

INFORMATION

72

Tuesday, December 26, 1967 12: 14 1.
6:30 p. m.

Mr. President:

Herewith Sec. McNamara's response to Gen. Westmoreland's suggestions concerning returning Vietnam veterans.

Free file

W. W. Rostow

WWRostow:rlh

72a

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20301

22 DEC 1967

MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRESIDENT

SUBJECT: Vietnam Veterans

I have reviewed General Westmoreland's letter to you of 11 December concerning actions which are being taken or could be taken to facilitate the transition of the departing serviceman to a useful, productive life as a civilian.

With regard to General Westmoreland's suggestion for a motion picture film to illustrate for the serviceman the magnitude of our achievement in Vietnam and the role the individual serviceman has played in that achievement, I am sure that such a picture would be useful. We will begin joint planning with General Westmoreland's staff on the production of such a film. With regard to the other films which General Westmoreland suggested, the Veterans Administration now has one in production designed to cover the specific education and training programs which are available. I understand that this film will be ready for distribution soon. It is possible that this film will serve the purpose of the other films suggested by General Westmoreland. In any case I agree with the desirability of using motion pictures for the purposes suggested and I will have the matter explored further.

We have in being, a number of programs designed to assist the serviceman who is being separated from the service. The military departments have updated and improved their separation counselling programs. In accordance with your instructions, we now inform the Department of Labor of the home address for every discharged serviceman, and that Department is now providing a personalized service to those men. Under this program, each discharged serviceman is to be contacted by the U. S. Employment Service in his local community and offered assistance in securing employment or in retraining or upgrading his skills. As part of this program, each separating serviceman receives a letter from the Secretary of Labor and from the Governor or other high official in his home state welcoming him back into the civilian community and offering assistance in his transition to civil life.

There is in the planning stage a Federal Inter-Agency program spearheaded by the Veterans Administration, to insure that every veteran is given the maximum assistance to which he is entitled in effecting the adjustment to civilian life. This program envisions a single centralized location where returning veterans can receive one-stop service concerning their rights, benefits, and educational and job opportunities, to include possible affiliation with social action programs such as the Peace Corps, Job Corps, Teachers Corps, etc.

One of our principal concerns involves the serviceman who has not had the opportunity to acquire a civilian related skill or to upgrade his education prior to his return to civilian life. For this man we have established Project TRANSITION, which will provide maximum in-service skill training or education during the last 6 months of his service. This program will reach many of the Vietnam servicemen who have returned to duty stations within the United States. The concept of this skill and education program is to provide marketable civilian skills so that the men may make a favorable economic adjustment after they leave military service. During the last few months we have already developed training programs sponsored by our own military bases, Federal agencies and private industry at our pilot installations. For example, at the Naval Hospital at Oakland, California, and Walter Reed Army Medical Center we are giving training for post office workers to combat disabled Marines and soldiers prior to separation. During the last 6 months at Fort Knox, some 800 men, many of whom were Vietnam veterans, completed training in a variety of skill trades or for completion of high school equivalency level of education.

There has been great interest by industry in satisfying its manpower needs through cooperative transition training programs at or near military bases. The program has high promise not only for the man without a marketable skill but for others who wish to upgrade existing skills. Furthermore, Project TRANSITION -- which I have directed be in operation at all our major installations in January 1968 -- is an ideal vehicle for counselling and training servicemen to take up vocations where significant civilian shortages exist, e. g. policemen, medical technicians, etc.

With regard to the role suggested for national veterans and service organizations, it is of interest to note that several of these have already undertaken special projects to assist returning veterans. The Department of Defense is currently cooperating with the National Urban League and the Junior Chamber of Commerce (JAYCEES) in two such endeavors.

These various programs are in complete accord with General Westmoreland's stated views. They are designed to channel the returning veteran into gainful and meaningful employment or to assist in the furtherance of his education to the maximum of his abilities -- all to the end that he will continue to make a significant contribution to the Nation -- this time as a responsible citizen in the local civilian community.

Robert S. Westmoreland

TOP SECRET

Tuesday, December 19, 1967

TEXT OF CABLE FROM GENERAL WESTMORELAND (MAC 11956)

I have received your message which raises the old spectre of "Why do we fight the enemy near the borders?" I welcome the opportunity to state my views again on this subject, because it gets at the basic issues of how this war must be fought.

The enemy has chosen to concentrate major elements of his NVA forces along the borders in Quang Tri, Kontum/Pleiku, and northwestern III Corps so that he can launch major attacks against SVN to gain a psychological and political victory, while at the same time retaining the best hope of disengaging when defeated. He has demonstrated this strategy by his recent incursions near Con Thien, Dak To, and in the Loc Ninh/Song Be areas. In each of these battles, the targets of the enemy attacks, and the big chance for an exploitable psychological victory, were the closest major GVN/US positions to the border and the populated areas surrounding them. In the north his targets were marine and ARVN positions at Con Thien, Gio Linh and Dong Ha and the populated areas of Quang Tri. In Kontum it was the position at Dak To and the whole of the populated valleys along Route 14. At Loc Ninh and Song Be it was the district and province headquarters and the population centers nearby--as graphically demonstrated by the grisly attack on the village of Dak Son where the murder of civilians was abominable.

When the enemy moves across the borders we must strike him as soon as he is within reach, and before he can gain a victory or tyrannize the local population. We cannot permit him to strike the confidence of the SVN people in ultimate victory or to bolster his own morale with successes. To do otherwise would be to deliver to him, without contest, the very objectives which he seeks. However, we do not stand along the border and catch the enemy as he enters. Rather, we take every step to meet him and stop him before he reaches his objectives. The recent battle of Dak To is a good example. We knew the enemy was on the move towards Dak To and Highway 14. We moved forces, not to the border, but to Dak To, from which we could base our operations so that the enemy could not overrun any portion of the populated areas of Kontum, and at the same time maneuver against him. It is important to realize that our most

TOP SECRET

DECLASSIFIED

E.O. 12356, Sec 3.3

DA Memo. Jan 5, 1983

By 119 NARA Date 1-16-92

recent Hamlet Evaluation Survey shows the 84.3 percent of the population of Kontum Province is under GVN control. If we intentionally let the enemy deep into Kontum Province, we would be taking a major step backwards. In time people (in that Province) could feel, justifiably, that they had been let down, the Refugee Program would be enormous and the first step in total erosion of our posture in this country would have begun.

In addition to the psychological, political and economic impact of a withdrawal policy, it is also unsound from a military standpoint. If we let the enemy into such places as Kontum, he will be in a position to isolate GVN positions (which must be maintained to protect the people and their land), interdict the roads and forces US deploy and support our forces entirely by air. This is a very difficult task, as was proven in 1965 in the highlands when the enemy succeeded in cutting all roads and isolating all towns. Also, once the enemy gets established in SVN Proper, he is not necessarily an easier target to destroy. In fact, the opposite is the case. If, for example, we had to engage the enemy along the populated valleys of Kontum, rather than in the difficult (but unpopulated) terrain southwest of Dak To, we would have a much more serious proposition. We cannot apply our firepower with as much freedom, we permit him to get at potential sources of food to sustain his forces and we give him more maneuver room, also I am certain that, if we did not fight the enemy at Con Thien or near Dak To, it would have cost us at least twice as much in military casualties (not to mention civilian casualties) and would have taken at least twice as long to do the job. We have had plenty of experience in fighting NVA Divisions that have gotten adrift deep within SVN and it is not an attractive proposition. To surround and destroy such an enemy is most difficult. The 2d NVA Division got into Quang Tri Province last year and we have been fighting it ever since. We have had an almost uninterrupted battle in that area since May of this year, in which we have inflicted approximately 7,000 casualties on the enemy, and have suffered nearly 1,000 killed in action on our part. The 3d NVA Division has been in southern Quang Ngai and northern Binh Dinh for over a year. And, the 1st Cavalry Division has had its hands full in searching them out and destroying them in that highly populated area. In addition to fighting NVA Divisions in the populated areas we have plenty of evidence that fighting combinations of local forces, main forces and guerrillas in such places as Hau Nghia and Tay Ninh is not a fast, cheap road to victory. Since May 1967 the 25th US Division has been devoted entirely to this task in operations Kolo Kolo, Barking Sands and Diamond Head. During the period 11 May - 7 December the Division has suffered 324 killed in action, while killing 1,686 enemy. These figures are remarkably comparable to the Dak To fighting--except that the Hau Nghia - Tay Ninh fight kept a whole division tied down for seven months whereas Dak To took three weeks.

If we do not violently contest every attempt to get NVA units into SVN, we permit him to expand his system of bases in-country. He is in a better position to support the local forces and the guerrillas in the vital battle for the people. Conversely, the main forces are in a better position to levy taxes on the people, to get their rice and to prove to the people, visibly, that the NVA is very much alive in SVN. When we engage the enemy near the borders, we often preempt his plans and force him to fight before he is fully organized and before he can do his damage. Although such fighting gets high visibility in the press, it has low visibility to the people of South Vietnam since it is not being fought in their front yard. This is how they would like it to continue.

The idea that we can't fight the enemy along the borders without seriously diverting forces from the populated areas is not entirely sound. Again, let's look at Dak To. When the battle started to shape up we had one battalion in Kontum. As the enemy moved, we took advantage of our mobility and rapidly built up our US forces to nine battalions, drawing down from selected areas for minimum periods of time. We have already returned the two 1st Cavalry Battalions to Binh Dinh. One was away for about ten days, the other for about one month. Temporary drawdowns, of this nature do not raise havoc with the pacification process, but they do contribute enormously to the defeat of the enemy in the areas where he elects to concentrate. In general, I keep my reserves in the populated areas (along the coast in II Corps) where they can be productively employed to grind down the enemy while awaiting other missions.

As to the idea that fighting near the borders creates pressures for escalatory action against the out-of-country sanctuaries, I find this reverse reasoning. The fact that the enemy is gainfully using these sanctuaries from which to mount his attacks is what stimulates our desire to strike them. If we elect not to protect the border provinces, the enemy would still use these sanctuaries to avoid the attacks by fire that we can apply to in-country bases. We would still be faced with the decision of attacking or granting immunity to these bases. By contacting him at the borders and thereby exposing the fact that he is making tactical use of these sanctuaries as a part of the border battlefields, we are simply putting the spotlight on a hard fact of life which cannot be ignored by the tactical commander, despite a full realization of the political implications. We have had a hard time in the past convincing the world that this war was an invasion. By forcing the enemy to fight on the borders, from his sanctuaries, we bring frontier defense into sharp and realistic focus.

I can see absolutely no psychological or military advantage to a strategy that would intentionally invite the war east towards the coast. It would be retrogressive, costly in casualties and refugees, and almost certainly prolong the war.

TOP SECRET

75

INFORMATION

TOP SECRET

Tuesday, December 26, 1967
8:55 a.m.

Pres file

Mr. President:

This is a first-rate response by
Gen. Westmoreland to the question: Why do we fight the enemy near the borders?

I thought you would like to read it.

W. W. Rostow

TOP SECRET

WWRostow:rla

DECLASSIFIED

E.O. 12958, Sec. 3.4(b)

White House Guidelines, Feb. 24, 1983

By h3, NND, Date 12-26-91