H-13 Sioux: "Angel of Mercy" in Korea

Say "M.A.S.H." to most people and they will conjure an image of a flimsy helicopter flying patients into a tent hospital in the opening sequence from the television series of the same name. The Bell 47, dubbed the H-13 Sioux by the Army, with its distinctive "goldfish bowl" cockpit cover was responsible for between 18,000 and 20,000 evacuations during the Korean War (1951-53). This accomplishment is remarkable, given the limitations of the aircraft. The "D" series used for MedEvac service was underpowered, highly vulnerable to ground fire and required up to eight hours of maintenance and pre flight checks for each hour of flight. It had to have a level landing area and could only fly at treetop level at best when loaded with wounded. In spite of its limitations, the H-13 was largely responsible for the reduction in battlefield mortality to 2.5 per 100 wounded in Korea, down from 4.5 in World War 11. It is this achievement that makes the H-13D a seminal aircraft in the history of the Army Medical Department.

Between 1947 and 1973 over 6,200 versions of the Bell 47 (H-13) were built. Thousands are still in service. Besides civilian uses like crop dusting and traffic observation, more than 40 armies of various nations have used the Bell 47.

The AMEDD Museum is pleased to announce the acquisition of the H-13D. It has been restored at Fort Sam Houston in its medical configuration. The H-13 is placed next to the UH-1 "Huey" for side-by-side comparison in the museum outdoor exhibit pergola. Both aircraft have been acquired with the support of the AMEDD Museum Foundation, Inc.
