HOWARD K. SMITH: It may not happen, but with the general downgrading of the United States by Asians we ought to give it some thought. I mean a move by North Korea against South Korea. There's a logic favoring such a move: a) Kim Il SUNG of North Korea has indicated often and openly and recently that it has never left his mind; b) his opponent General PARK of South Korea has applied repression -- though nothing like KIM's in the North -- repressions which have disunified and weakened South Korea, and c) South Korea's main support, the United States, has just lost its first war ever and has little stomach for another land war in Asia at present. But if KIM doesn't act soon we may somehow regain stomach. There's a countervailing logic also, China may oppose an adventure by KIM that might cause the U.S. to lose interest in Asia and leave China alone on the Asian continent facing a hostile Russia and also possibly facing a Japan going nuclear because of lost confidence in the U.S. Also the U.S. mood is unpredictable, it is such that one more nasty slap might just cause a quick change of heart in favor of blowing KIM to kingdom come, especially since unlike Indochina our interests should be clear in this case, the Korean Peninsula points straight at Japan. I don't know which logic will prevail but it might influence things if we made up our minds soberly, now and indicated our thoughts to KIM early. Congress would have to do that. I had the impression President FORD has already made up his mind, he would be for fighting.

Due to insufficient space items of relevance to DOD from the CBS Morning News and the Today Show NBC News of May 14, 1975 have not been included.

PLEASE NOTE: Complete transcripts of the following are available:

Special Report: Phnom Penh After the Fall CBS Radio May 8, 1975.

Evening Edition EE TV May 12, 1975 Ambassador Basheer, spokesman for President Sadat.

Evening Edition EE TV May 13, 1975 Ambassadors of Thailand and Australia.

CBS Morning News CBS TV May 13, 1975 Ike Pappas and Phil Jones discuss the Mayaguez.

Tomorrow NBC TV May 13, 1975 Senator McGovern.

First Line Report CBS Radio May 13, 1975 Daniel Schorr comments on the last days of the Nixon presidency.

Walter Cronkite CBS Radio May 12, 1975 Substitute Hottelet on Cambodia.

News WAVA Radio May 12, 1975 Report on Rep. Aspin charges against Army regarding nuclear security.

UPI World Desk UPI Radio May 13, 1975 Statement by Capt. Hill.

News WAVA Radio May 13, 1975 Report on Marines on the alert.

The World Tonight CBS Radio May 12, '75 Report on the Mayaguez.

News WAVA Radio May 13, 1975 Marines flying back to Indochina.

Radio Net Alert News Report CBS Radio 5/14 Statement by Secretary Laitin.

DECLASSIFIED

CURRENT NEWS

PART I - EARLY BIRD EDITION - 0730

PART II - MAIN EDITION - PUBLISHED AT 1130

THIS PUBLICATION IS PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL NEWS ITEMS OF INTEREST TO THEM IN THEIR OFFICIAL CAPACITIES; IT IS NOT INTENDED TO SUBSTITUTE FOR NEWSPAPERS, PERIODICALS AND BROADCASTS AS A MEANS OF KEEPING INFORMED ABOUT THE NATURE, MEANING AND IMPACT OF NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL NEWS DEVELOPMENTS. USE OF THESE ARTICLES HERE, OF COURSE, DOES NOT REFLECT OFFICIAL ENDORSEMENT. FURTHER REPRODUCTION FOR PRIVATE USE OR GAIN IS SUBJECT TO THE ORIGINAL COPYRIGHT RESTRICTIONS.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 14, 1975

WASHINGTON POST 14 MAY 1975 Pg. 21

Spain Stiffens Stand on Bases

By Miguel Acoca
Special to The Washington Post

MADRID, May 13—Spain has put in question basing rights for American nuclear submarines during deadlocked negotiations with the United States about renewing the bilateral defense agreement, according to authoritative sources.

Spain's hardened stand over the continued presence of U.S. Polaris submarines in Rota, a nuclear naval station in southern Spain, followed earlier requests that the United States abandon Torrejon air base near Madrid and give up the presently inactive Moron air base in the south.

Because of its strategic location at the western entrance of the Mediterranean, Rota is considered vital to anti-Soviet defenses. The number of Polaris nuclear missiles at Rota have been the subject of negotiation between the United States and the Soviet Union at the SALT talks.

(See BASES, Pg. 2)

GENERAL NEWS SUMMARY
FROM THE WALL STREET JOURNAL
MAY 14, 1975
World-Wide

CAMBODIAN GUNFIRE hit a U.S. plane flying over a seized American ship.

The U.S. surveillance plane suffered minor damage and landed safely after being fired on while observing the merchant ship in the Gulf of Thailand. That vessel, previously believed taken to a port, is lying 30 miles off the coast guarded by two Cambodian gunboats. Pentagon sources said 1,000 Marines on Okinawa had been alerted and 150 would be flown to a U.S. base in Thailand. But Thailand said it wouldn't permit its bases to be used in attacking Cambodia.

President Ford met with the National Security Council and again demanded immediate release of the cargo ship and its 39 American crewmen. But he didn't set a deadline.

Ford would consult Congress before taking any military action to retrieve the ship, although he has "certain inherent powers"

(See NEWS SUMMARY, Pg. 3)

NEW YORK TIMES 14 MAY 1975 Pg. 17

Japanese Fearful of Conflict in Korea

By RICHARD HALLORAN
Special to The New York Times

TOKYO, May 13—A Japanese official, asked what the long-run impact of the fall of Indochina would have on Japan, jabbed the air slightly with his chopsticks and shot out a one-word answer: "Korea."

"Indochina is of no real concern to us," he continued a moment later. "We are sorry about the refugees and all that. But it is a long way from us. Korea is our neighbor next door."

All over Tokyo, conservative politicians, officials, businessmen, and foreign diplomats and businessmen produced the same answer with the same speed. All were concerned that Korea would be the next battlefield in Asia and that this would have unhappy, if unpredictable, consequences for Japan.

The Japanese and Foreigners noted the basic objective of Communist North Korea to take over the South, the example of Communist successes in Indochina, the recent trip to Peking by President Kim Il Sung of North Korea seeking Chinese support, and reports that he would travel to Moscow soon for similar reasons.

Repression in South

The sources further suggested that President Kim might be tempted by the unrest in South Korea caused by President Park Chung Hee's political repression. "If there was only a way to replace Park Chung Hee," one Japanese sighed. "There are so many people who could run that country better and be more effectively anti-Communist."

Beyond Korea, politically aware Japanese have shown since the fall of Saigon that: ¶The confusion of their relationship with the United States has become accentuated. They fear that the United States will abandon them and want reassurances on the American security commitment. At the

(See CONFLICT, Pg.2)

NEW YORK TIMES 14 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

U.S. Alerts West Pacific Forces After Cambodian Ship Seizure

By PHILIP SHABECOFF
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 13—United States marines, warships and planes have been placed on alert in the western Pacific following the seizure of an American merchant ship yesterday by Cambodian gunboats, Administration officials said today.

The officials said a 1,000-man Marine battalion on Okinawa had been alerted for possible participation in operations to rescue the vessel, the unarmed container ship Mayagüez.

One source said that about 100 marines had been sent to Thailand for possible use as a boarding party to rescue the crew of the ship.

Ron Nessen, the White House press secretary, said President Ford would consult with Congress before ordering the use of force to retrieve the vessel. Mr. Nessen briefed reporters after Mr. Ford had met with the National Security Council.

Crew of 39 Aboard

The White House would make no public statement on either military or diplomatic efforts to obtain the release of the ship and its crew of 39 Americans. But officials said the basic strategy under consideration involved the use of air or sea power to prevent the ship from being taken into a Cambodian harbor.

High-ranking sources familiar with military strategy and planning said privately that the seizure of the vessel might provide the test of American determination in Southeast Asia that, they asserted, the United States has been seeking since the collapse of allied governments in South Vietnam and Cambodia.

The Mayagüez was fired on and seized by two Cambodian gunboats early yesterday 8 miles off the Wai Islands, a group of rocky islets 60 miles from the Cambodian coast.

Was Not Taken to Port

Yesterday, White House spokesmen said the ship had been taken to the port of Sihanoukville, known as Kompong Som under the previous regime. But by this morning it was evident that the Mayagüez and the gunboats had halted off Tang Island, 30 miles from the port.

With the ship 30 miles from the coast, American officials said, there was hope that military power could be interposed to prevent it from being taken to the mainland. The officials conceded that there were serious military and political problems in any such operation.

The Government of Thailand has stated publicly that it would not allow the use of Thai bases by planes, ships or troops for a military operation against Cambodia.

Actually United States aircraft based in Thailand are already being used for around-the-clock surveillance of the Mayagüez, administration sources disclosed privately. Publicly, the Government will not say where the planes are coming from, for fear of exacerbating the delicate political

(See ALERTS, Pg. 2)

JAMES KILLINGBECK, CHIEF, CURRENT NEWS BRANCH, OX 78765 HELEN YOUNG, ASSISTANT CHIEF

FOR SPECIAL RESEARCH SERVICES OR DISTRIBUTION CALL HARRY ZUBKOFF, CHIEF, EXECUTIVE AGENCY SERVICE, OX 52884

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASH POST 14 MAY Pg. 35

Japan Asks U.S. To Control Forces

Reuter

TOKYO, May 13—Japanese Foreign Minisger Kiichi Miyazawa today asked U.S. Ambassador James Hodgson to take necessary mearsures to prevent recurrence of an incident in which a U.S. Marine is alleged to have raped two teenage girls in Okinawa last month, Foreign Ministry sources said.

Police said Pfc. Sammy Flores of a Marine Corps unit at Camp Hansen in Okinawa had been sent to the district prosecutor's office on a charge of raping the two girls, aged 15 and 13, after knocking them unconscious. Hodson repled that he would ask the U.S. forces in Japan to maintain discipline, they said.S

CONFLICT -- CONTINUED

same time, there is considerable gloating over the American defeat in Indochina.

¶They are worried about Communist infiltration into Thailand, a good trading partner and site of Japanese investments, and later into Malaysia, Singapore and Indonesia, thus threatening sources of supply as well as the shipping and oil lifeline that extends through the Strait of Malacca.

¶They are prepared to carry on their relationships with North Vietnam and South Vietnam pragmatically. The Japanese Ambassador to Saigon and his staff were accidentally left behind during the evacuation but have established initial contact with the new Government there.

¶At home, trends toward greater awareness of their own security needs, toward resistance to the treaty to halt the spread of nuclear arms and toward revision of the Constitution to enhance the status of the small Self-Defense Forces have accelerated slightly.

It is equally clear, however, that Premier Takeo Miki's administration has done little to formulate a new policy to act on the new Japanese perceptions of the region around them.

Japanese officials suggested that their Government might increase its cc economic aid to South Korea and Southeast Asian nations to shore up their anti-Communist posture. But inquiries about political initiatives drew only polite smiles or blank stares.

The speed with which a consensus on Korea and its dangers seems to evolved has been striking. The Japanese, in their innate caution and groping for agreement, usually take plenty of time. In this instance, proximity and history appear to have dictated a swift reaction.

Ever since the turn of the century, the Japanese have considered Korea "the dagger pointed at the throat of Japan." That concept was used to justify Japanese colonial rule from 1905 to 1945.

Today, the Japanese fear that turmoil in Korea, where national interests of the United States, the Soviet Union, China and Japan are involved, could further unsettle the uneasy balance of power in Asia.

Moreover, they fear that a unified Korea, whether under the Communists or non-Communists, would be a potential threat since there are more than four times as many men under arms on the Korean peninsula as in Japan.

More immediately, South Korea is a major Japanese trading partner and recipient of Japanese investment and loans. Turbulence there would almost certainly jeopardize those economic interests.

Second only to Japanese anxiety over Korea is an emotional thrashing about as the Japanese ponder their relations with the United States. The confusion was illustrated in a series of articles in Asahi Shimbun, a major daily newspaper.

Shortly before Saigon fell, a columnist in the Asahi said: "More than anything else, the Vietnam war was a defeat for American civilization."

Several days later, however, the columnist asked: "Can the United States really be depended upon in the case of an emergency?" Answering, he said: "The curtain is gradually being rung down on the age when one was safe if one depended on the nuclear umbrella of the United States."

The column concluded: "There is need for further strengthening of friendly relations with surrounding nations," an allusion to China and the Soviet Union.

More recently, another commentary in the same newspaper said: "Despite the widespread demands in Japan for moving away from the United States, the time may be here for examining more realistically what the options are."

The commentary went on: "Bluntly, talk of moving away from the United States is unrealistic if this means severing the massive Japan-United States ties that have been developed." These include immense trade and investment, and a mutual security pact.

Premier Miki and the governing Liberal-Democratic party seem unable to move in this situation because of diplomatic inertia that has built up over the years. Japan's foreign policy has been to stay out of conflicts of any kind, to maintain good relations with as many nations as possible and to rely on the United States diplomatically and militarily.

Within the governing party itself, there is no fundamental consensus between the conservatives and liberals or between the older, senior men and their juniors. Between the liberal Democrats and and the leftist opposition is an evidently unbridgeable chasm.

Thus, said an Asahi commentary, "neither side has answers for what Japan must do now in Asia."

ALERTS -- CONTINUED

situation.

One of the Thailand-based aircraft, a Navy P-3 Orion reconnaissance plane, was hit by small arms fire as it swooped low over the merchant ship today, officials reported. They said that the unarmed plane had been forced by cloud cover to fly at a low altitude. It reportedly was not seriously damaged and was able to complete its flight.

The original operations plan, the officials said, was to airlift the Marine battalion to U Taphao air base in Thailand. But when word of the alert leaked out and Premier Kukrit Pramoj said in Bangkok that Thailand could not be used as a staging area, the use of the battalion became doubtful. American officials said privately that the Thai warning might be intended chiefly for domestic consumption.

Meanwhile, the aircraft carrier Coral Sea, which had been en route to Australia to celebrate the anniversary of the World War II battle of the Coral Sea, has been diverted and is now sailing toward the Gulf of Siam. Other ships from the Seventh Fleet, including destroyers, have also been ordered to move toward the gulf.

The Coral Sea was said to be one day's sail from the Mayagüez and none of the other ships is in the immediate vicinity.

Comment by Kissinger

Secretary of State Kissinger, answering questions at a news conference in Kansas City, said diplomatic efforts were also in progress. He said the Government was proceeding "with deliberation and determination" and would not make any decisions under pressure.

Several members of Congress who saw Mr. Ford privately today came away with the impression that he did not intend to order the use of force in the immediate future.

Senator Jacob K. Javits, Republican of New York, told reporters after having emerged from the White House that the President had not decided at this point to take military action.

"He is keeping his shirt on," Senator Javits said.

At today's White House briefing, Mr. Nessen reported that air surveillance showed there were Cambodians aboard the Mayagüez. When asked whether Americans were still aboard, Mr. Nesse replied, "I can't go into that."

When asked whether the Mayagüez had been engaged in spying or any activity other than carrying cargo, Mr. Nessen replied, "The answer to that is a flat no."

The Globe and Mail, Toronto

PEKING, Wednesday, May 14—Diplomatic efforts to obtain the release of the Mayagüez are believed to have included contacts yesterday between the United States Liaison Office here and the office of Prince Norodom Sihanouk, titular head of state of the Cambodian Government. Spokesmen for the mission and for the prince both declined to comment in response to newsmen's queries.

George Bush, chief of the liaison office, spent the morning visiting the Great Wall and the Ming Tombs north of Peking in the company of Secretary of Commerce Rogers C. B. Morton, who is here as his personal guest. Mr. Bush returned to the office shortly after noon, possibly to supervise the relaying of messages from Washington to the Cambodians.

A channel for contact with Prince Sihanouk was opened last month when the liaison office relayed a cease-fire proposal from the then Cambodian Government to the prince, who rejected it. The Communist-led insurgents captured Phnom Penh shortly afterward.

Western diplomats thought it likely that United States efforts to retrieve the ship would also include representations to the Chinese Foreign Ministry, which maintains close contact with Prince Sihanouk and the Phnom Penh Government. The diplomats said the United States would probably ask Peking to use its influence with the Cambodians.

BASES -- CONTINUED

President Ford and Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger are expected to try to break the bases deadlock when they stop here for an overnight visit May 31. Officials were not optimistic however.

Mr. Ford is scheduled to confer with Chief of State Francisco Franco. But sources familiar with the negotiations said that Franco will not yield on essential issues such as formal recognition of Spain's contribution to Western defense, new equipment for the Spanish armed forces and a general revision of Spain's security arrangement with the United States.

A sign that Spain is preparing to take a more independent course in defense issues came last week with the announcement that the government will develop a weapons industry and increase funds for new arms.

Spain has made it clear, sources said, that it expects Washington to upgrade the defense relationship between the two countries. The present agreement expires in September.

Sources said that, in explaining their stand, Spanish officers participating in the talks have told U.S. negotiators that unless they remain firm and obtain favorable terms the regime will have difficulty with young officers who are demanding a greater voice in defense affairs.

It is no secret that the Spanish military have been disdainful of the quality of U.S. war materiel received under the present agreement. The Spanish navy rejected three U.S. destroyers some time back and found that re-equipping a helicopter carrier cost more than building a new one.

In many respects, the Spanish position on the bases is obviously designed to increase their bargaining leverage, but there is no doubt that it is also an attempt to assuage public opinion. Some months ago a poll showed that 48 per cent of those questioned opposed U.S. military bases in Spain.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK TIMES - 14 MAY 1975 Pg. 3

Kissinger Firmer on Detente Line

He Seeks to Bolster Political Stand by Talks in Midwest

By LESLIE H. GELB

Secretary of State Kissinger has been off in the American heartland giving speeches in an attemp to fill a policy vacuum left by the setbacks in Indochina and to shore up his political position in Washington.

News Analysis

One speech indicated he was taking a tougher line on détente to reestablish closer ties with allies. He is noting that it has become increasingly difficult to pursue better relations with Moscow and at the same time keep alliances together.

The second speeech held out an olive branch to the developing world. Again, Mr. Kissinger is pointing out that it has become increasingly difficult to maintain the economic security of the industrialized world without also coming to terms with the new demands of the third world.

Mr. Kissinger's aides have been telling him that although he is under fire in Washington, his popularity is still strong in the countryside. It is time, in their judgment, to send this message back to the capital.

In St. Louis two days ago the subject was detente.

"The willingness of the Soviet Union to exploit strategic opportunities—even though some of these opportunities presented themselves spontaneously and not as a result of Soviet action —constitutes a heavy mortgage on detente," Mr. Kissinger said.

'Our Allies and Friends'

This Administration considers our allies and friends our first priort priority," he added.

If Mr. Kissinger acts on this statement of priorities, it will mark a shift in policy that has long centered on Soviet-United States relations.

In Kansas City, yesterday Mr. Kissinger said that the United States was ready to negotiate new arrangements on energy with the developing countries and, of special concern to them, commodity prices.

The first speech will help Mr. Kissinger with conservatives, particularly in the Republican party, who after years of relatively quiet under President Richard M. Nixon are now publicly accusing the Secretary of State of having sold out to detente with Moscow. Mr. Kissinger is telling them that he is as wary of the Russians as they are.

The second speech might help Mr. Kissinger with the liberals, particularly in the Democratic party, who have been charging the Secretary with neglect of the third world.

But here, he also drew the line for the conservatives by underlining that the United States would resist demands for "a totally new economic order founded on ideology and national self-interest."

"The expansion of Soviet military power and its extension around the world is a serious concern to us," Mr. Kissinger said in St. Louis.

"The United States is determined to maintain the hopeful new trends in U.S.-Soviet relations on the basis of realism and reciprocity. But it is equally determined to resist pressures or the exploitation of local conflict."

Mr. Kissinger noted progress in avoiding nuclear war and in achieving stability in Europe and added:

"If detente turns into a formula for more selective exploitation of opportunities, the new trends in U.S.—Soviet relations will be in jeopardy. If our contention in peripheral areas persists, even more if it becomes exacerbated, the progress achieved in other areas of detentewill ultimately be undermined."

This was Mr. Kissinger's linkage theme, stated so often in the early days of the Nixon Administration and then dropped.

Mr. Kissinger's public remarks in recent months have been edging ever closer to a tougher stance with Moscow, particularly on the Middle East, Portugal and Indochina. According to Administration officials, the Secretary's of underscoring these points at this time does several things.

It signals Moscow that the Ford Administration is going to expect more "pve" from Soviet lileaders in a whole rang of negotiations: the Middle East, strategic nuclear arms, the European security conference, and mutal force reductions talks in Central Europe.

Mr. Kissinger will meet with the Soviet Foreign Minister, Andrei A. Grumyko, in Vienna next week to discuss these issues.

It signals Chinese leaders that Mr. Kissinger is not so committed to detente with Moscow as to let down the United States military guard or to neglect Chinese-American relations.

In recent months, Chinese leaders have reportedly been ignoring Mr. Kissinger and praising Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger for his hardline on Moscow.

Finally, Mr. Kissinger's new tone, if not new policy, on detente serves to reassure allies that their interests will not be sacrificed. Allies have been watching the Secretary of State walk the detente line with a mixture of admiration, anxiety and confusion.

WASHINGTON POST
14 MAY 1975 Pg. 23

* Radio Free Europe, the American-financed station broadcasting to Communist East Europe, announced in Munich that it will reduce its staff by 100 to save money.

NEWS SUMMARY ... CONTINUED

to use force to protect American lives, Secretary of State Kissinger said. It was understood that the administration has ruled out giving anything to Cambodia in return for the ship. Ford isn't expected to agree to a compromise or apology, as was done in 1969 to get the Pueblo crew from North Korea.

China's first deputy premier, Teng Hsiao-ping, said in Paris that he couldn't confirm reports that the U.S. had asked Peking to intervene with the Phnom Penh government to free the freighter.

* * *

Britain and Italy recognized the new government of South Vietnam, and United Press International reported from Saigon that the Communists are willing to establish diplomatic ties with the U.S. Hundreds of refugees who fled to Saigon during the last weeks of the war were reported returning to their home provinces.

Refugee assistance of $405 million was approved by the House Appropriations Committee. Congress was told that cumbersome security checks, along with dwindling funds, have slowed resettlement of Vietnamese refugees in the U.S. to only about 100 a day.

The U.S. has decided to evacuate some of the 1,000 Americans in Laos, a country increasingly dominated by the pro-Communist Pathet Lao, UPI reported. Meanwhile, a veteran diplomat, Galen Stone, was nominated to be U.S. ambassador to Laos.

* * *

Kissinger said industrial nations must adjust their food, energy and raw-materials policies to meet needs of poor nations, but he rejected the demand from some of them for a "totally new economic order." He said the U.S. disapproves of setting commodity prices by political means and indexing the prices to inflation.

* * *

Melvin Laird said Ford should give Republican conservatives a chance to dump Vice President Rockefeller at the GOP convention, thus perhaps making them less likely to dump Ford. Laird, who is a close Ford adviser, said the President didn't seem to favor the idea.

* * *

A meeting to revise the Rio Pact of 1947, under which the Cuban embargo was imposed in 1964, was proposed at the current Organization of American States foreign ministers meeting in Washington. The OAS is expected to set a meeting for July in Costa Rica at which delegates could remove legal barriers to ending the embargo with only a majority vote.

Sen. George McGovern (D., S.D.), who visited Cuba last week, said Castro has given clear signals that he is ready to improve relations with the U.S. McGovern suggested lifting the embargo on sales of food and medicine to Cuba.

* * *

President Park Chung Hee of South Korea revived a lapsed ban on all public opposition to his dictatorship and on publication of dissenting views. He cited what he termed a growing danger of invasion by North Korea.

* * *

A jailed Philippine politician whom President Ferdinand Marcos has charged with murder and subversion will end his 40-day hunger strike today, his wife said. The politician, former Sen. Benigno Aquino, is to go on trial shortly.

* * *

A new government of Chad was set up by Gen. Felix Malloum, who was freed from prison in a coup in the north central African nation last month. He holds the top posts.

* * *

School children whose native tongue isn't English should be taught chiefly in their primary language while learning English as a second language, the U.S. Civil Rights Commission said. Special instruction in English for such children already is required.

* * *

California repealed all previous prohibitions governing private sexual behavior by persons 18 years of age or over.

* * *

Four Lebanese ministers quit Premier Rashid Solh's cabinet, making his own resignation almost inevitable. They protested his handling of clashes last month between Palestinians and Phalangist rightists who claim the guerrillas' presence in Lebanon prompts Israeli attacks. Israel raided southern Lebanon yesterday for the second day in a row.

Israeli military censors confirmed a report that they had banned a book about Secretary of State Kissinger's peace mediation effort following the 1973 war. Sources in Jerusalem said the book contained quotes from Kissinger about Arab and Soviet leaders that would greatly embarrass Kissinger if published.

Syria closed its air space to Iraq's airliners in a worsening of their dispute based on use of Euphrates River water.

* * *

Turkish Premier Suleyman Demirel was punched in the nose in what the government described as an assassination attempt. It said the assailant, a leftist, used brass knuckles and broke Demirel's nose.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WEDNESDAY MORNING, 14 MAY 1975

NEW YORK TIMES - 14 MAY 1975 Pg. 16

Asian Crises Raise Question of Risk for Reporters

By MARTIN ARNOLD

Since the days of Richard Harding Davis and young Winston Churchill, people have had the notion that reporters, and particularly foreign correspondents, live a life of dangerous glamour.

There are other less flattering notions, to be sure, but generally the movies and television have added to the swashbuckling image.

Sometimes the reality and the fantasy merge and a correspondent's life is in danger. The most recent occasion was the fall of the American-supported Governments in Cambodia and South Vietnam.

Unable to Send Reports

Those events raised questions for correspondents and news-gathering organizations: Were they important enough in terms of the public's interest for reporters to risk their lives to get out the news? Is there ever a news story of such importance that it is worth such a risk? Is the matter more complex than one of risk?

The New York Times ordered its correspondents out of Cambodia and South Vietnam just before each country fell to the Communists, but Sydney H. Schanberg, its correspondent in Cambodia, remained. He was unable to file dispatches from the time of the Communist take-over on April 17 until May 8, when he reached Thailand.

Was it worth the risk insofar as the correspondent was "ineffective"—not able to file for so many days? Many journalists, but not all, agree that the risk was justified, and nearly all agree that the articles that finally emerged would make it seem that those who stayed were far from ineffective.

It is the policy of The Times not to allow its correspondents to stay on in such situations on the ground that no story is worth a man's life. James L. Greenfield, foreign editor of The Times, said however, that "if we thought there was to be a negotiated steelement between the two sides or the formation of a coalition government or some sort of governmental situation, then we would allow a correspondent to stay."

Self-Imposed Embargo

Mr. Schanberg's last dispatch from Cambodia appeared in The Times on April 18. For 13 days he, with other foreigners, including a few journalists, was in refuge in the French Embassy; he then spent three and a half days on the road to Thailand.

Once out of Cambodia the correspondents agreed to a self-imposed embargo until all foreign nationals had been evacuated. Mr. Schanberg's report on the situation in Cambodia appeared in The Times on May 9, the day the embargo was lifted.

No news-gathering organization would order a correspondent to stay in an area or situation in which his life was seriously endangered, but the matter is not that simple.

Murray Gart, chief of correspondents for Time, Inc., said: "The question for the newsman is really, How long is a reporter useful? At what point does the risk overwhelm his usefulness? If the reporter is going to get clobbered or is going to be locked in an embassy, then the risk is too great for someone who is not going to be effective."

Cut to the Minimum

William Small, senior vice president and director of news for CBS, Inc., said that it relied on its reporters for guidance, telling them that if there was any real danger it did not want them to stay. "We leaned on them to get out of Cambodia, and they did," he added. Some of CBS's part-time correspondents stayed, however.

Associated Press correspondents left Cambodia before the end, but three Asociated Press reporters stayed in Saigon and are still there.

"I ordered them to cut our Saigon staff to the minimum," said Wes Gallagher, president of The Associated Press. "It was a calculated risk, and it's hard to make the evaluation, but from our point of view it was worth the risk."

He said he had communications from his correspondents in Saigon.

Subtle factors may lead a correspondent to stay in a dangerous spot—factors beyond whether the story is worth the risk. Many a good reporter comes to see the situation he is covering as the most important there is, and he believes that his readers or viewers or listeners should know what is happening.

"I was here at the beginning and I think it's worth the risk to be here at the end," said Peter Arnett of The Associated Press in a message explaining why he was staying in Saigon.

Then too, some reporters develop euphoria amid the drama and the danger.

On the other hand, many correspondents are married and have families, and must take their personal responsibilities into consideration.

WASHINGTON POST
14 MAY 1975 Pg. 15

Ford Picks Stone for Laos Post

United Press International

President Ford yesterday named veteran diplomat Galen L. Stone as ambassador to Laos, where Communists are daily increasing their control of the government.

Stone will take over the post in Vientiane from Charles S. Whitehouse, named earlier to be ambassador to Thailand. The Senate must confirm Stone's appointment, a key political move in Southeast Asia.

Stone, 53, is a native of Brookline, Mass., graduated from Harvard University and was an Army officer during World War II.

Since 1973, Stone has been deputy chief of mission in Paris. Before that, he held diplomatic posts in India and South Vietnam. From 1969 to 1973, he was deputy chief of the American diplomatic mission in New Delhi, where he had also served from 1965 to 1968 as an assistant. In 1968-1969, he was a political counselor in Saigon.

Mr. Ford accepted the resignation of Joseph A. Mendehall as ambassador to the Malagasy Republic, and the resignation of Duane K. Craske as attorney for the District of Gaum. No successor was named to either post.

BALTIMORE SUN - 14 MAY 1975 Pg. 2

Zumwalt says U.S. verbally assured Thieu

Washington (AP)—Adm. Elmo R. Zumwalt, Jr. (Ret.) testified yesterday that the Joint Chiefs of Staff were instructed to prepare contingency plans for the use of force in case North Vietnam violated the Paris peace agreement.

He said it was "quite clear to me" in November, 1972, that verbal commitments had been given to South Vietnam and he assumed that congressional leaders also had been informed.

"But apparently they were not," said Admiral Zumwalt, who was chief of naval operations at the time of the negotiations for a truce in Vietnam.

He said he did not know that written commitments had been made by former President Nixon to former President Nguyen Van Thieu until the recent disclosure of letters by Mr. Nixon, written in December, 1972, and January, 1973.

In these letters Mr. Nixon told Mr. Thieu the United States intended to "take swift and severe retaliatory action" and would respond with "full force" if North Vietnam violated the peace agreement.

Admiral Zumwalt testified at a hearing of the Senate Judiciary Committee's Subcommittee on Separation of Powers that he had not known of these letters but that it had been clear that Mr. Thieu had "to be pressured and promised to go along" with the Paris accords.

The subcommittee is considering bills that would give the Senate or the House, or both, a veto over executive agreements made by the president with other nations.

Admiral Zumwalt testified that at a November, 1972, meeting in the White House Oval Office, the Joint Chiefs of Staff were instructed by Mr. Nixon to prepare contingency plans for the use of force if North Vietnam violated the peace agreement being negotiated.

NEW YORK TIMES
14 MAY 1975 Pg. 16

Kissinger Sees Atrocity In Events in Cambodia

ST. LOUIS, May 13 (AP)—Secretary of State Kissinger says that Cambodia is carrying out "an atrocity of major proportions" by forced marches and executions.

In a news conference here last night Mr. Kissinger said "very clear information" indicated that officers as low as the rank of second lieutenant in the defeated army and their wives were being killed and millions of Phnom Penh residents marched into rural areas where they will lack food before the November harvest.

Mr. Kissinger called the situation "a tragedy" where hospitals were emptied of the sick and wounded, who were forced to join in the evacuation.

BALTIMORE SUN
14 MAY 1975 Pg. 8

Train with missiles derails in Louisiana

Vinton, La. (AP)—A Southern Pacific freight train carrying antitank missiles and automobiles derailed here yesterday, forcing evacuation of three schools and a business district.

Two derailed cars slammed into the Orange Rice Mill beside the tracks and partially destroyed the building. An adjoining grocery was damaged.

The impact broke open doors of a boxcar carrying the missles, and boxfulls spilled onto the ground.

Gasoline leaked from wrecked autos on three derailed cars. Police said they feared fire would break out and explode the missiles. They evacuated a half-mile area in the center of town, including an elementary, junior high and high school.

Vinton is located along U.S. Highway 90 near the Texas border.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CB for 14 May

U.S. NEWS & WORLD REPORT 19 MAY 1975 (13)

WHERE U.S. IS LEFT IN ASIA

SOUTH KOREA. U.S. has 42,000 troops in South Korea — including the only American ground-combat forces left on Asian mainland — as well as a stockpile of nuclear weapons. U.S. is major supplier of weapons for South Korea, is pledged to defend it in case of attack.

TAIWAN. Mutual-assistance pact links Taiwan with U.S., which has 5,000 servicemen based there, plus air base big enough to handle B-52 bombers.

PHILIPPINES. President Marcos is turning neutralist, proposes renegotiating U.S.-base rights and defense treaty that would bring U.S. to Philippines' aid in case of attack. U.S. has 16,000 servicemen there, plus major naval and air bases.

THAILAND. U.S. servicemen, now numbering 23,000, will be cut to 19,500 within two months. Thailand, which U.S. is pledged to defend against outside aggression, has asked all U.S. forces to leave the country within a year and is now going neutralist.

SINGAPORE. U.S. wants to use naval facilities in Singapore from which Britain is now withdrawing. It has no treaty ties with Singapore.

AUSTRALIA, NEW ZEALAND. The two nations and U.S. are linked by treaties under which an attack in the Pacific against any one will involve all three. U.S. has major communications base in Australia, a token number of military technicians in each country.

JAPAN. U.S. has 52,000 servicemen at major naval and air bases in Japan and Okinawa — the largest remaining contingent in any one Asian country — and promises to help Japan resist armed attack.

MARIANA ISLANDS. U.S. has 11,000 men and major air and naval bases on Territory of Guam, as well as bases at Saipan and Tinian.

DEFENSE -- CONTINUED

commitments to protect Malaysia and Singapore has some teeth, even though the British intend to withdraw from the Singapore naval base by April, 1976. A New Zealand battalion is in Singapore, and Australia has two aircraft squadrons in Malaysia.

There is little if any chance that the U.S. will have any military links with this defense system. Australia and New Zealand have Labor Governments that are wary of involvement in U.S. military planning.

Malaysia is neutralist, while Singapore has said its port and naval facilities will be open to all comers—including the Soviet Union. The most the U.S. Navy can count on is use of Singapore as a refueling point for warships going to and from the Indian Ocean.

"Not anti-American." Australia's position is outlined in a cable from the U.S. News & World Report bureau in Sydney:

"Australians are not anti-American, and they do not want to drift too far from the American orbit. Yet they lack confidence in U.S. steadfastness.

"Key to Australia's defense is Indonesia. If that country can be kept peaceful while making economic progress, it will be a barrier to any aggression against Australia from the north.

"The Labor Party, which governs this country, resists dependence on the U.S., wants Australia to lead, not be led by others. At the same time, many Australians plead, in effect: 'Please, Americans, don't forget us.'"

Where will the first test of the Ford strategy take place?

North Vietnam, emboldened by victory and fat with U.S.-made arms captured in South Vietnam and Cambodia, is expected to step up assistance to Communist insurgents in Thailand and also in Malaysia. The U.S. is cutting back its force of 23,000 men in Thailand, but the Bangkok Government still has a claim on American military support. How the U.S. might respond would be seen as a test of American determination.

A more dangerous test could come in South Korea. Some experts believe North Korea's Communist dictator, Kim Il Sung, is convinced that "revolutionary" upheavals in the South, instigated by the North, would panic the U.S. Congress into ordering a withdrawal of the 42,000 American servicemen there as the only way to avoid U.S. involvement in another Asian war. [END]

FILIPINOS -- CONTINUED

The leases are due to expire in 1991. Now the Filipinos want to shorten this time span and obtain a greater degree of sovereignty over the bases and American personnel.

Furthermore, the U.S. pays no rent on the bases, although it does provide military assistance to this country—13.8 million dollars in 1974 alone. The Philippine Government, fighting a Moslem insurgency in the southernmost islands, wants more military aid, and economic assistance as well.

Wanted: respect. While President Marcos continues to feel out the possibility of recognition of Communist China, and talks about creating a "zone of peace" in Southeast Asia as an alternative to an alliance with the U.S., most Filipinos want America to stay here in any case. Says one senior diplomat:

"The trouble is the U.S. takes the Philippines too much for granted. The Filipinos want to be loved and respected as an important ally."

The foregoing was cabled by Wendell S. Merick of the magazine's International Staff, who is in the Philippines after being evacuated from Saigon the night before Communists seized the capital.

U.S. FORCES IN PACIFIC. In addition to nearly 150,000 servicemen, include eight carriers available for duty, the Seventh Fleet; 25 B-52 bombers in Thailand and Guam; 200 fighters and fighter-bombers scattered in Asia and 275 helicopters, most of them in South Korea and Japan.

NEW YORK TIMES 13 MAY

Camp Pendleton Full

CAMP PENDLETON, Calif., May 12 (UPI) — The refugee pipeline from Southeast Asia was closed today as far as this giant Marine base was concerned and will remain shut down until several hundred South Vietnamese and Cambodians are sent on to their new homes.

"We're completely full, more than full," a base spokesman said. "Our original capacity was 18,108, and we're way above that now. The pipeline is closed."

By this morning, 25,890 refugees had arrived here and 7,244 had been processed and sent on to their eventual destinations.

WALL STREET JOURNAL 13 MAY

Notable & Quotable

Charles, Prince of Wales, commenting on the fall of Saigon, as quoted in Women's Wear Daily:

Nobody seems to want to stand up against the Russians. The Russians have been sending so many supplies to the North Vietnamese. The Communists, after all, are dedicated to spreading their ideology over the world. This victory will give them encouragement and they will not stop there.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

FEATURES COLUMNISTS

U.S. NEWS & WORLD REPORT
19 MAY 1975 (13)

"YANKEES, GO HOME"?— NOT YET, SAY FILIPINOS

MANILA

Threats by Philippine officials to cut defense ties with the U.S. and force Americans to abandon strategic air and naval bases here are based more on furious rhetoric than on irrevocable intentions.

The fact is, most Filipinos do not want the U.S. to pull out, leaving this country militarily naked. But the U.S. defeat in Vietnam, and particularly the American unwillingness to back Cambodia and South Vietnam to the end, has forced the Filipinos to take a new look at the U.S. commitment to them. And they don't much like what they see.

Assurances that the U.S. will protect the Philippines from aggression are considered inadequate. The mutual-defense treaty signed in 1951 carries the proviso that American support will depend on "congressional approval"—and that is worrying Filipinos who know what happened in Indo-China.

SEATO dead? As Filipinos see it, the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization—set up by the U.S. in 1954—is dead as a joint-defense system. It failed to provide an "umbrella" for South Vietnam against the Communists, and three charter members—Britain, France and Pakistan—show no interest in giving it new life.

Says a top Filipino leader:

"What we really want is a guarantee, not by a U.S. President who can be overridden by Congress, but a treaty with no loopholes. We want a treaty that would make an American response to our need for help automatic, not one which can be blocked by a change of Administrations in Washington."

Why Marcos worries. Philippine President Ferdinand Marcos has been widely quoted as saying that he is afraid his country will be drawn into a war elsewhere in Asia if the U.S. keeps its bases here. That, officials say, is not his feeling at all. Rather, he is worried that the U.S. will not come to the rescue in a conflict involving aggression against the Philippines.

In addition to new defense guarantees "set in concrete," Filipino leaders are set on renegotiating agreements covering the two major U.S. bases—the naval installations at Subic Bay and the Air Force complex at Clark Air Base.

(See FILIPINOS, Pg. 2-F)

U.S. NEWS & WORLD REPORT
19 MAY 1975 (13)

A NEW DEFENSE LINE IN THE PACIFIC

Goal of U.S.: Stay out of war but guard its allies and vital interests in Asia. Key question: Where will Communists test America next?

A vigorous U.S. strategy for dealing with a troubled new era in Asia began to take shape in early May.

This strategy is keyed to three basic realities:

1. There are now two Communist powers—China and North Vietnam—in Asia, and they, along with Russia, are likely to create mischief, if not a continuing crisis, throughout the region.

2. Many nations formerly dependent on American military might already are trimming their sails to adjust to the winds blowing out of Hanoi and Peking.

3. The U.S. itself will play a far less dominant role in Asia than in the past—and it will have strict priorities as to what its vital interests are throughout the vast region.

"Beneficial" to peace. In a nationally televised news conference on May 6, President Ford said: "It is my aim to tie more closely together South Korea with the United States, to reaffirm our commitments to Taiwan, to work more closely with Indonesia, with the Philippines and with other Pacific nations. These are the kind of, I believe, forward movements in foreign policy that will be beneficial in the maintenance of peace."

To counter uneasy feelings in Pacific and other world capitals that the U.S., in the wake of defeats in Cambodia and South Vietnam, can no longer be counted on to carry out its commitments to allies, the President also said this:

"The United States is strong economically, despite our current problems, and we are going to maintain our leadership on a worldwide basis, and we want our friends to know that we will stand by them, and we want any potential adversaries to know that we will stand up to them."

Experts attached special significance to the talks President Ford had with the Prime Ministers of Britain, Australia, New Zealand and Singapore in Washington on May 7 and 8.

There was no rhetoric on Mr. Ford's part about defending frontiers of freedom, no call for unity to halt Communist aggression at the borders of the Indo-China nations. Instead, the sessions with the Commonwealth Ministers focused on a quiet stocktaking of American capabilities—and intentions—in the wake of the first U.S. defeat in war.

Staying in Pacific. In broad outline, this is the direction in which the Ford strategy for Asia is moving:

- The U.S. is not quitting the Western Pacific and withdrawing to Hawaii and the West Coast. Instead, it has plans for a new defense line—based on island redoubts and, other than in South Korea, away from the Asian mainland. Sea and air power, not U.S. infantry, will be the American peacekeeping instruments in the region.
- Japan and South Korea are seen as vital to American interests—strategic, economic and political—and will be backed at all costs by American military might.
- The U.S. will stand by its other commitments to Asian allies. But the obligation cannot be a one-way street. If the Philippines and Thailand, for example, want to take themselves out from under the U.S. defense umbrella and move toward neutralism, that will be acceptable to the U.S., even if it leads to loss of bases in those key nations.
- America has continuing interest in the stability, security and well-being of such nations as Indonesia and Singapore but has no intention of extending its security blanket to them.
- Asian nations can no longer count on the U.S. to come to their support automatically. Congress has tied the hands of the White House as far as swift military response is concerned.

Strength: 149,000. The over-all impression given to the visiting foreign leaders—Harold Wilson of Britain, Gough Whitlam of Australia, Wallace E. Rowling of New Zealand, and Singapore's Lee Kuan Yew—was that the Administration is steering a middle course between a major withdrawal from Asia and all-out involvement in affairs of the region. To do that, it intends to keep U.S. military forces there at current strength of about 149,000.

Two basic U.S. defense systems in the Pacific are unraveling. The Southeast Asia Treaty Organization, once a barrier to Communist expansion, exists on paper but is ineffective. The ANZUS Treaty linking Australia, New Zealand and the U.S. in common defense against any attack in the Pacific is in force, but there is no joint military planning.

A third defense system that involves British, Australian and New Zealander

(See DEFENSE, Pg. 2-F)

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WEDNESDAY MORNING, 14 MAY 1975

WASHINGTON POST
14 MAY 1975, Pg 1

PRG Hints At Links With U.S.

From News Dispatches

Officials of the new Saigon government have indicated in private discussions that the administration is prepared to accept diplomatic relations with the United States, UPI correspondent Alan Dawson reported Tuesday in a delayed dispatch from Saigon.

A broadcast by Hanoi Radio monitored in Hong Kong, said that the Vietcong's Provisional Revolutionary Government has claimed title to the South Vietnamese embassy in Washington and designated Algeria to take over the property.

Hanoi said the claim was made in a diplomatic note to the State Department May 10.

In Washington, a State Department spokesman said he was "unaware of any further message." He cited a similar request made last week by the Algerian charge d'affaires. The State Department at that time "took the matter under consideration," the spokesman said, and no further action has been announced.

In his report from Saigon, Dawson said Vietcong officials said privately that the initiative for establishing diplomatic recognition would have to come from Washington.

The officials said the Communist government would be willing to accept a small U.S. mission in Saigon, but the United States would have to agree not to meddle in Vietnamese affairs, UPI reported.

The report coincided with an announcement that Britain is recognizing the PRG; sources in Paris said France is expected to recognize the new Saigon government soon.

In Saigon, AP correspondent George Esper reported that hundreds of war refugees who fled to the South Vietnamese capital during the two months before the Communist takeover have begun returning to their homes.

He said Saigon is increasingly normal, as the refugees move back to the provinces and to the coastal regions of Quinhon and Danang.

The PRG has also sent notes to neighboring Asian nations asking them to inform Vietnamese refugees that they are welcome to come home, Esper reported.

The Foreign Ministry said the diplomatic notes, sent to the Philippines, Thailand, Singapore, Indonesia and Malaysia, said that a number of Vietnamese boats and ships in foreign waters had requested permission to return to Vietnam, and added: "Becuase we don't have representatives in your country, we request that you inform these Vietnamese ships we welcome their return home. Please tell them they can enter the ports of Vungtau, Danang, Quinhon or any other ports of South Vietnam."

Restaurants in Saigon are filled with people, AP reported, and business offices have reopened. Some airline agencies have reopened, but there is no word from authorities when Tansonnhut airport will resume commercial operations. Saigon radio said that more than 1,000 employees of the airport had been ordered back to work by military authorities.

There are daily flights from Hanoi, and one flight Monday brought in a group of about 30 foreign journalists, including East Europeans, Cubans, Chinese, two Frenchmen and an Italian. The reporters carried visas issued by the PRG.

The first cargo ship from North Vietnam was scheduled to arrive in Saigon Tuesday, and Saigon's Liberation Radio said an enthusiastic dockside welcome was being readied for the 10,000-ton vessel.

Broadcasts from Vietnam monitored in neighboring countries said that two major highways had been repaired and opened to traffic in the rice-rich Mekong Delta.

Although life in Saigon appears to be relaxed, signs of the war still crop up from time to time. Reuter correspondent Bernard Edinger described how children playing at the riverside shouted and pointed at a bloated human corpse that floated past a restaurant on the Saigon River.

The new government, concerned about law and order, said a thief who stole the briefcase of an American correspondent was apprehended and shot on the spot. Thieves, who abounded under the former Saigon government, are now judged immediately by a people's court, AP reported.

Reuter said that the new Saigon Communist newspaper was not available Tuesday, but loudspeaker vans moved through the city giving people instructions.

A former major in the deposed government asked Reuter correspondent Edinger to aid him in bringing his family back from the United States.

Nguyen Van Uyen, 38, said he believed that his wife, his parents and four children are in Los Angeles. "I believe my family are in Los Angeles, but they might still be in Guam or some other place," Uyen said. "I would like them to come back."

WASHINGTON STAR 13 MAY 1975, Pg 3

Some Refugee Costs Masked by Pentagon

By Vernon A. Guidry Jr.
Washington Star Staff Writer

The Pentagon is not totaling all allowable costs in its refugee bookkeeping because of its concern with adverse congressional reaction to the cost of the operation.

Defense Department witnesses appeared before Congress yesterday with projections on what the Vietnamese refugee operation would cost the Pentagon. The over-all estimate was $382 million based on sea and airlift costs, and the cost of maintaining refugees at military-operated facilities for an average of 90 days.

Defense Department expenditures for the operation will be reimbursed by the State Department.

ABSENT FROM the Pentagon estimate are personnel costs. Under the rules governing such interagency transactions, these costs should be included but are not, according to Donald B. Shycoff, director of operations for the Pentagon's comptroller.

There is a feeling in Congress that the "Pentagon has the money," Shycoff said yesterday following Hill testimony.

Had the additional costs, which were not estimated, been included, he said, "we would've been roasted, let's face it."

Shycoff told the House defense appropriations subcommittee that the cost of the military operation to evacuate Saigon last month was $10 million to $15 million above the cost of the routine operations planned for the forces involved.

THE DECISION has been taken, at least for the present, not to add these costs to the bill that will go to State to be paid from its appropriation.

Shycoff predicted that the absence of the personnel charges will stir controversy in the future when the figures are sorted out in a less emotional atmosphere.

The $382 million estimate includes $30 million for sealift, $132 million for airlift, $35 million for refugee facilities and $185 million for maintaining refugees.

The $185 million works out to about $15 per refugee per day with the assumption that refugees will spend an average of 30 days on Guam and 60 days at U.S. facilities.

THOSE ASSUMPTIONS seemed destined to be overtaken by events as bottlenecks appear in refugee processing.

Moreover, Maj. Gen. Maurice Casey, head of logistics for the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told the subcommittee that planners now envision a "final stage" of refugee operations extending beyond the current 90-day average.

This stage will include longer-term housing and training for perhaps 10,000 to 15,000 Vietnamese who cannot be readily resettled in the United States.

The refugee operation started with $98 million and nearly all of that has been obligated, according to administration witnesses.

Shycoff said it is too late in the fiscal year to trim back expenditures and operational accounts in order to come up with additional money for refugee operations. He said without additional appropriations, the Pentagon might have to ask congressional committee approval to shift money from procurement accounts to refugee operations.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON POST 14 MAY 1975, Pg 1

Jordan Gets Pledge Of Syrian Air Cover

By Jim Hoagland
Washington Post Foreign Service

BEIRUT, May 13—Syria has pledged to send its air force into Jordan to provide air cover for Jordanian troops in return for King Hussein's commitment to join any new war between the Arabs and Israel, Western sources reported today.

The Syrian pledge, which has been mentioned by King Hussein in recent talks to Jordanian army units, represents a significant upgrading of potential military coordination between the two previously hostile Arab states on Israel's eastern front.

The coordination, limited to the air-defense agreement falls far short of the establishment of a joint military command like the one that links Egypt and Syria, responsible sources say.

But the agreement and Hussein's success in getting a commitment for the supply of Hawk antiaircraft missiles during his visit to Washington earlier this month provide the clearest evidence yet that the king is planning to throw his 70,000-man army into any new fight against Israel.

[The U.S. decision to sell Hawks to Jordan "enables Jordan to pursue the kind of moderate policy we have sought to encourage . . . and to rely on its own resources, rather than on other countries," Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger said in a speech in Kansas City Tuesday.

["Jordan has been extremely restrained," he said. "We felt it is in U.S. interests that we continue to be the principal supplier of military equipment to Jordan."]

Citing Jordan's lack of an effective air force or antiaircraft missiles, Hussein did not take part in the October 1973 war. His units were badly cut up by unopposed Israeli jets in the June 1967 war.

Hussein has been reassuring his troops during recent morale-boosting trips to the field that they will not face a similar fate if war erupts again. "Thanks to our brothers," he has said, Jordan will have air defense.

The Syrian pledge to send Mig-21s to protect Jordanian units is effective immediately, the sources said. In the 1973 war, Egypt and Syria preferrred to rely more on their antiaircraft missile screens than on their combat pilots, who proved no match for the Israeli air force.

The United States and Saudi Arabia will evidently provide most of the financing for Jordan's purchase of the expensive Hawk missile system. The order is expected to run well over the $100 million figure cited in dispatches from Washington. Delivery is to begin in the fall.

Syria, which sent tanks into Jordan in 1970 to support a Palestinian uprising against Hussein but then pulled them out and allowed the guerrillas to be crushed, has steadily improved its relations with Jordan in recent months, partly to balance its strained relations with Egypt over U.S. Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger's mediation effort.

Israeli Defense Minister Shimon Peres called attention to the Jordanian-Syrian "flirtation" today during a tour of Jewish settlements in the Jordan Valley. "Jordan is moving in the Syrian direction," Peres told the settlers, according to news agencies.

Peres asserted that such fluctuations in policies justified Israel's determination to keep the Jordan Valley. Charging that Jordan was moving troops toward the Israeli lines, he said, "It is lucky that the Jordanians aren't here or they would be moving their forces toward Jerusalem. At the moment they are moving their forces toward the Jordan."

Tension also increased along the Israeli-Lebanon frontier today after Israeli troops crossed into Lebanon at dawn for the second consecutive day and kidnaped three persons from the village of Aitaroun.

Supported by helicopters, the Israeli patrol damaged one house with explosives before withdrawing, according to a Lebanese Defense Ministry communique that claimed Lebanese troops fired on the invaders.

One, a woman, was returned to Lebanon today, according to Israeli authorities in Tel Aviv, and one of the four men was to be returned Wednesday.

On Monday, five persons were kidnaped by Israeli troops in a similar raid.

Diplomatic experts here report that Israel expects a terror raid to mark the anniversary this week of the Arab exodus from Palestine in 1948. The Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine announced tonight that its forces had been put on alert against a planned Israeli attack into Lebanon.

Iraqi Planes Barred From Syrian Airspace

From News Dispatches

DAMASCUS, May 13—Syria closed its air space to all Iraqi aircraft today in an escalation of the border feud between the two Arab neighbors.

A Syrian spokesman said the move was taken to protest "barbaric and inhuman treatment of Iraqi and Syrian personnel of Syrian airlines working in Baghdad as well as ill treatment of Syrian passengers passing through Iraq."

The order followed by three days a decision by Syria to call home a dozen Syrian airline employes in Baghdad and close the Iraqi airline office in Damascus.

The two countries, ruled by rival wings of the Arab Baath Socialist Party, have been engaged in a propaganda battle for weeks.

An Arab terrorist group believed to have links to the Iraqi government claimed today to have destroyed a Syrian intelligence office last night.

The Arab Communist organization said the attack in the White Bridge region of Syria was to avenge the torture killing by the Syrians of a commando last month.

Syria last month arrested scores of Baath Party members it suspected of cooperating with the Iraqi Baath.

Meanwhile in Beirut, four more Cabinet members resigned, leaving Lebanese Premier Rashid Solh's shattered government with only five ministers instead of the normal 17. Local newspapers predicted that Solh, caught in a dispute over his handling of riots between Palestinians and right-wing Phalangists, would resign soon.

In other developments:

- Sir Christopher Soames, vice president of the European Common Market Commission, began talks in Iran on the renewal of the EEC agreement with Iran.
- Soviet Premier Alexei Kosygin, on a visit to Libya, had a second meeting with Premier Abdel Salam Jalloud.

WASHINGTON POST 14 MAY 1975, Pg 9

Asians See Hanoi Mood 'Promising'

KUALA LUMPUR—North Vietnam has asked foreign ministers of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations, now meeting here, not to make public announcements of their current discussions of future relations with North and South Vietnam, ASEAN conference sources said yesterday.

ASEAN officials interpreted the request as a possible attempt by Hanoi to insure that no fixed association positions on relations with Indochina countries become known and create difficulties in future talks on cooperation.

Delegates to the meeting said if Hanoi's intention was to prevent difficulties arising in relations with Indochina, the plea was "promising" for future negotiations between ASEAN countries and Indochina.

Malaysian Prime Minister Tun Abdul Razak opened the talks with an offer of friendship to Indochina and an invitation to the Communist countries to join ASEAN in working toward regional peace.

Tun Razak said the real lesson of the Indochina events was that the key to the future security and stability of the region — and of individual states — depends on a constructive response to the new realities. He did not spell out what the constructive response involves.

In Hanoi, authoritative North Vietnamese sources said a delegation of South Vietnam's Provisional Revolutionary Government will travel to Bangkok shortly. The report appeared to confirm an earlier statement in Kuala Lumpur by Tahi Foreign Minister Chatichai Choonhavan that the PRG would send a delegation to "recover South Vietnamese property," presumably a reference to goods brought by fleeing officials of the ousted Saigon government.

Thai Interior Ministry officials said an estimated 40,000 Vietnamese refugees who have lived in northeast Thailand for more than two decades after fleeing the anti-Communist government in South Vietnam will be repatriated within a year.

WASHINGTON POST 14 MAY 1975, Pg 21

Bases in Britain Tied To Talks' Outcome

LONDON, May 13—British Defense Secretary Roy Mason said in the House of Commons today that "It may be possible to seek removal of the United States Polaris bases in Britain as a first step in multilateral negotiations once the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe and the talks on mutual and balanced force reductions are concluded."

Mason stressed that the Polaris bases form part of Britain's alliance with the United States. Answereing a statement by Mrs. Winnifred Ewing, a Scottish nationalist member of Parliament, in which she said she considers the Polaris deterrent as "just old scrap iron," the defense secretary replied that he does not think the Soviet Union would regard it as scrap iron.

Mason said, "We regard it as a real deterrent. Because of it we have managed to maintain between East and West 30 years of peace."

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CURRENT NEWS

PART I - EARLY BIRD EDITION - 0730

PART II - MAIN EDITION - PUBLISHED AT 1130

THIS PUBLICATION IS PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL NEWS ITEMS OF INTEREST TO THEM IN THEIR OFFICIAL CAPACITIES. IT IS NOT INTENDED TO SUBSTITUTE FOR NEWSPAPERS, PERIODICALS AND BROADCASTS AS A MEANS OF KEEPING INFORMED ABOUT THE NATURE, MEANING AND IMPACT OF NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL NEWS DEVELOPMENTS. USE OF THESE ARTICLES HERE, OF COURSE, DOES NOT REFLECT OFFICIAL ENDORSEMENT. FURTHER REPRODUCTION FOR PRIVATE USE OR GAIN IS SUBJECT TO THE ORIGINAL COPYRIGHT RESTRICTIONS.

MONDAY, MAY 12, 1975

GENERAL NEWS SUMMARY

FROM THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

MAY 12, 1975

World-Wide

THE PREMIER OF LAOS practically conceded the Pathet Lao have taken control.

Prince Souvanna Phouma, a neutralist who heads the year-old coalition of rightists and pro-Communist Pathet Lao, acknowledged the growin Pathet Lao, domination of the government following the resignations of four rightist ministers and the ouster of three rightist generals. Souvanna Phouma urged Laotians to "look at the facts" and avoid bloodshed by accepting the "important changes that have taken place all around the kingdom."

The government later appealed to the populace to remain calm and forbade anyone to leave the country, but many rightist leaders were believed to have fled.

Souvanna Phouma appointed a member of the Pathet Lao acting defense minister, succeeding one of the rightists who resigned.

* * *

In South Vietnam, the new Communist leaders said they intend to hold nationwide elections and eventually reunify the North and South. A radio broadcast said Saigon sent messages to Indonesia, Malaysia, Thailand, the Philippines and Singapore asking them to advise all Vietnamese refugees that the new regime will provide transportation for any wishing to return.

The Khmer Rouge stressed Cambodia's strong ties with China and thanked North Korea, North Vietnam and Laos for their support. The Soviet Union wasn't mentioned in the statement.

* * *

The Pentagon may get much of the $35.8 billion it seeks for new weapons. Congress will start considering this week bills cleared by committee that leave most of the Pentagon's top projects intact. The Senate Armed Services panel has voted $30.3 billion for arms through Sept. 30, 1976.

* * *

The new F15 fighter plane is having engine problems, causing the Air Force to put a "temporary restriction" on its operation at top speed. The Air Force temporarily suspended flights May 1 because of cracks in certain blades of the jet engine.

* * *

Four Arab states took a major step toward establishing an arms industry, according to reports in Cairo newspapers. Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates reportedly each contributed $260 million to the joint agency, which will be headquartered in Cairo. The weapons plants may be established in Egypt.

* * *

(See NEWS SUMMARY, Pg. 3)

BALTIMORE SUN
12 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

Bases are Spain's ace with U.S.

By FREDERIC B. HILL
Sun Staff Correspondent

Madrid—A host of recent developments, ranging from recent American humiliation in Indochina to growing anti-Americanism in Spain to Portugal's leftward swing, are giving Spanish authorities a strong hand in current renegotiations on U.S. bases in this country.

At the same time, a pervasive feeling among Spain's military leaders of being "taken for granted" too long lies behind the bolder stance of the once-pliant Franco regime.

And President Ford, who plans to visit Madrid later this month after the NATO summit talks to nudge the now-stalled talks along, only has to cast back over the last 18 months of his own stormy career in high office to prepare himself for a new Spanish attitude.

Eighteen months ago, the President visited Spain as a representative of the United States at the funeral of the former prime minister, Luis Carrero Blanco, assassinated by Basque terrorists.

Since then, not only the retreat from Vietnam and Cambodia, but the weakening of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and internal developments here have sharply strengthened the position of Spanish leaders who want major changes in the agreements that expire September 26.

A new agreement is widely favored by the Franco regime, and probably most moderate opponents. There is little desire to greatly loosen American ties in view of the presence of a left-wing government next door in Portugal and Spain's own less than fully professional armed forces.

But Spanish officials, realizing the ever-more strategic importance of the American bases

(See BASES, Pg. 2)

NEW YORK TIMES
12 MAY 1975 Pg. 14

A GUERRILLA WAR FEARED IN KOREA

But Seoul Leaders Stress Threat of Conventional Attack From North

By RICHARD HALLORAN
Special to The New York Times

SEOUL, South Korea—The South Korean analyst sat back with an anxious look and said: "Frankly, I am impressed by the sophistication of the training the North Koreans get for a Vietcong-type of war."

"The North Korean soldiers who have received training in guerrilla warfare and then have been incorporated into the regular army number about 80,000" said the analyst, who asked not to be identified. "They are organized into guerrilla units ranging from four or five men up through platoons and companies all the way to battalions."

"They have flexibility and mobility. We've seen them move from east to west, to strike while moving, to conduct surprise attacks, to fight in rear areas, to fight set battles. Their training is really impressive," he said.

The analyst, who tries to stay out of politics here, said that the potential North Korean threat to South Korea was from a gradually escalating "war of national liberation" patterned after that of the Communists in Southeast Asia.

Threat of Frontal Attack

His analysis, and that of American military officers here, contrasts with the emphasis on the threat of a frontal attack usually made by South Korean political leaders—an attack leading to a conventional war like that from 1950 to 1953.

But nonpolitical South Korean analysts and American officers expect more of the warfare of subversion that the North Koreans tried from 1967 to 1970. That was defeated largely because South Koreans turned North Korean suspects over to the authorities.

The danger today, it is felt, is that President Park Chung

(See KOREA, Pg. 2)

NEW YORK TIMES
12 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

CARRIER ARRIVES IN GUAM BRINGING SAIGON AIRCRAFT

By ANDREW H. MALCOLM
Special to The New York Times

APRA HARBOR, Guam, Monday, May 12—The aircraft carrier Midway arrived today to unload a controversial cargo of 99 repossessed South Vietnamese military aircraft. Meanwhile, the curtailment of refugee flights to the United States continued.

The aircraft, worth several hundred million dollars and carrying more than 1,300 refugees, were flown out of South Vietnam in the dying hours of the Saigon Government.

Some helicopters landed on the Midway's four-acre flight deck. However, most of the planes were flown by fleeing South Vietnamese Air Force pilots to a United States air base in Thailand. There, Thai officials eager to seek accommodations with their new Communist neighbor promised to return the planes to the new government.

U.S. Reclaims Jets

The United States, however, cited a clause in its military assistance agreement and reclaimed the jets. Some of the planes, which included F-5's and A-37's, were towed 10 miles down back country roads to reach the waiting carrier. Most of the South Vietnamese tail markings have been obliterated. More aircraft reportedly remain in Thailand.

The Midway also brought to Guam 94 more refugees, who were rescued from a sinking fishing boat in the Gulf of Siam. That brought to 84,389 the number of refugees who have passed through here since the airlift from South Vietnam began 19 days ago.

More than 37,000 refugees remained on Guam this morning as the island authorities

(See CARRIER, Pg. 2)

JAMES KILLINGBECK, CHIEF, CURRENT NEWS BRANCH, OX 78765 HELEN YOUNG, ASSISTANT CHIEF

FOR SPECIAL RESEARCH SERVICES OR DISTRIBUTION CALL HARRY ZUBKOFF, CHIEF, EXECUTIVE AGENCY SERVICE, OX 52884

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

BALTIMORE SUN 12 MAY 1975 Pg. 4

Singapore chief asks if U.S. would aid Korea

Washington (AP)—There is a question in the minds of Asians about whether the United States would fight to defend South Korea, Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew of Singapore said yesterday.

Mr. Lee, appearing on the CBS program Face the Nation said a partial reason for this concern is the open debate in the United States on foreign policy.

"I'm not saying that a more closed society is a better society, but I think in certain security matters . . . you are at a disadvantage," Mr. Lee said.

Asked if people in Southeast Asia feel the United States would fight to defend South Korea, Mr. Lee said:

"There is a question mark. It will fight for 60 days. We all know in 60 days it goes to Congress." He referred to 1973 legislation requiring congressional approval within 60 days of the commitment of American troops into combat by the president.

Mr. Lee said there seems to be a concensus in Congress that Japan must be protected, but there is debate about South Korea and this can be misread by Asians.

BASES -- CONTINUED

here, are demanding something concrete in return—some kind of defense commitment from the U.S.

The current 1970 accord does not include a pledge to come to the defense of Spain in the event of hostilities. And Spain is not a NATO member—due largely to objections to the Franco dictatorship.

The lack of a mutual security arrangement has been a stumbling block in most negotiations since the bases were established in 1953. But developments in Portugal, the weakening of NATO along the Eastern Mediterranean and international pressures here give Spain a stronger case this year.

"With these bases, they feel they are subjecting themselves to nuclear attack," notes a diplomat. "They're holding out for a mutual security deal."

Public opinion in Spain seems to support—or be a stimulus for—the government's tougher position. A recent poll showed 48 per cent of the people opposed U.S. military presence here.

"With the press more open than ever before," one Spanish official said last week, "the issue is really being hammered. And even this government has to respond to public opinion."

Furthermore, doubts about American will and the prospect of more democratic government in Spain are leading some Spanish moderates to question the desire for an American presence openly.

Registering still largely unstated fears of what the future holds, a banker in Barcelona asked rhetorically: "If there is a pro-Russian government in Portugal, why should any Spanish democrat risk his neck?"

Spanish moderates, who are pressing ahead with plans to form political parties in the face of government opposition, are not not excited about President Ford's visit.

The two-day stopover is expected to include June 1, a day of celebration of Gen. Francisco Franco's uprising in the civil war. And any personal talks between Mr. Ford and the generalissimo, the moderates fear, will be seen as an American endorsement of his regime, which more and more Spaniards are anxious to bring to an end.

The American stance has not been strengthened by the recent refusal of the new Portuguese government to allow the U.S. to use its Azores base in the event of another Middle East war. Spain, always has been very pro-Arab and is unlikely to yield on this issue.

Outside of communications stations, the U.S. has three major bases on Spanish soil. There are two air bases, Torrejon, near Madrid, and Moron, plus a key atomic submarine and missile base at Rota.

The sensitivity of the Spanish today to the base question was illustrated last week when Greece announced its plans to limit American presence there. "Rota could be converted into a superbase," proclaimed a headline in the Madrid daily, Informaciones.

One item that President Ford and his hosts, Generalissimo Franco and Prime Minister Carlos Arias Navarro, may be able to agree on is new weaponry for Spain's weak and underequipped armed forces.

Oddly, in a country where the military won the 1936-1939 civil war, Generalissmo Franco has been stingy in paying and equipping the military. Spain, for example, with four times the population and six times the gross national product of Portugal, spends only twice as much on defense as the latter. Much of Portugal's huge per capita expenditure on defense—one of the highest in the world—was due to its many African colonies, now being let go, but Spain's defense spending has been considered low.

Perhaps taking note of the role low pay played in the left-wing military uprising in Portugal, the salaries of Spanish soldiers were increased substantially in the last year.

But military and foreign sources here report that while the Army still is considered loyal and conservative, morale, poor equipment and lack of activity is becoming a serious problem.

Two officers, a major and a captain serving in the Barcelona region, are now in jail for pushing demands for reforms in the military and the government.

KOREA (CONTINUED)

Hee's repressive political measures have alienated many city residents and some people in the traditionally conservative countryside. As a result it is uncertain to what degree they would resist North Korean subversion.

To stimulate anti-Communist sentiment, the South Korean Government sponsored a series of recent rallies calling for pledges of national harmony and defiance of the North Koreans.

Following Communist successes in Indochina, South Korean analysts look for low-level North Korean subversion and sabotage at first, then commando raids and finally North Korean guerrilla units operating in South Korea in the guise of South Korean revolutionaries.

Mountain Parachuting

North Korean paratroops, for instance, have reportedly been trained to drop into the mountains instead of in the usual flat areas, especially at night.

Both South Korean and American sources report that the North Koreans are training with an old airplane called the AN-2, which is usually used to spread fertilizer. It flies low and slowly to evade radar and to drop a few men and their light equipment.

The North Koreans have also been reported buying high-speed, manueverable boats in Japan for possible use in transporting agents down the coasts to South Korea.

South Korean and American officials also report that North Korean tunnels have been dug under the demilitarized zone that divides the North and South. Two tunnels have been discovered and there is evidence of 11 more, it is said. They are reportedly intended to channel small guerrilla units into South Korea behind front lines.

In addition to the potential for guerrilla warfare, South Korean and American officials said, there is the possibility of a quick, all-out conventional strike by North Korea across the DMZ.

The North Koreans in that case would be expected to throw their armor, artillery, infantry and air power into a drive for Seoul, which is only 30 miles from the DMZ.

Such an attack, however, would directly challenge United States forces, since one infantry division of the 38,000 American troops here is stationed on a main route to Seoul. For that reason, American officials tend to discount the possibility of such a drive, reasoning that neither the Russians nor the Chinese, North Korea's allies, want to risk a conflict with the United States.

CARRIER (CONTINUED)

braced for the imminent arrival of up to 20,000 more refugees on five chartered American merchant ships.

7,800 On Wake Island

An additional 7,800 South Vietnamese refugees were being processed on Wake Island and 2,500 in the Philippines; 1,200 are headed here aboard two South Vietnamese ships, and an unknown number are on ships that left Singapore for the Philippines.

That would put the total number of refugees from South Vietnam at more than 116,000.

Yesterday 5,000 refugees left here by plane. But most of them were being shifted to Wake to make more room in the crowded facilities here. Officials on Guam have been ordered to hold up transportation of refugees to the continental United States because the three refugee camps there—Camp Pendleton, Calif., Fort Chaffee, Ark., and Eglin Air Force Base, Fla.—are said to be filled.

That order has caused considerable concern because it means that camps built here in U.S. imperialism is the loser."

Reuters reported that the general said that his country would have friendly relations with all nations and would not take sides in the long-time dispute between the Soviet Union and China.

Of reported predictions by Americans that the Communist take-over of South Vietnam would be followed by a bloodbath, he said, "This is a very contemptible slander, as you can see." And, of Vietnamese who fled, he said: "We are sorry to see that a number of our people are living miserably in a foreign country."

The only Vietnamese who left of their own accord, General Tra said, were "a small number of ringleaders and reactionaries who scheme and plot and do harm to the people."

Defeated Generals Register

SINGAPORE, May 11 (Reuters)—Ten generals of the defeated South Vietnamese Army have registered at a Government center in Saigon, the Saigon radio said today.

In a broadcast heard here, the radio said that within half an hour of the center's opening last Thursday 400 colonels, more than 1,000 lieutenant colonels and 124 majors had registered. At other centers more than 10,000 air force, navy and police personnel had registered, it said.

The generals who registered were said to have included the commander of Military Region III surrounding Saigon, The commander of Special Forces, the deputy commander of the Saigon area, the commanders of the Third, Fifth, 23d and 25th Divisions and the commander of Special Forces in Military Region II.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR - 12 MAY 1975 Pg. 6

Military technology may affect Atlantic alliance

By Takashi Oka
Staff correspondent of
The Christian Science Monitor

London

New military technologies are reaching a stage of development where they could "deeply affect" Atlantic alliance politics and superpower arms control arrangements.

"Smart bomb" technology has increased the vulnerability of fixed targets and is blurring the distinction between conventional arms and nuclear weapons.

These are among the major assessments of "Strategic Survey 1974," the annual review of the prestigious International Institute for Strategic Studies, released here in London on Friday.

The institute, housed in a small but distinguished historic building just off the Strand, is one of the world's leading "think tanks" in the defense field. Clattering up and down its wooden stairs one can meet not only the Soviet military attache, but also the Chinese in his sober dark blue Mao uniform — as well as other defense experts and scholars from around the world. International in membership, the institute's currrent director is a brilliant young West German lawyer, Christoph Bertram.

This year's strategic survey characterizes 1974 as "an interim period, a holding operation while the contours of the new international system become visible." By inference, 1975 is already turning out to be a much more active year, one in which the consequences of past actions are going to have to be dealt with, and efforts made to shape the contours of the new international system

Important decisions wait

Despite the trauma of Watergate, detente held between the superpowers during 1974. But Washington and Moscow face important decisions in 1975, one of the knottiest being how to work out the details of SALT II, the second phase of strategic arms limitation talks.

In the Middle East, the "danger of a new war in the area remains real," the institute study says. The industrialized nations managed on the whole to cope with the oil crisis, but the strategic survey devotes a couple of pages to examining proposals for armed seizure of Arab oil installations.

Its conclusions: Any such action would probably embroil the Soviet Union and could not in the short term improve the West's oil supply situation. It would also create severe tensions between the United States, still relatively well-off in terms of supply, and its partners in Western Europe and Japan, who are far more dependenton Middle East oil.

At Vladivostok in December last year, President Ford reached agreement with Soviet leader Leonid I. Brezhnev that under SALT II, each side would have no more than 2,400 offensive delivery vehicles, of which no more than 1,320 would be equipped with MIRV's — multiple independently targeted reentry vehicles. All the details, however, must be worked out in an agreement yet to be signed, which will run from Oct. 1, 1977, until Dec. 31, 1985.

Land-based missiles vulnerable

Progress in military technology has been such that land-based fixed-site missiles are more and more vulnerable. The Soviet Union has greater throw-weight than the United States, but 85 percent is concentrated in land-based missiles. The United States is far ahead of the Soviet Union in electronic guidance systems.

Progress in conventional arms technology has also been rapid. The so-called smart bomb — precision guided munitions or PGM in military shop talk — has made such advances that in many cases it can replace nuclear warheads. On the one hand this increases the defensive capacity of the Atlantic Alliance in Central Europe, where the problem has always been how to stop a massive invasion of Soviet tanks.

On the other hand, PGM's blur the distinction between nuclear and conventional warfare. This poses new problems for the Atlantic alliance. The survey warns that PGM's are not a magic substitute for the large standing armies and defense expenditure that West Europeans are finding increasingly onerous.

In the first place they are not cheap. A TOW anti-tank guided weapon costs $3,000, but the unit used to guide the missile to its target costs $20,000. In the second place, there are operating problems: in most cases, clear daylight is required, and for some systems, smoke or camouflage is sufficient to defeat "smart" technology.

Indian explosion noted

Institute officials say that too little attention has been paid to India's explosion of an atomic device last spring. Mr Bertram, in a press conference releasing the survey, noted that the U.S. State Department took six weeks to react and ascribed this gap to Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger's preoccupation with the Middle East. India's example will be significant to other countries if the explosion is seen to have given India added political leverage.

The collapse of Cambodia and South Vietnam and the failure of Dr. Kissinger's shuttle diplomacy between Egypt and Israel in March this year came too late for inclusion in the strategic survey. As Mr. Bertram put it, the United States emerged from 1974 relatively unscathed, despite its own severe internal problems. But today the situation has changed. Mr. Bertram ascribed part of the blame for American failures in the Middle East and Southeast Asia to Dr. Kissinger's "one-man show," and said that a better and new approach to foreign policy might be taking shape, under which the full resources of the State Department would be employed, and Congress and public opinion brought in to build a wider based consensus than before.

NEWS SUMMARY ... CONTINUED

The Common Market signed a far-reaching trade pact with Israel despite an Arab League warning of possible "political consequences." The EC hopes to liberalize trade with other Mediterranean states, including Arab nations.

* * *

A $68.8 billion deficit for fiscal 1976 is projected in a congressional resolution expected to be approved this week. The figure arrived at by House-Senate conferees, is considerably higher than the $60 billion deficit President Ford has said he would accept. The resolution doesn't require Ford's signature and isn't binding on Congress in the first year. But it is expected to provide political pressure to hold down spending.

* * *

Gulf Oil Corp. told Bolivia that the South American nation wasn't the foreign country Gulf allegedly paid $4 million to remain in business. Gulf's statement said, though, that it still was investigating whether any political contributons were made to Bolivia, the Associated Press said.

* * *

Michael Tzur, former head of Israel Corp. and a leading figure in Israel's biggest financial scandal, unexpectedly pleaded guilty in a Tel Aviv court to 11 counts of fraud, bribery and larceny. The scandal involved the illegal transfer of more than $16 million from Israeli state companies to Liechtenstein trusts.

* * *

Britain faces its "gravest crisis" since 1931 because of growing unemployment and a 21% inflation rate, Prime Minister Harold Wilson said in a television interview. He ruled out a coalition government with the Conservatives. Wilson's Labor Party government has been split over his support of continued Common Market membership; the issue will be decided in a national referendum June 5.

* * *

A Boston school-busing plan ssued by a federal judge Saturday received widespread criticism. The final integration plan, to be implemented next fall, will require the busing of about a quarter of the city's public-school children, or 21,000; including 12,000 in lower grades. The interim plan resulted in a series of clashes last fall with frequent arrests and injuries.

* * *

Sen. Roman Hruska (R., Neb.) won't run for reelection in 1976, an aide said. Hruska is 70 and has been in the Senate 20 years.

Sen. Birch Bayh of Indiana said he is "giving a lot of thought" to seeking the 1976 Democratic presidential nomination.

* * *

General Electric must consult with union officials on health and job-safety matters in some instances, the federal Occupational Safety and Health Review Commission ruled.

* * *

A San Francisco doctors' strike to protest malpractice-insurance costs was expected to spread throughout the state as Gov. Edmund Brown considered calling a special legislative session to act on the rate issue. In Los Angeles, a work stoppage by physicians at a county-run hospital over the quality of patient care continued despite the firing of at least eight doctors and the threat of more dismissals.

* * *

Welfare waste totaling about $1 billion annually results more from clerical error than from cheating, a Health, Education and Welfare Department study said. But officials said cheating is rising sharply and may extend to 30% of all cases.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON POST - 12 MAY 1975 Pg. 18

Israel Fears Arms Delay Could Tilt Balance

By John M. Goshko
Washington Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM, May 11—Israeli government and military circles are increasingly concerned that the Ford administration's continuing refusal to act on Israel's pending arms requests could tilt the Middle East military balance heavily in favor of the Arabs.

Officials here are divided about the real meaning of Washington's suspension of arms talks with Israel pending the completion of a reassessment of the U.S. Middle East policy. But especially within the Israeli Defense Ministry, some appear convinced that the United States wants to weaken Israel's defense posture to make it more amenable to U.S. diplomatic pressure.

Until now, this theory has been a minority view. It has been gaining momentum however, since it became known during King Hussein's visit to Washington last week that the United States had agreed to supply Jordan with Hawk antiaircraft missiles. In the Israeli view, that amounts to U.S. collaboration in creating a double-edged new threat to Israel's security.

The Israelis feel that the Hawk missiles will give Hussein the hitherto-missing arms element he needs to rejoin Egypt and Syria as a full-fledged member of the Arab "confrontation states" on Israel's borders. As if to confirm this, Hussein said Jordan would take active part in any new Arab-Israeli war.

More ominously, Israel sees the deal with Jordan as a breach of an understanding that Washington would not make any agreements about arms supplies to any Middle Eastern state during the reassessment. Israeli officials say they are not satisfied with U.S explanations that the missiles had previously been promised to Jordan. The affair has touched off fresh uneasiness here about what Washington will decide on the Israeli requests.

Israel is seeking $2.5 billion in U.S. assistance for the coming fiscal year including a $1.8 billion request for military aid—largely to cover several squadrons of F-15 fighter aircraft and sophisticated Lance surface-to-surface missiles.

Discussions on the delivery of these items were broken off by the Ford administration in March following the collapse of Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger's effort to mediate between Israel and Egypt. Making no secret of its belief that Israel was primarily responsible for the talks' failure, the administration began a reassessment and made it clear that it would take no action on the arms requests until this had been completed.

In the meantime U.S. officials have leaked hints that they regard the requests as exceeding what Israel requires to maintain the present arms balance. They have suggested that the request might be cut by half.

Before the squabble with Washington, the Israelis had been warned by friends in the United States that Congress would be unable to fill their full request. As a result, the Israelis are known to have privately scaled down their expectations of what they can realistically hope to get from the United States to between $1 million and $1.5 billion.

Some high-ranking sources here, particularly civilians, say privately that Israel could live with this cutback although it would require considerable belt-tightening. Military circles regard the idea of sizeable cuts in the arms request with deep foreboding.

Sources subscribing to this pessimistic viewpoint say they consider Washington's assessment of the Arab-Israeli arms balance as incorrect. This assessment is that Israel can defend itself if the amounts of major weapons possessed jointly by Egypt, Syria and Jordan are no more than three times those of Israel. The theory is that the superior quality of the Israeli weapons and the acknowledged fighting superiority of the Israeli forces would compensate.

Israelis say this means that in war they would sustain substantially higher casualties than they would if their arsenal were closer in size to the Arabs'. In addition, they add, their own estimates of the Arab buildup indicate that the Arabs now have a superiority in tanks of 3.5 to 1 and in artillery

Most important, the Israelis contend that the quality of the weapons the Soviet Union is supplying to the Arabs, principally Syria, has improved and in many areas is superior to equivalent Israeli weaponry. Two items causing Israeli defense planners considerable concern are the Scud surface-to-surface missile and the new Mig-25 fighter.

Israel contends that the Soviets have provided Syria, Iraq and Egypt with substantial quantities of the Scud, which can fire 1,400 pounds of explosives 185 miles. While Israeli experts doubt that the Scud actually gives the Arabs the capability of penetrating the Israeli heartland to destroy its cities and military stockpiles, they say it is a formidable weapon that they currently cannot match.

Israelis contend that the Syrians already have some Mig-23s and that there is a likelihood that Egypt will also get some. In addition, they add, the Soviet Mig-23 fighter, which Egypt, Syria and Iraq already possess in substantial numbers, can fly faster and higher than Israel's most advanced Phantoms.

This is why Israel is so anxious to obtain the Lance missile and the F-15 fighter as deterrents to the Scud and the Mig-23 and Mig-25. If Washington delays deliveries of these items to Israel and then limits the quantities, the sources say, the arms balance would shift precipitously against Israel in the next two to four years.

Adding to this concern is the belief in military circles here that the supply of Hawk missiles to Jordan will give Israel a serious new problem to worry about. After taking a brutal beating in the 1967 Arab-Israeli war, Hussein stayed out of the October 1973 war.

But he has been rebuilding his forces, and now Israelis regard them as a serious threat. Israeli military sources say that the one thing Hussein lacked—and, in the view of many, the factor that kept him out of the 1973 war—was an adequate anti-aircraft system to defend his tanks and ground forces from Israeli air attack.

Now, the Israelis charge, the United States has unexpectedly agreed to fill this gap in Jordanian strength. By mounting Hawk missiles on the heights on the eastern side of the Jordan River and firing them vertically, Israelis contend, Jordan could play havoc with Israeli aircraft operating from fields on the West Bank.

Israeli officials scornfully dismiss U.S. explanations that the Hawks being provided to Jordan are purely a defensive weapon. They also reject Washington's explanations that the negotiations had been virtually completed before the reassessment began. To the U.S. contention that Jordan could have obtained the missiles from Saudi Arabia in any case, the Israelis reply that when Washington sold the Hawk system to the Saudis, it publicly stated that transfer of the missiles to Egypt, Syria or Jordan was banned by the agreement.

Many sources here say that they still don't know what Washington's intentions were and hope that their protests will draw a fuller explanation. Others are interpreting the episode as proof that the Ford administration is using the weapons issue as a club to pressure Israel into being more receptive to Kissinger's initiatives.

Some officials say privately that their American counterparts have dropped broad hints in recent weeks that Washington now feels that it made a mistake by replenishing Israel's depleted arms stocks so fully after the 1973 war. The suggestion is that by rebuilding Israel's strenght, the United States lost a lot of its leverage.

This leads to the suspicion that Washington's aim now is to regain this leverage by allowing some erosion of Israel's military capabilities. No one believes that the United States would let this go so far as to completely undermine Israel's security.

NEW YORK TIMES
5/10/75(12) Pg. 3

Canada Cites Gains In Accord With U.S. On Defense System

Special to The New York Times

OTTAWA, May 9—Canada and the United States have renewed the 1958 North American Air Defense (NORAD) agreement for another five years with few changes, Allan J. MacEachen, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, announced today.

The principal change in the pact, a realignment of regional command boundaries, will enhance the Canadian role in the joint electronic surveillance system of the two countries by establishing a control center in Edmonton, Alberta, in addition to the one at North Bay, Ontario.

"For Canada, this will have the practical effect that, in the future, all operations in Canadian air space will be controlled from centers located in Canada and manned by Canadian personnel," the announcement said.

The area of western Canada to be covered by the Edmonton center, which is to be built at a cost of $25-million, has been an American responsibility till now. This had upset Canadian nationalists, who have been increasingly sensitive to questions involving this country's sovereignty, especially in the Canadian Arctic regions where many of the NORAD electronic lookouts are situated.

NEW YORK TIMES
12 MAY 1975 Pg. 3

Kosygin Off to Libya

MOSCOW, May 11 (Reuters) —Premier Aleksei N. Kosygin left Moscow today to visit Libya and Tunisia.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

MONDAY MORNING, 12 MAY 1975

WASHINGTON STAR
11 MAY 75 (12) Pg.3

Northrop Was Host To Military

By Peter Gruenstein
Capitol Hill News Service

Pentagon personnel were guests at the Northrop Corp.'s duck hunting lodge in Easton, Md., on 144 occasions between 1971 and 1973, in apparent violation of an executive order prohibiting federal employes from accepting anything of monetary value from a company doing business with the government.

During the three-year period, Northrop, a major aerospace firm, was competing for a mult-billion dollar contract to build a lightweight air combat fighter, the F17. It has been described as "the contract of the century."

While the Air Force earlier this year selected General Dynamics' F16 as its lightweight fighter, the Navy announced last week its decision to proceed with full-scale development of the F18, a modified version of the F17 designed by Northrop and McDonnell Douglas Corp. The Navy's controversial move, which must still be approved by both Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger and Congress, could involve 800 planes and about $6 billion.

In a letter to Schlesinger sent Friday, Rep. Les Aspin, D-Wis., called on the Pentagon to investigate the trips to Northrop's hunting lodge.

"I DON'T THINK DOD should tolerate this kind of cozy relationship between Pentagon officers and a contractor seeking a new multi billion dollar contract," said Aspin, a member of the House Armed Services Committee.

A Civil Service Commission official familiar with Executive Order 11222, which sets ethical standards for federal employes, said that the trips to Northrop's duck hunting facility by Pentagon personnel "appear to conflict" with the executive order.

The executive order, signed by President Lyndon Johnson on May 8, 1965, reads in part:

"No employe shall solicit or accept, directly or indirectly, any gift, gratuity, favor, entertainment, loan, or any other thing of monetary value, from any person, corporation, or group which—(1) has, or is seeking to obtain, contractural or other business or financial relationship with his agency . . ."

IT ALSO STATES: "It is the intent of this section that employes avoid any action, whether or not specifically prohibited . . . which might result in, or create the appearance of—(1) using public office for private gain; (2) giving preferential treatment to any organization or person . . ."

A Pentagon spokesman said the trips to the hunting facilities by department personnel were "news to me" and had no further immediate comment.

The figures on the trips to the hunting facility were found in a voluminous report prepared for Northrop by the national accounting firm of Ernst & Ernst. The report, which is on file at the Securities and Exchange Commission, deals primarily with about $250,000 in illegal corporate donations to political candidates over a 10-year period.

No names of the guests visiting the hunting facility during the 1971-73 period were given, although there were references to guest lists kept in Northrop's Washington office.

When asked earlier this week if the company would release the guest list for the three-year period, Les Daly, Northrop's vice president for public affairs in Los Angeles, responded: "I don't think we'd want to publish that."

In addition to the Pentagon visits to the hunting facility—123 by "military" personnel and 21 by "Department of Defense" officials—other visitors during the three-year period included: 11 congressmen, 85 congressional staff members, 119 Northrop employes and 49 "unknowns."

IT IS NOT CLEAR from the statistics whether 144 different Pentagon personnel visited the facilities or whether any repeat guests were counted each time they visited the facility.

Northrop reported spending $4,000 in rental costs on the hunting facility in 1971, $13,000 in 1972 and $24,000 in 1973.

The facility which was used for duck, quail, and geese hunting, consists of a "modest house" near Easton "used as a meeting and overnight facility for weekend hunting trips," and four nearby farms and commercial hunting areas. None of the facilities is owned by Northrop.

The purpose of the hunting facility is described by Northrop as purely social.

Capitol Hill News Service earlier reported that Northrop had provided free flights on company jet to former California Gov. Ronald Reagan, Sen. Barry Goldwater, R-Ariz., and other members of Congress.

BALTIMORE SUN 10 MAY 1975 (12) Pg. 1

Pentagon tells U.S. arms makers bribes may be necessary in Mideast

Washington (AP)—The Pentagon is telling American arms makers they must frequently use bribery of foreign officials to sell their goods in the Middle East.

A document prepared by a Pentagon arms salesman for use by United States weapons manufacturers says the bribes sometimes can total millions of dollars and reach very high levels of Middle Eastern governments.

The document does not name any countries where bribes are paid or any American companies that pay them. However, the Northrop Corporation is accused in a government lawsuit of paying $30 million over three years to sales agents and consultants without adequate accounting.

Security and Exchange Commission documents indicate that at least some of this money was paid to an Iranian attorney and a wealthy Saudi Arabian agent. Northrop is fighting to keep details of these payments secret. Saudi Arabia recently signed a contract to buy more than $756 million worth of Northrop's F-5E Tiger II jet fighters.

The Pentagon document was prepared last year by Joseph K. Hoenig, an official of the Defense Security Assistance Agency, for use by trade associations of American arms makers. It is unclassified and a copy is on file publicly in connection with the SEC's proceedings against Northrop.

A Pentagon spokesman, Joseph Laitin, said yesterday he had not read the document, but "we are foursquare against bribery." Asked if overseas arms bribery is going on presently, he said, "I trust not."

Mr. Hoenig's paper gives a different impression. It says U.S. arms makers sometimes have no choice but to pay excessive fees to local agents who have or buy influence with their own governments. It says these Middle Eastern agents have existed for 2,000 years and will be hard to eliminate entirely.

The paper says the agents apply influence variously through friendships, family ties with government officials and through "payment of substantial sums of money to individuals in high government positions with somewhat lesser amounts paid to lower-echelon government officials."

"One local agent had admitted to this writer that he has three members of the National Assembly of the country on retainer fees for the purpose of obtaining inner-circle intelligence and to promote the sales potential of his principal's product."

The document adds, "Influence is not always related directly to a cash gratuity. It can include the rent-free use of a villa in France or a flat in London along with car and servants. Sometimes the government official is a silent partner in the agency or other business completely divorced from his normal activities from which he receives financial benefit."

The document says the cost of the agent's fees and bribes is included in the price of the arms paid by the government in question. It says the agent's "influence" can sometimes lead those governments to buy shoddy or ill-suited military hardware.

One country bought used aircraft that were "plagued with maintenance problems" so bad that only two or three of them were able to fly at any given time. Another desert country, dealing through the same agent, bought European-style vehicles that overheated and stalled in the hot summer months.

American arms makers must compete for sales with French and British weapons makers who "have no compunction to agreeing to excessive fees," the document said. One French firm reportedly paid $40 million to an agent who handled a contract worth $200 million to $300 million, it said

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK TIMES
11 MAY 75 (12) Pg.11

HANOI TOP POWER IN CORNER OF ASIA

North Vietnam Now Viewed by U.S. Analysts as Key Force in Southeast

North Vietnam has emerged as the primary military power in Southeast Asia, according to United States military analysts. The old balance of power, which rested on American-armed South Vietnam, has faded.

The sources expect the gradual consolidation of North and South Vietnam, with the unified state exercising hegemony over Laos and Cambodia. The resulting power structure, it was predicted, will exert political influence from Singapore and Indonesia on the west to the Philippines on the east.

The Soviet Union has asked North Vietnam and the Revolutionary Government in South Vietnam for the use of Cam Ranh Bay as a naval and air base, according to qualified military sources. They regard the request as natural in view of Moscow's steady expansion of naval and air power northeast and southeast of China.

Cam Ranh Bay was the site of the largest American naval and air base during the United States involvement in the Vietnam war. A Soviet base there would be a convenient link between Vladivostok, home port for the Soviet Pacific Fleet, and the squadron from that fleet operating in the Indian Ocean.

A Soviet presence at Cam Ranh Bay would also balance American strength in the Philippines to some extent.

The Pattern of Other Bases

A base at Cam Ranh Bay is likely to follow the pattern of those at Matruh, Egypt, on the Mediterranean, and Berbera, Somalia, on the Gulf of Aden. Storage would be provided for cruise missiles, torpedos and shells. Shore parties would service ships and aircraft. Telecommunications and radar stations would be constructed.

Defense Department sources said that the Soviet Union's position in its quarrel with China would be bolstered since it would be in a position to threaten Chinese ports.

The Soviet request, the sources said, is probably based on the important logistical support given the North Vietnamese in their campaign in the South—equipment, tanks, field and antiaircraft guns, surface-to-air missiles and aircraft.

The Russians are reportedly prepared to make up the relatively light losses in equipment and the ammunition expended in the March-April compaign. United States sources do not know if a replacement program is conditional on use of Cam Ranh Bay: the replacements may be made in any case to prevent Hanoi from going to the Chinese.

North Vietnamese casualties in most of the campaign are believed to have been light. American sources say the exception was the fighting around Xuan Loc in April, where both sides lost heavily.

While the North captured an immense amount of equipment, how much can be incorporated into its war machine is unclear.

Large Stock of Aircraft

The Defense Department estimates that the North captured 1,000 fixed-wing aircraft and helicopters during the campaign; only 110 South Vietnamese aircraft are believed to have escaped. The biggest prizes were 87 F-5 fighters, including 27 of the new F-5E's, and 434 helicopters, plus attack planes, gunships and transports.

The military analysts said there was little doubt that Hanoi could use the aircraft now, for pilots who can fly Soviet craft can adapt to American models. The problem lies in acquiring spare parts once the slender stock in South Vietnamese depots has been exhausted.

No accurate figures are available on the number of armored vehicles taken by the northern forces. South Vietnam's inventory at the start of the campaign included 600 medium and light tanks, 1,000 armored personnel carriers and 400 armored cars. Some were destroyed or damaged in the fighting. The North Vietnamese are not believed to be equipped for rapid restoration of damaged vehicles.

The North Vietnamese must be assumed to have captured all of the field and antiaircraft guns in the South's inventory of 1,500 that remained undestroyed, plus antitank missiles.

While the combination of a large, well-trained army and more than adequate military supplies gives the North Vietnamese considerable military power, the analysts said that spare parts would eventually become a problem as far as American equipment is concerned. For the moment, though, they said, Hanoi commands the largest and best military force in South Asia east of India.

"It's really not a question of what they have," a source commented. "We're relatively sure of that. It's what they intend to do with it now that they have it. One thing you can be sure of—none of their neighbors is going to sass them."

WASHINGTON POST
12 MAY 1975 Pg. 14

U.S. Seen Prepared To Leave Laos or Stay

By Murrey Marder
Washington Post Staff Writer

The United States is prepared either to remain in Laos or to pull its personnel out, depending on the attitude of the Pathet Lao who can now dominate the country, a senior American official said yesterday.

"If they want to push us out, we will get out," said the official, "if they want us to stay, we will stay."

The crumbling position of the pro-American rightists and neutralists in the coalition government of Premier Souvanna Phouma was described by an American source as "quite a genteel sort of collapse."

The United States is planning to send a new ambassador to Laos, who may arrive too late to have any influence. He is Galen L. Stone, now minister-counselor in the U.S. embassy in Paris, a career diplomat who served in Saigon in 1968.

Stone who has not yet be nominated by President Ford, will replace Charles S. Whitehouse, who left Laos in April and now is ambassador to Thailand.

The government of Souvanna Phouma agreed to accept Stone only two days ago an informed source said. Christian A. Chapman, an experienced diplomat is presently in charge of the U.S. embassy in Vientiane.

"There is no feeling [in Washington] that there is a violent catastrophe right around the corner" in Laos, said one official yesterday, because "if the rightists and neutralists are pushed hard, they have no alternative except to give in."

"It depends," this source said, "on how fast the other side wants to make it clear that it has won the fight."

WASHINGTON POST
12 MAY 1975 Pg. 12

Pentagon Regulations Violated by Abortions

Despite a controversy over the legality of many military-funded abortions the Defense Department has been authorizing them—nearly 5,500 last year—for women in military service and the wives and daughters of servicemen.

Many of these abortions, however, violate Defense Department regulations and in some instances the laws of foreign nations where U.S. troops are stationed.

"It is a real problem, and we're in a very embarrassing position on this," said a military physician who asked that his name be withheld.

Other Pentagon officials privately blamed Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger for "looking the other way" and refusing to clarify Pentagon policy on abortion.

Army officials in Europe revealed that the problem of pregnancies among WACs in West Germany has become increasingly costly. Because German laws forbid abortion, the Army has been sending pregnant WACs to the United States for abortions.

Most of those have taken place at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, where a spokesman confirmed that there has been a "very large increase" in the number of abortions for WAC's. District of Columbia law permits abortion on demand within the first three months of pregnancy.

Current Pentagon policy prohibits abortion on demand, for the Army surgeon general, Bernard Katz, a spokesman said that the policy permits abortion only where physical or mental health is threatened. This policy is based on an executive order issued by President Nixon in 1972.

In addition to establishing the criteria for abortions, the Nixon order prohibited the military from conducting abortions at U.S. bases in nations such as Germany where local law forbids it. But while Army WACs are complying with German law, Pentagon officials say Air Force women have abortions at hospitals on air bases in Germany.

Despite the prohibition of abortions on demand, Pentagon spokesmen said incomplete statistics showed that in 1974 the Army performed Navy, 2,236; and the Air Force, about 2,000 abortions; the 1,191.

The statistics do not show how the abortions are broken down between women in the military and wives and daughters of servicemen. But one Army doctor said that 155 WACs were flown from Germany last year for abortions in the United States.

To get around the Pentagon regulations, "You can just say mental health is involved in demand abortions," said one Army doctor, "that can be broadened to cover anything."

A major factor in the abortion increase is the doubling of the size of the WAC force since 1972. Total strength is now estimated at 97,000.

"In addition to the WACs coming [to the United States] from Germany, I would estimate about another 155 are having abortions in Sweden or other countries where it is legal," a military medical official said.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WALL STREET JOURNAL 12 MAY 1975, Pg 5

Pentagon Request for Weapons Funding Is Changed Little by House, Senate Panels

By Arlen J. Large
Staff Reporter of The Wall Street Journal

WASHINGTON -- The Pentagon's bankroll and defense doctrines so far are receiving kind treatment from the same liberal Congress where so many speeches are made about military boondoggles.

Floor debate in the House and Senate in coming weeks will be shaped by the preliminary decisions of the Armed Services Committee of both bodies. Both committees last week finished work on bills authorizing procurement of weapons, and both gave Defense Secretary James Schlesinger little to worry about.

The Senate Armed Services Committee's chairman, John Stennis (D., Miss.), Friday reported that his 16-member panel cut $5.5 billion from the $35.8 billion sought by the Pentagon for a 15-month period starting July 1. That sounds like a lot, but it doesn't hit Mr. Schlesinger where he lives. And earlier last week, the House Armed Services Committee voted to slice $3.7 billion from the weapons budget, but more than a third of that money had been earmarked for South Vietnam.

Meanwhile, the Defense chief is winning his campaign to get bigger, more-accurate and more-sophisticated warheads for U.S. strategic missiles aimed at the Soviet Union. These, he says, give military planners the option of a surgical attack on enemy missile silos instead of ordering a doomsday flattening of Russian cities. Sen. Thomas McIntyre (D., N.H.), an Armed Services Committee member, protests that these smarter warheads could damage detente by seeming to threaten the Russians with a first-strike wipeout of their own deterrent missile force.

Won an Early Skirmish

As he did last year, Sen. McIntyre won an early skirmish in the committee, but the final vote was 10 to four in favor of giving Mr. Schlesinger all the money he wanted for developing his new warheads.

The Pentagon also is winning most of the fights over military hardware, at least those items that have become symbolic targets of would-be budget-cutters. The most symbolic of all is the B1 strategic bomber, nearing the end of the development phase at Rockwell International Corp. The Air Force asked for $222 million in advance funds to begin actual procurement of a B1 operational fleet, a sum that the Senate committee denied.

But Sen. Stennis said that didn't represent a decision against procurement of the bombers, just a postponement of an eventual go-ahead. The committee approved $726 million for the 15-month period for continued development work, including the construction of a fourth prototype bomber. Sen. Stennis said this amounted to "a green light" for the B1 project.

Moreover, a related committee vote apparently removed a threat to the B1 in the form of a potential rival, the F111 made by General Dynamics Corp. For several years the Air Force has said it doesn't want to buy any more of these fighter-bombers for its inventory, but Congress has been voting money for them anyway. F111 advocates argue that production lines should be kept open in case the Air Force decides the B1 has become too expensive to buy. However, Congress has already rescinded last year's appropriation for more F111s, and a proposal to insert some money in the new budget was voted down by the Armed Services Committee, nine to seven.

Unnecessary Hardware

For many Pentagon critics, another symbol of gold-plated unnecessary hardware is Boeing Co.'s tactical air combat control plane, known as AWACS. The Air Force wanted $690 million to buy six of the planes, and the Senate committee granted it all. (The House committee voted to cut back the purchase to three planes; the difference must be resolved later.)

Secretary Schlesinger's smart warheads, the fourth F1 prototype and the six AWACS planes all may be challenged again when the weapons bill reaches the Senate floor. But the full Senate hasn't in memory overturned Mr. Stennis on a major weapons decision, and Pentagon critics this year must vote in the realization that cutting money for planes and other hardware will throw people out of work during a recession. Administration allies also will argue that a cutback in military spending might be taken the wrong way by foreign governments after the U.S. defeat in Vietnam.

"Very emphatically, I believe the Senate will uphold this bill," Sen. Stennis told reporters Friday.

Saigon's fall was responsible for the biggest single reduction in the bill by the committee. The $1.3 billion sought for continued military aid to South Vietnam can't be used now, so the committee left it out. Other reductions stemmed from essentially bookkeeping quirks, such as denial of nearly $1 billion sought by the Navy to catch up with previous inflation, and deletion of a $300 million 'standby' fund for replacing U.S. weapons that may be sent to Israel or some other ally.

Some of the cuts touched real weapons, however. The Senate committee said the Navy can't have, at least for now, $257 million sought for a fifth nuclear-powered frigate to escort aircraft carriers. Previous frigates in this class have been built by Tenneco Inc.'s Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. Another $270 million was saved by a decision to authorize just seven new patrol frigates for the Navy instead of the 10 requested. Deleted also was $331.5 million for an emergency stockpile of spare aircraft parts.

On the other hand, the committee approved with little change funds for purchase of 45 more Grumman Corp. F14 fighters by the Navy and 135 more McDonnell Douglas Corp. F15 fighters by the Air Force. The committee approved money for continued work on Trident submarines by General Dynamics, and on development of Trident missiles by Lockheed Aircraft Corp.

The Senate committee's bill authorizes $25 billion for the year starting July 1, and $5.3 billion for a special three-month transition period to a new fiscal year beginning Oct. 1, 1976, for a total of $30.3 billion. These sums set ceilings on appropriations that must be voted later for weapons and military research. The ceilings don't apply to much bigger appropriations that will be needed for military pay and operating expenses.

BALTIMORE SUN 12 MAY 1975, Pg 1

Senate unit cuts military bill

By CHARLES W. CORDDRY
Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—The Senate Armed Services Committee proposed yesterday a $30.3 billion military procurement bill, reducing President Ford's requests by $5.5 billion but leaving major weapons programs largely intact.

Some cuts in the requests submitted in January were illusory, such as that for Vietnam military aid, which is no longer an issue, and others shaved moderate sums from tank, ship and airlift programs.

The committee endorsed with minor or no changes, however, such front-line programs as the Trident missile submarine, the Navy and Air Force F-14 and F-15 jet fighters and jet-propelled cruise missiles, Army attack helicopters, attack submarines and continued production of Minuteman intercontinental missiles.

The Senate panel's cuts were almost $1.8 billion deeper than its House counterpart recommended earlier this week, and the mix was considerably different, so that numerous changes will be made by the time the legislation is passed.

Action in both committees, however, seemed in line with a spreading interest in Congress in holding off some of the deeper cuts that once were, and still may be, sought this year.

Those with this view argue against "rocking the boat" in what is seen as a difficult post-Vietnam period for United State foreign-military policy.

Representative Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr. (D., Mass.), the House majority leader, will not support demands for overseas troop cuts this year, for example, as he has in several years past.

Senator Mike Mansfield (D., Mont.), the Senate majority leader, still seems undecided on whether to demand cuts in Europe this year, as he has automatically done for years.

Representative Ronald V. Dellums (D., Calif.), who perennially seeks overseas troop cuts in the hundreds of thousands, apparently would settle for about 70,000 this year.

The House Armed Services Committee proposed no troop cuts at home or abroad. The Senate panel recommended a military reduction of just 18,300 troops spread among the services. These could be cut from command headquarters, support elements that can be reduced because of withdrawals from Thailand, training staffs and overhead. The committee said there would be no effect on combat capability from such cuts.

It also proposed a cut of 23,000 in Defense Department civilian employment, including some foreign nationals overseas. Its total staff cuts would save $470 million a year when fully implemented, the committee said. After the reductions, there would be 2,081,700 in uniform and 962,000 civilian employees.

The annual procurement bill fixes ceilings on sums that may be spent for arms research, development and production, and sets manpower levels. This year's bill is for 15 months starting July 1, because the government is shifting in 1976 to fiscal years starting October 1.

Appropriations must be voted later, and some defense spending critics may hold their heaviest fire until then, arguing they are not seeking to influence foreign-military policy but simply to make defense more efficient and to rid it of weapons deemed unneeded.

The Senate committee approved, as reported earlier in the week, continued development of the B-1 supersonic bomber, but refused $222 million for advance production materials. It also endorsed five projects aimed at improving accuracy and power of nuclear warheads.

Of its $5.5 billion cut, $1.3 billion was for Vietnam aid, $300 million to stockpile weapons for foreign sales and $1 billion for cost escalation on ships. The ship-cost item will have to be dealt with next year.

The "real" cut, therefore, was about $2.9 billion for weapons development and production—about 9 per cent, compared with a figure of $1.1 billion in the House committee.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

A038
R I
GUAM 5-12
(PICTURE)
DAY LD
AGANA, GUAM (UPI) -- THE U.S. AIRCRAFT CARRIER MIDWAY LEFT GUAM TODAY AFTER BRINGING IN A CONTROVERSIAL CARGO OF 145 WARPLANES AND HELICOPTERS FLOWN OUT OF SOUTH VIETNAM BY THE NOW-DEFUNCT SAIGON AIR FORCE.

THE MIDWAY STEAMED INTO PORT SUNDAY WITH ABOUT 100 WARPLANES AND 45 HELICOPTERS, TAKEN OUT OF THE COUNTRY BEFORE THE FALL OF SAIGON TWO WEEKS AGO.

THE CARRIER LOADED THE PLANES, F5 FREEDOM FIGHTERS AND A37 DRAGONFLIES, AT A PORT NEAR THE U.S.-RUN U TAPAO AIR BASE IN THAILAND AND PICKED UP THE HELICOPTERS WHILE UNDERWAY IN THE SOUTH CHINA SEA.

THE UNITED STATES HALTED SHIPPING MORE PLANES FROM U TAPAO LAST WEEK AFTER THAILAND PROTESTED, BUT BY THEN MOST OF THE SOPHISTICATED AIRCRAFT HAD ALREADY BEEN LOADED.

THE COMMUNIST RULERS OF NORTH VIETNAM AND SOUTH VIETNAM HAVE DEMANDED THAT THE MULTI-MILLION DOLLAR CARGO SHOULD BE RETURNED TO SAIGON.

SEVEN VESSELS, INCLUDING A VIETNAMESE WARSHIP, WERE EXPECTED TO BRING MORE THAN 20,000 REFUGEES TO GUAM THIS WEEK, BALLOONING THE PACIFIC ISLAND'S REFUGEE POPULATION TO 52,000.

AFTER THE MIDWAY'S ARRIVAL, REAR ADM. WILLIAM HARRIS JR. SAID IN A NEWS CONFERENCE HE DID NOT KNOW HOW MANY, IF ANY, SOUTH VIETNAMESE WARPLANES REMAINED AT U TAPAO.

"WE TOOK ALL WE WERE ASKED TO TAKE," HARRIS SAID.

THE CARRIER USED A HELICOPTER SLING AND A BARGE EARLY THIS MONTH TO WINCH THE PLANES ABOARD ITS FOUR-ACRE FLIGHT DECK. SAIGON SURRENDERED TO THE COMMUNISTS APRIL 30.

ONE F5 WAS DROPPED AND DAMAGED WHILE LOADING, BUT MOST OF THE PLANES WERE FULLY SERVICEABLE, HARRIS SAID.

THE HELICOPTERS, MOST OF THEM UH1 HUEYS, LANDED ON THE CARRIER DECK DURING THE HECTIC SCRAMBLE OUT OF SAIGON TO THE SOUTH CHINA SEA APRIL 29 AND 30, HE SAID.

THE U.S. SHIPS GREEN WAVE AND GREEN PORT DOCKED IN GUAM TODAY AND THREE MORE AMERICAN VESSELS WERE EXPECTED BY TUESDAY AFTENOON. THE FIVE VESSELS CARRIED 19,613 REFUGEES.

TWO SOUTH VIETNAMESE SHIPS -- ONE THE FIRST VIETNAMESE WARSHIP TO ENTER GUAM SINCE THE FALL OF SAIGON -- WERE DUE LATER THIS WEEK WITH AT LEAST 600 MORE REFUGEES.

UPI 05-12 04:14 AED

APB065
060

(WASHINGTON) -- THE STATE DEPARTMENT SAYS THE UNITED STATES HAS NO PLANS TO EVACUATE THE ONE-THOUSAND AMERICANS IN LAOS ALTHOUGH THE COMMUNIST PATHET LAO APPARENTLY ARE TAKING OVER THE LANDLOCKED INDOCHINESE KINGDOM. A SPOKESMAN IN WASHINGTON SAYS: ''THE SITUATION DOESN'T APPEAR TO WARRANT IT.''

VIENTIANE, THE LAOTIAN CAPITAL, REMAINED CALM TODAY FOLLOWING A SPEECH YESTERDAY IN WHICH PREMIER SOUVANNA PHOUMA IN EFFECT CONCEDED THAT THE PATHET LAO NOW CONTROL THE COALITION GOVERNMENT OF RIGHTISTS, LEFTISTS AND NEUTRALISTS ESTABLISHED UNDER A 1973 PEACE ACCORD.

THE PREMIER'S SPEECH FOLLOWED THE COMMUNIST VICTORIES IN CAMBODIA AND SOUTH VIETNAM, AND ATTACKS BY PATHET LAO FORCES ON VARIOUS POSITIONS HELD BY THE RIGHTIST ROYAL LAOTIAN ARMY. IT ALSO CAME IN THE WAKE OF RESIGNATIONS BY FOUR OF THE SIX RIGHTIST MEMBERS OF SOUVANNA PHOUMA'S COALITION CABINET AND THE REMOVAL OF THREE TOP-RANKING RIGHTIST GENERALS FROM THEIR ARMY COMMANDS. THIS LEFT THE PATHET LAO THE DOMINANT FACTION IN THE GOVERNMENT.

04:06AED 05-12-75

A037
R A

CAPE CANAVERAL, FLA. (UPI) -- AN ELECTRICAL STORM HAS DELAYED UNTIL MAY 19 THE LAUNCH OF TWO MILITARY COMMUNICATIONS SATELLITES SET FOR TUESDAY BECAUSE OF FEARS LIGHTNING MAY HAVE DAMAGED SOME INSTRUMENTS.

A TITAN III-C ROCKET HAD BEEN SCHEDULED TO CARRY THE TWO MILITARY COMMUNICATIONS SATELLITES INTO SPACE TUESDAY, TO COMPLETE A NETWORK PROVIDING MILITARY FORCES WITH A SECRET METHOD OF COMMUNICATIONS.

SPACE AGENCY OFFICIALS SAID THEY DID NOT THINK DAMAGE WAS DONE TO THE SENSITIVE ELECTRONIC INSTRUMENTS DURING THE THUNDERSTORM FRIDAY NIGHT, BUT THEY NEED THE EXTRA TIME TO RUN TESTS AND MAKE ABSOLUTELY SURE. UPI 05-12 04:07 AED

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CURRENT NEWS

PART II - MAIN EDITION - 1130

THIS SUPPLEMENTS PART I-EARLY BIRD EDITION

THIS PUBLICATION IS PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL NEWS ITEMS OF INTEREST TO THEM IN THEIR OFFICIAL CAPACITIES. IT IS NOT INTENDED TO SUBSTITUTE FOR NEWSPAPERS, PERIODICALS AND BROADCASTS AS A MEANS OF KEEPING INFORMED ABOUT THE NATURE, MEANING AND IMPACT OF NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL NEWS DEVELOPMENTS. USE OF THESE ARTICLES HERE, OF COURSE, DOES NOT REFLECT OFFICIAL ENDORSEMENT. FURTHER REPRODUCTION FOR PRIVATE USE OR GAIN IS SUBJECT TO THE ORIGINAL COPYRIGHT RESTRICTIONS.

FRIDAY, MAY 9, 1975

WASHINGTON POST
9 May 1975 Pg. 1

Castro Hints At Thaw

By Jules Witcover
Washington Post Staff Writer

Cuba Prime Minister Fidel Castro has moved to thaw his long-frigid relations with the United States, saying that talks could resume with a partial lifting of the trade embargo against Cuba.

The White House promptly replied yesterday that President Ford welcomes the apparent overture but had no immediate plans to act until the ban is lifted by the Organization of American States, which imposed it under U.S. leadership 11 years ago.

Castro, in a press conference with American reporters accompanying Sen. George McGovern (D-S.D.) on a Cuban tour, said late Wednesday that the removal of restrictions on medicines and foodstuffs would constitute evidence of U.S. willingness to negotiate its longstanding differences with Cuba.

But McGovern reported after eight hours of talks—including three hours during a rollicking tour of the Cuban countryside with Castro at the wheel of an open jeep—that the Cuban leader appeared ready to take a number of steps on his own to signal Cuba's desire to ease relations.

McGovern said Castro promised to grant exit visas to the parents of Luis Tiant, a Cuban pitcher for the Boston Red Sox, so they could come to the United States to see their son play. On a larger scale, McGovern said, Castro was "very much interested" in a pro-

CASTRO...Pg. 2

NEW YORK TIMES 9 May 1975 Pg. 9

Ford Assures Asian Visitors on U.S. Ties

By JAMES M. NAUGHTON
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 8—President Ford gave fresh assurances today to officials from South Korea and Singapore that the United States would maintain its presence in Asia.

Chung Il Kwon, the speaker of the South Korean National Assembly, and Hahm Pyong Choon, the South Korean Ambassador to Washington, paid a 10-minute "courtesy call" on Mr. Ford at the White House. They said later that they had warned that an American withdrawal from South Korea would lead "within six months" to a military attack by North Korea.

For Ties With Allies

Mr. Hahm told reporters that the President had pledged that his Administration would stand by treaty commitments to defend South Korea and that he had no intention of removing the 38,000 American troops stationed there.

Mr. Ford met this afternoon with Prime Minister Lee Kuar Yew of Singapore and, according to Ron Nessen, the White House press secretary, restated "the American determination to stand by allies and friends."

Both White House meetings were part of a continuing attempt by Mr. Ford to demonstrate his resolve to maintain and strengthen ties with allies in the wake of the defeats of the American-supported governments of Cambodia and South Vietnam.

The President expressed similar assurances yesterday to the Prime Ministers of Britain, Australia and New Zealand.

Although the meeting with the Koreans, Mr. Chung and Mr. Hahm, was the most brief of those scheduled this week by the President, it may have been the most significant. Some Administration officials are said to suspect that South Korea will be the next target for a test of United States resolve after Indochina.

Mr. Nessen said that the President would delay completion of a reassessment of Mid-

FORD...Pg. 2

NEW YORK TIMES 9 May 1975 Pg. 1

Brezhnev Says End of Conflict In Indochina Will Help Detente

Special to The New York Times

MOSCOW, May 8—Leonid I. Brezhnev said today that he hoped the end of the wars in Indochina would lead to a further relaxation of tensions between the Soviet Union and the United States.

The Soviet Communist party leader made the bid for accommodation in his first public comments on the Communist victory in Vietnam. He praised the "patriots of Vietnam" for having waged a successful "struggle against foreign interventionists and their henchmen."

Mr. Brezhnev avoided identifying the United States as an adversary of the Communists in Vietnam, in keeping with a recent policy here of not antagonizing the United States on the matter of Indochina.

Except for the refugee issue, the Soviet press recently has generally not criticized the Americans on Vietnam, evidently out of concern over Soviet-American détente.

The Kremlin leadership delivered formal congratulations to the Communist victors a week ago, but delayed doing so until more than a day after the fall of Saigon had become known here.

Mr. Brezhnev's remarks seemed intended to reassure the United States that the Soviet Union still wanted détente.

There has been some concern here that the United States might consider pulling back from its commitment to cooperation with Moscow as a result of the Communist takeovers in Vietnam and Cambodia.

At the same time, Mr. Brezhnev did not hide the Kremlin's support of "national liberation struggles," as it defines con-

BREZHNEV...Pg. 2

NEW YORK TIMES
9 May 1975 Pg. 26

CONFEREES SLASH DEFENSE FUNDING

By EILEEN SHANAHAN

WASHINGTON, May 8—The Joint Senate-House Conference Committee on the Budget agreed today to cut next year's defense spending by $3.3-billion from the figure requested by President Ford.

The Congressional group, which is implementing for the first time a new procedure aimed at giving Congress a more comprehensive and unified look at the effects of its various actions on spending programs, also voted to make a large reduction in the budget category called "International Affairs."

Although the conferees did not specifically say so, their action on this item appeared aimed at discouraging approval by Congress of any funds whatever for aid to the rehabilitation of Vietnam.

The point is unclear because, in writing the new budget guidelines, the House and Senate Budget Committees are not supposed to deal with individual programs in detail.

But in discussing the cuts they were making in the "International Affairs" category, members of the conference committee referred to only two items. One was the remaining $300-million of Vietnam aid and the other was funds for what is known as the "safety net" to protect the big industrialized countries from the international financial ramifications of the quadruping of oil prices.

The $3.3-billion cut in defense spending, plus a $7-billion reduction in the authorizations for future military spending,

DEFENSE SPENDING—Pg2

JAMES KILLINGBECK, CHIEF, CURRENT NEWS BRANCH, OX 78765
HELEN YOUNG, ASSISTANT CHIEF
FOR SPECIAL RESEARCH SERVICES OR DISTRIBUTION CALL HARRY ZUBKOFF, CHIEF, EXECUTIVE AGENCY SERVICE, OX 52884

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CASTRO...Continued

posal by the South Dakotan to exchange U.S. and Cuban baseball and basketball teams, in the way "Ping-Pong diplomacy" helped ease relations between the United States and China in 1971.

Also, McGovern reported, Castro said he would consider returning $2 million in ransom brought to Cuba on a hijacked plane in 1972, and releasing nine American political prisoners, some of whom Castro said were involved in CIA activities.

"He said they were conspirators against the Cuban government," McGovern said, "but to help the position of friends of Cuba in the United States he will consider releasing some or all of these nine political prisoners."

Castro made it clear, however, that the lifting of the trade embargo was the essential first step to improved relations, McGovern said.

In the press conference, Castro extended "a wish of friendship" to the American people. "I understand it is not easy because we belong to different worlds," he said. "But we are neighbors and in one way or another we (ought) to live in peace."

Presidential press secretary Ron Nessen, commenting on Castro's remarks, said the White House "notes that he seems to have accepted what the White House has referred to in the past as the mutuality of obligations."

In a speech in Houston in March, Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger said that a "fundamental change" could not come "unless Cuba demonstrates a readiness to assume the mutuality of obligation and regard upon which a new relationship must be founded."

Under questioning, Nessen said he was "not announcing a change in U.S. policy toward Cuba." But he noted that "the United States has said we see no future in perpetual antagonism" toward Castro's country.

At the State Department, spokesman Robert J. Funseth said the United States has "made it clear to Cuba that we are prepared to improve our relations" in public and private statements and "by some symbolic acts" such as easing restrictions on validating passports to Cuba.

A state Department official said the United States would like to see, as a further evidence of Castro's sincerity, other gestures such as allowing travel by Cubans to the United States and the reuniting of Cuban families split between the two countries. Castro's reported remarks to McGovern appeared to touch on these points.

Castro, in the press conference, also indicated that the departure of Richard M. Nixon from the White House and the end of the Vietnam war both might help restore good relations between Cuba and the United States.

He said he felt Nixon had "a personal hostility against Cuba and many counter-revolutionary friends," but added that "President Ford does not have any personal hostility." As for the war, Castro said, Cuba's strong opposition to U.S. policy in Vietnam made it "very difficult" to improve relations.

Castro denied to the visiting reporters that his government was involved in any way in the 1963 assassination of President John F. Kennedy. Such action would have been "absurd, irresponsible, crazy and a very dangerous measure," he said.

Castro said that although Kennedy was an adversary of Cuba who approved the Bay of Pigs invasion, he added that he was "an intelligent man who had begun to understand the errors of his policies, and perhaps Kennedy would have made some steps toward improving relations with Cuba."

While denying any Cuban role in Kennedy's death, Castro said "it is not news for us" that the CIA reportedly was involved in attempts to kill him and other leaders of his 1959 revolution. He said his own security men "for many years" had uncovered plots against his government by individuals he said were trained by the CIA, in some cases with weapons "smuggled out of the U.S. Guantanamo Naval Base" in Cuba.

Castro's interview with McGovern, after the three-hour tour of the Cuban countryside, continued at the Palace of the Revolution in Havana over a barbecue dinner, and finally during a night tour of Havana in a Russian-built limousine. The press conference took place at the palace during an interim in the talks with McGovern.

BREZHNEV...Continued

flicts like those in Cambodia, Vietnam and elsewhere.

Mr. Brezhnev spoke today to a bemedaled audience in the Kremlin's Palace of Congresses at a ceremony marking the 30th anniversary of the defeat of Nazi Germany.

Mr. Brezhnev used the occasion to send a message to President Ford in which he said "substantial positive changes have been achieved in Soviet-American relations as a result of efforts made by our countries."

During his five-minute speech, which was devoted largely to a retrospective look at the war, Mr. Brezhnev referred briefly to the European security conference that the Soviet Union wants to conclude quickly at a summit level. He suggested that "it would probably be good to have this European experience used in this or that form by states on other continents."

The party chief did not amplify his proposal. It possibly was an allusion to an Asian collective security system that Moscow has been trying to put together as a hedge against China. Soviet officials have expressed concern recently about where the fast-moving events in Indochina may put them in comparison with their Chinese rivals.

Mr. Brezhnev confined his foreign policy remarks largely to Indochina.

"The elimination of the hotbed of war in Indochina creates conditions for further improvement in the international atmosphere," he said. "This will benefit the cause of international détente, including, we believe, détente in relations between our country and the United States of America."

He went on to stress the need for "concrete agreements" for cutbacks of "military preparations of states." Though he did not elaborate, Mr. Brezhnev may have had in mind the agreement on the reduction of nuclear weapons that was tentatively outlined in his brief summit meetin with President Ford near Vladivostok and is now being negotiated by Soviet and American experts.

In turning to Vietnam, the Soviet leader contended that "attempts to suppress the liberation movements of people are doomed to failure."

"And the best proof of this," he said, "is the glorious victory scored by the Vietnamese people in the struggle against foreign interventionists and their henchmen.

"This victory crowns the long heroic struggle of the patriots of Vietnam. "It is the result of a skillful use by them of various forms of struggle: military, political and diplomatic.'

FORD... Continued

dle East policy until after he confers next month with President Anwar el-Sadat of Egypt and Premier Yitzhak Rabin of Israel. In that context, Mr. Ford met today with Arthur J. Goldberg, who was the chief United States delegate to the United Nations during the 1967 Middle East war.

Mr. Nessen said Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger had advised the Cabinet last night that the United States had "recovered" 288 combat airplanes and helicopters from its defeated allies in Cambodia and South Vietnam.

At the Pentagon, however, Joseph Laitin, the Defense Department spokesman, said that more than 180 of the aircraft were still in Thailand. The United States suspended removal of the planes from Thailand this week at the request of the Thai Government after the Communists in Saigon claimed ownership of the aircraft.

Mr. Nessen also indicated that the United States was seeking the assistance of the new Saigon Government in recovery of the bodies of two marines killed just before the final American evacuation of Saigon.

"Every possible channel is being used to retrieve the two bodies," Mr. Nessen said. He declined to specify what diplomatic channels might be used "because of the delicacy of the situation." He said Mr. Ford had directed the Marine Corps to submit a "full report" explaining how the bodies of Cpl. Charles McMahon Jr. of Woburn, Mass., and Lance Cpl. Darwin L. Judge of Marshalltown, Iowa, had been left behind.

NEW YORK TIMES
9 May 1975 Pg. 11

Wallace Criticizes U.S. On World War Policy

WASHINGTON, May 8 (AP)—Gov. George C. Wallace of Alabama recently told a group of foreign correspondents he believed the United States may have been "fighting the wrong people" in World War II.

In a wide-ranging interview with the correspondents on March 3, Mr. Wallace also said he thought there might never have been a second world war if the United States had cultivated the friendship of the Japanese and Germans.

Reached today in Montgomery, Ala., Mr. Wallace said he had been quoted out of context in published reports about the interview.

"We were fighting the right people but our diplomacy led us to fight people who should have been our friends," Mr. Wallace said in explanation.

DEFENSE SPENDING... Continued

appeared to be roughly in conformity with the partial actions taken so far this year by other Congressional committees on the military budget.

In domestic policy areas, as the committee moved toward probable completion of its work tomorrow, the conferees seemed disposed to make some increases in the Ford budget but often smaller ones than had been boted earlier in either the Senate or the House.

In other words, only rarely did the conference committee pick the highest available figures. More often, they either split the difference between the House and Senate or took the lower figure.

Thus, the conferees appeared to be headed toward a total spending figure that would produce a deficit in the neighborhood of $67-billion to $69-billion. According to Congressional estimates of the actual costs of programs endorsed by President Ford, this would be about the same deficit as the Ford program would produce.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

SYRACUSE, N.Y. HERALD-JOURNAL 30 April 1975 Pg. 23 (9May)

Asian allies need assurance

By JOSEPH A. PORCELLO

The United States "still has obligations to its allies in Asia and we must make sure those allies realize we are going to meet those obligations."

Three U. S. Department of Defense speakers at today's "Dialogue on the Defense" in Hotel Syracuse agreed generally with that statement made by Lt Gen. Daniel O. Graham, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency.

"We cannot abandon Southeast Asia any more than we can any other part of the world," said Vice Adm. John G. Finneran, principal deputy assistant secretary of defense.

"We're still involved with friendly nations" in Asia, said William Levitt, director for production and research for the secretary of defense.

The speakers were asked in an interview about the nation's role future role in Asia as a result of the fall of South Vietnam.

Also speaking at the one-day meeting sponsored by the American Defense Preparedness Association was John R. Quetsch, principal assistant budget director for the secretary of defense.

Thomas I. Paganelli, vice president and general manager of General Electric's Electronics Systems Division at Syracuse, chaired the morning panel discussion. Russell L. Bearss, plant manager, Chrysler Corp.'s New Process Gear Division, was master of ceremonies at the luncheon, where General Grahmam spoke on "World Threats to U. S. Peace."

Graham said in reply to a question that the "big lesson" of Vietnam to him is "that the United States has the kind of society which is not one that supports a limited objective war that lasts a long time."

He said in the interview, "The situation out there (in Asia) would go to pot quickly if we don't make sure they (our allies) understand that those obligations are accepted by the whole American people and are blessed by the Congress, and that there is no doubt about those committments as there was in Vietnam."

He pointed out that the United States' treaties with Korea, Japan, the Philippines and others "have a lot stronger base than we ever had in Vietnam."

The U. S. influence in Southeast Asia, he feels, "is going to be a little indirect" as the result of the lessened military presence of the United States there.

Admiral Finneran noted that the nation's continued involvement with Asian nations included treaties with Japan, "a lot of years of support of Taiwan, 77 years in support of the independence of the Philippines."

We have basic agreements with these and other allies that are not going to be changed overnight. There may be some redefinition of these, but we can't ignore these nations."

He mentioned specifically Japan, which he termed "an industrial giant."

"It is in our interest as one of the economic leaders of the world to pursue those ties that strengthen our role in world economics," the admiral declared.

Not only are some of these nations "friends" he said, "but we also have some economic ties with them."

Port visits of U. S. flagships in Asia is one way to provide our allies with "some visibility of our military potential," he noted.

Levitt said the U. S. must "continue to pursue our relations with these (allies), but it's too early to tell yet what will happen there (Southeast Asia) now."

He termed the fall of South Vietnam as "disheartening to one who has spent many months" on that nation's problems in the Defense Department.

NEW YORK TIMES
9 May 1975 Pg. 45

SAUDIS REASSESS NORTHROP DEAL

GARDEN CITY, L.I., May 8 (UPI)—At the urging of the Pentagon, Saudi Arabia has begun a reappraisal of an aircraft maintenance contract renewal with the Northrop Corporation that could result in the payment of a $45-million agent's fee, according to a report published today.

The report said the Defense Department warned Saudi Arabia in March it could end up paying that amount to Northrop's Saudi agent, Adnan M. Khashoggi.

The $45-million fee would be a 5 per cent commission to Mr. Khashoggi on renewal of an $850-million, five-year contract for the maintenance of nearly 100 F-5 jet fighters purchased from Northrop, according to a report published in Newsday.

According to the paper, Saudi law requires that foreign companies wishing to do business in the Arab nation must have a Saudi national as an agent. Mr. Khashoggi, best known in the United States for his unsuccessful attempt to take over the First National Bank of San Jose, Calif., is that agent.

Possible Bribes Seen

Critics of large agent's fees, Newsday said, believe that such commissions are used to bribe government officials. "United States regulatory agencies are currently examing the records of Northrop and other American corporations, looking for evidence of the use of slush funds for bribes abroad and for illegal contributions to political campaigns."

The paper quoted a spokesman for Northrop as saying, "the matter, including the agent's fee, is still under discussion. You must remember that he [Mr. Khashoggi] is one of the few people who can help make an $850-million sale."

BALTIMORE SUN 9 May 1975 Pg. 4

Security fears grip S. Korea

By MATTHEW J. SEIDEN
Sun Staff Correspondent

Tokyo—Eight days after the surrender of the former Saigon government, Kim Jong Pil, the South Korean prime minister, arrived here yesterday on an unscheduled one-night visit, apparently seeking reassurances of continued American and Japanese support for his government.

South Korea is reportedly afraid that the United States might "abandon" Seoul as it is thought to have "abandoned" Saigon, in the face of a Communist attack.

The South Korean government is particularly worried by the visit to Peking of the North Korean president, Kim Il Sung, which coincided with the Communist victories in Southeast Asia.

The South Korean prime minister will meet this afternoon with Takeo Miki, the Japanese prime minister, and Kiichi Miyazawa, Japan's foreign minister, according to a Japanese government spokesman.

Both the Japanese spokesman and a Korean government official said the discussions probably would deal with South Korean security problems that could follow recent developments in Indochina.

"At a time when American credibility is being questioned around the world, Korea is and feels like the most vulnerable spot," a knowledgeable Western diplomat said.

According to Western and Japanese sources, the South Korean prime minister hopes to strengthen secondary alliances with countries like Japan, as a backstop in case American support declines in the future.

Japan recognized the Communist government in South Vietnam Wednesday.

WASHINGTON POST 9 May 1975 Pg. 21

Laos Sends Team To Enforce Truce

VIENTIANE — A government peace-making team set out yesterday from here to try to halt the advance of pro-Communist Pathet Lao forces in Laos.

The team reflected the makeup of the Laotian coalition government in which Pathet Lao members sit left-Vientiane to try to stop alongside right-wingers. t the advance of Pathet Lao forces, which has brought them to within 60 miles of the capital.

An official announcement in Vientiane said the team also wanted to make sure government forces made no effort to move against the Pathet Lao.

Military sources said four battalions of Pathet Lao soldiers, supported by tanks and artillery, were facing three Vientiane battalions in the area of Vang Vieng, 90 miles north of Vientiane.

The two opposing sides in the coalition government signed an agreement Wednesday to stop the clashes between the Vientiane and Pathet Lao forces that have disrupted the cease-fire there since mid-April, government sources said.

The peace call was endorsed by the leading Pathet Lao minister in the Laotian coalition, Foreign Minister Phoumi Vonvvi, prime minister.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK TIMES 9 May 1975 Pg. 1

HOUSE PANEL CUTS AID FOR REFUGEES TO $405-MILLION

By DAVID BINDER
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 8 — A House Appropriations subcommittee today cut President Ford's request for $507-million for Indochina refugees to $405-million and said that the relief program should be funded with this sum for the next 14 months.

The Administration's request was based on cost estimates for transport and resettlement of 150,000 Vietnamese and Cambodian refugees over the next 28 months.

L. Dean Brown, director of the Interagency Task Force on Refugees, said of the figure reached by the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Foreign Operations:

"I am delighted, because it is a solid endorsement of the President's request. We will work with this, and if it doesn't work, we will come back for more."

How Fund Was Cut

Mr. Brown said that Representative Otto E. Passman, Democrat of Louisiana, who is chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, had made clear in a hearing that the subcommittee was working on the assumption that there would be 115,000 Indochina refugees in need of aid—not 150,000.

The subcommittee slashed the Administration's request to $405-million in these categories.

¶$155-million for daily maintenance of refugees at $15 per person, down from $185-million.

¶$65-million for airlifting refugees out of Indochina to the continental United States, down from $99-million.

¶$70-million for resettlement efforts through voluntary agencies, down from $78-million.

¶$100-million for subsequent welfare and medical costs, including education and vocational training, down from $125-million.

¶$15-million for movement of 20,000 refugees to other countries, down from $20-million.

Testimony Is Recalled

In testimony before the subcommittee, Mr. Brown stated that 113,340 Vietnamese and Cambodians were "in the American pipeline," and that there were 35,000 to 37,000 additional Indochinese who might eventually qualify as refugees.

This, and the determination that as many as 20,000 of the Vietnamese and Cambodians under American care already had sponsors in this country, prompted the subcommittee to make the cuts, pending later disclosure of a larger refugee total.

Mr. Passman called for speedy action on a recommended appropriation after hearing from Mr. Brown that the Administration had already spent $89-million on evacuation and care of refugees from Indochina and had only $11-million left from assistance funds.

The available funds would run out "in the next few days," Mr. Brown testified. They had been borrowed from an Indochina reconstruction fund set up under the Foreign Assistance Act and suspended after Saigon and Phnom Penh fell to Communist forces last month.

In San Francisco, meanwhile, the Immigration Service announced that it would reinvestigate many of the Vietnamese children who had been brought to this country for adoption to determine whether any were not orphans and therefore not eligible for adoption.

Both the House and the Senate appeared to be responding as best they could to President Ford's repeated appeals over the last week for "urgent action" to provide adequate funds for the refugees.

The Senate is expected to vote next week on an authorization, although it may not meet the Administration's request for $507-million.

Last night, the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration marked up a bill authorizing "such sums as may be needed" for refugee aid. This enabled the legislation to go before the full Judiciary Committee this evening.

While the mood in both legislative bodies appeared to favor passage of a sizable authorization for refugee assistance, three was still some opposition in the House and Senate.

Asserting that he had discovered he could "feed myself on $1 a day," Representative Clarence D. Long, Democrat of Maryland, told Mr. Brown that he thought the feeding cost of $3.40 for each Vietnamese refugee projected by the Administration was "way out of line."

"I just think your whole program is full of water," he said and declined to vote with the majority on the $405-million authorization in the Appropriations subcommittee.

In the Senate, James Abourezk, Democrat of South Dakota, introduced a bill that would authorize only $127-million in refugee aid.

In an accompanying speech, he accused the Administration of providing "inadequate and sketchy reports to the Congress" on the entire Indochina situation and suggested that it was trying to aid "thousands of trained political assassins."

But the majority sentiment of the Senate favoring refugee aid was demonstrated a little later in a vote on a resolution by Alan Cranston of California and James B. Allen of Alabama, both Democrats.

The resolution, stating that "the Senate warmly welcomes the latest exiles to our shores," passed 91 to 1—the lone dissenter being William L. Scott, Republican of Virginia.

The Administration is still hoping that other countries will help the United States to resettle Indochina refugees, Mr. Brown testified.

He said that Canada had offered to take 3,000 refugees, and that Australia's Prime Minister Gough Whitlam had told President Ford that he would admit 1,500. Gabon, Ivory Coast and Morocco have also offered to take several hundred Vietnamese each.

BALTIMORE SUN 9 May 1975 Pg. 22C

Will the Navy end Academy band?

By J. S. BAINBRIDGE, JR.
Annapolis Bureau of The Sun

Annapolis—The Naval Academy Band, the oldest continuing musical organization in the Navy, may be eliminated in a military budget-cutting move.

Concern from Annapolis area constituents about the band's future "beats the refugees" as an issue locally, according to a spokesman for Representative Marjorie S. Holt (R.,4th).

Mrs. Holt said yesterday her office had received hundreds of phone calls and letters. She said she contacted the Chief of Naval Operations to express how much a part of "the Annapolis tradition" the band is.

For two years the Navy has been considereing whether to phase out the band or merge it with the Navy band in Washington.

"We're just sitting tight, awaiting the decision," said Lt. Joseph Phillips, the band's leader. "It's rough on the morale," he added. "The guys don't know whether they're stopping or going."

Capt. F. Brayton Harris, the assistant chief of information for the Navy's office of information, said that the examination of the band's future is "part of a general review of the overall Navy music program."

"We don't anticipate any hard decision on this for some time," Captain Harris added.

The band was formed in 1852 and plays for formal ceremonies at the academy such as the spring and fall parades and June Week. Concerts also are given about four nights a month, with six special ones in the summer. All Naval Academy Band performances are open to the public without charge.

"Anchors Aweigh," the Navy's official song, was written by an academy band leader, Charles A. Zimmerman, shortly after the turn of the century, according to Lieutenant Phillips.

Originally it was intended as the march for one academy graduating class, an annual Zimmerman composing tradition, but it "just caught on," Lieutenant Phillips said. This weekend the band will be in the Preakness Parade and later this month it will record a two-record bicentennial album with the Naval Academy Glee Club.

According to Lieutenant Phillips, many of the band members, all professional Navy musicians, have retired since the controversy over the band's continuance arose. Eighty-eight members a few years ago, the band now has been reduced to below 70 in an economy move.

Mrs. Holt expressed doubt yesterday that a merger of the academy band would effect any real economy.

NEW YORK TIMES
9 May 1975 Pg. 14

Thailand and North Korea Establish Diplomatic Ties

BANGKOK, Thailand, May 8 (Renters)—Thailand and North Korea established diplomatic relations today and said they would exchange ambassadors as soon as possible.

The agreement was signed at the Thai Foreign Ministry by Cha Byong Ok of the North Korean Foreign Ministry, and Vikrom Ninanad, his Thai counterpart.

Thailand has told South Korea that their diplomatic links would not be affected by the agreement with Pyongyang.

The North Korean said his country was considering relations with the Philippines and Singapore.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II -- Main Edition -- 9 May 1975

EDITORIALS

NEW YORK TIMES - 9 MAY 1975

Defense Defended

A nervous world, watching Washington for indications of the role the United States will play abroad in the wake of the Indochina defeat, is beginning to get some reassurance that this country's posture will not be one of renunciation of world responsibilities.

A number of key Congressional liberals and moderates, who fought the Ford Administration on the Indochina issue, have now decided to back away from their earlier intention of challenging the Administration anew through attempts to make major cuts in defense spending and overseas forces. Also rejected were other measures that might lead nations abroad to believe that the United States was bent on isolationism or on endangering the East-West military balance. Such reassurance is much needed.

"The Vietnam situation does paint a different picture for us," Senator Mondale acknowledges. "It's very important not to signal the Russians and others that we're giving up. The Congress decided against the war in Vietnam. We did not vote to become an isolationist country."

Senate Majority Leader Mansfield reportedly is unlikely to offer his amendment, as almost annually since 1966, to withdraw the bulk of American forces in Europe. Two other leading sponsors of more limited troop withdrawal proposals, Senator Nunn of Georgia and House Democratic Leader O'Neill, are shelving their measures. Two liberal Democrats, Representatives Aspin and Symington, have obtained 51 co-sponsors for a resolution reaffirming American treaty commitments abroad.

Similarly, the Brookings Institution, which has made annual studies of the defense budget showing how spending could be reduced as much as $12 billion, has outlined only a maximum of $1.9 billion in cuts in this year's Administration proposals.

* * *

None of this means that the Administration's request for $104.7 billion in obliggational authority, with $94 billion to be spent in the 1976 fiscal year, is sacrosanct. On the contrary, Congress would serve the interests of mankind as a whole, as well as the United States, by disapproving a half-dozen proposals to improve the accuracy of American long-range nuclear missiles, turning them into potential "first-strike" weapons. It would be self-defeating for the United States to move unilaterally in this direction as long as a chance still remains in the SALT talks to head off a Soviet first-strike capability against American land-based missiles.

The B-1 bomber, the Trident nuclear missile submarine, the AWACS airborne radar warning system and other questionable projects require further study rather than accelerated development programs. Billions of dollars are wasted annually by Congressional insistence on useless bases at home and National Guard units rather than ready reserves. The House Armed Services Committee, politically motivated, has again voted over $100 million for Texas-built A-7D attack planes which the Pentagon has not requested.

A normal or, preferably, a better-than-normal Congressional review of the Administration's defense requests is much in order. What must be avoided at this sensitive time is the kind of large-scale reduction that would be seen abroad as a policy change.

1-E

CHICAGO TRIBUNE - 5 MAY 1975 (9)

New Mediterranean role

The United States might have to revise the role it has played in the Mediterranean as its allies in the region opt for independent action and as Soviet intentions become less menacing under the influence of detente.

The latest indication of that change came last week with the U.S. agreement to reduce its military presence in Greece, giving up 6th Fleet home-porting facilities and closing an air base near Athens. Both Turkey and Portugal, the other two allies who traditionally have provided basic support for U.S. strategy in that part of the world, have given ample warning they will reconsider their U.S. ties.

The traditional U.S. aim in the Mediterranean has been to guard the so-called "soft underbelly of Europe" against Soviet incursions and to keep an eye on the turbulent Middle East where Israel is dependent heavily on U.S. military aid. But the Soviet Union, despite the increase of its naval units in the Mediterranean, has not shown hostile intentions where southern Europe is concerned and is moving to better relations with both Greece and Turkey.

As for the Israeli lifeline, it has been apparent for some time that it has to be shifted to a route other than that passing through NATO bases, perhaps to the Pacific and Indian oceans.

There is no question but that the United States has to maintain a strong presence in the Mediterranean, both as a deterrent and to preserve flexibility in foreign policy. But the tone of U.S. relations with the countries of the region ought to be revised.

Greece and Turkey, formerly considered clients of Washington, are demanding treatment as equals. The Arab countries for years virtually ignored, have asserted their influence through their oil power.

These are important developments in a vital part of the world for U.S. planners to ponder as they mull over America's changing global role.

NEW YORK TIMES - 9 MAY 1975

The O.A.S. Assembly

It is a sad commentary on the current standing of the Organization of American States that despite all that is going on in the hemisphere, it will probably take up no more important business at the annual General Assembly, which opened in Washington yesterday, than the routine election of a Secretary-General to succeed Ecuador's distinguished Galo Plaza Lasso. There are plenty of urgent problems affecting the American states—and progress may be made on some of them in informal consultations during the two-week Assembly—but the O.A.S. itself will be only incidentally involved.

It is now regarded as unlikely that this Assembly will take any decisive action to lift the sanctions invoked against Cuba by the O.A.S. eleven years ago, though these are no longer effective and a majority of member governments favors repeal. Instead, the Assembly is likely to set up an Organ of Consultation that may eventually recommend a change in O.A.S. regulations to require only a majority vote in such circumstances.

With Secretary of State Kissinger absent and the U.S. abstaining, a special meeting of O.A.S. foreign ministers in Ecuador last November fell two votes short of the required two-thirds' majority for ending the Cuban boycott. The embittered sponsors of repeal are reluctant to put the matter to another test until the rules are changed. Meanwhile, nine O.A.S. members have breached the sanctions to establish relations with Cuba.

CONTINUED NEXT PAGE

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II -- Main Edition -- 9 May 1975
AIR FORCE MAGAZINE - MAY 1975 (9)

Vietnam—Some Policy Implications

By John L. Frisbee
EXECUTIVE EDITOR, AIR FORCE MAGAZINE

Washington, D. C., April 11

IT IS both sad and frustrating to see an ally, for whom and alongside whom we have fought, disintegrate.

Last night (April 10), in his address to Congress, President Ford asked for an additional $722 million in military assistance for South Vietnam. Early indications are that it will not be approved, even in part.

The proximate cause of South Vietnam's collapse was President Thieu's strategic but almost totally unplanned withdrawal from the Central Highlands. The concept may have been sound, influenced by his belief that US military assistance was in permanent decline, and perhaps in hope that the prospect of impending disaster might help reverse that decline. In any event, the withdrawal was woefully inept.

But the underlying causes go back much further. Over the years, we have commented on the folly of some US policy decisions that prolonged the war and put South Vietnam's survival in question: failure to use airpower properly until the weeks immediately preceding the cease-fire; tardiness in beginning a serious Vietnamization program; acceptance of a cease-fire agreement that left 130,000 North Vietnamese troops in the South; refusal to give the South offensive weapons that would have forced Hanoi to keep most of its troops in defensive positions north of the DMZ; congressional reductions, over the past three years, of $1.3 billion in Administration requests for military assistance to the South; dedication to the futile hope that the USSR would cooperate in enforcing the cease-fire.

From the bitter experience of more than ten years' involvement in Southeast Asia, we should have learned some painful lessons about how, where, and whether to commit ourselves to wars of limited objectives.

We ought to take an even more fundamental lesson from the experience of the past twelve months, when North Vietnam illegally expanded its largely Soviet-equipped forces in the South to an estimated 350,000. While détente may—at least temporarily—reduce the chance of direct clashes between the US and the USSR, it in no way affects the long-term objectives of the Communist movement. That movement is like an amoeba: flexible, formless, persistent, infinitely patient. It will flow outward until it meets opposition, stop if the opposition is balanced, retreat if the balance is against it, and flow onward again when circumstances permit.

Our contest with this amoeba-like force is open-ended. There can be no effective opposition to it without US participation or support. And since the US has neither the means nor the will (nor now, perhaps, even the credibility) to counter aggression everywhere, our truly vital national interests must be redefined. External commitments have to be reduced to a point where US military forces—the smallest since 1953—can support them, or our military posture must be brought into line with commitments that now are too large in their potential demands.

Another lesson that may not be clear quite yet concerns the domino analogy, unfortunately labeled a theory, and thus made endlessly debatable. The domino analogy is a fact of life, not a theory, in a power-dominated world. In its simplest form, an aggressive power that wants to get from square "A" to square "C" must pass through square "B." But the analogy is more complex than that.

Assume, as now seems inevitable, that South Vietnam falls. What will be the effects on events in the Middle East of US failure to adequately support Saigon? On North Korea's long-thwarted plans to invade South Korea? Would Communist control of Southeast Asia—a third of Japan's export market—threaten our major Pacific ally economically and politically? These complex linkages are part of the array of dominoes that have been kept standing by faith in the physical and moral strength of the United States.

The fall of South Vietnam, if it happens, may mark a turning point in twentieth century history. That could hardly have been so if the US had not laid its prestige on the line in Southeast Asia. Vietnam itself was not a vital US interest. Significant, yes, but not vital. Persistence in carrying out the US commitment to that country was a vital interest. The ultimate cost of our failure to persist is yet to be determined.

Make no mistake about it. US influence on world affairs is still very great. The worst thing that could befall this country—and the trend in this direction is gaining momentum—would be a retreat to isolationism. We must stay the course, and it must be carefully plotted.

Our sympathy for the tortured people of South Vietnam and Cambodia is undiminished, but we can now do only what the law allows and what the will of Congress and the people make possible. The limits of the possible—of what we can and should do to support South Vietnam—grow ever narrower.

The people of Southeast Asia may perhaps be forgiven if they feel they have paid too large a share of our tuition for a seminar in the exercise of power. History will not forgive us if we fail to heed its lessons. ■

O.A.S. ASSEMBLY CONTINUED

Latin governments will voice again in the Assembly their outrage that the United States trade act bars tariff preferences for Ecuador and Venezuela, as members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries; but all Mr. Kissinger can do is renew his assurances that the Administration is doing its utmost to get the offending provision modified. The Latins may also express again their solidarity with Panama for the negotiations with the United States on a new canal treaty; but the Assembly as such can play no direct role on the issue.

The fact is that the Latin-Americans in recent years have striven increasingly to set up new regional machinery and organizations outside the O.A.S.—sometimes in order to include Cuba or to exclude the United States. Another factor in the decline of the O.A.S. has been the tendency of United States Secretaries of State to interest themselves in inter-American affairs only episodically. Mr. Kissinger's four postponements of a scheduled visit to Latin America—however pressing the reasons—is the latest case in point.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

THE RETIRED OFFICER - MAY 1975 (9)

A Strong National Defense

By Col Minter L. Wilson, Jr., USA-Ret., Editor

U.S. military and foreign policy in Southeast Asia lies in tatters. And it's badly frayed elsewhere. Our ability to reason sensibly about foreign policy and defense suffers. This is a sorry dilemma for a great nation that has temporarily lost its equilibrium.

Vigor and decisiveness in the face of adversity must replace what someone has diagnosed as a "fervent wish to return to the womb." Above all we must stop dealing from emotion and hearsay and start dealing with facts. Our national defense is at stake.

We Are Not a Poor Country

We are not a poor country. With national will, we have the resources to defend ourselves and our vital interests. Substantial as the cost of freedom may be, it is not too great for us to shoulder.

In this season when we establish national priorities through our budget, we cannot fail to recognize the dynamic relationship between our military strength and the pursuit of peace.

The FY 1976 Defense budget at $92.8 billion is the largest in history. But keep in mind why.

The world in which we must conduct our affairs continues in a most volatile state. Even so, since 1968 we have reduced our defense budget by 42 per cent in real terms. During the same period the Soviets have been adding to their defense forces at the rate of 3 to 5 per cent per year. We are on the threshold of inferiority to the U.S.S.R. if, indeed, we have not already crossed it.

The results of our defense cutbacks are visible around the world. Consider the disaster in Southeast Asia, our failure to achieve a Middle-East peace and the disarray in the southern flank of NATO.

Portugal is tilted way leftward: Italy, with one of the largest Communist parties in the western world, continues to totter along unable to govern effectively; Greece is uncertain in her commitment to NATO and Turkey is reassessing its stand. We have lost our bases for emergencies short of all-out war thus effectively curtailing our ability to influence political action in the Mediterranean.

We are not the world's policeman. But we have legitimate interests and responsibilities in this interdependent world. We neglect them at our peril.

If this is the direction our people want, the decision should be openly arrived at and the possible consequences clearly understood. We should not be saddled with a second rate defense through constant erosion.

The Budget Dollar

In the last 10 years, outlays for national defense have shrunk from more than 40 per cent to about 25.8 per cent of the total federal budget. That is the lowest since 1940. Contrast that to human resource expenditures which have increased in the same 10-year period to more than 70 per cent of the total budget.

Outlays for education, manpower, medicare, income security and other individual benefits from government are necessary expenses. But we must not forget two things: First, social welfare programs now take twice the money spent on defense; and, second, defense spending as a percentage of Gross National Product continues near its lowest point since the end of World War II.

Views of Joint Chiefs

Gen George Brown, JCS Chairman, is frankly worried about the picture he sees. He has publicly stated that "we no longer possess that predominance of strategic power which, for over a quarter of a century has protected the peace of the free world and the security of the United States." Gen Brown is committed to keeping the overall U.S. capability second to none. Now he is fighting a crucial battle—the battle of the budget—and he may be losing.

Gen Weyand, our Army chief, struggles to achieve a stable force of 785,000 men and women in 16 combat divisions and supporting forces.

Since 1968 we have cut our Army in half while the Soviets have added 20 combat divisions. Our Army strength now is almost 200,000 men below pre-Vietnam War figures. Yet Gen Weyand is determined to have a 16-division force—just as pre-Vietnam—through a judicious cut of support forces.

Adm Holloway finds himself with the lowest number of ships since 1939—two years before Pearl Harbor. In the forthcoming fiscal year the Navy will dip below 500 ships. Thirty-year-old WW II ships are being phased out and new modern ships built. That costs money but our survival depends upon it.

Gen Jones, Air Force Chief of Staff, has some of the finest people and equipment in the world. But he has less of those commodities than at any time since WW II, and the Congress threatens to eliminate B-1 bombers and other modern aircraft needed to update our Air Force.

Gen Cushman's marines hold steady at three active combat divisions.

In addressing the needs of our forces, we must not overlook the vital ingredient of skilled, dedicated and motivated manpower. That, too, carries a price tag, as President Carpenter pointed out in his March 27 "Open Letter to Defense Secretary Schlesinger." It is a cost that must be met, for without that element, the finest hardware in the world will not achieve the peace we so desperately seek.

The Congress and Defense

All the arguments for a strong national defense—essential to our nation—will be focused on the new Congress. Many of the new members of that body campaigned on platforms calling for defense cuts. We can only hope that, having now gained better insight into our national needs, they will act with a greater sense of responsibility. They must clearly understand that history will record their part during this difficult time.

The military balance between the free world and our potential adversaries is very delicately poised. Our stake in maintaining that balance is great. Only from a position of strength is that possible.

Our Congress must know that if the proponents of a strong military structure have erred in placing too much of the nation's resources in its armed forces, all we have lost is a relatively minor portion of our total financial resources. But if those who would trim the defense budget to an unrealistic point prevail and they are wrong, we could well lose the entire country.

SYRACUSE HERALD-JOURNAL - 1 MAY 1975 (9)

Realistic reading

At a community seminar on defense fathered by the American Defense Preparedness Association, Lt. Gen. Daniel G. Graham, director, Defense Intelligence Agency, said:

The U.S. "still has obligations to its allies in Asia, and we must make sure those allies realize we are going to meet those obligations."

Vice Adm. John G. Finneran, assistant deputy secretary of defense for manpower, agreed, saying:

"We cannot abandon Southeast Asia any more than we can any other part of the world."

And William Levitt, director for production and research, who recalled working 80 hours a week for nearly a year to equip the forces of South Vietnam during the U.S. pullout, said:

"We're still involved with friendly nations" in Asia.

Basically, the three have presented a premise.

... they believe the 94th Congress ... underwrite that premise? Even to the limited involvement outlined in the Nixon doctrine; namely, supplying material but not men?

All in the absence of strong leadership from the White House?

We believe not unless the objectives are within easy reach.

To go beyond that, if we read the mood of the 94th Congress correctly will require another Pearl Harbor.

Whatever the prospect, we will learn soon enough.

We'll be put to another test.

North Vietnam, Communist China, the Soviet Union, perhaps North Korea will see to that.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER - 9 MAY 1975

Cuba trade ban hurts the U.S.

Sen. Harry F. Byrd is surely aware that Fidel Castro would never consent to the pre-conditions the Virginia independent has laid down for repeal of the 13-year-old American trade embargo against Cuba.

That, we assume, is why he has laid them down, in a series of amendments to legislation proposed by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy.

One of his amendments would require that the embargo be kept in force until President Ford certifies to Congress that the Cuban government has agreed to settle all claims for U. S. property confiscated by the Castro regime. Those claims go way back, but if negotiations on such a complex subject are ever to go forward, an atmosphere of detente is itself a precondition.

Another amendment would require Cuba to renounce its alliance with the Soviet Union, close its ports to Soviet vessels and kick out all Soviet military and intelligence agents. One can hardly disagree with the ultimate aim, but here again a cooling-off of Havana's relations with Moscow depends in the long run on a warming-up of its relations with Washington.

We are especially intrigued by one of the senator's amendments. This would require the Cuban government to agree not to intervene in the domestic affairs of any other Western Hemisphere nation.

In view of the rather tarnished record of the U. S. Government on that score — intervention in Cuba itself, in Chile and elsewhere — one wonders whether Sen. Byrd might accept an amendment to his amendment, requiring the U. S. Government also to proclaim nonintervention in other countries' affairs and to bring home its farflung agents.

The U. S. embargo serves no purpose except to deprive American business, in these days of recession, of opportunities for trade with Cuba. Most members of the Organization of American States want to end OAS sanctions, as they have made clear again during their current meeting in Washington. Maintaining tensions with Cuba adds to tensions with our Latin American friends. Neither is in the U. S. interest.

KANSAS CITY STAR - 1 MAY 1975 (9)

After Vietnam, Rest of the World Can Stand Some Attention

Beyond Vietnam there is a big and rapidly changing world for the United States to consider and deal with. Vietnam itself has so absorbed the passions and energies of the American people and their leaders that there has been a conscious deferral of attention to other international concerns. Thus it was that President Ford's recent state-of-the-world address offered specific proposals only on a South Vietnam whose pulse was barely fluttering. Otherwise his foreign policy review was largely a backward look at positions this country finds itself locked into.

Such time-marking is no longer good enough, now that the Vietnam War is or ought to be a closed chapter in American history. Mr. Ford himself has said what he should say in calling on Americans to close ranks, avoid recrimination about the past, and look ahead to goals that are shared and tasks which remain to be accomplished. His appeal had the note of a platitude but it made sense just the same.

We do not suppose that all Americans or indeed everyone in national government or politics will go along with the President's advice. Mr. Ford himself has blasted away at Congress for first slashing military aid to Saigon and then withholding it entirely. In line with his latest entreaty, we would expect him to have nothing more to say on the subject. Yet there may be a temptation for some Republican campaigners in 1976 to revive the charge of bad faith to an ally fighting with its back against the wall. Our guess is that the public would be bored with any such campaign tactics. But then Democratic candidates are still running against Herbert Hoover and the Depression.

So any future that Vietnam, its sorrows and its mistaken judgments may have as a public issue remains to be seen. Just now most people would rather leave it for the historians to chew on for many years, as they no doubt will.

The grim disposition of the Vietnam issue for this country will permit greater concentration on a whole range of important foreign policy considerations. These include the Mideast, which has not been ignored by Secretary Kissinger, but whose demands for attention remain urgent. Then there are the more or less pigeonholed matters of working to improve ties with Canada and Latin America, particularly in the light of our own energy and oil problems and a general impression that the U. S. needs to focus more on its own hemisphere. There is also the lack of a constructive approach toward the neglected states of Africa. And a great deal of patching up and rethinking needs to be done with the Atlantic alliance and its military arm, NATO.

Thus the President, Dr. Kissinger and various committees of Congress have an armful to take up in the wake of Vietnam's climax. There is also the large question of a postwar policy for Southeast Asia, but that will take time and there is no reason now for fast decisions. The triumph and expansion of Hanoi's communism have changed the power balance in that corner of the earth and will set up new situations to be watched and analyzed as they unfold.

The more immediate need is for the United States to start concerning itself elsewhere in the world.

LOS ANGELES TIMES
4 MAY 1975 (9)

A New U.S. Policy

It's too soon to do much about a new American policy toward Indochina, but it's not too soon to start thinking seriously about one.

Under the peace agreements of 1973, the road was left open for both the reunification of Vietnam and the reconciliation of Washington and Hanoi. The question of reunification is now out of American hands, but reconciliation is not.

In the period since World War II, once Soviet hegemony over Eastern Europe was accepted, the United States has tended to react to new Communist conquests by always trying to isolate—and once, in Cuba, to destroy—the new Marxist regimes. This has produced a record of failure, almost without exception, from Peking right around the world to Havana and Santiago.

There is still a tendency to respond too simplistically whenever the Communists seem to be getting ahead; that seems to be the best explanation, anyway, for the clumsy responses of Secretary of State Kissinger to the events of the last 12 months in Portugal.

It would be most regrettable if old prejudices and disappointments were to dictate the American response to the new Communist regimes of Indochina; we don't think they will. Richard Nixon's new approaches to the Soviet Union, and especially to China, pointed the way for a more subtle, and more mature, understanding of the realities of foreign policy.

The new American policy toward the Indochinese should do what can be done to help them, especially the Vietnamese, assert their ancient sense of national independence, as against China, and as against their new ally, the Soviet Union.

The first step in trying to encourage independence and nonalignment for Vietnam and Cambodia is to make clear to their leaders that the United States remains committed to the welfare of the people, and will prove that commitment with food and medicine.

The second step is more difficult and may not come soon, for bitterness and suspicion are hard to overcome. In fact, it may not be possible to normalize relations at all in the foreseeable future. Much will depend on the policies adopted in Hanoi, Saigon and Phnom Penh. But should they turn away from preaching regional revolution to practicing internal development, the United States could then begin to respond. One way would be to resume contributions to the Mekong River project, and to contribute assistance through other multilateral organizations to speed reconstruction and accelerate development.

There will no doubt be obstacles to a normalization of relations between the United States and Indochina, but they need not, and should not, be erected by the United States.

It is through a program of humanitarian assistance and, ultimately, economic assistance that the United States can help restore stability to Southeast Asia. That stability, built on a foundation of a viable economic base to assure each nation's independence, would benefit all of Asia.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II--Main Edition--9 May 1975

FEATURES COLUMNISTS

NEW YORK TIMES 9 MAY 1975

The 'Vietnam Disaster' and U.S. Security

By Maxwell D. Taylor

WASHINGTON—In our attempts to appraise the significance of the Vietnam disaster, we must reflect on its bearing on our national security. If we mean the protection of our most important national valuables wherever found against dangers from whatever sources, it is obvious that in the collapse of our Vietnam policy we have suffered loss of protective power in many forms.

As the world watched on television screens the masses of South Vietnamese fleeing before the victorious Communist forces, the message conveyed was a simple one: "See what is happening to the South Vietnamese abandoned by their American friends." No elaborate explanations of past American sacrifices or of South Vietnamese shortcomings can change that visual impression; it is now a part of history. It will remain vivid until replaced in time by a new concept of American character based upon more-recent conduct.

One is obliged to assume that an immediate consequence of this tragedy will be widespread loss of confidence in our reliability, particularly among allies nearest the scene.

Already Thailand and the Philippines are displaying intentions of disengaging from American ties. The attitude of Japan will be far more important. There the Government may decide to assume full responsibility for national defense, to the exclusion of an American role, even to the point of seeking its own nuclear weapons. It might also perceive profit in developing its own détente with the Soviet Union, which has raw materials to offer Japanese industry and, as further bait, the former Japanese-owned Kurile Islands taken at the end of World War II.

The internal weaknesses revealed in our behavior toward Vietnam particularly since the 1973 cease-fire will have an even broader impact on our standing in the international community.

A conspicuous development of the period has been the continuing conflict between the President and Congress over the control of foreign policy and the conduct of military operations. One outcome has been the war powers resolution of 1973, which though ambiguous in some respects is sufficiently clear to eliminate much possibility of a quick Presidential response to a violation of existing treaties such as that with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or to a violent Treaty of the peace such as the invasion of South Korea in 1950. For the moment at least, crisis management seems to have passed to the leaderless, unpredictable Congress that has played such a dominant part in the last days of American policy in South Vietnam. In its defense, however, Congressmen may have represented fairly accurately the mood of a large segment of their constituents.

It seems likely that the evidence of shackled leadership and impaired national will perceived abroad may invite probes of American strength in places as widely separated as Korea and the Middle East.

Troublemakers, particularly practiced Muscovite fishermen at home in troubled waters, may be expected to sound the depths of American debility while anxious friends and allies, Israel in particular, await the outcome. With the decline in American prestige, our diplomats will work at a disadvantage attempting to improve matters, and the big stick represented by the armed forces under present circumstances can hardly add credible authority to their voice. A perceptible national will to use military power when necessary is an indispensable element of its deterrent effectiveness.

For the foregoing reasons, I am obliged to conclude that the Vietnam finale, by impairing our reputation for reliability, weakening our alliances, and exposing our internal weaknesses to friend and foe has been highly detrimental to the many forms of national power that contribute to our national security—power derived from unity, self-confidence, allies, reputation, and military strength.

Fortunately, many of the basic causes of our predicament are within ourselves and hence subject to self-correction. We can diminish factional strife by uniting in a common effort to resolve problems of general concern such as inflation, recession, unemployment and inadequate government. We can renounce the national pastime of hounding scapegoats of whom the current favorites include President Ford, Secretary of State Kissinger, Congress, the news media and the unfortunate people of South Vietnam.

It would also help to restore respectability to a few old-time virtues like a sense of duty, tolerance for differing point of view, gratitude for American citizenship, and willingness to perform public service. In such an atmosphere, the Presidency and Congress might return to a collaboration of effort without which our vaunted system of checks and balances becomes one of governmental futility and eventual stalemate.

Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor (Ret.) served as Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and Ambassador to South Vietnam.

ORBIS WINTER 1975 (9 MAY)

THE EXPOSED FLANK OF NATIONAL SECURITY

by Maxwell D. Taylor

ALTHOUGH most of us are inclined by habit to view national security primarily as the protection of national valuables from military threats by military means, we have ample evidence nowadays of the inadequacy of such a concept. There are too many civil threats on our list of current concerns to permit so narrow a view — matters such as population growth, inflation, recession, resource scarcities, and loss of confidence in government. Not only are the causes and effects of such threats generally nonmilitary but the means for coping with them derive little directly from the military power found in the armed forces.

These considerations impose a closer examination of the civil sector of our national defenses than has been normal in past times of peace. During the Cold War we were made aware of the potential for damage of nonmilitary weapons in unfriendly hands — defamatory propaganda, intimidation of allies, acts of mini-aggression against our ships and aircraft, the expropriation of American property in foreign countries, and the subversion and sabotage of friendly governments in the course of "wars of national liberation." During the Vietnam war and its aftermath we have seen how a decline in national unity, morale, and respect for leadership can diminish the effectiveness of our government in domestic and foreign matters and muffle its authority in international debate. In addition, we now have a whole set of environmental problems, global in scope and chargeable to no human troublemaker, many of which are direct or indirect consequences of population growth.

To one professionally involved throughout his adult life with military security, this proliferation of nonmilitary threats raises acute concern, chiefly because of the obvious lack of governmental preparedness to deal with them. Inevitably I reflect on the contrast between our elaborate military preparations to deter or defeat military aggression and the absence in the civil sector of means to forestall dangers of equal gravity. The problem is, to an important degree, organizational. Whereas our military resources are concentrated in the Department of Defense and immediately responsive to the President, comparable civil resources are widely scattered in many departments and agencies -- State, AID, Treasury, Commerce, Interior, Agriculture, Labor, HEW, to mention a few. Not only are the Executive resources scattered, but no one is in complete charge of them all; even the President lacks full authority to call upon them in an emergency.

(See EXPOSED FLANK OF NATIONAL SECURITY, Pg. 2-F)

DECLASSIFIED

An organizational asset of policymakers in the foreign/military field is the National Security Council, established in 1947 to provide a forum advisory to the President and serve as a focal point for the integration of foreign, military and domestic policies related to national security. In practice the Council has limited its activities almost entirely to foreign and military matters, fields in which it has been most valuable in introducing order and method into the planning and programming. Needless to say, there is no counterpart to the NSC to reinforce the civil sector.

Another advantage associated with the NSC is the worldwide intelligence organization monitoring potential problem areas and danger points abroad. Since its principal targets are political and military, it pays relatively little attention to economic matters for which responsibility is divided within the government. But whatever the shortcomings of the intelligence system, its product has usually provided timely warning of developing crises and a solid basis for planning in the foreign field.

The urgency of rehabilitating the civil sector is emphasized by the probable nature of the international environment in which our nation will pursue its goals during the next decade or so. This is likely to be a period in which the great power centers — the United States, the USSR, Western Europe, Japan and China — will focus attention on maintaining a favorable balance of power in their pentagonal relationship. A tendency for any two to make common cause will arouse alarm among the others — hence the constant nervousness in Moscow over our relations with Peking and the unhappiness in some European chancelleries over a Soviet-American détente.

The leaders of developed countries will have serious internal problems that will affect their behavior toward one another. All have the common problem of staying in power, and therefore the need to gain and retain popular support at home. Their peoples have a common interest in avoiding war and in raising or at least maintaining their standard of living. They also share a kindred impatience with any government that appears to neglect their interests or even to delay their fruition. This mutuality of purpose encourages a hope that responsible leaders will avoid military confrontations and concentrate on the economic and social welfare of their people.

In the case of the major industrial powers in the West, there are other reasons to believe that a deliberate resort to arms will not be likely. They are faced with shortages of raw materials, notably oil, which are essential for extended military operations. The exorbitant prices they must pay for oil alone will strain national budgets to the point where a deliberate choice of war is well-nigh inconceivable if only for fiscal reasons. Even if inclined to war, they would have to verify the willingness of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) to continue to supply them with oil for the duration of hostilities.

But if there is cause to rejoice at the reduced probability of major war, there is still no reason to anticipate unbroken tranquility in international relations. There will be multiform sources of friction among nations, great and small, in an increasingly crowded world confronting serious shortages in land, food, water and other resources. Industrial countries will be obliged to compete with one another for access to markets and resources; they will contest for advantage in exploring and exploiting the riches of the seabed. They cannot entirely escape involvement in the troubles of the turbulent Third World, for, even with help from more fortunate neighbors, indigent emerging countries appear doomed to suffer the consequences of excessive population growth, limited resources and inadequate government. The prospect in the worst cases is for famine, drought, floods, revolt, war and chaos.

Throughout this period, one may expect the USSR to continue to act as a compulsive fisher in troubled waters and to use its expanding nuclear armaments and growing navy to intimidate adversaries and extend Soviet influence. However, concern over the military situation along the Sino-Soviet frontier should tend to set limits to Soviet aggressiveness.

II

If this cursory estimate of the environment ahead is not too wide of the mark, it suggests certain priorities of concern for our national security in such a period. While the use of military force on a limited scale may develop from the frequent clashes of national interests, the main threats to our security, at least in their initial stages, will take nonmilitary forms — efforts to manipulate power relationships, rivalry with the Soviets for primacy in world leadership, the proliferation of nuclear weapons among nations seeking security or prestige, weakened allies in the new setting, and political and economic instability in many quarters. At home we may expect to confront continued factionalism developed along racial and economic lines, an inflated, torpid economy and a sagging standard of living, conditions leading to increasing discontent with our government and its leadership.

While it is difficult to predict specific contingencies that may arise under these conditions, two unrelated episodes in the recent past suggest forms which may repeat themselves. The first was the triangular conflict involving India, Pakistan, and what is now Bangladesh. When one seeks its causes, they prove to be multiple and difficult to arrange in order of importance. Among them was East Pakistan's chronic dissatisfaction with the central government in Islamabad, a discontent that peaked in the wake of the destructive floods in late 1970. During the following months, as millions of East Pakistanis fled into India to escape government troops, starvation, or both, the wave of refugees together with the secular animosity always existing between Hindu and Moslem provided a sufficient excuse for Indian military intervention resulting in war which, in the end, was a disaster for all parties.

Another episode that may foreshadow future events was the energy crisis arising in 1973 from the increase in oil prices by the OPEC cartel. In the United States the effect has been to add to inflation, retard economic growth, and foment grumbling over government ineptitude and Big Oil avarice. Our European and Japanese friends have been hurt far more seriously; it is still not clear how they will ever pay their oil bills and continue to have a sound currency and a viable economy. Nor can one predict the effect on the monetary system of the huge transfers of capital from the West to the oil producers.

In international relations OPEC's action served as an apple of discord tossed into the NATO alliance, causing an inglorious scramble of member nations for favored treatment by the oil producers. In exposing NATO's fragility under economic pressure, the crisis underscored the military weakness of an alliance which cannot be sure of its petroleum supplies. Throughout the episode the disarray in NATO must have presented a most enjoyable spectacle to the USSR — the undermining by proxy of the Western alliance, indeed of the entire capitalist system, by means of an unsolicited act of economic warfare.

A lesson for Americans to carry away from this experience is the unreadiness of our government to cope with an economic situation

See EXPOSED FLANK OF NATIONAL SECURITY, Pg. 3-F

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

of this sort. In effect, it was a kind of economic Pearl Harbor in which warnings bearing on its imminence were either ignored, misread, or filed without reaching the officials responsible for action. Even if the available information had reached the right authorities, it would not have been adequate to answer the many valid questions regarding the amount and location of oil reserves available to relieve the pinch.

Equally inadequate was the organizational structure of the executive branch, where a dozen or more officials were responsible for parts of the problem but no one, short of the President, for its entirety. So there was a scurry to round up a "czar" to assume the unassigned responsibility, followed by another to recruit a staff that would permit the czar to function. Whatever the subsequent criticisms of the performance of this improvised team, it was better than the country had a right to expect.

My theme is simply that we should recognize the existence of intolerable governmental inadequacy in an important field of national security while there is still time to do something about it. Recurrent cases are arising to confirm or reinforce the lesson of the oil crisis — new examples of our unpreparedness to anticipate economic, monetary and social problems and to forestall them by timely policies and programs. One recalls the delays in 1971 in setting up the agencies required to institute limited wage and price controls. More recently Congress, speaking through the General Accounting Office, has criticized the lack of fixed responsibility in the Executive for dealing with shortages in agricultural and industrial commodities. Senators studying the world food problem have reached similar conclusions regarding the failure to develop a coherent food policy and the lack of central coordination of research and programming in this vital field.

Nowhere is the headless character of the civil organization more apparent than in the area of economic policy, where over a score of federal agencies are involved in varying degrees. A recent article dealing with the Law of the Sea negotiations indicated that twenty-one federal agencies and forty congressional committees and subcommittees had some interest in the matters involved. The number is truly frightening, particularly in the absence of a central coordinating authority capable of expediting action among such widely scattered entities. While President Ford has recently conferred a certain primacy in the economic field on Treasury Secretary Simon, it remains to be seen how much real authority he will exercise over this vast, untended domain.

One gets the impression that Congress is likely to intervene soon if the Executive does not improve its performance in these areas of increasing sensitivity. In such a case, one of two things may take place. In an effort to placate criticism quickly, the bureaucratic reaction in the Executive may be to appoint an ad hoc committee to deal with the immediate problem attracting unfavorable attention. After the problem is allayed or public attention is diverted from it, the committee will dissolve and disappear without leaving a trace of the experience acquired to guide subsequent crisis managers in the same field.

Alternatively, an impatient Congress may pass a law creating a new independent agency like the recently established Federal Energy Administration to deal with the matter causing concern, and making the creation responsible directly to the President. Thus one more agency will be added to scores of others looking for guidance and direction to the most overburdened official in the world. As the result of such practices, the executive branch has come to resemble an overbuilt pipe organ to which new pipes have been added over the years but never a console adequate for their orchestration.

III

My main proposal for remedying these Executive deficiencies would be to expand the NSC into a National Policy Council (NPC) responsible for surveying the entire span of national security. It would be charged, as is the present NSC by the National Security Act of 1947, with "advising the President with respect to the integration of domestic, foreign, and military policies related to national security." However, national security in this context would have a wider meaning than military protection from military threats of foreign powers. It would include the protection of all national valuables of importance — assets, interests, sources of power — wherever found, from all serious threats, military and nonmilitary, foreign and domestic.

In expanding the role of the NSC, it would be necessary to increase the regular membership so as to give adequate representation to the nonmilitary sector of national security in this widened sense. This could be done by adding the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare (HEW), and a presidentially appointed representative of the economic sector (Ecrep). Thus, with the President, Vice President, and Secretaries of State and Defense, the NPC would consist of seven members, providing representation for the four principal sectors of national policy: foreign/military, economic, fiscal/monetary, and public welfare.

To support the NPC, I would foresee the need for four policy panels corresponding to these four sectors, chaired respectively by the Secretary of State, the Ecrep, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of HEW. Panel members would be drawn from the departments and agencies with major responsibilities in the panel's field. For example, the foreign/military policy panel, in addition to the Chairman, would include a senior representative of the Defense Department, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the Central Intelligence Agency, whereas the economic policy panel would draw its members from the eight or more departments and agencies involved in economic matters. The panels would have office space in the department of their chairman except for the economic policy panel which, I imagine, would establish itself in the Executive Office Building alongside the White House if space can be found for additional residents.

To discharge their responsibilities, the panels would communicate directly with all subdivisions of the Executive having resources relevant to their work and would keep informed of everything going on in government affecting their mission. However, they would not have authority to give operational instructions to these subdivisions, which, for operational purposes, would remain the responsibility of their statutory department chiefs. Their normal activities would be confined to recommendations to the President of policy, programs and departmental tasks; activities for integrating resources from several departments in approved programs; verification of progress made under these programs; and the anticipation and management of such crises as may arise.

There will always be a cluster of complex perennial problems requiring special treatment — at the moment, inflation, recession and energy are conspicuous examples. For such intractable issues as these, it will be necessary to establish at an echelon below the panels a number of permanent study centers to permit continuing study of such matters by the best talent available to the nation. For the purposes of this article, I shall assume the locus of such activities to be in a Center for Policy Research operated under the NPC and containing permanent study groups for specially assigned problems. Resident members would consist of the best specialists within government, reinforced as necessary by consultants brought in from private life. Funds should be available for contracting tasks to qualified extramural research organizations; indeed, it is possible that much of this work could be assigned to a not-for-profit "think tank" organized especially for this purpose.

Although the foregoing proposal is relatively simple and could be carried out with little or no new legislation, it would undoubtedly stir up sharp debate over its merits in many quarters. As a principal advantage, I would list the establishment of the NPC as a broadly based forum for the discussion of all major national policies, foreign and domestic, supported by an adequate staff with access to all relevant resources of the executive branch. It should facilitate the fixing of responsibility for major programs and bring order and method into interdepartmental planning and programming. By laying down procedures and clarifying relationships, it should assure the participation of the right people, particularly those with statutory responsibilities such as cabinet members, and thus allay suspicions of government by cabal or crony.

See EXPOSED FLANK OF NATIONAL SECURITY, Pg. 4-F

DECLASSIFIED

But there are also valid objections which are sure to be raised. One drawback may be the appearance and perhaps the fact of ponderosity in this expanded version of the old NSC, which itself was not svelte. Partisans of foreign and military programs may feel that their interests will be diluted in making common cause with domestic programs, whereas spokesmen for the latter may fear unsympathetic treatment in a forum until recently preoccupied with national security in its foreign and military aspects. It may be objected that until Congress takes parallel action and reforms its antiquated procedures, it will be useless to ask the Executive to change its ways. Finally, the whole proposal may be said to suggest undue faith in the intrinsic efficacy of organization to solve the problems of mankind while betraying a lack of concern for the quality of the people who will do the work.

As might be expected, I support the statement of advantages claimed and believe the objections, while sometimes serious, can be obviated if responsible leaders are alert to the dangers. Any bureaucratic creation such as the NPC can become ponderous if there is no one charged with pruning excrescences as they appear. But if the panels are kept out of operations, are prohibited from having big staffs, and are obliged to depend on the departments in which they reside for logistic and administrative support, there is a good chance of retarding if not arresting the working of Parkinson's Law.

As for Congress, inactivity on the Hill is no excuse to postpone renovations in the Executive. Indeed, the latter might provide incentive for Congress to act. Fears of unfairness by the NPC tribunal will disappear if it is seen in practice that all parties have an equal day in court. The charge of overreliance on organization to mend all things can be silenced if there is a concurrent effort to improve the quality of government personnel.

On this latter point, I readily concede that organizational improvement can only make it easier for good people to carry out difficult tasks — it cannot be a substitute for good people. I would insist, however, that their tasks will be so formidable in the coming decade that incumbents of key government positions, no matter how well qualified, will need all the assistance sound organization can give them. Concurrently, I would urge as an essential part of this proposal a comprehensive program to attract superior people to Washington positions and, in so doing, to try to remove some of the tarnish adhering to government service as a result of Watergate. I can think of at least two measures that would help.

The first would require all senior political appointees to the executive branch — that is, the top officials appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, along with their principal assistants — to agree to serve at least two years in the post to which assigned, if their chiefs so desired, and further agree to undergo a period of preliminary training, perhaps a month, before settling into a seat of authority. In this period, they would learn something about the workings of their own department and its relationship to the rest of the government. They could also make the acquaintance of future colleagues and learn their telephone numbers and the names of their secretaries who, for a while at least, will know more than their bosses about the business. These are practical matters of real importance, particularly at the time of a change in administration following the ritual eviction of the former incumbents along with their files and records.

The other measure would have the ambitious goal of creating a corps of professional executives on the British model to be inserted between political appointees and the senior civil service, who would perform the role of permanent, apolitical assistants to the rotating political officials. This is far from a new idea, but no one, to my knowledge, has yet advanced a feasible plan for forming such a corps.

To recruit qualified candidates it would be necessary to proselytize and train promising talent, somewhat after the practice of big business. Experienced older men could be transferred from the senior ranks of the civil service or enlisted outside of government. Promising young recruits could be attracted by the offer of postgraduate training leading to a doctorate or master's degree in government management. This training could take place in university graduate schools or eventually perhaps in an official Institute for Government Management operated somewhat like the National War College. Graduates would be appointed to an executive corps with pay, career patterns and retirement privileges comparable to those of the foreign and military services. If this corps developed as I would hope, it could do much to assure in good times and bad the presence of experienced professionals at or near the throttle and brakes of the government machinery.

IV

Thus far, we have considered ways to strengthen the exposed civil flank of the government in anticipation of nonmilitary dangers for which the armed forces offer a limited or inadequate response. The principal remedy proposed, expansion of the role of the NSC into a National Policy Council, undertakes to assure more effective use of resources across the entire spectrum of national security.

But even if we improve our performance in this respect, it is unlikely that national resources alone will be sufficient to meet the needs of national policy. Our government will have at least three major preoccupations abroad in the period under review: (a) the maintenance of a favorable international power balance, (b) the preservation of order and stability in the world economic and monetary system, and (c) concerted action with the UN and with individual nations in dealing with some of the troublesome global problems that transcend national capabilities. To achieve these purposes we will need help from other states with the means and will to cooperate. In order to determine which nations to cultivate, we should thoroughly review our current alliances and commitments for their relevance to likely future needs.

Only cursory consideration is required to establish the point that our primary need for friends today is not for the containment of communism — the purpose which generated most of our alliances following World War II — but rather for help in the three areas noted above. In our concern over the pentagonal balance of power, we shall want to retain close relations with Western Europe and Japan, bearing in mind the possibility that the latter may be tempted to turn to Moscow for assistance in finding a reliable source for the raw materials so critically needed by Japanese industry. We shall also need to keep an ever watchful eye on the USSR and China to see that they neither join hands nor cross swords.

For purposes of economic and monetary stability, we will want the cooperation not only of the principal industrial nations but also of their OPEC creditors because of the potential of their vast accumulations of capital to help or hinder the economic system. We should seek to keep on friendly terms with our own principal suppliers — Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and Iran for Middle East oil; Canada, Australia, South Africa, Rhodesia and a half-dozen Latin American countries for oil and scarce minerals. In seeking coop-

See EXPOSED FLANK OF NATIONAL SECURITY, Pg. 5-F

DECLASSIFIED
DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

EXPOSED FLANK OF NATIONAL SECURITY -- CONTINUED

eration to deal with global problems, particularly those of the Third World, we will look to the UN and to individual countries with the means to contribute.

While we have political and military relations with most of those whom we will especially desire as friends, we have no formal understandings covering the kind of help we are now interested in obtaining. The oil crisis demonstrated the economic inutility of our NATO military alliance; conceivably our membership in it may now expose us to requests to help allies meet their oil payments in peace and protect sea lanes from the Middle East to Europe in time of crisis or war.

These observations should not be interpreted as a call for a wholesale abrogation of understandings with old friends and for another set of formal alliances with new partners. Such a course would generate hard feelings abroad, divisive debates at home, and universal speculation about our motives. My suggestion would be to allow outmoded commitments to fade away when possible and to depend on a parallelism of interests, confirmed as necessary by short-term agreements more like contracts than treaties, to assure the right kind of help from the right kind of friends.

V

Even after reinforcing the civil flank of national security and obtaining all available help from foreign sources, we cannot be complacent over the success of our efforts. In the end, much will depend on how our handiwork appears in the eyes of the international world and the resultant national posture presented. That posture, to be effective, should create an impression of strength derived from formidable power in the hands of determined leaders acting with a clear sanction from their people. Such power must include components of many sorts — political, economic, military, moral, under the leadership of individuals of recognized character and ability, enjoying the confidence and respect of their people. Weakness in any of these elements diminishes the effectiveness of the impression; preponderant strength in one sector will not compensate for weakness in another.

One cannot be sure how we look to others, but our current posture certainly must suggest great economic and military power along with an unusually elastic political system that has just survived a severe test. Yet, unhappily, our history of the last several years has been replete with indications of loss of national unity, decline in faith in American institutions, and a proclivity approaching a national vice for undermining authority and denigrating leadership. With the accession of President Ford, we may hope for a moderation of these attitudes, but until it takes place our national posture will continue to display blemishes detracting from the authority conferred by its material strength. To achieve full effectiveness it must be clearly seen that the ramparts of our security, both the military and civil sectors, are manned by citizens united in purpose and responsive to the commands of trusted leaders.

AVIATION WEEK 5 MAY 75 (9)

Identification Revised On Recently Orbited Military Spacecraft

Washington—Satellite launched by the U. S. Air Force Apr. 18 now appears to be an ocean surveillance/reconnaissance spacecraft rather than a second Satellite Data System (SDS) spacecraft, judging from orbital parameters released belatedly by the U. S. Air Force (AW&ST Apr. 28, p. 30).

USAF initially refused to release any orbital data on the launch, as it did following the launch of the first operational SDS on Mar. 10 (AW&ST Mar. 17, p. 188).

Normally, USAF makes available initial orbital parameters on all satellites it launches, including those intended for photo-reconnaissance, early warning and other sensitive missions.

USAF's extreme sensitivity over the orbital parameters of the SDS satellites, which employ a highly elliptical orbit similar to that used by most Russian Molniya communication satellites, prompts some observers to believe the SDS has another mission beyond the announced one of providing emergency communications with Strategic Air Command bombers in the polar region.

The weekly satellite situation report published by NASA's Goddard Space Flight Center, immediately following the launch of the first operational SDS, stated: "Current elements not available."

The U. S. is obligated under an agreement with the USSR reached in the early 1960s to report the launch and initial orbital parameters of all spacecraft to the United Nations.

Additionally, the monthly satellite situation report published by Britain's Royal Aircraft Establishment, gives the initial orbital data for the SDS satellite launched on Mar. 10, showing it to be in a Molniya-type orbit.

Orbital data subsequently released by USAF for the Apr. 18 satellite are perigee of 84 mi., apogee of 247 mi., inclination of 110.5 deg. and orbital period of 89.8 min.

The satellite is believed to be an adaptation of an earlier vintage USAF photo-reconnaissance spacecraft that transmits photos to earth by radio link, which the Navy is using to gain experience with spaceborne ocean surveillance prior to the launch of its own specially designed spacecraft late this year.

CHICAGO TRIBUNE 9 MAY 1975

Chinese construct giant nuclear shelters

bNANKING, China [Reuters]—Chinese militiamen have dug a huge complex of underground shelters outside this eastern city which they claim could provide sanctuary against all known nuclear and chemical weapons.

Running 1.75 miles beneath lush farmland close to the Yangtse River, the tunnels can accomodate about 20,000 people.

A British press delegation which toured the concrete shelters was shown a newly installed air filtering system.

CHINESE guides said the system, driven by a simple generator, "washed" incoming air, cleansing it from radioactive fallout and chemical contamination.

The heated shelters, built by the Nanking rail vehicles plant militia, have storage and dining areas, a small auditorium, and water tanks.

In one passage there was a simple rifle range and underground workshops, equipped with multispindled industrial lathes.

FROM INTERVIEWS iwth Chinese officials h ere it appeared more than 60 per cent of greater Nanking's two million people had some military training.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Marquis Childs

BALTIMORE SUN 9 MAY 1975

After Vietnam, Deep Disagreements Remain

Washington.

Compiled for the Secretary of State, Henry A. Kissinger, is a thick volume made up of cables from around the world following the fall of Vietnam asking more or less bluntly this question: Who makes the foreign policy of the United States?

There are variants on this theme: Who is responsible for decisions taken? And even, whom can we trust when we hear conflicting views on a policy issue?

For Mr. Kissinger, trying to pull together the tangled threads of American policy following the debacle, this is a black book that cannot be simply filed and forgotten. For the inquiries come from foreign ministers, from prime ministers and presidents. While the tone is not unfriendly, it is nevertheless insistent.

And there is no answer or, at any rate in this moment of doubt and uncertainty, there can be no unequivocal response. Foreigners, even those best informed and responsible, have always found it difficult to understand the American system of divided powers with the executive and the legislature sharing power even on foreign policy to some degree.

In the aftermath of the debacle, as Mr. Kissinger muses, the nation might have had a Dunkirk reaction. We shall all stand together with unity in diversity. We will demonstrate to the world that we are one people able to withstand a blow to our pride and prestige.

But that was not to be. The abyss between Congress and the State Department and the White House, to speak of only one of the fissures in the body politic, is wider than ever. Old differences over policy have if anything been accentuated. Foremost on this list is Turkey and the Greek-Turkish quarrel over Cyprus.

Congressional action to prevent further military aid to Turkey still stands, with little chance the blockade will be lifted short of action on Cyprus not presently in the cards. As Mr. Kissinger sees it, he has gone a long way to try to meet the demands of the members of Congress chiefly responsible for putting up the barrier.

Twice he has held lengthy meetings with Representatives John Brademas, Paul Sarbanes and Benjamin Rosenthal to try to convince them that the ban can only be harmful to American security and the NATO structure. Not only that but he showed them the most important cables passing between the department and Ankara in an effort to convince them that everything possible was being done to persuade the Turks to show some give on Cyprus. In later sessions with Mr. Brademas he debated the issue with all his brilliant forensic skill.

But the three were unmoved. They felt the cables showed the secretary had not taken a firm line with the Turks. Instead he had tried persuasion and sweet reasonableness. Until he was willing to state that the foreign aid law had been broken when the Turks used American weapons for other than defensive purposes and bring Ankara to account on this score, the ban will remain.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee approved a resolution by the Senate majority leader, Mike Mansfield, and the minority leader, Hugh Scott, to resume the flow of military materiel. But the vote was only 9 to 7, which is pretty narrow for that body on an issue endorsed by the leadership and sought by the administration. Once on the Senate floor it would have tough going and certainly it would be defeated in the House.

That is only one impasse, although it is extremely important as Mr. Kissinger prepares to go to a NATO meeting with Greece and Turkey and the strength of the alliance on the southern flank on the critical list. Divergent views on how to avert war in the Middle East smoulder just below the surface following the failure of Mr. Kissinger's second round of shuttle diplomacy.

The secretary is embattled with his enemies, notably in Congress and in the press, determined to cut him up into little pieces. But Mr. Kissinger is fighting it out with the high articulateness, the public presence, which have stood him in good stead in the past. He is telling his story to reporters. He gave a 45-minute interview to Barbara Walters on NBC's Today show and, somewhat to his surprise, she is releasing it in five segments. He is speaking in St. Louis and Kansas City.

A striking parallel is with Dean Acheson, Harry Truman's Secretary of State, who in his last months in office was set upon by violent opponents. Mr. Acheson stood on the dignity of the office and the loyalty of his President. Mr. Kissinger is in the sweaty arena giving his critics as good as he gets.

NEW YORK TIMES 9 MAY 1975

Text of Remarks at Saigon News Parley

Following is the text of introductory remarks made at a news conference in Saigon by Lieut. Gen. Tran Van Tra, the new military commander, as broadcast in Vietnamese by the Saigon radio and translated and transmitted from Bangkok, Thailand, by The Associated Press.

Comrades and gentlemen, I am very glad to represent the Military Command Committee of Saigon-Gia Dinh [Saigon's Province] in meeting the first official time with the press and people of Saigon in this big city.

And I recall I have met some of you here in Saigon before but in different circumstances and in different conditions.

And I believe many of you have followed different phases of our giant struggle.

You, friends, witnessed the moment when the people of Saigon together with their liberation Armed Forces rose up to liberate their city.

And in other cities of South Vietnam, as in Saigon, you have witnessed that historic moment that ends 170 years in which our country did not have independence and freedom.

Since the liberation of Saigon, now and forever, our people have independence, freedom and democracy. Independence, freedom and peace will exist in our country forever.

Having independence, freedom and peace we believe that the country will be built into a rich one. The Vietnamese people will have a peaceful and happy life.

It goes without saying that we meet with a number of difficulties in the first days of our liberation, but these difficulties are not considerable in comparison with those in 30 years of war.

Support of the People

You, yesterday, have observed the sentiments and attitudes of the people here toward the Provisional Revolutionary Government of the Republic of South Vietnam and the People's Liberation Armed Forces. The city fully supports the P.R.G. and supports the armed forces of the people.

Where there is the people's support, where there is the people's determination, obstacles will be wiped out.

In spite of those difficulties we are trying to restore security and order in the city soon and also stabilize life for all people here.

You have already witnessed that the people have taken an active part in all activities together with the revolutionary administration in Saigon.

Through unity in their tasks the revolutionary administration of the city, together with the people, will settle all problems and wipe out all obstacles.

In my speech yesterday I spoke of the matters that we are attending to and I would like not to repeat them in order to save your precious time.

Congratulations Received

We are very happy to receive a great many congratulations from all parts of the world after we liberated Saigon and other parts of South Vietnam.

In only a short period of more than one week 11 countries have recognized the Revolutionary Government of the Republic of South Vietnam.

And I believe that in the future there will be more countries establishing relations with us.

We are deeply moved not only by those congratulations from all over the world but also by the support and assistance from our friends in the Socialist countries—the Soviet Union, China and other countries, as well as organizations.

For example, the Soviet Union and China have transported food here.

We are very thankful for this timely and active support.

to all progressive organizations, progressive personalities from all corners of the world who are sending us congratulations, support and assistance.

NEW YORK TIMES
9 MAY 1975

Cambodians Say Return Of Evacuees Is Planned

BANGKOK, Thailand, May 8 (Agence France-Presse) — The communist-led forces that took over Cambodia on April 17 apparently had a long prepared plan to move millions of inhabitants into zones where they would be instilled with the spirit of service to the revolution.

Millions of people have been forcibly evacuated from at least the main centers through which the first convoy of refugees from the French Embassy in Phnom Penh passed — Kompong Chhnang, Pursat and Battambang, plus the capital—with only the bare minimum necessary for survival. Sewing machines, electric fans, folding beds and cars have been discarded by the wayside.

Journalists in the evacuation convoy who asked were told that the evacuees would return to their homes later in what was termed a clean condition. It was said that they would have no useless belongings and would start their lives from scartch, free of the artificial needs of a western world that was never theirs.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

SYRACUSE POST-STANDARD MAY 1, 1975(9)

Military Gap Feared As Manpower Costs Increase

By DOROTHY NEWER

An existing and increasing need for military hardware was highlighted by speakers yesterday at a "Dialogue on Defense" program sponsored by the Syracuse Chapter, American Defense Preparedness Association (ADPA) at Hotel Syracuse.

"This is no time for less than adequate military capabilities," declared Lt. Gen. Daniel O. Graham, director of the U.S. Defense Intelligence Agency, the dialogue's luncheon speaker.

Gen. Graham added the number of combinations that could cause new conflict were on the rise.

He cited such potential trouble-makers as the shortage of oil, food crises, the proliferation of nuclear weapons, terrorism and the rise of tyranny in newly developed and emerging "third world" countries.

Other key defense officials on the program were John R. Quetsch, principal assistant budget director for the secretary of defense; Vice Admiral John G. Finneran, USN, principal deputy assistant secretary of defense, and William Levitt, director for production and resources for the secretary of defense.

All the speakers described the cost of manpower, operations and maintenance as consuming such an increasing share of the U.S. defense budget that the amount left to procure new equipment has been plunging.

The result is the development of an equipment gap and the need for the hardware of war, Adm. Finneran declared, the time for buying "is before you need it because you can't do it overnight. The word is 'preparedness'," he declared.

Thomas L. Paganelli, vice president and general manager of General Electric Co.'s Electronic Systems Division, was dialogue chairman. Russell L. Bearss, manager of Chrysler Corp.'s New Process Gear Division plant introduced Gen. Graham. The Syracuse ADPA chapter is headed by Harold G. Francis, General Electric Co.

Gen. Graham, comparing the military capabilities of the United States and Soviet Russia, said in attack equipment the two countries were about even. Russia has an advantage in possessing more ICBMs but the Soviet lags behind the United States in the technology for putting sophisticated warheads on their missiles.

While the United States leads in bombers, Russia has a massive air defense installation. Russia, he said, has a tremendous advantage in ground forces—165 divisions against 20 for the United States, although the Russian divisions are somewhat smaller than those of the U.S.

He also declared Russia and the Communist countries can mobilize forces swifter than we can. While the United States has a technological advantage, we are threatened by a lack of conventional (non-nuclear) power.

He said not just nuclear weapons were needed but all types of equipment. "If you have the capability to strike back, you can prevent the first strike," he explained.

JASHINGTON STAR 7 MAY 1975(9)

GARRY WILLS

No End to the Lying

The Kissinger-squid scuttles off through obscuring squirts of ink. Responding to his inky valves, some right-wingers write plaintively about what they consider the real tragedy of Watergate: Nixon, it turns out, was ready to re-escalate his "peace with honor" in April of 1973. Peace with new bombings, honoring secret dishonorable pledges.

If he had tried that, it would have made the 1970 spasms of Cambodia and Kent State look like kindergarten games. After all, he had been reelected on the assurance that peace was at hand — and had been elected in the first place by saying that people who have four years to end a war and cannot end it should be retired.

Yet people assure us, credibly, that he was ready to go in again in 1973. If Watergate prevented that, it was the nicest blessing it bestowed on us. How can former apologists for Nixon, who boasted that he brought the war to an end, now think it a boast that he was trying to start it up again? The answer is simple: These people are also apologists for Henry Kissinger.

And Kissinger realized, recently, that the Thieu correspondence was bound to come out — a correspondence that virtually promised renewal of the war after victory at the polls in 1972.

At the same time, Henry Kissinger was paying a great deal of attention to what the accords said and was pretending that Communist "intransigence" on the precise terms was all that stood between us and real peace. In other words, he was lying to Americans about his lies to the South Vietnamese.

What an extraordinary performance Kissinger's has been. In the fall of 1972, he said peace was at hand, but that nasty Hanoi was intransigent — and he was lying. Peace was not at hand, only a suspension of the combat. And it was Saigon that was balking, not Hanoi. Whom was he fooling more, at that time — America, or Hanoi, or Saigon, or Moscow? Or himself? The lies were all tidily connected. It was omnidirectional mendacity.

And now he tells us, in hints and asides and leaks, that — six months later — he had another announcement to make: that war was at hand, but that a nasty Congress, gone blood-crazy over Watergate, was intransigent. But for that, his lies about peace would have been cancelled out, and he could have successfully bombed — which is also a lie. Even he knew he could not get away with that; but he must protect, with new lies, his first lies to Thieu about America's ability to unlimber its B-52s forever and ever. Each of his earlier lies demanded a new lie to cover it up, and yet each just revealed his mendacity further. It is a private Vietnam of his own whose escalation we cannot prevent. The Sorcerer's Apprentice of the Christmas bombing is destroying his own office in order to save it.

We lied our way in, and lied our way out — and the lies didn't work, either way. And we still have to listen to more lies about why they didn't work. Vietnam is over, but disgrace is not laid to rest. Henry Kissinger is a walking, talking national disgrace.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

TIME MAGAZINE 12 MAY 1975 (9)

MEDITERRANEAN

Strong Fleet Without Friends

The mighty U.S. Sixth Fleet was locked out of one of its most important eastern Mediterranean bases last week. In an anti-American decision with potentially grave strategic effect, Greece's democratic government, still angry that the U.S. had once backed the fallen junta and then did not do more last year to prevent the Turkish invasion of Cyprus, withdrew permission for the fleet to use the harbor of Elefsis, 17 miles west of Athens. Set up only three years ago on a lease basis, Elefsis was a home port abroad for the six ships and 1,700 crewmen of Destroyer Squadron 12, as well as for 1,100 dependents who lived ashore. According to the terms of a joint U.S.-Greek statement, Elefsis will be closed and the families out by September; the American airbase at Hellinikon Airport in Athens will also shut down, although U.S. planes may continue to land there to aid Greek defense needs. The future of five other U.S. installations in Greece will be determined at another joint conference in June.

Home-Porting. In response to the announcement, the Sixth Fleet's commander, Vice Admiral Frederick C. Turner, issued a terse statement: "The Sixth Fleet will be able to meet its commitments in support of national policy without home-porting in Athens." In fact, the closing of Elefsis greatly complicates Turner's task. Because Turkey has also been angered by U.S. policy on Cyprus, no ships of the Sixth Fleet have been able to drop anchor in Istanbul or Izmir since February. As for Greece, the last destroyer landing party to go ashore on Corfu was nearly lynched by hysterical Greek islanders. Even in Athens, American sailors' wives and children from Elefsis have been stoned.

The Sixth Fleet still has bases in the western Mediterranean, notably at Naples in Italy and Rota in Spain. But these are at least three-hours steaming time from eastern waters, a fact that will become even more important next month when access to the eastern Mediterranean is increased after the reopening of the Suez Canal—a herculean chore carried out in part by Sixth Fleet salvage units. All of the 50 or so ships of the Sixth Fleet can be rotated back to Norfolk, headquarters of the U.S. Atlantic Fleet. But that kind of maneuvering would add to fuel costs, already so heavy that ships of the fleet spend much of their time at anchor.

The loss of port facilities in Greece and Turkey also means that the Sixth Fleet has fewer "bingo fields," airstrips ashore to which carrier planes can divert in emergencies or bad weather. In addition, the new political situation creates morale problems for seamen, who will be forced to spend more and more time aboard ship without the chance of seeing their families and without liberty in the foreign ports.

Even with these handicaps, however, the Sixth Fleet continues to be the strongest military force in the Mediterranean. Though the Soviet fleet has made remarkable strides in a decade, and now actually outnumbers the Sixth Fleet (60 ships to 50), its submarines and cruisers still cannot match overall U.S. firepower. TIME's Rome bureau chief Jordan Bonfante recently spent two days at sea with Task Force 60 of the Sixth Fleet and sent this report:

Before dawn, the fuel tanker Marias had appeared out of nowhere, like a floating filling station, and the 80,000-ton carrier Forrestal danced into place alongside. The two ships cruised ahead, a scant 140 ft. apart, while the carrier took on engine and jet fuel from two suspended umbilical lines. Meanwhile, three destroyers with the law-firm-sounding names of Sampson, Barry and Miller took turns on the tanker's far side.

With her tanks topped off, the carrier soon swung into the wind and went back to work. The flight deck erupted with the frenetic precision of "launch and recovery," sending up 40 planes, like a parking lot emptying at rush hour. Phantoms, Intruders, Corsair II light attack bombers, as well as ugly-goose Hummers with their absurd-looking radar dishes, vaulted off the catapults with a roar and a swoop, 15 seconds apart. Within minutes, other planes were simultaneously coming in for "recovery," the "controlled crashes," as one flyer put it, that pass for carrier landings.

Martial Arts. On the bridge, Captain James Scott, 48, the Forrestal's skipper and a former fighter pilot, watched the thunderous flight deck activities below with a cheerful scowl: "We can do this with a 200-ft. ceiling and three-quarter-mile visibility," he said in his Alabama drawl. "That's bad-ass. We don't like it, but in a crunch we have that capability, even at night."

It was a typical flight operation at sea and an impressive display of a Sixth Fleet carrier's naval-air talents. The U.S.S. Forrestal, with four escorting destroyers, was steering a complicated course between Sicily and Crete, exercising its special martial arts. The Phantoms and Corsairs flew off to drill in interceptor tactics or to make practice runs with dummy bombs and missiles. Electronic-surveillance planes stuffed with microtechnology ranged far and wide on reconnaissance flights. The destroyers darted off or raced back to the carrier according to their own tactical plans. Periodically, tankers showed up to refuel.

The Sixth Fleet is confident that it retains military superiority. For one thing, the Soviet fleet, powerful as it is, is still regarded as basically defensive; its main weapons are the surface-to-surface missiles targeted on the U.S. carriers. The Sixth Fleet's two carriers—at present the Forrestal and the Roosevelt—are decidedly offensive weapons, with aircraft that, from positions in the eastern Mediterranean, could penetrate the Soviet heartland.

U.S. naval experts have high respect for the design and firepower of Soviet ships, but the Sixth Fleet has not been standing pat. It has taken on ever more sophisticated landing-guidance and weapons systems, like computerized dive-bombing that allows 20- to 30-ft. accuracy from 4,000 ft. It has also refined the all-important and largely secret missile defense for the carriers. The Sixth Fleet commanders are well aware that their carriers are potential floating targets in an age of surface-to-surface missiles; they also feel that their multiple early-warning defense systems are more than capable of shielding their mobile ocean-borne airfields from disaster.

Within the year the fleet's battle-experienced pilots, many of them Viet Nam veterans, will be flying two imposing new aircraft: Lockheed's S-3 Viking, which will be the first antisubmarine jet, and the swing-wing F-14 Tomcat, Grumman's new $18 million attack plane, which is to replace the effective but aging Phantom.

Stretching the Legs. The Sixth Fleet also boasts amphibious forces, which can land 2,000 combat Marines supported by helicopters and vertical-takeoff harrier planes from small mobile carriers like the Guam. Every two months or so, the landing force "stretches its legs" with an amphibious exercise in Spain or Sardinia.

Such scrambles ashore have been interpreted as possible rehearsals for a U.S. invasion of Middle East oilfields in the event of petroleum "strangulation." Sixth Fleet commanders deny that the exercises are anything more than routine. They point out that the amphibious force, after all, is only large enough to "go ashore to protect an embassy" in case of trouble.

"We don't get involved in what our State Department does," says Rear Admiral Forrest Petersen, Task Force 60's commander, when asked about the fleet's potential role in any possible U.S. action against the Middle East oilfields. "We simply stand ready to follow orders." Petersen has no doubt that with the amount of weaponry now assembled in the Mediterranean, a pitched battle between U.S. and Soviet fleets, which no one expects, would be awesome in cost. "A conflict would be pretty bloody, no question about that. An awful lot of people would get hurt," he says. "But I am convinced that we have the capability to meet that threat and still retain the residual force to do whatever else should be required beyond that."

WALL STREET JOURNAL 9 MAY 1975

YANKEES, GO HOME: More governments threaten U.S. military bases.

Washington wants to hold on to most foreign bases, but troubles arise in Europe as well as Asia. Spain insists on a U.S. defense pact before renewing base leases there; the U.S. says that's impossible. Portugal specifies that the Azores base can't be used by planes flying material to Israel. Greece takes back some bases; Turkey threatens to close some.

The Philippines probably will put new restrictions on U.S. forces, threatening Seventh Fleet operations. Thailand demands closing of air bases there within a year. But Washington counts on covert help from China to help maintain the U.S. military in Asia. Peking privately wants some U.S. troops in Asia to offset Soviet power, U.S. analysts contend.

Base closings somehow don't bring savings. The Air Force says all 350 warplanes to be pulled out of Thailand must be kept ready for "contingencies."

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II -- Main Edition -- 9 May 1975

AIR FORCE MAGAZINE - MAY 1975(9)

USAF'S INCREASING OPERATIONAL EFFICIENCY

BY THE HON. JOHN L. McLUCAS
SECRETARY OF THE AIR FORCE

IN THIS post-Vietnam, post-Vladivostok era, the wishful notions that military strength and détente are incompatible, and that current negotiations and increased cooperation with the Soviet Union signal an opportunity for us to decrease our commitment to the maintenance of military strength, are conclusions fraught with danger.

It is strength, translated by resolve, that has fostered this period of negotiation. Our military preparedness is the touchstone of international accord because détente remains a very delicate balance of cooperation and competition based on mutual interest and not, as yet, on the altruism of man. As President Ford has said, "Strength makes détente attainable. Weakness invites war."

In my opinion, Air Force accomplishments during the past twelve months have done much to maintain the strength that nurtures the process of détente. Substantial improvements have been made in our strategic and conventional capabilities as well as in the utilization of our people and our overall operational efficiency—despite the effects of inflation and increasing demands on the nation's resources.

It is clear that the Soviets recognize the importance of military strength. The CIA estimates that Soviet expenditures on defense, not including pensions, exceed our own by twenty-five percent. Secretary Schlesinger, in his annual Defense Department Report for FY '76, labeled Soviet advances in ICBMs, for example, as "very substantial" and "indeed unprecedented." In addition, the USSR also has a new, long-range, variable-sweepwing bomber known as the Backfire that has been designed for in-flight refueling.

Strategic Forces

Our development of the B-1 bomber, along with other strategic initiatives, provides the sinew and muscle for the strength we will need for more substantive negotiation.

With the roll-out ceremonies in late October and the first flight just before Christmas, the B-1—at least in prototype form—became a flying reality. That test flight was an early milestone in a two-year evaluation program with a production decision anticipated by late 1976, dependent upon congressional funding, development progress, and the SALT environment.

Except for a minor problem during the third flight, test results so far have been favorable. The engines have been very responsive, and the aircraft overall has flown essentially the way the ground simulator indicated it would.

We have also initiated various economies to reduce B-1 cost. Aluminum has been substituted for more expensive titanium wherever possible in the airframe. The engine inlet has been modified to a more easily manufactured design. As a result of intensive review, we are taking a number of cost-saving actions such as the replacement of the crew escape module with new, advanced technology ejection seats. We will continue to evaluate and adopt those trade-offs that cut costs but do not degrade essential mission performance.

Due to Soviet advances and the long lead time involved in developing new major weapon systems, we are continuing efforts to improve our strategic missile forces. Probably the most significant recent event took place over the Pacific Test Range in October. Using the C-5 as a transporter, a Minuteman I was dropped from the rear cargo door and stabilized with parachutes. Ignition occurred at 8,000 feet and the missile climbed above 20,000 feet during the ten-second firing, demonstrating the technical feasibility of air-launching such missiles.

Other aspects of the Advanced ICBM Technology Program (MX) include examination of ground mobile missiles and increasingly hardened silos.

In airlift, the C-5's capability to be air refueled was demonstrated in nonstop flights from Dover AFB, Del., to Clark AB in the Philippines—more than 10,000 miles. Obviously, the use of in-flight refueling techniques extends the range of the aircraft, but these measures also permit larger payloads, cut our dependence on en-route stations, and reduce overall fuel consumption. We have begun training our line crews in in-flight refueling.

In the context of the strategic environment, these advances preserve our bargaining options in the SALT talks. To some extent, the technological capability implicit in these programs tends to inspire the Soviets to negotiate before deployment can take place. Also, the programs provide a hedge against our having to play "catch-up ball" in maintaining strategic parity.

Tactical Weapon Systems

In addition to "essential equivalence" in the strategic realm, we also are meeting our responsibilities for maintaining an equilibrium of conventional forces. A number of new developments have occurred to ensure this "equilibrium" for the foreseeable future.

Fresh in many minds is the recent selection of the F-16 as the new Air Combat Fighter. While the competing YF-17 is a very capable aircraft, the YF-16 proved superior in a number of areas, including acceleration, transonic maneuverability, and, for the Air Force, projected life cycle costs and production risk. Both the YF-17 and YF-16 were flown more than 300 hours during the evaluative process.

The F-16 will be a multimission fighter weighing about half as much as the F-15 and costing significantly less. With a thrust-to-weight ratio greater than one, the ACF will be a highly maneuverable aircraft capable of Mach 2 speed. Because of its relatively low price tag, we will counter the trend toward rising weapon systems costs, permitting modernization and planned expansion of our tactical forces.

See McLUCAS, Pg. 10-F

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

McLUCAS -- CONTINUED

Moreover, we hope our European allies will select the F-16 to replace their aging F-104s and thereby achieve increased standardization within NATO. We have offered them an attractive coproduction arrangement.

The F-16 will complement the more sophisticated, all-weather F-15 tactical fighter. During its 2½-year test program, the F-15 has met or exceeded all expectations and will provide air superiority against any challenger.

The F-15's performance capabilities were highlighted early in February when it broke eight world time-to-climb records set previously by a Navy F-4 and a Russian MiG-25. The F-15 also holds great promise for durability. For example, the aircraft that visited the Farnborough Air Show in Great Britain this past fall made seventy-two flights before maintenance was required on its radar.

President Ford, in welcoming the aircraft into the Air Force inventory during ceremonies at Luke AFB, Ariz., last November, called the F-15 Eagle a "pioneer of peace." The several aircraft assigned to Luke will be used for training purposes with the first operational wing scheduled for Langley AFB, Va., in FY '76.

The first aircraft we have ever designed specifically for the close air support role, the A-10, promises to counter the numerical advantages in armor the Warsaw Pact enjoys in Europe. While armed with the new GAU-8 30-mm armor-piercing cannon and capable of carrying an eight-ton multipurpose payload, the A-10 nonetheless possesses high maneuverability, long loiter time, and the capability to operate from austere, forward bases.

In a comparative flight evaluation with the A-7D last spring, the A-10 proved more effective for close air support. Funds have been released for purchase of twenty-two A-10s this fiscal year with a programmed buy of more than 700 by 1980. The first of these preproduction aircraft flew early this year. As in the case of the F-16 for the air-superiority mission, the relatively low cost of the A-10 will enable us to acquire the number we need for the close air support role.

Capable of tying all these tactical weapon systems together and enhancing their respective capabilities is a surveillance, warning, and control system known as AWACS. The E-3A AWACS, or Airborne Warning and Control System, is actually a Boeing 707 equipped with long-range radar, computers, displays, and a thirty-foot diameter rotating radome.

Operating in a highly sophisticated arena such as Central Europe, AWACS will be able to monitor and direct large-scale air operations. At its normal operating altitude of 30,000 feet, it can detect and track aircraft flying at high and low altitudes over both land and water. It can also track ships at sea. Recent tests verified the suitability of the AWACS concept for tactical and air defense operations.

We are hoping for continued support from Congress to make AWACS an operational part of the inventory. Six aircraft were funded last year and we are requesting $431 million in FY '76 for six more, along with $199 million to continue development and testing.

Reserve Components

However important equipment and performance capabilities are, the basic factor that determines our level of effectiveness remains the ability and dedication of the people who fly and maintain the hardware and perform countless other jobs necessary to Air Force operations.

Air Force manpower has declined steadily since 1968, the peak year of our involvement in Southeast Asia. Projections through FY '76 show reductions of thirty-five percent for military and twenty-four percent for civilians—an overall drop of thirty-two percent. Dependent, of course, on future circumstances, I would hope that we can avoid further significant cuts.

The decrease in active-duty and civilian manpower points to the importance of the Total Force Policy for maintaining our overall strength. Since 1968, Air National Guard and Air Force Reserve total manpower has increased some twenty-nine percent. In addition, the Reserve components are receiving modern equipment and high-priority missions.

For example, three Guard units have completed conversion from older F-100s to new-production A-7D aircraft and are combat-ready. Three more such conversions are programmed before the end of FY '76. Also, fifty-six percent of our tactical airlift aircraft are assigned to Reserve components, and in FY '76 we will begin the assignment of 128 KC-135 tankers to the Reserve.

With more modern equipment and added responsibilities, the Reserve components are becoming increasingly essential to maintaining our capabilities.

Personnel Programs

Another area vital to maintaining our capabilities involves our recruiting success in the all-volunteer environment. There were those who doubted the ability of the Air Force to meet recruiting quotas in the absence of the draft. Last June, we ended the first full year of the all-volunteer program and the results were very positive. Quotas for both airmen and officers were met without lowering our quality standards. We did have some trouble in recruiting enough doctors and filling certain enlisted requirements in the Air Force Reserve, but the overall program has been successful.

While possibly affected somewhat by the nation's economy, the recruiting totals since last June are equally impressive. Monthly quotas are being met, in terms of both quantity and quality. About ninety percent of our recruits are high school graduates or the equivalent, and ninety-nine percent are in the top three mental categories.

Overall, I think we are continuing to make good progress in creating a stimulating, rewarding environment in which our people can work. With more than 1,000 jobs in forty-eight career fields, the Air Force certainly offers diverse opportunities.

Furthermore, the Chief of Staff, Gen. David Jones, and I have been working hard to make the Air Force more responsive to the needs of our people. The new Advanced Personnel Data System (APDS), through closer integration of personnel preferences into the decision-making process, enables us to be more sensitive to the needs and desires of our people. Full travel and transportation entitlements have been extended to E-4s with two years of service. The CAREERS program is now a reality and enables us to match the skills and interests of our reenlisting airmen with those needed by the Air Force.

In equal opportunity, three percent of our officer corps currently consists of minorities, but our goal is to increase that to 5.6 percent by 1980 and thereby approximate the percentage of minority college graduates in the US population. Our minority enlisted manning is 15.6 percent. Women now compose about 4.5

See McLUCAS, Pg. 11-F

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON POST - 9 MAY 1975

Non-Fighters For Freedom

A Commentary

By Nicholas von Hoffman

The State Department is appealing for Americans to step forward and be financial sponsors of the Vietnamese fugitives the executive branch of the government is packing in here. This is a wonderful opportunity for the parents of those of our soldiers who were turned on to heroin over there.

With any luck they may be able to sponsor their kids' pushers. This is also a chance for the Mafia to demonstrate its patriotism while at the same time recruiting some experienced personnel. The pimps, madams and hijackers of American food and material certainly should have the experience to fit into the underworld's operations in America.

Perhaps that description of the fugitives is overdrawn, although the television newsclips of them landing at Clark Air Force Base and immediately converting their gold hoards into dollars isn't reassuring. It is even less reassuring in the light of reports that we left hundreds of former Vietnamese employees of our embassy stranded in Ho Chi Minh City, nee Saigon, while thousands of these unvouched-for persons, who apparently bribed their way onto the airlift, are now becoming residents of a reluctant America. It may take the FBI years to determine how many are Red spies, but the more likely outcome is that, in one stroke, we have solved the new Communist government's vice and crime problem.

Assuming that the State Department and the White House aren't lying to us—and there are many who won't make that assumption—it appears they have no idea who they're trucking over. Do you recall that in a matter of a couple of weeks the estimates of the number of arrivals have jumped from 50,000 to 80,000 to 120,000 and beyond. It is impossible, given these circumstances, for the government to know if it is admitting, babies excluded, worthy individuals, or the scum of Saigon's brothels, or the torturers from Gen. Thieu's political police.

"Give me . . . your huddled masses," etc. The light atop the Statue of Liberty is invoked by the President's press secretary as justification. We're told that we admitted thousands of Hungarian Freedom Fighters when their cause was extinguished by the Russian Army. Would that South Vietnam had been populated by Hungarians! By this time Hanoi would have been renamed Budapest East. What we're getting is a bunch of Freedom Non-Fighters who, as the television shots of acres of deserted tanks and artillery show, dropped their weapons and ran.

An orderly transfer of deserving Vietnamese was possible. Dr. Kissinger has had more than two years to arrange it. From the time it became clear that Congress was ending American participation in this war, it was incumbent upon him and both Mr. Nixon and Mr. Ford to negotiate a humane and sensibly planned evacuation.

That was never done. The executive branch would not accept the fact that its power to conduct foreign policy is absolutely limited by the Congress's decision to pay for it. They went ahead, presuming that they could continue to involve us and then come back to Congress and say, "Like it or not, we're in the soup now and you've got to provide the crackers."

Doubtless Dr. Kissinger and President Ford based their intransigence on sincerely felt policy reasons. (Kissinger was never as good as he was once painted but he isn't the total blackguard they're making him out now.) But with that said, there is still an element of anger and spite in this Vietnamese fugitive business. It's as though they're trying to get back at the antiwar sentiment, which frustrated them, by sticking America with this mob of what may turn out to be mostly Indochinese riff-raff.

What do we do now? Send them back? Not likely. You'll notice the new government in Saigon, while hollering that the fugitives made off with their airplanes and ships, isn't demanding the return of the passengers. Farm a substantial number out to those loyal allies we're told we have such unshakeable commitments to? No other country in the world will take more than a token number.

We're stuck with them; but just as the executive branch used Americans in Saigon as hostages to get that bunch out of there, the legislative branch can now use the Vietnamese fugitives to force President Ford to sign an amnesty bill granting complete legal oblivion to all our war resisters. Mr. Ford is demanding a large appropriation for his Vietnamese objects of mercy. That bill should carry an amnesty clause. And if, out of pride, he vetoes it, then let him do what he will with our 120,000 uninvited new, non-friends.

To talk about Lady Liberty's golden door, to grant home, hospitality and welfare checks to some of the very same people who were involved in putting electrodes on the testicles of their political opponents, while keeping in exile the young men who opposed such barbarism, is not, as they like to say at the White House, in accordance with our finest traditions.

© 1975, The Washington Post/King Features Syndicate

McLUCAS -- CONTINUED

percent of our active-duty force with more than 27,000 in the Air Force, and we expect that percentage to almost double to 8.2 percent by 1978. Although our work in equal opportunity is not finished, we have made significant gains.

The Effects of Inflation

Overshadowing our equipment and manpower programs in recent months has been the specter of rising inflation. Since 1968, the purchasing power of the Defense budget has declined some forty percent, although the funding level in then-year dollars has remained relatively constant. In FY '75 alone, inflation since the budget was prepared has already taken about $6 billion more than originally programmed.

Consider the cost of petroleum products. Even though we have significantly reduced our consumption through such measures as increased use of simulators and reduced flying hours, we are paying more for fuel. For example, in FY '76 the Air Force plans to purchase twenty-eight percent less fuel than in FY '73, but the cost of that reduced amount will be more than $1 billion higher. The price of JP-4 jet fuel has jumped from eleven to about thirty-seven cents a gallon since mid-1973.

We have taken a number of belt-tightening measures to counter the effects of inflation without jeopardizing our combat capability. As our overall manpower strength has declined since 1968, we have made significant reductions in support and headquarters manning, with many of the personnel authorizations being used to increase the capability of our operational units. The retirement of 400 reciprocating-engine support aircraft should provide a cost avoidance of $75 million and reduce annual fuel consumption by more than 1.5 million barrels.

Incumbent upon all of us—from equipment operator to shop foreman to wing commander—is the necessity for prudent management and maximum efficiency. The American people demand it—and rightfully so.

Détente has been likened to easing the tension on a bow. Only through strength—the continued quality of the bowmen, the bows, and the arrows—can the tension be reduced with confidence.

Current economic stresses and rising Soviet military might are formidable challenges, but the lessening of international tension through détente requires that we maintain a powerful Air Force. We are meeting those challenges. ■

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CHAMPAIGN-URBANA (ILL.) NEWS-GAZETTE 4 MAY 1975(9)

B-1 Bomber Called Price Of Survival

By ED BORMAN
News-Gazette News Editor

"How much is peace worth? What are the American people willing to pay to keep a nuclear attack unthinkable?"

The questions were asked Saturday night in Champaign by Maj. Gen. Harry M. Darmstandler, who as special assistant to the Air Force chief of staff has top responsibility for development of the B-1 bomber and the plane's fate in Congress.

Gen Darmstandler answered his own questions with, "Hopefully we are willing to pay enough to assure our own survival."

For the B-1, "enough" is now calculated to be $81 million for each of the 241 planes the Air Force says it needs to deter nuclear attack on this country. Gen. Darmstandler emphasized that this figure takes into consideration the inflation that has occurred since the first B-1 development contract was let in 1970 and is forecast to continue until the last of the 241 planes is produced in 1985.

Gen Darmstandler spoke at the annual convention of the Illinois Reserve Officers Assn. at the Ramada Convention Center.

While the price tag for development and construction is high, Gen. Darmstandler pointed out that B-1s can be operated at less cost than the B-52s they would replace.

The Air Force bought 744 B-52s. It says 244 B-1s can do the job. Reliability of the B-1 is expected to make it possible to keep a much higher percentage of the new planes on alert.

The B-1 has a crew of four, compared to the B-52's six.

Built into the B-1 are efficiency and savings in maintenance that are impossible in the B-52, the general said.

Most important to the Air Force is the performance anticipated from the B-1 in case of a nuclear attack. Gen. Darmstandler put it this way:

"We paid particular attention to having a bomber that could survive the most severe kind of attack that we could foresee. . . The B-1 is designed to get off the ground and out to a safe escape distance in appreciably less time than our current heavy bombers.

"We also gave a lot of thought to what it would take to penetrate advanced and sophisticated enemy air defense.

"We knew we would have to be able to penetrate low and fast — lower and faster than the B-52. We also knew we had to make sure it was very small as seen by radar.

"When you apply those requirements — together with the requirements for a useful range and payload — to your design, you come up with the B-1.

"You get an aircraft with wings that stick almost straight out for takeoff and landing in short distances, but you get one with wings that are sharply swept back for high speed at low altitude.

"You get an aircraft that is structurally strong to resist the overpressures of nuclear blast; but you get one that is smoothly curved from almost any angle — curved so that radar energy will be scattered rather than bounced back to an enemy detection or tracking site.

"And you get an aerodynamically clean airplane with a large internal payload — a design that will have, in the popular expression of the day, good fuel economy.

"The facts are that the B-1 would be the most cost-effective force — that is, it would be the cheapest force to do the bomber job. All costs considered, there is no better way to do it."

The first, and thus far only, B-1 was rolled out of a factory at Palmdale, Calif., last October. Since then it has flown 31 hours in eight test flights, Gen. Darmstandler reported:

"We have traversed a speed regime from takeoff to supersonic flight, and we have refueled in midair. We have operated all of the flight controls and we have flown with wings in every position from full forward to full aft. Throughout these flight tests, we have developed growing enthusiasm and every increasing confidence in having a really fine flying machine."

Under the present schedule, flight tests and other evaluations will continue until November 1976, when the Department of Defense will decide whether Congress will provide the funds.

The B-1 is intended to meet the United States needs for a manned bomber well into the 21st Century — serving for about 30 years as the B-52 has done.

While Gen. Darmstandler and his associates try to overcome the resistance of congressmen to the B-1's cost, they are watching the Soviet Union, where a new, swing-wing bomber, the Backfire, already is being produced and is operational.

Gen. Darmstandler told an interviewer that the new Russian machine is a "good airplane, capable and has many of the attributes of the B-1."

To the reserve officers, he stressed that the mission of the American armed forces is to "deter" an attack. He declared:

"We use our strategic missiles and aircraft every day. We use them for the primary purpose for which they were designed, developed and put into the strategic inventory. That purpose is neither to kill nor to destroy. It is just the opposite — it is to deter an attack and preserve peace."

The general pleaded for "grass roots support" and said, "Without support this nation will soon fade -- not only from its position of global preeminence, but also from its ability to defend itself and protect its society, its institutions, and its way of life."

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR - 9 MAY 1975

Those marines look good

Commentary by Harry Reasoner on ABC News.

The sight of United States Marines in combat situation in Phnom Penh and Saigon recently was to some people strangely comforting, particularly so since no real fighting developed. But it made me think of the concern I felt about the U.S. military in the '60s — concern lest the divisiveness and frustrations of the Vietnam involvement should leave us with a crippled and fragmented fighting force.

I remember trying to explain what I felt to a young man who at the time was violently anti-military. It was at the time when there was a disastrous strike of police and firemen in Montreal, leaving the city naked. What happened, of course, was that the Canadian Army moved in. The point, I said, is that a society must have the means to enforce order and protect its citizens. In a good society the soldiers are the agents and servants of the citizenry, they are the good guys, the white hats. The greatest danger of the Vietnam era was that this perception of them — by the country and by themselves — would change. In a democracy, an army that feels itself apart from and antagonistic to the population cannot be effective. And while a world without armies is a lovely dream it is not here yet. We badly need a military that we can be proud of and that is proud of itself.

It seems to me the services have made substantial progress since 1972 in regaining that pride. We can hope that just as the memory of our failure in Indo-China leads to new maturity in the nation, rather than to a continuing bitterness, the record of frustration that the services have to live with will make them wiser and stronger. They have, overall, nothing to feel guilty about — like the country, they did their best.

In the meantime, on this mission of rescue and help, didn't those marines look good?

U.S. NEWS & WORLD REPORT
12 MAY 1975(9)

★ ★ ★

The CIA is having trouble getting Secretary Kissinger to read its assessments of world trouble spots, particularly those dealing with Asia and the Middle East. The CIA complaint is that he prefers to rely on information provided by his own group of hand-picked analysts.

★ ★ ★

Political associates of Ronald Reagan hint that his speech at the first annual reunion of U.S. prisoners of war in the Vietnam conflict will be a blockbuster. The ex-POW's first invited Secretary Kissinger to be the featured speaker at the reunion in San Antonio, Tex., on June 28, then withdrew the invitation before he could accept or reject it.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

RADIO - TV DEFENSE DIALOG

RADIO TV REPORTS INC. WASH., D.C., SUMMARIES NOT TO BE QUOTED.

MONDAY, MAY 12, 1975 (BROADCASTS OF MAY 10, 11, 1975)

PART I

SUMMARY OF NETWORK NEWS IN THIS ISSUE

Edwin Newman, NBC, and Dan RATHER, CBS, report that the coalition government of Laos is near collapse. NEWMAN notes that leading Royalist and pro-American officials of the Laotian government have already fled that country for asylum in neighboring Thailand. And RATHER notes that more anti-American student demonstrations are being planned in Vientiane.

The collapse of the anti-communist governments of South Vietnam and Cambodia and the deteriorating political situation in Laos were apparent factors in a huge anti-communist rally Saturday in Seoul, South Korea. John STICKLER, CBS, reports that upwards of two million demonstrators, embracing virtually all elements of South Korean society from the military to students and labor union members, rallied in support of the government of President PARK Chung Hee. During the rally, the North Korean communist leader, KIM Il Sung, who has periodically threatened to invade the South, was burned in effigy. A less expansive report is filed by NEWMAN. Washington reaction to potential developments in Korea is the subject of a report by Robert PIERPOINT, CBS. PIERPOINT notes that administration officials are optimistic that the Chinese communists are exercising a restraining influence on the North Koreans.

In other news, John COCHRAN, NBC, and RATHER report that the trade and diplomatic embargo against communist Cuba may soon be lifted by the Organization of American States. Both correspondents note that Secretary of State Henry KISSINGER has indicated that OAS officials have worked out a general formula by which the embargo will be lifted by the end of the year. In Indochina-related news, NEWMAN reports that fighting continues in some parts of Vietnam, northwest and southeast of Saigon, and that Senator Mike MANSFIELD has criticized the administration for what he terms its failure to make funds available for South Vietnamese refugees.

And finally, in a report on the CBS Evening News for Saturday, Bernard KALB reports on David Atlee PHILLIPS, a CIA agent who recently resigned so that he could publicly defend the agency. According to KALB, PHILLIPS has maintained that the U. S. played no role in the coup which deposed Marxist President Salvador ALLENDE in Chile. However, KALB notes that PHLLIPS was unable to deny categorically that the CIA "discussed" the assassination of foreign political leaders, notably Cuban Premier Fidel CASTRO.

PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE SAFAA AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL MATTERS WITHIN THEIR OFFICIAL RESPONSIBILITIES.

FOR INFORMATION REGARDING THIS PUBLICATION CALL MR. HARRY [illegible] OX 57585

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NBC SATURDAY NIGHT NEWS NBC TV
6:30 PM MAY 10

Embargo Against Cuba May Soon Be Lifted

EDWIN NEWMAN: It appears tonight that the trade and diplomatic embargo imposed on the Fidel CASTRO regime in Cuba may soon be coming to an end. The embargo was imposed eleven years ago by the Organization of American States, with the United States in the lead. But five OAS members no longer honor the embargo; others are weakening, and today the foreign ministers of the OAS countries, Henry KISSINGER among them, met in Washington and discussed what to do.

Nothing official was announced, but they apparently intend to lift the embargo in two steps later this year. KISSINGER told reporters there is a general understanding of where we want to go.

John COCHRAN reports.

JOHN COCHRAN: Until today's OAS meeting, KISSINGER had side-stepped questions all week about the embargo, even ignoring Cuba in a speech yesterday to the foreign ministers. Cuba is an emotional issue among the OAS members, and KISSINGER wanted to avoid a bitter public debate. Deferring to Latin American belief that the U. S. still tries to play "big brother," KISSINGER played down his role and encouraged other countries to take the lead on Cuba. That has happened, leading to KISSINGER's remark about a general understanding on the embargo. But he was still silent on the details, saying there must be some room for secret diplomacy.

Not far from the OAS conference, about two hundred Cuban refugees demonstrated against any relaxation of the boycott. There are more than half a million Cuban refugees in this country, making up a formidable political bloc. Even so administration officials had told them privately to expect a lifting of the embargo that could, in turn, lead to talks between Havana and Washington.

At the White House, officials say President FORD is more willing to get along with Fidel CASTRO than Richard NIXON was. But those same officials warn against expecting any sudden breakthrough. Earlier this week during a news conference in Havana, CASTRO seemed to make an overture. A White House spokesman then responded in kind, indicating President FORD was pleased. But tonight, in prepared remarks at a reception for OAS ministers here, Mr. FORD does not even mention Cuba. One White House official summed it up this way: "We're in a diplomatic game with Cuba. CASTRO takes a little step towards us; we take a little step toward him. And now," said the official, "it's CASTRO's turn again."

John COCHRAN, NBC News, the White House.

Laotians Flee To Thailand

NEWMAN: In Laos today, border police reported that more than two thousand people, including high-ranking government officials, had fled across the Mekong River into Thailand. There are nearly a thousand Americans still in Laos, and the United States Embassy today urged them to remain calm, inspite of yesterday's attack on the embassy by students.

The Embassy said the Laotian police had promised effective protection.

Fighting Persists in Vietnam

NEWMAN: In South Vietnam, the new government reported that some fighting is still going on northwest and southeast of Saigon involving a few units of the old government's militia and regulars.

Mansfield Criticizes Administration

NEWMAN: Senate Majority Leader Mike MANSFIELD today criticized the administration for saying that money for South Vietnamese refugees is running out and Congress must act quickly to provide more. MANSFIELD put it this way. If they could cut through the red tape to get the refugees out, they can cut through red tape to make funds available.

Massive Rally in South Korea

NEWMAN: The Premier of North Korea, Kim Il Sung, was burned in effigy today in Seoul, the capital of South Korea. South Korean President PARK Chung Hee had warned North Korea not to think about an invasion because of the communist victories in Indochina.

The burning in effigy took place when a million people gathered in Seoul to endorse PARK's warning.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CBS EVENING NEWS CBS TV 6:30 PM
MAY 10

Koreans Stage Massive Rally

DAN RATHER: Concern is spreading and becoming more evident about the possibility that communist victories in Vietnam and Cambodia may cause new troubles in other parts of non-communist Asia. The latest example came today in South Korea. John STICKLER was there.

JOHN STICKLER: Korean citizens gathered in the huge plaza in Seoul this morning to raise their voices in unison against communist aggression. The rally lasted all morning, and estimates of the number of people ranged up to two million.

Sponsored by a group called the National Council for Total Security, the massive demonstration included people from all walks of life. Many of the men were Korea Reserve Forces. Whole units were ordered to attend. Disabled veterans of both the Korean War and Vietnam were there. Students, teachers and labor unions were all represented and called upon President FORD to support South Korea in the event North Korea should attack again as it did in 1950.

Communist leader KIM Il Sung was burned in effigy, and the demonstrators worked themselves into a frenzy. Some used their own blood to write slogans and to sign a symbolic letter to North Korea. They vowed to defend South Korea to the death, if need be.

John STICKLER for CBS News, Seoul, Korea.

US Assessment of Korean Situation

RATHER: Before that demonstration took place, Robert PIERPOINT was getting Washington's reading of the Korean situation.

Here's his report.

ROBERT PIERPOINT. According to one high FORD administration official, North Korea's President KIM Il Sung is, quote, the kind of guy who might try a probe to see if we're weakened by the collapse of Indochina. For years, KIM has threatened another invasion like the one in 1950. That's a major reason American troops remain in Korea twenty-two years after the end of the war. Congress approved a Mutual Defense Treaty with South Korea, but those troops are more important reassurance to the Seoul government, an automatic trigger to U. S. re-involvement.

But this time U. S. officials believe KIM would not have Chinese help. Last month the North Korean President went to Peking for talks with Chinese leaders. Afterward, a joint communique was issued in which China emphasized its support for peaceful unification of Korea. KIM apparently got no encouragement for any military moves.

But the U. S. Congress has recently cut down on its support of the South Korean government because of President PARK Chung Hee's repressive domestic policies. The FORD administration fears further weakening of U. S. support for South Korea could tempt the North into dangerous military adventures.

Robert PIERPOINT, CBS News, at the White House.

Laotian Coalition Near Collapse

RATHER: In Laos, the coalition government all but crumbled today, clearing the way for a take-over by the communist Pathet Lao. Five rightist ministers in the coalition resigned; students are planning more anti-foreign, anti-American demonstrations; and there are reports that some pro-American officials now are preparing to flee Laos.

End of Cuban Embargo Near

RATHER: Secretary of State KISSINGER said today that the Organization of American States has reached what he called, quote, "a general understanding that could mean the end of the economic boycott against Cuba." KISSINGER did not go into details.

Senator James BUCKLEY of New York declared he, quote, "would oppose any attempt by my government to restore formal diplomatic or economic relations with Castro's Cuba until Castro Cuba purges itself of the Soviet presence." End of quotation.

BUCKLEY and other conservatives have been warning Secretary KISSINGER and President FORD that continued talk about easing restrictions against Cuba could develop into a factor against the FORD administration for next year's elections.

Ex-CIA Agent Defends Agency

RATHER: David PHILLIPS, a veteran agent for the Central Intelligence Agency in Latin America, has resigned so he can defend the agency from what he thinks are unfair attacks. But about one accusation PHILLIPS declined to be totally reassuring, as Bernard KALB reports.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

BERNARD KALB: PHILLIPS described the agency's work as "damn effective" and defended it against various allegations, denying any U. S. involvement in the Chilean coup of 1973. But on charges that the CIA was involved in plots to assassinate Cuba's Fidel CASTRO, PHILLIPS could not make a categorical denial.

DAVID ATLEE PHILLIPS: I have never heard anyone in CIA planning an assassination. I've never seen a plan for assassination. I'm not aware it's ever happened.

However, there must be something there. There have been discussions, and now people that were much senior to me have said, yes, there was some sort of discussions. In recent times, I've learned more than I knew when I came back to this job two years ago. A great deal of it I got from the press. But I've also talked with all of my friends, and there's no question that in those traumatic times something took place which might have been termed "discussions." Whether they were plans or not, I don't know.

RATHER: PHILLIPS also said he is convinced that Cuba had no part in the assassination of President KENNEDY.

NBC SUNDAY NIGHT NEWS NBC TV 6:30 PM
MAY 11

Pre-empted by NHL Playoffs.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CURRENT NEWS

PART I - EARLY BIRD EDITION - 0730

PART II - MAIN EDITION - PUBLISHED AT 1130

THIS PUBLICATION IS PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL NEWS ITEMS OF INTEREST TO THEM IN THEIR OFFICIAL CAPACITIES. IT IS NOT INTENDED TO SUBSTITUTE FOR NEWSPAPERS, PERIODICALS AND BROADCASTS AS A MEANS OF KEEPING INFORMED ABOUT THE NATURE, MEANING AND IMPACT OF NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL NEWS DEVELOPMENTS. USE OF THESE ARTICLES HERE, OF COURSE, DOES NOT REFLECT OFFICIAL ENDORSEMENT. FURTHER REPRODUCTION FOR PRIVATE USE OR GAIN IS SUBJECT TO THE ORIGINAL COPYRIGHT RESTRICTIONS.

THURSDAY, MAY 8, 1975

NEW YORK TIMES 8 MAY 1975 Pg. 14

Ford Ends 'Vietnam Era' and Terminates G.I. Wartime Benefits

By JAMES M. NAUGHTON
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 7. — President Ford formally declared that today was the end of "the Vietnam era" in a proclamation ending wartime veterans benefits for new military recruits.

At the same time, the President sent to Congress legislation that would set June 30 as the final date on which an individual enlisting in the military could quality for educational benefits under the G.I. bill.

"America is no longer at war," Mr. Ford said in a statement issued at the White House. "The time has now come to terminate wartime benefits which apply to the new peacetime volunteers."

The Presidential proclamation, issued two years after the withdrawal of American combat forces from Vietnam and one week after the fall of Saigon, was a formality that terminated such benefits as burial allowances and death pensions for individuals enlisting in the armed services after today.

Mr. Ford said that the action

(See FORD, Pg. 2)

BALT SUN 8 MAY Pg.1

U.S. got back 108 Viet planes

By CHARLES W. CORDDRY
Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—The United States retrieved 108 South Vietnamese jet combat planes and helicopters from Thailand —practically all the valuable aircraft there—before it suspended removals at the Thai government's request, the Defense Department reported yesterday.

The Thai defense minister, Praman Adireksarn, said in Bangkok at the same time that American officials and the new Communist government in Saigon should negotiate over the ownership of the planes impounded in Thailand, so that "the owner can take them away."

The United States asserts title to the aircraft, in which South Vietnamese airmen and others fled to Thailand, and informed sources said evidence of ownership, under aid arrangements with the former Saigon government, is en route to the acting U.S. ambassador in Bangkok, Edward Masters.

The competing claims of the U.S. and the victorious Communists in Vietnam have left Thailand in the middle.

Joseph Laitin, Defense Department spokesman, said yesterday the only "high value' planes left in Thailand, after a weekend of retrievals, are six C-7 Caribous, relatively small transports suitable for operations in and out of rough, combat airfields.

Besides the C-7's, other sources said, there are 53 aircraft still impounded at Thailand's Utapao Air Base, all probably in poor condition. They include 11 A-1 attack

(See PLANES, Pg. 2)

NEW YORK TIMES 8 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

Pentagon Says 2 Dead Marines Were Left in Saigon by Mistake

By JOHN W. FINNEY
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 7—The bodies of two of the last marines killed in the Vietnam war were left behind in the confusion of the final American evacuation from Saigon, the Defense Department said today.

The department had announced last Thursday—and informed the parents of the two young marines—that the bodies had been flown to the carrier Midway for return to the United States.

A Pentagon spokesman said today, however, that after checking the Midway and other ships in the evacuation fleet it was concluded last night that the bodies had been left behind, probably in a hospital near Tan Son Nhut Airport.

The parents of Cpl. Charles McMahon Jr. of Iowa, who had been making plans for the burial of the two marines on the basis of earlier Pentagon assurances, were informed late last night that the bodies had not been recovered in the evacuation.

The two marines, part of the security guard at the defense attaché office in Saigon, were killed in a Communist rocket and artillery bombardment of the Tan Son Nhut airport on April 29, about 12 hours before the helicopter evacuation effort began. Their bodies were taken to the Seventh Day Adventist Hospital, which is near the airport.

Charles McMahon Sr., father of the marine corporal, told reporters in Woburn that a Marine Corps spokesman had informed him that his son's body "couldn't be evacuated" because it was "out of reach of the helicopters.' A different

(See MARINES, Pg. 2)

WASHINGTON POST
8 MAY 1975 Pg.4

Groups Press Hill to Scuttle Bomber Fleet

By Michael Getler
Washington Post Staff Writer

A coalition of organizations, many of which have frequently opposed specific Pentagon weapons projects in the past, yesterday announced a "national campaign" to persuade Congress to kill Air Force plans to build a $20 billion fleet of B-1 jet bombers.

More than 25 organizations have lent their support to this effort, including Americans for Democratic Action, Common Cause, the Federation of American Scientists, environmental groups, a variety of religious organizations, and a few labor organizations, including the International Longshoreman's and Warehousemen's Union of the AFL-CIO.

At a press conference yesterday, spokesmen for several of these groups fired a barrage of charges at the project, ranging from claims that it is militarily unnecessary and a waste of taxpayers' money to charges that the high altitude jet would break down the earth's protective layer of ozone and result in 40,000 more cases of skin cancer every year in this country alone.

The Pentagon and the Congress have heard all those

(See FLEET, Pg. 2)

GENERAL NEWS SUMMARY
FROM THE WALL STREET JOURNAL
MAY 8, 1975

World-Wide

THE VIETCONG asked for U.S. aid; communications with Saigon were restored. A South Vietnam Revolutionary Government delegate in Paris, Mrs. Pham Thi Minh, said the U.S. has a responsibility "to repair the damage it caused in Vietnam." Mrs. Minh and the new military governor of Saigon, Gen. Tran Van Tra, both said officials and soldiers of the former government were being treated with leniency, a statement corroborated by Western newsmen in their first reports from South Vietnam since it surrendered last week.

A UPI reporter who has been in Saigon since the Communist take-over said the city returned to normal within 48 hours and he hadn't heard any reports of reprisals. His report was transmitted via Hanoi.

Thousands of Communist troops entered

(See NEWS SUMMARY, Pg. 6)

JAMES KILLINGBECK, CHIEF, CURRENT NEWS BRANCH, OX 78765 HELEN YOUNG, ASSISTANT CHIEF.
FOR SPECIAL RESEARCH SERVICES OR DISTRIBUTION CALL HARRY ZUBKOFF, CHIEF, EXECUTIVE AGENCY SERVICE, OX 52884

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

BALTIMORE SUN

8 MAY 1975 Pg. 2

Marine dead left behind

Washington (Reuter)—The bodies of two marines were left behind in the last-minute confusion of the Vietnam evacuation, the Defense Department said yesterday.

Joseph Laitin, a department spokesman, said it had been believed the bodies of Cpl. Charles McMahon, Jr., of Woburn, Mass., and Lance Cpl. Darwin Judge, of Marshalltown, Iowa, the two marine guards killed by rocket fire at Saigon's Tan San Nhut Airport hours before the April 28 helicopter evacuation began, were taken to the aircraft carrier Midway, but a check of the Midway and other American ships has failed to turn up the bodies.

"We have come to the conclusion that there is every probability the bodies of the two marines are still at the Seventh Day Adventist Hospital in Saigon," where they were taken after the rocket attack, Mr. Laitin said.

The marines were the last two of more than 56,000 Americans killed in South Vietnam in more than a decade of conflict.

Mr Laitin said the State Department is doing everything possible to determine the whereabouts of the bodies and obtain their return.

American officials on the scene had thought the bodies had been evacuated by helicopter to the Midway, Mr. Laitin said.

MARINES -- CONTINUED

version was provided by a Pentagon spokesman.

As explained by Joseph Laitin, Assistant Secretary of Defense for public affairs, embassy officials and the marine contingent had called the hospital on the day of the evacuation and were told by hospital officials that the bodies had been removed by "American authorities," who were not identified.

At first, according to Mr. Laitin, it was assumed that the bodies had been flown out by aircraft to Thailand before the helicopter evacuation began. But later, he said, the Pentagon received a message from the American Embassy in Saigon stating it was understood that the bodies had been flown by helicopter to the carrier Midway.

A few days ago, Mr. Laitin said, the Midway, which had been ordered to make arrangements to have the bodies flown to the United States, advised the Pentagon, after a complete check of the ship, that the bodies were not aboard the carrier.

A search was then ordered of other ships in the evacuation fleet, all of which reported that they did not have the bodies, he added.

Mr. Laitin said the Defense Department concluded late yesterday that there was "every probability" that the bodies were still at the hospital in Saigon.

Mr. Laitin said the State Department was "doing everything possible" to determine where the bodies were and to arrange for their return to the United States.

The mix-up, as Pentagon officials privately acknowledged, was of particular embarrassment to the Marine Corps, which places emphasis upon the military tradition not to leave any dead or wounded behind.

The two marines were the last to be listed officially killed in the Vietnam war. Two other marines — first Lieut. Michael John Shea and Capt. William Craig Nystol — were listed as missing and presumed dead when their helicopter crashed at sea the next day during the evacuation effort.

The Defense Department reported, meanwhile, that on the basis of interviews with persons evacuated, the American Embassy in Manila had concluded that some 30 Americans and 25 persons of other nationalities had remained in Saigon, apparently of their own volition.

Marine's Father Bitter

WOBURN, Mass., May 7 (UPI)—"If they can evacuate 130,000 South Vietnamese refugees, why can't they get two dead marines out?" asked Charles McMahon Sr. as he bitterly read the last letter from his son once again.

FORD -- CONTINUED

would save $1.5-billion over the next five years without limiting the benefits due some 7 million Americans who served in uniform during the Vietnam war.

The action served, along with several other steps taken today by Mr. Ford, to underscore his statement at a news conference last night that the United States had learned "the lessons of the past in Vietnam" and should begin now to "look ahead."

The President also created a Cabinet committee to monitor increasingly large investments in the United States by foreign governments and corporations, including those in Arab oil producing nations.

National Arthritis Month

Without referring specifically to controversial investments made or planned by beneficiaries of the Arab oil embargo, which raised the international cost of fuel, Mr. Ford instructed the Departments of State, Defense, Commerce and the Treasury and White House economic aides to determine, among other matters, if foreign investments "might have major implications for United States national interests."

Two Administration officials testified coincidentally before the Senate Commerce Committee today that foreign investments posed no present risk and that restrictive legislation would not be in order. The officials were Jack F. Bennett, Under Secretary of the Treasury, and Thomas O. Enders, an Assistant Secretary of State.

The President also sent messages today to all Federal agencies encouraging bureaucrats to use "creative talents and skills" to generate ideas that might save money and energy for the government.

He proclaimed May to be National Arthritis month, announced his acceptance of an interview to take part Saturday in a celebrity golf tournament in nearly Locust Grove, Va., and in yet another signal of a post-Vietnam tempo, held an informal Cabinet meeting this evening aboard the White House yacht, Sequoia.

Opposition Possible

The Potomac River cruise was Mr. Ford's first on the Sequoia since he became President last August. Ron Nessen, the White House press secretary, said that the agenda included the status of energy legislation and the request for $507 million to resettle Vietnamese refugees, crime control proposals that Mr. Ford will send to Congress next month and the prospects for better relations with Democrats on Capitol Hill.

No Congressional action was required to terminate the wartime veterans benefits, but Mr. Ford's request for an end to the educational assistance available under the G.I. bill could face serious opposition.

Senator Vance Hartke, Democrat of Indiana, who is chairman of the Senate Veterans Affairs Committee, told reporters that it would "not only be shortsighted but would be contrary to the best interests of the nation" to cut off the educational benefits.

Mr. Ford contended that his request was in line with actions taken after World War II and the Korean War and that military pay scales established for the all-volunteer Army made enlistements attractive enough without continuing the G.I. benefits.

FLEET -- CONTINUED

charges before, and have offered counter arguments which thus far have kept the plane's development moving ahead to apoint where the first experimental version is already flying.

The Pentagon argues that even in the missile age, bombers are still necessary because they complicate an enemy's attack plan and are far more flexible than missiles because they can be launched and then recalled in the midst of a crisis.

The Air Force wants 244 B-1s to replace a portion of the aging B-52 bomber fleet in the 1980s.

Though Congress thus far has continued to approve money for development — some $2 billion has been spent thus far — there is mounting concern on Capitol Hill over the project's huge cost.

Each plane is now estimated to cost about $86 million — more than double the estimate of six years ago.

The key decision on whether to mass-produce the plane will be made in November, 1976. Congressional committees this week moved to keep the Pentagon from spending any money on production in advance of that decision.

If Congress preserves the B-1, said Jeremy Stone of the Federation of American Scientists, a private group of liberal-leaning scientists, "it will represent the bankruptcy of the Congress in dealing with defense programs."

Stone argues that since the United States has more than 1,600 nuclear tipped long-rang missiles in place on land and in submarines, the B-1 is simply too costly as a third nuclear deterrent. The B-52s will last through the 1980s, he argues, and a cheaper bomber could be built if one is needed.

PLANES (CONTINUED)

planes, designed 30 years ago; three C-119 transports of Korean war vintage; 16 C-47's of World War II design, and a number of small utility planes.

The aircraft removed, Mr. Laitin said, were 25 F-5 fighters, 27 A-37 attack planes, 48 helicopters and an 0-1 spotter plane—all carried away by the aircraft carrier Midway—and 8 C-130 transports flown out.

The U.S. thus removed 109 of 170 aircraft flown out by fleeing South Vietnamese. Informed sources said two trainer versions of the F-5 were also flown to Thailand's Korat Air Base for unknown purposes.

Mr. Laitin could not place a value on the aircraft retrieved, but military observers thought it would be more than a quarter of a billion dollars.

The 170 aircraft appear to be all that remains—outside South Vietnam itself—of the almost 1,900 aircraft the deposed regime had on hand at the start of the North Vietnamese offensive. Of that total, nearly half were helicopters.

Mr. Laitin said aircraft were loaded aboard the Midway before Bangkok "protested," but he did not know whether the ship sailed before or after the U.S. acceded to the Thai suspension request. "We have legal right to this equipment," he declared.

In Bangkok, Mr. Praman, deputy prime minister and defense minister, said both the United States and "Vietnam" claim the planes.

"Let them come here and hold negotiations with each other, then whoever is the owner can take them away," he said at a press conference reported here through government channels.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON POST
8 MAY 1975 Pg. 27

U.N. Requested To Protect Newsmen

Agence France-Presse

COPENHAGEN, May 7—The International Congress of Newspaper Editors today appealed to the United Nations to adopt a statute to protect journalists on dangerous assignments.

Delegates from 23 countries adopted a resolution saying: "The International Congress of editors in Copenhagen asks all signatory governments and international press organizations to unite their efforts to have the proposed statue for the protection of journalists on dangerous assignments debated as a matter of priority and adopted during the next U.N. session.

WASHINGTON POST
8 MAY 1975 Pg. C17

Safeguard Shipments To Cease

Special to The Washington Post

MADISON, Wis., May 7 — The U.S. Army is ending a controversial program of transferring missile parts by helicopter here, and opponents of the operation have dropped plans to file a lawsuit aimed at stopping the shipment.

The Army was using Traux Field in Maidson as a transfer point for missile components being shipped from an Army arsenal in Savanna, Ill., to a missile site in North Dakota. Critics of the shipments, including Madison Mayor Paul Soglin, charged that they included nuclear weapons and constituted a threat to the city's safety.

The Army refused to confirm or deny the involvement of nuclear materials in the flights, but it did say the missile components were for the Safeguard anti-ballistic missile system.

Shortly after the flights began in February, Soglin and Reps. Kastenmeier (D-Wis.) and Les Aspin (D-Wis.) protested the flights and asked that they be moved to less-populated areas.

A group of local citizens said they were going to file a suit in federal court this week seeking an injunction against the flights, claiming that the Army had failed to consult with local officials before beginning the operations and had failed to file an environmental impact statement on it.

The Army told Kastenmeier that the flights would end after two more in May and two in June. Robert Gruber, attorney for the local residents, said the Army's action satisfied the group's concern.

WASHINGTON POST
8 MAY 1975 Pg. G13

By Jack Anderson and Les Whitten

* * *

Another rip-off—Although the Pentagon insists its $104.6 billion budget is trimmed of all fat, the munitions makers still manage to squeeze extra lard out of their defense contracts.

This is the confidential finding, at least, of Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.), whose subcommittee has accused defense contractors of chiseling the taxpayers out of $100 million a year through a depreciation gimmick.

The subcommittee named four of the nation's most prestigious manufacturers—Lockheed, General Dynamics, United Technologies and General Electric—among the culprits.

The rip-off, according to the senator's "preliminary information," works this way:

The contractors "are fully reimbursed for...equipment used in the performance of defense contracts." They may collect a few dollars for special dies or millions for gigantic drydocks. The payments are then spread out over the life of the equipment.

One company, which depreciated its drydock over a 40-year period, collected $200,000 a year from the government. But another firm depreciated its dock over a 12-year span and collected a juicy $1.2 million a year.

By speeding up the depreciation, the companies wind up with more capital for investments. This brings them faster profits with less interest to pay.

Proxmire's study also charges that contractors "use the equipment for their commercial business after the government has paid for it." Some equipment purchased by the taxpayers, according to Proxmire, is never used for government work.

To plug the loopholes, the Cost Accounting Standards Board, after buckling to the Contractors on several points, set somewhat stricter depreciation standards effective in July. But now, defense contractors have sent their lobbyists swarming over Capitol Hill to soften these mile standards.

Footnote: General Electric, General Dynamics, United Technologies and Lockheed swiftly and stoutly denied Proxmire's charges. All four claimed they are in full compliance with federal standards.

* * *

WASHINGTON POST
8 MAY 1975 Pg. D3

• A Cypriot government spokesman said that two Turkish air force jets violated the island's air space for the second time in eight days and a protest would be lodged with the United Nations.

WASHINGTON POST - 8 MAY 1975 Pg. 2

Ford Pledges To 'Stand By' Allies of U.S.

By Carroll Kilpatrick
Washington Post Staff Writer

President Ford yesterday launched the first of a series of meetings he will have with world leaders to assure them that despite the failure in Vietnam America will honor its commitments.

In separate meetings yesterday, the President conferred with British Prime Minister Harold Wilson, Australian Prime Minister Gorgh Whitlam and New Zealand Prime Minister Wallace E. Rowling.

The President will meet today with Singapore's Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew. The four prime ministers are stopping here briefly following a Commonwealth conference in Jamaica.

Later in the month, the President will meet here with the shah of Iran and Prime Minister Johannes M. den Uyl of the Netherlands before flying to Europe for conferences involving several western European leaders.

In yesterday's meetings, the President assured his guests that "the Indochina setback has in no way weakened United States resolve to stand by its allies and friends in Asia and elsewhere," a White House spokesman said.

"The President also stressed the need, in the wake of Indochina, for continued close cooperation between the United States and its allies in Asia and the Pacific," the spokesman said.

It was emphasized that the United States has a treaty commitment, through the ANZUS (Australia, New Zealand alliance and North Atlantic Treaty Organization, to all the countries represented in yesterday's talks.

In addition, press secretary Ron Nessen stressed the treaty commitments the United States has to South Korea and to Taiwan.

In his news conference Tuesday evening, the President acknowledged that since the Vietnamese surrender he has received "reactions from foreign governments wondering what our position will be, asking where we will go and what our policy will be."

He said that it was his aim to "tie more closely together South Korea with the United States, to reaffirm our commitments to Taiwan, to work more closely with Indonesia with the Philippines and with other Pacific nations.

Nessen explained that the President wanted to reaffirm the defense arrangements with South Korea and Taiwan and "to convey to North Korea" American determination to keep its commitment in the Korean peninsula.

Nessen denied that the President's statement in the press conference suggested any shift in U.S. policy toward China or Taiwan. Declaring that there is "absolutely no change in policy" toward Peking, Nessen said the Mr. Ford looks forward to his scheduled trip to China later in the year as part of his effort to normalize relations.

In another post-Vietnam action, the President issued a proclamation canceling special Vietnam war benefits, such as burial allownace, death pensions and benefits for nonservice connected disability, for persons joining the armed forces after last midnight. Those in the service as of yesterday will not be affected.

The President also asked Congress to terminate Veterans' education benefits for those joining the service after July 1. But there were indications Congress would be slow to follow his advice.

"America is no longer at war," the President said. "But peacetime military volunteers have remained full eligible for all the wartime vertan benefits."

Cancellation of the two forms of benefits would save $1.5 billion over the next five years, the President said.

Last night, Mr. Ford held a Cabinet meeting aboard the Sequoia, the presidential yacht. It was the first time he has used the yacht.

NEW YORK TIMES
8 MAY 1975 Pg. 16

Senate Approves 2 Envoys

WASHINGTON, May 7 (Reuters)—The Senate today approved the nomination of Laurence H. Silberman, who has been Deputy Attorney General, or Ambassador to Yugoslavia. It also approved Charles S. Whitehouse, a career Foreign Service officer, as Ambassador to Thailand.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON POST - 8 MAY 1975 Pg. 6

26 S .Vietnamese Ships Bring 20,000 to Subic

From News Dispatches

SUBIC NAVY BASE, Philippines, May 7—A convoy of 26 South Vietnamese navy vessels carrying about 20,000 exhausted refugees arrived here today after a week-long voyage.

A U.S. Navy spokesman said the 20,000 persons, who boarded the vessels at Phu Quoc Island off the southern Vietnamese coast, may be the last of at least 70,000 evacuees lifted by sea and air from South Vietnam Tuesday and Wednesday of last week in an operation code-named "Frequent Wind" and backed by 46 vessels of the 7th Fleet.

Arrivals were transferred immediately to six civilian merchant ships chartered by the U.S. Military Sealift Command and sent to Guam, the Navy spokesman said. There they will be processed and continue to the continental United States.

A U.S. embassy spokesman said the vessels had technically become U.S. property as U.S. Navy officers boarded each ship before they entered Philippine waters and took title.

The move was apparently designed to meet a Philippine demand that no South Vietnamese government ships or personnel enter its territory. Saigon has demanded the return of ships and planes carrying evacuees from the country.

Eight C-141 transport jets took off from Subic today for Wake Island with 1,000 refugees, the Navy spokesman said.

The spokesman added that the Navy expects to complete the airlift to Wake and Guam within the next two or three days. A total of 34,000 refugees have been flown there since April 26, he said.

Some 20,000 refugees reaching Guam today were the first to arrive by ship and largest single daily influx.

Guam's governor placed the island under emergency status Tuesday to handle crowding of the 212-square-mile U.S. territory. Gov. Ricardo J. Bordallo's declaration gives him special powers to help the military care for the refugees. Schools are closed to free buses for the arrivals.

In other developments:

• A spokesman in Bonn said West Germany is ready in principle to take in refugees and has contacted the United States and the U.N. high commissioner for refugees.

• Graham Martin, the U.S. ambassador to South Vietnam as the evacuation was carried out, flew 130 miles north of Manila to the Philippine mountain resort of Baguio to "rest and do some work," a U.S. embassy spokesman said.

• A Canadian official in Hong Kong said his country had agreed to admit 1,000 refugees stranded in Bangkok, Singapore, Manila and Hong Kong.

• In Singapore, former South Vietnamese Information Minister Nguyen Ngoc Linh criticized the U.S. attitude toward some 7,000 refugees ordered to stay aboard 46 ships off that tiny nation.

"The U.S. has the distinct obligation to take care of the refugees from South Vietnam," Linh said. "Instead, the American embassy here completely ignored their written appeal for help."

NEW YORK TIMES
8 MAY 1975 Pg. 22

30,000 REFUGEES LEFT IN VIETNAM

AGANA, Guam, May 7 (AP)—An evacuation captain whose ship reached here after more than a week at sea says thousands of South Vietnamese "howling and crying, 'come back!'" were left behind on the beaches.

Capt. Arthur Boucher said that "at Phu Cuoc there were 30,000 to 50,000" would-be refugees left behind who pleaded to board his ship, the freighter American Challenger.

"There were people afloat in boats. They were scrambling to get on the ship," said Captain Boucher, who arrived yesterday with his ship, one of the last to leave South Vietnamese waters.

The American Challenger took on 9,000 refugees, about double her capacity. Later, nearly half were shifted to other vessels, Captain Boucher said.

Arriving here shortly after the Challenger was the freighter Pioneer Commander with about 5,400 Vietnamese refugees.

The Challenger left Vung Tau, 40 miles southeast of Saigon, shortly before the fall of Saigon. The Commander departed with its load of refugees April 23, a week before Saigon surrendered.

Many refugees were Roman Catholics, led by several Vietnamese priests who apparently brought along their entire congregations. One refugee carried a life-size statue of the Virgin Mary.

Both ships carried fishermen and their families, some of them carrying their belongings in fishing nets, who came barefooted in black pajama-like clothes.

The Pioneer also carried an élite group of passengers, headed by Tran Van Lam, a former president of the South Vietnamese Senate who signed the 1972 Paris agreement. Others included a former Foreign Minister, high police officials and the former director of Tan Son Nhut airport.

BALTIMORE SUN
8 MAY 1975 Pg. 7

Kissinger says he will not resign

Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—Henry A. Kissinger said in a television interview prepared for broadcast today that "it would not be a service to the country" for him to resign as Secretary of State.

Mr. Kissinger also said, in the interview with Barbara Walters on the NBC-TV Today program, that no purpose would be served by his giving up his second hat as national security adviser.

After 6½ years in Washington, he said, positions themselves do not "hold any particular attraction." Mr. Kissinger said he is concerned rather about the international repercussions of the United States losing a secretary of state after having already lost a president and vice president under pressure.

The secretary observed philosophically that it would have been better for him "selfishly" if he had resigned.

NEW YORK TIMES
8 MAY 1975 Pg. 17

Saigon Restores Its News Links

International communications with Saigon were reopened yesterday for the first time since the Communist take-over exactly one week earlier, and Western newsmen who had remained behind were able to file dispatches.

But, according to Reuters, the main post office from which the dispatches were sent was open for only a few hours. Newsmen were required to write only in English or French, Reuters said, and had to submit their dispatches in duplicate.

Whether there was any censorship was not clear.

According to Reuters, there were about 120 reporters from 13 countries in the South Vietnamese capital, and all were said to have been permitted to move about without hindrance during the last week but were not permitted to file until yesterday.

Press spokesmen of the Revolutionary Government reportedly made an appearance only in the last 48 hours, and reporters were told yesterday for the first time that they would be allowed to send out news. Technical reasons were cited to explain why there had been a news blackout for the last week.

But there had been some speculation in recent days that the victorious Communists did not want to let Western newsmen monopolize dispatches from Saigon immediately after the take-over and wanted to halt communications until Communist-bloc reporters could reach the city. Until yesterday, Communist broadcasts were the principal source of news about South Vietnamese developments since, shortly after the take-over.

American reporters in Saigon include representatives of The Associated Press and United Press International. Both agencies also had direct reports from Saigon yesterday, as did television and radio networks.

WASHINGTON POST
8 MAY 1975
Pg. D3

Argentine Navy Acts

BUENOS AIRES, May 7 (UPI)—An Argentine destroyer captured the Greek fishing vessel Atlantikos II as it made an unauthorized passage through a prohibited zone of the Argentine coast, the navy said today.

WASHINGTON POST
8 MAY 1975
Pg. D3

McGovern-Castro

HAVANA—Sen. George S. McGovern (D-S.D.) said he talked with Prime Minister Fidel Castro for an hour Tuesday night, when the Cuban leader came to a dinner given by Vice Premier Carlos Rafael Rodriguez.

McGovern said he and Castro agreed that "inevitably a change will come" in U.S.-Cuban relations. He added that Rodriguez told him there had been numerous assassination attempts against Castro and Cubans believe some were instigated by the CIA.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON POST - 8 MAY 1975 Pg. C12

U.S., Soviets Recess SALT for Month

GENEVA, May 7 (UPI) — The United States and Soviet Union recessed the new round of strategic arms limitation talks today for one month so negotiators could return to their capitals for fresh instructions.

The break was agreed to after negotiations on a new treaty to limit nuclear weapons ran into snags involving the definition of strategic delivery systems and verification issues.

American spokesmen said that "Given the complexity of the issues being dealt with, the U.S. delegation feels reasonably satisfied with the progress that has been achieved."

A joint communique after an 80 minute meeting said: "the delegations agreed to a brief working recess in the talks from May 8 to June 1, 1975, to permit members of the delegations to return to their capitals for consultations. The talks will resume in Geneva on Monday, June 2."

Diplomatic sources in Washington said that Secretary of State Henry Kissinger and Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko are expected to meet during the recess period to discuss SALT and other issues between the two countries.

Informed sources said problems arising in the talks were the main reason for a postponement in the summit visit to the United States by Soviet Communist Party General Secretary Leonid I. Brezhnev.

Brezhnev and President Ford had hoped to sign the projected treaty this summer but Brezhnev is now scheduled to go to America in autumn.

At their summit in Vladivostok last November, the two leaders directed the SALT negotiators to conclude a pact by the end of this year limiting each side to 2,400 strategic weapon delivery vehicles—missiles and bombers—1,320 of which may be missiles capped with multiple nuclear warheads.

But in trying to translate this basic directive into treaty language, chief U.S. negotiator U. Alexis Johnson and Vladimir S. Semenov of the Soviet Union were forced to take the recess.

One of the problems apparently concerns the new Soviet Bomber "Backfire-B."

The U.S. Defense Department said in a study that the bomber, if combined with a new aerial tanker aircraft, could reach targets throughout the United States.

Whether it is intended for such missions, however, depends on training patterns and tanker development, the study said.

The United States is understood to be demanding the inclusion of the Backfire B in the Soviet quota of 2,400 strategic delivery vehicles, while Moscow argues that the bomber is not a strategic weapon.

NEW YORK TIMES - 8 MAY 1975 Pg. 36

On U.S. Intelligence

By Hanson W. Baldwin

ROXBURY, Conn. — There is not much doubt that the K.G.B., the Soviet secret police, is gloating in Moscow.

In the last few months, exaggerated, inaccurate or irresponsible press accounts and self-serving politicians have greatly damaged United States intelligence organizations.

Some crippling restrictions already imposed are now being followed by extensive and numerous investigations into every facet of intelligence and counterintelligence, which may result in new and dangerous exposure of organizations, methods and personnel.

One of the most damaging and irresponsible leaks in United States intelligence history—the widely published accounts of the salvaging of the sunken Soviet submarine—already has occurred, with the media, in the name of freedom damaging the defense of freedom.

Nor is it encouraging that The New York Times allowed the columnist Jack Anderson to trigger its own actions. The consequent publication by The Times and all other media of a fantastic technological feat and an intelligence coup still incomplete could cause immense potential damage. One need only recall the broken codes of World War II, and, in recent history, the nasty surprises new Soviet weapons provided in Vietnam and in the 1973 Arab-Israeli war.

The current investigations, therefore —unless they are to be of great aid and comfort to those who would destroy the system of political freedom that makes such investigations possible—must concentrate on the constructive, not the destructive; on the future, not past.

They must avoid, at all costs, any more public exposure of secret intelligence methods, technology or personnel. No intelligence organization, even in a democracy, can be a completely open book if it is to be worth its cost.

But there are some key questions that require reassessment:

Are there, for instance, too many semi-independent intelligence agencies, each vying for power? Or does each have its important specialized role and does each act as check-rein on the others?

Should the director of Central Intelligence be given more power—to knock heads together, to merge, to allocate tasks? Or would this continue and expand an already dangerous centralization of power?

Intelligence and counterintelligence are twins. What, particularly, should be the relationships between the Central Intelligence Agency and Federal Bureau of Investigation, and who should do what in counterespionage and countersubversion?

It is easy to dismiss the Communist and radical and terrorist threats as bogeymen; yet the capability of Puerto Rican nationalists and radical Weathermen to bomb public places repeatedly without detection and the ability of so well-known a figure as Patty Hearst to remain hidden in an American underground speaks badly indeed for present and recent attempts of our intelligence services to combat espionage, subversion or even simple anarchy.

How does one define the thin line between freedom and license, security and repression, the "right to know" and irresponsibility? The political extremists and fanatics, in pursuit of revolution, believe that the ends literally justify any means.

United States intelligence agencies can never embrace such a concept, without ultimately aiding the hidden enemy. The adoption of such a policy —the ends justifying any means— would subvert our own institutions. Yet there is a nagging problem here; a threat exists and it cannot be met by mouthing shibboleths.

How should authority over our intelligence services at the top level be exercised? Intelligence is a tool of government; as such it can be turned by those who control it to good or evil purposes. Who should be the guardians of the good, who the monitors? The more people that get into the act the less secrecy. Congress is noted for its blabbermouth proclivities; if there is to be any secret intelligence it is clear that only a handful of Congressmen, picked for ability, judgment and discretion and devotion to the common good, can be kept fully informed.

Intelligence—facts, secrets, our own and the opposition's—means today and for the future, security—the difference between the life and death of a nation.

Granted the need, how then do you keep intelligence apolitical, freed from the ambivalent pressures of domestic politics, in a milieu such as Washington, which is highly partisan?

And, ultimately, the larger question —the unresolved residue of Watergate —how do you curb executive power without crippling it, and how do you operate a democratic government, or for that matter, any government, without secrecy?

Hanson W. Baldwin, now retired, was military affairs editor of The New York Times.

WASHINGTON POST - 8 MAY 1975 Pg. 14

Harriman Fears Detente Oversold

MOSCOW, May 7 (UPI)—W. Averell Harriman, wartime U.S. ambassador to the Soviet Union, said today that many Americans are cynical about detente because it has been oversold and they do not understand it.

"I'm very much opposed to using French words," Harriman told U.S. newsmen. "Most people think detente is something like rapproachment [reconciliation] or entente [understanding]. Dentente means a relaxation of tensions between nations and no one can be against that."

He said neither the Soviet Union nor the United States wants renewed warfare in the Middle East and predicted "we'll see a move to the Geneva conference before too long."

Harriman is President Ford's personal representative in the Soviet Union for the 30th anniversary of the end of World War II.

WASHINGTON POST
8 MAY 1975 Pg. 31

U.S. Citizens Urged To Depart Angola

LUANDA, Angola, April 7 (UPI)—The United States has joined several foreign consulates in advising its nationals to leave Angola until order is restored in the violence-wracked southwest African territory.

Five days of fierce gun battles between two rival black African parties last week left 500 dead and 700 wounded in Luanda, the capital of the oil-rich territory slated for independence from Portugal in November.

"Until the situation stabilizes, the consulate is advising that all dependents of American citizens leave," a U.S. official said.

The British and West German consulates have advised citizens of their countries to leave Angola, which is ruled by a coalition of three African parties assisted by the Portuguese.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEWS SUMMARY ... CONTINUED

Saigon with a massive display of firepower after its surrender, but many have since left the city, UPI said. Saigon was described as "in many ways still the wide-open city" it was during the war, with black markets still selling goods from American PXs and Communist troops among the buyers.

The bodies of two U.S. marines killed hours before the last Americans left South Vietnam apparently were left behind in a Saigon hospital, the Defense Department said. It blamed the confusion of the final evacuation and said the State Department was trying to arrange a return of the bodies.

Ford's request for money to pay for resettlement of 120,000 to 150,000 Indochina refugees was unanimously approved by a House subcommittee. The President has estimated that $507 million will be needed.

Ford assured the premiers of Britain, Australia and New Zealand at separate Washington meetings that the U.S. will honor its commitments around the world despite the collapse of its Vietnamese and Cambodian allies.

* * *

Ex-Cambodian President Lon Nol was paid $1 million by the government he headed to leave the country last month, Saukham Khoy, who succeeded Lon Nol as president, asserted. Lon Nol left Cambodia two weeks before its surrender April 17. It was hoped that his departure might induce the Khmer Rouge to negotiate. Lon Nol now is in Hawaii, and Saukham Khoy is at a refugee center in Camp Pendleton, Calif.

The Pathet Lao and their rightist partners in the Laotian coalition government agreed to end recent clashes between their military forces north of Vientiane.

* * *

Gulf Oil Corp. denied that $4 million in political contributions to a foreign nation involved Venezuela or Ecuador. In messages to the presidents of both nations, Gulf's chairman said it never bribed their officials to remain in business. Disclosure of the cash payments came in secret testimony by Gulf officials to the SEC.

* * *

American Ship Building Co. officials generally acted in good faith and on advice of counsel in a 1970-72 program of employe bonuses to cover political contributions, a special review panel told the SEC. But it said George Steinbrenner, chairman, should reimburse American Ship for $42,325 of bonuses used to cover gifts to Nixon's campaign, and he agreed to do so.

* * *

A $5 billion bill to provide state and local job-creating construction projects was approved by a House subcommittee and sent to the Public Works Committee, where action was expected today. The Senate has yet to act, and Congress would have to pass a separate appropriations bill, which could reduce the amount.

* * *

A bill to regulate strip mining received final congressional approval from the House. The margin was slightly more than two-thirds, but it wasn't clear whether the House would vote to override a possible veto. Ford rejected a similar measure late last year on the ground that it would have cut coal production.

* * *

Certain military benefits for new recruits will end today because "America is no longer at war" in Vietnam, the President said. His order affects some death and disability aid. Separately, he will ask Congress to end, effective July 1, the GI bill for education for peacetime volunteers.

* * *

Welfare rolls rose 1.3% in January, the largest monthly increase in more than three years. The government blamed rising unemployment. But initial claims for regular state unemployment benefits fell in the week ended April 26 to the lowest level since last November, the Labor Department said.

* * *

Guidelines for union organizing of employes of nonprofit private hospitals and nursing homes were issued by the National Labor Relations Board. The rules indicate that collective-bargaining units should cover large groups, which would make organizing more difficult.

* * *

Two West German ships trapped in the Suez Canal since the 1967 Arab-Israeli war were freed and steamed into Port Said, Egypt, under their own power. Thirteen remaining merchant ships also will be freed before the canal formally reopens June 5.

* * *

Mayor Richard Hatcher of Gary, Ind. won renomination with about 56% of the vote in the Democratic primary, practically assuring him of reelection to a third term in November. Inner-city precincts gave him a nearly four-to-one margin over his rival, black challenger.

* * *

Tornado-damaged Omaha was declared a disaster area by President Ford, making it eligible for federal assistance. Nebraska Gov. James Exon estimated damage at more than $500 million. The dozen tornadoes that hit eastern Nebraska Tuesday night killed three persons and injured 130.

* * *

Lt. Gen. Louis H. Wilson Jr. was confirmed in a Senate voice vote for a four-year term as Marine Corps commandant.

WASHINGTON POST
8 MAY 1975
Pg. 27

S. Korea's Park Expresses Faith In U.S. Backing

SEOUL, May 7 (AP) — Prdsident Chung Hee Park today expressed confidence in the American defense committment to South Korea — his first such statement since the fall of Phnom Penh and Saigon.

"We all know our ally the United States has repeatedly renewed its determination to stick to its defense commitments to Korea. I do not see any reason why we should doubt the ally's defense commitments," Park told a joint meeting of government and ruling party leaders called to discuss the impact of the Indochina Developments.

President Ford recently reaffirmed U.S. commitments to Korea.

WASHINGTON POST
8 MAY 1975

• The Tunisian foreign ministry announced that Soviet Prime Minister Alexei Kosygin will visit Tunisia May 15-17.

CHICAGO TRIBUNE
8 MAY 1975 Pg. 12

Red force overruns Lao town

From Tribune Wire Services

PRO-COMMUNIST Pathet Lao troops overran a government town 75 miles north of the Laotian capital Tuesday and were immediately ordered by the coalition government to pull back.

The Pathet Lao troops, driving tanks and equipped with artillery, took the government town of Muong Kassy after 30 minutes of fighting, military sources said Wednesday.

The sources said the battle for the town was the latest in a series of clashes along Highway 13.

COMMUNIST AND royalist members of the coalition government signed a cease-fire memorandum ordering both sides to stop fighting. A government inspection team was sent to Muong Kassy to issue the orders on the spot.

Premier Souvanna Phouma had already ordered both sides to halt all fighting.

Despite the upsurge in violence, Souvanna said he does not believe North Viet Nam will pose a threat to Laos for another five years.

"IT WILL TAKE A few years or at least five years for both Viet Nams to attain the reunification and during that period there will be no threat to Laos from North Viet Nam," the premier said.

Meanwhile, an unknown assailant on a motorcycle threw a hand grenade into a car carrying former national assembly deputy Prince Boun Omna Champassak. The prince and two others were killed and three persons in the car seriously injured.

Elsewhere, a Pentagon spokesman said the United States removed more than 100 jet fighters, light bombers and helicopters from Thailand before suspending the operation at the request of the Thai government.

IN LONDON, a Viet Cong official said the U. S. has the responsibility of helping repair the war damage in South Viet Nam.

Mrs. Thi Binh, a member of the Provisional Revolutionary Government's delegation, said: "We welcome most favorably all help as long as no conditions are attached to it."

"We have in fact said that it is the responsibility of America to help repair the damage they caused in Viet Nam," she said. Binh spoke to reporters on her arrival for talks with British Foreign Office officials about possible recognition by London of the new Saigon regime.

WASHINGTON POST
8 MAY 1975 Pg. 15

2 Marines' Bodies Left In Vietnam

United Press International

The bodies of the last two U.S. Marines killed in Vietnam were left behind in the confused final day of the American evacuation from Saigon, the Pentagon said yesterday.

"Different people thought others had taken care of the matter," said Pentagon spokesman Joseph Laitin. "It was certainly not that the effort had not been made."

Left behind were the bodies of Cpl. Charles McMahon Jr. and Lance Cpl. Darwin L. Judge, killed April 28 while they stood guard duty at Tansonnhut airport near Saigon just before the final evacuation of Americans and South Vietnamese.

"The State Department is doing everything possible to arrange their return," Laitin said.

Two other Americans died later in Vietnam when their helicopter crashed during the evacuation.

Laitin said last Thursday the field reports indicated the bodies had been taken to the carrier Midway. But when the Navy Department contacted the Midway to make funeral arrangements, the ship reported it didn't have the bodies.

All the other ships in the task force were checked and the bodies were not found, Laitin said. He said both families were notified Monday after it was learned the bodies were not on any evacuation ships.

After the Marines were killed, their bodies were taken to the Seventh Day Adventist hospital not far from the airport, Laitin told reporters yesterday.

"There is every probability" that the bodies are still at the hospital, he said.

Laitin said Marines and embassy officials in Saigon called the hospital in the confusing final hours to arrange removal of the bodies and were told that U.S. officials had already removed them.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON POST 8 MAY 1975, Pg 17

Moscow Fears for Detente

Victor Zorza

The Kremlin's greatest concern about the fall of South Vietnam is that it may turn the United States away from detente. While the Soviet press refrains from exploiting Washington's discomfiture over Vietnam, it is stressing the need for the continuation of detente. To stop now would endanger what has already been achieved, says Izvestia, quoting a recent speech by Brezhnev. Detente, he insisted, was a process that required "constant movement forward."

The reason for the Kremlin's concern is to be found in the need, as it is perceived in Washington, to assert the continuing world role of the United States. President Ford has made the point by stressing the military might of the United States when he commissioned the new aircraft carrier Nimitz. For Defense Secretary James Schlesinger, "this is a time, once again, for America to choose" whether to maintain its military strength.

For Moscow, this means that the United States may well insist on building up its military strength—a trend about which Soviet analysts have been showing increasing concern lately. The signs from Congress already suggest that the cuts in military appropriations are not going to be as large as they were expected to be. The suspension of the SALT negotiations in Geneva, while both delegations return home for consulations, is due partly to the hardening of the U.S. attitude. The U.S. has demanded certain changes in the terms of the accord as worked out in Vladivostok, and this in turn has caused the Soviet Union to ask for compensatory changes.

Washington made it clear to Moscow quite early in the year that failure to make sufficiently rapid progress in Geneva would lead to a postponement of Brezhnev's July summit visit to the United States until September. This gave Washington a strong card, because Brezhnev's political calendar, leading up to the 25th Party Congress next February with a series of major foreign policy successes, required a SALT agreement and a summit in early summer.

But now the card has been played, the summit has been postponed, and other delays in Brezhnev's calendar are also becoming apparent. Moscow wanted a European Communist Conference to precede the 35 nation East-West summit meeting in Helsinki. The first conference was to show how Brezhnev had managed to re-establish the Kremlin's hold over European Communist parties. The second meeting was to crown his effort, pursued so doggedly since 1966, to hold a European Security Conference. But now the Communist meeting has been postponed till after the Security Conference, which is itself in danger of delay because of continuing failure to resolve some of the remaining differences.

One reason for the various delays is that Brezhnev is perceived to be "a man in a hurry," with a deadline to meet, and is therefore being asked to make concessions. But if his own calendar really requires a series of foreign policy successes to culminate in his triumphal retirement at the Party Conference, and if these can be obtained only in exchange for concessions, Brezhnev is laying himself open to the same criticism that was directed at President Nixon in his last months in office.

Those Soviet leaders who do not like some aspects of his foreign policy are now in a position to argue that Brezhnev is pursuing personal rather than national interests. They would object that to make the concessions now being demanded of Brezhnev would leave them, after his retirement, to pay the real price for his present "triumphs."

When Brezhnev says, and Izvestia repeats, that detente requires constant progress, that to stop now would endanger past achievements, he may be speaking not only to the West but also to those who are dragging their feet in Moscow. He may be warning them that the national mood in the United States does not favor such progress, and that detente itself is therefore in danger.

The Soviet press repeatedly rejects the argument of Western critics of detente who claim that it has been of more benefit to the Soviet Union than to the West. At the same time, however, this is the very argument that is being used in the internal Soviet debate over detente. At one time, Soviet supporters of increased trade with the West painted the benefits to be derived from it in such glowing colors as to imply that it was worth making the concessions the West demanded, because the Soviet Union stood to gain so much. Now it is the disruption of the West's alliances that is presented as a major Soviet gain from detente.

"The whole point is," says Izvestia in another article, "that the further things progress, the more difficult it is to persuade NATO member countries to bring further sacrifices to the NATO altar." Britain, Holland, Belgium, and Denmark have "already" announced cuts in military spending. West Europe is increasingly unwilling to depend on the "dangerous zigzags" of a strategy laid down by the Pentagon. NATO is "powerless to eliminate discord" even among such formerly reliable members as Turkey and Greece. The NATO meeting at the end of this month—which is to be attended by President Ford—will have to acknowledge, Izvestia concludes, that it is "increasingly impossible to keep the Atlantic team in harness and under control."

No doubt there are many other, less controversial, benefits of detente, but Izvestia has blurted out one advantage that is more important to the Soviet Union than anything it could gain from the U.S. withdrawal from Indochina. The Soviet Union can hardly be blamed if this is one result of detente, and for wanting to preserve both detente and its result at a time of misgivings about past foreign policies occasioned in the U.S. by the fall of South Vietnam. But the unity of the West is not incompatible with detente—provided the will is there, and the political leadership to make that will effective.

1975, Victor Zorza

NEW YORK TIMES 8 MAY 1975

Leftovers of War

In the final disengagement from South Vietnam and Cambodia, billions of dollars in American-built air, ground and sea facilities and equipment were abandoned by our former allies and captured by their enemies. There was no scorched-earth policy in the last days of the war to exacerbate the bitterness and terror of the departure. The booty of war exceeds by far what was captured from the French in the last shootout at Dienbienphu.

Although the material wealth in arms and facilities left in Southeast Asia is beyond rescue (apart from the planes recovered in Thailand), there are still burdens that remains within American control. One such problem is the disposition of 2.3 million gallons of Orange herbicide, the deadly chemical that defoliated forests and destroyed ricefields and remains a risk to life.

The Air Force has stored these drums of Orange on Johnston Island, an American military base between Hawaii and the Pacific Trust Territory, and also in Gulfport, Miss. Its plan to incinerate the herbicide "downwind" of Micronesia has encountered protests from scientists, environmentalists and representatives of people of the trust area. The Air Force maintains that incineration aboard a specially equipped ship in the Pacific Ocean would have no human danger or environmental impact; the Trust Territory's Environmental Protection Board does not want to subject its people or environment to possible hazards.

A longer and costlier alternative is to try to reprocess the pesticide by destroying its harmful compounds. As a result of protests, the Air Force is now looking into this possibility. This would reconvert the Orange into accepted commercial form as a pesticide registered by the Environmental Protection Agency. It is a lesser evil. Against the background of death and destruction and disengagement from war, it would be ironic if another Pacific people were subjected to dangers long after the fall of Saigon.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR 8 MAY 1975

Soviet admiral tells where his fleet is headed

Red Star Rising at Sea, by Admiral of the Fleet Sergei G. Gorshkov. Annapolis: Naval Institute Press. Illustrated. $15.

By Burke Wilkinson

This extraordinarily important and interesting book consists of 11 essays on the Russian Navy from its origins under Peter the Great to the present. The essays first appeared in Morskoi Sbornik, the leading professional naval journal of the Soviet Union. Excellently translated by Theodore Neely, they are, each in turn, analyzed and put in context by leading American fleet officers.

The reasons that Admiral Gorshkov's writings are so important are several. He is his country's foremost naval strategist and writer on sea power — a latter-day Admiral Mahan. He is also the creator and the commander-in-chief of the Soviet Navy, and has held his six-star post for nearly 20 years.

Books

Gorshkov's backward look at naval history makes one clear point that he hammers home: "All of the modern great powers are maritime states." From this flows the inevitable conclusion: to support insurgencies, to expand her own territory and ultimately to dominate the world, the USSR must have a Navy second to none.

Thanks to Gorshkov's persuasive eloquence and driving energy, the Soviets are well on their way to doing so. The Soviets now possess the largest surface fleet in the world and the largest number of nuclear-propelled submarines. Their ocean research and shipbuilding programs are first-class. With good seaborne logistics, the Soviet fleets are able to operate in every ocean in the world and indeed are doing so. Recent maneuvers, deploying over 220 ships, were the most elaborate and far-flung they have ever undertaken.

The running comment by some of the brightest U.S. naval officers is terse and shipshape throughout. Admiral James Calvert wryly compares Gorshkov's version of the influence of sea power to "an unbiased history of the War Between the States from the Southern point of view" and Admiral Joseph Wylie also refers to the "rather myopic and selective" use of history. Admiral Arleigh Burke advances the interesting view that Gorshkov's essays might be plea as well as policy, for he could be experiencing "some difficulty in obtaining approval of the Soviet hierarchy for the building, support and operation of the Navy he envisages."

Even if Gorshkov's creation has so far fallen short of his dream, we must recognize that it is an awesome one, and presented with absolute clarity. As Admiral Elmo Zumwalt points out, "Gorshkov's writings do not force us to do much reading between the lines." Party line and all, they give us invaluable glimpses into an adversary mind, glimpses that are like searchlights in the fog of hearsay and hope through which the U.S. mostly regards the Russians.

In Gorshkov's own words: "The flag of the Soviet Navy flies over the oceans of the world. Sooner or later the United States will have to understand it no longer has mastery of the seas."

Admiral Gorshkov's book deals mainly with the sweep of naval history and the broad lines of strategy. For those who want chapter and verse the revised edition of Norman Polmar's "Soviet Naval Power" (National Strategy Information Center, $5.95) complements it very well. Polmar, who is an editor of "Jane's Fighting Ships," reinforces his own brisk narrative of the Soviet Union's rise to sea power with appendices giving the dimensions and characteristics of her warships today. A useful chapter called "Alarmist versus Realist" discusses some of the limitations that the structure and geography of the U.S.S.R. impose.

Commander Wilkinson, USNR, served two tours of naval duty [1941-46 and 1950-52].

DAY LD A032

BY JAMES DOYLE

CAMP PENDLETON, CALIF. (UPI) -- LON NOL, CLINGING TO THE PRESIDENCY OF CAMBODIA WITH HIS MIND IMPAIRED BY A STROKE, WAS PAID A $1 MILLION BRIBE TO RESIGN IN A LAST FUTILE ATTEMPT BY FELLOW LEADERS TO ORGANIZE AN EFFECTIVE RESISTANCE TO THE KHMER ROUGE REBELS, ACCORDING TO NOL'S SUCCESSOR.

"WE PAID THE PRICE TO HAVE LON NOL LEAVE AND THE COUNTRY FELL ANYWAY," MOURNED SAUKHAM KHOY, LAST PRESIDENT OF NON-COMMUNIST CAMBODIA.

LON NOL RESIGNED TWO WEEKS BEFORE THE COMMUNISTS OCCUPIED PHNOM PENH APRIL 17 AND FLED WITH HIS FAMILY TO HAWAII, WHERE HE BOUGHT A $100,000 HOME. HE IS PROTECTED THERE BY THE U.S. SECRET SERVICE.

U.S. OFFICIALS SAID LON NOL DID NOT WANT TO COMMENT ON THE BRIBERY REPORT.

SAUKHAM KHOY, TALKING WITH REPORTERS OUTSIDE HIS QUONSET HUT AT THE REFUGEE CAMP HERE WEDNESDAY, SAID NOL HAD A STRONG GRASP ON CIVIL AND MILITARY POWER IN CAMBODIA BUT WAS "NOT ABLE TO RULE" EFFECTIVELY AS THE COMMUNISTS CLOSED IN, BECAUSE OF IMPAIRMENTS FROM A STROKE SUFFERED IN 1971.

"IT WAS DIFFICULT TO DO ANYTHING WITH HIM THERE," SAID SAUKHAM KHOY, 60, WHO BECAME ACTING PRESIDENT WHEN LON NOL FLED.

FORMER CAMBODIAN MINISTER OF CULTURE LONG BOTTA SAID LON NOL'S BRAIN WAS "NOT SO WELL BECAUSE OF THE STROKE."

"IF WE DIDN'T GIVE HIM ENOUGH MONEY HE WOULDN'T LEAVE THE COUNTRY," SAUKHAM KHOY SAID THROUGH AN INTERPRETER, HIS SON VANRUOEN, AN AGRICULTURAL ENGINEER. OTHERS IN THE GOVERNMENT DECIDED THE ONLY HOPE TO SAVE THE COUNTRY WAS TO PAY LON NOL ENOUGH TO GET OUT, HE SAID.

ASKED WHETHER HE REGARDED THE PAYMENT AS A BRIBE, SAUKHAM KHOY REPLIED "YES." HE DID NOT SPECIFY THE SOURCE OF THE FUNDS, OTHER THAN TO SAY THE CAMBODIAN GOVERNMENT MADE THE PAYMENT.

"WE THOUGHT WE HAD ENOUGH TIME TO STRENGTHEN THE (ANTI-COMMUNIST) OPPOSITION TO FIGHT AFTER HIS DEPARTURE," LONG BOTTA SAID. "WE DIDN'T KNOW THAT WE HAD NO TIME AND THAT THE GOVERNMENT WOULD FALL."

ALTHOUGH SAUKHAM KHOY SAID HE STILL BELIEVES THE PAYOFF WAS "A WISE DECISION" AT THE TIME, LONG BOTTA SAID HE REGRETTED IT WAS SO MUCH.

"I WOULD HAVE JUST GIVEN HIM A QUARTER OF A MILLION," THE FORMER CULTURE MINISTER SAID.

SAUKHAM KHOY SAID THAT ALTHOUGH THERE WERE RUMORS LON NOL ESCAPED WITH A TREASURE IN GOLD, HE AND OTHER FORMER CAMBODIAN OFFICIALS AT THE REFUGEE CAMP HERE HAVE NO SUCH FORTUNES.

"IF WE WERE RICH," HE SAID, "WE WOULD NOT LIVE IN THIS CAMP. WE WOULD GO LIVE IN A HOTEL OR MOTEL OR WE WOULD BUY SOME HOUSES."

UPI 05-08 03:05 AED

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CURRENT NEWS

PART II - MAIN EDITION - 1130

THIS SUPPLEMENTS PART I-EARLY BIRD EDITION

THIS PUBLICATION IS PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL NEWS ITEMS OF INTEREST TO THEM IN THEIR OFFICIAL CAPACITIES. IT IS NOT INTENDED TO SUBSTITUTE FOR NEWSPAPERS, PERIODICALS AND BROADCASTS AS A MEANS OF KEEPING INFORMED ABOUT THE NATURE, MEANING AND IMPACT OF NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL NEWS DEVELOPMENTS. USE OF THESE ARTICLES HERE, OF COURSE, DOES NOT REFLECT OFFICIAL ENDORSEMENT. FURTHER REPRODUCTION FOR PRIVATE USE OR GAIN IS SUBJECT TO THE ORIGINAL COPYRIGHT RESTRICTIONS.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 7, 1975

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER 7 May 1975 Pg. 3

U. S. Halts Plane Pullout

From Inquirer Wire Services

BANGKOK, Thailand — The United States agreed yesterday to suspend its pullout of aircraft flown to Thailand by fleeing South Vietnamese, but the halt came after the most valuable planes had already been moved to a U. S. carrier at sea.

The planes are claimed by the United States and by the new Communist government of South Vietnam.

Thailand, eager to avoid offending the Communists in Indochina and unsure of the reliability of U. S. support in the wake of South Vietnam's fall, is caught in the middle.

North Vietnam denounced Thailand for acting "in complicity with the looters and said: "Washington has blatantly pillaged the South Vietnamese people's properties."

The most valuable and formidable of 125 American warplanes, which are claimed by the new Saigon government as spoils of war, were already aboard the U. S. carrier Midway in the Gulf of Thailand by the time Foreign Minister Chatichai Choonhavan announced the aggreement.

The Thai cabinet had earlier in the day decided to hold on to the aircraft.

Pentagon sources said the Midway had left after loading 27 A-37 light bombers and most, if not all, of 25 F-5 fighters that South Vietnamese air force pilots flew to the U. S. base at Utapao, Thailand, last week.

The A-37s and the F-5s are the most important of 122 aircraft that North Vietnam and the new Communist government in Saigon have demanded be returned. The rest are mostly utility planes, light observation craft and older transports.

So far nothing has been said about 48 helicopters that sources said were loaded on the Midway in recent days off Sattahip, a port in South Tailand. These helicopters also were flown to Tailand, mostly by South Vietnamese. They may include some choppers used by Cambodians to escape from their country before it fell.

It appeared that the Pentagon's official acknowledgment Monday of the movement of the planes out of Thailand might have put the Thai government in a position where it had no choice but to insist that the shipment be stop-

PULLOUT...Pg. 2

PHILADELPHIA INQ.
7 May 1975 Pg. 24D

War Foes Focus on Bomber

By SAUL FRIEDMAN
Inquirer Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — Leading doves and political reformers are turning their attention from Watergate and the Vietnam war to a major new target—the B-1 bomber.

After two months of quiet planning, representatives of more than a dozen labor, religious and citizens organizations are scheduled today to begin a national lobbying campaign to shoot the bomber program down.

The administration had asked for nearly $1 billion next year for continued work on the huge weapons program.

The House Armed Services has approved the entire amount; the Senate Armed Services Committee cut it by $222 million yesterday, and the anti-bomber lobby is mobilizing an effort to cut it even more or kill it when it comes to a vote in both houses within a few weeks.

Broad Coalition

But the coming congressional confrontation will be more than a battle over a new Pentagon weapons system.

The Air Force, which has spent more than $2 billion in

BOMBER...Pg. 2

NEW YORK TIMES
7 May 1975 Pg. 1

HOUSE UNIT VOTES ARMS FUND SLASH

By JOHN W. FINNEY
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 6—The House Armed Services Committee cut 7 per cent today from the Pentagon's weapons procurement and research programs in approving a $26.5-billion military authorization bill for the fiscal year 1976 beginning July 1.

The normally pro-Pentagon House committee cut far more deeply into the defense programs than has been its practice in recent years, obviously hoping to ward off greater reductions by a House that has changed with an influx of young, liberal Democrats.

"We can read the election returns," explained Representative Samuel S. Stratton of upstate New York, a senior Democrat on the committee. "We know that we face a hostile House and decided that it was better to make reductions in the committee rather than have meat-ax cuts made on the House floor."

Whether the new House, where sentiments on defense issues have never been clearly tested, will be content with the reductions made by the committee was still unclear to senior members of the committee as well as to Pentagon officials, who are unusually worried this year about the fate of the defense budget in Congress.

A group of six junior members of the House committee, all of whom voted against the bill today, is prepared to offer on the House floor a "counter-budget" calling for a 14 per cent reduction.

Representative Bob Carr, Democrat of Michigan, a member of the group, acknowledged in ARMS FUND...Pg. 3

NEW YORK TIMES
7 May 1975 Pg. 1

FORD ASKS NATION TO OPEN ITS DOORS TO THE REFUGEES

By DAVID BINDER
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 6—President Ford, described today as "damned mad" about widespread opposition to resettlement of 130,000 Vietnamese and Cambodians in this country, appealed tonight to the nation to "welcome these people."

"I am primarily very upset because the United States has had a long tradition of opening

Transcript of news conference is printed on Page 5-F its doors to immigrants of all countries," he said at his evening news conference.

"We're a country built by immigrants from all areas of the world, and we've always been a very humanitarian nation, and when I read or heard the comments made a few days ago I was disappointed and very upset," he said.

His remark about the opposition to refugee resettlement was reported by Republican congressional leaders and administration officials who attended a White House meeting on the refugee issue with the President this morning.

"It just burns me up, these great humanitarians," the President was quoted further by Senator Hugh Scott, the Senate minority leader from Pennsylvania. "They just want to turn their backs. We didn't do it to the Hungarians, we didn't do it to the Cubans and, damn it, we're not going to do it now."

Mr. Ford was referring to

FORD...Pg. 2

JAMES KILLINGBECK, CHIEF, CURRENT NEWS BRANCH, OX 78765 HELEN YOUNG, ASSISTANT CHIEF

FOR SPECIAL RESEARCH SERVICES OR DISTRIBUTION CALL HARRY ZUBKOFF, CHIEF, EXECUTIVE AGENCY SERVICE, OX 52884

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK NEWS 7 May 1975 Pg. 27

Sees No Danger in Viet Planes

Air Force Secretary John L. McLucas said here yesterday that the hundreds of U.S. military planes left to the Communists in South Vietnam will pose no danger to other Asian countries because many were in need of repairs and there is a lack of spare parts for them. He spoke to reporters before addressing the Wings Club at a luncheon.

FORD..

Continued

the resettlement of 40,000 Hungarian and 675,000 Cuban refugees in this country since 1956, after the Hungarian revolt and the take-over of Cuba by Fidel Castro.

But as the President spoke, antagonism to the Vietnamese refugee relief program spread in the House and the Senate and mail to the White House and Congress was predominantly against assistance for the Vietnamese.

White House spokesman reported that 2,809 messages contained in telegrams and letters opposed aid, while 2,451 were for it.

Speaking to reporters this morning, Senator Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, the assistant majority leader, predicted that President Ford's request yesterday for $507-million for refugee transport and resettlement would be cut.

"There is no political support for it in this country," he said.

Senator Byrd said he thought the Administration ought to see to it that "undesirables" be screened out of the resettlement process, naming "barmaids, prostitutes and criminals" as excludable categories.

In a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing with Secretary of State Kissinger, Senator Joseph Biden, Democrat of Delaware, charged that the Administration had not informed Congress adequately about the number of refugees to be brought here.

At a news conference, L. Dean Brown, director of the Interagency Task Force on Refugees, disclosed that Florida Congressmen, led by Representative Robert L. R. Sikes, a Democrat, had compelled the Administration to trim the size of its refugees reception center at Eglin Air Force Base from a capacity of 20,000 to one of 2,500.

"They let us know they didn't want very many," said Mr. Brown.

Democratic members of the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration, including the chairman, Representative Joshua Eilberg of Philadelphia, told Mr. Brown yesterday that Congress would not give the full amount of aid sought by President Ford.

The Administration is also contending with coldness in the international community toward its appeal for assistance in resettling the refugees.

Mr. Borwn said repeatedly at the news conference that he was "disappointed" with the response of countries counted as friends of the United States.

He cited Australia as an example saying, "They are taking less than a hundred."

Mr. Brown also spoke sardonically of the United Nations High Commission on Refugees, to which the United States made an appeal for Vietnam refugee assistance two weeks ago.

"They put out a communiqué today finally and got some people on Guam," he said. "They sent two people to Guam."

However, there were also some positive signs for the Administration on the refugee problem.

Senators Jacob K. Javits, the New York Republican, and Claiborne Pell, the Rhode Island Democrat, submitted a bill in the Senate to authorize "such sums as may be necessary" to pay for transport, resettlement, education and vocational training of Vietnamese and Cambodian refugees.

Senator Javits told a reporter that he expected the bill to be ready for a vote in the Senate early next week.

"Of course I am worried about the House," he added.

Foreign Relations Committee staff aides said Senators Biden and Dick Clark, Democrat of Iowa, were expected to reject the Administration refugee assistance request.

Organized labor was also urged to support the Administration's refugee assistance program in a statement issued by the executive council of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations and backed by its president, George Meany.

The statement accused legislators opposed to the refugees of "meanness of spirit," adding, "It is a meanness in which the American labor movement will not participate."

"Yes, we have 9 per cent unemployment," Mr. Meany said at a news conference, but adding, "If this great country can't absorb another 30,000 to 40,000 and find them jobs, we're denying our own heritage. The group is a drop in the bucket.

Asked whether the American businessmen, contract employes and newsmen evacuated by United States military forces from Vietnam would be billed, Mr. Brown said the Defense Department intended to obtain reimbursement. Not all of the passengers in these categories could be identified, he added.

BALTIMORE SUN 7 May 1975 Pg. 2

McGovern visits Cuban showcases

Havana (AP)—Senator George McGovern (D., S.D.) spent yesterday visiting showcases of Cuba's educational and mental health programs, then plunged into "substantive talks" on United States-Cuban relations in a late night meeting.

Senator McGovern conferred with Carlos Rafael Rodriguez, deputy prime minister for foreign affairs and a key man in Cuba's international economic affairs. Senator McGovern said his meeting with Mr. Rodriguez should be a prelude to an anticipated private talk with Prime Minister Fidel Castro.

BOMBER...Continued

developing the plane, hopes that the B-1 will be the first of a new generation of big bombers and that it will restore manned aircraft — like the B-52 — as a top strategic weapon in the age of the nuclear missile.

On the other side, the new anti-bomber coalition includes groups active in Watergate, environmental battles and the anti-war movement, testing their political strength in a new campaign.

Furthermore, leaders of the coalition decided as a matter of strategy to attack the $95-billion defense budget requested by the administration by focusing on a single weapons system—the B-1.

They hope that their battle against the B-1 becomes as effective as the one several years ago which turned public opinion away from the anti-ballistic missile (ABM).

UAW Secedes

Among the organizations sponsoring the campaign against the B-1 are Comon Cause; the liberal Americans for Democratic Action; the conservative National Taxpayers Union; Environmental Action; the Federation of American Scientists, Clergy and Laity Concerned; and the American Friends Service Committee.

But this time the United Auto Workrs (UAW) has refused to join the coalition and is lobbying hard for the B-1 program, a union spokesman said, "because we believe it vital for the national security."

The spokesman denied that the UAW position had anything to do with the jobs at stake. However, many congressional offices have recieved appeals from UAW Region 6, on the West Coast, which have included material printed by Rockwell International, the prime contractor for the B-1.

The UAW-Rockwell appeals contend that the B-1 program, if it is approved by Congress, will support at least 192,000 jobs, more than half of them in California.

PULLOUT... Continued

ped.

Some Pentagon sources implied that the Thais might have been willing to allow the planes to go, even while voicing public protests for the benefit of the North Vietnamese and the new leadership in Saigon.

The United States contended that military aid laws gave it title to the planes, which carried about 3,700 South Vietnamese refugees to Thailand.

Meanwhile, in New York, Secretary of the Air Force John L. McLucas said the hundreds of U.S.-supplied aircraft left to the Communists as they took over South Vietnam would not pose a threat to other Southeast Asian nations.

McLucas told reporters before a luncheon meeting that the planes left in South Vietnam were "ineffectual at this stage and will be worse in six months."

He noted that many of the aircraft needed repairs before the government forces fled and that they lacked spare parts. It is generally regarded, he added, that a plane would have to be "cannibalized if it is left for six months in order to make it operative again."

The UAW support for the B-1 is an indication of the difficulties that peace and reform groups face in their transition to a campaign against defense spending.

The recession has made many members of Congress leery about ending a defense program and putting more men and women out of work.

The anti-bomber forces argue, however, that the B-1 program, if it is allowed to grow to the dimensions that the Air Sorce wants, will encourage wasteful spending and inflation and thus "deepen the economic crisis."

The B-1 fleet, including the 244 planes that the Air Force seeks, plus crews, tankers, weapons and other equipment aboard the bombers, would end up costing about $75 billion over a 10-year period, according to congressional estimates, or about half the cost of the Vietnam war. The planes alone would cost at least $20 billion.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

ARMS FUND... Cont'd

an interview that the proposed cut was "probably too ambitious" to beaccepted by the House. But the purpose of the proposed reduction, he explained, will be "to stimulate" a floor debate on the nation's global military role in the post-Vietnam period.

"It is apparent," he said, "that we cannot make any real savings in the defense budget until we have a re-examination of our military role in the world."

The authorization measure, passed 32 to 6 today by the committee, sets a spending ceiling. The appropriation of the funds will be in a separate bill.

The Administration's principal justification for the $94-billion total defense budget proposed for the coming fiscal year is that it is necessary to continue a 25-year-old policy of maintaining a military balance around the world.

Following the American withdrawal from Vietnam, there is a reluctance among some Congressional liberals to make deep cuts in the defense budget or to propose withdrawal of troops from abroad that could be interpreted as a weakening of the nation's global military posture.

Reassessment Is Aim

At the same time, some junior members of the committee, such as Representative Les Aspin, Democrat of Wisconsin, believe that certain weapons programs should be challenged and that the groundwork should be laid for a reassessment of th defense budget in feuture years.

According to Mr. Aspin's calculations, the committee bill would add $1.2-billion to the over-all budget approved al last week by the House in setting a ceiling of $70-billion on the deficit in the coming fiscal year. This fiscal consideration, in Mr. Aspin's opinion, may aid liberals in making further cuts on the floor, since both conservatives and liberals will be faced with a decision on whether they want to add to the deficit or to make reductions in nondefense programs to stay within the deficit d ceiling.

Mr. Aspin contended that some of the reductions made by the committee, which said it had cut $3.7-billion out of a pentagon request of $29.8-billion, were "phony." In particular, he pointed to a committee reduction of $1-billion in the Navy's shipbuilding program that he contended was just a deferral of payments that would have to be made in future years.

In its reductions, the committee included elimination of $1.3-billion that the Administration had asked for military aid to South Vietman—a request that became moot with the downfall of the American-supported Government in Saigon.

In its legislation, the committee authorizes weapons procurement and research and development programs, which represent about one-fourth of the total defense budget. The administration had requested $28.5-billion for weapons procurement and research, an amount the committee reduced to $26.5-billion.

Within the House committee, the junior members scored at least a partial victory in knocking out three of the six controversial and expansive early warning planes, known as AWACS, that the Aif Force wants to build.

The Senate Arm ed Services Committee, which is still working on the authorization bill, boted 8 to 7 today to eliminate $222-million in advance production funds that the Air Force had requested for its B-I strategic bomber program. The committee approved about $600-million to continue development of the supersonic bomber, designed as a successor to the B-52.

WASHINGTON STAR 6 May 1975 (7) Pg.12

Struggle For Power In Asia?

From News Services

Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew of Singapore says that a rapid American military withdrawal from Asia could lead to a power struggle there between China and Russia.

"If this withdrawal takes place precipitately," Lee told the Commonwealth summit conference in Kingston, Jamaica, "it could give the Soviet Union a chance to move into areas China considers vital and so force China's hand."

On the next to last day of the 34-nation meeting, Lee offered his assessment of the Asian scene in the aftermath of the Indochina war.

LEE SAID it will take up to 18 months before the world will know "how swiftly China, Vietnam and the Soviet Union have moved to consolidate their respective positions to increase their own influence and diminish that of the other."

He described conditions that could cause problems for Thailand, Malaysia, Singapore, the Philippines and Indonesia, already troubled by Communist insurgents, but said they should do nothing to offend Peking.

Thailand must "make a U-turn" from its alliance with the United States, he said, and reach an accommodation with h China to prevent future power struggles. Lee said China is "the more benign of the Communist powers" and has no territorial ambitions on Thailand.

Lee's comments came as the United States and Thailand announced a 28 percent reduction in U.S. troops over the next two months in an effort to phase out the American military presence in that country.

IN CAMBODIA, a possible scenario for a Sino-Soviet power struggle could be shaping up.

According to U.S. intelligence reports, Soviet officials are furious that the new Communist government in Phnom Penh unceremoniously deported seven Russian diplomats along with other foreigners.

The reports said the "humiliating" expulsion of the Soviet officials was a calculated move by the Cambodian Communist Central Committee, not the whim of lower-echelon officials.

The Soviet Union had recognized the American-supported Lon Nol regime until its fall was certain, eventhough the Khmer Rouge insurgents were fighting President Lon Nol's troops with Russian as well as Chinese weapons.

"ONE OF THE reasons the Russians are so angry," said a U.S. Defense Department official, "is the fact that the Chinese are using Pochetong Airport (near Phnom Penh) at will. The Russians are not allowed to use the airport and neither are the French.

NEW YORK NEWS
7 May 1975 Pg.36

Keep Troops Out: Khmer

Bangkok, Thailand, May 6 (AP)—The Khmer Rouge radio in Phnom Penh said today that Cambodia would respect the national and territorial integrity of neighboring states but would not allow any foreign troops on its soil.

The broadcast said Cambodia would continue to seek good relations with countries of Asia, Africa, North America and South America. It did not mention establishment of diplomatic ties or requests for foreign aid.

It was not known whether the reference to "foreign troops" included the North Vietnamese, who have had units in eastern Cambodia since the early 1960s.

WASHINGTON STAR
6 May 1975 (7) P.12

Anderson To Leave Marine Post

By Vernon A. Guidry Jr.
Washington Star Staff Writer

The exodus of Marine Corps generals that traditionally follows the appointment of a new commandant has begun with internal notice from the "No. 2 Marine," Gen. Earl E. Anderson, that he is retiring.

Anderson, assistant commandant of the Marine Corps since 1972, was a top contender for the commandant's job. But Lt. Gen. Louis H. Wilson, commander of Fleet Marine Force Pacific, has been nominated by the White House to replace Gen. Robert E. Cushman Jr. as commandant for the next four years.

Cushman was also said to have begun the retirement process. The commandant, sources said at the time, recommended Anderson as his successor but Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger and Navy officials sent Wilson's name to the White House.

The appointment of a new commandant is usually followed by the resignation of high-ranking officers in what one Marine Corps observer has termed the Corps' "Rite of Purification."

The most widely cited exodus occurred in 1960 when Gen. David M. Shoup, then a junior two-star general, was named commandant. A number of Marine three-star generals promptly retired. Wilson is a senior three-star general.

A question of economics complicates the picture this time around for those who would, as one officer put it, "read the tea leaves" to determine who backed Anderson over Wilson.

Those officers who have not initiated the retirement process well before October will lose substantial retirement benefits due to changes in the way retirement pay is computed.

Anderson and Cushman are scheduled to retire July 1. Wilson is scheduled to appear before Congress today to begin the confirmation process.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK NEWS 7 May 1975 Pg. 6

We're Not Favoring Arabs, Henry Insists

Washington, May 6 (AP)—The United States definitely is not tilting toward the Arabs and there is an even-handedness in its treatment of Israel and the Arabs, Secretary of State Kissinger said today.

"The United States is attempting to achieve a just and durable peace in the Middle East," Kissinger told reporters after briefing the Senate Foreign Relations Committee for three hours.

Asked About Sale

"We are definitely not tilting toward the Arabs." Kissinger responded to a reporter's question. "It (the U.S.) is attempting to achieve peace according to its best judgment and in close cooperation with all parties."

Kissinger's comments came after he was asked about the sale of Hawk antimissile systems to Jordan.

Kissinger said the U.S. had sent military shipments to Israel during the past month "in fairly large quantities," and added that Jordan will not get delivery on the Hawk missiles for about a year or perhaps longer. Kissinger said the Hawk sale had been in negotiation for more than a year and just happened to be consumated at this time.

Earlier, U.S. officials, requesting anonymity, said Kissinger had given Jordan's a "verbal commitment" to help in its air defense while he was on a negotiating trip to the area more than a year ago. These officials said King Hussein completed details for delivery for "a small number of Hawks" and other equipment while on a private visit here last week.

Meetings Needed

Kissinger told reporters that President Ford wants to talk to President Nnwar Sadat of Egypt and Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin of Israel before making any final decision on what role the United States will play in the Middle East in the future.

The secretary said his primary purpose in meeting with the committee was to seek congressional advice before a new U.S.-Middle East policy is formulated. He said he will follow the same procedure before the final decision on new U.S. policy in Asia.

WASHINGTON POST 7 May 1975 Pg. 44

Salyut Said to Fail Once More

By Thomas O'Toole
Washington Post Staff Writer

The Soviet Union appears to have abandoned its orbiting Salyut space station, which would be the fourth straight time the Soviets have launched one of their $500 million space laboratories without revisiting it.

Western space observers say that Salyut 4 appears to be drifting aimlessly in orbit, each day slipping a little more off course for Soviet cosmonauts to reach it. The 20-ton space laboratory was put into space late last year and visited only once, by the cosmonauts of Soyuz 17 last January.

Another sign that the Soviets have given up plans to revisit the Salyut space station is the departure of the Soviet tracking ships from their normal stations in the Gulf of Newfoundland and the Gulf of Guinea. The tracking ship Komarov has returned to its Black Sea port of Odessa and the Korolev to its port in the Baltic Sea.

In another development, the Soviet tracking vessel Gagarin left port in Cuba and steamed to 4 position in the Atlantic just north of Puerto Rico. This strongly suggests the Soviets will attempt a deep space flight to Venus, since the "window" for a Soviet flight to Venus opens up in the second week of June.

Soviet tracking ships position themselves near Puerto Rico to help relay radio signals to unmanned spacecraft that have left the Soviet Union and have been put into "parking" orbit around the earth before leaving for Mars or Venus. Presumably, the Gagarin put to sea a month ahead of time for practice sessions with ground controllers in the Soviet Union.

"There's a good chance that this time the Soviets will attempt to put a spacecraft into orbit around Venus," suggested Charles Sheldon, Soviet space expert of the Library of Congress. "It's just possible we'll see two Soviet flights to Venus next month, one an orbiter mission and the other a lander."

Sheldon pointed out that the Soviets did not launch a spacecraft toward Venus the last time earth was close enough to attempt a flight to the planet. Such opportunities occur every two years.

"The last time the Soviets skipped a window was to Mars more than two years ago," Sheldon said. "It turns out they skipped the window while they were upgrading their launch vehicles, sp they could be getting ready to carry a lot more weight to Venus with the bigger launch vehicle."

WASHINGTON POST 7 May 1975 Pg. 1

CIA Probers Keep Secrets From Staff

By George Lardner Jr.
Washington Post Staff Writer

The Senate Committee on Intelligence Operations has decided to keep secrets even from its own investigators.

In a stringent display of security precautions, the committee has adopted a "need-to-know" rule similar to that employed by the Central Intelligence Agency, whose operations are under investigation.

In addition, the committee, headed by Sen. Frank Church (D-Idaho), has decided to make secret automatically any documents or records that its staff receives, even if unclassified to begin with.

This practice would prohibit the committee staff from making public even the news stories they clip unless authorized to do so by a majority vote of the 10-member committee.

"The reason for this is the committee wants to retain control over the information to be released," Church declared in an interview. "It's not for the purpose of preventing publication, but to retain control."

Making public unclassified documents turned over by either the administration or by other sources, Church also maintained, might not give "the true picture" of the issues involved.

"The committee wants to keep things in context," he said.

Under the separate "need-to-know" rule, Senate committee staff lawyers and investigators assigned to dig into a particular aspect of the CIA's operations — or of any other intelligence agency under investigation — will be kept in the dark about other secret activities of the same agency.

They will be brought up to date about operations outside their limited spheres of investigation only if their superiors decide they need to know about them in carrying out their own inquiries.

Church has repeatedly promised as open and as public an investigation as possible without jeopardizing national security. He has also said on several occasions that the committee insists there be "no strings attached" to any of the documents it gets and is reserving the right to make them public eventually.

The committee's intentions, however, are apparently much more modest. Church acknowledged that White House aides expressed concern over the "no strings attached" pronouncements at a recent meeting. They were assured that senatorial restraint would be exercised in handling sensitive information.

"I explained to them that the committee reserved the right to decide, buy that before any information was made public, we would confer with them and secure from them a statement of their own position," Church said. He said he also explained that the committee does not intend at this point to make "raw documents" public.

"That seemed to satisfy them," he said.

The Senate inquiry, and a parallel but still-to-be started House investigation, were prompted by allegations and disclosures of illegal or improper domestic spying operations by the CIA.

The Senate committee's rules were held back from reporters for more than a month on the grounds that they were still being refined. They were finally adopted April 9, but first became available to the press only about three weeks after that.

Under the rules, all senators on the committee are to have access to all of its records, but even they may examine "sensitive or classified documents . . . only at secure reading facilities." Of the approximately 50-member staff, only staff director William G. Miller, chief counsel Fritz Schwarz and minority counsel Curtis R. Smothers are automatically entitled to all classified infomation that may be developed.

Sen. Church said it has also been agreed, at least in principle, that some top secret disclosures may be limited to him and to Sen. John G. Tower (R-Tex.), the ranking minority member, if their colleagues agree. "That has not arisen yet," Church said.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

EDITORIALS

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
7 MAY 1975

Mideast: back to basics

What ever happened to United Nations Resolutions 242 and 338 on the Middle East? Is it not time they again were brought back into play?

These, it should be recalled, were accepted by both the Arab states and Israel as providing the basis for negotiations to end their bitter conflict. After the October war in 1973 they became the terms of reference for convening the Geneva conference. Then, as Secretary of State Kissinger launched his step-by-step shuttle diplomacy to avoid the pitfalls of a conference no one wanted, less and less was heard about the resolutions.

Again there is talk of Geneva. But all parties, including the Russians, are gingerly dancing around the issue, obviously reluctant to return there without the groundwork laid first. President Ford, when he meets with the Egyptian and Israeli leaders next month, will probably explore whether a step-by-step approach can be resumed.

Whatever the outcome of those meetings, however, it seems clear there will have to be a link with Geneva to break the present deadlock — and the Security Council resolutions provide that link. A public reaffirmation of them — by the United States, the Soviet Union, the Arab states, and Israel — should form the framework within which negotiations, in whatever cast, are revived.

Taken together, they provide the elements of a final peace accord. Resolution 242, among other things, calls for Israel's withdrawal from territories it occupied in the 1967 conflict and the Arabs' acknowledgement of Israel's territorial integrity and the right to live "within secure and recognized boundaries." Resolution 338, sponsored by the Americans and Russians after the 1973 war, calls for implementation of 242 and for negotiations between the parties to achieve a peace settlement.

Semantically, the problem has always revolved around the diplomatically phrased term "withdrawal from territories." The Arabs say this means from "all" land seized by war. The Israelis argue that the phrase does not endorse or preclude the pre-1967 boundary and that its right to a "secure" frontier is recognized. Surely there is room for compromise here. Neither the U.S. nor the more moderate Arab leaders have ruled out minor territorial changes in the pre-1967 line to accord with the resolution.

In any event, the objectives of a final settlement ought to be restated to clear the air of apprehensions on both sides. Israel must withdraw from Arab lands and the Arabs, including the Palestinians, must recognize Israel's right to exist. That has to be the final goal; without it there can be no negotiation and the alternative will be war. If all sides say where they are headed, this should make the path of negotiation easier.

Meanwhile, it is plain that American pressures on Israel continue to grow. Mr. Ford's strategy to meet first with President Sadat is not lost in Jerusalem. Nor is Washington's decision to hold back deliveries to Israel of Lance missiles and other sophisticated equipment while agreeing to provide Jordan with modern Hawk missiles.

What the much-touted "reappraisal" of U.S. policy in the Mideast adds up to has yet to be disclosed. But there grows a determination in the White House to avert another Mideast war at all costs, to get a final peace settlement — and to do this even at the risk of domestic political consequences. Whether Washington is "tilting" toward the Arabs or toward Israel is not the relevant issue. It is tilting toward peace — and the survival of Israel.

Hence the importance of using every mechanism possible, including the UN resolutions, to keep sights focused on that overriding goal.

BALTIMORE SUN - 7 MAY 1975

Thailand's Post-Vietnam Dilemma

After the fiasco in Vietnam, the United States will have to be exceedingly discreet in its relations with friendly Asian governments. Under no circumstances should this country force an ally unwillingly to adopt hostile positions toward a Communist neighbor it has reason to fear. To do so would be to incur certain obligations (we shy away from the word "commitments") to protect the ally from adverse consequences that might ensue. Given the mood of the American people and the disillusionment that has swept through non-Communist Asia, such obligations would be lacking in credibility. Whatever the future U.S. course will be in Asia, especially if vital sea lanes are threatened, this is hardly the time to invite adventures that we or our allies or our adversaries might come to regret.

The need for U.S. circumspection is evident within the Bangkok government, which was sorely embarrassed when Thieu regime pilots escaping capture by the Communists flew 125 warplanes to U.S. bases in Thailand. The United States immediately claimed these planes, holding that Washington retained permanent title to them under terms of military aid agreements negotiated with the former authorities in Saigon. But the new revolutionary government of South Vietnam demanded the "return" of the aircraft, holding that they were the property of the Vietnamese people. In these circumstances, the Bangkok government characteristically tried to bend with the wind. First, it said it was up to the United States to decide what to do with the planes, then ordered a halt to their removal after Liberation Radio in Saigon pointedly said "it is time for Thailand to reconcile its policy toward Vietnam or Vietnam will reciprocate accordingly."

We would guess that when this matter is finally resolved the United States will retain possession of most or all of the planes, especially sophisticated A-37 light bombers and F-5 fighters. It is hard to conceive after all the humiliations of recent weeks that Washington would permit the Vietnamese Communists to augment the $5 billion military arsenal they captured with the collapse of Thieu regime forces. But in denying the enemy this war booty, the United States should try as best it can to reduce the awkwardness for Thailand. This may be accomplished by a gesture of accommodation or an effort to negotiate or even by preemptive action that will permit Bangkok to mute Communist anger by blaming the Americans.

Whatever the outcome, relations between Thailand and the United States are not going to be easy in coming months. Even before the Thieu regime fell, the government of Prime Minister Kukrit Pramoj demanded the removal of the 23,000 U.S. troops and 345 U.S. planes in Thailand by next March, and the first phases of the withdrawal already are in the works. Whether the pullout will be total remains to be seen, but it is obvious on all sides that the U.S. bases in Thailand were there to wage war in Vietnam and Cambodia, not to put down indigenous insurgency. Now that the wars in Vietnam and Cambodia are over, it will be in the best interests of Bangkok and Washington to reduce the U.S. presence to the point where it no longer can be exploited by Communists, within or without the country.

NEW YORK NEWS - 7 MAY 1975

THERE ARE CHILLING SIGNS

—that the new Communist regime in Cambodia, less than three weeks in power, has begun a bloody reign of terror.

Robert Anderson, spokesman for our State Department, reported on Monday that word has filtered through of one incident in which 80 former government Army officers and their wives were executed.

Anderson said that the U.S. also has "reliable information" about Red orders to liquidate all "top political and military leaders" who had opposed them.

Even more ominous than Anderson's words is the silence of the several hundred foreigners —eight of them trained newsmen—who were trucked out of Cambodia several days ago. They have refused to talk about what they saw in Phnom Penh and en route to safety for fear of jeopardizing the safety of 250 other non-Cambodians awaiting repatriation.

It is becoming clear, however, that the Communists forcibly drove all residents of the capital and other major cities out of their homes and into the countryside. Their purpose in uprooting the populace in such savage, ruthless fashion can well be imagined.

The brutal outrages occurring in Cambodia are, we suspect, relatively mild in comparison with the slaughter that may take place in South Vietnam once the Communists have fully digested their conquest—and gotten rid of prying outsiders.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON POST - 7 MAY 1975

Mr. Ford and the Mideast

IN DECIDING TO MEET with the leaders of Egypt and Israel next month, President Ford has done a good bit more than make a politically inspired move to distinguish his own foreign-policy profile from that of his harried Secretary of State. He has ensured that the United States will be actively engaged in a new effort to bring about a Mideast settlement. The President prudently refused at his press conference to make too much of his forthcoming meetings with President Sadat of Egypt and Prime Minister Rabin of Israel. But Mr. Ford would hardly choose to identify himself with this kind of difficult diplomatic project, at this pre-election time, if he were not prepared to push it through.

Though the administration says it has not completed its "reassessment" of Mideast policy, some aspects of it are evident. By announcing the review against a backdrop of complaints of Israeli inflexibility, by suspending consideration of Israel's new arms requests (while proceeding with a new missile defense system for Jordan), by treading water on Israel's large aid requests, and by a general manipulation of atmospherics, the administration has conveyed its conviction that Israeli policy must be a little more forthcoming. The altogether serious American rationale is that, by softening its position, Israel will be better able to get into a continuing diplomatic process with the Arabs, to its own large and later advantage. No one doubts, however, that a continuation of such American pressure will produce a raw collision between the administration on one side and Israel and its American supporters on the other.

Some cynics will argue, to be sure, that a public spat with Israel is merely a charade meant to distract the Arabs and buy time: time to normalize the status quo by reopening the Suez Canal, to work on alternate energy supplies, and so on. We trust this is not the case. A spat with Israel is not necessarily a bad thing but it must be a spat with a legitimate purpose. The only legitimate purpose we can imagine is to facilitate a settlement, not to circumvent one. The relevent question is, in our view, is the administration going about this in the right way?

The answer isn't yet clear. Dr. Kissinger, even while presiding over a pressure campaign against Israel, declares that the United States hopes for "new decisions" from "all of the parties," not just Israel. This would be a sensible approach. Israel was ready to give the particular slice of territory the Egyptians wanted in the last, failed negotiation—but only for a price in terms of permanent peaceful coexistence that Egypt is not yet ready to pay while large parts of its own and other Arab territory remain under Israeli occupation. We would hope that both countries would be ready to adjust their positions. This would seem to offer President Ford the best hope of actually helping the diplomatic process he is about to personally join. One further way to open up the potential for diplomatic maneuver would be to bring the Syrians more actively into the next round.

There is, however, a more basic consideration. Americans, Israelis and Egyptians all agree that the convening of the Geneva conference under joint Soviet and American auspices should not and does not preclude further step-by-step diplomacy managed by Americans alone. For the step-by-step effort to have a better prospect, however, the parties must have a clearer idea at least in principle of what final goal they are stepping toward. Otherwise, the parties may continue to fear they are stepping toward an abyss, as Israel felt in the last go-around; or they may fear that they are surrendering concessions prematurely, as Egypt felt.

The answer, as we see it, comes in two parts. One part is for the Israelis to say that they are negotiating for real and enduring peace, which means to them not only clear acceptance of their right to exist as a Jewish state but a new, open and constructive relationship with their neighbors. And the other part is for the Arabs to say that they are negotiating for the return of their territory, all of it, plus self-determination for the Palestinians within some newly established state, presumably on the West Bank of the Jordan River and in Gaza. The purpose of negotiation would then become to reach agreement on the terms and the timetable by which each of the parties proceeds to satisfy the other's final goals. If this is the general direction in which President Ford is now taking American policy, then all of the parties most directly concerned should support that effort and all of us should wish him well.

NEW YORK TIMES - 7 MAY 1975

Philippine Suppression

Of all the Asian strongman rulers with whom the United States has found itself strategically engaged, the Philippines' President Marcos is emerging as one of the most cynically skillful in defusing potential domestic opposition to his authoritarian rule.

For two months now a strange and obscure process of military justice has been played out against former Senator Benigno Aquino, leader of the opposition Liberal Party, an eloquent 42-year-old populist who was the favorite to defeat Mr. Marcos for the Presidency in 1973—if free elections had been held as scheduled. Instead Mr. Aquino was arrested within hours after President Marcos declared martial law in 1972, and he has been held in a military prison ever since.

Worn down by fruitless legal maneuverings against the regime, Senator Aquino seems to have given up his fight. Last Friday, after nearly a month of a self-imposed hunger strike, he received the last rites of the Roman Catholic Church and told his friends and supporters: "There comes a time in a man's life when he must prefer a meaningful death to a meaningless life."

President Marcos has so far been deaf to pleas for Senator Aquino's release and, if necessary, exile. The United States Government has made it clear that the Senator and his family would be welcome to this country if he were to be permitted to leave on his own.

Following the collapse of the American position in Indochina, President Marcos has been quick to raise public questions about the value of his alliance with the United States. The question could well be asked in reverse: Are America's long-term strategic interests really best served by placing military reliance in regimes which can overcome opposition only by brutally supressing it?

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER - 7 MAY 1975

Ford plea for refugees is in the American tradition

President Ford has asked Congress for $507 million to finance the evacuation and resettlement of refugees who fled the Communist takeovers of South Vietnam and Cambodia. The bill, referred to the House Judiciary Committee, does not contain the authorization for the use of American troops which resulted in a House rejection of his earlier request last week.

It is, thus, a "clean" bill to handle a dirty situation, and Congress should act promptly to provide.

That doesn't mean that Congress shouldn't ask questions or require some kind of screening program for the refugees. In the chaos of the evacuation, many deserving Vietnamese were left behind while others managed to buy their way out of the country — sometimes by paying off Americans.

There is no reason why, as a number of congressmen declared at a Judiciary subcommittee hearing on the subject, the refugees who can afford to pay their own way shouldn't be required to do so. Nor is there any reason why, as Rep. William Cohen of Maine said, American companies shouldn't reimburse the Defense Department for expenses of evacuating their American and Vietnamese personnel.

Still, it is disturbing to note the intensity of some of the opposition to the refugees. "In my opinion," declared Rep. Elizabeth Holzman of New York, "persons engaged in stealing American funds, who operated tiger cages and assassinated people, are undesirable." Well, one can hardly argue with that, but that is not the immediate issue.

The U. S. Government now estimates that about 140,000 refugees will seek asylum in this country. If their ranks include some few corrupt generals and avaricious businessmen who did well financially out of America's misguided attempt to do good, the vast majority of refugees are people who invested their lives in a cause, a lost cause, that they believed in and that the American government supported.

Most of them are decent people, as deserving of our aid and compassion as the Cubans who fled Castro in the Sixties and the Hungarians who fled Russian tanks in the Fifties, and to whom America opened its doors.

Yet the issue is not what kind of people they are but what kind of people we are. Like President Ford, we cannot believe that Americans will turn their backs on their own tradition of giving asylum to political refugees.

NEW YORK TIMES - 7 MAY 1975

Denying the Heritage

President Ford is right to be angry at the querulous and uncharitable responses of too many Americans t[illegible]he plight of the Vietnamese refugees. His request fo[illegible] million to assist the resettlement of approximately 150,000 Vietnamese over the next two years is a reasonable and honorable response to a tragic human situation. The United States can do nothing less.

Those citizens who are unemployed or who are financially pinched by inflation and high taxes have understandable fears that the nation is taking on yet another burden while their problems remain unsolved. But those fears are based on a misconception of the facts.

About 60 per cent of the refugees are children, while many others are elderly persons too old to enter the job market. Thus, only 30,000 of the Vietnamese refugees are heads of households and likely to seek work. Of these, many are doctors, lawyers and businessmen who can readily find places for themselves in American life and contribute needed skills.

* * *

What is harder than the fears of the unemployed to explain and justify is the antagonism of many members of Congress, including well-known liberals, and other leaders of opinion throughout the country. Several liberal members of the House of Representatives seem not to be aware that the war in Vietnam is over.

No nation is eager to welcome criminals, prostitutes, war profiteers, or practitioners of political torture. But it grossly distorts the whole nature of the refugee problem to focus on the tiny minority of persons who might deserve one or another of those terms of opprobrium, or to exaggerate their number. There is no possible way to make a just determination about the political or moral character of individual refugees.

If some Vietnamese engaged in dirty work, they usually had American advisers or were financed by American money. In some respects it was a dirty war. But now that it has all ended badly, it would be the ultimate disgrace for Americans to turn their backs and adopt a holier-than-thou attitude toward those Vietnamese who aligned themselves with the American war effort in their country.

It is likewise blatantly contradictory to play upon fears that the Vietnamese may take away jobs or end up on welfare rolls and at the same time argue that many of them are too rich to deserve help.

* * *

Most of these refugees have lost all of their worldly possessions. Many are separated from loved ones. All have lost their country, a lasting sorrow that perhaps only other migrants and exiles can fully comprehend. They deserve to be cherished as fellow human beings and given a welcoming hand as new Americans.

George Meany, president of the A.F.L.-C.I.O., has pledged the labor movement's help—even in this time of economic adversity—to asist the Vietnamese refugees to find jobs. "The United States has an inescapable moral responsibility," Mr. Meany observed. "We are a nation of immigrants. Rejecting them would be denying our heritage and the history of this country as a haven for the oppressed."

No matter what one may have thought about the rights and wrongs of the Vietnam War, those words express the true American tradition.

NEW YORK TIMES - 7 MAY 1975

Rocket Launch Pads Found Near Jerusalem

From News Dispatches

Rough wooden launching ramps for Katyusha rockets have been found south of Jerusalem, Israeli officials reported yesterday. It was believed that the ramps had been used for firing rockets that landed harmlessly in Jerusalem near Parliament Saturday.

An unfired rocket was still in one of the launchers, pointed at Jerusalem, police said. It was later disarmed.

In Beirut, a spokesman for said. It was later disarmed.

In Beirut, a spokesman for the General Command of the Palestine Revolution said a guerrilla group planted explosives in Tel Aviv's industrial district Monday night, setting off fires that caused widespread damage. There were no reports of such fires from Israeli authorities.

An Israeli newspaper, Haaretz, said yesterday that Foreign Minister Yigal Allon has been invited to Romania for talks and it speculated that the visit could include discreet contacts with senior Soviet officials. Romania is the only Communist nation that has diplomatic relations with Israel.

The Times of London, meanwhile, said oil tankers have been alerted to reports of a plot by Arab skin divers to hijack a tanker in the Persian Gulf.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

AVIATION WEEK - 5 MAY 1975 (7)

The Apollo-Soyuz Experiment

The visit of the U. S. Apollo astronauts to the Soviet space launch complex at Tyuratam and their inspection of the actual Soyuz spacecraft with which they will dock has apparently cleared the last operational obstacle to the launch of the joint manned space venture now scheduled for mid-July.

This is a good time to take a look at what has been accomplished since the project was first proposed more than three years ago and to try to appraise its value.

Apollo-Soyuz was conceived in those grandiose days of Nixon-Kissinger live-television summitry. It is one of the few tangible survivors of that champagne bubble atmosphere of detente along with the badly tarnished SALT agreements. From the Soviet viewpoint, the goals were obvious. First, to tap into the mainstream of U. S. space technology, which had spurted a generation ahead with Apollo. Second, to blur the international image of U. S. superiority with at least the appearance of parity by flying a joint manned mission. Third, to develop the technical base for an international space rescue capability. This last objective was shared by the U. S. But other U. S. goals sought from this venture remain obscure and may be non-existent beyond the political parameters.

Apollo-Soyuz must be viewed strictly as an experiment. There is no new technology involved. Both countries will be exercising well-used spacecraft and conventional operational techniques. The experimental questions to be answered include:

- Can the U. S. and the USSR work together in a joint operational program in space?
- Can an international space rescue capability be developed that could be applied to future space stations and spacecraft?
- Can the experience developed through Apollo-Soyuz be expanded to future joint ventures in space?

Only the flight experience of the nine-day Apollo-Soyuz mission in July can provide the answers to these questions.

That the Apollo-Soyuz program has survived to the final countdown toward launch is due to the flexibility, stamina and ingenuity of the technical working groups of both countries. There has been a formidable series of technical, philosophical, linguistic and operational problems to solve. But it now appears that a practical operational duality has been hammered out that promises to meet the test of the nine-day mission in space this summer. In all fairness to the Soviets, it should be noted that their investment in the program has been substantial, and they have provided a very thorough and conservative training and test program in support. They built new Soyuz docking simulators complete with the U. S. adaptor module at Star City (see cover), a new mission control center at Kalinin in the Moscow suburbs and have flown two unmanned Cosmos space flights and a manned Soyuz 16 mission to test ASTP equipment and configurations. They have committed two boosters and two Soyuz spacecraft to the mission itself.

There have been some problems uncovered in the Soviet space program that raise as yet unanswered questions about booster reliability and spacecraft systems functions and still pose the fundamental problem of working openly with what is basically a closed system. The Soyuz is providing only a very limited capability—even less maneuvering margin than the Agena targets for Gemini rendezvous. The Apollo must do most of the work of the mission in space.

The interface of the open, public NASA space program with the tightly closed, compartmentalized Soviet space program is still a technical and philosophic irritant. The Soviets apparently still do not realize that many of the problems within their own space program stem from this irrational secrecy and compartmentalization that terribly inhibit a healthy technical flow. They made strenuous efforts to impose these standards on the Apollo-Soyuz mission. Some timid NASA officials initially were all too willing to accept these strictures along the Henry Kissinger philosophy that nothing must jeopardize agreement with the Soviets. However, there has been a healthy change in the U. S. position and Brig. Gen. Thomas Stafford, commander of the Apollo crew, has been a tower of strength in bringing the Soviets to face the realities of a joint program. His steadfast refusal to fly the mission until he and his crewmen were permitted to inspect the actual Soyuz spacecraft and launch facilities was a key battle in this philosophic struggle. Many Americans would feel much safer if men of Stafford's experience and determination were entrusted with SALT negotiations instead of the technically naive and mathematically modeled theorists now in the saddle.

All Americans who have followed the U. S. manned space flight program from its inception will also have some special good wishes for Deke Slayton as he makes his first space flight after 12 years of unstinting labor running the astronaut office after a foolish flight surgeon's decision grounded him unnecessarily. At a time when many foreigners are wondering about this country's current mood, the dogged determination of Deke Slayton should give them a better idea of American spirit than some of the bilge being pumped out of the Harvard Yard.

We think it has been partially worth the effort put into the Apollo-Soyuz project by this country to have a sizable group of NASA and industry technicians get some practical hard-headed experience in working with their Soviet counterparts and acquiring a realistic view of their technical capabilities and philosophy. We think the rest of the value of the mission will come from determining just how serious the Soviets are about future joint ventures in space and how much they really want to give and how much they want to take.

—Robert Hotz

NEW YORK TIMES - 7 MAY 1975

Army-I.B.M. Computer, Pact Criticized on Cost, Is Ended

WASHINGTON, May 6 (UPI) —The Army and the International Business Machines Corporation have agreed to end a contract under which computers were being purchased at a cost of $1-million a computer higher than open market prices, Representative Jack Brooks, Democrat of Texas, said today.

Mr. Brooks, chairman of the House Government Operations Committee, said the termination could save up to $10-million. He said that the Army had entered into the contract for nine computers for the Army Material Command at $2.7-million each when the computers could have been bought on the open market at about $1.7-million.

Mr. Brooks said that the Army would purchase six computers at $2.7-million from I.B.M. The remaining three will be purchased on the open market, and I.B.M. will forgo a penalty clause that would have raised the price of the computers already installed.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

FEATURES COLUMNISTS

U.S. NEWS & WORLD REPORT 12 MAY 1975 (7)

WHEN IT COMES TO DEFENSE, IT'S "GI, DON'T GO HOME!"

It takes little more than a glance at Western Europe's military lineup to understand why U.S. remains the underpinning of Allied defense.

Reported from WEST EUROPEAN CAPITALS

Thirty years after the end of World War II, potentially hostile armies still stand guard in a divided Europe.

And as on V-E Day—May 8, 1945—it is the U.S. and Russia that are the backbone of strategic military might from the Baltic Sea to the Mediterranean.

In Eastern Europe, Moscow has only limited confidence in the reliability of its Communist allies in any crunch.

In the West, armies are so sapped by poor morale and public indifference that they could not meet a Communist attack without Americans at their side.

Commanders of the 673,000 troops from seven Allied nations stationed in West Germany agree that it is the 180,000 U.S. soldiers who make up the heart of this force.

Rating the armies. A size-up of the six other Allied contingents holding the line from Denmark to Austria—based on a first-hand survey by correspondents of U.S. News & World Report—shows:

- France, which is virtually boycotting NATO, has spent so heavily on nuclear arms that its conventional military strength has critically deteriorated. French draftees regard themselves as underpaid, poorly housed and badly treated.
- Belgium sends its best troops to West Germany, but their effectiveness is hampered by poor equipment and the short term served by draftees.
- Britain's armed forces, while highly regarded for their proficiency and equipment, have been cut in size three times in 17 years. Also, British military energy is spent on keeping a lid on civil war in Northern Ireland.
- Canada's all-professional force, man for man, is rated the best in West Germany. But troops are few and lack the latest equipment.
- The Dutch, once acclaimed as among the best in NATO, now are graded worst in terms of appearance and dedication.
- Only West Germany gets high marks from everyone—including Americans—for the size, quality and training of its armed forces.

For a close-up look at combat readiness of Western European armies—

PARIS

France's contribution to the defense of Western Europe is ambiguous.

- There are 60,000 French troops based in West Germany, but they are not committed to NATO.
- France is a member of the Alliance but it has withdrawn from the integrated command structure. And there have been no NATO bases in France since U.S. forces were expelled by President Charles de Gaulle in 1966.

Discontent among French. Poor troop morale, an uneven weapons system and political infighting also combine to make the French Army the most troubled major force on the Continent.

Dissension among French soldiers reached a peak early this year when about 150 of them marched in protest through the streets of Karlsruhe in West Germany. Their main grievance: French draftees were paid only about $17 a month, while German troops received four times as much. French pay has since been increased to $50 a month, and men now receive transportation-paid leaves to visit their homes once a month.

Recruits also complain that they are forced to live in old, run-down barracks; their reading material is censored; and they are harassed by military police.

Says one close observer:

"The French are years out of date. They treat their soldiers as children. Their noncommissioned officers are less educated than the soldiers under them. Their barracks have been neglected for 30 years."

Discontent is by no means confined to lower ranks. Some French officers find it hard to adjust to a peacetime army after 23 years of constant fighting that ended with withdrawal from Algeria in 1962. Many senior commanders still feel that they were betrayed, not just in Algeria but in Indo-China as well.

But another military expert notes: "In spite of low morale in the French Army, the officers do their jobs well and are

(See DEFENSE, Pg. 2-F)

WALL STREET JOURNAL
7 MAY 1975

Weapons Budget Cut $3.7 Billion By House Panel

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON—The House Armed Services Committee voted, 33 to six, to cut $3.7 billion from the Defense Department's weapons budget. But more than a third of the eliminated funds had been destined for South Vietnam.

The committee approved a total of $26.1 billion for the fiscal year that begins July 1 and for the three months ending Sept. 30, 1976, a transition period required by Congress' decision to change the start of the government's fiscal year to Oct. 1. The Pentagon had requested $29.8 billion for the 15 months.

The authorization bill approved yesterday and similar legislation before the Senate Armed Services Committee set spending ceilings. Actual appropriations, which will be made separately, could be lower.

What is more, some liberal Democrats who ran for Congress last year promising to cut defense outlays will try to make deeper cuts when the authorizing bill comes to the House floor later this month. But high unemployment could dampen the zeal of some liberals for reducing weapons procurement. And some liberals are reluctant, following the fall of South Vietnam, to do anything that might make the U.S. look militarily weak.

The collapse of South Vietnam's non-Communist government was responsibile for the largest single cut made by the Armed Services Committee. The panel eliminated $1.3 billion for arms aid to that country.

The committee reduced the Navy's shipbuilding budget about $1 billion, money the Navy says it will need in later fiscal years to make up for inflation. But the committee said it is too early to tell how bad inflation will be when those payments are made.

The B1 strategic bomber, which has strong opposition in the Senate committee, received full support from the House panel. Rockwell International Corp. is doing the research and development work.

Yesterday, the Senate Armed Services Committee cut $222 million in production-related money from the Pentagon's request for the B1 bomber for fiscal 1976 and the

(See BUDGET, Pg. 2-F)

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

DEFENSE -- CONTINUED

able to train and discipline draftees. If you walk around a French camp, you get a salute. Around a U.S. camp, you may—or you may not."

Equipment and position. What most worries many Allied officers about the French Army is not its men but its equipment and tactical disposition.

France spends only about 2.9 per cent of its gross national product for defense. Top priority goes to nuclear submarines and developing new aircraft and weapons for export.

"The latest models of French Army equipment are very good," reports a military source.

"I mean everything—from nuclear submarines and combat aircraft to smaller vehicles," he adds. "But France has become the world's No. 3 arms exporter. As a result, the latest models are not in the hands of French troops."

One obstacle is that the proud French still resist adopting arms of other nations. A joint French-German tank project broke down when the Germans decided to arm their version of the vehicle with a British cannon that they considered superior.

About two thirds of the 60,000 French troops stationed in Germany are draftees, who serve terms of only 12 months. This forces a rapid turnover of personnel not long after training cycles reach their end.

What's more, many military commanders feel that French forces are in the wrong place—the bulk of them in two mechanized divisions assigned to Southwestern Germany hard against the French border. Critics contend they should be shifted close to the Czechoslovak border, where trouble is more likely to come.

As one strategist sees it:

"Logistically speaking, the French Army is prepared only to fight a 15-day war—a kind of 15-day Maginot Line. The U.S. has been criticized for exactly the opposite concept: building up supplies in Europe as though they are about to fight World War II all over again."

Technically, France is not part of the Alliance military network at all. But the efforts by the late President de Gaulle to pull out of the Alliance completely never really filtered down to troop level. The French continue to co-operate with NATO units in planning and occasionally on maneuvers.

"The French now have fewer complexes about sharing information and contingency plans," insists a NATO officer. "Troops on the ground have always got on well. If the balloon goes up, the French will fight well alongside us."

Like their French counterparts, troops in the Belgian Army complain that they are underpaid. Nearly half of the 65,000 soldiers belong to a union, which is pushing demands that the Army be paid as well as the national police force.

What really bothers NATO leaders is that starting this year the tour of duty for Belgian conscripts serving in Germany is being cut from 12 to 10 months, and this will in time undermine performance. One expert's judgment:

"Their equipment is mixed and really not very good. But the Belgians are loyal to the Alliance, and they do their job. The difference between the Belgians and the Dutch in NATO is that the Belgians do more and talk less. The Dutch talk more and do less."

LONDON

British troops in NATO are rated as good, but officials worry because they are part of a military force that is small and growing steadily smaller.

Under heavy budgetary pressures, Britain has cut back its armed forces three times in the last 17 years. The latest reduction, announced in December, 1974, will knock 12,000 from the Army's strength of 178,000 men and women.

Defense spending—now around 8.7 billion dollars a year, or 5.5 per cent of gross national product—is to be trimmed by 11.2 billion over the next 10 years until it reaches 4.5 per cent of projected national output.

One important result: The four brigades held ready in England to reinforce the 55,000 British troops in West Germany will be slashed to a single brigade.

Comments an American military aide:

"Britain's forces now are down to such a low level, it would be very difficult to cut further without hurting the Alliance. Essentially, the recent cuts amount to a focusing of British forces on a single mission—NATO."

That mission is a key one. The British Army of the Rhine (BAOR) is stationed astride the strategic West German plain, facing some of the Soviet Union's best attack troops.

Small, efficient army. All the British soldiers are volunteers, and they draw nearly unanimous praise from Allied officers. Some observers criticize their lack of field training and argue that British tactics are too inflexible. But the BAOR is rated a very efficient unit.

The endless violence in Northern Ireland is regarded as both a help and a handicap. About 14,000 troops are tied down in Ulster. They shuttle back and forth constantly to Germany. So, at any given time, the BAOR is likely to be short two or three battalions when conditions become tense in Ireland.

Some authorities argue that the Northern Ireland experience helps sharpen British troops—gives recruits experience under fire and provides officers a chance to improve tactics.

Another view from a German officer who asked: "What good is street fighting as training for the defense of Europe?"

But aside from concern over reductions in strength, few would argue with the British officer who said:

"It's a far better army than Britain has ever had before in peacetime—more professional, more humane, better motivated and better trained. This is a force with a single aim—to become the best bloody army that ever existed, whatever its size."

For the present, though, the honor of being the best troops in Western Europe belongs hands down to the Canadians. But they are few in number. Said Gen. Michael Davison, commander of the American Seventh Army and head of the Central Army Group that includes contingents from the U.S., West Germany and Canada:

"The Canadians are highly professional and very skillful. Technically, they're the best—real pros. I'm struck also by their age. They must, on the average, be five to seven years older than the rest of us in the enlisted ranks."

Comparatively high pay is one incentive for career Canadian soldiers. A bachelor corporal living in barracks gets almost $700 a month—equal to the combined pay of 14 French draftees.

The Canadian Army spends so much on pay, in fact, that some Alliance officials believe modernization of weapons three following months. Last month, the research and development subcommittee had voted to cut $388.3 million. Yesterday morning the full committee went along with this recommendation but in the afternoon decided on the more modest reduction.

(See DEFENSE, Pg. 3-F)

BUDGET -- CONTINUED

The result of the Senate committee action, if sustained throughout the legislative process, will be to slow the Air Force's attempts to move the controversial bomber into action. The delay could also push up the price tag on the bomber, currently estimated at $345 million a plane.

The House committee cut $45 million from the budget for development of the Trident missile system, a project of Lockheed Aircraft Corp.

It also rejected a Pentagon request for $300 million to replace weapons taken out of inventory for other countries and for authority to stockpile weapons to sell or give to allies in dire need. In the 1973 Arab-Israeli war, the U.S. stripped weapons from its own stocks for the Israelis. The Pentagon wants to prevent a repetition.

The panel reduced the authorization for the AWACS warning plane $260 million, which will limit the Air Force's procurement to three planes instead of six. Boeing Co. is developing this plane, designed mainly to control fighter planes over Europe.

The committee lopped $186 million from the budget for the Advanced Airbourne command post, limiting it to research and development. This flying command post for U.S. officials in a nuclear crisis is another Boeing project.

Also eliminated was $21.8 million for advance procurement of the Navy's A7E aircraft, made by LTV Corp.; $27.5 million to modify the Navy's P3C and sea aircraft made by Lockheed to carry the Harpoon missile and $22.9 million for the Air Force's Sidewinder missile, made by Raytheon Co.

But it gave the Navy $14.3 million that it didn't request for A6E aircraft, made by Grumman Corp., and it gave the National Guard $115 million it didn't request to buy A7D planes made by LTV.

The committee agreed to the civilian and military manpower ceilings requested by the Pentagon. It also voted to place a 5% ceiling on pay increases for the uniformed services between Jan. 1, 1975, and June 30, 1976, provided that an identical pay "cap" is placed on civilian federal employes and provided that the Pentagon suspends a proposed increase in commissary charges. This would mean a net saving of about $828 million in the Pentagon budget.

The bill approved yesterday doesn't contain money for payrolls, small-weapons procurement, military construction and other items, which will swell total defense spending in the coming year to about $90 billion.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II -- Main Edition -- 7 May 1975

U.S. NEWS & WORLD REPORT 12 MAY 1975 (7)

WITH SOUTH VIETNAM'S FALL— IS THAILAND THE NEXT DOMINO?

DEFENSE -- CONTINUED

and equipment is being neglected.

Five years ago, the Ottawa Government cut its armed forces in West Germany in half. Still on hand: Some 5,000 men—2,800 of them in a crack mechanized battle group. Because of the high quality of the manpower involved, the impact of that reduction is still being felt in NATO today.

BONN

Far and away the largest—and many say the most powerful—military contingent committed to NATO is that of West Germany.

Its Army of 340,000 men forms the cutting edge of a ground-forces complex that totals 673,000. The Bonn Government pours proportionally more into material and equipment than any other Allied country—nearly 4 billion dollars out of a defense budget of 14 billion.

"Right now," said a German officer, "we are every bit as good as the Americans—perhaps a bit better because we don't have as serious a drug problem."

General Davison, the American commander, declares: "The best answer is to say that I have as much confidence in the performance of German troops as I have in ours."

About one half the German Army is composed of draftees, who serve 15 months. Although it is easy under German law to gain exemption as a conscientious objector, the number of youths taking that route is starting to decline.

Support for Germans. Professionals in other armies rate some German equipment—notably the Leopard tank and the Marder (Marten) armored personnel carrier—as better than their own.

Asserted General Davison:

"The Marder is one of the best in the world—better than anything we have. The Leopard II is going to be a truly outstanding tank. We ought to look at it seriously for our own use."

Behind the German military effort is broad public support for maintaining a strong defense system.

"Our people take military necessity seriously," explained a Defense Ministry official. "That's because of geography. We would be the first to be attacked."

Public resistance forced officials to abandon a brief experiment in permissiveness that for a time threatened to eat into the Army's efficiency. The last straw for traditionalists came when the Army bought tens of thousands of hair nets for soldiers who refused to visit a barber. Now, stiff regulations are being enforced once again.

Political pressure also recently forced the economy-minded Bonn Government to shelve plans for cutting its active forces by 30,000 men. Down the road, Germans see a delicate problem arising as their military power increases while their neighbors get weaker.

"Comparatively, we are getting too strong inside the Alliance, confided one German expert. "It's the old story of the Germans' having to be strong enough to cope with the Russians without worrying the Luxembourgers."

Summing up: NATO forces in Central Europe—with the single exception of West Germany—today show glaring soft spots in manpower, weapons and commitment. Furthermore, demands are heard in some Allied countries for even further reductions in military strength.

On the other hand, the Soviet Union and its Warsaw Pact allies keep upgrading the power of their armies, which already far outnumber Western Europe's defenders.

It is this growing disparity that leads Allied strategists to one conclusion:

Western Europe's defenses depend on a strong American Army almost as much today as when the first GI's were made part of the Atlantic Alliance.

BANGKOK

The "domino theory"—sworn to by many people, scorned by others—will soon be tested here in Thailand.

Two dominoes, South Vietnam and Cambodia, have already fallen to the Communists. A third domino, Laos, is for all practical purposes controlled by Communists in Hanoi.

Now Thailand, once a staunch ally of the U.S. and a base for American air attacks on North Vietnam, is beginning to feel the heat as its neighbors collapse.

In faraway Washington, also, concern is felt about the domino impact of the Communist successes in Indo-China on Thailand and other Asian nations. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger underlined this concern at a news conference on April 29, saying:

"There is no question that the outcome in Indo-China will have consequences not only in Asia but in many other parts of the world.

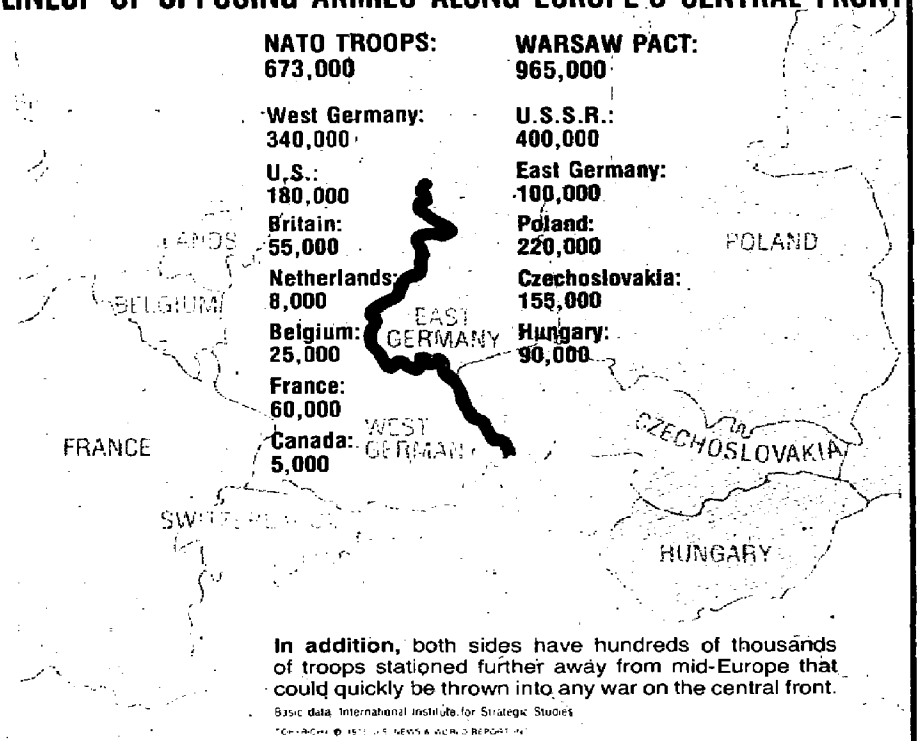
"To deny these consequences is to miss the possibility of dealing with them. So, I believe there will be consequences. But I am confident that we can deal with them, and we are determined to manage and to progress along the road toward a permanent peace that we have sought, but there is no question that there will be consequences."

Thailand is already afflicted by Communist-run insurgencies in three separate areas—the Northeast, the North and in the Southern tip, along the border with Malaysia. China and, to a much greater extent, North Vietnam have given political support, some weapons and even training to the Thai rebels.

Once Hanoi has tightened its grip on the Indo-China peninsula, the flow of supplies across the Laotian and Cambo-

(See THAILAND, Pg. 4-F)

LINEUP OF OPPOSING ARMIES ALONG EUROPE'S CENTRAL FRONT



In addition, both sides have hundreds of thousands of troops stationed further away from mid-Europe that could quickly be thrown into any war on the central front.

Basic data: International Institute for Strategic Studies

COPYRIGHT © 1975 U.S. NEWS & WORLD REPORT, INC.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

THAILAND -- CONTINUED

dian borders is expected to increase. Some experts believe that recruiting inside Thailand will be made vastly easier by the Communist successes in Cambodia and South Vietnam.

Outlasting a welcome. Hoping to ease the anticipated pressure, Thailand already is moving to establish better relations with Hanoi and Peking. The Bangkok Government announced on May 1 that an "enormous withdrawal" of U.S. troops and planes would soon start. Up to 8,000 of the 25,000 U.S. servicemen there are expected to leave.

Hanoi earlier made it clear that it has little interest in a working relationship with Bangkok as long as U.S. forces are still on Thai soil.

Some diplomats believe it is already too late for Bangkok to mend its fences with North Vietnam. Says one:

"After all, Thailand provided bases from which Americans attacked the North Vietnamese. Thailand sent 'volunteers' to fight in Laos, at least 17,000 of them, and the 'Black Leopard' Division to fight Communists in South Vietnam. Hanoi isn't going to forget that easily or soon.

"Also, the Vietnamese Communists are somewhat to the left of the Chinese, and they will feel it important to throw their weight behind many revolutionary forces in Southeast Asia. Thailand is a made-to-order target for intensified insurgency—but without a direct invasion."

Some Thai officials hope that Peking, once it has diplomatic relations with Bangkok, will curb North Vietnam's expansionary designs. Other officials are not at all sure of that. Peking has diplomatic links with Burma and Malaysia—but radio stations in Southwest China continue to support "liberation movements" in both countries.

A restricted rebellion. Communist insurgency in this country is relatively new—dating back only to the early 1960s. There has never been any full-scale uprising; fighting has been largely confined to light skirmishes between insurgent bands and police or local militia.

The bulk of Thailand's 120,000-man Army has never been put into the struggle, although units are based in the disaffected areas. Nevertheless, one rebel attack on an armored cavalry post in the North recently cost the lives of 17 Thai soldiers. Another firefight, in the Northeast on April 24, resulted in the death of 12 people, including an Army colonel and a major.

The three areas of insurgency:

• The North. In the rugged terrain along the border with Laos, Meo and other hill tribesmen have been in revolt since 1967. Although most of the weapons and other supplies come from Laos, Thai officials fear that China may send in supplies through Northeast Burma.

• The South. Poor plantation laborers and tin-mine workers form the backbone of the rebel organization. Some support is provided by ethnic Chinese Communists who are still dug in in jungle hideouts in neighboring Malaysia. Thai officials expect new weapons to be smuggled in by junk from Communist-controlled Cambodia.

• The Northeast. This is by far the most dangerous of the insurrections. The rebels are Thai citizens but ethnic Laotians, most of them with relatives in the Communist Pathet Lao—a partner in the coalition Government in Vientiane. Some of the Thai rebels have been trained in Hanoi, and supplies move easily across the Mekong River into Thailand. Laos is the "secure border area" that facilitates revolution in a neighboring country.

All told, the insurgents probably do not number more than 8,000 men under arms—3,000 in the North, 3,000 in the Northeast and 2,000 in the South, plus some Communist-led Moslem separatists in the deep South. The rebels probably can count on 10 times that number for support in nonmilitary activities.

In theory, the insurgents are all led by the illegal Communist Party of Thailand, but the propaganda and the ideology come from the "Voice of the People of Thailand," a radio station based at Kunming, China. A training camp called "Hoa Binh"—which, ironically, means peace—is in North Vietnam.

Attracting recruits. Recruiting, particularly in the North and Northeast, is relatively easy for trained Communist cadres. The people are poor and uneducated, and have long been neglected by the Government in Bangkok. And as the flow of weapons from North Vietnam increases, youths in the villages find the romance of taking up guns irresistible.

The Government, on the other hand, has difficulty recruiting officials to work in villages where living conditions are primitive, dialects are hard to learn and chances for promotion are few.

As a result, dealing with the rebels is left largely in the hands of the Thai military, which is in woeful shape. A senior officer explained:

"We are not in a position to defend ourselves. If the Khmer Rouge had kept going after taking Pnompenh, or if the Pathet Lao had crossed the Mekong River, they could have walked almost unhindered to Bangkok."

The Thai Armed Forces are also divided on the nature of the danger. One group wants internal security to be given top priority; another group insists the military should be geared up to resist aggression from outside. A Thai general comments: "Why worry about being invaded by a large army when we can't even subdue the guerrillas operating inside the country?"

One thing stressed by officials in Bangkok: Thailand is not going to go Communist except at gunpoint. The question, then, is whether the country needs and can afford a bigger, more-effective military force.

Since 1965, the United States has given this country more than 600 million dollars' worth of military equipment, plus additional millions in "funded assets"—an arrangement by which the U.S. pays part of the cost of a frigate, for example, and the Thais pay the remainder. The U.S also outfitted 20,000 Thai troops who served in Vietnam and 17,000 who fought in Laos.

Furthermore, the United States provided employment and profits when it began using Thai air bases for the wars in Indo-China. A deepwater port with huge warehouses was built at Sattahip, along with an air base for B-52 bombers at nearby U Tapao.

Now U.S. protection is to be withdrawn within a year, unless Thai leaders change their minds, and the flow of military support seems certain to dry up. There is a degree of bitterness in Bangkok directed at the U.S. over its failure to do more in the last days of Vietnam and Cambodia. Deputy Prime Minister and Defense Minister Pramarn Adireksarn, for example, says the U.S. "can't be trusted." And referring to congressional restraints, Pramarn declared, "The U.S cannot do what it promises, even if it wants to."

American military commanders believe that a U.S. pullout from Thailand is inevitable, no matter what the Thais finally decide they want. Nevertheless, suggestions are heard that a compromise might be worked out to keep some American forces here.

The U.S. Air Force now has eight tactical squadrons in Thailand—five of F-4 Phantoms, two of F-111s and one of A-7 Corsairs. In addition, there are 15 B-52s at U Tapao, plus support aircraft, totaling 350 planes.

Experts maintain that, with the exception of key bases at U Tapao and Sattahip, the Thai installations could be given up without damaging the U.S. military position. U Tapao would be designated home for a skeleton air force, and Sattahip would be the port for delivery of ammunition and supplies.

Sattahip, especially, is of strategic importance to the U.S., which is facing possible loss of facilities at Subic Bay in the Philippines.

Decision in Washington. The key to what happens may well rest in the hands of Congress. Without appropriated funds, the bases would have to be given back to Thailand.

On the Thai side, the decision depends to a large degree on the extent of hostile Communist activity along the nation's borders.

The Government wants to maintain some of its ties with America. It claims that the U.S. has pledged to honor its military commitments to Bangkok despite planned and future withdrawals of the American forces. With enemies on nearly every border, Thailand realizes it needs the U.S.—as friend and ally.

WALL STREET JOURNAL 7 MAY

GE Gets $8.5 Million Of Work for Air Force

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON—General Electric Co. received two Air Force contracts totaling $8.5 million for turbojet engines.

Goodyear Aerospace Corp., a unit of Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., received an $8.2 million Air Force contract for a radar reconnaissance system.

Raytheon Co. was awarded a $3.7 million Army contract involving the Sam-D antiaircraft missile system.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK TIMES 7 MAY 1975

Transcript of the President's News Conference

Following is a transcript of President Ford's news conference in Washington last night, as recorded by The New York Times.

PRESIDENT: Will you please sit down. Good evening, Miss Thomas.

QUESTIONS

Lessons of Vietnam

Q. What are the lessons of Vietnam in terms of the Presidency and Congress and the American people, in terms of secret diplomacy and fighting a land war in Asia. Also, would you welcome a Congressional inquiry into how we got in and how we got out of Vietnam?

A. Miss Thomas, the war in Vietnam is over. It was sad and tragic in many respects. I think it would be unfortunate for us to rehash allegations as to individuals that might be to blame, or Administrations that might be at fault. It seems to me that it's over, we ought to look ahead, and I think a Congressional inquiry at this time would only be divisive, not helpful.

Q. Mr. President. May I ask you then don't you think that we can learn from the past?

A. Miss Thomas, I think the lessons of the past in Vietnam have already been learned—learned by Presidents, learned by Congress, learned by the American people—and we should have our focus on the future, and as far as I'm concerned, that's where we will concentrate.

Middle East Negotiations

Q. Mr. President, your forthcoming meetings with Egyptian President Sadat and Israeli Prime Minister Rabin, do they represent the beginning of a new American-led negotiation in the Middle East for a peace settlement?

A. They do not represent a new negotiating process. I am meeting with President Sadat and Prime Minister Rabin for the purpose of getting from them yny recommendations they might have as to how we can maintain the peace in the Middle East; how we can come to some final settlement that will be beneficial to all the parties.

We're in the process of reassuring our Middle East policy and they can make a very valuable contribution with their on-the-spot recommendations.

Q. Mr. President, do you now see any hopeful signs that there is any movement there off dead center?

A. I'm always optimistic. I believe that the leaders of all of the countries, both Arab and Israeli, as well as others, recognize the seriousness of any new military engagement in the Middle East and the ramifications that might come from it. So I'm optimistic that as we try to move ahead, aimed at avoiding a stalemate, avoding stagnation, that we can work with other countries in order to insure the peace and a settlement that'll be satisfactory to all parties.

Opposition to Refugees

Q. Mr. President, you've been reported as being damn mad about the adverse reaction of American people to the Vietnamese refugees, and I would like to ask you, how do you explain that reaction, what in your judgment is the cause of that?

A. Mr. Lisagor, I am primarily very upset, because the United States has had a long tradition of opening its doors to immigrants from all countries. We're a country built by immigrants from all areas of the world, and we've always been a humanitarian nation, and when I read or heard some of the comments made a few days ago, I was disappointed and very upset.

I was encouraged this afternoon, however. I understand that the executive committee of the A.F.L.-C.I.O. passed a resolution urging that the United States open its doors to make opportunities available for the South Vietnamese who have been driven or escaped from their country.

I understand that the American Jewish Committee has likewise passed a resolution this afternoon endorsing the policy of making opportunity in the United States for South Vietnamese, and I am very proud of those Governors like Governor Pryor of Arkansas, Governor Askew of Florida, Governor Longley of Maine, Governor Evans of Washington, Governor Ariyoshi of Hawaii as well as Mayor Alioto who have communicated with me and indicated their support for a policy of giving the opportunity of South Vietnamese to come from this country to escape the possibility of death in their country under the North Vietnamese and the Viet Cong and individuals who wanted an opportunity for freedom. I think this is the right attitude for Americans to take and I am delighted for the support that I have gotten.

Q. I'd like to foHow that and ask you, why, in your judgment, is there such a widespread adverse reaction to them?

A. I understand the attitude of some. We have serious economic problems. But out of the 120,000 refugees who are either here or on their way, 60 per cent of those are children. They ought to be given an opportunity. Only 35,000 heads of family will be moved into our total society.

Now I understand people who are concerned with our economic problem. But we have assimilated between 50 and 100,000 Hungarians in the mid-50's; we have brought into this country some 500 to 600,000 Cubans. They've been good citizens. And we ought to welcome these people in the same way—and despite our economic problems.

I'm convinced that the vast majority of Americans today want these people to have an another opportunity to escape the probability of death. And therefore I applaud those who feel that way.

Q. Mr. President. I'd like to ask a political question. What steps have you taken so far toward the creation of a campaign organization in 1976 and if you haven't taken any steps, what steps do you plan to take in the future and when do you plan to take them?

A. Within the last week a group headed by Dean Birch have indicated that they would like to get started in a very informal way to kick off a campaign at the proper time. This group is meeting wtihin the next few days, I understand. They expect to get a great many more who will join them. The precise time when we will take the formal step to declare my candidacy has not yet been determined, but I would only reiterate my intention to become a candidate.

Q. Mr. President. You've said many times that you intend to become a candidate and yet there seems to be continually skepticism in some quarters of your own party that you really will be. Why do you think that skepticism has endured?

A. I'm surprised myself that there's any skepticism. I know my intention; I've said ir repeatedly, as you've indicated. I intend to be acandidate. I believe that I have the best opportunity to solidify the Republican party, getting strength from both the right aa well as the left within the Republican spectrum, and to put on a good campaign against the individual that the Democratic party nominates. There should be no skepticism about my intention. I will be, at the proper time, a candidate in the legal sense, and no one should feel otherwise.

Re-election Speeches

Q. Mr. President, will you this year be going out and speaking at Republican gatherings, doing the kind of political thinngs that Presidents often do in the yeat before they run for re-election?

A. I undoubtedly will make an effort to help the Republican party. I think that's a proper function for a president. I did it a week or so ago for the Republican party in the state of Virginia and I'll do similar activities in the future. But that effort will be aimed at helping the party. We need a strong two-party system and I have a responsibility to try and help the Republican party.

Miss McGrory may I congratulate you on your Pulitzer Prize and I'm delighted to recognize you.

Amnesty for Americans

Q. Thank you very much Mr. President. I was wondering if now that the war is over for everybody and we are admitting many thousands of Vietnamese, including, we are told, some young men who did not obey their country's draft laws, have you reconsidered your position on an amnesty towards young Americans?

A. Miss McGrory, about six months ago I initiated a program under former Congressman Charles Goodell and a group of eight others to grant relief or amnesty to some 120,000 individuals who were either deserters or did not comply with the Selective Service laws. As a recollect up to a week . . . that group had applied. I assume that most of them will have a change in their status. I hope so. And therefore I have taken, I think, a step that was right, it is a good program and I just wish that more had taken advantage ofit.

At the present time we're in the process, or they, the commission, are in the process of handling the applications. I hope they'll expedite and be very generous in their considerations of the reocrds of those who have. . . . There's always a chance in the future if the facts justify it.

Q. Mr. President, even though the war is over, sir, there are many Americans who msut still live with the agonies that it caused them. I speak primarily of those wounded and crippled and the families of those who died.

A. Well, first, let me say very emphatically, they made a great sacrifice. The 56,000 that died and the countless thousands who were wounded, I honor and respect them. And their contribution was most significant.

I think their contribution was not in vain. Five Presidents carried out a national policy. Six Congresses endorsed that policy. Which was the policy of our country and they carried out that responsibility as a member of our armed forces.

I think we should praise them, congratulate them, and we have an unbelievable commitment to them in the future. All we can is thank you very much for wht they've done for freedom.

(See PRESIDENT, Pg 6-F)

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

PRESIDENT -- CONTINUED

Foreign Policy Developments

Q. Mr President, you mention that you spoke to some Virginia Republicans the weekend before last and at that time you said that in 1976 we will have some excellent results in foreign policy. After the past few weeks we can all use a little bit nof news. Could you tell us just what do you expect in '76?

A. Yes, I think between now and the end of 1976 we're going to make progress in the negotiations for a SALT II agreement. It hasn't been finalized, but the atmosphere is good.

There's going to be some hard negotiating, but I will approach that important meeting with Mr. Brezhnev aimed at achieving results. And I think his attitude will reflect the same.

I think you're going to find a greater solidarity in our — Europe. I'm going to Europe the latter part of this month to strengthen that solidarity and to work on a more unified position in solving our joint economic problems, in trying to solve the enerby problems that are serious for all of us.

It's my judgment that we can move ahead even in the Pacific. We'll have to —not reassess but assess how we can proceed. But it's my aim to tie more closely together South Korea and the United States, to reaffirm our commitments to Taiwan, to work more closely with Indonesia, with the Philippines and with other Pacific nations.

These are the kind of, I believe, forward movements in foreign policy that'll be beneficial in the maintenance of peace.

Foreign Commitments

Q. Mr. President, is your job going to be complicated by what happened in Southeast Asia. You've gone out of your way in the past week or two to say that the United States will honor its foreign commitments. What sort of private feedback are you getting from foreign capitals? Is there a lack of confidence or a loss of confidence in the United States?

A. We do get recation from foreign governments wondering what our position will be, asking where we will go and what our policy will be.

We have indicated to our friends that we will maintain our commitments. We understand the perception that some countries may have as a result of the setback in South Vietnam, but that perception is not a reality because the United States is strong militarily, the United States is strong economically, despite our current problems, and we are going to maintain our leadership on a worldwide basis and we want our friends to know that we will stand by them and we want any potential adversaries to know that we will stand up to them.

Rockefeller Commission

Q. Mr. President, there've been persistent reports here in Washington that the Rockefeller Commission is looking into reports that somehow or the other discussion of the assassination of Fidel Castro may have somehow triggered the assassination of John Kennedy Can you tell us, is there any connection between those two events?

A. I cannot give you the inside information on the Rockefeller Commission because I established it for the purpose of investigating the C.I.A. and making any recommendations concerning it.

It's my understanding that they are taking a very broad look. Until I get their report, I think it would be premature for me to make any comment as to precisely where they are going with their investigation.

Now, as a former member of the Warren Commission, a commission that I think did a good job—we found as a Warren Commission, no connection of anything between Cuba and the United States. We found no evidence of a conspiracy, foreign or domestic.

G.O.P. Accomplishments

Q. Mr. President. After eight years of a Republican in the White House, there probably will be lot of people who next year will say it's time for a change. Now, what accomplishments can you cite to rebut the argument that there should be such a change?

A. Well, I don't think there ought to be a change. I strongly believe that a continuation of the basic policies of the last eight years will be good for America, and let me take a minute or two to talk about foreign policy.

A Republican Administration endec the war in iVetnam. They withdrew 550,000 American military personnel They brought back all of the P.O.W.'s

The United States, under a Rep bli can Administration, took the first meaningful steps in trying to control nucleai ars—and I think we're going to have continued success in that area.

In the domestic area we have gone through a difficult time, but when you look at the over-all—a period of eight years—I think domestically there will be far more pluses than minuses, and therefore it's my judgment that the American people, if we sell the program properly, we will have an excellent opportunity of prevailing in November of 1976.

Q. You tell us among other things the economic issue, I assume that what you're saying is, but what if the economy is at a low ebb next year—if unemployment is about what it is now? Can you win?

A. I don't think the economic conditions in 1976 will be comparable to those today. I think we're at the end of the recession. I believe that we can economically in the third and fourth quarters of 1975 and they ought to improve in 1976. Therefore, in my judgment we will be looking in the future toward better times at home and a good foreign policy abroad.

Indochina Evacuation

Q. Mr. President, Events in Indochina outran tehe deliberative process of the Congress and you wern't given the clearly defined authority to U. S. forces to evacuate there because of Cambodia and Vietnam. And my question goes to the matter of whether it was a personal dilemma for you as Commander in Chief to use the U. S. forces without the expressed concurrence of the Congress.

A. Our prime objective, of course, both in the evacuation from Phenom Penh and Cambodia and in Saigon was to bring all Americans out of both locations.

Now in the process ita did appear to be wise, particularly in Saigon, to take out a number of South Vietnamese. We did that because, number one, we felt that a number of the South Vietnamese had been very loyal to the United States and deserved an opportunity to live in freedom, and secondly, the possibility existed if we had not brought out some South Vietnamese that there could have been an anti-American attitude develop that would have complicated the evacuation of our American personnel.

So I felt that what we did could be fully justified in not only in evacuating Americans but evacuating some of the South Vietnamese who wanted to come to the United States.

Kissinger and Evacuation

Q. Secretary Kissinger said that all of the Americans who wanted to leave South Vietnam were evacuated. But there may be some reason to believe not all were evacuated. Some organizations, for example, report at least eight missionaries captured in the northern part of South Vietnam. So I'm wondering if there is some process to check this sort of thing out, and what could be done about it.

A. We certainly made a maximum effort to get every American out. We found in the last week that on a certain day they could tell us that there were a thousand Americans that were ready to come uot, and we'd take three or four hundred out. Then the next day we would find that a number of other Americans had come into Saigon and wanted to get out.

So, we certainly made a tremendous effort to get all Americans out. I'm sure there are some who were left. At this time, I can't give you the specifics as to how we will seek to get any American who are still there; but we will do all we can to achieve that result.

Martin Role Praised

Q. Mr. President, you praised Ambassador Graham Martin's record in Vietnam and you've also defended the evacuation of Vietnamese civilians. Yet there is some evidence that Mr. Martin's actions made it impossible for some Vietnamese to escape who were longstanding employes of the United States Government. And others were evacuated on the basis of their ability to pay. Have you investigated any of these charges and do you still believe that Ambasador Martin's record is one of effectiveness?

A. Because of the ability of Ambas*sador Martin to handle a tough situation* —and it was very difficult—we got all Americans out and we got roughly 120,000 plus South Vietnamese.

I'm familiar with some individuals who are critical of the way in which Ambassador Martin handled it. I never had much faith in Monday morning quarterbacks, or grandstand quarterbacks. I would rather put faith in the man who carried out a very successful evacuation of Americans and a tremendous number of South Vietnamese.

And rather than be critical of somebody who I think did a good job, I think we ought to praise him. And if some of these people want to in hindsight, who didn't have the responsibility, criticize him, I think we'll accept it for what it's worth.

Q. Mr. President, there have been some references tonight to the economic situation. The over-all unemployment rate is 9 per cent, but among black teenagers and young black males and some other minority groups it is three times that. What plans do you have to cope with the social consequences of that kind of unemployment?

A. We are concerned about the unemployment of the youth particularly, and the highest percentage, of course, of unemployment falls in the black youth group. I submitted to the Congress about a month ago a request for $450-million as I recollect, to fund a young people's employment program for this coming summer.

Now, unfortunately, the Congress hasn't approved that funding and the steps that have been taken I think will hamper the possibility of getting that funding to meet this problem, and they've added about $3-billion over and above, extra funding that I don't think can be justified. If the Congress would

(See PRESIDENT, Pg 7-F)

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

PRESIDENT --- CONTINUED

approve the request that I made for roughly $450-million, we would be in a position right now to do something about the problem that you raised.

Q. Mr. President, the record of recent years is that that kind of summer job and that kind of things has not prevented what really is a chronic long-term problem of 30 per cent unemployment among young minority groups. What I' really asking is this. A great many economists think that instead of coming out of this recession dramatically, we're just going to have a long period of stagflation where we don't have a really serious situation but we don't have things very well indeed, and this kind of chronic unemployment among minority groups just persists. And what I'm trying to find out is other than summer jobs and that kind of thing, do you think this is really a serious problem that the United States ought to address and try to do something about, and if you do, wht are your plans for it?

A. Yes I think it is a serious problem, but the most important problem is to meet the present difficulty which begins with the end of the school year, and that's why I think Congress ought to act quickly on the request that I made for summer employment. Now in the long run the best way to get the young people properly employed in our economy is to have a healthy economy, not a government-dominated economy. I think we're in the process of coming out of the recession. I'm optimistic in the future and when we, in the third and fourth quarters of this year, have the success that I think we're going to have, some of the problems will be answered that you have raised.

Mr. Jones.

Cambodian Executions

Q. You apparently had some intelligence report about a blood bath in Cambodia. I'm wondering if you can bring us up to date on anything in this area, in Cambodia, and whether or not there is any report of a blood bath in South Vietnam.

A. We do have some intelligence reports to the effect that in Cambodia some 80 or 90 former Cambodian officials were executed, and in addition, their wives were executed. This is very hard intelligence, yet, I think, very factual evidence of the blood bath that has taken place, or is in the process of taking place in Cambodia.

Now, turn to Vietnam. As you know, there is a very tight censorship in South Vietnam. The news that gets out is pretty heavily controlled by the South—by the North Vietnamese and by the Vietcong. So we really don't have the same kind of hard evidence there that we have had in Cambodia in the instance that I've indicated.

But I think probably the best evidence of the probability is that 120,000 plus South Vietnamese fled: because they knew that the probability existed that if they stayed their life would be in jeopardy. That's the best evidence of what probably will take place.

Q. I'd like to follow up on that. You say you don't have any hard evidence. Do you have any report—any intelligence reports that indicate that the—

A. Not at the moment, we do not.

Q. Mr. President, may I ask you something, sir. Simply a matter of style, and nothing of substance. Reading Mr. Hersey who spent a week with you, and reading others, you seem to be a kind of a peaceful, quiet man. A placid man. Do you ever get mad at people? Do you ever chew people out? Do you yell? Do you fire people? Do you kick people around?

A. I have learned to control my temper. I get very upset internally but I've learned that that's not the best way to solve a problem. I do have occasional outbursts on the golf course, but in dealing with people I've found that the best way to meet a personnel problem or to handle serious matter where a decision has to be made, if you can keep cool, you can make a better decision, and I've learned that over a long period of time.

Q. Mr. President, if I may follow up, sir, you were described as very angry about these rumors that you were going through a political charade and secretly not going to run—a story in a news magazine a week or so ago. I mean, how did you express yourself, you know,—

A. I didn't shout, I didn't raise the devil with anybody. I simply indicated to my staff that the stories were totally untrue, which they are, and that no such meeting took place where such a policy was outlined by me. I found the best way to handle the matter is to be very firm, very calm, but very forthright, dealing not only with my staff but with others. I think they understand what I mean by the way I say it, but you don't have to shout to do it.

Banning of Handguns

Q. Mr. President, Attorney General Levi has proposed the banning of handguns in high crime areas and the Justice Department says that the White House cleared that position before he made it clear. Does that represent an extention of your proposal that the Saturday night specials only be—

A. Well, it's my understanding that the Attorney General, when he made that speech, indicated that this was an alternative way of meeting the problem created by Saturday night specials. It is my understanding that he did not recommend this as the way to handle the problem.

I think it's a unique approach and it is being discussed with the Department of Justice within our domestic council. But there is no firm decision on whether that approach or any other approach is the right way to meet the problem.

Q. Mr. President, do you expect effective gun control legislation to be passed, and are you going to get behind . . .

A. I am not going to recommend the registration of gun owners. And I am not going to recommend the registration of guns. Now—handguns, I should say.

If we can find some responsible way to do it other than that approach, we certainly will consider them.

Mortgage Rates Shifting

Q. A number of Americans it is said, lower and middle-class, are being priced out of the housing market. And now there's new evidence that mortgage rates may be turning around; indeed the F.H.A. has increased its rate by half a percentage. Can you tell the American people tonight that makers of houses, potential buyers of houses — can you give them any assurance that in the next month, in the next year or two, more housing will be available at relatively moderate prices and that interest rates will stay down?

A. The most encouraging development in the housing area is the fact that the inflow of deposits in the savings and loans has gone up very substantially. My recollection that in the last reported month about $4-billion dollars in deposits flowed into savings and loan. And that over the last three months, it has been a very favorable inflow into the S. and L.

This means, of course, that there is money available for home buyers. And it's my judgment that once we start the upturn from the present recession, that the consumer interest in buying homes will increase significantly and with the money available in the S.&L. I think the prospects for an upturn in the housing industry are very encouraging.

Q. Do you then approve the F.H.A. increase?

A. I approve the increase because if you're going to have F.H.A. handling of mortgages; if you're going to have the Government guarantees, they must be competitive with other interest rates. And I happen to think that an F.H.A. loan, or a VA. loan, either are very good. And we want those competitive with the regular conventional interest rates.

And therefore, to make them competitive, I agreed with the decision.

Q. Thank you very, very much.

TIME 12 MAY 1975 (7)

No Pictures, Please

In Russia for the final round of joint training exercises for July's space link-up of an Apollo and a Soyuz spacecraft, U.S. Astronauts Tom Stafford, Deke Slayton and Vance Brand visited a site never before seen by Americans the secrecy-shrouded Soviet space-launch center, located in low, rolling hills some 1,300 miles southeast of Moscow near the city of Leninsk in Kazakhstan.

Last week in Moscow, the astronauts expressed confidence that the joint mission would take place. They noted that the Soviets had two Soyuz craft ready at the space center, one a stand-by that would be launched if the first had technical difficulties. The astronauts also discovered some basic differences between the U.S. and Soviet launch techniques. Unlike U.S. rockets, which are restrained on the ground until close to maximum thrust is developed, Russian launch vehicles leave the pad as soon as they have achieved the minimum thrust needed for lift-off. Also Soviet rockets are aimed to go into orbit from a launch pad that can be revolved into the proper position, while U.S. rockets are electronically guided into orbit after they are airborne.

The Americans also found that their hosts, Cosmonauts Alekse Leonov and Valery Kubasov, enjoy more luxurious living quarters than U.S. astronauts use at Cape Canaveral. For now, the world will have to be content with the astronauts' verbal descriptions of the little they saw at the space center. The Russians scheduled the visitors' arrival and departure to occur after dark, and requested that they leave their cameras in their hotel rooms

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK TIMES
6 MAY 1975(7)

Congress's 'Inaction' On War

By Thomas F. Eagleton

WASHINGTON—On Jan. 5, 1957, President Dwight D. Eisenhower, concerned about possible Communist advances in the Middle East, addressed a joint session of Congress to request authority to use military force, if needed, in the region.

Congressional liberals, feeling that the United States was best served by a strong and flexible President, were suspicious of the request. They moved in the Senate to strike the word "authorized" from the draft of the White House resolution and, when the resolution passed, it read part "if the President determines the necessity thereof, the United States is prepared to use armed forces."

The Middle East resolution was considered a great liberal victory in 1957. It also represented a virtual renunciation of Congress's constitutional duty to authorize—and proscribe—the use of American forces in a war.

In the Congressional handling of the recent Vietnam evacuation, history has repeated itself.

On April 10, 1975, President Ford requested "clarification" of his legal authority to use United States forces in South Vietnam to rescue American and foreign nationals. Clarification was needed.

I share the view of many constitutional scholars that the President, as Commander in Chief, possesses an inherent right to rescue endangered Americans. However, there is no precedent to support an inherent right to use United States forces to rescue foreign nationals.

The President's request presented an important opportunity to proscribe by law the use of force for the Vietnam evacuation. More important, Congress had the chance to resurrect the concept, advanced by the Founding Fathers, thatthe executive and Congress would participate together in decisions potentially involving war.

But Congress fumbled the ball. When the President was forced by events to order the evacuation from South Vietnam on April 29, the House of Representatives had not yet completed the final stage in enacting the necessary legislation. Two days later, when the House finally had the opportunity to express Congressional will and intent, the House voted overwhelmingly not to act.

This unfortunate decision raises grave questions about the willingness of Congress to fulfill its constitutional responsibilities. The President obviously had no authority to use the United States forces to rescue foreign nationals in Vietnam. Yet our forces evacuated thousands of Vietnamese. Asked to explain, President Ford tried to justify his action on "moral" rather than legal grounds. Yet Congress let the precedent stand. Future Presidents might now conclude that the Commander in Chief had an inherent right to do what Mr. Ford did.

The failure of the war-powers resolution to specify those emergency situations wherein the President may unilaterally commit United States forces to battle has left the war powers of Congress and the President as vague as ever.

Lacking such a statutory definition, power accrues to the branch that invokes it. And, once again, in rescuing foreign nationals from Vietnam the President has invoked powers the Founders did not grant the Presidency.

The President can move all too quickly to usurp Congressional powers. He has only to order troops into battle. Congress, on the other hand, can only impose its will through the legislative process.

That is the tragedy of the House's recent action. On the verge of reimposing itself in the decision-making process, Congress rejected the opportunity to legislate.

From the beginning the debate over the President's request for "clarification" was marked by distrust of the executive branch, fear of military involvement in Vietnam, and a conspicuous lack of confidence that a law, however tightly drafted, would be faithfully executed. In the end, liberals, long disenchanted by the imperial Presidency they helped create, unintentionally threw their considerable weight in the direction of Presidential omnipotence.

To avoid the remotest of possibilities—that President Ford would send forces back into Vietnam despite his written promise not to—Congress chose to leave a precedent for unilateral and unrestricted Presidential rescue authority.

White House references to "moral" justification and the pleasure Congress seems to derive in abrogating its constitutional responsibilities should alarm those who see the rule of law as America's primary source of strength.

Congress has again failed to act in a forthright and timely manner to proscribe a Presidential war-making initiative. By its inaction, and by its refusal even to provide expost facto authorization for the Vietnam evacuation, Congress has once again shirked its constitutional duty.

Thomas F. Eagleton, junior Democratic Senator From Missouri; is author of "War and Presidential Power: A Chronicle of Congressional Surrender."

BALTIMORE SUN - 7 MAY 1975

Marquis Childs

U.S. Must Reassess 'Benign Neglect' of Japan

Washington.

Whatever reassessment may mean for the Middle East, and to date it seems to have meant mostly delay, the debacle in Vietnam cries out for reassessing American policy in Asia. Belatedly first things must come first and spinning out the guilt of Vietnam in an endless wrangle can only multiply the damage of American failure and defeat.

Reassessment must begin with Japan, which is infinitely more important to American security than all of Indochina. Concentration on Southeast Asia and the hapless lot of the Vietnamese who never could be "saved" by a foreign power has meant neglect of Northeast Asia.

Indifference and neglect have eroded the relationship with the Japanese, for 20 years a fruitful partnership. The "Nixon shock" that came when, without prior notice to Tokyo, the United States opened the way to Peking and a presidential visit was only one instance of indifference to the sensitivity of a partner sheltering under the U.S. nuclear umbrella.

By the mid-1970's Japan will be capable of producing enough plutonium for 200 atomic bombs a year and their skill in rocketry is increasing. But there is still a strong and pervasive anti-war sentiment among the Japanese, who are proud of their remarkable success in promoting their interests without possessing large armed forces. This is the conclusion of Ralph N. Clough, a foreign service officer who spent 13 years in and around mainland China and is now a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, in a timely book, "East Asia and U.S. Security."

"If Japan again became militarily powerful," Mr. Clough writes, "its domestic politics and its attitude toward other countries could not fail to be profoundly altered. The military and military-related industry would gain influence in national affairs; the martial spirit would be stimulated and the heightened influence of military views and concepts also could lead to restrictions on Japanese democracy, as many Japanese fear it would . . ."

As the third largest economic power in the world, Japan 18 months ago was unreatened by the oil crisis with ruinous inflation and at the same time serious unemployment and recession. Japan is obliged to import all its oil, and at the peak of inflation wholesale prices rose at the dizzy rate of 7 per cent in a single month.

But by the end of 1974 with a tight money policy Japan was well on the way to recovery. Unemployment was only 2 per cent, owing somewhat to the fact that Japanese employers rarely fire their workers, and, instead, cut work hours. The rise in wholesale prices had dropped to virtually zero. While the gross national product dropped 1.8 per cent, in contrast to the dramatic 9 and 10 per cent jumps in previous years, this was absorbed without serious political or social dislocations.

News of an import fully as great as the collapse of South Vietnam, it scarcely has been reported in the American press. On the basis of a restored and healthy economy Japan, America's largest trading partner with the exception of Canada, will be able to continue to extend its trade relations not only with the West but in Asia.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II -- Main Edition -- 7 May 1975

THE NEW REPUBLIC - 3 MAY 1975(7)

The End is the Beginning

by Frances FitzGerald

It is now exactly 25 years since the United States first entered the war in Indochina with a gift of military aid to the French. As the end draws near it is clear that the course of the war has had all the rigidity of a fugue: there are variations, but each event refers back to others in history, and the end is the beginning. In March the Communist troops seized control of the central highlands of South Vietnam; they had done the same in 1954 as they drove the French from the country. As it happened the ARVN commander of the highlands military region had fought with the French at Dien Bien Phu. As the offensive progressed Nguyen Van Thieu began to act more and more like Ngo Dinh Diem in the last months of his life: he refused all compromise, isolated himself more and more from his generals and waited passively, as it were, for a miracle. Ambassador Graham Martin clung to Thieu the way Ambassador Frederick Nolting had clung to Diem, offering no way for the Vietnamese to change the government by peaceful means and thus each day increasing the risk of assassination for Thieu, who waited until it no longer mattered to resign.

Like his four predecessors, President Ford could have ended the war with a political compromise. The stakes were, perhaps, lower but the way out was a good deal easier for him than it was for them. The North Vietnamese and the PRG had designed it that way in the political articles of the Paris peace accord. An ambush on three sides being so often their strategy, they kept the offer of a cease-fire and a political settlement open until the very end. But Ford refused that offer. He asked the ARVN to die at Xuan Loc the way the Eisenhower administration had asked the French to die at Dien Bien Phu, holding out a promise of military aid the way Nixon in 1954 had held out a promise of atom bombs. (Not one atom bomb, not three, but two.) Nothing, it seemed, but total defeat and the collapse of an army would do.

How to explain these repetitions of history? How to explain the rigid repetitiveness of American policy over 25 years? Quite clearly the policy of support for the war was not a simple mistake based on a misreading of the Indochinese. As the Pentagon papers show, not one of the five Presidents who supported intervention had any confidence that the war could be won. Certainly Ford and Nixon, if not Johnson and Kennedy as well, saw the end, however, far off. Their intelligence analysts erred on tactical matters, but they tended to be right about the essentials. They even made correct predictions about psychological events such as the Vietnamese reaction to an American withdrawal. The protection of Americans from angry mobs of "allied" soldiers and civilians figured in the Pentagon's contingency planning since 1965. American officials, of course, rarely dwelled on these gloomy predictions in public. And in a sense it was not Da Nang, the city, that fell some weeks ago, but the world of illusion they had created about the war. Many believed in the illusions, but it was with no real hope of success that five administrations proceeded on a course that led to the death of 55,000 Americans and the near-destruction of three Indochinese societies.

American policy is inexplicable in terms of Indochina alone, and indeed American officials often explained it in other ways. For 20 years or so they described it variously as an effort to stop communism, to contain China or to deter national liberation movements all around the world. With détente and the opening of relations with China, these explanations tended mysteriously to appear in reverse. All of a sudden the United States was actually helping China by continuing the war; alternatively it was helping the Soviet Union against China in Southeast Asia. President Nixon and Secretary Kissinger, however, took a new tack. As they explained it, the reasons for the war were intangibles: they were questions of "face" and "credibility" and the image of the United States around the world. With the beginning of the current offensive, Kissinger and Ford revived one of the oldest of the explanations—the domino theory—while at the same time adding a series of new ones. the Indochina war was, it seemed, "linked" to almost every foreign policy objective the United States had in the world with the result that the fall of Saigon might eventually mean the fall of Israel, Portugal and so on. To take all of this new rhetoric seriously is, of course, to imagine that Kissinger lives in some strange, metaphysical landscape where symbolic battles are fought over the future of civilization itself. To take it seriously is to believe that Kissinger looks at Indochina with the detachment of a schizophrenic.

The detachment, of course, is real. The rigidity and the brutality of American policy in Indochina has entirely to do with the fact that no American President has ever really cared what happened to the Indochinese. What is questionable is whether any other official explanation for the war is correct, whether in fact any administration pursued the war for genuine reasons of foreign policy. Conceivably Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson did, at least in part. But by linking the fall of Saigon to American "credibility" everywhere on earth, the Nixon and Ford administrations, guided by Henry Kissinger, seemed to detach themselves from all the other objectives of their foreign policy. As time passed it became more and more clear that their theories were but another kind of cover-up and that the war continued because a few cynical men wished to prove themselves right and to retain their old authority with the American public. They did not realize, of course, that it was too late—that Americans had rejected their theories and no longer cared. Isolated as Nguyen Van Thieu, they continued to play all of the old games with greater desperation. In the last few weeks of the war Kissinger, at least, indicated that he was ready to sacrifice not only more Vietnamese lives but much of American foreign policy in his battle with Congress.

Frances FitzGerald, a free-lance writer, is the author of the Pulitzer prize-winning The Fire in the Lake.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
7 MAY 1975

Viet Cong tally troops, arms captured

Belgrade

Viet Cong forces put out of action 2.5 million enemy troops and captured military arms and equipment worth about $5 billion during the eight-week thrust that led to the fall of Saigon, the Yugoslav news agency Tanjug reported from Peking

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

THE NEW REPUBLIC - 3 MAY 1975(7)

Myths and Interests

by Adam Yarmolinsky

It was one of John Kennedy's recurrent nightmares that he might find himself a survivor of a nuclear holocaust, asking his companions, "How did it all happen?" We survivors of the holocaust in Southeast Asia find ourselves in similar circumstance, and no quantity of refugee ferry flights, no Saigon airlift, can stay that question.

If people need to understand the sources of their irrational behavior in order not to repeat it, countries need to all the more, since they are less easily restrained by external means. And if we conclude that we were dragged into Vietnam by the military, or stayed there as long as we did because we were misled by the military, then we may find ourselves contemplating a similar scene of desolation a generation hence, asking the same question—if anyone is alive to ask it.

Myths tend to come in matching pairs. The right-wing myth—now being energetically propounded by Barry Goldwater—that the civilians would not allow the military to win the war, is matched by the liberal myth that the military would not allow the civilians to stop the war, or at least bamboozled the civilians into going on with it. The fact is that responsible civilian officials knew just what was going on in Southeast Asia. As Robert McNamara observed as he politely cut off his first formal staff briefing as Secretary of Defense (which, as I recall, reported fighting in the Plain of Jars), "we all read the newspapers."

What the civilians didn't know was the domestic political reaction to giving up. And four successive Presidents have tried to postpone that discovery by whatever means they could find. It is still too early to tell what the reaction will amount to. But we can already observe the fascinating spectacle of an administration pushing against the weight of popular opinion, in order to avoid what it fears will be an unpopular result.

The sum of popular reactions is almost certain to be ambiguous enough so that no politician would be willing to risk his future on a repetition of the same behavior patterns. The only lesson anyone can safely draw is that we ought to try to avoid ending up in a situation where our only reason for carrying on with a military intervention is that we are afraid of the domestic political consequences of getting out. It follows that we ought not to begin what we may not be prepared to finish.

Fortunately or unfortunately—and I would suppose fortunately for most of the world—military intervention on the cheap is no longer possible. When the United States first went into Vietnam, it wasn't a real war to the people who made the decisions. It was rather, in their view, a necessary if not painful exercise of national will. And when they discovered the war was real, it was too late. They had made a commitment, not to whoever happened to be occupying the presidential palace in Saigon, but to the American electorate, and to what passes for the world community, from which it took a decade to extricate ourselves.

The ultimate result in Vietnam should have been predictable in advance, simply because no reasonable American statesman could, with a straight face, argue in the councils of state that whether Ho Chi Minh or Ngo Dinh Diem exercised the fragile authority emanating from Saigon was a matter affecting the most vital interests of the United States. And if American political leaders didn't believe it, there was no reason why North Vietnamese political leaders should believe it either. The North Vietnamese must have known too that the embarrassment of not winning might be enough to keep us in the war for a long time, accepting and inflicting incredible human costs. But it wouldn't be enough by itself to give us the will to win, at a politically unacceptable cost in American casualties, and a morally unacceptable cost in still further destruction of another country and its people.

The result was not widely predicted because we did not understand the costs, for a number of reasons. These reasons included the general euphoria about the use of military force that pervaded Washington after the abandonment of the frightening doctrine of massive retaliation, as well as the residue that remained from the Dullesian visions of the monolithic nature of world communism. We supposed that somehow we could easily fight limited wars in other people's jungles, and that Moscow could easily turn on and off the fighting in other people's countries.

The age of innocence is over now, and no one—not even Gerald Ford—still claims to be able to see a light at the end of the tunnel. "No more Vietnams" used to be a fashionable slogan. But the maxim about learning history in order to avoid repeating it implies that events do not recur in easily recognizable patterns; otherwise there would be very little to learn.

One commentator has already distinguished the Arabian peninsula from the Indochinese peninsula because it lacks extensive tree cover. If the United States contemplates a cheap and easy war to protect its Middle East oil supplies—doubtfully a vital national interest—we risk another Vietnam, without foliage. But there are still some things for which the United States must be prepared to pay any price. If the United States can decide what really are its vital interests in the Middle East and can make clear its decisions, then other nations are much more likely to respect those interests—and we should not have to pay either the price of victory or the price of ignominy.

Adam Yarmolinsky, a Defense official under Kennedy and Johnson, is a professor at the Univ. of Massachusetts.

BUSINESS WEEK - 12 MAY 1975 (7)

Booz-Allen vs. Litton

The Navy has enlisted Booz-Allen Applied Research, a subsidiary of Booz, Allen & Hamilton, Inc., to help prepare its cost-overrun case against Litton Industries, Inc. Litton claims the Navy should pay $1.45-billion for the five landing helicopter assault ships the company is building at its Pascagoula (Miss.) shipyard. The Navy insists it should not have to pay a penny more than $946-million. Booz-Allen experts will inspect the trouble-plagued Pascagoula yard to evaluate Litton's claim that the extra $505-million cost is the Navy's fault because of such things as contract changes, "delay costs," and "cost of disruption."

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR - 7 MAY 1975

Viet 'bloodbath' fears may be dissolving

By Daniel Southerland
Staff correspondent of
The Christian Science Monitor
Hong Kong

If one were to believe the United States Embassy in Saigon, a "bloodbath" was well under way within days after the Communists took over large parts of South Vietnam.

But independent investigation by this reporter and interviews with a number of refugees from areas occupied by the Communists show that a number of the reports of alleged killing carried out by the Communists that the embassy was transmitting to Washington were derived from second-hand sources and were poorly documented.

There is little doubt that the staunchly anti-Communist embassy officials who passed on the reports tended to believe them. This apparently was not a case of deliberate fabrication. After all, there had been executions throughout the long history of the Vietnam war.

Once the reports went out in the form of official cables, with high-level signatures attached, there was apparently even more of a tendency in Washington to accept their veracity. Pentagon officials soon began to speak of the summary executions of "thousands" of Vietnamese.

The 'why' of the issue

The "bloodbath" issue is important, first because of what it would mean in human terms if it did occur and, second, because it could become a political issue in the United States once politicians start trying to apportion the blame for "why Vietnam was lost" and "whether more should have been done to prevent its loss."

There were some lower-level American officials in Saigon who doubted the reports of widespread killings in the initial stages of the Communist take-over simply because they thought, based on past history, that the Communists would not operate thay way. They predicted executions would come only after the Communists held firm control.

But is is worth noting that high-level members of the Roman Catholic Church in South Vietnam, who might be thought to have much to fear from a Communist take-over, were convinced that the Communists were anxious not to repeat mistakes of the past. Leftist sources in Saigon reported that when Communist officials briefed their cadres on the "reconciliation policy" of the Provisional Revolutionary Government, they sometimes specifically said that it was designed to "avoid the excesses of the past."

Some killings reported

Many Vietnamese refugees suggested that if there was a "bloodbath" in the early stages of the Communist take-over, it was carried out by fleeing Saigon government troops who took control of several refugee ships and terrorized the passengers.

Quite a few refugees reported that the Communists, while attempting to reestablish order, did kill looters among Saigon troops. Prominent among the looters were Vietnamese marines, supposedly the best troops Saigon could field.

But when an American official interviewed a marine who reported that eight of his friends were executed in the city of Da Nang, the interviewer apparently failed to try to determine if any of the marines in question had done any looting.

To point up the contrast between what the U.S. Embassy in Saigon reported and this correspondent's own interviews with refugees, it might suffice to examine two embassy cables that indicated widespread killings occurred in Da Nang.

One cable, drafted April 19th, said that information on the alleged killings was supplied by an officer assigned to the national police headquarters in Da Nang.

No support for allegations

The cable said that shortly after seizing Da Nang at the end of March, the Communists began "detaining" Buddhist youths who had participated in a demonstration aimed at helping the Communists take control. The Buddhists, it said, belonged to the National Reconciliation Force (NRF), a non-Communist group that actively had cooperated with the Communists following their take-over of a number of cities.

But when asked about the alleged killings, a leading member of the NRF in Saigon said that he had no information from NRF refugees to support such allegations. One refugee whose cousin was a Buddhist leader in Da Nang said the allegations amounted to sheer fantasy.

The U.S. Embassy cable said that 30 persons were executed at one time in a widely known public market in Da Nang. An earlier cable, citing a report from an elderly, educated refugee, said that 1,000 people were killed in a mass execution within three hours after the Communist take-over. Among them, it said, were "primarily uniformed military men, policemen, long-haired 'hippie' types, and looters."

A Vietnamese Air Force officer who escaped from Da Nang two weeks after the take-over confirmed that Buddhists belonging to the NRF had circulated throughout the city in the early stages urging the people to remain calm and not to loot. But the officer, who could hardly be accused of having pro-Communist sympathies, laughed when told about the embassy reports of widespread executions.

He said that military officers were being told by the Communists to report to assembly points and that they were later sent to "education courses" outside Da Nang. He said that there was some fear as Communist troops entered the city but that gradually people began to relax.

The officer predicted that eventually the Communists would get around to arresting those persons who were considered "bad" or "corrupt," and that they would be tried by "people's courts." But he said that he doubted strongly that anything like a bloodbath would occur.

A businessman from Da Nang who escaped about 10 days after the take-over gave a similar account to newsmen of events in "post liberation" Da Nang.

The Federal Diary

WASHINGTON POST - 7 MAY 1975

Ford Panel to Study Pay Systems

By Mike Causey

President Ford soon will appoint an important, top-level federal committee to study streamlining the various systems the government uses to arrive at its civilian-military payroll, which now runs around $55 billion a year."

The committee will have a November deadline for its report on the systems, tracks and payline methods federal statisticians now use to determine what cooks, typists, generals, ambassadors—and federal statisticians themselves—should make. It also will be expected to make recommendations—all with an eye to economy—which Mr. Ford may want to translate into "corrective" federal pay legislation as part of his next budget.

Federal officials say the committee has no plans or mandate to tamper with the present comparability-with-industry salary law. That is supposed to guarantee the government's 1.2 million white-collar civilians' "catch-up" raises each October to put them on a wage par with comparable jobs in the private sector.

Instead, as this column reported April 29, the main focus of the study will be on whether the government should abandon its system of paying nationwide rates for its 18 different grade levels in favor of an area wage system for clerical personnel and a regional pay system for professionals.

Mr. Ford's new pay team is expected to include the chairman of the Civil Service Commission, head of the Office of Management and Budget, and secretaries of Defense and Labor. Officials from VA, which has its own pay system for medical personnel, the State Department, which has several different pay systems, and other agencies will be called in to help, but probably will not serve as regular members.

Insiders say that President Ford, like many taxpayers and federal workers themselves, believe the federal pay system is cockeyed, resulting in overpayment in many jobs, and not enough money especially for top executives.

Many people believe that the federal pay disparity results from the fact that the government pays a single national rate for most of its jobs, but takes "catch-up" pay data from industries that pay employees local or regional rates.

The Civil Service Commission already has several pay studies under way, and they will be used by the presidential panel when it looks at the possibility of local or regional wage scales.

The committee will also study the various systems that are used to give different kinds of raises, at different times of the year, to white-collar government personnel, the half-million wage board (blue collar) employees. Rates for the military, Foreign Service and VA medical system are tied to the white-collar federal pay system.

* * *

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II--Main Edition--7 May 1975

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER 7 May 1975

Vietnam defeat could bring a new wave of McCarthyism

By ERIC F. GOLDMAN

As Communists settle into their rule of Cambodia and South Vietnam, American foreign policy is obviously in a shambles. At the same time, the nation faces a less apparent, but more serious problem: the possibility of another rampage of McCarthism — Joseph McCarthyism — here at home.

In 1949 Communist forces took over China, and the cries went up in the United States that we had "lost" that huge land. Sen. Joe McCarthy, he of the genius for malevolence, rumbled in with his assault on those Americans he accused of being responsible for a "Red" China.

McCarthy confined his own marauding largely to people involved in foreign policy, but his implication went much further. He helped mightly to spread across the country a sulking, snarling sense of a vast conspiracy working away against sound Americanism in domestic as well as international affairs.

Soon many upper-status conservatives, irascible from a generation of New Dealism, middle-level families battling an insistent mortgage or a black moving into the neighborhood, and hundreds of thousands of unmitigated yahoos—all these joined in a formidable legion. They denounced in the same breath "the Communists in Washington who handed over China," advocates of civil rights, and that woman down the street who signed a petition for a birth-control center in the community.

In recent days, President Ford and Secretary of State Kissinger were talking portentously of the "blame" for the fall of Cambodia and South Vietnam. If we had lived up to our "commitments" after the Paris peace accord of 1973 and sent adequate arms, the Communists would not have triumphed. The finger was pointed directly at Congress and, less directly but no less unmistakably, at all critics of the Johnson-Nixon-Ford Vietnam policy.

Ford and Kissinger, of course, stopped far short of McCarthyism. At Tulane University, the President even emphatically called for "reconciliation," no "recriminations" and a turning of attention to matters other than Southeast Asia. Yet the Ford Administration has sown seeds, and whether the President himself will stay steady in the path of nonrecrimination may be doubted.

Ford will not become a full McCarthyite; he is too decent and sensible a man for that. But in the 1950s President Dwight D. Eisenhower was decent and sensible, too. Yet, he found reasons to acquiesce in the emerging McCarthyism, thereby greatly encouraging it.

If a new wave of McCarthyism does hit the United States, it is likely to spatter a far larger group than before. In the late 1960s and 1970s, many millions of Americans thought our Southeast Asia policy utter folly, and said so in conspicuous ways.

Another period of McCarthyism would also be—if it takes the familiar pattern of making liberal domestic policies part of a crypto-Communist conspiracy—far more destructive of efforts to make sense out of the home scene.

A 1970s McCarthyism, with its call for hairy-chested analogies and bomb-rattling in world affairs, could raise other grave dangers. The United States may have had serious international problems in the era of Joe McCarthy the First. But the American place in the world was as sunny as Ike's smile compared to the present harrowing mess, seeping from an explosive Middle East down to a festering Latin America out to those millions of Asian refugees frantically bicycling to a dubious future.

It is all so melancholy—and so unnecessary! The simple fact of the matter is that the United States did not "lose" China in the 1940s and did not "lose" Cambodia and Vietnam in the 1960s and 1970s. They were never ours to lose.

Their conquest by Communist armies resulted from long-running social and political forces over which the United States had little control.

As for the Paris peace accords of 1973, they did not commit America to continue arming South Vietnam; they gave it the right to replace weapons. If President Nixon sent private assurances to President Thieu, they were just that—private and without binding force.

So melancholy, so unnecessary—and yet likely. If the United States is not to undergo the ravages of another sweep of McCarthyism the millions of Americans susceptible to its blandishments will have to do what few large groups have been willing to do in any country at any time. They will have to forego the joy of accusing somebody else, and find it within themselves to summon the good sense and the guts to face the genuine facts concerning a world in revolution.

(Mr. Goldman is the Rolling professor of history at Princeton University. He served as special consultant to President Johnson from 1963 to 1966. He is author of the book "The Tragedy of Lyndon Johnson.")

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR 7 May 1975

Atomic-bomb proposal jars Argentina—and Americas

By James Nelson Goodsell
Latin America correspondent of
The Christian Science Monitor

A Peronist legislator's proposal that the Argentine Government build an atomic bomb has set off a major debate in Argentina and sent ripples of concern over South America.

In introducing legislation that would authorize manufacture of a nuclear bomb for national defense, Edgar Cossi Isasi said construction of the device would win "increasing recognition in the international area" for Argentina.

The proposed legislation comes at a time when a considerable amount of hemisphere attention already is focused on Argentina because it has Latin America's first operating nuclear reactor.

Put into operation in January, 1974, and built by a West German company, the facility at Atucha, a suburb of Buenos Aires, is to be followed by two more reactors in 1979 and 1981 in Mendoza and Bahia Blanca.

Mr. Cossi Isasi's bill has won some tentative support from Peronist legislative sources, but the issue is receiving widespread attention in the Buenos Aires press where comment on the measure — both pro and con — has been appearing in recent days.

In Brazil, the proposed legislation is causing major concern. With Argentina already using an atomic reactor, Brazilians with whom Argentines compete for hemisphere hegemony are openly worried — and any Argentine effort to construct an atomic weapon would likely be viewed as a hostile act in Brazil.

Moreover, Argentina last year signed an agreement with India to exchange nuclear information. Argentines also viewed India's recent explosion of a nuclear device with interest. Retired Gen. Juan Guglialmelli, for example, wrote that India's nuclear capability was important "not only for the political and military implications but also because it concerns a country on the road to development, with anguishing economic and social problems."

The implication in this was that Argentina also is a developing nation — and many Argentines see the Cossi Isasi proposal as a step in boosting Argentine prestige in the hemisphere and thus aiding its development.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

RADIO - TV DEFENSE DIALOG

RADIO TV REPORTS INC. WASH., D.C., SUMMARIES NOT TO BE QUOTED.

THURSDAY, MAY 8, 1975 (BROADCASTS OF MAY 7, 1975)

SUMMARY OF NETWORK NEWS IN THIS ISSUE

John CHANCELLOR, Robert HAGER, Richard VALERIANI, and Ray CULLEN, all of NBC News, report on refugees and Vietnam. HAGER reports that the bodies of the two Marines killed at Tansonnhut Airport were left behind in Saigon, that both families have been notified and that the McMAHON family is very upset. VALERIANI reports that the State Department is being inundated by calls from citizens and organizations wishing to sponsor or offer jobs to Vietnamese. CULLEN reports on governmental structure set up at Camp Pendleton by the Vietnamese to coordinate their activities with the government. CHANCELLOR reports on reports out of Saigon concerning the normalization of Ho Chi MINH city; on a statement by Rep. Peter RODINO urging haste in approval of funds for the refugees; on charges that Lon NOL was bribed with one million dollars to step down; that Mr. FORD proclaimed the last day of the Vietnam era and ending some benefits. John PALMER, NBC, reports on the expected opening of the Suez Canal and what it will mean to the stability of that region.

Walter CRONKITE, Lesley STAHL, Terry DRINKWATER, Murray FROMSON, all report on Indochina and refugee news for CBS. STAHL reports on efforts to spur passage of relief funds for the refugees and on certain provisions being written onto the bill. DRINKWATER reports on Cambodians arriving in California and on charges that Lon NOL was bribed to relinquish power and that clothes are being distributed to the refugees. FROMSON has a lengthy report on the switch in Thai foreign policy from pro-American and anti-Communist support to a policy of neutralism, ostensibly a change forced on the Thais by the presence of neighboring Communist governments. He reports on what this means to the U.S. as far as its bases there are concerned and on the internal situation in Thailand as regards the insurgents, the economics and politics after the military government ended. CRONKITE reports the last shiploads of Vietnamese refugees have arrived in the Philippines; that the bodies of two Marines killed in Saigon were not taken out; that President FORD proclaimed an official end to the Vietnam war era; on the takeover of power by the Vietcong and conditions in Saigon as portrayed by wire service reports and an East German film; and on the retrieval of former Viet aircraft from Thailand.

Bob SCHIEFFER, CBS, reports that President FORD is in the process of reassuring and strengthening American committments to South Pacific allies. CRONKITE reports that the SALT talks at Geneva have been resumed because of an impasse. Eric SEVAREID, on analysis for CBS, comments on opposition to the resettlement of refugees as being contrary to the American way and on the U.S. role in taking in refugees over the years.

Howard K. SMITH, Tom JARRIEL, Ted KOPPEL, Arnold COLLINS and Harry REASONER, all of ABC, report on relevant news. JARRIEL reports on the reassessment of U.S. Asian policy and on new lines of defense extending from Japan to Korea to the Philippines to Australia and Indonesia; and on the inclusion of Taiwan in that select circle and what that may mean to detente with China. KOPPEL reports specifically on Mr. FORD's inclusion of Taiwan and the reaffirmation of committments to that country. He includes a statement by the Taiwanese Ambassador. COLLINS reports on the situation in Saigon as portrayed by an East German film. SMITH and REASONER report on Mr. FORD's ending the Vietnam era; the situation in Saigon; congressional action on refugee aid; and that the bodies of two Marines killed in Saigon were not evacuated.

PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE SAFAA AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL MATTERS WITHIN THEIR OFFICIAL RESPONSIBILITIES.

FOR INFORMATION REGARDING THIS PUBLICATION CALL MR. HARRY ZUBKOFF, OX 52884

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NBC NIGHTLY NEWS NBC TV
7:00 PM MAY 7

News About Vietnam; Refugees

JOHN CHANCELLOR: Good evening. This afternoon we heard from our last remaining correspondent in Saigon, Jim Lorry, who hasn't been heard from in eight days. During that time there was a total news blackout on the capital of South Vietnam but that is now to be lifted. Lorry sent us a telex that said the NBC staff there is safe and that there is, in his words, complete freedom of movement, city functioning just as before the liberation if not slightly better, no shortages except bureau money. Saigon draped in revolutionary flags, literature and music stores and restaurants open per usual, says Lorry. Further messages have been received from the Associated Press, UPI, Reuters News Service, and we should be getting some details about life in Saigon soon. This is some film shown by East German television made in the past few days of life in Saigon. That's the presidential palace, picture of Ho Chi Minh. Reuters reported today that 30,000 people gathered near the palace to celebrate the victory. The UPI reported today that there seemed to be no reprisals by the victorious troops, that security in Saigon has been more or less on the honor system. The impression we get from all of these reports and from this East German film is that information coming out of Saigon is being carefully controlled. Still this is what the place looked like a few days ago with the North Vietnamese tanks standing in front of the presidential palace. These films were made in Hanoi at a political rally. The premier of North Vietnam Pan Van DONG made a speech. The man seen here in civilian clothes is the legendary Ngo Nguyen GIAP, who did more than anyone to win the war. Out on the streets of Hanoi people were celebrating both the victory and Mayday. Here you will see a North Vietnamese buying maps of Saigon. And here is a poster showing a united Vietnam, north and south. Saigon is the symbol of victory won by these people, but many analysts believe that despite their joy at winning the war they will not be unified with the South for some time to come. North Vietnam, despite the Mayday firecrackers and dragons, is a tightly regimented society, it will take some time to bring the easy-going southerners up to the regimented standards of the north.

Two United States Marines; Lance Corporal Darwin JUDGE of Marshaltown, Iowa, and Corporal Charles McMANN, Jr., of Wilburn, Mass. were killed in a rocket attack on Saigon's Tansonnhut Airport two days before the fall of South Vietnam, and their bodies supposedly were on the way home for burial. But today the Pentagon said they're not, not yet. Robert Hager visited the McMANN family today in Wilburn and he has more on the story.

ROBERT HAGER: For more than a week the McMANN family waited here at their home under the impression that the body of their son Charles was in transit here. But last night a Marine officer came to this house to tell the family that somehow in those last chaotic moments the body had been left behind in Saigon. The Defense Department says they thought the body was on the carrier Midway. But when the Pentagon cabled the Midway about funeral arrangements, it found out the bodies weren't onboard and were'nt on any other evacuation ship. In the terrible confusion of the pullout they had been left behind in a hospital in Saigon. In Wilburn the McMANNS, unaware of all this, had already arranged with their church for a funeral and made other arrangements with a nearby funeral home. Today the family was angry that the Marines had not informed them earlier, and the father asked to tell his story to reporters.

MR. McMANN: We took good faith that they were sending him home. And it seems to me that waiting eight days and have them every day tell me that he'll be coming, he'll be coming. Then last night -- all of a sudden -- eight days later tell me they never got him out. It would appear to me that they must have known this a week ago. They had nerve enough to say they killed my boy, why didn't they have nerve enough to tell me they didn't get him out.

HAGER: Just a few days ago the family got a letter from their son postmarked the day he was killed. In the letter McMANN told his mother not to worry and said he hoped he would be home very soon. Robert Hager, NBC News, Wilburn, Mass.

CHANCELLOR: In Marshaltown, Iowa, Corporal JUDGE's brother Loren, an Air Force sergeant, said the JUDGE family is optimistic that their body will be returned, and that, in Loren's words, "the bible says to pray for those in authority over you rather than ridicule them, support them."

***

Peter RODINO, the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, today called

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

President FORD's request for humanitarian aid for South Vietnamese refugees legislation of the highest national priority. RODINO said, "when this country forgets its immigrant heritage and turns its back on the oppressed and homeless, so indeed has written finish to the American dream." The State Department, acting on that premise, has set up an office to take telephone calls from Americans who would like to sponsor Vietnamese refugees. Richard Valeriani has that story.

RICHARD VALERIANI: The telephone center which is open from eight in the morning until midnight has been taking in more than 1,000 calls a day since it was set up on Monday. The calls are coming from individuals as well as organizations willing to guarantee jobs or some other kind of support for the refugees. Anybody can be a sponsor if he can provide the support. State Department employees and a battery of temporary secretaries fill information forms which indicate whether the call is to sponsor a specific person or family he knew in Vietnam, or somebody with special skills, or just any refugee. The forms are then passed on to voluntary relief agencies which have the job of certifying the sponsors and matching their requests with the refugees. Administration officials are confident sponsors will eventually be found for all 125,000 refugees from Vietnam. Richard Valeriani, NBC News, Washington.

CHANCELLOR: A group of refugee Cambodians reached Camp Pendleton, California today. There are already more than 12,000 South Vietnamese refugees at Pendleton and they've taken some practical steps to prepare themselves for the transition to American life. Ray Cullen has that story.

RAY CULLEN: The refugee camp is divided into five major tent areas. This one is home for 4,000 refugees. A governmental structure has been organized by the Vietnamese headed by a 20 member executive committee. Overall is a village chief who coordinates activities with the military camp commander. There is also a chief for each area and a chief for each row of tents. They meet daily to discuss common problems. The refugee government was set up by a former Saigon banker and MIT graduate.

VIETNAMESE BANKER: The first action that we took was to get right away a nucleus of Vietnamese responsible and try to cooperate in the management of our camp.

CULLEN: Schools have been organized and teachers recruited from among the ranks of the evacuees. English classes began this week. Older children learn English through folk songs. The English classes and other parts of the program were all designed to aid in the transition of the refugees to American life. Ray Cullen, NBC News, Camp Pendleton, Calif.

CHANCELLOR: The second convoy of foreign refugees coming out of Phnom Penh in Cambodia is now reportedly only 36 miles from the border of Thailand. The convoy may have as many as 250 people in it, including five Americans, and it may be the last out of Cambodia. When it does get out the newsmen will be able to tell the full story of the Khmer Rouge takeover of Cambodia. Newsmen who got away in the first convoy have promised to say nothing until everybody got out.

At Camp Pendleton today it was charged that Lon NOL, once President of Cambodia, had to be given a one million dollar bribe to step down and leave the country. The accusation was made by Sakhan KHOY who served as acting president after Lon NOL quit. KHOY said it was a good buy, Lon NOL was so strong, he had all the military and civil power but he was a sick man. KHOY added that the cabinet had decided the million dollar bribe.

And this should be noted. President FORD officially proclaimed today to be the last day of the Vietnam war era. He did so in cancelling some wartime benefits; (unintelligible) allowances, death pensions for survivors and benefits for non-service disabilities, for men and women entering the military after yesterday.

(Commercials and other reports)

CHANCELLOR: The President met at the White House today with the Prime Ministers of Australia and New Zealand. He told them that the fall of South Vietnam has in no way weakened American resolve to stand by allies and friends. Mr. FORD met later with British Prime Minister Harold WILSON.

Suez Canal

CHANCELLOR: And finally this evening a story about one of the great works of mankind, which hasn't been working for nearly eight years. The Suez Canal was closed by the Egyptians during their 1967 war with Israel, for a long time it was closed to shipping. But with American help -- our Navy helped to clear the mines -- the canal was cleared by the Egyptians and is going to be open soon. There was some news from there today and John Palmer has a report on that by satellite.

JOHN PALMER: On the morning of June 5th, 1967 a large convoy of merchant ships was northbound in the Suez Canal

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

when war broke out between Egypt and Israel. Since then 15 of the ships have been stranded here, midway up the canal, in this section and in the great bitter lake, trapped by the debris of war. Now almost eight years and another war later the ships, with their corroded hulls and rusting engines, are about to complete the 100 mile trip up the waterway into the Mediterranean Sea. The final job in a $300 million clearing operation for next month's reopening of the Suez Canal. Only two are still able to make the trip under their own power.

The prospect of the canal's reopening next month is being greeted here with the same kind of enthusiasm that must have accompanied the first opening of the waterway in 1869. It means badly needed revenue for Egypt and the savings of billions of dollars for world shipping. But most important it will create an international economic buffer zone, one that could discourage a fifth Arab-Israeli war. John Palmer, NBC News, at the Suez Canal.

CHANCELLOR: Palmer is quite right when he says the reopening of the canal will make war in that part of the world more difficult. When I was in Cairo last month talking with President SADAT of Egypt, I asked him if the reopening of the canal and the rebuilding of Egyptian cities along the canal would not be a deterrent to both sides. SADAT said yes. So the canal story is a bit of good news.

CBS EVENING NEWS CBS TV
7:00 PM MAY 7

Indochina and Refugee News

WALTER CRONKITE: Good evening. A House subcommittee is working into the night, so far with speed rare for Congress, on legislation to aid Vietnamese refugees. The panel began its consideration today with an appeal from New Jersey Democrat Peter RODINO, himself an immigrant's son, not to close the nations' doors to the homeless. Lesley Stahl reports.

LESLEY STAHL: The administration bill is being sponsored by House Judiciary Chairman RODINO who called the issue non-partisan.

REP. PETER RODINO: When this country forgets its immigrant heritage and turns its back on the homeless, the fearful and the oppressed of the world, we will have indeed written finish to the American dream.

STAHL: To get the bill passed the administration accepted two subcommittee recommendations: that large American companies like the television networks be asked to reimburse the government for any evacuation expenses; and that something be done about any so-called undesirable refugees. The setting up of detention camps was discussed.

-

House members are not full accepting the administration's assertions that all refugee money will run out by this weekend. In fact, a final appropriations bill is not expected to pass both House and Senate for another two weeks. Lesley Stahl, CBS News, on Capitol Hill.

CRONKITE: An estimated 20,000 Vietnamese refugees believed to be the last large group evacuated from Saigon arrived in the Philippines today and were taken on to Guam. They were aboard 24 South Vietnamese navy ships all now flying the American flag. Other refugees, these from Cambodia, have arrived in Calif. and one of them made a startling accusation today. Terry Drinkwater reports.

TERRY DRINKWATER: More than 600 Cambodian refugees are now at Camp Pendleton. When their country fell to the Communists they fled first to Thailand and finally here, their new country. With them the last president of Cambodia, Sakhan KHOY. He said, through an interpreter, that his predecessor as president Lon NOL was given a million dollar bribe to leave Cambodia. KHOY said that Lon NOL was too sick a man to deal with the desperate situation in Phnom Penh just before the capital fell. So, he said, government leaders agreed to give him a million dollars in American money to leave. Lon NOL lives now in Hawaii, KHOY will live here temporarily in a quonset hut. But he said today, I am not bitter. The Cambodians at Camp Pendleton, like the Vietnamese, will be processed and then move on to their new homes throughout the United States. In the Vietnamese camp today a new problem, lost children. There are now nearly 15,000 refugees here and many youngsters have become separated from their families. For some of the refugees badly needed clothes were handed out today. Perhaps in response to President FORD's defense of the refugees last night many people came here to donate clothing. It was our way, one lady said, of making the Vietnamese feel welcome. Terry Drinkwater, CBS News, Camp Pendleton.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CRONKITE: In Honolulu Lon NOL was not immediately available for comment. Last week, just before Saigon fell during the Communists' final assault on Tansonnhut Airport, two U.S. Marines were killed; Corporal Charles McMANN of Wilburn, Mass. and Lance Corporal Darwin JUDGE of Marshaltown, Iowa. Today the Pentagon said that in the confusion of the Saigon evacuation the bodies of those Marines were left behind. In Massachusetts McMANN's father had this reaction.

McMANN: (Same as Hager report on NBC)

CRONKITE: There's been no confirmation from the new Saigon government that it has the bodies. The State Department said it is pressing its inquiries.

President FORD has proclaimed this day as the end of the Vietnam war era as far as eligibility for some wartime veterans benefits. The proclamation does not effect GI Bill education and job training rights, but the White House says Mr. FORD will ask Congress to terminate those benefits on July 1st.

(Commercials)

CRONKITE: With a massive show of potential firepower, Vietcong and North Vietnamese troops entered Saigon the morning of April 30th, gathering outside Saigon's presidential palace. Pictures of Ho Chi MINH, architect of the Vietnamese revolution, were carried in triumph. East German television, which shot this film, described the atmosphere as festive. Today for the first time in a week international communications with Saigon were restored. First reports from that city indicated there were no reported Vietcong reprisals and life there returned to normal within 48 hours. Even the black market is open, according to today's report, with new customers, the Communists, buying material looted from the American PX. But a week after the takeover, these reports say, there is no police force for Saigon and still no operating government.

The Pentagon says it retrieved more than 100 planes and helicopters from Thailand before the Thai government demanded yesterday that the removal be suspended. One hundred and twenty-two U.S. supplied South Vietnamese aircraft had been flown into Thailand just before Saigon's capture last week. A Pentagon spokesman said most of the aircraft left in Thailand were unserviceable. Both the United States and Communist South Vietnam had claimed those planes, putting Thailand in a diplomatic squeeze. Murray Fromson, in the second of two reports, takes a look at how Thailand is adapting to the recent developments in SE Asia.

MURRAY FROMSON: The Thais have suddenly been outflanked by Communists, socialists or neutralist countries. The most visible evidence is the presence of Khmer Rouge troops along the Cambodian frontier. So once again the Thais are forced to equate survival with flexibility, that is, the ability to make concessions to potential enemies. The Thais have applied the diplomatic flip-flop for two centuries, with the British, the French and the Japanese. In doing so they've been the only people in SE Asia never to have been colonized. From hawkish anti-Communism the Thais seem ready to bend like the proverbial bamboo back toward a more neutral position. After years of collaboration misgivings are being expressed about Bangkok's 20 year alliance with the United States. The removal of the U.S. military presence within a year is under negotiation. A U.S. troop cutback has just been announced, yet there's a nagging feeling that Washington may try to preserve some residual rights at the huge Utapao Airbase complex on the Gulf of Thailand. If that goes, said one American official the other day, we have nothing between the Philippines and Iran. From a peak of 64,000 men in 1968 the number of Americans still based in Thailand is 23,000, and they'll be cut nearly in half again by June. The artifacts of the American presence are everywhere. In a Bangkok shop the casings for bombs that were to be dropped on North Vietnam are now being sold after being converted into temple bells. But the Thais fate may hinge on how they deal with their internal problems, trouble is brewing in the north and NE provinces as it has been for nearly a decade. The seeds of insurgency have been implanted among people who are geographically closer to Hanoi and to China than to Bangkok. Since 1968 the number of guerrillas has grown from 500 to 7,500, according to intelligence sources. Not all the insurgents are Communists. The hill tribes of the so-called golden triangle that joins Thailand to Laos and Burma fiercely oppose any attempts to control their opium trade. The Communists are merely capitalizing on the disaffection caused by years of neglect, harrassment and corruption traceable to officials and army units assigned by Bangkok. Along the 1,000 miles of frontier with Cambodia and Laos the Thais have no more than 12,000 soldiers or border police scattered in pockets of platoon sized strength. The gap between Bangkok and the countryside is striking, a consumer society versus one still waiting to have its expectations fulfilled.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

THAI MAN: We have a rich government with very poor people. There's got to be correction, we can't go on very much longer under that system.

FROMSON: Since the overthrow of the military dictatorship 18 months ago, more Thais are speaking out than ever before, critical of the government. For the first time they're enjoying the benefits of free speech, a free press and assembly. There's a tendency to draw sweeping conclusions about the future of this country, especially by those who would justify the domino theory. But Thailand is not Vietnam or Cambodia, its foundation rests on a strong belief in Buddhism and the monarchy. It has an experienced, if somewhat mossback civil service, a healthy treasury, natural resources and a sense of nationhood as well as international recognition. If it fails to survive the fault will be mostly its own. Murray Fromson, CBS News, Bangkok.

CRONKITE: Communist led forces in Laos have captured the strategic town of Muang Kasi 75 miles north of the capital, Vientiane. Soon after the town was overrun though the Communists and non-Communist members of the Laotian coalition government signed a cease-fire to end the three weeks Communist offensive in the area.

Ford Reassures Allies

CRONKITE: Meanwhile President FORD is becoming more personally involved with foreign policy. He's scheduled meetings with leaders of 15 nations over the next six weeks and more from Bob Schieffer.

BOB SCHIEFFER: Today three of those foreign leaders beginning with New Zealand's Wallace RAWLING (?) were ushered in and out of the Oval office. The President's concern now is that the Vietnam debacle will cause other nations, especially those in the Pacific, to doubt U.S. resolve. So the message to RAWLING, and later in the day to Australia's Goulf WHITLAM (?) and finally to Great Britain's Harold WILSON, was the same, that the United States will stand by its friends and has no intention of pulling out of the Pacific or the rest of the world. The President struck that same theme during his news conference last night when he said the United States intends to strengthen its ties with South Korea and reaffirm its committments to Taiwan. That raised some eyebrows here, but officials said today it did not mean the United States was giving up on normalizing relations with Communist China. Even so it did seem to be a pointed reminder to the Chinese that the United States intends to honor its defense treaties with Taiwan and South Korea. By the way, as Mr. FORD was trying to brace up foreign policy today his 17 year old daughter Susan was embarking on a mission of her own.

Bob Schieffer, CBS News, the White House.

SALT Differences

CRONKITE: In Geneva today the SALT talks between the United States and the Soviet Union were reset for a month because of differences over undisclosed complex issues.

Eric Sevareid Analysis

CRONKITE: Much of the early public reaction to resettling the Vietnamese refugees here was protest. But Eric Sevareid senses a swing in the pendulum of opinion and here is his commentary.

ERIC SEVAREID: President FORD appealed to the best instincts of the American people last night, a change from the last few years, and has every reason to think the homeless Vietnamese refugees will stay in this country, will be assimilated with the help of fairly generous funding that this Congress will provide. The flurry of opposition to welcoming these people -- most of them children incidentally -- now looks like just that, a flurry. In contrast thousands of Americans have offered their help to the refugees, even their own homes, a far harder thing to do than writing a telegram of protest. The total of the protest messages received at the White House so far around 3,000 is tiny compared to the mail received when people are deeply aroused by an issue or an incident. The refugee difficulty will become localized, more resistance in places where large numbers of them are deposited, particularly those places that already have a high rate of joblessness. But it is not beyond the wit of man to disperse the refugees into many other places. Leaders of the Roman Catholic hierarchy have now spoken in favor of accepting the Vietnamese, so have Jewish leaders and so have labor leaders, the most critically important group. Some of these refugees are going to want to return to Vietnam sooner or later, some will find their way to other countries and other countries should be pressed to help. The welcoming gestures from some countries that supported the Vietnam war, the Philippines for example and Australia, have scarcely been impressive. Indeed the Philippino panic to have the refugees shuttled away from them to Guam, tying up the rescue planes, probably reduced the number of the desperate that we were able to rescue. Refugee resettlement is supposed to be one of the things the United Nations is for and it will be pressed for action. The basic difficulty is a familiar one, the more the U.S. does in any such enterprise the more other governments lie back and let us do it. A 100,000 or so Vietnamese equals about one-fourth the number of immigrants taken in here each year by legal means. It is scarcely one-fourth of the number who get in each year illegally from Mexico and the Caribbean region. This, of course, is not 19th century America when immigrants were needed for an unsettled land and immigration has to be limited. No other country in the world stands for anything like the illegal immigration that we receive and it is that part of the problem that has to be firmly dealt with. Had America turned its back on these Vietnamese the world's judgment would be that we fought that war purely for power purposes, not for the human purposes of saving those people from totalitarian rule. It would have been the worst possible auspices for the bicentennial, the anniversary of the world equine declaration that this land was to be different, the foe of all those who tyrannized over the mind of man.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

ABC EVENING NEWS ABC TV
7:00 PM MAY 7

Vietnam Refugee News

HOWARD K. SMITH: President FORD today marked the official end of the Vietnam era. He issued a proclamation cancelling some wartime benefits for servicemen and asked Congress to eliminate the GI Bill education program for anybody entering the military after July 1st. Meanwhile, there are indications that a new post-Vietnam defense policy is beginning to emerge. We have reports first from ABC White House correspondent Tom Jarriel.

TOM JARRIEL: As President FORD today signed a formal proclamation required by law designating midnight tonight as the last day of the Vietnam era the administration continued a reassessment of its SE Asia policy. It's taking form along these lines. It's hoped detente with the Communist giant Peking will continue, even though hard line presidential statements of support for the Nationalist government on Taiwan could result in the President's being disinvited to mainland China later this year. The U.S. concern is to draw clearly defensible lines based on considerations of geography and formal defense treaties. The line would begin with protection for Japan, it would extend across the 38th parallel in Korea, South Korea is viewed by U.S. officials as a forward defense area. American troops will remain there for the foreseeable future. The island of Taiwan is considered defensible and protected by treaty. The line would continue southward, putting the Philippines under the U.S. shield, plus Indonesia, Australia and New Zealand. Left on the Communist fringe with little more than a moral committment of U.S. help are Laos, Thailand, Singapore and Malaysia. Personal diplomacy aimed at reassuring South Pacific allies began today with a White House call, first by the Prime Minister of New Zealand Wallace RAWLING and later in the day by Australian leader Goulf WHITLAM. Both nations are protected by U.S. treaty obligations, both leaders were advised those pledges are still binding in the post-Vietnam era. Tom Jarriel, ABC News, at the White House.

TED KOPPEL: This is Ted Koppel in Washington. What appeared to give added meaning to the President's reaffirmation of support to Taiwan is the fact that it was the first time in more than two years that an American President has publicly recommitted the United States to that country. ABC News has learned, however, that the President inadvertently included Taiwan in his list of Asian countries to which he was reaffirming American support. Taiwan's Ambassador, however, Jin SHIN (?) was delighted to take the President's words at face value.

It is your understanding and the understanding of your government that in the event of an attack on your territory that the United States would in a military fashion come to your assistance?

AMBASSADOR JIN SHIN: Well we expect it to act according to treaty and to meet the common danger.

KOPPEL: Well that's ambiguous diplomatic language. Does that mean come to your military assistance?

AMBASSADOR SHIN: We certainly hope so, cause otherwise it would be difficult to read any other meaning into this particular clause in the treaty.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

KOPPEL: Administration officials are embarrassed by the incident, insisting that nothing has happened to cause a reassessment of America's new policy of detente with Peking, but unable to publicly retract President FORD's warm words of support last night for Taiwan. This is Ted Koppel, ABC News, Washington.

SMITH: Western communications with Saigon were restored today following a week long blackout. Reports from the Associated Press and UPI reporters who stayed behind when the Communists took over said that the city is back to normal with major hotels operating, markets open and no restrictions on the movement of foreign newsmen. A UPI dispatch says the actual takeover was smooth and quick. The AP says there was a big rally in Saigon today where the military commander of the city warned that there would be severe punishment for those acting as henchmen for foreign countries. East German television today released what are said to be the first pictures of Saigon since the city fell to the Communists. Arnold Collins narrates.

ARNOLD COLLINS: East German television today broadcast the first film to come out of Saigon under the new regime. A commentator said the film was shot within hours after the PRG takeover. Apparently happy South Vietnamese are seen marching through the streets in the city now also known as Ho Chi MINH city. East German television called it a fantastic welcome for liberators. It said the people gathered around tanks deployed in front of the South Vietnamese palace. Saigon's new look included pretty girls talking to friendly, smiling Vietcong soldiers. The East German commentator said that even on this first day of the Communist takeover, traffic and food and water supplies were back to normal and the people werepreparing to rebuild their country. Arnold Collins, ABC News.

SMITH: In Washington a House Judiciary subcommittee today began considering provisions of a measure to pay for the resettlement of the Vietnamese refugees. The Judiciary Committee chairman Peter RODINO urged swift action, saying, when this country forgets its immigrant heritage we will have written finish to the American dream. Labor Secretary John DUNLOP said that both federal and state employment officials have begun interviewing refugees at processing centers and the State Department has set up a toll free number for people offering jobs, training or other forms of assistance to Vietnamese refugees, and it said it's getting swamped with calls. A department spokesman said offers of assistance are coming in at about the rate of 2,000 a day. And in California local and state officials have begun making specific plans to deal with the impact of the Vietnamese refugees now located at Camp Pendleton.

HARRY REASONER: The Pentagon said today that in the confusion of trying to evacuate Saigon the bodies of the last two Marines killed there were mistakenly left behind. It's believed the bodies of Lance Corporal Darwin JUDGE of Marshaltown, Iowa and Corporal Charles McMAHON, Jr., of Wilburn, Mass. were left in the 7th day Adventist hospital in Saigon. When it was discovered that the bodies were not on any of the evacuation ships or planes, the families of both men were notified. Today at his home outside Boston Charles McMAHON talked about the mix-up with his son's body.

CHARLES McMAHON: They didn't tell me four or five days ago. And it also seems to me if they can evacuate 130,000 Vietnamese refugees they could at least get the two boys who were killed out. (Rest of this statement is same as Hager report)

REASONER: In Marshaltown, Iowa the family of Lance Corporal JUDGE were reported to be optimistic that his body could be returned to the United States for burial.

Due to insufficient space items of relevance to DOD from the CBS Morning News and the Today Show NBC News of May 7, 1975 have not been included.

PLEASE NOTE: Complete transcripts of the following are available;

Vietnam: A War That Is Finished... CBS TV April 29, 1975.

Evening Edition EE TV May 5, 1975 Interview Rep. Wayne Hays, Rep. Charles Whalen, Stanely Karnow, New Republic.

Overseas Mission Syndicated Radio May 7, 1975 U.S. Ambassador to Sri Lanka.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CURRENT NEWS

PART I - EARLY BIRD EDITION - 0730

PART II - MAIN EDITION - PUBLISHED AT 1130

THIS PUBLICATION IS PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL NEWS ITEMS OF INTEREST TO THEM IN THEIR OFFICIAL CAPACITIES: IT IS NOT INTENDED TO SUBSTITUTE FOR NEWSPAPERS, PERIODICALS AND BROADCASTS AS A MEANS OF KEEPING INFORMED ABOUT THE NATURE, MEANING AND IMPACT OF NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL NEWS DEVELOPMENTS. USE OF THESE ARTICLES HERE, OF COURSE, DOES NOT REFLECT OFFICIAL ENDORSEMENT. FURTHER REPRODUCTION FOR PRIVATE USE OR GAIN IS SUBJECT TO THE ORIGINAL COPYRIGHT RESTRICTIONS.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 7, 1975

WASHINGTON POST 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

U.S. Halts Plane Pullout in Thailand

By Bruce Palling
Special to The Washington Post

BANGKOK, May 6—The U.S. embassy here agreed today to a "temporary suspension" of the withdrawal American-supplied aircraft flown into Thailand last week by fleeing south Vietnamese pilots.

The agreement follows the removal of all of the more sophisticated jet fighters and cargo planes in the past two days to the carrier Midway in the Gulf of Siam and to Clark Air Base in the Philippines.

The U.S. embassy here has refused to disclose any details of the plane withdrawal even though the Pentagon announced the move yesterday in Washington.

Newsmen on a press tour of the Utapao Air Base today saw about 40 to 50 aircraft on the base which had presumably come from South Vietnam.

(See PULLOUT, Pg.4)

BALTIMORE SUN 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

Soviet held ready to offer missile cuts after talks

By MICHAEL PARKS
Moscow Bureau of The Sun

Moscow—The Soviet Union is offering to negotiate reductions in the numbers of missiles allowed under strategic arms agreements with the United States once a new arms treaty is concluded, according to sources here.

The Soviet offer apparently is intended to improve prospects for fast agreement and ratification of the next treaty, whose broad terms were set in November at the Vladivostok summit meeting.

As the Kremlin sees it, the Ford administration would be able to use a public Soviet commitment to reduce the two superpowers' arsenals in order to overcome extensive criticism in the U.S. to the limits agreed upon at the Far Eastern Soviet port.

What Moscow hopes to gain beyond reduced opposition to the new agreement and to Soviet-American detente in general is not clear, however; some diplomatic sources have suggested, though, that the Soviet Union is seeking U.S. concessions on several highly technical but important issues in current negotiations on a treaty implementing the Vladivostok agreement.

The Soviet offer meets a key U.S. demand, which was incorporated in negotiations, to begin immediately after the conclusion of the next arms agreement to set lower ceilings on the numbers of strategic weapons and to curb development of new weapons.

The sponsors of the resolution—Senators Edward M. Kennedy (D., Mass.), Walter F. Mondale (D., Minn.) and Charles McC. Mathias, Jr. (R.,

(See SOVIET, Pg. 4)

NEW YORK TIMES 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

Standing by Commitments, Ford Assures U.S. Allies

By JAMES M. NAUGHTON
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 6 — President Ford, declaring that the United States had learned the lessons of Vietnam, said tonight that he would pursue a vigorous leadership "on a worldwide basis."

He acknowledged, in a nationally televised news conference, that United States allies had doubts, following the loss of Cambodia and Vietnam to the Communists, about this country's commitments.

But he said such doubts were "not a reality" because the United States would remain strong militarily and economically.

"We want our friends to know that we will stand by them and we want any potential adversaries to know that we will stand up to them," Mr. Ford asserted.

He also pledged "forward movements in foreign policy that will be beneficial to peace," including efforts to strengthen United States ties to South Korea and to reassure such Asian allies as Nationalist China, Indonesia and the Philippines of continuing support.

The President said that the "atmosphere is good" for a strategic arms limitation agreement with the Soviet Union, although the negotiations would be "hard."

(See FORD, Pg. 2)

WASHINGTON POST
7 MAY 1975 Pg.1

Pentagon Budget Slashed

By Michael Getler
Washington Post Staff Writer

The House Armed Services Committee yesterday voted a record $3.7 billion cut in the Defense Department's $29.8 billion request for new weapons but Pentagon critics on the committee called much of the reduction "phony."

Included in the cuts is $1.3 billion the Pentagon wanted in the next fiscal year for military aid to South Vietnam.

Rep. Les Aspin (D-Wis.), one of a handful of members on the traditionally pro-Pentagon panel who frequently challenge defense programs, said the Vietnam aid request is now "a moot point and shouldn't be considered as part of the overall cut."

(See BUDGET, Pg. 2)

GENERAL NEWS SUMMARY
FROM THE WALL STREET JOURNAL
MAY 7, 1975

World-Wide

FORD ASKED AMERICANS to welcome refugees from Indochina.

The President told a news conference he is "very upset" at reports of resistance to the refugees. He said he understood economic misgivings about the influx but added that only 35,000 of the estimated 120,000 refugees are likely to seek jobs and noted that the AFL-CIO yesterday urged union members to welcome them. Ford said the lessons of Vietnam have already been learned and a congressional inquiry would be divisive.

The U.S. will continue to be involved in Asia and will keep its commitments to Taiwan, the President said.

Ford reaffirmed his intention to run for the presidency in 1976 and said a GOP group led by Dean Burch will begin work on his campaign "in a very informal way." He said he thought Republican foreign achievements since 1968 and an expected economic upturn give him a good chance of winning.

Ford opposed registration of guns or their owners and said he isn't committed to

(See NEWS SUMMARY, Pg. 5)

JAMES KILLINGBECK, CHIEF, CURRENT NEWS BRANCH, OX 78765 HELEN YOUNG, ASSISTANT CHIEF.
FOR SPECIAL RESEARCH SERVICES OR DISTRIBUTION CALL HARRY ZUBKOFF, CHIEF, EXECUTIVE AGENCY SERVICE, OX 52884

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK TIMES
7 MAY 1975 Pg. 30

President Assures Congress on Curbs For Nuclear Arms

WASHINGTON, May 6 (AP)—President Ford assured Congress today that his Administration was giving "priority concern" to preventing the proliferation of nuclear weapons or the acquisition of nuclear explosive material for possible nonpeaceful uses.

In a message to Congress, the President said, "Whatever efforts are needed to allow the United States and other countries to enjoy the benefits of nuclear power, without fear, will be taken by the Government of the United States."

Mr. Ford said the United States was taking the lead in proposing measures to prevent terrorist groups from capturing or sabotaging nuclear materials and facilities.

The President included with his message a report on United States laws and regulations governing nuclear exports and safeguards.

"Current laws provide ample authority to control the export and re-export of nuclear-related material, equipment and technology," Mr. Ford said.

But, he said, existing policies and regulations were constantly being reviewed and "changed as appropriate" to make them more effective.

He also said the United States was encouraging the strengthening of international safeguards through participation in international discussions and through the adoption of an internation l agreement.

FORD ... CONTINUED

The President declined at the outset to entertain the suggestion that a Congressional inquiry might somehow determine where the policy of five President ann six congresses had erred in Indochina. And he urged the nation to look ahead rather than back as it began the post-Vietnam era.

"It sees to e that it's over," Mr. Ford said of the Vietnam experience.

He said that the war had been "sad and tragic in many respects" and that it would merely foster continued divisiveness to "rehash allegations as to individuals that might be to blame, or administrations that might be at fault."

"I think the lessons of the past in Vietnam have already been learned," Mr. Ford declared "Learned by Presidents, learned by Congress, learned by the American people, and we should have our focus on the future."

The news conference, in the spacious theater in the Executive Office Building next to the White House, was Mr. Ford's first since the fall of Phnom Penh on April 17 and the surrender of Saigon Last Wednesday. As a result it was dominated by the causes and consequences of the two events, which Mr. Ford said last week "closes a chapter in the American experience."

The President, evidently pursuing domestic unity as a prelude to efforts at strengthening United States diplomacy, had set the tone for his appearance tonight by proposing that "reconciliation, not recrimination" be the theme of the post-Vietnam era.

The President was said to believe that if he did not rally Americans behind his policies allies and potential foreign opponents might conclude that the political instability that has marked the last decade in the United States was likely to continue.

At his last full-dress news conference, on April 3 in San Diego, Mr. Ford noted the refusal of Congress to supply military assistance to South Vietnam and Cambodia and said it was "up to the American people to pass judgment on who was at fault and where the blame may rest" if those two nations should fall.

More recently, however, the President has led the Administration away from such suggestions. Secretary of State Kissinger told a Washington audience that the Congressional verdict on military aid would be accepted "without recrimination or vindictiveness."

And Mr. Ford, in a speech at Tulane university in New Orleans on April 23, proposed "a great national reconciliation." The time has arrived, he said, "to look forward to an agenda for the future, to unity, to binding up the nation's wounds and restoring it to health and optimistic self-confidence."

To Confer With Premiers

The President will begin specific discussions on diplomatic relations tomorrow in a series of private meetings here with Prime Ministers Harold Wilson of Britain, Gough Whitlam of Australia and Wallace E. Rowling of New Zealand. On Thursday, he will confer with Prime Minister Lee Kwan Yew of Singapore.

Later this month Mr. Ford will embark on a European trip, his first as President, during which he will meet with Western leaders at a conference of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in Brussels. He will later to Spain, Austria and Italy and confer during the trip with President Anwar El-Sadat of Egypt.

Mr. Ford will meet her next month with Premier Yitzhak Rabin of Israel.

BUDGET ... CONTINUED

Another $1 billion was trimmed from the Navy's shipbuilding program, but no ship projects were actually cut back. The committee instead voted to defer a Navy request for money to cover anticipated contract claims and inflation on ships under construction.

"We're going to have to come up with that money and maybe more next year," Aspin said. "They just put it off, not cut it."

According to Aspin's arithmetic, the actual cuts in the panel's annual weapons procurement and research and development authorization bill amount to about $1.3 billion, not $3.7 billion.

The committee gave its full support to the $749 million Air Force request for its top priority B-1 bomber development project, and made a $45 million cut in the Navy's $2 billion request for its top-priority Trident missile-firing submarine.

The panel cut $260 million from Air Force plans to build a fleet of new radar-packed aircraft known as AWACS intended to warn of enemy air attack. The reductions limit the Air Force to the purchase of three rather than six planes next year.

The panel trimmed $185 million from another new plane the Air Force and White House want as a new airborne command post for the President in a nuclear emergency. The reduction keeps the project in development rather than allowing it to move into production.

The House committee—as in previous years—inserted an extra $115 million in the Defense budget to buy 24 more Texas-built A-7D attack planes for the National Guard. The Pentagon did not request these craft.

The House panel also denied a $300 million request by the Pentagon to set up a new fund that would allow quick replacement of weapons taken out of stockpiles for overseas sales.

In the Senate, the Pentagon also appeared to be avoiding, at least at this point, the major slashes in new weapons projects that some defense officials feared would be forthcoming from a new and more liberal Congress.

The Senate Armed Services Committee, meeting behind closed doors, voted 11 to 4 to approve five projects intended to improve the accuracy and lethality of long-range U.S. missiles

In so, doing the full committee overturned an earlier 3-to-2 vote by a subcommittee to kill these projects, which some critics say could stir up the arms race by threatening to knockout an opposing missile force in a surprise first strike.

The Senate panel, it was learned, also voted 9-to-6 to cut $222 million out of the B-1 project. But this reduction continues the B-1 in development and cuts out only the funds related to tooling up for actual production. The decision on whether to mass-produce the new plane is not scheduled to be made until November, 1976.

Because the government is moving toward a fiscal year that will eventually begin annually on Oct. 1, this year's budget request includes both the 12-month period from July 1, 1975 and an additional three-month transition period running from uly 1, 1976, to Oct. 1, 1976.

Thus, in the house committee action yesterday, a total of $1.7 billion was cut from the new authorization request of $28.2 billion for the 12 months of fiscal 1976. The Vietnam money and $300 million stockpile fund brought the total fiscal '76 request to $29.8 billion.

In addition, $390 million was trimmed from the $5.8 billion requested for new weapons procurement and development for the three-month transition period.

Aside from its fiscal actions, the House committee also tabled an amendment that would allow women to enter military academies and go into combat. Rep. Sam Stratton (D-NY) said he would take his academies campaign to the House floor but would probably drop the combat provision.

NEW YORK TIMES
7 MAY 1975 Pg. 67

Army on Airwaves

The Army, which like the other branches of the Armed forces is forbidden to use paid full-time advertising in recruiting, this week started its second test of the airwaves. Its a small one—$600,000 for 13 weeks on radio in 15 markets—and its being done by N. W. Ayer ABH International. The first test, in 1971, used both TV and radio by all accounts was very successful.

WASHINGTON POST
7 MAY 1975 Pg. 46

Spain Said to Want NATO Membership

According to an authoritative source in Washington, the Spanish government remains very much interested in NATO membership but recognizes that it continues to be unobtainable because of opposition from Denmark, Norway, Belgium, and to some extent, the Netherlands.

Spain wanted a firm bilateral defense guarantee from the United States but Washington balked at that, an American source said. The United States preference, is to obtain for Spain a direct NATO acknowledgment that U.S. access to bases in Spain contributes to NATO defense. This is the present focus of discussions, it was said.

It is questionable whether this can be arranged in time to be added to the NATO communique to be issued at the end of the forthcoming NATO summit conference in Brussels, however.

Events in Portugal are said to have underscored the importance of Spain to Western defense in the American perception. American diplomats have been telling their Spanish counterparts that European attitudes in time are likely to become more syimpathetic to Spanish participation in NATO.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON POST - 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 46

Ford, Franco Seek to Heal Rift on Bases

By Miguel Acoca
Special to The Washington Post

MADRID, May 6—Wide differences between Washington and Madrid over continuation of U.S. military bases in Spain will be the key topic when President Ford visits here late this month for talks with Generalissimo Francisco Franco, informed sources said today.

While Spain is anxious to continue its military relationship with the United States, "We are not in the mood for just another piece of paper," a senior Spanish official said.

The Spanish bases are considered vital to the Western defense system particularly the U.S. nuclear submarine base at Rota in Southern Spain.

Pro-Arab Spain, however, has steadfastly refused to allow American use of the bases here to resupply Israel. It does not recognize Israel and there are no indications Spain intends to change its policy.

The hardened Spanish positions has become clear after four months of negotiations here and in Washington. The two countries, sources said, are far apart on the following:

- Continued American use of Torrejon, the big joint U.S.-Spain base in Madrid's suburbs. Spain also wants the Americans to giving up the mothballed Moron Air Base.
- A mutual security treaty.
- Modern military hardware for the Spanish armed forces.
- Contracts to manufacture U.S. weapons and components in Spain under licensing arrangements.

Coloring official Spanish attitudes toward the U.S. and a new agreement on the bases are such related matters as U.S. support of Morocco in its dispute with Spain over the Spanish Sahara and U.S. refusal to back Spain's case against Britain for the return of Gibraltar.

Franco, who at 82 sees his 36 years of authoritarian rule coming to a close, presumably would like to see these problems settled with American help before he fades from the scene.

Another thorny issue involves American strategy to link Spain to NATO. Spain has been excluded from the alliance because of Franco's association with the Axis powers in World War II.

Reflecting the view of the Spanish military, the air minister has declared publicly that Spain is not interested in joining NATO. The military also resent U.S. efforts to structure a "backdoor" NATO association for Spain through a joint declaration signed last summer. It said that the bilateral defense relationship "is complementary to that of existing security arrangements in the Atlantic framework and that equal treatment should be accorded to all the countries of the region."

Franco and the Spanish military were reportedly outraged by a recent U. S. weapons sale to Morocco, which is seeking to annex the phosphate-rich Spanish Sahara territory in northwest Africa and to oust Spain from two enclaves in Morocco.

Spanish officials are said to feel that the United States must recognize that Spain has been a faithful ally and that the bilateral relationship must be sharply upgraded to reflect present power realities in Europe and the Mediterranean.

It is felt that this is especially necessary following the U.S. setbacks in Indochina and political changes in Greece, Turkey and Portugal affecting the American military presence.

Franco invited President Ford upon learning that negotiations were proceeding so badly that they might not be finished by September, when the present agreement expires. He made it clear that, while he is eager to conclude a new bases agreement, any new accord must be rewarding not only politically but economically.

Spanish thinking has also been affected by the left-wing military government in neighboring Portugal. Spanish officials fear that if the worst predictions of Secretary of State Henry Kissinger come to pass and Portugal becomes a Communist-dominated country, Spain will become a target for subversion and guerrilla activities from Portugal, and they want guarantees of U.S. help.

Although Spain remains a politically restricted society, Spanish negotiators are conscious that Spanish public opinion is opposed to foreign military bases here. A newspaper yesterday criticized what it called plans to expand the joint Spanish-American air base at Zaragoza, which would become the main air facility if Torrejon is abandoned.

See RIFT, Pg. 4

BALTIMORE SUN - 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

House panel trims little from Ford military bid

By CHARLES W. CORDDRY
Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—The House Armed Services Committee approved yesterday a $32 billion military procurement bill —$3.7 billion less than President Ford asked—after sidelining a proposal to let women attend the service academies and become combat officers.

At the same time, the Senate Armed Services Committee dealt the Pentagon a sharp blow by striking from its version of the bill a $222 million sum requested to make preparations for production of the B-1 supersonic bomber.

The Senate panel left intact $726 million to continue research and development with four prototypes of the B-1, but its action on the advance production funds reflected increasing congressional concern about the prospective production cost—more than $80 million a plane—of the bomber.

In its action on the bill, in which it made no cuts in B-1 funds, the House reduced the administration's requests considerably less than the nominal $3.7 billion cut indicated.

For example, the cut included $1.3 billion that had been sought for military aid to South Vietnam, a matter now academic. Another $300 million that was disallowed would have been used to stockpile weapons for sales abroad.

A slash of about $1 billion in ship construction requests was mainly a cut in expected escalation of costs—in money, that is, that would not be spent until later years. The committee said it could not accept the Pentagon's escalation estimates at this time.

The House and Senate panels' proposals are for a 15-month period starting July 1 —instead of the usual 12 months—because the government next year is shifting the beginning of fiscal years to October 1. The Senate committee has not yet completed action on its version.

Representative Samuel S. Stratton (D., N.Y.), who tried unsuccessfully in the committee to win entry to the service academies for women, said he planned to take the battle to the House floor.

On a motion by Representative Lucien N. Nedzi (D., Mich.), who heads a manpower subcommittee, the Stratton proposal was tabled, 24 to 22. The Maryland committee member, Marjorie S. Holt (R., 4th) voted with Mr Nedzi, who said there were issues other than sex discrimination, such as suits to establish quotas, that might have to be faced.

Mr. Stratton said the idea of combat coniures up pictures of women in foxholes, but that, in fact, they could serve in such roles as ship's officers and pilot instructors after leaving Annapolis, West Point or Colorado Springs.

Mr. Stratton told a reporter the General Accounting Office has made a study showing as many as 10 per cent of academy graduates do not get combat assignments anyway. He hopes to get a measure passed that will admit women to the academies and then let the controversy over combat duty be resolved at another time.

The annual procurement measure fixes ceilings on sums the services may spend on weapons research, development and production and military manpower. Except for certain increases in Army and Navy reserve strength (about 32,000 in all), the House committee approved Pentagon manpower proposals.

The panel voted for a 5 per cent limit on military pay raises for the January 1, 1975-June 30, 1976 period, provided that a similar kept on civilian raises in the federal establishment. It said that limit would save $828 million in 12 months, whereas a prospective 9 per cent increase would have added more than $2 billion to defense costs. Its net saving was arrived at after taking account of its ruling that proposed increases in military commissary prices be suspended.

The House committee shaved requests for several weapons systems, but in one case—A-7 attack planes for the National Guard—it added $115 million.

Originally yesterday, the Senate committee voted a $338 million cut in the B-1 request. On a motion of Senator Robert A. Taft, Jr. (R., Ohio), it restored $116 million by a 9-to-6 vote.

The Air Force had wanted the advance production money to buy materials and save time if it decided next year that the B-1 should go into production. Opponents argue that such action might have committed Congress prematurely to production.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON POST - 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 43

U.S., Soviets Back Nuclear Pact Again

GENEVA—In a message to the 60-nation conference reviewing the five-year-old nuclear nonproliferation President Ford said yesterday that support for it "is a major tenet of American policy."

The Soviet Union also reaffirmed support for the treaty but the Mexican delegate accused the two major nuclear powers that signed it of dragging their feet on disarmament.

U.S. delegate Fred C. Ikle said that "we have to concern ourselves seriously with the threat of theft and other criminal seizure of nuclear materialm" The Soviet representative also called for international measures to prevent nuclear thefts by criminals and terrorists.

SOVIET ... CONTINUED

Md.)—said their support of any new treaty would depend on acceptance of this condition.

Soviet negotiators at the Geneva talks, which are due to recess shortly, made the Kremlin offer, according to sources here, and it is now being conveyed to congressmen and others outside the administration who are interested in strategic arms limitations.

Over the past weekend, a leading Soviet specialist on American affairs, Georgy Arbatov, said in a Radio Moscow broadcast to the United States that conclusion of the treaty agreed upon at Vladivostok will make it possible "to effect a transition from arms limitation to their reduction."

Dr. Arbatov, director of the Institute for U.S. and Canadian Studies and a Kremlin adviser on foreign affairs, endorsed the resolution proposed by Mr. Kennedy, Mr Mondale and Mr. Mathias as "a very realistic approach to the problem."

Moscow is willing to make this pledge to negotiate reduced ceilings on strategic weapons, multiple warhead missiles and new weapons systems explicitly when the next treaty is concluded, sources here said, if necessary to insure congressional ratification of the pact without full-scale controversy.

Moscow is concerned that Soviet-American rapprochement might be endangered if the treaty is widely criticized.

"What would be very damaging to detente would be a repetition of the trade agreement affair," a Soviet source said, referring to the collapse of the 1972 trade agreement after Congress severely restricted Soviet-American trade terms to force increased emigration of Soviet Jews in a move Moscow interpreted as aimed primarily at undermining detente.

Dr. Arbatov's comments, putting on the record what is being said privately, were viewed as significant because of their timing just before a recess in the Geneva talks for consultations.

But Dr. Arbatov was reported to be speaking not only on behalf of these circles, often described as the doves in distinction to the Kremlin's military and ideological hawks, but on behalf of the whole Soviet leadership following a meeting two weeks ago of the Communist party's policy-making central committee.

That meeting firmly supported the Vladivostok agreement. The party leadership declared firmly that "political detente must be supplemented by the relaxation of tension in the military field and used for the reduction of armaments and the struggle for disarmament."

Presumably, the central committee overrode objections not only to the Vladivostok agreement—the meeting was followed by calls in Pravda, the party newspaper, to follow the party's foreign policy line—but also approved the proposed follow-up negotiations for the affirmation of the need for reductions in arms levels as an unexpected note of the committee resolution.

WASH. POST 5/7/75

By Jack Anderson and Les Whitten

Washington Whirl—President Ford has told subordinates that he will press Congress for a full $100 billion military budget, as evidence to the world that the United States isn't planning any more pullbacks . . . Before Congress votes more military money, some legislators intend to ask tough questions about the billions worth of equipment abandoned in South Vietnam. . .

RIFT -- CONTINUED

Recently a member of the rubber-stamp Parliament presented a plea asking the government to evict the United States from all the bases.

Ford will be arriving in Spain at a time of widespread speculation that Franco is preparing to yield power to Prince Juan Carlos de Borbon, 37, his designated successor. Reports that Franco's retirement is imminent have even slipped into the controlled Spanish press. Important establishment personalities have gone so far as to write articles suggesting Franco's retirement.

PULLOUT ... CONT'D

Sources on the base said that about 20 aircraft were carried from Utapao to the Midway by giant helicopters Sunday and Monday. At least two aircraft were reported seriously damaged when they fell from the helicopters—one on the Utapao runaway and one on the Midway.

The aircraft already removed include F-5 jet fighters, A-37 jet fighter-bombers and also C-130 cargo planes which were reported to have been flown direct to the Philippines.

The Thai government's request for a suspension followed contradictory statements by various members of the Cabinet, with some declaring that the affair was solely an American problem while others considered that the aircraft should be held by Thailand until the government decided their fate.

Hanoi radio has claimed that the aircraft are the property of the Provisional Revolutionary Government of South Vietnam and warned Thailand that any hesitancy about returning the planes could jeopardize relations between the two Vietnams and Thailand.

Thai Foreign Minister, Chatichai Choonhavan called the acting American ambassader, Edward Masters, in for a 25-minute talk on the matter today. Masters refused to answer any questions after the meeting.

Observers here consider it impossible that Thai military authorities did not know that the United States was taking the planes out of Thailand.

However, the armed forces are considered opposed to giving the aircraft to the Provisional Revolutionary Government. They are known to view the two Vietnams as posing the greatest military threat to Thailand. Additionally, the military leaders would be extremely reluctant to commit any hostile act towards the United States out of concern that U.S. military assistance program to Thailand be maintained at a high level.

Cynics say that the present situation is the best possible one for Thailand, with all of the sophisticated aircraft already gone and the Thai government now taking a "tough stand" to give the impression of surprise and anger at the unilateral action taken by the Americans.

There are, however, government officials who are genuinely angry at the United States for taking such action apparently without formal consultation.

To avoid the risky move of returning the other aircraft to South Vietnam, Prime Minister Kukrit Pramoj said the remaining aircraft will stay in Thai custody until peace and order have returned to South Vietnam and the ownership question can be determined.

Foreign Minister Chatichai has also asked to see the United States and South Vietnamese agreement on military aid, saying that if there is an agreement about the title reverting to the United States Thailand would not interfere. Chatichai also requested that a delegation from the Provisional Revolutionary Government come to Bangkok to negotiate the return of the aircraft and other military supplies brought in by fleeing Saigon government forces.

Such contradictory statements highlight the dilemma in which the Thai government now finds itself, in its efforts to be accomodating to both sides.

[Foreign Ministry sources said today that a five-member North Korean delegation will fly to Bangkok Wednesday for talks on establishing diplomatic relations, AFP reported from Bangkok.]

NEW YORK TIMES
7 MAY 1975
Pg. 22

U.S. SHIP WITH 200 REACHES SUBIC BAY

SUBIC BAY NAVAL STATION, The Philippines, May 6 (Reuters)—The Stoddert, last of 46 American Evacuation ships to leave South Vietnamese costal waters, reached the Subic Bay Naval Base today with 200 South Vietnamese refugees, 19 of whom had been rescued from a sinking boat.

The Stoddert, a guided missile destroyer, was expected to be followed into port by five other ships carrying more than 5,000 people.

The ships include a chartered South Korean ship and two South Vietnamese vessels.

A Subic Bay spokesman said that more than 40,000 refugees had been funneled through here in the last four days. Most were flown out in transport planes, to Guam to be processed for entry to the United States.

WASHINGTON POST
7 MAY 1975
Pg. 48

Japan-China Pact

Agence France-Presse

TOKYO, May 6—Japan and China exchanged verbal notes in Peking today on their intergovernmental shipping agreement, clearing the way for its implementation starting June 4.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WEDNESDAY MORNING, 7 MAY 1975

WASHINGTON STAR - 6 MAY 1975(7) Pg. 11

Schlesinger Reinforces View of CIA Role as Passive

By Jeremiah O'Leary
Washington Star Staff Writer

The finality of Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger's declaration that the CIA has never resorted to assassination could be construed as reinforcing the contention of administration sources that the agency discussed and knew about political murder plots but never was involved in a successful one.

Schlesinger made his statement late yesterday after testifying before the Rockefeller commission investigating illegal domestic activities of the CIA.

He emerged from his closed-door appearance and, unlike some former CIA officials, appeared almost eager to set the record straight. He said, "Let me make it very clear now that assassination has not been used as a tool by the CIA at any time, and I don't think that applies prospectively any more than it does retrospectively."

THE FORMER CIA director was even more emphatic in denying CIA involvement in the slaying of President John F. Kennedy.

"The suggestion of any CIA involvement is preposterous," Schlesinger said. "It is psychologically and intellectually impossible that the CIA could in any way be involved in the tragic event."

Analysis

He said any such suggestions could only emanate from sick imaginations. The agency's whole role, he said, has been to serve and protect the United States and its leaders.

Schlesinger refused to comment directly on reports of CIA involvement in plots to assassinate foreign leaders, but he said appropriate review bodies such as the Rockefeller commission and the congressional committees will want to review those issues.

THE SUM of Schlesinger's declarations are strongly supportive of statements to The Star by White House and CIA officials that the agency knew of, and even discussed, political murder but never was involved in a successful one.

This leaves open the implication that the CIA may have had direct involvement in plots for political murder that did not succeed — for example, perhaps plots against Fidel Castro, whose death was certainly desired by many Cubans. It is even more suggestive that the CIA knew of such plots but was not directly involved.

Commission officials said yesterday that the group, appointed by President Ford and headed by Vice President Nelson A. Rockefeller, is nearing the end of the labors it began last February. The hearings will be completed Monday, and then the commission will begin writing its report and recommendations for the President.

THE REPORT is to be handed to Ford on June 4 and will be released publicly soon after that. At that stage, the Senate Intelligence Committee, headed by Sen. Frank Church, D-Idaho, will commence its hearings into the activities of all American intelligence agencies. Its House counterpart is almost totally dormant.

Also testifying yesterday was Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger. He denied having any knowledge or involvement in either alleged CIA domestic spying or foreign assassination plots.

"Since I have been in Washington, the National Security Council or the NSC staff, or the assistant to the president for national security affairs (Kissinger's other title) did not concern themselves with domestic intelligence; nor were they informed about domestic intelligence," Kissinger declared.

Asked about allegations of CIA assassination plots, Kissinger said none of those allegations pertain to the period of his service in Washington from 1968 until the present.

ANOTHER WITNESS yesterday, former CIA Director John A. McCone (1961-1965) said, "During my term of office, there was no, absolutely no assassination plot against Castro or any other foreign leader.

McCone said such plots were not consistent with the moral values of the United States or the CIA.

NEWS SUMMARY -- CONTINUED

Attorney General Levi's proposal for a handgun ban in high-crime areas. Ford said his coming meetings with Egyptian and Israeli leaders won't be part of any new U.S. negotiating effort in the Mideast.

* * *

A WEAPONS BUDGET $3.7 billion below Ford's request cleared a House panel.

Besides eliminating a $1.3 billion budget request for military aid to South Vietnam, the House Armed Services Committee reduced by $260 million the authorization for Boeing's AWACS early-warning plane and cut $186 million of procurement money for the flying command post that U.S. officials would use during a nuclear attack. The total authorization approved for July 1, 1975, through Sept. 30, 1976, was $26.1 billion.

That could be cut further on the House floor or when appropriations are voted. But the sentiment for defense cutbacks is being cooled by unemployment and the fall of two U.S. allies in Indochina.

The House panel tabled an amendment that would have let women enter military service academies and go into combat.

The Senate Armed Services Committee voted to cut $222 million in production-related money for the B1 bomber in fiscal 1976 and the following three months.

* * *

The U.S. removed from Thailand at least 25 of the estimated 125 warplanes flown there last week by fleeing South Vietnamese pilots. But then the removal was suspended in response to a request from the Thai government, which wants to evaluate U.S. claims to the planes. Vietnamese Communists have demanded that Thailand send them the planes.

* * *

Jordan's King Hussein said the Arab states are willing to make a final peace with Israel recognizing its right to exist on condition that Israel vacate all occupied territory and "recognize the legitimate rights of the Palestinians in their homeland."

* * *

Secretary of State Kissinger said that the U.S. "definitely isn't tilting toward the Arabs" and that "fairly large quantities" of arms have been shipped to Israel in the past month. It probably was a mistake, he said earlier in an NBC interview, to have made Vietnam a test case for U.S. policy.

* * *

Home-mortgage lenders reject almost twice as many applications from minorities as they do from whites, a Federal Reserve Board study of six metropolitan areas indicated. But the 1974 data aren't sufficient to determine that discrimination exists, the Fed said.

A bill to bar discrimination on the basis of age, race, religion or national origin in granting credit was passed unanimously by the House Banking Committee.

* * *

State and local governments plan to increase taxes $3.6 billion this year while reducing construction spending $1 billion and expenditures for services $3.3 billion, a congressional survey made public by Rep. William Moorhead (D., Pa.) indicated. Nearly half of state and local governments are cutting payrolls, eliminating about 140,000 jobs.

* * *

San Francisco anesthesiologists' strike to protest soaring malpractice-insurance rates spread to Los Angeles and San Diego, where a dozen hospitals were forced to cancel all but emergency surgery.

* * *

Mexico attacked the nuclear disarmament policies of the U.S. and Russia at a 56-nation Geneva conference that is reviewing the five-year-old treaty banning the spread of atomic weapons. But U.S. support for the treaty was reaffirmed in a message from President Ford.

* * *

A dozen tornadoes struck eastern Nebraska, killing at least two persons in Omaha and injuring scores more. Gov. James Exon mobilized the National Guard.

* * *

The nomination of Lt. Gen. Louis H. Wilson Jr. as Marine Corps commandant was approved by the Senate Armed Services Committee.

* * *

A Commonwealth of Nations summit meeting ended in Kingston, Jamaica, with presidents, premiers or chief delegates of 34 former British colonies warning of a race war in Rhodesia unless the majority blacks there are allowed to enter the government.

* * *

Sen. George McGovern (D., S.D.) called for an end to the U.S. trade boycott against Cuba as he arrived in Havana for an "educational" visit.

* * *

Saudi Arabia banned contraceptives after the World Moslem League ruled that birth control violates Islamic law.

* * *

Died: Joseph Cardinal Mindszenty, 83, former primate of the Roman Catholic Church in Hungary who was convicted of treason in a Communist trial in 1949, and later spent 15 years in asylum in the U.S. embassy in Budapest, in Vienna; of a heart attack following surgery; J. G. Underwood, 80, president and chief executive officer of Harsco Corp., in Harrisburg, Pa.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WEDNESDAY MORNING, 7 MAY 1975

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 19

Canada's air defense commitment

To stick with U.S.— but for how long?

By Don Sellar
Special to
The Christian Science Monitor

Ottawa

This week Canada is expected to renew its participation in the 18-year-old North American Air Defense Command (NORAD) agreement with the United States for at least five more years.

Defense Minister James Richardson, an enthusiastic NORAD supporter, will announce the decision to continue sharing with the U.S. in continental defense sometime before the current pact expires May 12.

The only uncertainty surrounding the new NORAD arrangement is the length of Canada's commitment. Mr. Richarson favors an unlimited term, but has been under pressure to opt for a five-year package.

A Parliamentary committee, dominated by members of the ruling Liberal Party, recently did some deep soul-searching about NORAD and concluded another review after five years would be in order.

Cabinet must decide

However, the cabinet, led by Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, will make the final judgment on the matter. If it decides on an indefinite term, Canada would want the option to withdraw on one year's notice.

NORAD, a sophisticated surveillnce system, currently costs about $1.4 billion a year to operate. The U.S. foots the bill for 90 percent of the command, whose headquarters are at Colorado Springs, Colorado.

Only once since NORAD was formed did Canada not sign a minimum five-year deal. That was in 1973, when the Trudeau Government, then a minority in Parliament, angered some American officials by settling on a two-year term which is now expiring.

Some of NORAD's critics have described the $140 million Canadian component of the system as a waste of money, although its proponents reply that an all-Canadian defense system would cost a great deal more than that.

Military picture changed

There is also the military-strategic argument which contends NORAD was designed to counter a Soviet manned bomber attack — a threat seen now as minimal at best.

But NORAD planners already have recognized the validity of that criticism, to some extent, by reducing the number of interceptor aircraft in the system to 500 from 2,000. At the same time, they have upgraded NORAD communications and tracking systems, and broadened its role.

Another line of attack against NORAD is the political-ideological argument which holds that Canada relinquishes its sovereignty by participating. At present, Americans are responsible for NORAD flights across vast tracts of Canadian landscape.

Canada has only one regional control center, at North Bay, Ontario, but this base is charged with responsibility for watching over part of the northeast U.S.

Edmonton base planned

The sovereignty argument against NORAD, however, may diminish further in the next two or three years, when Canada assumes responsibility for its own air space.

Last week, as a prelude to the renewal of NORAD, Mr. Richardson announced construction of a second Canadian regional base, at Edmonton, Alberta.

This $25 million installation will cover western Canadian air space previously handled from an American one. Under the new zone format, North Bay will assume responsibility for eastern Canadian air space and relinquish its role in the northeast U.S.

Defense Department sources in Ottawa say it could take two years or more before all the NORAD zones of responsibility are redrawn and the new Canadian installation at Edmonton is operational.

Had Canada failed to continue its NORAD obligations, officials here admit relations with the U.S. would have been dealt a stunning psychological blow.

But such a change in attitude by the Trudeau government would be startling, since only four years ago it declared the defense of North America to be its No. 2 priority in defense, behind only that of Canadian territory itself.

WALL STREET JOURNAL
7 MAY 1975 Pg. 24

Suit To Bar Vietnamese Asks Environment Data

Special to THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

SAN FRANCISCO—A federal district judge will hear a request today that no more South Vietnamese citizens be given refuge in the U.S. until an environmental impact statement is filed.

The suit was filed by Delta Citizens Group and James Shanks and William Shauer, two Sacramento businessmen, against Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, the Interior and Defense Department secretaries, and against the Immigration and Naturalization Service. It was transferred here from Sacramento.

The suit notes that an estimated 50,000 to 75,000 refugees will be immigrating with State Department help of up to $500 million. The suit says, "this is a major federal action with extensive national and local consequences," requiring an environmental impact statement under the National Environmental Policy Act.

It says the refugee program is a "monumental undertaking," with considerable consequences on U.S. citizens and that incoming refugees haven't been fully screened for communicable and contagious diseases.

The suit asks federal Judge Spencer Williams to issue a temporary restraining order that would halt any further entrance of South Vietnamese citizens into the U.S. and also halt further issuance of immigration permits to them.

NEW YORK TIMES 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 23

SAIGON SAYS CITY IS NORMAL AGAIN

HONG KONG, Wednesday, May 7 (Agence France-Presse) —The Saigon radio said yesterday that life had returned to normal in the South Vietnamese capital, with telephone lines functioning as before and well-stocked markets crowded with shoppers.

Thousands of Saigonese who had fled the city last week when the Communists took over were now said to be returning by bus.

Meanwhile, preparations were reported under way to celebrate the victory of the revolution.

Teachers belonging to patriotic associations were asked to meet yesterday afternoon to arrange a reception at which civilian and military leaders would presumably be presented to the people. Students were scheduled to meet last night.

It appeared that the celebration might be held some time today, one week after the city was surrendered to the Communists.

The radio said workers were busy at their jobs, noting that this was especially the case at the Sicovina textile factory, which has 1,000 employes.

Saigon bookstore owners were said to have tossed out all books that were regarded as useless or offensive.

Television Resumes

Among the indications that life had returned to normal, the radio said, was that a television station in the capital resumed operation Friday. In addition, an official newspaper published its first issue last Sunday.

A new administrative and moral order was reportedly being established in Saigon through the mobilization of volunteers, divided into several groups.

Medical aid was reported being handled by a group of 100 people, among them doctors and nurses.

Two groups of 50 volunteers each were said to be responsible for public order, while 120 people, divided into 17 teams, wearing civilian clothes and red armbands and carrying guns, were reported directing traffic.

The radio also mentioned a weapons reception group, staffed by 23 volunteers. They were said to have collected or requisitioned 4,323 guns of all kinds and undetermined quantities of grenades and ammunition.

Still another group of volunteers was said to be assigned to the distribution of revolutionary propaganda.

For the first time mention was made in a Vietnamese Communist broadcast of activities of Western journalists still in the city. They were said to have been present at Tan Son Nhut airport Friday to watch the first plane with the insignia of the Revolutionary Government to land there.

However, Western newsmen who last filed dispatches from Saigon last Wednesday, the day of the surrender, continued to be forbidden to send news out.

Broadcasts from both Saigon and Hanoi yesterday said a total of 13 South Vietnamese islands from the Gulf of Tonkin to the Gulf of Siam had been "liberated" in recent days; among them the prison islands of Son and Phu Quoc.

Some of the islands were in the Spratly group 200 miles or more east of the southern part of South Vietnam. But there was no mention of the Paracel Islands, which are east of Da Nang. This archipelago was occupied by Chinese forces in 1974 after brief fighting with South Vietnamese troops.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON POST
7 MAY 1975 Pg 8

Radio Jingle To Promote Army Career

United Press International

After a four-year hiatus the Army is seeking recruits again with paid radio jingles.

The 13-week campaign began in 15 cities Monday. Because the service is limited to a $600,000 budget, the ads will appear only on radio. In the spring of 1971 the Army had $10.6 million and advertised on television as well as radio.

The services have long asked radio and TV stations to broadcast free ads, but they usually appeared after midnight.

The 1971 campaign and the current one are both designed to attract volunteers for the infantry, artillery and armor. There is also a financial inducement because each volunteer for the combat branches gets a bonus of $1,500 to $2,500.

The 1971 ad campaign was considered a success by the Army, which got 10 times as many volunteers in the last month of the campaign as in the same month of the preceeding year. But in the first eight months of the current budget year, the Army reached only 76 per cent of its combat needs.

NEW YORK TIMES
7 MAY 1975, Pg 23

News Blackout May End

PARIS, May 6 (UPI)—Officials of the Revolutionary Government's mission here said today that foreign newsmen would soon be permitted to file dispatches from Saigon again.

WASHINGTON STAR 6 MAY 1975, Pg 3B (7)

'Politics' Charged in Plan To Shift P.G. Navy Office

By Brad Holt
Washington Star Staff Writer

"Keep My Chevy Off The Levee," proclaimed the sign held by an employe of the Naval Oceanographic Center.

About 1,300 center employes expect the Navy to transfer their Suitland office to the area of Bay St. Louis, Miss. and thus disrupt their lives—because of the move south itself, or because they will quit their jobs to stay in this area and then face the task of trying to find comparable work.

LAST NIGHT the employes, who perform scientific, engineering and environmental studies for the Navy as well as other federal and civilian agencies, had their chance to protest to the Navy. About 800 appeared at the Suitland High School cafeteria for a hearing on an environmental impact draft statement on the proposed move published by the Navy.

Among the 58 speakers who testified before a Navy hearing board were Maryland politicians from Congress, the state Senate and House of Delegates and the Prince Georges County government.

The politicians of the Free State were solidly behind their constituency—about 57 percent of those threatened by the move live in Prince Georges County.

U.S. Rep. Gladys N. Spellman, D-Md., told the crowd, "It disturbs me that the Navy thinks it can move people around like pieces on a chess board. They're dealing with disrupting families.

"For what reason?" she asked. "Politics," she answered.

BOTH THE oceanographic employes and the Maryland politicians pointed out that the center's annual payroll is about $25 million, which would leave Maryland along with the center. The proposed site, located in Mississippi close to the Louisiana state line, is sponsored by Sens. John Stennis, D-Miss., and Rusell Long, D-La., chairmen respectively of the Senate Armed Services and Finance Committees, last night's meeting was told.

Francis B. Francois, chairman of the Prince Georges County Council, said county officials "have been opposed to the move and that strong opposition still stands. The county executive and the County Council are ready to use every legal weapon available."

REP. MARJORIE S. HOLT, R-Md., read a letter written to Defense Secretary James Schlesinger from Reps. John M. Murphy, D-N.Y., and Charles A. Mosher, R-Ohio, respectively the chairman and ranking minority member of the oceanographic subcommittee of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. The letter announced oversight hearings on the proposed move to begin May 21 and asked for postponement of a "final decision on this transfer" until the hearings are completed.

THE NAVY STUDY, under the heading of "Adverse Environmental Effects," noted that "blacks, who comprise about 14 percent of the work force, may be reluctant to transfer to the proposed relocation site." The study notes that as many as 80 to 90 percent of the blacks may refuse transfer and that those who go "must consider the general attitudes of the majority populace toward minorities..."

Louise Driscoll, a deputy equal employment opportunity officer for the center who toured the area recently, said that "along the Gulf coast, everything is fine, but when you go inland, it's the old South. In the movie theaters, blacks are on one side and whites on the other; a black cop can't arrest a white man....It's very separate and very unequal."

Members of the Navy hearing board agreed with Mrs. Driscoll in her estimation of the racial situation but disagreed with statements about the availability of housing and the quality of education.

AT THE CLOSE of the hearing, members of the board told a reporter that there was adequate housing available near the Mississippi site.

WASHINGTON STAR 6 MAY 1975, Pg 11 (7)

Army Moving Its Prep School

Associated Press

Secretary of the Army Howard Callaway said Monday that the U.S. Military Academy Preparatory School will be moved this summer from Ft. Belvior, south of Washington, to Ft. Monmouth, N.J.

Involved are 325 students and 65 civilian and military instructors and administrators.

The Army said the shift will provide the shcool improved permanent facilities by the beginning of the 1976 session a year from August.

The Army said the transfer of the school to Ft. Monmouth will permit expansion of the Defense Systems Management School at Ft. Belvoir before January. The U.S. Military Academy Preparatory School prepares regular and reserve soldiers to qualify for entrance to West Point.

WASHINGTON POST 7 MAY 1975, Pg 43

For the Record

• Soviet Communist Party chief Brezhnev and Premier Kosygin will visit West Germany this year, the ruling Social Democratic Party announced in Bonn. The Soviet news agency Tass, meanwhile, said in Moscow that Kosygin will visit Libya the first half of this month.

LOS ANGELES TIMES 4 MAY 1975 (7)
Pg 6B

Californians Pressured Navy to Buy F-18, Critic Charges

DALLAS (AP)—The U.S. Navy has been pressured to spend $6 billion for a deficient fighter plane just to ease California's unemployment problems, according to U.S. Rep. Dale Milford (D-Tex.).

Milford said Saturday in a statement issued from his home that the Navy was pressured "in a demanding letter" to choose the F-18 fighter built by McDonnell-Douglas and Northrop in California. He said the plane is inferior to the LTV F-16 which the Air Force chose in January. Congress earlier had recommended the Navy and Air Force adopt the same new fighter plane.

"This letter clearly stated the demand that the award should go to Northrop because of California's high unemployment factor," Milford said. He said the letter was written by "the entire California (congressional) delegation."

Milford said the Navy's decision, which still requires congressional approval, is indefensible on the basis of the F-18's performance, economy or as the best combat plane available for Navy use.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WEDNESDAY MORNING, 7 MAY 1975

A035
R A
DEBATE 5-7
DAY LD
BY JOHN MILNE
WASHINGTON (UPI) -- THE SENATE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE HAS VOTED IN FAVOR OF THE "COUNTERFORCE" STRATEGY OF FIGHTING NUCLEAR WARS, WHICH SUPPORTERS SAY WOULD GIVE THE PRESIDENT MORE FLEXIBILITY IN RESPONDING TO CRISES.

OPPONENTS CONTEND "COUNTERFORCE" WOULD ADD NEW, DANGEROUS ELEMENTS OF RISK AND INSTABILITY TO RELATIONS BETWEEN NUCLEAR POWERS. THEY SAID TODAY THEY PLAN TO FIGHT THE DECISION IN THE WHOLE SENATE.

SOME SENATE SOURCES PREDICT A CONFRONTATION SIMILAR TO THE RECENT FIGHT OVER THE ANTIBALLISTIC MISSILE.

THE SENATE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE MET BEHIND CLOSED DOORS TUESDAY ON THE PENTAGON'S $10.2 BILLION RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT REQUEST. IT IS EXPECTED TO ANNOUNCE FINAL DECISIONS SOON, PERHAPS TODAY.

SOURCES NOT WISHING TO BE QUOTED BECAUSE THE COMMITTEE HAS NOT YET MADE ALL ITS DECISIONS SAID THE VOTE WAS 11-4 IN FAVOR OF $109 BILLION IN RESEARCH FOR FIVE "COUNTERFORCE" PROPOSALS. AN EXAMPLE OF ONE IDEA IS MARV, A NUCLEAR WARHEAD THAT CAN BE GUIDED TOWARD A TARGET AFTER IT IS FIRED. THE IDEA BEHIND "COUNTERFORCE" IS TO HAVE A MISSILE SO ACCURATE AND POWERFUL THAT IT CAN DESTROY AN ENEMY MISSILE BEFORE IT IS FIRED.

THE COMITTEE REVERSED THE RESEARCH SUBCOMMITTEE, HEADED BY SEN. THOMAS MCINTYRE, D-N.H., WHICH HAD ELIMINATED THESE PROJECTS. MCINTYRE IS ONE OF THE OPPONENTS WHO CALLS "COUNTERFORCE" DANGEROUS, IN HIS PHRASE, "PUTTING A HAIR TRIGGER ON NUCLEAR WAR."

THEY SAY IT IS ONLY A MATTER OF TIME UNTIL BOTH THE UNITED STATES AND THE SOVIET UNION GET THIS CAPABILITY, AND IF A CRISIS COMES BOTH SIDES WILL ITCH TO PUSH THE NUCLEAR BUTTON FIRST -- BECAUSE THE SECOND ONE COULD HAVE ITS NUCLEAR ARSENAL DESTROYED.

SUPPORTERS, WHO INCLUDE SECRETARY OF STATE HENRY KISSINGER AND SECRETARY OF DEFENSE JAMES SCHLESINGER, SAY "COUNTERFORCE" GIVES THE PRESIDENT ANOTHER MILITARY ORTION BETWEEN DOING NOTHING IN A CRISIS OR RISKING ALL-OUT NUCLEAR WAR.

THE SOURCES ALSO SAID THE COMMITTEE VOTED TO CUT $222.3 MILLION FROM THE $672 MILLION REQUEST FOR THE B1 BOMBER PROGRAM, AND PERMIT ONLY CONTINUED RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT, NOT PRODUCTION. THE SUBCOMMITTEE ORIGINALLY CUT $160.8 MILLION, AND THE COMMITTEE VOTED NARROWLY TO KEEP THE CUT. A LATER COMPROMISE CUT MORE, THE SOURCES SAID, AND IT PASSED 10-4.

CONSERVATIVES MAY ASK THE FULL SENATE TO RESTORE FUNDS FOR THE B1, DESIGNED AS THE NATION'S MAJOR HEAVY BOMBER FOR NUCLEAR WAR. THE HOUSE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE WAS KINDER TO THE CONTROVERSIAL PLANE, VOTING TUESDAY TO AUTHORIZE ALL THE PENTAGON ASKED.
UPI 05-07 03:42 AED

APB061
050

(BANGKOK) -- A REPORT BY THE SAIGON RADIO, MONITORED IN BANGKOK, SAYS A HUGE CROWD GATHERED AT THE FORMER PRESIDENTIAL PALACE TODAY. THE RADIO SAYS THE COMMANDING GENERAL OF THE SAIGON AREA PROMISED LENIENCY TO FORMER FOES OF THE VIET CONG AND RESPECT FOR LIVES AND PROPERTY OF FOREIGN RESIDENTS -- PROVIDING, HE SAID, THAT ''THEY EARN AN HONEST LIVING THROUGH CLEAN BUSINESS'' AND OBEY LAWS AND ORDERS.

GENENRAL TRAN VAN TRA, WHO LED THE ATTACK ON SAIGON IN THE 1968 TET OFFENSIVE, ALSO WARNED OF SEVERE PUNISHMENT AGAINST THOSE WHO -- AS HE PUT IT -- ''SEVER THEMSELVES FROM THE PEOPLE'' AND ''SERVE AS HENCHMEN FOR FOREIGN COUNTRIES.''
03:24AED 05-07-75

WALL STREET JOURNAL 7 MAY 1975, Pg 7

IBM Permits Army To Cancel Orders Without Any Penalty

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y. — International Business Machines Corp. said it has allowed the Army to cancel three remaining computers on a nine-computer contract without paying scheduled penalties of $9.6 million.

But IBM acknowledged — after a statement was issued by Rep. Jack Brooks, (D., Texas), chairman of the House government operations committee—that the Army was paying $8 million over current market prices for the six computers it is buying from IBM, and that the Army had violated federal law by signing the original contract.

"The Army has acknowledged a procedural error," an IBM spokesman said, commenting on a charge by Rep. Brooks that only the General Services Administration has legal authority to buy data processing equipment for the government.

IBM explained the $8 million price differential by noting that in 1973, when the agreement was reached, the price to the Army of $2.7 million for each of the six system 360, model 65 computers was "competitive" in the market. Since then the going price has dropped to $1.7 million, the spokesman said, because of "dynamics in the market" rather than any change in production costs.

IBM said the original contract, which was for up to 24 computer systems, was awarded by competitive bidding in 1967 but was revised by the Army and IBM in 1973 when Army requirements were reduced. Under that agreement, the Army was to pay $4.3 million for each computer if it purchased fewer than nine.

Rep. Brooks said the Army would purchase the other three computers on the open market, presumably at the lower price.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CURRENT NEWS

PART II - MAIN EDITION - 1130

THIS SUPPLEMENTS PART I-EARLY BIRD EDITION

THIS PUBLICATION IS PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL NEWS ITEMS OF INTEREST TO THEM IN THEIR OFFICIAL CAPACITIES; IT IS NOT INTENDED TO SUBSTITUTE FOR NEWSPAPERS, PERIODICALS AND BROADCASTS AS A MEANS OF KEEPING INFORMED ABOUT THE NATURE, MEANING AND IMPACT OF NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL NEWS DEVELOPMENTS. USE OF THESE ARTICLES HERE, OF COURSE, DOES NOT REFLECT OFFICIAL ENDORSEMENT. FURTHER REPRODUCTION FOR PRIVATE USE OR GAIN IS SUBJECT TO THE ORIGINAL COPYRIGHT RESTRICTIONS.

TUESDAY, MAY 6, 1975

BALTIMORE SUN
6 May 1975 Pg. 1

Phnom Penh said to order executions

By DEAN MILLS
Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—The State Department said yesterday that the new rulers of Cambodia have ordered the execution of all top political and military leaders of the old regime, down to the local level.

The order, if carried out, would mean the death of thousands of Cambodians who served under the defeated government of President Lon Nol.

American officials indicated that a program of mass reprisals would make the United States hesitant to recognize the new regime in Phnom Penh. Henry A. Kissinger, the Secretary of State, said in an interview televised yesterday that "very tragic and inhuman and barbarous things are going on."

"We don't regret not having recognized Cambodia immediately," he added.

Robert Anderson, the State Department spokesman, confirmed at a department press briefing reports of the execution orders given in radio transmissions intercepted by American intelligence.

And he said the United States has "information that in one outlying area this order was carried out and this involved 80. . .leaders and their wives."

But Mr. Anderson said information available to the United States is too fragmentary to indicate whether the execution orders have been carried out on a wide scale. There were solid indications, however, that the new leaders have been harsh in establishing their authority.

Western journalists who remained in Phnom Penh for the Communist takeover and who arrived in Thailand over the weekend have hinted darkly of severe measures taken by the new government, although they have foresworn writing directly on the subject for now for fear of harming those left behind.

PHNOM PENH...Pg. 2

WASHINGTON POST
6 May 1975 Pg. 1

Refugee Critics Shock Ford

By Carroll Kilpartick
Washington Post Staff Writer

Congressional and public criticism of administration policy on the admission of Vietnamese refugees has shocked and disturbed President Ford, White House sources said yesterday.

The President is expected to express himself on the subject in strong terms at a televised news conference at 7:30 tonight, the first he has held since the surrender of Saigon.

The President was quoted by one source as having said "it is not the America I know" when informed of what some public figures and citizens have said about not wanting the Vietnamese to come to this country.

The President also is expected to discuss in public for the first time the consequences for this country of the Communist victories in Cambodia and Vietnam.

He asked Congress yesterday for $507 million to care for the Vietnamese refugees until they can find homes and jobs, and he is expected to defend his position that they should be welcome and that the United States owes them refuge.

Last week, through his press secretary, Mr. Ford said he was "proud" of what he had done to help evacuate Vietnamese who wanted to leave their country.

Yesterday, press secretary Ron Nessen, asked about reports of criticism of Graham A. Martin, ambassador to South Vietnam, quoted the President as strongly defending the ambassador and hailing the success of the evacuation.

"The President feels that Ambassador Martin accomplished an extraordinarily

CRITICS...Pg. 2

BALTIMORE SUN 6 May 1975 Pg. 8

Kissinger denies links to any CIA death plots

Washington (AP) — The Secretary of State, Henry A. Kissinger, yesterday denied having any involvement in alleged Central Intelligence Agency domestic spying or foreign assassination plots.

"Since I have been in Washington, the National Security Council or the National Security Council staff or the assistant to the President for national security affairs did not concern themselves with domestic intelligence or were informed about domestic intelligence," Mr. Kissinger told reporters after a two-hour-closed-door session with the Rockefeller commission.

Asked about allegations of CIA assassination plots, Mr. Kissinger chuckled and said, "None of those allegations pertain to any period of which I have personal knowledge."

The Defense Secretary, James R. Schlesinger, who headed the agency briefly in 1973, also testified and later told reporters that "assassination has not been used as a tool by the CIA at any time."

However, Mr. Schlesinger said he would have "no comment on allegations regarding [the assassination of] foreign leaders" and added that "there are questions here that the commission and the appropriate congressional bodies may wish to review."

Asked whether the CIA had undertaken domestic surveillance in response to White House pressure, Mr. Schlesinger said, "My recollection ... is that indeed there were expressions of interest on the part of senior officials of the government."

Asked if these expressions came from Mr. Kissinger, who ordinarily would direct CIA covert activities, Mr. Schlesinger indicated that the requests for domestic surveillance "came through channels other than national security channels."

Vice President Rockefeller, the commission chairman,

KISSINGER...Pg. 2

NEW YORK NEWS
6 May 1975 Pg. 2

U.S. Taking Viet Planes From Thais

Washington, May 5 (News Bureau) — Despite official Thai objections, the United States has begun removing the 125 U.S.-supplied military planes flown to Thailand by fleeing South Vietnamese pilots, the Pentagon said today.

Meantime, it was announced that the U.S. would reduce by about 25% the number of American troops and planes in Thailand. The number of troops will be cut from 25,000 to 19,500, mostly Air Force personnel.

Scheduled for removal next month are two squadrons of U.S. F-111 fighter-bombers (36 planes) and three squadrons of F-4 fighters (72 planes). The total of American planes currently in Thailand is 340, including 176 fighters; 16 F-4s configured for reconnaissance duty; 17 B-52 bombers; 12 AC-130 gunships, and a number of other aircraft of the liaison, spotter or utility types.

The U.S. troop reduction, disclosed earlier today in Bangkok, was described in a Thai Foreign Ministry statement as the first step in an effort to phase out the American military presence in Thailand by March 1976.

The decision to bring the South Vietnamese aircraft to the United States had not been disclosed previously.

The announcement came as Thai Foreogn Minister Chatichai Choonhavan said in Bangkok that the Thai Government would aoretian the planes for the time being. He indicated that he wanted to discuss the matter with u.s. officials.

North Vietnam and the new Communist government of South Vietnam have demanded the return of all planes and ships

VIET PLANES...Pg. 2

JAMES KILLINGBECK, CHIEF, CURRENT NEWS BRANCH, OX 78765 HELEN YOUNG, ASSISTANT CHIEF

FOR SPECIAL RESEARCH SERVICES OR DISTRIBUTION CALL HARRY ZUBKOFF, CHIEF, EXECUTIVE AGENCY SERVICE, OX 52884

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK TIMES 6 May 1975 Pg. 1

Kissinger Denies Involvement In Domestic Spying by C.I.A.

By NICHOLAS M. HORROCK
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 5—Secretary of State Kissinger said today that he and the National Security Council had had no involvement in any domestic operations of the Central Intelligence Agency and that he had never "transmitted" to the agency any feeling of concern about domestic security on the part of President Nixon.

His statement was made to reporters after he testified before the Rockefeller Commission, which is investigating the C.I.A.

Richard Helms, former director of Central Intelligence had said in January that domestic operations were conducted in response to Presidential concern that foreign influences were controlling the domestic antiwar movement.

Mr. Kissinger's statement raised the question of whether the C.I.A.'s operations were outside the chain of command suggested by the National Security Act of 1947, which calls upon the C.I.A. to "perform such other functions and duties related to inelligence affecting the national security as the National Security Council may from time to time direct."

The present C.I.A. chief, William E. Colby, said in January that the agency conducted domestic intelligence gathering from 1970 until 1973 as an outgrowth of Presidential concern over radical activities.

This concern was expressed in the so-called Tuston plan, a proposed attack on radical movement that included burglaries, electronic surveillance and mail covers, which was prepared in 1970 but not implemented. The C.I.A., Mr. Colby has said, continued to gather information and maintain files on Americans even though the plan was not adopted.

The National Security Council, a national security advisery body, and the 40 committees are the normal conduits for commands to C.I.A. for instance, covert activity abroad is conducted either with the express approval of the 40 Committee or under the power of executive orders issued through the council. (The 40 Committee includes representatives from the major agencies of the intelligence community, Mr. Kissinger and members of the council.

But today, under questioning, Mr. Kissinger said that "since I have been in Washington, the National Security Council or the National Security Council staff or the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs did not concern themselves with domestic intelligence or were not informed about domestic inteligence.

Mr. Kissinger has directed the council since 1969 and his tenure covered the years 1970 until 1973, during which Mr. Colby sai dthat part of the domestic intelligence operation took place.

Vice President Rckefeller said today that there were other channels of cammand between the White House and the C.I.A. outside of the National Security Council and that these channels could have included President Nixon himself.

Mr. Kissinger also disavowed today any knowledge of alleged assassinations b ythe C.I.A. Each of the day's other witnesses—a former C.I.A. chief, John A. McCone, Secretary of Defense James M. Schlesinger, and a former White House aide, Walt Rostow — were asked about assassinations.

All denied direct knowledge, Mr. McCone said that during his term of office there was "absolutely no assassination plot or authorized assassination plot against Castro by the Cuban Premier, [Fidel Castro] or any other foreign leader."

Today's session was one of the last two in which the commission will hear witnesses. It has begpn to prepare its report, which is scheduled to be given to President Ford on June 6.

Mr. Schlesinger said what he recalled, from his internal investigation of C.I.A., indicated that what authorizations came in the summer of 1971 came through "channels other than the N.S.C."

The concern of the Nixon Administration with domestic radicals was synthesized in a plan written by John Charles Huston, then a White House aide, in the summer of 1970. The plan had been contributed to by members of the major intelligence agencies. It would have authorized, with Presidential approval, the use of burglaries, mail covers and electronic surveillance, to gather intellegence about the domestic radical movement.

The plan was in effect for five days, but was rescinded when the late J. Edgar Hoover refused to allow the F.B.I. to be involved. It was not the only period in which the C.I.A. has conducted domestic intelligence, according to Mr. Colby, the agency head.

KISSINGER...Continued

briefing reporters on the day's session, confirmed that "there were many channels from the White House to the CIA" but refused to supply details or state where requests for domestic surveillance had originated.

Walt W. Rostow, Mr. Kissinger's predecessor as national security adviser, also appeared before the commission but declined any comment on his testimony.

John A. McCone, the central intelligence director during the early 1960's, also testified before the eight-member commission investigating allegations of CIA domestic wrongdoing.

Mr. McCone later told reporters he had to "plead ignorance" in response to questions about alleged plots against the life of Cuban Premier Fidel Castro. "During my term of office, there was no, absolutely no assassination plot or authorized assassination plot against Castro or any other foreign leader," Mr. McCone said.

Mr. Kissinger was asked by reporters about the future of a former CIA director, Richard M. Helms, now Ambassador to Iran. "Helms will remain ambassador to Iran," Mr.Kissinger said. "I have complete confidence in him."

Last January, Mr. Helms acknowledged publicly that a special counter-intelligence unit was set up within the CIA in response to presidential concern that domestic unrest was influenced from abroad.

VIET PLANES...Cont'd

bused by South Vietnamese to flee their country before it fell last week.

But Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger has said that the U.S. retained title to the planes.

In response to questions, a Pentagon spokesman said that some South Vietnamese C-130 transport planes were being flown from Thailand to Clark Air Force Base in the Philippines and that most of the other South Vietnamese planes were being removed by ship.

About 54 F-5 fighters and A-37 light attack bombers, formerly os the South Vietnamese Air Force — which was once the world's foruth largest — were being loaded on the aircraft carrier Midway off the Thai port of Sattahip, sources daid. Alos aboard the Midway were 48 U.S.-supplied helicopters, either from South Vietnam of Cambodia.

PHNOM PENH...Continued

Several officials speaking privately yesterday agreed with Mr. Anderson's observation that the information so far is too thin to judge whether mass executions have begun. But they said the execution orders given in the intercepted radio messages applied even to low-ranking political and military officials at local levels.

Given the insurgents' reputation for ruthlessness, some analysts here said, there was no reason to doubt that the orders were being carried out. Ronald H. Nessen, the White House press secretary, told reporters yesterday that "80 to 90 officers and their wives" had been executed in Cambodia. Mr. Nessen also said the United States has had "some reports" of executions of South Vietnamese officials.

CRITICS...Continued

difficult task under trying circumstances and did it well," Nessen said.

Declaring that Martin was responsible for the lives of Americans in Saigon and for maintaining the embassy to the end, Nessen said the President "thinks the results speak for themselves." The Americans were evacuated safely as were thousands of Vietnamese, Nessen said.

Nessen said Mr. Ford appreciated the support of Gov. Reubin Askew of Florida and Gov. David Pryor of Arkansas both Democrats, for refugee resettlement activities in their states.

Evacuees are being sent to Eglin Air Force Base in Florida, Ft. Chaffee in Arkansas and Camp Pendleton in California.

Asked if the President had thanked Democratic Gov. Edmund G. Brown Jr. of California, Nessen replied, "Why should he" Brown has complained of the new immigrants at a time when many Americans are unemployed.

While there have been reports of heavy mail to members of Congress opposing the admission of Vietnamese refugees, Nessen said White House mail favored their admission.

Of 7,600 letters received on the subject in the last month, 4,456 supported the President's policy, 2,936 opposed it and the remainder commented but stated no firm position, Nessen said.

Asked about a suggestion by Sen. George McGovern (D-S.D.) that some of the refugees would want to return to their homeland, Nessen said they left voluntarily and if some want to return they are free to do so.

Nessen confirmed earlier reports that the President has invited Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin to visit Washinton next month. The visit will take place June 11-12, Nessen said, for discussions of "matters of mutual interest and in order to further strengthen the friendly ties between the two countries."

Israeli officials were reportedly disturbed last week because the White House announced that the President would meet first with Egyptian President Anwar Sadat during Mr. Ford's trip to Europe.

The meeting with the Egyptian leader is scheduled for June 1-2 in Salzburg, Austria. The President will first attend a North Atlantic Treaty Organization summit meeting in Brussels May 29-30 and also visit Madrid and Rome before returning to Washington June 3 or 4.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II--Main Edition--6 May 1975

WASHINGTON POST 6 May 1975 Pg. 1

Vietcong Wins First U.N. Recognition

From Wire Dispatches

The new Communist government of South Vietnam has released all prisoners from the Conson Island prison where inmates were held in notorious "tiger cage" cells, the Vietcong radio said Monday.

The move came as the Vietcong's Provisional Revolutionary Government continued to tighten its control over the country and won its first recognition from the United Nations as the successor of the former Saigon government.

The PRG ordered all officials of the former government to report to authorities by Thursday and extended to May 31 the deadline for members of the defeated armed forces to turn themselves in. Saigon Radio also reiterated its order for military equipment to be turned in immediately.

The Vietcong's Giai Phong Radio, monitored by the Yugoslav news agency Tanjug, did not give the number of prisoners released from Conson Island prison, but it said they would be reunited with their families.

Former U.S. Rep. William R. Anderson (D-Tenn.) once referred to the "tiger cages" of Conson Island as "the most shocking treatment of human beings I have ever seen" after touring the prison where 10,000 persons were held, most of them for political reasons.

During the height of the U.S. opposition to involvement in the Vietnam war, reports on the "tiger cages" raised a furor in the United States. At one point, 116 South Vietnamese political prisoners claimed that they had been paralyzed from maltreatment on the island and from being kept in the "cages."

The radio also reported that former officials of the defeated Saigon government, including former President Duong Van (Big) Minh, had been returned to their families in Saigon.

The officials were told upon their release that it was hoped that they would contribute to rebuilding the country, the radio said. Minh responded by saying he "welcomed the victory of the liberation forces and said he was happy to be a citizen of the independent Vietnam," the radio said

Meanwhile, Saigons' new rulers ordered the immediate closure of all overseas missions set up by the previous government and indicated that the new envoys would be sent out soon to take over.

In a three-point directive, the Foreign Ministry ordered all heads of mission to cease operations and close their embassies and to draw up lists of documents, equipment and property for handover to new representatives who would be sent out soon, and warned that acts of sabotage and illegal removal of funds would be punished.

The directive was the new government's first order to the former government's dozens of embassies, the largest of which are in Washington and Paris.

Domestic proclamations by the PRG have dealt thus far with the reconstruction of the country and the establishment of administrative machinery. Essential services have reportedly been restored and many factories are said to be in full operation. Communications with the outside world, however, have not been restored, and news has been confined to radio broadcasts monitored outside South Vietnam.

In Wellington, New Zealand, a U.N. official said that almost all the displaced persons in Vietnam are expected to be resettled in their villages by the end of May. The U.N. official said his agency, the U.N. High Commission for Refugees, is working closely with the new Saigon government to provide medicines, food, tools and seeds.

The North Vietnamese news agency in Hanoi reported that the television station in Hue has resumed broadcasting and Giai Phong Radio said a group of dancers from Hanoi performed in the former imperial capital on Sunday.

The radio also reported that Saigon citizens are scraping walls and cleaning up streets and market places. Old movie posters and posters of the Thieu regime have been replaced by revolutionary slogans, the radio said.

At the United Nations, the U.N. Economic and Social Council recognized the PRG as the successor government to the former Saigon regime yesterday, despite American "regrets" at the "premature" decision.

In a public debate on the recognition, other U.N. delegates suggested that the U.S. statement indicated that Washington would recognize the PRG "in the coming days."

U.S. representative Clarence Ferguson responded, "We will not recognize any government-in-exile, but that is not an either-or proposition. As of this moment, we do not recognize the authorities in Saigon."

Ferguson said the United States was "uncertain as to an eventuality of double representation."

The PRG's earlier application for membership in two U.N. bodies—the World Health Organization and the World Meteorological Organization—has indicated to some observers that the new Communist rulers in the South are preparing for a prolonged period of diplomatic activity independent of North Vietnam.

Yesterday's U.N. decision means that the PRG would succeed the government it defeated as an "observer" at the world body, but neither of the agency applications has been acted upon.

Monday's action at the United Nations was prompted by a request from Senegal that the PRG be invited to attend the U.N. International Women's Year conference in Mexico City in July.

Meanwhile, the Soviet news agency Tass reported that two Soviet ships had docked in Danang and brought 4,000 tons of food and fuel to the city. The Soviet vessels were the first ships to enter the port since the Communist government took control.

Western diplomats in Moscow said they expected the Soviet government to move quickly to supply the South Vietnamese Communists in a move to blunt Chinese influence in the area.

Neues Deutschland, the East German Communist Party newspaper reported from Saigon that the Danang harbor was reopened April 24.

Tass also reported that the new government's newspaper, Saigon Liberation, said that North Vietnamese and Vietcong forces killed or wounded more than 400,000 troops of the Saigon government in the final days of the war.

The Los Angeles Times quoted an American official as saying that 15 tons of gold remained in the vaults of the central bank when South Vietnam surrendered. The official said some efforts had been made to fly the gold out during the U.S. evacuation of the city.

NEW YORK NEWS 6 May 1975 Pg. 8

Says Egypt Fortifies Suez' Eastern Bank

By JOSEPH FRIED
Staff Correspondent of The News

Jerusalem, May 5—Israeli Defense Minister Shimon Peres charged today that Egypt had laid the military groundwork for a crossing of the Suez Canal, like the one that triggered the 1973 Mideast war.

Peres also disclosed for the first time that a Soviet spy ship had been operating off the Israeli coast for the last five years, using electronic equipment to monitor activities within Israel.

Peres told the Kresset that the Soviet Union had not only resumed the flow of weapons to the Arabs, but had considerably increased the numbers of shipments, including ammunition and spare parts for Soviet-made weapons already in Egypt.

Specifically, Peres said, the Kremlin was supplying Egypt with MIG-23 warplanes, surface-to-air missiles and spare parts for tanks and planes.

He said that Egypt had completed laying the groundwork for fortifications on the east bank of the Suez, where they could deploy forces to cross into Sinai.

Peres said that Egypt had been working on the east bank of the canal since the January 1974 signing of the separation-of-forces agreement with Israel following the Yom Kippur War in October 1973.

Peres said the new fortifications included gun emplacements, bunkers and ditches.

"They've set the stage for another invasion should Egypt decide to go to war again," sources said here. "So far, it appears to be a contingency effort, but all that could change overnight if the Egyptians decide to move their troops and weapons across the canal."

Peres' disclosure coincided with reports here that Egypt might shift additional troops to the east bank of the canal on grounds that they are required to protect the canal after it reopens June 5.

Others Aid Egypt

Israeli Transport Minsiter Gad Yacobi warned today that any such troop movement would "sabotage" efforts toward achieving a Mideast settlement.

Peres also disclosed that both Algeria and Saudi Arabia had bolstered Egypt's arsenal since the October 1973 war.

He said that Algeria had bought Soviet tanks and turned them over to Egypt and that the Saudis had transferred some of the Mirage jets it bought from France.

Peres added that Egypt was trying to buy military equipment in Western Europe, including France and Britain.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Air Defense System

WASHINGTON POST 6 May 1975 Pg. 14

U.S. to Sell Arms to Jordan

By Murrey Marder
Washington Post Staff Writer

The United States has agreed to supply Jordan with an air-defense system including Hawk ground-to-air missiles, American officials said yesterday.

Confirmation that Jordan's King Hussein last week won a specific U.S. commitment for the air defenses he long has sought came in an unusual sequence yesterday.

Earlier, State Department spokesman Robert Anderson was asked if the United States still held to its position that there will be no new American arms commitment to Israel, or its Arab adversaries, during the current reassessment of Middle East policy. Anderson said that still is U.S. policy and he was "unaware of any commitments that were made to King Hussein" during his talks here last week.

Officials later disclosed the weapons arrangement with Jordan. To defend official credibility, they described this as confirmation of an earlier intention, rather than a new commitment.

Hussein has cited Jordan's lack of air defense as the reason why Jordan participated only symbolically in the October, 1973, Arab-Israeli war.

U.S. officials said an American survey team was sent to Jordan and Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger last February told Hussein that the United States intended to supply the air-defense system. An official said "final agreement" was "reached on details" last week.

Components of the system, including Hawk missiles and antiaircraft guns, will not begin reaching Jordan until the fall, it was said.

Jordan is reported to have argued that if it did not get the air-defense system from the United States, it would have to go, through Syria, to the Soviet Union for arms help.

Before Hussein's visit to Washington, a report circulated that Syria and Jordan agreed to a joint military command, which would have access to Soviet weapons. U.S. officials expressed disbelief over the report and Hussein denied it in a television interview here on Sunday.

To counter charges of discrimination against Israel, U.S. officials emphasized that Israel continues to receive deliveries of American weapons from previous commitments. This includes, one source said, "quite a large number of tanks" in April.

Kissinger, in a "Today" show interview to be televised this morning (NBC, WRC), said President Ford had "set a tentative deadline" for the Mideast policy reassessment, but that was before Indochina events "took a great deal of our attention." It is "a mistake to believe that there will be some clear terminal date at which one can say from now on the assessment is completed," Kissinger said.

He said that "on the whole . . . the final decision will not be made until President Ford has had an opportunity to meet with the leaders of the countries principally concerned."

Referring to the advanced F-15 warplanes which Israel wants, Kissinger said such aircraft, "in any event, would not be delivered until the end of 1977, early 1978."

WASHINGTON POST 6 May 1975 Pg. C-1

Navy Move Plan Scored

By Harold J. Logan
Washington Post Staff Writer

Almost 700 persons indicated through speeches, signs and applause last night that they think the Navy's plan to shift its oceanographic office from Suitland to the Gulf Coast is ill-considered, politically motivated, and technically unwise.

The crown that overflowed the cafeteria at Suitland High School, where a public hearing was held on a Navy-prepared study of the environmental impact of the proposed move was made up of mostly middle class professional employees of the office who would be directly affected by its proposed relocation to Bay St. Louis, Miss.

Many of them indicated that they felt, as did oceanographer Lewis J. Franc, that politics, rather than Congress's stated effort to reduce the Navy's presence in the Washington area, is "what appears to be the primary driving force of relocating to the proposed site."

"The proponents (of the move) have argued again and again that it is not politically motivated; that it was only an accident that the loss of Congressman F. Edward Hebert's chair on the House Armed Services Committee concided with the sudden demise of Michoud, La., as a viable site for relocation."

The relocation of the facility, which employs 1,300 workers, is being pushed by Sen. John C. Stennis (D-Miss.), chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee and Sen. Russell B. Long (D-La.), chairman of the Finance Committee. One of the things at stake is the oceanographic offices' $25 million annual payroll.

Other testimony at the hearing focused on the almost 200 black persons who work at the office, and who are expected to oppose a move to the deep South.

Louise Driscoll, the deputy equal employment opportunity officer at the oceanographic office, said "EEO (equal employment opportunity) is hard enough right here. We don't need to go to Mississippi."

Mrs. Driscoll said she was one of several oceanographic office employees who visited the Bay St. Louis area and reported, "On the coast it's fine (for blacks), but don't go a mile inland. It is just like it was 100 years ago."

The environmental impact study that was the subject of the public hearing asserts that "potentially, as many as 80 to 90 per cent of the blacks may refuse transfer."

It also predicts that "relocation will likely cause a number of individuals to exercise their retirement options earlier than previously planned." The study says 288 oceanographic employees are eligible for part or full retirement.

The study contemplates that about 800 of the institute's 1,300 employees would make the move if it is approved by the Navy.

It predicts that the influx of oceanographic office employees would seriously strain the housing and public school capacities of the Bay St. Louis area.

The study predicts no serious negative impact of the move on the natural environment of Bay St. Louis.

Only one person testified in favor of the move. Mrs. William King spoke highly of the fishing, golf, and other recreational benefits of the Guf area, and said its sunset "has been compared to those on the Riviera." She said the educational and cultural opportunities in the area 55 miles northeast of New Orleans are good.

CHICAGO TRIBUNE
6 May 1975 Pg. 13

U.S. takes 'wait, see' Viet stance

WASHINGTON [AP]—Secretary of State Henry Kissinger says the United States will watch the actions of the new Communist regime in Saigon before deciding whether to recognize it diplomatically.

"We now have to see what the conduct of this government is internationally and partially domestically," Kissinger said in an interview with Barbara Walters Monday on NBC's Today show.

"For example, we know that in Cambodia very tragic and inhuman and impoverished things are going on," Kissinger said. "We don't regret not having recognized Cambodia immediately."

Kissinger also said he doubts that Hanoi would have staged its successful military drive on Saigon if Watergate had not sapped Presidential power and Congress had not passed the war powers act.

"IN JANUARY '73 we did not foresee that Watergate would sap the executive authority of the United States to such a degree that flexibility of executive action inherently would be circumscribed," Kissinger said.

"We did not foresee that the Congress would pass a law which prohibited us from enforcing the Paris agreement and while we probably might have done nothing anyway, it makes a lot of difference for Hanoi whether it thinks the United States probably will not or whether it thinks that we certainly cannot," Kissinger said.

"I do not believe that Hanoi would have sent 19 of its 20 divisions south if these two things hadn't happened," he added.

THE SECRETARY also defended the Ford administration's refusal to reveal the contents of a January, 1973, letter in which former President Nixon promised Thieu the United States would use full force to punish any violations of the Paris peace agreement.

"If we begin revealing the contents of letters, simply because a senator, on top of it a Presidential candidate, but quite apart from this, a senator alleges that there is something in these letters, then Presidential correspondence will lose its private character," Kissinger said.

Sen. Henry M. Jackson [D., Wash.] had demanded that the administration reveal the contents of any secret commitments Nixon made to Thieu.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

EDITORIALS

CHICAGO TRIBUNE
6 MAY 1975

Our best military customers

For a time, $722 million was a familiar figure. It was the amount that President Ford on April 10 asked Congress to appropriate promptly for military aid to South Viet Nam. About the same time, Sen. Gaylord Nelson widely distributed a list of military sales to foreign countries in the current fiscal year thru March 26 [almost nine months]. The list was prepared by the Defense Security Assistance Agency. It is of interest to note that cash sales to each of three countries so far in fiscal 1975 exceeded $722 million. These countries and the amounts of their military purchases are: Iran, $1.9 billion; Saudi Arabia, $1.1. billion; and Israel, $806 million.

There is a big drop to fourth place, Kuwait, $332 million, and another drop to a clump of three, West Germany, South Korea, and Greece. China [Taiwan], Turkey, and Italy round out the top 10.

Tho $722 million is a large sum, $1.9 billion is much larger. It is more than a little startling to realize that arms sales to Iran, a country not very high in the awareness of most Americans, are large enough to bring that many petrodollars back to this country in nine months. It is surprising, too, to find military sales to Saudi Arabia running appreciably ahead of sales to Israel. And it is a corrective to the popular preoccupation with Europe [when we think of foreign affairs at all] to note that less than 8 per cent of the dollar volume of military sales to our 10 best customers goes to Europe. The other 92 per cent goes to Asia, most of it to western Asia—Iran, Saudi Arabia, Israel, Kuwait, and Turkey. And only a geographical technicality prevents adding Greece to that list.

Southeast Asia's prominence in the news should not obscure the fact that western Asia, alias the Near East, is a most explosive part of the world. In a paradoxical way, the fact that the United States is supplying both Saudi Arabia and Israel, both Greece and Turkey, both Iran and [in nonstrategic goods] the Soviet Union, may discourage massive detonation of the arsenals in that part of the world.

U. S. NEWS & WORLD REPORT
12 MAY 1975 (6)

★ ★ ★

The coming debate on funding for the controversial B-1 bomber is viewed on Capitol Hill as the main event in this year's congressional struggle over military spending. "It's going to be a now-or-never situation for the B-1," says one House strategist.

★ ★ ★

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR - 6 MAY 1975

Nuclear club: members only

How do the members of an elite and powerful club make everybody else happy not to join it?

This is a basic question posed to the countries already possessing nuclear weapons as Geneva talks begin in a renewed effort to prevent the potentially catastrophic spread of such weapons. How to deter the increasing number of countries developing a-capability to "go nuclear" if they choose?

The answers lie in reducing the apparent advantages of belonging to the nuclear weapons club — and reducing the disadvantages of staying out of it.

Specific means to these ends are being discussed in the conference to review the 1970 nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) which began in Geneva yesterday. Though public interest has not exactly been galvanized by the treaty with the jaw-breaking name, progress at the conference is vitally important if the lid is to be kept on what has so often been called the Pandora's box of nuclear proliferation.

The good news is that there is hope for such progress on the basis of new cooperative efforts by the United States and the Soviet Union. These are signaled by the joint release of policy reports on the subject by a panel of Americans and a panel of Russians under the auspices of the respective United Nations Associations of the two countries.

There are differences along with much fundamental agreement. Particularly significant is an increased Soviet disposition to talk "seriously" about pressing ahead with carrying out the terms of the NPT, according to Prof. Lincoln Bloomfield of the Center of International Studies at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, a panel member who met with the Russians in Moscow in March.

India's explosion of a nuclear device appeared to be one spur to the Soviet concern about further nuclear spread. With Israel, Brazil, and South Korea among several other nations discussed as potential nuclear powers, the whole world should share an urgency to answer that question of why any nonnuclear country should resist going nuclear.

The UN Association panel reports suggest various means of encouraging abstinence. For example:

• Internationally safeguarded help from the nuclear countries to the nonnuclear countries, including the use of peaceful nuclear explosions. This could remove pressure from countries to develop their own, perhaps less safe-guarded, efforts.

• Self-control by the nuclear countries in the development of weapons, while pursuing the NPT's provision for pushing toward a comprehensive test ban treaty. Salt II ought to be followed by a SALT III, suggests Professor Bloomfield, going beyond the limitation of strategic weapons to an actual cutting back on such weapons. Such steps could show the nuclear powers doing their part in reducing nuclear threat.

As the U.S. panel stated: "The most significant actions that the nuclear powers can take to discourage the spread of nuclear weapons will be major, prompt steps towards reducing their own nuclear capabilities. An international climate must be created in which the use of nuclear weapons in a military conflict is totally unacceptable and in which the political utility of possessing nuclear weapons steadily diminishes."

The steps are complicated, of course, so long as nuclear powers China and France remain outside the NPT. The review conference ought to work toward inducements to them to join in reducing arms. With all the danger of theft and misuse of spreading nuclear materials, the stricter safeguards recently proposed in a Vienna meeting of experts called by the International Atomic Energy Agency also need to be pursued.

The NPT review didn't make headlines yesterday. But its work is crucial to everybody's future.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR - 6 MAY 1975

Thailand and U.S. troops

Thailand is moving with characteristic alacrity to accommodate to the emerging communist dominance of Indo-China. The withdrawal over the next two months of another 7,500 American troops is a part of the process, begun long ago, of disengaging from the United States.

How far that process will be carried — some 19,500 U.S. troops will still remain — is not clear. Thailand's traditional, and shrewd, diplomacy has been to adjust to the realities of the moment in order to keep its independence. Hence Bangkok is trying hard not to offend the communists, which accounts too for its eagerness to be rid of the Cambodian refugees.

Treading the fine line between accommodation and independence will not be easy, especially in relations with Vietnam. Thailand also has a problem of communist insurgency, thought to be supported by the Chinese and North Vietnamese; serious battles took place only recently. The Thais may therefore wish to keep a certain American presence in their country.

One important factor in the equation is Peking. It is not known what the Chinese leaders really think, but comments made to foreign visitors suggest they look favorably on U S support for countries on the rim of Asia, including Thailand, in order to prevent Hanoi's domination of Indo-China and keep the Russians at bay. Peking would not, however, countenance the use of U.S. troops to fight domestic insurgencies.

Nor of course would the American Congress and public Hence the question now is how American military power can best be used in Asia to keep the region stabilized and at the same time avoid local entanglements.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
16 APRIL 1975 (6 MAY)

It's Turkey's Move

One of the reasons given for Turkey's reluctance to compromise on the Cyprus issue was the unstable, interim status of the government in Ankara. Now, however, a new coalition has been formed by Premier Suleyman Demirel and it will be interesting to see if this results in making a small but meaningful compromise aimed at resuming the dialogue with Greece and the shipment of U.S. military aid to an important member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Compromise is possible by an announcement by Premier Demirel of intentions to resettle refugees uprooted as a result of Turkey's invasion of Cyprus and occupation of the northern one half of the island. It is possible by recognizing, at least in principle, the necessity of withdrawing the occupying forces and the desirability of unifying the island which would perhaps be given a federated status, but under a central government made up of Greek and Turkish Cypriots.

Without this sort of a compromise, Congress should reject pressure from the Ford Administration to lift the arms embargo from Turkey. Military aid would be resumed under a bill approved by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee by a nine-to-seven vote. We hope the Senate does not fall for the Administration's argument that NATO's eastern flank is being undermined by the embargo. The resumption of aid would further antagonize Greece and thus leave the eastern flank undermined. It would also make a mockery of U.S. laws which prohibit such military assistance to countries using U.S. arms to invade other countries.

The only way to restore NATO's health in the eastern Mediterranean is to settle the Cyprus issue and this requires certain compromises from a country whose invading forces are on foreign soil.

NEW YORK TIMES 6 MAY 1975

U.S. Foreign Policy: After Vietnam

To the Editor:

There are a number of points that deserve comment regarding Secretary of State Kissinger's recent observations about Vietnam.

First, it is not helpful to blame Congress for the debacle. Recent Congressional rejection of Administration requests for military aid contributed something to the decline in ARVN's will to resist. But after all, the main Washington decisions have been made by successive Administrations. Future problems press so hard upon us that this is not the time for a post mortem on Washington's role.

Secondly, the breathtaking collapse in Saigon surely results mainly from the internal inadequacies of the Saigon regime itself—its inability to inspire; its corrupt, incompetent military leadership; its rigid, unresponsive political structure. No amount of American aid could have made up for these chronic deficiencies as Saigon faced its Vietnamese enemies.

Thirdly, the collapse of Vietnam should have come as no surprise. This development has been expected in most of Southeast Asia ever since the cease-fire sprung American troops and established a complicated "political process" neither party seriously accepted. Most governments in Southeast Asia long ago prepared for the present contingency. The surprise is only that Saigon lasted so long and that the collapse, when it came, was so abrupt.

Fourthly, the Secretary is right that there will be "consequences" following on the abrupt American withdrawal, particularly in Thailand, Malaysia and South Korea. But it is not correct that statesmen in Western Europe and the Middle East, where our interests are so much more substantial and direct, will look on our withdrawal from Vietnam as a guide to our likely reactions to crises in their area. Their principal response is one of relief that now Washington is at last free to tackle more central issues.

There are humanitarian imperatives the President and Secretary rightly seek to cope with. These will require urgent actions by many concerned Americans, including the Congress.

Finally, now the President, the Secretary and the Congress must turn their serious and nonpolemic attention to the agenda of foreign-policy challenges before us. These include (1) the continuing risk of war in the Middle East; (2) the troubling ambiguities of "détente"; (3) the stalled progress in SALT; (4) American relations with Europe, Japan and the Asian giants of China and India, and (5) reshaping an economic order accommodating the many profound changes since Bretton Woods. These are of far greater urgency and consequence to our national interest than how or why our entanglement in Indochina came to such an end.

We now have an opportunity to revitalize that gift of innovative attacks on complex international problems which made American leadership of the postwar nineteen-forties and early nineteen-fifties so remarkable—and so widely welcomed.

(Prof.) HOWARD WRIGGINS
Director, Southern Asian Institute
Columbia University
New York, May 1, 1975

WASHINGTON STAR - 5 MAY 1975 (6)

Candor in Correspondence

The administration, we think, has been a good deal less than candid about the correspondence between former President Nixon and South Vietnamese President Nguyen Van Thieu previous to the signing of the Paris peace agreement in 1973. The private assurances given to Thieu, revealed in two letters made public here by a former cabinet minister in the Saigon government, go well beyond the promises admitted by the White House, that the United States would "react vigorously" in case of violations of the agreements by Hanoi.

As it turns out, the pledges were considerably more specific. In November of 1972, Thieu received from Nixon "my absolute assurance that if Hanoi fails to abide by the terms of this agreement it is my intention to take swift and severe retaliatory action. In January of the next year, a recalcitrant Thieu was offered "my assurance of continued assistance in the post-settlement period and that we will respond with full force should the settlement be violated by North Vietnam". It is quite understandable that the Saigon government should have taken these assurances as a promise that the United States would intervene, at least with massive air attacks, if the peace accords broke down.

Why is the Ford administration touchy about these communications between two former presidents? The presumption must be that they were made in good faith by Nixon. The reports that he had every intention of retaliating against massive North Vietnamese violations of the peace accords have not been denied. Nixon's sudden loss of authority as the result of his Watergate problems in the spring of 1973 is a quite logical explanation of why the projected air strikes on North Vietnamese military installations in South Vietnam were cancelled. It is true, of course, that private correspondence between heads of state are not normally made public. But in the present circumstances, with both president's out of office and one of the two governments no longer in existence, the argument of confidentiality carries little weight.

Nor do we believe that the Congress or the American people were deliberately deceived. In many public statements early in 1973, Nixon threatened retaliation against the North Vietnamese in terms very nearly as specific as those in his letters to Thieu. It was the circumstances that made these warnings, as they say, inoperative. As Nixon's authority crumbled under the weight of Watergate revelations, Congress passed specific legislation prohibiting the kind of relatiatory action that Nixon had pledged. After that, it is incredible that Thieu should have expected any American intervention, and in fact, there is sound evidence that he did not.

So why all the pussy-footing about the letters, which, in any case are already in the public domaine? The administrations's qualms in this matter simply feed charges from Senator Henry Jackson and others that it is once again covering up. President Ford, it seems to us, has nothing whatever to lose in making all of the correspondence public, and we urge him to do so forthwith.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER - 6 MAY 1975

Consent is the foundation of foreign policy success

We aren't sure that there are any new lessons to learn from the Vietnam debacle, but there certainly is an old one. It is that no foreign policy of the U. S. government can be successful without the informed consent of the American people.

That may sound like a truism, but it seems necessary to state it because even the brilliant Secretary of State Henry Kissinger does not seem to have grasped it. In an interview yesterday on the NBC "Today" show, Mr. Kissinger reiterated a favorable theme. Reflecting on the debacle, he saw it stemming from the inability of the Executive Branch to conduct foreign policy as it saw fit.

"In January '73," he said, "we did not foresee that Watergate would sap the executive authority of the United States to such a degree that flexibility of executive action inherently would be circumscribed."

And he went on to say, "We did not foresee that the Congress would pass a law which prohibited us from enforcing the Paris agreement . . . I do not believe that Hanoi would have sent 19 of its 20 divisions south if these two things hadn't happened."

Looked at one way, this is a roundabout way of saying that Congress is to blame for America's failure to meet its commitments, but there are deeper implications as well.

Mr. Kissinger's approach rests on two untenable assumptions—that the Executive Branch, which is to say the President and himself, not necessarily in that order of importance, know the right course to follow in foreign affairs and that their action should not be "circumscribed" by public opinion.

One must grant, of course, that public opinion can be wrong. Still, it seems to us that when the people make erroneous judgments it is usually because they have not been given the facts on which to make right judgments.

And that is the history of our involvement in Southeast Asia—a history of an Executive Branch which, over the years, operated in secrecy and insisted on public acquiescence, not to say acclaim, without telling the public the truth. Many of the crimes of Watergate were themselves rooted in President Nixon's obsession with secrecy—the wiretapping of newsmen and officials on Mr. Kissinger's staff, for example, and the attempt, by a burglary, to "get something" on Dr. Daniel Ellsberg, who had revealed the secret study of the truth about our Vietnam involvement.

Secrecy breeds deceit, and deceit breeds distrust. The War Powers Act was not immaculately conceived. It was born of a congressional determination, reflecting public opinion, that never again would an Executive Branch deceive the American people into another shooting war.

That may be an inconvenience to the administration. The necessity of obtaining public consent to policy may also seem to be an inconvenience. Yet the very process of obtaining public consent can save policy-makers from their more egregious errors, for there is no better way of testing policy than to debate it openly. That, after all, is what democracy is all about.

What went wrong in Southeast Asia was not the inability of the Executive to pursue a policy but the policy itself, and if one lesson of America's defeat is that the Executive Branch can also be wrong, surely another is, as Averill Harriman put it, that "no foreign policy will stick unless the American people are behind it." And they cannot be expected to give any administration "flexibility" unless the administration gives them the facts.

NEW YORK TIMES - 6 MAY 1975

Choice for Portugal

Portugal's chances for peaceful progress toward political democracy, social reform and economic development now depend critically on the answer to one question:

What do the country's military rulers mean when they speak of "Portuguese socialism" as the goal of the revolution they launched with the overthrow of the fascist regime a year ago?

If they mean social democracy in the Western European mold—social reform, free speech and press, economic planning, state intervention or ownership in some sectors, private enterprise in others—they can be assured of a relatively smooth passage.

This pattern was supported by more than 63 per cent of the voters who marked their ballots for the Socialist and Popular Democratic parties in the election of a constituent assembly a few days ago. This direction would win immediate sympathy and support for Portugal from many European governments and presumably from the United States as well.

If, however, the military leaders are bent on pervasive Marxist socialism with no political democracy—the socialism clearly favored by one of the most orthodox Communist parties in the world, as well as by radical spokesmen for the Armed Forces Movement—Portugal faces a bleak future. The Portuguese will find they have exchanged a dictatorship of the right for one of the Marxist left.

To its credit, the Armed Forces Movement ignored Communist pleas for a delay and carried out a remarkably free election. The response—a 92 per cent turnout—was magnificent. But if the people demonstrated above all their desire to participate in the democratic process, they also indicated clearly the direction they wish to go. The Communists, far better organized at the outset than any other party and lavishly financed from abroad, got only 12.5 per cent of the votes. Only 7 per cent took the advice of some military leaders and cast blank ballots.

The wiser military chiefs surely realize that to ignore such decisive results will risk unrest and opposition to the legitimate goals of the 1974 revolution. But others behave as though the election had no significance whatever.

There can be no effective challenge to the authority of the Armed Forces Movement. All major parties have agreed, albeit under pressure, to a dominant military role in Portugal's political life for at least three years. But the hope must be that after the long night of fascism the military rulers will not substitute the ideas of a radical minority for the clearly expressed will of the people.

What those people were saying emphatically last week is that Portugal can have social reform, structural change and economic advance within a framework of democracy and a climate of freedom.

NEW YORK NEWS - 6 MAY 1975

THE AMERICAN WAY

The Ford administration will ask Congress for $507 million to pay the cost of bringing 125,000 Vietnamese refugees to this country and helping them to start new lives. That is in keeping with this nation's tradition of compassion and hospitality.

Honoring another cherished American principle, the refugees will be given a free choice whether to remain here, return home, or settle in another land. That, we hope, will still the vicious Communist lie that these people were "kidnaped" by the U.S.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

BOSTON GLOBE - 4 MAY 1975 (6)

Lessons from Vietnam

The greatest disaster in American foreign policy has ended at last. This country's intervention in Southeast Asia cost us more than 50,000 American lives and $150 billion in tax money. And, in the end, we got nothing for our effort but pain and humiliation.

If there is a single lesson in this terrible experience, it is that America's foreign policy has been isolated from the will of the people at home and has become increasingly out of touch with the ideals and aspirations of the people we aimed to help abroad — not just in Vietnam, but in places like Greece and Portugal, Chile and the Middle East.

In large part our deafness has stemmed from a dangerous overdependence by two Presidents on a single brilliant and tireless Secretary of State who was given free rein to promote what he saw as the best interests of the United States.

This has resulted in short-term gains without long-range solutions. It has made waste of a large and extremely capable State Department. And it has not only led to the neglect of areas beyond Dr. Kissinger's personal scrutiny but it has closed the Administration to valuable outside advice.

As Mary McGrory suggested last week, it was not until our young people "took up arms in the McCarthy campaign" and "evicted a President" that the ordinary citizen began to question our activities abroad. With the young people and their parents of the World War II generation in rout, grass roots resentment began to penetrate Congress.

American foreign policy has too often been regarded as the exclusive province of the President and his Secretary of State. Today Congress is taking an active interest in foreign policy. It should be a long time before any Administration is again allowed to lead the nation down the road of military intervention.

And, with the people still casting a suspicious eye on everything that happens in Washington, there is a fair chance that a consensus foreign policy can evolve.

It may be a dangerous process. The temper of the country is more isolationist than internationalist these days and, as James Q. Wilson points out in the Spring issue of "The Public Interest," there is a continuing decline in the people's trust in their government.

This could manifest itself in a Congress which substitutes obstruction for consideration and result in a foreign policy that is timid rather than cautious. Recent polls seem to suggest that the average citizen would just as soon forget Asia and the Asians and focus entirely on domestic matters.

But we cannot forget Asia — or Europe or Africa or Latin America or the Middle East. Americans must not give unwitting credence to the domino theory by reacting so strongly to the failure in Indochina that we abandon our commitments to the rest of the world rather than creatively modifying them. As President Kennedy once put it, "Domestic policy can defeat us; foreign policy will kill us."

Overall, our goal must be to get back to the point where the United States is respected for what it is, not for the power it wields.

What this country needs now is a new type of commitment. No longer can we rely on threats of arms and economic reprisal to get our way. In fact we should work to reduce the reliance on arms everywhere. And this process might well begin with a review of all of the 50 to 80 bilateral treaties now in existence that require the United States to use force on behalf of a perceived ally, regardless of our lasting national interest.

Our new commitment should be based on openness and on respect for the rights and interests of other nations as well as our own. Economic, technical and humanitarian aid should be based on mutual interest but they should not be used to curry favor with one people while letting another people become our enemy.

It will not be easy to change a foreign policy which has undergone little modification since the days of John Foster Dulles' brinksmanship. But change it we must, if we are to survive in a changing world.

BALTIMORE NEWS AMERICAN - 1 MAY 1975 (6)

The Taste Of Ashes

So it has ended at last, this Vietnamese war of more than 30 years, and perhaps the strongest first reaction was a sense of numbed surprise that the end came so quickly in the final cataclysm.

It is literally difficult to grasp that it really is all over, that unconditional surrender was given by the Saigon government to its Communist invaders, that it would do so with such meekness after so much suffering by its people over so many years.

The brutal fact is that Saigon was beaten and had absolutely no hope of victory left. In the face of forces armed by unlimited supplies from the Soviet Union and Red China, South Vietnam was doomed when the 74th Congress withheld similar aid from the United States.

It is unfair to blame Congress. Its members are elected to represent the views of the American public. And that public — in no uncertain terms—had signalled the hell with Vietnam and any further involvement in that country's troubles.

You have to face it. Following a generation of trying to help the south, a collapse of American will occurred when we got our own fighting men out of there through the Paris "peace" accords. The war had cost us over 50,000 dead, 300,000 wounded, some $140 billion and all kinds of damaging domestic divisions. Enough was enough.

Along with Saigon's surrender, a tragic chapter in this country's history thus has ended. Because of our failure to carry through in support of South Vietnam, a new and uncertain chapter in our future remains to be written.

The outlook is not encouraging, but the taste of ashes from our Vietnam defeat need not be as important as it may seem.

We can recapture lost credibility with our allies by keeping ourselves militarily strong — and henceforth living up to commitments made with the same kind of selective care taken by pragmatic bosses of the Communist world.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II --Main Edition -- 6 May 1975

FEATURES COLUMNISTS

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR - 6 MAY 1975

CIA view proved right Last days of Saigon:

By Daniel Southerland
Staff correspondent of
The Christian Science Monitor

Hong Kong

Graham Martin, the U.S. Ambassador to South Vietnam, is the target of much criticism for the hasty and disorderly way in which the last Americans and some of their Vietnamese friends were evacuated from Saigon.

But as time moves on, the critics are likely to focus increasingly on the more weighty issue of Mr. Martin's entire Vietnam policy and what embassy insiders began to describe openly in recent days as the Ambassador's "illusions" and "overoptimism."

Prominent among those insiders were Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) officials, who were painting a gloomier picture of Saigon's prospects for survival several weeks ago than Mr. Martin was.

Even well after the fall of the city of Da Nang at the end of March, the Ambassador persisted, according to embassy officials, in thinking that Saigon could hold the line at some point on the military front. The CIA, on the other hand, was convinced soon after the fall of Da Nang that the war was lost.

Last-ditch hopes held

With much of the country in Communist hands, Mr. Martin argued that the Communists actually held little more than "deficit," or nonproductive, areas, and that Saigon still had a hope of defending the more productive areas.

According to well-placed embassy sources, the CIA at that point saw the need to encourage the establishment of a new and more conciliatory leadership in Saigon. But Mr. Martin and some of his subordinates were advocating the formation of a "fighting cabinet" in Saigon under President Nguyen Van Thieu.

As it was, the "fighting cabinet" was ineffective, the CIA's pessimism over Saigon's prospects for survival seemed justified by further government retreats, and the CIA station chief in Saigon apparently had some success in helping persuade Mr. Martin that President Thieu's leadership was a liability.

It may remain one of those "ifs" of history, but some CIA officials are convinced that if Mr. Martin had foreseen more clearly the defeats that lay ahead of Saigon, he and Washington might have been able to move quickly enough to set up conditions for at least a gradual, phased Communist take-over, and a more graceful American exit, instead of the outright military take-over that eventually occurred.

Saigon bickered to the end

By the time Mr. Thieu resigned in late April and Saigon did shift to a negotiating posture, there was still much bickering among the Saigon politicians as to how power should be transferred from the old Thieu regime to a new "peace government."

The Communists began hardening their public position on negotiations, and, after halting major attacks for four or five days,

See CIA VIEW, Pg. 2-F

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER - 6 MAY 1975

Thais Want U. S. to Go, Not Afraid of Dominoes

By JAMES McCARTNEY
Inquirer Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon announced a 28 percent slash in U. S. troop strength in Thailand yesterday, raising new fears about tumbling "dominoes" in Southeast Asia.

The announcement, made jointly with the Thai government, cut authorized troop levels from 27,000 to 19,500 by the end of June. The announcement did not say how many of the 350 U. S. military planes remaining from the armada that bombed Cambodia and North and South Vietnam would be allowed to remain.

The new figure represented a sharp increase in the speed of U. S. troop withdrawals from Thailand, on the Indochina frontier, and could signal the beginning of the end of a U. S. military presence in Thailand.

The announcement, forced by Thai officials who have publicly demanded a total U. S. troop withdrawal by next March, could hardly have come at a more awkward time for the United States.

It came only a week after a total U. S. pullout from nearby South Vietnam, at a time when President Ford, Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger and other top officials have been attempting to reassure the world that U. S. commitments remain unaltered.

Thailand has long been considered the next major country that might be threatened with a Communist take-over, if the Communists won in Indochina, as they have now. It has been considered the next potential threatened "domino" in the much-discussed "domino theory."

But officials here do not believe that Thailand is under immediate military threat from Communists in Indochina. Instead, pressure on the United States to withdraw troops is coming from a shaky conservative government, under domestic political pressure to get rid of unpopular foreigners and pursue a more neutral policy.

In the classic "domino" theory, as first explained by President Dwight D. Eisenhower, the United States was supposed to give military assistance to threatened "dominoes." Now the Thais are not asking for U. S. help — they are asking the United States to leave.

The United States first sent major

See THAIS, Pg. 2-F

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
6 MAY 1975

U.S. looks beyond Vietnam

By Dana Adams Schmidt
Staff correspondent of
The Christian Science Monitor

Washington

The shape of U.S. foreign policy in the Far East — how will it emerge after the Vietnam experience?

U.S. leaders are groping for new plans for American influence and power — where to use it and to what ends.

The effort might be described as one intended to stop the trend that set in with Vietnam, to limit the damage, and make sure that other American commitments remain firm; to avoid future overcommitment without lapsing into isolation.

The President, who intends increasingly to take key policy decisions into his own hands, has made a commitment to maintain American strength. And Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger has talked about making a stand on a chain including Taiwan, Japan, and South Korea.

Now Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger and his Undersecretary for Political Affairs Joseph J. Sisco offer new insights into what they feel should lie ahead for the United States.

Dr. Kissinger in an appearance on the NBC "Today" show asserted that the major objectives of the United States "dictated by our history" remain unaffected.

"They are more difficult as a result of our setback, but we can master them and we will master them," he said. Recalling that "almost every great initiative in the postwar period has either been initiated by America or has been carried out with our strong support," he declared that "if we want to avoid a world of chaos, if we want to achieve a world of progress, the American role is absolutely imperative."

The problem, he said, "is to gear American commitments to American capabilities."

A major step toward cutting back on these commitments, meanwhile, was indicated by agreement between the United States and Thailand to reduce the American presence

See BEYOND VIETNAM, Pg. 2-F

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER
6 MAY 1975

The war machine: expensive

By WILLIAM VANCE
Inquirer Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — Throughout the war years we have been counseled by officialdom to look at the bright side and rejoice in the economic wonders wrought by high defense spending.

The multi-billion dollar defense budgets, we were led to believe, had a happy and healthy spinoff in terms of new jobs rippling through the economy.

Well, would you believe that those $80 billion military budgets actually were creating unemployment instead? Would you believe that between 1968 and 1972, Pennsylvania and New Jersey were being robbed of an average 180,000 jobs a year because of the "negative impact" of defense spending.

That, at least, is the premise of an intriguing study that has just arrived here from the Public Interest Research Group in Michigan (PIRGIM).

The report relies heavily on the research and methodology employed by Yale Professor Bruce Russett, who analyzed 30 years of military spending for a book on the burdens of national defense.

Russett found that, yes, military spending does have a stimulative effect on some specific localities. But nationally, when spending on military goods goes up, spending on consumer-oriented items—clothing, food, cars, houses and the like — goes down.

For example, $1 billion spent on the military means $187 million will not be spent on civilian services, $163 million will not be spent on durable goods and $114 million will not be spent on housing, the analysis showed.

The study shows that military spending creates fewer jobs per billion dollars than any other government spending except the space program.

The real stunner here is in the translation to lost jobs.

Pennsylvania suffered the fifth worst negative employment impact in the nation, the study shows, with 127,600 "foregone" jobs, on an annual average, from 1968 to 1972. New Jersey was eighth with a minus 53,000 jobs, and Delaware was 24th with a minus 1,000.

In the five hardest-hit states — New York, Illinois, Michigan, Ohio and Pennsylvania — the number of jobs foregone because of high Pentagon budgets "averaged 85 percent of their total unemployment for 1968-72," the study says.

In all, 26 states lost jobs because of high military spending, including every major industrial state except Texas and California.

And despite defense-related job gains in the other states, the bottom line in PIRGIM'S analysis shows a net loss of 844,000 jobs for the U.S. as a whole.

THAIS -- CONTINUED

combat units to Thailand in 1962 and began a major buildup of air power for the Vietnam war on Thai bases in 1964.

U. S. troop strength reached a peak of 48,000 in 1969, under former President Richard M. Nixon. Major withdrawals began after the signing of the Vietnam peace accords in 1973.

U. S. officials apparently would like to maintain about 10,000 U. S. troops in Thailand, but the Thais apparently are under heavy pressure from student groups and others to force the United States out.

Thais also would like to improve relations with North Vietnam, now that North Vietnam has established itself as the dominant power in Indochina.

Thailand is not part of Indochina. The term refers to countries that were colonized by France, now known as Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia. Thailand is one of the few nations in the area that was never a colony for anyone. It maintained itself as a buffer state between British and French colonial interests in the area, often playing one great power off against another, with some success.

It is still a largely undeveloped country, operating under a so-called "constitutional" monarchy. People still fall on their knees before the king.

Only last week, Thailand's foreign minister angrily denounced the United States as a country without morals and vowed to expel U. S. servicemen within a year.

The foreign minister Chartichai Choonhavan, responded to remarks made in Washington by Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger, about a U. S. "obligation of a moral nature" to defend Thailand.

"Moral?" asked Choonhavan. "The United States does not have any morals at this point. They have already pulled out from Cambodia and South Vietnam, so we are going to have to depend on ourselves."

While State Department officials do not talk in terms of "moral" obligations to Thailand, they point out that the United States has had a mutual defense treaty with Thailand and other so-called "SEATO" countries in Asia since 1954.

The treaty requires that the United States come to the aid of Thailand in the event of "common danger" in "accordance with its constitutional processes."

In 1962, Secretary of State Dean Rusk embellished this obligation by stating publicly that the United States accepted a responsibility for defending Thailand regardless of what other SEATO nations might do.

Another matter causing tension between the U. S. and Thailand involves disposition of about 125 U. S.-built aircraft flown to U. S. bases in Thailand by fleeing South Vietnamese airmen.

The United States insists that it has title to the planes. Some Thai officials favor returning the planes to the new Communist government in South Vietnam. U. S. officials say the matter will be "negotiated." The Communists insist that they own the planes.

The Pentagon reported yesterday that it already had started to remove some of the planes, according to the Associated Press. A spokesman said the larger C-130s were being flown out and smaller aircraft such as helicopters were being loaded onto the carrier USS Midway off the Thai port of Sattahip.

CIA VIEW -- CONTINUED

they grew impatient and began pressing again militarily. The demoralized Saigon Army crumbled rapidly in the face of more concerted thrusts. And as senior Saigon Army officers began sending their families out of the country and then fleeing for their own lives, the smell of victory apparently became overpowering for the Communists. There was little left for them to do but walk into Saigon.

By late Monday, April 28, Ambassador Martin still thought the Communists probably would go through the motions of negotiating a final settlement that would amount to little more than a disguised surrender for Saigon but would permit the presence of a reduced U.S. Embassy staff in South Vietnam.

This view still prevailed at an embassy meeting that ended around 2 a.m. Tuesday. But by late that morning the risk that the Communists might soon overrun the city became apparent to all and the final evacuation was ordered.

Evacuation started late

Mr. Martin earlier had feared moving toward a complete evacuation of Americans, because he thought that it would amount to "pushing the panic button," and would undermine any further "will to resist" on the part of Saigon. A staged evacuation had been going on for weeks, but it had been orchestrated to give the impression that not all the Americans were leaving.

One mistake, in the view of many critics, was not to have evacuated earlier, along with their families, more of the Vietnamese who had worked for the Americans. But Ambassador Martin had thought he had more time to get them out. As it was, an undetermined number of these Vietnamese were left behind.

The irony was that some of the Vietnamese the Americans considered the most "deserving" were left behind, while quite a few corrupt officials and military officers, as well as bar girls and prostitutes, got out on the basis of personal friendships with Americans and hastily contrived "marriages."

About 180 Vietnamese, comprising employees of the U.S. Information Service (USIS) and their families, had gathered at the USIS offices in Saigon Tuesday to be taken to the airport. When buses for the airport began to load, people from the streets poured onto them, the employees were pinned inside the USIS compound, and left behind.

BEYOND VIETNAM -- CONTINUED

there by one-fourth, from 25,000 to 19,500. Some 350 aircraft, which once spearheaded American bombing of North Vietnam and Cambodia, are expected to be reduced proportionately

The reduction is a first step toward total withdrawal with 12 months demanded by the Thai Government.

That will leave the main American military presence in the form of the Seventh Fleet with its five aircraft carriers, about 40,000 men in South Korea, and a Marine division on Guam. The Philippines has asked for renegotiation of U.S. air and naval bases, Indonesia's anti-communist regime has shown signs of nervousness, and Japan is seeking to draw tighter the strands of the United States mutual defense commitment.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

U.S. NEWS & WORLD REPORT 12 MAY 1975 (6)

WHAT'S WRONG WITH THE MARINES?

There's unrest in the ranks, key weapons are short, career leathernecks are fed up. It's enough to raise fresh worries about the Corps' future.

Signs that the U.S. Marine Corps is fading as the nation's elite fighting force is a matter of deepening concern in Washington—and in the Corps itself.

The quality of the men who serve is a matter of widening debate. Desertions and court-martial convictions are climbing. Crime inside the barracks is rampant. Many career Marines are fed up and are getting out.

Key equipment is in short supply. Marines still lack the latest antitank missiles, though they already are being made available to Mideast nations. The Corps' own tank forces are approaching obsolescence.

Marine generals are wracked with dissension over the future of their service. A bitter fight over selection of a new Commandant was dampened only by President Ford's earlier-than-usual nomination April 30 of Lt. Gen. Louis H. Wilson Jr., to become the top Marine.

Lean and hard, or—? The Marines' top leadership agrees that the service has problems brought on by post-Vietnam stresses. But it maintains that corrections are under way and that the Corps is lean, hard and ready to meet any crisis. A growing number of Marine officers disagree.

Talks with high-level Marines both at headquarters and in the field as well as with other defense officials reflect the widespread alarm.

A chief concern is evidence that the quality of the men in the Corps has been sliding.

In an effort to reduce on-base thefts and fights, for instance, staff noncommissioned officers have returned to living in barracks as policemen, according to Marine officers.

A senior colonel relates that on Okinawa, "We have two fully armed sentries on duty at all armories at all times. Who are they protecting the armories against? Our own men."

"Disorder squads." The Marines on Okinawa, the colonel continues, were forced to form "disorder squads," which come on duty at 4 p.m. daily, equipped with night sticks, body armor and face protectors.

Figures provided by the Marines and the Department of Defense show this about changes in the Marines since the Corps quit drafting men in 1972:

- The Marine desertion rate per 1,000 men is more than double that of the Army—89 to 41. In 1971, rates were nearly reversed—Army, 73; Marines, 56.
- The U.S. Army is nearly four times the size of the 196,000-man Corps, yet 1,328 Marines were convicted of major crimes in federal and State courts in 1974, only slightly fewer than the 1,697 convictions of soldiers.
- On a percentage basis, the Marines led all the services in 1974 in issuing bad-conduct, undesirable and dishonorable discharges. This has been generally true since 1970. In previous years back to 1950, less-than-honorable discharges were about the same for the Marines and Army, with the Marines often showing fewer. In mitigation of these figures, Pentagon officials point out that the other services are more prone to release men who will accept discharges in lieu of a trial.
- At two Marine installations with a total Marine population of 43,931—Camp Lejeune, N.C., and Camp Pendleton, Calif.—court-martial convictions for felonies jumped from 91 during 1972 to 184 in 1974.

Public complaints. So troublesome have discipline and other personnel matters become that some Marines have begun complaining publicly.

Said former 1st Lt. David E. Kelly, who once served on Okinawa, in a recent magazine article that received wide attention: The Marine Corps has "antiquated equipment, living conditions far below those of the other services, poor training facilities and lack of discipline." He added:

"Too many of the quality Marines get out."

Over all, the Marines report few difficulties in meeting their goals in numbers of recruits. Men completing their first tour of duty are re-enlisting at a rate of 19 per cent, 7 percentage points higher than in 1972.

However, re-enlistment among career Marines is off, a fact that worries many officers. What's more, Marine officials have expressed concern over having to dip deeper into groups of men who have been high-school dropouts, in order to meet enlistment quotas.

No magic number? Several generals told U.S. News & World Report in private that they fear the Corps has become hypnotized by numbers at the expense of quality—that there is no magic in 196,000 Marines, the number supposedly needed to maintain three divisions and three air wings as required by law. Perhaps, they said, the solution lies in letting manpower levels drop to where the Corps winds up with only 150,000 "really good men."

Racial integration poses problems, too.

Though only 20 per cent of the Corps is black, the combat and combat-support groups are 38 per cent black. Headquarters explains that blacks are generally less well educated and thus do not qualify for many specialist ratings.

Black-white relations have taken a turn for the better recently, with the introduction of compulsory race-relations studies. Clashes based on race have been halved in the past two years.

Equipment shortages. As if personnel problems were not enough, there are equipment shortages.

For one: Wire-guided TOW antitank missiles and shoulder-fired Dragon missiles are in the Army's inventory—and even those of some Middle Eastern nations. But the Marines have none. They still depend on recoilless rifles, their own tanks and air support to defeat enemy armor. Latest antiaircraft weapons, such as those used in the 1973 Israeli-Arab war, are making the air-support operation costly, however.

Modern tanks are in short supply. The Marines are authorized 408 M-60 tanks, which are heavily armored and mount a 105-mm gun. By the end of June, the Marines hope to have 120—which looks unlikely since they have only about 60 on hand and production lines are slow.

As the backbone of their armored forces, the Marines have 431 M-48 tanks with 90-mm guns.

Such tanks "are not considered viable battlefield opponents for Soviet tanks," states an Army report.

The Marines have two antiaircraft-missile battalions, but only one is equipped with the faster, more-accurate and improved Hawk missile, designed to hit low-flying planes.

In aircraft, the Marines are well supplied by their standards with fighter-bombers, such as the F-4 Phantom, and ground-attack planes—the A-4 Skyhawk and the A-6 Intruder. The marines are also up to strength in helicopters and in amphibious-landing vehicles.

Even if the Marines had the most advanced equipment available, they would have difficulty getting where they wanted to go.

Fewer transports. The Navy, which had 157 amphibious-warfare ships in 1968, now has only 66, scattered from Okinawa to the Mediterranean Sea.

There are some estimates that to assemble the ships, embark an assault force of 25,000 Marines and transport them to a distant point—say the Persian Gulf—would take at least 45 days.

It is a decision to buy an advanced weapon that has touched off one of the Corps' hottest disputes.

A number of generals are angered by a move to acquire four squadrons—48 planes—of Navy F-14 Tomcat fighters, costing 18 million dollars each.

The F-14, built by Grumman Aerospace Corporation, is an extremely fast and agile interceptor designed to shoot down enemy planes at great distances from aircraft carriers. It now is being modified to carry air-to-ground weapons although, as a manufacturer's representative noted, it would not have the accuracy of much cheaper planes.

The generals are questioning the wisdom of sending an aircraft with an 18-million-dollar price tag to do a job that is done better by one that costs less than 4

(See MARINES, Pg 4-F)

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON STAR 5 MAY 1975 (6)

The Credibility of U.S. Commitments

CROSBY NOYES

The question before the world in the wake of the debacle in Vietnam is the credibility of the American commitments. And for just about everyone, friend and foe alike, it is a very important question indeed.

There are three major elements involved. The first is how our adversaries — notably the Soviet Union and the People's Republic of China — view our performance in Vietnam.

The second is how those who depend on American power for their security view it. And finally, there is the question of how we view it ourselves.

So far as our adversaries are concerned, there probably is less to worry about, in the view of many diplomatic experts, than with the other two groups. The Chinese and Russians being somewhat cautious types, no very sweeping conclusions are likely to be drawn about Vietnam.

To be sure, the Americans intervened in the war and their allies were ultimately defeated. On the other hand, neither the Russians nor the Chinese intervened, except with military and economic aid, even when their allies were most hard-pressed.

The Russians, for their part, allowed the Arab armies to be defeated in 1967, without seriously impairing their credibility in Eastern Europe.

The general guess is that our adversaries will be cautious in pressing their luck. They may even be somewhat concerned that the United States could overreact to a new challenge in order to re-establish its credibility as a world power.

The attitude of our friends and allies obviously is ambiguous.

They are making the calculation that our real national interests were not involved in Vietnam and (hopefully) that they are involved in Western Europe, Japan, Israel and other areas.

The most confident are those with whom we have formal security commitments, such as NATO and the Japanese-American mutual security treaty. The least confident are those nations who rely on American power (like, say, Yugoslavia) but with whom we have no formal commitments of any kind.

Other countries with whom we have commitments, like Thailand or Taiwan, or even an American military presence, as in South Korea and the Philippines, are betraying a growing anxiety as the result of the outcome in Vietnam.

For them, the really critical question is how the American public itself will react to the defeat. And they suspect that they have something to worry about.

I can hardly blame them. They, like everyone else, have access to polls which show that the majority of Americans would intervene militarily to protect no foreign country in the world except Canada (which also happens to be one of the least-threatened areas in the world).

They, too, can read the endless pronouncements of our most eminent political leaders about the "lessons of Vietnam," the mistake that will never be repeated, the myth of American power, and so on.

To them, it adds up to a powerful new mood of isolationism in this country that leaves them feeling suddenly and uncomfortably naked. And that also is understandable.

MARINES -- CONTINUED

million.

Atop all this, the Corps' leaders are in turmoil over its future mission.

This furor burst out in the form of a bitter struggle over the successor to Gen. Robert E. Cushman, Jr., as Commandant later this year.

Inside war. "Old breed" Marines with 20 to 30 years of service said the infighting was the fiercest in their memory, fragmenting the upper echelons of the Corps.

Selection of General Wilson to take over as the next Commandant is expected to calm, though not necessarily end, the differences.

"We can live with him," said one general who has been critical of present leadership.

Many Marine generals considered the selection of the new Commandant more important at this time than in any other period since the 1930s when the Corps pioneered in amphibious assault. The reason lies in the fact that the new chief will play a major role in charting the course of the Corps for four years during a period of transition.

Since the Boxer Rebellion and U.S. intervention in China at the turn of the twentieth century, the Marines have been oriented toward operations in the Pacific Ocean basin and, closer to home, the Caribbean area.

An about-face. Now the Marines are beginning to look across the Atlantic, convinced that the nation is turning its back on most of Asia for the foreseeable future.

Many Marines believe their new areas of interest will stretch from Norway through Central Europe to the Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf—from the Arctic to the deserts.

> These are all high-risk areas in which heavy loss of men and material is a very real possibility if fighting comes about. It will be the new Commandant who will lay down guidelines for combat doctrine there, thus affecting training, as well as type and quality of material.

Despite the headaches facing the Corps, General Cushman believes the Marines are still the crack force they are designed to be.

Liking for violence. The Commandant told U.S. News & World Report he thought the personnel problems are being tackled properly; that most recruits who complete training go on to become good Marines.

The general noted that the Corps is "afflicted with all the ills that plague big cities."

He added that the Marines "no longer get the big strapping farm boys" but the ones who are street wise.

They come, the general felt, with problems of drugs, racial prejudice and "a greater propensity to violence."

One general, rated as a possible future Commandant, said: "Stability is a matter of great importance. When you have high-quality men, all the other problems take care of themselves—drugs, discipline, race and crime. . . .

"We need to reinvigorate ourselves. Overriding all else is something not really quantifiable, but it is a fact. That fact is that we can develop men who will go into battle and win—or they will die in the attempt."

The foregoing was reported by Bem Price of this magazine's staff, himself a Marine for 12 years.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

U.S. NEWS & WORLD REPORT 12 MAY 1975 (6)

THE CASE FOR MORE NUCLEAR CARRIERS

By Adm. Hyman G. Rickover, Authority on Atomic Warships

The Navy on May 3 commissioned the U.S.S. Nimitz, our second nuclear-powered aircraft carrier and our seventh nuclear-powered surface warship.

The Nimitz has a length of 1,092 feet, a flight-deck width of over 250 feet, and a combat-load displacement of nearly 95,000 tons, and can operate and provide sustained support for a naval air wing of about 100 aircraft. Her initial nuclear cores will provide her with enough fuel to carry out operations for the next 13 years, thus making her truly independent of propulsion-fuel logistic support. These cores contain energy equivalent to over 2 million tons of coal or 11 million barrels of oil—enough oil to fill a train of tank cars stretching from Washington to Boston.

Freedom from oil. The Nimitz marks the renaissance of a modern nuclear-powered surface Navy. Nuclear power in surface warships gives them the ability to operate continuously at high speed; this affords them protection not available to nonnuclear ships. This could mean the difference between victory and defeat in battle. As the number of our advance bases decreases and the size of the fleet continues to shrink, the need for ships independent of the logistic umbilical cord for oil will continue to increase.

Next to providing the major deterrent to all-out nuclear war, I believe that the most important mission of our Navy is to insure that our first-line naval striking forces can carry out their mission against threats potential enemies are presently developing. A significant portion of our major surface warships must be nuclear-powered or we may end up without a credible deterrent to aggressions which do not warrant escalation to a nuclear war.

For the foreseeable future, the aircraft carrier will be the principal offensive striking arm of the Navy in a nonnuclear war. No other weapon system under development can replace the long-range, sustained, concentrated firepower of the carrier air wing. Nuclear submarines and nuclear surface ships with antiair and antisubmarine capabilities are all needed to supplement and augment the capabilities of the nuclear carrier.

The U.S. Navy currently has 14 active aircraft carriers: the Enterprise; eight oil-fired Forrestal-class, large-deck carriers built in the 1950s and 1960s; three post World War II Midway-class carriers, and two World War II Essex-class carriers, the Oriskany and the Hancock. This is about half the 24 carriers the U.S. Navy had at the beginning of the Vietnam War.

It will be necessary to start building replacements for the eight Forrestal-class carriers soon just to sustain a 12-carrier force. With the declining number of overseas U.S. bases and the decreasing number of carriers, it is important that the new carriers we build be as capable as possible. The Nimitz and her sister ships are such carriers.

Our carriers are vulnerable to attack by Soviet sea-based cruise missiles—as are all surface ships. However, the first line of defense our surface ships have against such missiles and their launching platforms is carrier-based aircraft. Without carriers and their aircraft, other surface warships, replenishment ships and amphibious forces would be all much more vulnerable.

The nuclear-carrier task force with its capability of unlimited operation at high speed is the most powerful, least vulnerable surface-ship force in the history of naval warfare.

Some have objected to nuclear warships on the basis of higher initial-investment cost. In this regard, it should be borne in mind that the initial cost of conventional ships does not include the cost of oil. Recently, oil costs have risen dramatically.

It costs more than $25 a barrel to buy, store and deliver oil to Navy ships. At that rate, it would cost about 270 million dollars to provide the amount of oil for a conventionally powered carrier equivalent to the nuclear fuel in the Nimitz. That is almost three times the comparable cost of nuclear fuel for this type ship.

Nuclear ships are often compared in cost with cheaper conventional ships of much less military capability, the argument being that we should build more of the cheaper conventional ships rather than fewer of the nuclear ships. Yet study after study has shown that when all costs are considered, nuclear warships cost little more than conventional warships having the same weapons systems—and the nuclear warships are far superior militarily.

Further, the cost of war itself far exceeds any cost needed to be prepared to prevent a war. The best warships we can build are those which are never used in combat because they have served to prevent war.

At stake: "our survival." With the heavy military and nonmilitary demands on its budget, the United States must only spend where it is necessary and where the value received is clear. But the real value of having a Navy capable of countering the Soviet threat cannot be measured in dollars alone; our survival may also depend on it.

The Soviets recognize the importance of becoming the world's strongest sea power. We have now chosen not to challenge them with numbers of ships. For this reason, it is essential that the ships we do build are the most powerful and effective weapons we know how to build. This means nuclear propulsion for major warships. The penalty for any other approach is the steady erosion of our conventional military forces, with the consequent reduction in our influence and in our "options" in world affairs.

The alternative is to rely for our security on nuclear weapons. Their use could mark the supreme failure of mankind.

DEFENSE SPACE BUSINESS DAILY 5 MAY 1975 (6)

TUNNEY URGES SUPPORT FOR B-1. Sen. John Tunney (D-Calif.) has called on the Senate Armed Services Committee to provide the full funding requested for the B-1 bomber, asserting that the B-1 is necessary "to maintain the strategic arms balance and to demonstrate our willingness to support our commitments abroad by bolstering our defense at home."

He said that the B-1, which is an indispensable part of America's strategic deterrent, will provide the U.S. with "bargaining power" to encourage detente.

"It is important to demonstrate to the Soviets, the Chinese and whoever else might doubt the fiber of our determination that this country has not abandoned its role of world leadership and its dedication to a stable balance."

Tunney cited the major strategic advances made in recent years by the Soviets, including development of four new missile systems and a potentially strategic bomber (Backfire), and discounted the "many myths" brought up about the reliability cost-effectiveness and usefulness of the B-1. "Study after study has demonstrated those concerns are unfounded," he said.

In addition to its strategic value, the senator reminded the committee, the B-1 will provide 41,300 jobs directly and another 62,000 indirectly to California, whose economy has been sagging. (see page 20, for Rep. Les Aspin's charges against the B-1 program)

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II--Main Edition--6 May 1975
DEFENSE SPACE BUSINESS DAILY 5 May 1975 (6)

ASPIN SAYS AIR FORCE HIDES B-1 COST OVERRUNS

Pentagon Denies Charges

Declaring that: "Whether to continue the B-1 program or not is one of the major issues facing the Congress in consideration of this year's defense budget," Rep. Les Aspin (D-Wis.) says the Air Force B-1 bomber has incurred "a cost overrun" of $225 million in its research program.

He cited a special General Accounting Office report which also said that General Electric, producer of the aircraft's engines, is expected to have "a cost overrun" of $75 million to $100 million.

Aspin has also charged that the Air Force "has attempted to gloss over cost increases" on the B-1 by "claiming the increases are caused by inflation and delays in the program." He noted that the Pentagon "blamed" economic escalation, schedule delays, estimated changes, and the inclusion of component improvement costs for the $1.9 billion cost increase during the final quarter of 1974.

A Pentagon official said the Air Force has not attempted to play down the cost increases in the B-1 program and has admitted before Congress that there has been cost growth in the program. It was pointed out that Air Force Secretary John McLucas recently told Congress that the Air Force expected a cost growth of 10-12 percent in the B-1 program, not including inflation.

As the official explained it, "if the Pentagon and the rest of the nation cannot keep up with inflation, how can the contractor keep up?"

Aspin was referring to the most recent Selected Acquisition Reports summary for Dec. 31, which the Pentagon released in March, which explained there had been an increase of $1.939 billion in the cost of the B-1 reflected during the final quarter of the year (Defense/Space Daily, March 26). Although Aspin does not break this cost increase down, the Pentagon reported in March that $1.007 billion was due to inflation, $375 million for increased lead time requirements and procurement schedule impact resulting from delayed start; $407 million for estimating changes; and $143 million for component improvement costs.

The Wisconsin congressman, frequent Pentagon critic, says the Air Force "has never publicly acknowledged there are direct cost overruns on various contracts." He said the "cost overruns are the direct result of mismanagement" on the part of General Electric and Rockwell International.

Aspin said the GAO report also states that "no minimum performance requirements" have been established for the B-1 -- "there is no way for Congress to know if the B-1 degrades below an acceptable performance."

GAO said there have been reductions in the supersonic and subsonic ranges, and an increase of about 5000 pounds in gross takeoff weight, with the current estimated gross takeoff weight 395,000 pounds--"the maximum load the landing gear can tolerate."

Another charge made by the GAO is that the number of technical changes made in the B-1 that will be incorporated in the actual production "may be so significant that the test results will not be meaningful" or representative of the production aircraft.

The Air Force has admitted that it has had to reduce the speed capabilities of the B-1 as the aircraft has developed, but has emphasized that these reductions "did not degrade the capability of the B-1 to complete its mission."

It was explained that the gross weight of the B-1 was increased from the 360,000 pounds for the original vehicle to a planned 395,000 pounds, but the landing gear system has been redesigned to accommodate this increase. As for design changes, these are said to be less than 10 percent, "and not significant."

WASHINGTON POST 6 May 1975 Pg. B-11

The Federal Diary

By Mike Causey

* * *

Naval Oceanographic Office: Another hammer-lock has been placed on the Navy which is trying to move its Suitland-based unit to the Mississippi Gulf Coast.

The House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee has agreed to oversight hearings (via its Oceanography Subcommittee) into the move, which has been pushed by the powerful Mississippi-Louisiana congressional delegations. Washington area members of Congress got a boost two weeks ago when Sens. Warren Magnuson and Henry M. Jackson, both Democrats of Washington state, said they wanted the Suitland outfit to stay where it is.

The Navy has been looking, for many years, for a new locale that would please the politicians who control its budget as well as a succession of admirals who prefer sunny climates. When the Bay St. Louis, Miss., site was proposed by Armed Services Chairmen Sen. John Stennis and Rep. F. Edward Hebert (then House Committee chairman), it seemed to fit Navy's requirements perfectly.

It is rare that Navy has a chance of making three powerful legislators (Sen. Russell Long of the Appropriations Committee likes the idea, too) happy, at the "minimal" cost of disrupting the lives of only a few thousand employees and their families. So Navy studies were made and each concluded that the move should be made.

Rep. Marjorie Holt (R-Md.) has been punching the Navy goliath all along. She is the one responsible for getting a General Accounting Office probe of the move, and the upcoming hearings. She hopes the subcommittee (first meeting is May 21) will tell the Navy to delay any decision on the move until the GAO study is in. That is likely to be the end of September, and could knock Navy's secret timetable which calls for a go-decision within the next few weeks, so that the first workers can be transferred and in place by August. * * *

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON REPORT - APRIL 1975(6 MAY)

Is It Safe to Be an Ally of America?

Early this month I had lunch with Tran Kim Phuong, Saigon's Ambassador to the United States. The morning news had featured the fall of several leading cities in South Vietnam. The reports had told of the armies of South Vietnam in desperate retreat, as they sought to find positions where they might be able to use their ever-decreasing supplies of arms to greater advantage against the armies of the north.

As you might imagine, Ambassador Phuong was very discouraged. He found it almost impossible to believe the turn of events. As we talked, he sought a tactful way to express his disappointment at the decision of our Congress to abandon his country to the communist enemy. It was beyond his comprehension – as it is beyond mine. With deep emotion, he spoke of the sacrifices in blood and resources his countrymen had made to defend themselves and to preserve their right to choose their own form of government. He recalled the clear and unmistakable pledge of our national leaders to supply his people with the military weapons necessary to defend themselves in order to get their approval of the inequitable Paris agreement negotiated by the U.S. and imposed on South Vietnam.

And he spoke, as best he could, about the terrible slaughter which was already taking place as the communist conquerors took over the land. In particular, he stressed that the first group of people being rounded up were those who had worked directly with the Americans – from the chauffeurs to government officials.

After lunch, I found myself mulling over his remarks and thinking back to a preceding week when Tran Van Lam, the president of the South Vietnamese Senate, had come to the United States to try to tell our officials and the American people what lay ahead for South Vietnam if it did not receive the promised military aid from the U.S. [See WR 75-3 for report of press luncheon cosponsored by ASC and the Vietnamese-American Council for the Honorable Tran Van Lam.] On several occasions, U.S. Senators had left Mr. Lam and several of his colleagues from the South Vietnamese Senate cooling their heels in the anterooms for inexcusable periods of time. On one occasion, a senior U.S. Senator finally stormed out of his door after a long delay and shouted at the South Vietnamese group that he planned to vote against further aid and that he did not want to hear their side of the issue.

I also found myself reflecting on the many arguments being used to justify cutting off aid to South Vietnam. I was most offended by the argument that the South Vietnamese army did not have the courage to stand and fight. I was especially struck by the fact that the Members of our Congress making this charge were the same who were choking off the supplies essential to that army's survival. I could not help wondering how much courage those Members would have displayed if they had been faced by a horde of tanks and rocket launchers while all they had were a few bullets for their rifles – and no hope for new supplies.

It Was Predictable

On our Washington Report radio program, General John E. Murray, top U.S. military representative in South Vietnam in 1973 and 1974 and one of America's foremost diplomatic authorities on Indo-China, recently conceded that Congress's refusal to provide the one-for-one replacement of arms and equipment provided by the Paris Peace Agreement led directly to the weakening and collapse of Saigon's morale. The North Vietnamese were badly beaten in 1972, General Murray noted, but we have thrown away all this and surrendered by default. What could have been a shining example of freedom in Southeast Asia has turned to ashes, and we cannot escape our role in it at all.

As General Murray said to our radio audience, "The tragedy was entirely predictable. It was predicted and was reported. My remarks have appeared in the press. My official reports have been passed through the Pentagon. Congressmen that I talked to would be upset about the situation. But it was like dropping a rose petal down the Grand Canyon and waiting for the echo. Nothing happened. Now everyone seems to be surprised.

"The Vietnamese were on a starvation diet. We cut their ammunition more than half, we cut their fuel back 85%, we stopped giving them combat rations, even their medical supplies were shorted. Batteries for communications – things they needed to move, shoot and communicate – they simply did not have. Their GI's, for example, used to have ten grenades pinned on them when they went into battle in the Delta. Now they were only permitted two and effectively that is only one, because they always keep one as a last resort. This end is, as I say, entirely predictable."

Our Vital Interests

The other argument that came to mind was the one that America's vital interests are not involved in Vietnam. This is the key argument. It has strong popular appeal. Saigon is a long way from Washington. But a moment of serious thought will show that the argument is supported by geography, not political reality. It is precisely this argument, however, which must be answered. If the answer is "yes," then there is some justification for our policy of abandoning Vietnam. If the answer is "no," then we are not only aiding and abetting in a tragedy of mammoth proportions, we are being foolish as well.

Recently I was talking with a distinguished U.S. diplomat regarding the far-reaching implications of our policies in Vietnam. He gave me some insight into their effects in the Middle East and Western Europe. He noted Dr. Kissinger's remarkably candid explanation of his recent failure to arrange a peace between Egypt and Israel. The solution Dr. Kissinger had proposed called for an Israeli withdrawal from much of the Sinai desert coupled to a pledge of support by the U.S. in the event that Egypt's minimum declaration of non-belligerency proved to be temporary. But, Dr. Kissinger admitted, Israel did not see a pledge by the United States as enough, in light of our failure to support our ally, South Vietnam.

In regard to Western Europe, he told me of a telephone conversation the day before with a colleague of his who was representing the United States at a major capital in Europe. His friend had relayed the amazement of the NATO diplomatic corps at the reaction of both the Congress and the Chief Executive to the events in Vietnam. The leading political figures in Western Europe, he reported, simply could not understand how the Chief Executive could enjoy a golfing vacation and the Congress an Easter recess while a country the United States had pledged to support was being destroyed by an invader. The political leaders of Europe were astounded that the President had not rushed back to Washington and convened the Congress in an emergency session.

In light of the makeup of the Congress these days, the President's request for $722 million in military and humanitarian aid was quite bold. But in view of the circumstances in Vietnam and throughout the world, his request was totally inadequate.

See IS IT SAFE?, Pg. 8-F

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Hanoi Thanks Americans Who Helped

There is also no question that communist leaders had gotten the message -- and a long time ago. The telegram from Dinh Ba Thi of North Vietnam, which caused the furor at the Academy Awards ceremony by expressing gratitude to those Americans who had contributed to the communist success in "liberating" South Vietnam, certainly indicated that the communists understood the realities including the fact that the Americans who had participated in producing and distributing the propaganda film "Hearts and Minds" had served the communist cause well.

One of the difficulties with Vietnam is that it has caused many Americans to focus on an immediate event and lose valuable perspective. From time to time, we need to drop back in time and broaden our view. As a starting point, it would be wise for us to remind ourselves that 20th century technology has compressed the globe, forced interdependence on independent states, and made all the nations of the earth neighbors -- for better or for worse. This condition means that every nation can be infected by a disease anywhere in the world body politic. All systems are interconnected. An anti-freedom malignancy anywhere will eventually affect us here.

National Self-Determination

In the interest of a politically healthy and stable world order, the United States has long advocated the self-determination of nations. First expressed by President Wilson at the conclusion of World War I, the principle holds that each nation has the right as an aspect of its sovereignty to select its own form of government. Wilson called for the creation of the League of Nations primarily as a means of providing for collective action against any aggressor nation which sought to impose its form of government on any other nation by force of arms.

In one sense, World War II was fought to reestablish the principle of self-determination. And it was the Soviet breach of that principle in Eastern Europe which started the Cold War.

In pursuit of the right of self-determination, the United States committed its military forces to combat in Korea -- far from America's shores -- because our leaders knew that if we failed to halt aggression there, we would legitimatize it by acquiescence. That is, we knew that if we did not act to stop aggression by North Korea, we would signal acceptance of it. In the instance of Korea, we participated with other allies under the flag of the United Nations.

In the case of Vietnam, we acted unilaterally to defend South Vietnam against military attack and to prevent North Vietnam from imposing on the South an unwanted political regime. Former Secretary of State Dean Rusk said it simply one time: "The trouble with North Vietnam is that it will not let its neighbors alone."

The Policy of Gradualism

Because our purpose in entering the war in Vietnam was not to destroy North Vietnam but to preserve South Vietnam's right of self-determination, we acted on the battlefield with great restraint. The official word was "gradualism." While we fought essentially a holding action, we urged North Vietnam to cooperate with us in a political solution to the problems of Indo-China, one which would in no way challenge the existence of North Vietnam -- even its preeminence -- but would respect the sovereignty of South Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia.

In the early years of the war, before the Soviets supplied North Vietnam with anti-aircraft missiles (SAMs) and supersonic interceptors, we could have physically destroyed North Vietnam in a few weeks with a fraction of our force of tactical and strategic aircraft using conventional bombs. But instead, we employed our sea and land based airpower against easily repaired supply routes -- primarily the Ho Chi Minh trail -- following a policy of tactical interdiction. And we used our considerable seapower in largely unproductive patrols along the coast of North Vietnam.

Some people have made the mistake of assuming that because our airpower did not destroy North Vietnam, it was incapable of doing so. In August 1967 the Senate Armed Services Committee released a study showing that only two percent of the targets for our bombers in North Vietnam recommended to the White House by the Joint Chiefs of Staff were approved. Instead of the JCS-recommended targets, others were substituted by a team of "experts" in the White House -- targets which had very little military significance -- "gradualism" targets.

I recall a story to illustrate this point which goes back to an early period in the war. The story was relayed by an Air Force friend. It appears that the Air Force recommended and the JCS approved as targets three airfields, all fairly close to Hanoi. They were: the main commercial field for Hanoi, a training base that had just received a new supply of Soviet MIG fighters, and a new airfield still under construction. The one the White House approved was the airfield under construction. And, one should remember, that target would have been among the two percent counted by the Senate Committee. You can imagine how unimportant militarily some of the targets must have been that were substituted by the White House selection team.

Never a Civil War

What makes our policies in Vietnam so incredible is that the war there was actually fought within the larger framework of the balance of power between the communist and free worlds. The war in Vietnam was never a civil war, in our eyes or in the eyes of Moscow and Peking. In their eyes, the war in Vientam was the test case for their new concept of "Wars of National Liberation." To us, the war was originally intended to signal to world communist leaders that we could not accept the right of communists to impose their form of government on a non-communist nation by military force.

In short, the location of the war was never a determining factor in its importance. To return to the figure of speech about disease in the world body politic, the aggression in Vietnam was simply the place where the political malignancy was erupting.

Our failure to fight in Vietnam in such a way as to destroy the malignancy means now that other outbreaks will surely take place elsewhere in the course of time. And everywhere the political health of the free world has been undermined.

A Policy of Phased Surrender

As Sir Robert Thompson, one of Britain's leading experts on Southeast Asia and guerrilla warfare, observed: "We are all becoming dominoes. The American retreat before Moscow, like that of Napoleon, is beginning to litter the route with corpses."

Sir Robert's graphic statement raises the question again which has troubled me for years, that our actions in Vietnam and elsewhere in the world have added up to a policy of phased surrender. I remember the blunt declaration by Dr. Slobodan M. Draskovich, a Serbian

See IS IT SAFE?, Pg. 9-F

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II -- Main Edition -- 6 May 1975

Joseph Kraft

WASHINGTON POST - 6 MAY 1975

Letting Go of the Vietnam Issue

A puzzle tinges the overwhelmingly hostile reaction of ordinary Americans to the Vietnamese refugees. The puzzle is why so many intelligent and well-educated Americans find the reaction puzzling. For the whole history of the war testifies that most Americans don't care beans about Vietnam.

Not because of what are called "racist" reasons. On the contrary, the true background lies in the strong, autonomous inner beat of American life.

The attention of 200 million throbbing operators is not readily gained by remote people in faraway places. Europe matters to the United States because so many Americans have roots there. Russia and China count because of sheer size and the impact of Titanic revolutions. So do the Japanese because of a sneaking suspicion they know how to build better mousetraps.

But Vietnam? New York, Chicago and San Francisco combined probably have fewer Vietnamese restaurants than Paris. The main point of perhaps the best American book on Vietnam—"Fire in the Lake" by Frances FitzGerald—is that Americans aren't into Vietnamese customs or culture. Even Miss FitzGerald had to rely on a French authority—Paul Mus—for her insights into the Vietnamese character.

American indifference to Vietnam shaped the two central features of the war—its massive and enduring character. In the early 1960s a group which I have called the "piano-wire hawks" argued that the Vietnam war—which they wanted to win—could only be won by following the lead of the insurgents. They felt the United States had to adopt guerrilla tactics—knife in the teeth and piano wire in the hand.

But that argument was always a non-starter. The American army and the American people were not about to change themselves into Vietnamese. So this country fought the war—as it was bound to fight the war—with planes and tanks and aircraft carriers and big battalions.

Connected reasons explain why the fighting went on so long. As early as the 1966 elections, I believe, and certainly by 1968, the majority of Americans were fed up with pouring out blood and taxes in Vietnam. If allowed to proceed unhampered by outside events, the Vietnamization program pushed by Defense Secretary Melvin Laird would probably have seen the United States out of the war long before 1973.

What got in the way was the anti-war movement—or at least that element of it which used Vietnam as a stick to beat the United States. Ordinary people may have had it with the war. But they didn't think the United States was a rotten country. They weren't that much down on the President, the military, the party system, the concept of loyalty and other features of American life which the war critics brought under fire.

So President Nixon was able to rally what he called the "silent majority." The antiwar movement was more than canceled. The war went on and on and on, even though hardly anybody wanted it.

The underlying reality, however, was that hardly anybody wanted it. The country, long sick of Vietnam, got sicker and sicker as events ground to their inevitable end.

So now more than ever the country wants to wash its hands of Vietnam. Hence the hostility to the refugees. It may not be a generous attitude. But it is not puzzling. It is natural and logical. Even healthy.

For the basic fact is that the Vietnam experience is not powerfully relevant to the present problems of the United States. Our difficulties did not lie in an all-powerful executive or an unruly military or an uncontrolled intelligence community—least of all in an imperial-minded people.

To harp on these matters is another form of the self-delusion expressed in the constant replaying of Watergate and the Kennedy assassination. It is a way of not facing up to the prime present problem—the unglamorous and morally neutral problem of making the domestic and world economy work.

Everybody knows the trouble laid up by the true believers who refuse to abandon the Vietnam war. Worse I think will ensue if the war critics prove as unwilling to let go of the Vietnam issue.

© 1975, Field Enterprises, Inc.

IS IT SAFE? -- CONTINUED

scholar of communism, who wrote in his book, Will America Surrender?, "Our policy of no-victory in Vietnam and our recent advances to China and Russia have made it unmistakably clear that the U.S. is pursuing a policy of historical surrender to communism." He explained, "There is no other name for a policy which rejects U.S. national interests as its permanent basis, and shuns the idea of asserting U.S. rights and will in the world as a danger to peace. . . . Only surrender and suicide can designate a policy which rejects and penalizes U.S. friends and allies, and helps and supports U.S. enemies in the world."

There is still another aspect about Vietnam which has received little attention. We are now in the act of acquiescing in a breach of an international agreement by a minor communist nation -- not an agreement between a communist nation and some other free world nation -- but one involving the United States of America. We negotiated and signed the Paris Peace Accord. And we are allowing North Vietnam to breach that Accord with impunity. The massive invasion of South Vietnam was a tearing up of that Accord and a direct challenge to the U.S.! We have not only failed to respond militarily. We have also failed to act diplomatically. Neither the U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. nor the Secretary of State has demanded that the U.N. impose sanctions against North Vietnam for its direct challenge to peace and to the sanctity of international agreements. Our President failed to ask the Congress for the right to use military power, if necessary, to force North Vietnam to comply with the terms of the Agreement. (Nor did he ask for further assistance to Cambodia.)

From the Far East, a valued friend of the U.S., President Ferdinand Marcos of the Philippines, declared recently that Congress's refusal to extend additional aid to our Indochina allies suggests strongly that the United States no longer considers Southeast Asia vital to its interests. Philippine authorities are now looking carefully at our bilateral defense pact and at our military base agreements to see whether they were mutually beneficial.

If our national leaders did not understand the importance and the implications of the tragedy in Vietnam, the policy-makers in the Middle East, Far East, and Western Europe certainly had no difficulty.

Our failure to take action against North Vietnam is especially significant to our allies around the world. Ambassador Phuong made the point clearly in a television interview recently when he said: ". . . the United States has not lived up to the Paris ceasefire agreement and the world probably would conclude that it is safer to be an ally of the Communists than the Americans."

If it can be argued that we do not have the military strength to follow any other policy than that of acquiescence in Cambodia and Vietnam, then we must ask, Why do we not have the sufficient strength?

If we are going to allow North Vietnam to breach the Paris Peace Accord, then why should Moscow not feel free to violate the SALT Agreements?

The clear answer to whether or not the communists can be trusted to keep other Detente agreements, such as the SALT Agreements, can be found in Vietnam!

The only remaining question is: what can we still do to prevent the tragic effects of our naivete in believing that the communists want a true Detente from being felt in our own land?

I am asking our National Strategy Committee to review our crumbling and discredited foreign policy and to make recommendations as to what must be done.

In the meantime, please note the recent assessment by the Foreign Policy Task Force of the Liberal Coalition for a Democratic Majority which is excerpted in the pages following.

John M. Fisher
President
American Security Council

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK TIMES 6 MAY 1975

Feuds and Bad Planning In Saigon Exit Recalled

By FOX BUTTERFIELD

Special to The New York Times

MANILA, May 5 — Although more than 100,000 Vietnamese successfully escaped from Saigon, the evacuation was marred by what diplomats and newsmen now recall as bad planning, bitter feuding between sections of the United States Mission and often an every-man-for-himself attitude.

As a result, many key Vietnamese officials and others who had long worked for the Americans were left behind. Many fearing reprisals from the Communists.

Moreover, the selection of those to be evacuated often seemed arbitrary. Dozens of prostitutes, for example, were taken out by American contractors and officials who listed them as wives or fiancées. But the chief spokesman for the Saigon Government and his staff, who would be major Communist targets, were apparently not helped despite repeated pleas.

In addition, same officials in the United States Embassy and Consulate — partly because of panic and partly out of concern for their own Vietnamese staffs —are known to have deceived each other or failed to notify subordinates about the final evacuation on Tuesday, endangering many lives.

In the end, no American officials are known to have been left behind, and the loss of life in the evacuation was minimal.

But the series of mix-ups and the haggling that accompanied the final American exit angered many American officials, and on the evacuation ships that carried them here they talked of their bitterness toward Ambassador Graham A. Martin.

It was Ambassador Martin, they say, who by delaying evacuation until the last possible minute — to avoid throwing Saigon into chaos — was responsible for the failure to rescue many endangered Vietnamese.

Some officials go further, accusing Mr. Martin of having been so isolated inside his walled embassy that he was blind to the inevitability of the Communist victory. The Ambassador, an aloof, secretive man who strongly supported former President Nguyen Van Thieu, became ill with pneumonia in the last few days before Washington finally ordered him, last Tuesday, to "pull the plug."

Leaving Saigon among the last American evacuees, the Ambassador boarded the Seventh Fleet flagship, the carrier Blue Ridge, and—except for a chance encounter with a few newsmen — remained unavailable to the press. He could not be asked about criticisms of his role.

According to knowledgeable diplomatic informants, when some American officials began to push for evacuation planning after the loss of the northern two-thinds of the country in March, Mr. Martin's opposition delayed it.

As a consequence, some parts of the United States Mission— composed of the embassy, the Agency for International Development, the United States Information Service, the Defense Attaché's Office and the Central Intelligence Agency — privately began their own withdrawal scheme.

This worked best for those institutions with their own air transportation and money to bribe Vienamese officials and guards — namely the Defense Attachés office and the C.I.A. But the embassy and the aid and information agencies, which did not have their own "assets," in the popular term, were much less successful in getting their staffs out.

General Is Dismissed

On April 12, with North Vietnamese troops beginning to tighten around Saigon, Brig. Gen. Richard M. Baughn, the senior Air Force officer in the Defense Attaché's Office. was abruptly dismissed and transferred out of Vietnam by Ambassador Martin. According to military sources, he had angered the Ambassador by beginning to fly Vietnamese employes in the office to the Philippines aboard Air Force planes.

It was not until April 20, after the siege of Xuan Loc had begun 40 miles northeast of Saigon that Ambassador Martin on orders from Washington assented to the first legal evacuation flights by Air Force C-141 planes.

Thereafter the evacuation was pushed hard, with the embassy pressing the Saigon Government to accelerate granting exit permits and special passes for Vietnamese dependents and employes of Americans. In some cases the embassy actually helped in secretly taking Vietnamese out of the country without officials permission.

But there appeared to be little coordination or careful planning to separate cases of Vietnamese seriously endangered from those who merely wanted to leave.

Thus, for instance, a Vietnamese who had worked 10 years for the C.I.A. in Pleiku in the Central Highlands, before it was abandoned to the Communists, discovered no one in the embassy would help him when he managed to flee to Saigon. All his friends from the agency had already been transferred out of Vietnam and there was no one who recognized him.

But by contrast, on Saturday, April 26, a blue compact car of the type used by the embassy pulled up in front of Annie's Bar on Tu Do Street and took away three bar girls carrying suitcases.

Perhaps the worst case of confusion involved the United States Consulate General in Can Tho, the center of Military Region IV in the Mekong delta.

Officials from the consulate say they were never given any notice at all to evacuate their Vietnamese personnel until 11:30 Tuesday morning, when they were suddenly ordered to withdraw only their remaining Americans. By that time, the last emergency evacuation had already begun in Saigon.

As a result, the Con Tho office acting on its own at the last minute was able to get out only 42 of 573 Vietnamese employes, and 312 of over 3,000 Vietnamese dependents.

One Can Tho official who made three special trips to Saigon to discuss evacuation was reportedly turned away with the answer that Ambassador Martin would not accept puling out the Vietnamese employes

Another Can Tho official who was dispatched to Saigon over the last weekend to try to press for help in evacuating Vietnamese staff, was in the office of Donald Anderson, the embassy administrative officer in charge of pulling out field staff, on Tuesday morning when the order for final evacuation was given.

"Anderson got up and left his office with some of his own Vietnamese without telling our men anything," recalled a furious Can Tho official. "He just went out to get on an airplane with his people, leaving our man sitting there."

The Can Tho consulate at its own initiative had prepared several evacuation plans, including its main one using four Air America helicopters stationed in Can Tho. However, at 8 A.M. on Tuesday the local C.I.A. officials asked to borrow the four Air America helicopters for their own personnel and flew off to Saigon without returning the aircraft.

DEFENSE SPACE BUSINESS DAILY 5 MAY 1975 (6)

BILL PROPOSES REVIEW OF DOD CIVILIAN MANPOWER CHANGES

A 25-member, high-level commission which would seek to mitigate the economic effects resulting from the cutback of Defense Department civilian personnel employed at various military bases would be established under legislation introduced by Sen. Hirman Fong (D-Hawaii.).

The proposed Advisory Commission on Future Civilian Manpower Requirements at U. S. Military Installations, which would include the secretary of defense, would not be authorized to prevent closing or cutbacks at military bases directed by DOD. However, it would be authorized to find out what military installations are to be eliminated or cut back and to recommend "new ways to effectively utilize the changed status of the affected bases." It would also be authorized to: 1) Study the trends regarding the use and employment of civilians at U. S. bases and implications for the future use of such manpower. 2) Determine and project the impact that the withdrawal of U. S. troops from overseas bases and the reduction of the armed forces will have on various states and communities. 3) Make recommendations for lessening the economic impact of base closing; channeling the skills of those laid off into new fields of employment; retaining those laid off; and notifying the state and local communities at the earliest possible date of layoff plans.

In addition to the secretary of defense, the commission would include the secretaries of commerce and labor, the director of OBM, the chairman of the Civil Service Commission, five governors, five mayors, five country officers and five nongovernmental leaders.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II -- Main Edition -- 6 May 1975

WASHINGTON POST 6 MAY 1975

Israel Expects New U.S. Effort on Mideast

By John M. Goshko
Washington Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM, May 5—Israeli observers are convinced that America, now relieved of its responsibilities in vietnam, will soon launch a more intensified effort to defuse the Arab-Israeli conflict.

President Ford and Secretary of State Henry A. kissinger will meet Egyptian President Anwar Sadat in Europe the first week of June, and Israeli Premier Yitzhak Rabin will be Mr. Ford's guest in Washington on June 11 and 12.

Relations between Israel and the United States have been strained since March,when Kissinger's shuttle-diplomacy effort to mediate a further interim agreement between Israel and Egypt on troop pullbacks in the Sinai Peninsula failed.

Kissinger and Mr. Ford let it be known that they placed the main responsibility for the breakdown of those talks on Israeli inflexibility, and they ordered a complete "reassessment" fo U.S. policy in the Middle East. Since then; the Ford administration has continued to show annoyance at what it characterizes as Israel's shortsightedness and failure to recognize its own long-term interests.

Among other things, Washington has suspended negotiatios on supplying new arms to Israel and leaked word that Israel's pending request for $2.5 billion in military and economic aid during the coming fiscal year will be cut back substatially.

All this has caused great dismay within Israel, which looks to the United States as the ultimate guarantor of its existence.

In recent interviews, High-ranking officials of Rabin's government have frequently used such phrases as "tragic" and "deeply regretable" to describe the rift with Washington.

These same officials expressed a deep conviction, however, that Washington's tendency to blame Israel for the failure of the Kissinger mission is unfair and unjustified They left little doubt that the Rabin government badly wants to patch up the quarrel, but they also stressed that Israel will not, accept a rapprochement on terms that it ragards as dangerous to its security.

This stance appears to have the overwhelming support of Israeli public opinion. The U.S policy reassessment, which is widely regarded here as a psychological pressure tactic, has helped to solidify this support and may have hardened the Israeli position.

One foreign diplomat assesses the mood in more ominous terms, saying, "The Israelis are getting close to the point of developing a Samp-son-in-the-temple complex."

Officials in Rabin's government say that, in retrospect, they can see several reasons for the Kissinger mission's failure, and Vietnam is one to which they assign considerable prominence. By a strange quirk of timing, the situation in South Vietnam and Cambodia began to deteriorate just as Kissinger came to the Middle East.

The collapse of the peace agreements that Kissinger had negotiated in Vietnam made the Israelis skittish about the kind of accord he wanted them to strike with Egyptian President Anwar Sadat. In the Israeli view, this would have obliged them to give up very specific military advantages in exchange for vague, ill-defined assurances that the Israelis feel had been given to South Vietnam and that subsequently proved meaningless.

At the same time, the Israelis charge, the knowledge that his Vietnam accords were falling had a distracting effect on Kissinger. The officials leave little doubt of their belief that Kissinger and Mr. Ford wanted a diplomatic success in the Middle East to help compensate for the defeat in Indochina, and when this success proved to be beyond their grasp, they reacted by indulging in a fit of pique against Israel.

But, the officials add, they think that Kissinger's efforts would have failed even without the distorting effect of events in southeast Asia. The March negotiations, they say, revealed, perhaps for the first time, that a big gap exists between Kissinger's and the Rabin government's perceptions of how to resolve the Middle East crisis.

In pursuing his step-by-step diplomacy, Kissinger appeared to be going on the assumption that the nature of the problem —working out an Israeli withdrawal from occupied Arab territory—requires that the major concessions be made by Israel. Kissinger was said to consider this as working to Israel's long-term advantage, because it would lead in the end to the general Middle Eastern peace settlement that the Israelis want.

The Israelis, however, as one official said, "believe that the process should not be step-by-step but step-for-step," in which every significant Israeli concession should be matched by an Arab concession of roughly comparable weight. This would guarantee that neither side gained too lop-sided an advantage in the interim stages enroute to a final peace settlement.

In the March negotiations, for example, the Israelis say that they were willing to meet Egypt's demands for withdrawal from the Abu Rudeis oilfields on the Gulf of Suez and the strategic Mitla and Gidi passes in the Eastern Sinai Peninsula, but, they felt that they were entitled, in exchange, to an unequivocably clear-cut statement of non-belligerence from Egypt.

The Israelis contend that Kissinger accepted the Egyptian position—return of the passes and oil fields for an ambiguously worded statement of Egyptian intent—as the goal of the negotiations.

"I don't even think it could be described as a genuine negotiation," one official who took part in the talks sav. "In our view, the Egyptians hardly moved at all over the entire course of the negotiations. If anyone was inflexible, it was Sadat. For our part, we gave be described as a genuine neconsiderable ground from our opening position. But we got nothing of a matching nature in return—only pressure to give still more."

"Even then," he continues, "we were willing to go on bargaining and talking. But when we made clear that Egypt would have to make a better offer if we were to meet their full demands, Sadat apparently lost his temper and Kissinger apparently lost heart. It was they who broke off the negotiations, not us."

The officials say that the Rabin government would still react the same way under similar circumstances. As to the quarrel with Washington, they say that Rabin has decided to avoid exacerbating the situation by engaging in recriminations, and to wait instead for "practical signs" such as a resumption of arms aid talks.

In the meantime, Israel has carried out a quiet reassessment of its own, dispatching a small army of former Cabinet ministers and other prominent figures to the United States to explain Israel's position and to test American public and political opinion. As a result, the government now feels that Israel's standing with the U.S public and Congress remains high and that its problems are primarily with the Ford administration.

Even so, the officials add the government regards Mr. Ford and Kissinger as "friends" and is hopeful that the dispute with them can be resolved amicably. Official circles have been encouraged by the fact that the signals coming out of Washington in recent days had a noticeably more upbeat tone. Earlier this week, for example,

DEFENSE SPACE BUSINESS DAILY 2 MAY 1975 (6)

SECURITY OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS IN EUROPE IMPROVED--DOD. The Defense Department reported to Congress last week that the security of U. S. nuclear weapons in Europe has been improved since a senatorial team found some nuclear munitions being stored under lax security in the basement of an administration building in Europe in 1973. The DOD statement came in response to the release of a report Wednesday discussing the 1973 inspection by the Senate team.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II -- Main Edition -- 6 May 1975

WALL STREET JOURNAL 6 MAY 1975

Sadat's Diplomatic Offensive

By RAY VICKER

CAIRO — America should say clearly whether it wishes to guarantee Israel within its borders or to guarantee Israel's occupation of lands taken from Arabs.

That is the thesis President Mohamed Anwar el Sadat will be expounding to President Ford at their forthcoming meeting in Salzburg, Austria June 1 and 2. And the Egyptian president is pushing the same theme hard in a round of diplomacy which seeks to rally world opinion against continued occupation by Israel of Arab lands seized in the 1967 war between Arabs and Israelis.

Here in Egypt, where the emphasis seems to be upon rebuilding the country rather than on war, there is strong support for the diplomatic offensive unleashed by President Sadat. There is also an attitude of injured indignation. In government ministries, on the campus of Cairo University, in homes of Egyptians one is constantly lectured that it has been Egypt which is seeking a real peace in this part of the world, that it is Israel which has been dragging its feet through Secretary of State Henry Kissinger's aborted shuttle diplomacy.

"I don't understand what is the matter with America, why it doesn't see that we are holding out a hand of friendship. We want peace. We want to work with America. Yet the United States does not use its strength for achieving peace. It treats us like . . . like lepers," says Mohamed Kamel Anous, director general in the ministry of foreign trade.

And at Cairo University, Mahmoud Gamel, a 23-year-old economics major, contends: "It should be obvious by now to everybody that there can be no peace in the Middle East when so much of our land still is occupied by the Jews. Yet America seems unwilling to even admit that for eight years the Jews have been sitting in the Sinai, in the West Bank of Jordan and on the Golan Heights, pumping our oil from the Sinai, building settlements on Arab lands and ignoring United Nations resolutions which call for withdrawal."

Blunt Speaking

In one recent speech, President Sadat bluntly said: "I say to the United States that it is high time for the United States to adopt a well defined attitude to be clear-cut and black and white. Is the U.S. defending Israel within its borders or is it defending Israel's occupation of the land usurped from Arabs? This should be made clear in the reevaluation of U.S. policy."

(To many observers, however, the definition of "occupied territory" is not so clear-cut. Most Israelis remain deeply suspicious of the Egyptian call for return of the land occupied in 1967. They argue that Egypt couples this demand with a further call for "justice to the Palestinians," who were displaced in the 1948 fighting that gave birth to the State of Israel. This further demand, argue the Israelis, may well mean that Egypt still wants to dismember their country as it existed before 1967. Certainly many Arabs, and particularly the Palestinians, consider all of Israel to be "occupied Arab territory.")

Questions raised by the Egyptian diplomatic offensive are somewhat embarrassing to President Ford's administration. Up to now, the U.S. has avoided any clear-cut answer to some of those questions. By indirection, there is the implication that the U.S. does not favor annexation by Israel of those subjected lands. But that hasn't been spelled out.

Israelis strongly contend that a readjustment of borders was necessary for its defense, which means that Israel would not return to the so-called "Green Line."

Egypt's president is pressing the U.S. to define its own policies concerning Israeli "security" and if that fails, to bring the issue home to the American public.

This is the border which had pertained before the 1967 war. However, Israel has not defined what it considers to be a "defensible" border.

In 1973, in one interview in the lobby of the Tel Aviv Hilton Hotel, General Ariel Sharon blandly declared that the most defensible border with Egypt from his standpoint was the Suez Canal. Two days later, the Yom Kippur war (known as the "Ramadan war" here) proved that the Suez Canal wasn't so defensible after all.

Nevertheless, if you talk to 10 Israelis, you probably will obtain 10 different descriptions of what constitutes "defensible borders." And none of them are likely to involve returning to the Green Line, as Arabs insist.

In this age of long distance rockets, of supersonic planes and of murderous weaponry, no borders are any longer defensible in the static manner which usually is meant when the term is used. Perhaps the best way to work for peace is not to seek "defensible" borders which might prove as illusory as the impregnability of Israel's Bar Lev Line along the Suez Canal, but to try to diffuse the animosities which are the basic cause of trouble in the Mideast.

Israel, however, has committed itself to the "defensible borders" concept. This favors delay and more delay in the surrender of any occupied territory since any retreat at all is likely to antagonize some segments of the Israeli population. And the present government in Israel is not strong enough to risk any splintering of its support.

In the face of delay, Arabs have three basic choices: To press a diplomatic offensive hoping to achieve aims peacefully, to launch another war, or to fall back to a no-war-no-peace situation which most likely would lead to a war of attrition and then to a full fledged, bloody war, anyway.

With oil money pouring into Arab lands, time no longer is on the side of Israel, something which still has not sunk into many minds in Israel. That belief, though, is becoming more widespread in Western Europe, in Japan and among many Americans who have had opportunities to travel through Arab countries recently.

Another war, today, would be far bloodier than any so far in this part of the world. And the odds probably would favor Israel as the "victor" on the battlefield, without its being able to score such a resounding success that it also could dictate the peace. Only once did that opportunity appear, in 1967. Israel didn't rise to the occasion with the generous peace offer which might have led to peace, and the opportunity was lost.

So now, at a time when the world does not like military occupations, Israel finds it necessary to justify an occupation which it obviously wishes would continue indefinitely. Alleged "security" thus becomes the basic argument for such a policy. From the Israeli standpoint, it is a good debating position, for emotions may be touched easily with it. Who within a country could be against "security," for instance? Who would make political hay by arguing against it?

President Sadat's diplomatic offensive is a very clever gambit, too. He wants the U.S. to define its own policies concerning Israeli "security." If that doesn't come officially, he would like the American public to become so aware of the issues that people in the U.S. might pressure Washington to reassess its position. This would lift peace moves from the stagnant mire into which they fell after Secretary of State Kissinger shelved his shuttle diplomacy.

Prospects of War

If the Sadat offensive fails, then the Mideast could be heading directly for another war. This is something which should be understood now, with a whole lot more clarity than was the case in 1973. Well before the Yom Kippur (Ramadan) war, President Sadat advertised his desire to get things moving by booting Russians from positions of influence in Egypt. Both America and Israel ignored that action. Subsequently President Sadat indicated his intention to launch a war since nothing else seemed able to awake America and Israel. Again, few paid any attention to him. Yet war did come.

From the Egyptian standpoint, the timing of the current offensive could not be more advantageous. This offensive comes just at a time when the collapse of South Vietnam is bringing home to the American people the troubles which might stem from having the U.S. attempt to play policeman to the world. Secretary of State Kissinger has declared that one lesson to be learned from Vietnam is that "foreign policy must be sustained over decades if it is to be effective, and if it cannot be, then it has to be tailored to what is sustainable."

So Egyptians are asking: Is it American policy to defend Israel's occupation of Arab lands? And by implication there is another question: Does America really think that the affirmative can be sustained over decades in the face of bitter opposition from over 100 million Arabs plus literally over a 100 supporting nations?

And Vietnam provides lessons concerning what might happen if America is led to give guarantees which it can't sustain, say Egyptians. For Israel, there is a disturbing factor here, too. Suppose the U.S. clearly declares that it has no intention of guaranteeing Israeli possession of occupied lands? Then suppose another war starts, with Arabs claiming they seek only to win back occupied territories? What would the U.S. attitude be then?

Such questions are all involved in that thesis which President Sadat is expounding. Like it or not, the U.S. must consider them in reassessing its own Mideastern position.

Mr. Vicker is the Journal's senior international editor and is currently stationed in the Middle East.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR 6 MAY 1975

Jordanian paper says Israel masses troops

Amman, Jordan

Israel is massing troops and armor along the entire length of the Syrian and Jordanian cease-fire lines, the Jordanian newspaper Al-Destour asserted Monday.

There was no immediate comment from the Israeli, Syrian, or Jordanian commands.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

RADIO - TV DEFENSE DIALOG

RADIO TV REPORTS INC. WASH., D.C., SUMMARIES NOT TO BE QUOTED.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 7, 1975 (BROADCASTS OF MAY 6, 1975)

SUMMARY OF NETWORK NEWS IN THIS ISSUE

John CHANCELLOR, Irving R. LEVINE, John COCHRAN, Catherine MACKIN, Lou ALLISON and Ray CULLEN, all of NBC, report on refugee related subjects. LEVINE reports that the AFL-CIO has come out in favor of resettling Vietnamese refugees. He includes a statement by AFL-CIO head George MEANY. COCHRAN reports by way of Republican congressional leaders President FORD's reaction to those who oppose resettlement of refugees. MACKIN reports on congressional reaction to the refugee aid bill. ALLISON reports on the arrival at Guam of sealifted refugees, including about 1,000 fishermen. CULLEN reports on the arrival of Nguyen Cao KY at Camp Pendleton, California and about his new status as a refugee. CHANCELLOR reports that the U.S. has agreed to stop removing aircraft flown by Vietnamese to Thailand, but that we have already removed a large portion of them.

CHANCELLOR and Kenley JONES, NBC, report on the Mid-East and a speech by King HUSSEIN of Jordan. CHANCELLOR reports that the U.S. has agreed to sell the Jordanians a Hawk missile system. JONES reports on HUSSEIN's speech in which he talked about Israeli peace conditions and Arab acquiescence. Included is an excerpt of an interview by Barbara WALTERS with Secretary KISSINGER. CHANCELLOR also reports that the U.S. and Russia called for a stoppage of lax security measures which might enable people to gain possession of nuclear materials. He reports that $222 million was cut from the B-1 funds and that an amendment calling for entrance of women into military academies was tabled.

Roger MUDD, Bob SCHIEFFER, Lesley STAHL, and Bruce DUNNING, all of CBS, report on refugee related events. SCHIEFFER reports by way of Republican congressional leaders Presidential reaction to opponents of refugee resettlement and that only 35,000 jobs are needed. STAHL reports that mail received at Capitol Hill is against resettlement and includes statements by congressmen on the subject. DUNNING reports on the arrival of sealifted refugees at Guam. MUDD reports that the U.S. has recovered 50 of the 120 Vietnamese planes which landed in Thailand.

Harry REASONER and Howard K. SMITH, ABC News, report on the arrival of the las U.S. Navy ship to leave Vietnam at Subic Bay; on the repossession of Vietnamese aircraft from Thailand by the U.S.; and that Australia has recognized the new Saigon regime and is willing to accept refugees.

REASONER reports on funding cuts for the Air Force's B-1 bomber; House committee approval of a $26 billion weapons bill; and the tabling of an amendment to allow women in military academies. REASONER and Ted KOPPEL, ABC, report on the Mid-East. KOPPEL reports on the reassessment of American foreign policy in the Mid-East, using as indicators U.S. approval of providing Jordan with an air defense system and inaction on Israeli requests for F-15s and other items.

Bruce MORTON, CBS Morning News, reports along with Ike PAPPAS on the phased shutdown of U.S. bases in Thailand and the removal of U.S. troops. PAPPAS also reports on the repossession of Vietnamese planes by the U.S. MORTON also includes a statement by State Department spokesman Robert ANDERSON who says that the Khmer Rouge are executing former Khmer officials and their wives.

Barbara WALTERS, the "Today" show NBC TV, interviews Secretary of State KISSINGER on the fall of Vietnam and Cambodia and their relation to detente; on China's position as a result of Indochina losses; and on the current situation in Thailand with respect to their withdrawal requests.

PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE SAFAA AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL MATTERS WITHIN THEIR OFFICIAL RESPONSIBILITIES.

FOR INFORMATION REGARDING THIS PUBLICATION CALL MR. HARRY ZUBKOFF, OX. 52884

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NBC NIGHTLY NEWS NBC TV
7:00 PM MAY 6

Vietnam Refugees

JOHN CHANCELLOR: Good evening. President FORD got a big assist today from organized labor in his efforts to get Vietnamese refugees settled in this country. This afternoon the executive council of the AFL-CIO held its regular quarterly meeting and to a lot of peoples' surprise produced a ringing endorsement of the President's plan to bring in up to 150,000 refugees, of whom 30-to-40,000 would need jobs. Irving R. Levine has the story.

IRVING R. LEVINE: The AFL-CIO leaders met after some union officials had objected to resettling Vietnam refugees. Afterwards George MEANY said that even with high unemployment the economy can absorb the Vietnamese and MEANY denounced critics.

GEORGE MEANY: Frankly I think the attitude of people who say dump these refugees in the sea, send them back, to me is really deplorable. If this great country can't absorb another 30 or 40,000 people and try to find some way for them to make a living then I feel we're -- in a sense we're denying our own heritage, we're denying the history, the background, the traditions of this country as a haven for the oppressed.

LEVINE: In practical terms George MEANY's words mean that AFL-CIO officials around the country are now forbidden from objecting to Vietnam refugees settling here. It also means that the AFL-CIO will use its influence in Congress to get President FORD the money to find homes and jobs for the refugees. Irving R. Levine, NBC News, Washington.

CHANCELLOR: Yet in the Congress there was little movement today on the President's request for $507 million for resettlement of the Vietnam refugees. There was a meeting at the White House between the President and Republican congressional leaders. One of them came out and quoted the President as saying opposition to the refugees makes him damned mad. Here's more on the refugee story from Washington.

JOHN COCHRAN: Republican congressional leaders told the President he will not get all the refugee aid he wants. There was some criticism of liberals who oppose the President's refugee program. Mr. FORD did not mention anyone by name, but after the meeting Senate Minority leader SCOTT had some sharp words about Senator George McGOVERN who went to Cuba after suggesting that some Vietnamese refugees would be better off in their own country.

SENATOR HUGH SCOTT: We're not running off to Cuba to divert attention from the serious problems, we're not asking that they go back in any sort of people killing program.

COCHRAN: So far mail coming into the White House indicates that Americans want to help the refugees as long as they don't stay here. By latest count the letters were running nearly two-to-one in favor of some kind of refugee aid. But the initial response to bringing the Vietnamese here shows a three-to-one margin against resettling them in the United States. The President told Republican leaders today that he is just burned up by liberal opponents of the resettlement program. Mr. FORD said, "these great humanitarians, now damn it they want to turn their backs. We didn't do that with the Hungarians and the Cubans, and damn it we're not going to do it now." The President's language will be milder at tonight's news conference, but his aides say he will still make a strong appeal for public support of his refugee program. John Cochran, NBC News, the White House.

CATHERINE MACKIN: Mail received by leaders of Congress and those who represent states where the Vietnamese are being processed is not considered overly heavy, it's certainly not on the scale of a major issue like Watergate. But those who do write are virtually all against the new refugees because they think they'll take work away from them. Some in Congress think these fears result from early administration estimates that the refugees could run as high as a million. Nevertheless there is divided opinion in Congress over refugee aid.

SENATOR ROBERT BYRD: Now I have a feeling that the American people, with the 8.9 percent unemployment rate here and with the welfare caseload burgeoning, feel that this number of refugees could have an additional economic impact.

SENATOR ALAN CRANSTON: I don't think we can abandon them. The American history and heritage is to open our doors to those who flee what they may deem to be terror somewhere else. And I don't think that we can turn away from that historic policy.

MACKIN: It's too early to say whether President FORD will get the entire $507 million he's requested for refugee aid, but the leaders in Congress say there is no doubt that substantial humanitarian aid will be approved and that Congress will act soon. First the administration will have to answer a lot of questions about how the money will be spent and give assurances that state and local governments won't have to pay any of the refugee costs. Catherine MACKIN, NBC News, Washington.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

(Commercials)

CHANCELLOR: A week out of Phuoc Loc island, South Vietnam the freighter American Challenger arrived today in Guam with more than 5,000 South Vietnamese refugees aboard. The captain said he left behind possibly 50,000 people on Phuoc Loc and just off its shores in small boats and he added that three infants died aboard his ship while half a dozen more were born. Lou Allison reports.

LOU ALLISON: For the next 10 days American ships like this one will be bringing South Vietnamese refugees to Guam. In all the sealift will add 80,000 evacuees to the more than 50,000 who have begun moving through Guam by airlift. The first evacuation ship, the American Challenger, docked at the Guam Navy Station early Wednesday morning Guam time with more than 5,000 people aboard, people at sea for four weeks but most of them in good health and happy to be safe here. The American officials running operation "New Life" say they're marked changes as the flood of refugees continues to grow. They say these people and those on the other ships are much poorer than those who came before. These people told NBC News reporter Ngo Yen KY (?) that the largest single group of refugees aboard the American Challenger were penniless fishermen from the southern coast of Vietnam. The fishermen and their families, numbering more than 1,000, are actually North Vietnamese. They fled their homes more than 20 years ago to get away from the Communists then. In this rescue operation the evacuation ship had to leave thousands of people behind and the ship's captain said there was desperation among those left in their fishing boats.

***

The fishermen and their families may stay many months, perhaps years, in resettlement and training camps here or on the United States mainland. The fact that they were uprooted by war once before and resettled in South Vietnam with no other skills than fishing will make it much harder for them to start a new life in America and much harder for Americans to help them. Lou Allison, NBC News, Guam.

CHANCELLOR: The most prominent of the South Vietnamese refugees to arrive at Camp Pendleton, California is Nguyen Cao KY, former vice president of South Vietnam. KY is the man who said that any South Vietnamese leader who left the country in the face of enemy attack would be a coward, and then KY left. Ray Cullen has more on KY in the United States

RAY CULLEN: KY was escorted from the plane by military police who followed him only to the terminal. Otherwise there was no special security.

NGUYEN CAO KY: I will stay with them as a normal refugee.

REPORTER: Do you consider yourself a normal refugee?

KY: Personal I can live among my people here.

CULLEN: Former premier KY says he's just a normal refugee, but it's obvious he's trying to improve his image among his fellow countrymen. His actions today were not those of a regular refugee. Conscious of the cameras, KY walked freely around camp talking to both newsmen and evacuees. He said it was too cold to sleep last night and asked a Marine officer for heavier clothing and more bedding. There were no security guards and officials say he will be given no special treatment in processing. A woman cried as she told KY of losing two sons in the defense of South Vietnam. KY says he wants to leave the base as soon as possible and will then join his family in Washington. Ray Cullen, NBC News, Camp Pendleton, California.

CHANCELLOR: The United States promised Thailand today to stop removing planes flown to Utaphao Airbase in Thailand by South Vietnamese pilots escaping from the war. The United States made the promise after it took away many of the 120 planes involved. The smaller jet fighters were hooked onto big helicopters and flown to the carrier Midway in the Gulf of Siam. The Midway then sailed away. American sources in Thailand said that a number of C-130 transports, which is too big to be picked up any helicopter, were simply flown out of the country.

U.S. and Mid-East

CHANCELLOR: Secretary of State KISSINGER said today that the United States is definitely not tilting towards the Arabs in the Middle East. KISSINGER did confirm that the United States has agreed to sell Hawk missiles to Jordan. But he said American Mid-East policy is even handed. He said military equipment was sent to Israel under existing agreement. The United States has, however, put off any new arms agreement with

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Israel pending a reassessment of American policy. And Israel today expressed concern over the missile deal with Jordan. Jordan's King HUSSEIN, who is visiting this country, made an important speech in South Carolina today concerning Israel and the Arabs. Kenley Jones reports.

KENLEY JONES: HUSSEIN came to the Citadel, the military college of South Carolina, to receive an honorary doctor of law degree and to make what aides called a major foreign policy statement. The Jordanian King said the Arab nations have changed their policy since 1967 when they refused even to recognize the existence of Israel. He said Jordan, Egypt and Syria are all now ready, even eager, to negotiate a peace treaty.

KING HUSSEIN: We accept the conditions for peace that have been laid down; recognition of Israel, non-belligerence, Israel's right to exist within recognized borders, and our willingness to make and support a final peace. All of these we accepted on condition that Israel withdraw from all Arab territory and recognize the legitimate right of the Palestinians in their homeland. It is as simple as that.

JONES: HUSSEIN called on private citizens in this country, as well as the government, to put pressure on Israel to withdraw from the occupied territory. Kenley Jones, NBC News, Charleston, S.C.

CHANCELLOR: Secretary KISSINGER said the United States does not now have a peace plan for the Middle East. He said one reason for that is that events in Indochina have taken up so much time and attention. KISSINGER said these things in the second part of an interview with Barbara Walters broadcast this morning on the Today Show program. Here's part of that interview.

BARBARA WALTERS: Almost six weeks ago President FORD asked for a reassessment of our policy in the Middle East. Now I know you haven't finished the reassessment, it's said it will take another week or so. But can you tell us anything of what is in there.

SECRETARY KISSINGER: Well first of all when President FORD announced this and set a tentative deadline it was before events in Indochina took a great deal of our attention. Secondly it's a mistake to believe that there will be some clear terminal date at which one can say from now on the assessment is completed. But I believe that on the whole the decision -- the final decisions -- will not be made until President FORD has had an opportunity to meet with the leaders of the countries principally concerned. But the conclusion to which we have come is certainly to continue a major American effort to produce progress towards peace in the Middle East and not to permit a long period of stagnation.

Conference On Nuclear Materials

CHANCELLOR: The United States and the Soviet Union today called for international measures to stop nuclear materials from being stolen by criminals and terrorists. Delegates from both countries spoke at an international conference in Geneva.

Senate Committee Arms Cuts

CHANCELLOR: The Senate Armed Services Committee today cut $222 million from the B-1 bomber program. The committee voted about half a billion dollars for research and testing on the B-1. And the House Armed Services Committee tabled an amendment to let women into the military academies and go into combat.

CBS EVENING NEWS CBS TV
7:00 PM MAY 6

Vietnamese Refugees; Thailand

ROGER MUDD: Good evening. President FORD let it be known today he is disturbed by the public backlash against his plan to resettle thousands of Vietnamese refugees in the United States. The President's feelings were passed on by Republican congressional leaders after they met with him at the White House. We have reports from Bob Schieffer and Lesley Stahl.

BOB SCHIEFFER: During the meeting the President tried to counter fears that bringing the refugees into this country would only make the unemployment situation worse. He said only 35,000 of the 130,000 refugees expected here could be classified as head of households. Sixty percent of the group coming here will be children, he said, who will not be looking for jobs. Republican leader Hugh SCOTT said the President was dismayed at the anti-refugee sentiment being expressed in some quarters. Pressed later for the President's personal reaction, SCOTT described it this way.

SENATOR HUGH SCOTT: He -- I've forgotten the word he used -- but he expressed something that -- well yea I'll get around to that John -- he said something about it was shocking or he was amazed that there would be hesitancy shown and that criticism would erupt. And he said, in fact, in makes me damned mad -- I guess that is a reaction.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

SCHIEFFER: White House mail is running three-to-one against resettling the refugees in this country, but so far only 322 letters on the subject have been received. Mr. FORD is expected to say more about the public's reaction at tonight's news conference. Bob Schieffer CBS News, at the White House.

LESLEY STAHL: On Capitol Hill the mail is overwhelmingly hostile to the refugees, displaying little of the sense of moral obligation the White House is advocating. Some of the objections are racist. One letter from Nebraska reads: They bring only disease, corruption and apathy. There's great anger because the refugees, the letters say, wouldn't stand up and fight the Communists. But most of the letters are about the economy.

SENATOR BYRD: The United States gave $150 billion and 56,000 lives and 306,000 casualties to help the South Vietnamese to have an opportunity to survive. (rest of statement same as Mackin report on NBC.)

STAHL: But most labor and political leaders disagree with the congressional mail.

MAN: There's no way I can see that we can turn our backs on the 100,000 there who chose freedom and that chose to escape from the tyranny. And we didn't do that with the Hungarian refugees and we didn't do that with the Cuban refugees and we can't do that now.

SENATOR GOLDWATER: We are a nation of immigrants. And to turn our backs on people who are fleeing from oppression, fleeing for their lives, and say to them that we're going to dump them in the sea. This to me is about as contrary to American tradition as anything that I ever heard of.

STAHL: The State Department says it has had to hire Kelly girls to take all the calls coming in offering to help the refugees. And the administration's refugee task force chief Dean BROWN held a press conference to respond to the criticism.

MAN: Well how do you respond to some people who feel, rightly or wrongly, that the government is ramming people down their throats?

DEAN BROWN: Well frankly, I don't respond to it, because I don't think the government is ramming anybody down anybody's throat. Because it's being taken on on a voluntary basis by the people that want to have them in their house.

STAHL: Lesley Stahl, CBS News, Washington.

MUDD: The United States today yielded to the Thai government and stopped removing American warplanes that fleeing South Vietnames had flown into Thailand. Both the U.S. and Saigon claimed the planes, about 120 of them and worth $330 million, and Thailand got caught in the middle of that dispute. The U.S. did not agree to the Thai request, however, until it reportedly recovered the 50 most expensive planes.

(Commercials)

MUDD: The last U.S. Navy ship used in the evacuation of Saigon reached Subic Bay in the Philippines with 177 refugees. After processing they will be transferred to Guam, where Bruce Dunning reports on the recent refugee arrivals.

BRUCE DUNNING: The people on this ship were just the beginning of the largest group of refugees yet to arrive. In the next week to ten days about 80,000 refugees are expected here by ship, a number almost equal to the entire population of Guam. Many of these people had fled from South Vietnam in small boats hoping to be picked up by ships out at sea. How many more set out to sea but were never picked up no one will ever know.

***

As the first arrivals continue their processing others waited for hours to debark from the ship. It took all night to unload the ship, and at dawn another ship entered the harbor with 6,000 more refugees. And there are more ships behind them arriving in a few days as the total of refugees continues to grow to well over 100,000. Bruce Dunning, CBS News, Guam.

MUDD: From Guam the refugees will be transferred to one of three military bases in the U.S.

ABC EVENING NEWS ABC TV
7:00 PM MAY 6

Vietnam Refugees; Thailand

HARRY REASONER: The last U.S. Navy ship to leave the waters off Vietnam arrived at Subic Bay in the Philippines with 177 refugees today. And the captain of a freighter that brought 5,000 refugees to Guam today said at least 50,000 Vietnamese were left behind in boats in the waters off Saigon. Among the new Vietnamese arrivals in Camp Pendleton, Calif.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

is former South Vietnamese premier and vice president Nguyen Cao KY. Flamboyant as ever, KY quickly made his presence known.

HOWARD K. SMITH: When the end came in South Vietnam last week South Vietnamese pilots flew 129 of their American made warplanes to Thailand. The Thai government said it would return those planes to the Communist regime in Saigon. But the U.S. had begun ferrying them out on the aircraft carrier Midway. Well today the Thai government demanded the U.S. stop removing those aircraft. The U.S. agreed, but it appeared that by then more than half the planes, the most valuable ones, were already moved out.

The Communist Vietcong flag was hoisted today over the South Vietnamese legation building in Paris. It was reported however, that France has not yet decided when an exchange of ambassadors with the new Saigon regime will take place. Australia meanwhile has announced it has officially recognized the new Communist government in South Vietnam but is also willing to accept Vietnamese refugees.

Armed Service Committee Cuts

REASONER: In a major setback for the Pentagon weapons program the Senate Armed Services Committee today cut $222 million from funds requested for development of the Air Force B-1 strategic bomber program. And the House Armed Services Committee approved a $26 billion weapons bill, three and a half billion less than President FORD requested. The House committee tabled an amendment to the bill to let women enter military academies and go into combat.

Weapons, U.S. and the Mid-East

REASONER: There are reports today of a new U.S. weapons committment to Jordan. But the administration says this does not indicate any change in Middle East policy. With President FORD scheduled to meet with leaders of both Egypt and Israel in the coming weeks, ABC diplomatic correspondent Ted Koppel puts the latest developments in perspective.

TED KOPPEL: The administration continues to insist that its reassessment of America's policies in the Middle East has not been completed. And yet when Jordan's King HUSSEIN wrapped up his talks here in Washington the other day he left with a committment that the United States will provide Jordan with an air defense system made up of Red Eye missiles, Hawk missiles and conventional anti-aircraft equipment. Israeli officials are furious. In the past, they point out, Jordan's excuse for staying largely on the sidelines of Arab-Israeli confrontations has been precisely its lack of a viable air defense system. Now, say the Israelis, one of the first necessary steps in the event of a new Middle East war would have to be the safeguarding of Israel's eastern front, a polite way of describing the forceful elimination of that Jordanian air defense system. What troubles the Israelis equally is that Egypt and Syria are receiving generous infusions of Soviet military equipment. In the meantime any discussion of selling the Israelis the sophisticated American F-15 aircraft or the Lance missile is being deferred until after the reassessment of America's Middle East policy is concluded. On the surface then the reassessment appears to be weighted rather unevenly against the Israelis. But what is emerging is not so much a new American policy as a new atmosphere in which to negotiate an Israeli-Egyptian agreement. Israeli officials are now letting it be known that they are willing to discuss a pullback from almost half of the Sinai to a line stretching from Bir El Mazar (?) in the north, along the heights of Gebel Yelich (?) to a point east of the Abu Rudeis oil fields. Their terms, the same as a couple of months ago, a formal Egyptian declaration of non-belligerency. Presumably when Israeli Prime Minister RABIN comes here to Washington on June 15th, President FORD will have given the Israelis a new gesture of support, the availability for example of those Lance missiles and F-15 jets. Israel, in other words, can be responding to American support rather than American pressure. By then Mr. FORD will also have met with Egypt's President SADAT at a time when America looks more even handed in its Middle East policy than ever before. On Capitol Hill today Secretary KISSINGER rejected any suggestion, however, that America is tilting towards the Arabs.

America's reassessment in the Middle East appears to be less a change in direction than a change in tactics. This is Ted Koppel, ABC News, Washington.

CBS MORNING NEWS CBS TV
7:00 AM MAY 6

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

U.S. Withdrawals From Thailand

BRUCE MORTON: The U.S. is going ahead with plans to pull troops out of Thailand. Ike Pappas reports.

IKE PAPPAS: Sources say the Pentagon plans to shut down one of the four airbases the United States maintains in Thailand to coincide with the withdrawal of 7,500 Air Force personnel by the end of June. The United States maintains 350 aircraft in Thailand, an undisclosed number will also be removed. The Air Force operates four bases in Thailand, Udorn, Korat (?), Nakhon Phanom, and Utaphao. Pentagon sources would not reveal which base would be closed, they said only that the big American airfield at Utaphao, an airlift supply center during the Cambodian war, would remain in U.S. hands at least for the time being. Despite public demands by the Thais that the United States withdraw all military personnel by next year, it is still hoped by top Pentagon analysts that the Thais will agree to allow a small U.S. force to remain. They point out that Thailand and the United States are still members of SEATO. Most of the Thailand's military equipment is U.S. made, if the Thais insist on a total U.S. pullout, spare parts for that equipment may be hard to come by. The Thais might need that equipment to put down the threat of a Communist insurgency in their country. Negotiations will continue with Thailand on future American military withdrawals. On another matter the Thais last week said they intended to return to Communist officials in Saigon some 120 South Vietnamese Air Force planes and helicopters that were flown into Thailand during the evacuation. Defense Secretary SCHLESINGER protested this, saying that the United States holds title to that equipment since the aircraft are part of U.S. military aid. Yesterday the aircraft carrier Midway, in the Thai port of Sattahip, began loading smaller former South Vietnamese aircraft onto her flight deck for the trip to the United States. Larger planes, such as C-130s, will be flown out to U.S. bases. The value of the abandoned aircraft is put at $330 million. Ike Pappas, CBS News, Washington.

Report on Cambodia

MORTON: The administration has intercepted radio transmissions from Cambodia which indicate the Khmer Rouge have killed some Lon Nol government officers and their wives. State Department spokesman Robert Anderson.

ROBERT ANDERSON: Our information on what may be transpiring in Cambodia is fragmentary, but I can say that it is evident to us on the basis of reliable information that orders have been issued by the Khmer Rouge to their outlying commands to kill top military and political leaders at local levels. In addition in one outlying area this order has been carried out, resulting in the death of at least 80 Khmer leaders and their wives.

MORTON: White House press secretary Ron Nessen said the President was deeply bothered by that report.

TODAY SHOW NBC TV
7:00 AM MAY 6

Interview With Kissinger

JIM HARTZ: Now part two of Barbara Walters filmed interview with Secretary of State Henry KISSINGER, the first comprehensive interview he's granted since the fall of South Vietnam. Today Secretary KISSINGER talks about the domino theory and detente with the Soviet Union, among other things.

BARBARA WALTERS: We talk of detente with the Soviet Union, but how do we reconcile detente with a country that aids the collapse of an ally we're committed to defend?

SECRETARY OF STATE KISSINGER: We have to understand what detente represents. The Soviet Union is a country that we recognize as ideologically hostile. The Soviet Union is a great power that is in many parts of the world operating competitively with us. The Soviet Union is also a country that possesses an enormous nuclear arsenal and with which we have certain interests in common; such as the prevention of general nuclear war, such as limiting conflict in areas where both of us could get directly involved. And in those areas detente has worked reasonably well. What we cannot ask the Soviet Union to do is to keep itself from taking advantage of situations in which for whatever reasons we do not do what is required to maintain the balance. It is true that Soviet arms made the conquest of South Vietnam possible. It is also true that the refusal of American arms made the conquest of South Vietnam inevitable. And therefore, while the Soviet Union does have a heavy responsibility we cannot expect the Soviet Union to police the world for us, and we have to be mature enough to recognize that we have to coexist even in a competitive world and perhaps hopefully be able to moderate over a period of years the competition in peripheral areas. Now eventually the Soviet Union must realize that it is responsible for the consequences of its actions, even in peripheral areas. But as a basic relationship detente has never meant the absence of competition.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WALTERS: Where does China stand now as a result of the fall of Saigon?

SECRETARY KISSINGER: Well China now has 40 million Vietnamese on its frontiers that do not exactly suffer from a lack of confidence in themselves. I think China will look at the international situation from the point of view of the overall balance of power, from the point of view of its own national interests, and I think it will conclude that the policy that led it to undertake normalization of relations with the United States remain the best course for it. Just as we believe that the normalization of relations with the Peoples Republic of China is an important objective of American policy which will be maintained.

WALTERS: Mr. Secretary, Thailand's foreign minister has said all American soldiers will be totally gone from that country within one year. What does this mean to us?

SECRETARY KISSINGER: Basically, as we assess our policy around the world it is important to understand that the United States does not do favors to other countries by being in an alliance with them, nor do other countries do us a favor by being our ally. If other countries want us to withdraw our troops we will of course withdraw them. Our security can be protected in many ways. What it means, however, is that for the Thai leaders the last few months have been a traumatic experience. Thailand supported our efforts in Vietnam and in Indochina because it believed its own security was intimately connected with it. And it is well known that we use Thai bases for many of the operations of the Indochina war. So naturally the Thai leaders are concerned about what this means -- what our withdrawal from Cambodia and Vietnam means -- about our general attitude in foreign policy.

(Complete transcript available)

PANORAMA WTTG TV
12:30 PM MAY 6

Interview With John Lofton, et al

***

JOHN LOFTON: But I think you (Gloria EMMERSON) ought to be congratulated for your candor because there are many people like yourself who have postured as advocates of peace in Vietnam when what you desired all along was in fact a Communist victory.

But anyway that's not central to the point. You said that -- talking about North Vietnam -- you said it's more of a country with more spirit and there's more purpose -- which certainly could have been said of Nazi Germany too. But I think the South is a nightmare and nothing works there now. What interested me was what is it that you think works in North Vietnam?

GLORIA EMMERSON: Well let me just tell you what doesn't work. After all those preposterous years of mythology about how ARVN was doing well, we've seen the performance of a disgraced and decomposing army. Nothing works in the villages, nothing worked in the districts because military officers were running them. Nothing worked at any human level of the society. Money was the only thing that got you anything in South Vietnam at all.

***

LOFTON: In order to fight you must have not only will but bullets. And in the 19 day war in the Mid-East, 1973, the United States government gave Israel $700 million in military aid a week. And had that aid been withdrawn from Israel, Israel would have collapsed and been overrun also.

(complete transcript available)

PLEASE NOTE: Complete transcripts of the following are available:

Evening Edition EE TV April 25, 1975 Interview Sen. Percy.

Evening Edition EE TV April 24, 1975 Interview Ambassadors of Korea and the Philippines.

Walter Cronkite CBS Radio May 2, 1975 Commentary by Dan Rather on Vietnam.

News WTOP Radio May 3, 1975. Report from Vienna on Atomic Nonproliferation treaty.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CURRENT NEWS
SPECIAL EDITION

THIS PUBLICATION IS PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL NEWS ITEMS OF INTEREST TO THEM IN THEIR OFFICIAL CAPACITIES: IT IS NOT INTENDED TO SUBSTITUTE FOR NEWSPAPERS, PERIODICALS AND BROADCASTS AS A MEANS OF KEEPING INFORMED ABOUT THE NATURE, MEANING AND IMPACT OF NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL NEWS DEVELOPMENTS. USE OF THESE ARTICLES HERE, OF COURSE, DOES NOT REFLECT OFFICIAL ENDORSEMENT. FURTHER REPRODUCTION FOR PRIVATE USE OR GAIN IS SUBJECT TO THE ORIGINAL COPYRIGHT RESTRICTIONS.

6 MAY 1975 No. 4

COMMENTARY MAY 1975

Vietnam: The Final Reckoning

Robert W. Tucker

AT LAST, the final reckoning in Vietnam is at hand. Barring some unforeseen and unexpected reversal, the last act in what has seemed a never-ending drama has begun. How should we behave in the concluding phase of a conflict whose outcome we have for so long sought to influence? How should we act toward those we chose to support and whose destiny we presumed to guide? However one answers these questions, their importance is apparent. For what we ultimately learn, if anything, from this our first defeat in war will depend in large measure upon our collective memory of Vietnam. In turn, this memory will surely be affected by how we behave in the moment of defeat.

It may be argued that these are questions which should have been asked long ago, that at the very least they should have been asked in January 1973 when American military forces withdrew from Vietnam in accordance with the cease-fire agreements. In fact, they were only seldom raised. To be sure, many have asked how the war, and continued American support of South Vietnam, might be ended. But few have permitted themselves the assumption that these questions would one day have to be raised and answered in the circumstances we now face. The unwelcome truth is that most of us have been loath to confront the issues we have now been forced to confront. The sudden and dramatic turn in the course of the war has brought us to the full accounting we have so long sought to avoid making and one we have been encouraged to avoid making by those bearing official responsibility for American policy. If there is a pervasive air of unease over Vietnam today, it must be largely attributed to the realization that this dreaded accounting can no longer be put off.

At the same time, it is necessary to stress that this accounting is of a special sort and, as such, not to be equated simply, or perhaps even primarily, with conventional diplomatic-strategic calculations. It is not President Ford's falling dominoes and the presumably vital American security interests thereby jeopardized that have given rise to the unease. Nor is it Secretary Kissinger's strictures on the indivisibility of peace and the effects on American global interests in abandoning an ally (South Vietnam) in its moment of extremity. These arguments, invoked from the outset of the American involvement in Vietnam, are still not without some effect. But the effect appears rather minimal, and this quite apart from whatever intrinsic merit the arguments might have. Indeed, it may well be that the world of the middle 1970's gives a considerably greater plausibility to such arguments than did the world of the early-to-middle 1960's. Certainly, the American position in the world today is not one that will bear favorable comparison with the American position of a decade ago. These considerations apart, the point remains that the altogether familiar arguments of the administration in response to the recent events in Vietnam are markedly less persuasive than they were in earlier years, and even in the earlier years of American involvement in the war their persuasiveness was limited. The currents of public opinion, and of a substantial portion of elite opinion as well, are running in directions other than those set out by the President and his Secretary of State in defining American security interests both in, and affected by, Indochina.

Nor does it seem plausible that the unease over the impending dénouement in Vietnam is a response to expected recriminations—already surfaced by leading administration figures—over "who lost Vietnam." If anything, these recriminations are likely to still much of the unease that does clearly exist by submerging it in domestic political considerations. There is little the Ford administration can reasonably expect to gain by assigning the loss of Vietnam to the Democratically-controlled Congress accused of having been niggardly in the amount of support it was prepared to give South Vietnam, though there is a good deal the administration could quite possibly lose. This is so if only for the reason that the administration must contend with something approaching the status of a law of politics: re-

CONTINUED PAGE 2

ROBERT W. TUCKER, whose article, "Oil: The Issue of American Intervention," in our January issue has provoked worldwide discussion, is professor of international relations at John Hopkins and the author of several books on world affairs and American foreign policy. He wishes to thank his colleague, Professor Piero Gleijeses, for invaluable help in preparing this article.

JAMES KILLINGBECK, CHIEF, CURRENT NEWS BRANCH, OX 78765 HELEN YOUNG, ASSISTANT CHIEF
FOR SPECIAL RESEARCH SERVICES OR DISTRIBUTION CALL HARRY ZUBKOFF, CHIEF, EXECUTIVE AGENCY SERVICE, OX 52884

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

sponsibility for what happens at a given time falls upon those who currently hold power. To escape the operation of this law, however cruel and unjust it may in practice occasionally prove, the present power holders must make a persuasive demonstration that Vietnam might—even would—have been saved had it not been for a recalcitrant and penurious Congress. Given the difficulties of such demonstration, the prospects that it might succeed cannot be rated very bright. Clearly, it will take a good deal more in the way of "proof" than merely to argue that Vietnam would have been saved had Congress only complied with whatsoever requests for aid were made by the executive.

More generally, the circumstances of 1975 simply do not favor in the case of Vietnam even a mini-repetition of the earlier Republican "loss-of-China" gambit. It is not only that in the present case a Republican administration will have presided over the "loss," but that it will have done so in a period when détente with the Soviet Union (and, in lesser degree, with China) has been the great desideratum of policy. How is one to explain simply and persuasively to the great public that those who have been so instrumental in bringing about the loss by presumably being more generous with their ally than we have been with ours, are nevertheless the states with which we must continue to seek closer and more understanding relationships? The initiated may find little trouble in grasping these subtleties of statecraft, though in the case of the Soviet Union even many of the initiated are evidently beginning to experience some difficulty. It seems doubtful, though, that the public will be able to follow this logic.

Yet the charge against Congress of "losing Vietnam" may still elicit a strong public response simply by virtue of the blood and treasure the American people have sacrificed in Vietnam. To invoke this particular logic, to tell the people that its sacrifice has been in vain because in the end this sacrifice was willfully betrayed by those who refused to comply with the administration's requests, would be reckless and irresponsible in the extreme. It would recall a dark and shameful chapter in our history and, in doing so, it would put an even more miserable end to an involvement that has been marked throughout by little else than misery. Despite the occasional intimation that charges reminiscent of McCarthyism may yet be raised, it is difficult to believe we have in recent recriminations more than misguided, though understandable, efforts to prod a Congress no longer willing passively to accept either the judgments or the requests of the executive branch on Indochina—and, for that matter, on foreign policy generally.

II

THE question persists: Why the unease in watching the dénouement in Vietnam?* Why do I feel uneasy in observing a tragedy the last act of which can come as no surprise? Clearly, it is not because of any regret over a position of opposition taken and held for more than a decade. In retrospect, there is no apparent reason for altering that position today. I remain persuaded that the American involvement in Vietnam represented, more than anything else, the triumph of an expansionist and imperial interest which, by the 1960's, had submerged the narrower and more conventional security interest the policy of containment initially expressed. Without question, the involvement in Vietnam was also a legacy of the classic cold war, of the momentum generated by the cold war, and of the habits of thought and action the years of intense conflict had encouraged. Yet the greatest legacy of the classic cold war was the gradual submission of the narrower interest that containment initially expressed in the larger interest of maintaining under American leadership a stable and congenial global order. Vietnam was perceived as a threat to this larger interest, and it was the preservation of this larger interest—an imperial interest—that must ultimately explain Vietnam. In the purpose of maintaining a particular vision of world order, in the equation of this order with American security, in the hubris of those who led the nation into war, and in the reluctance to withdraw from a conflict that could not be "won" without resort to odious measures, Vietnam affords a classic case of an imperial war.

Thus the United States involvement in Vietnam was not primarily due to intellectual error, as the prevailing liberal orthodoxy on the war would have it. Nor can it be adequately explained either in terms of an ideological obsession pursued for its own sake or, with more plausibility, in terms of the domestic constraints of anti-Communism. These and similar explanations of the policy that led to Vietnam give to this policy a quality of disinterestedness it did not possess and a quality of innocence it did not have. That policy was not the work of incompetent ideologues who were blind to political realities and oblivious to age-old considerations of interest. It was the work of men who, though they obviously made mistakes, wished to preserve America's global preponderance, and who not unreasonably saw in Vietnam a threat to the nation's preeminent position. In the manner of all imperial visions, the vision of a preponderant America was solidly rooted in the will to exercise dominion over others, however benign the intent of those who entertained the vision. That this will was commonly cloaked in such disarming terms as "liberal internationalism" does not alter the reality. The policy of intervention—of liberal intervention—that culminated in Vietnam was the expected response of an imperial power with a vital interest in maintaining an order that, quite apart from the material benefits it conferred, had become synonymous with the nation's vision of its role in history.

Yet even for one who opposed this vision and the results to which it finally led in Vietnam, there is something awesome and disquieting in the swiftness with which so many have apparently abandoned it in the conviction that we have entered a new period of world history. It may of

CONTINUED PAGE 3

* It is perhaps well to emphasize that "unease" is used here in a sense to be distinguished from the unease that arises simply from witnessing death and destruction (and, in this instance, the sense of shame among many South Vietnamese that an ordeal many bore with so much courage and dignity has been mocked by the behavior of an army in defeat). We all feel uneasy in the face of the suffering of others, quite apart from whether or not we have had any role in, or relationship to, that suffering. In the case of Vietnam, however, the particular unease experienced today stems in large part from the role we have played in the war and the nagging doubts almost all must feel about that role. Then, too, unease might in part stem from the self-deceptions that have been entertained almost to the very end.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

course be argued that the vision has not in fact been abandoned, only the methods by which it was formerly sustained. But given the world in which foreign policy must still be conducted, the abandonment of these methods is very likely to leave the vision little more than an empty shell. Indeed, the abandonment of these methods may well result in jeopardizing narrower and more traditional security interests. In any event, it is in the excess of Vietnam that we may find a root cause—perhaps the root cause—of an outlook today that promises to be as indiscriminate in its anti-interventionism as was the interventionism of only yesterday. If some of the now visible consequences of this sudden change are to be deplored, this consideration cannot alter the judgment rendered on our involvement in Vietnam. On the contrary, it can only strengthen the judgment made on the intrinsic folly of that involvement.

III

We come closer to answering the question of why the sense of unease over Vietnam once it is acknowledged that we never honestly faced the issue of how we were to disengage entirely from an enterprise—and this regardless of the consequences—which, even though we should never have undertaken it, we nevertheless did undertake. To have faced up to this issue necessarily meant facing up to its probable consequences—indeed, to its almost certain consequences—and this we could not bring ourselves to do. At least, this is true for almost all of those who, however opposed to American involvement in Vietnam, have not been sympathetic to the cause of the other side in the conflict. A very small minority apart, then, the rest of us have sought, whether consciously or unconsciously, varying ways to escape from confronting the issue we now find we can no longer avoid.

Although few were ever seriously persuaded that Vietnamization would really work, many nevertheless managed to find comfort in the promise that it might do so. Even so, the seductive promise of Vietnamization itself necessarily implied the indefinite continuance of American aid to South Vietnam, both economic and military, or at least so long as the war continued and the North continued to receive help from its allies. To agree to the one—Vietnamization—while denying the other—aid for an indefinite period—was either obtuse or insincere, provided that the South Vietnamese government and army made reasonably effective use of such aid. Moreover, experience had amply demonstrated that "reasonably effective use" in the South Vietnamese context could only be realistically interpreted with some looseness, unless it too was to prove no more than a deceptive—or self-deceptive—formula.

The premise underlying Vietnamization, and thus the implicit obligation to continue aid support, was not the representative character of the South Vietnamese government. On this all-important point, there has been, and remains even today, much confusion. It is true that, during the years Vietnamization was pushed as a way to disengage from direct participation in the conflict, many argued that such assistance as we might later provide would never be effectively used in the absence of a more representative government. Whether subsequent events have confirmed this long-held view must at least remain unclear in one respect, since we have no way of knowing whether a more representative government would in fact have made better use of the aid South Vietnam was given in the period following the American withdrawal. The contrary position is not self-evident, despite the tendency of its proponents to assume that it is. There have been governments before which, while broadly representative, have nevertheless shown themselves incompetent to conduct a war effectively. Moreover, in the case of South Vietnam a government more representative than the Thieu government—though a government that excluded the Vietcong—would still be one that represented disparate political factions which have always been largely devoid of any real popular support. After so many years of discussion and debate, we still do not have a plausible, let alone a persuasive, picture of the kind of government that would have elicited such support in South Vietnam. It is, after all, quite possible that none would have done so.

At any rate, this much at least is clear: if the strategy of disengaging from direct involvement in the war did not mean the abandonment of the South, it implied the commitment in principle to continued economic and military aid after disengagement was completed. It is disingenuous to argue today, though many do, that this strategy implied no commitment of aid, certainly no commitment of military aid, and that if such commitment was undertaken it was done in secret. The argument is disingenuous because the strategy of disengagement was largely based upon just such a commitment, and this was generally understood and accepted at the time. Nor is it relevant, in contending the contrary, to point to the instrument that completed and formalized American disengagement, the January 1973 Vietnam cease-fire agreement.* For that instrument did not have as its purpose the specification of commitments undertaken by the United States toward its ally, and it is captious to pretend otherwise.

It is for these reasons that it is difficult to gainsay the position of the Secretary of State in urging a review of the "public debate during the period that these [1973] agreements were negotiated to see what the imperatives were of the administration in negotiating these settlements" (although it is rather startling to find the Secretary making so ardent an appeal to a process he discouraged at the time). "There was never any proposition," Mr. Kissinger went on to insist at his March 26 news conference, "that the United States would withdraw and cut off aid, and these agreements were negotiated on the assumption that the United States would continue economic and military aid to South Vietnam."

The record broadly supports these assertions. Although in the press conferences and other public statements made at the time by Nixon administration officials in explaining the agreements the military aid question was played down, it was nevertheless answered in a manner that was clear enough given the circumstances. Thus Kissinger himself declared in a news conference immedi-

CONTINUED PAGE 4

* The "Agreement on Ending the War and Restoring Peace in Vietnam" was concluded in Paris on January 23, 1973, the parties to it being the United States, North Vietnam, South Vietnam, and the Provisional Revolutionary Government of South Vietnam (PRG). It was attended by various protocols, thus giving rise to such varying descriptions as the cease-fire agreement(s), the Paris accords, etc., and subsequently transmitted to Congress in the form of an executive agreement.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

ately following the conclusion of the Paris accords that the United States would continue to provide South Vietnam with "that military aid which is permitted by the agreement" (that is, to replace used-up equipment on a one-for-one basis with identical equipment) and went on to state: "The United States is prepared to gear that military aid to the action of other countries and not to treat it as an end in itself. . . ." Similar statements were made in subsequent official explanations of the cease-fire agreement. When Thieu visited President Nixon in early April 1973, the joint communiqué issued at the end of the talks reaffirmed, though in guarded terms, what was by then a well-understood position. And in considering the administration's aid requests for Vietnam in the spring of 1973, Congress not only proved quite uncritical in its examination of the requests but appeared to take for granted a continuing commitment to military aid.

It is necessary to review these events, since memories are often quite short, even over issues that once aroused deep passions. The view that the American government, with the knowledge of Congress and the public, undertook no commitment to the government of South Vietnam in the course of disengaging from active participation in the war, may be true in the narrow legalistic sense, but it is only in this sense that it is true. The commitment the American government did evidently undertake was not unconditional. Few, if any, such commitments between states are. It was conditioned on the performance of the South Vietnamese and, of course, on the behavior of the North. But a commitment there was, and it is not only misleading but somehow demeaning to attempt to deny this today.

IV

In some measure, the argument that has gone on over whether we have had a commitment to aid South Vietnam may be seen as one manifestation of the temptation to believe that we were deceived throughout the course of the war by whichever administration was in power—though above all by the Nixon administration. And where we were not deceived, it is tempting to believe that our will, however inarticulately it might have been expressed, was simply ignored by those who bore official responsibility for conducting Vietnam policy. It is tempting to believe this—indeed, the temptation verges on a compulsion—since it relieves us of a responsibility that, for good reason, we do not wish to bear. In fact, the deception of the public and the ignoring of its will do not contrast so markedly with a number of other chapters in post-World War II foreign policy. Moreover, it is often forgotten how frequently in the course of the war deceptions were exposed and secret undertakings uncovered. This is true even of the Nixon years when secrecy and deception, particularly with respect to Vietnam, were carried to yet new extremes. Prior to Watergate, however, they did not represent a political liability for Mr. Nixon. Quite the contrary: if anything, the Nixon Vietnam policy, despite its manner of execution, ultimately turned out to be a factor contributing to his 1972 victory.

Nor is this all. The public will—one uses that shadowy concept with diffidence, though use it we must—was not subverted in the case of Vietnam, not even by Richard Nixon. It may fairly be charged that Nixon exploited this will for his own purposes. But if he did so successfully, it was because this will remained profoundly ambivalent toward the war. Though clearly desiring to get out of the conflict from 1968 on, the public never accepted the stark prospect of defeat. Nor, for that matter, did a majority of the foreign-policy elites, and this despite their opposition to the war. Nixon instinctively recognized this ambivalence, and it dictated his Vietnamese strategy throughout. By changing the costs of the war to the nation,* while effectively exploiting public unwillingness to accept undisguised defeat, the President was able to marshal broad domestic support in 1972 for measures that carried the war as never before to North Vietnam. The relative absence of opposition to the war in the last six months of direct American involvement indicated that public—and also, in substantial measure, elite—disaffection with the war had been largely a function of costs (and, of course, the absence of definitive results). This may be a depressing conclusion to reach, but it is one that is difficult to avoid.

The 1973 cease-fire agreement preserved virtually intact the belief that if we had not won the war, we also had not lost it, that we had not been defeated. This being achieved, the public could readily endorse, and was only too willing to endorse, Nixon's "peace with honor." The President and his principal national-security assistant, for their part, were almost as eager as the public to achieve American disengagement. In addition to its role as the most troublesome of domestic issues, continued American involvement in the war was seen as a constant threat to further progress in détente with the great Communist powers. The Paris accords, particularly coming in the aftermath of the last and greatest display of American air power, satisfied Nixon's and Kissinger's dual requirement that American withdrawal not be seen by the public as a defeat, thereby not jeopardizing the domestic support needed for "larger policies," and by allies and adversaries as an erosion of the nation's prestige and credibility.

It may be no more than poetic justice that the man who negotiated the Paris cease-fire accords has recently suffered so much criticism for efforts that were almost universally acclaimed at the time. But if Henry Kissinger merits condemnation for what is rapidly becoming in the eyes of growing legions of critics a veritable catalogue of sins, it is difficult to see why the Paris accords should be counted among these sins. Admittedly, the Nobel Peace Prize appeared at the time, and appears even more so today, a rather excessive appraisal of the Kissinger handiwork. But the present condemnation of that handiwork seems only slightly less excessive. For even if it is true, and it is true, that the Paris accords amounted to a delayed and ultimately miserable death sentence for South Vietnam, this condemns the Kissinger efforts only if it is plausible to argue

CONTINUED PAGE 5

* To this nation, and not to the Vietnamese, South or North. The key was the reduction of American casualties and the build-up of American firepower. In 1972, the virtual disappearance of what had once been a strong anti-war movement testified to the effectiveness of the Nixon strategy. Elite groups were almost as vulnerable to the strategy as the general public, though they indignantly denied being so. Yet the record is clear that it was American casualties—and, of course, the draft—which above all supported the anti-war movement.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

VIETNAM: THE FINAL RECKONING...Continued

that the results could have been otherwise and better.

No doubt, the results could have been otherwise and better had more favorable terms for the South been extracted from Hanoi. But more favorable terms could only have meant, in the main, the complete withdrawal from the South of the North's forces (together with some mechanism for enforcing the withdrawal), and on this critical issue Hanoi had remained intractable for years. There is no evidence we have that Hanoi might have been induced to alter its position on this issue, short of an American threat literally to destroy the North. Save for a handful of unreconstructed hawks on the war, nearly everyone else drew back in horror at the very suggestion. Indeed, the terms that Kissinger did finally get, though legitimizing the North's presence in the South, might (no more is claimed) still have given the South an indefinite lease on life had they been accompanied by the meaningful prospect that the American bombers would return should the North again initiate large-scale military action. Kissinger evidently wanted to retain that option—he strongly hinted so publicly at the time—but he was effectively deprived of it only months later by a President in decline and a Congress that forbade American military forces from engaging in hostile acts in or over Indochina. Once it was made clear that the bombers would not return, there remained no effective means of protecting the South, whether from its own misdeeds or from its endemic vulnerability to large-scale attacks by Hanoi's forces, and it is difficult to fault Kissinger's plaintive comment to this effect in his March 26 news conference.

It has been argued that better terms for South Vietnam might have been gained had the United States agreed to Hanoi's longstanding demand for an unconditional American withdrawal and Thieu's removal. But these terms would have been tantamount to American acknowledgment of an undisguised defeat and, for this reason alone, were out of the question. Even so, it obviously does not follow that if these demands had been accepted, Hanoi would then have been willing to withdraw its forces from South Vietnam. At least, this does not follow in the absence of a government in Saigon that at the least included, if it was not dominated by, the Vietcong. With or without Thieu, Hanoi gave every indication that its forces were in the South to stay.

There remains the view that even given the terms of the Paris accords the results for South Vietnam could have been otherwise and better had Saigon and the United States made a sincere attempt to abide by the terms of the cease-fire. Moreover, this argument runs, had the provisions of the cease-fire agreement been carried out by Saigon and this government, there would have been no need to send additional military aid—or, alternatively, even if the need still had arisen, it might well have been kept to very modest proportions.

Clearly, what is implied here is an overall judgment on the nature of the Paris accords, and it is a judgment to the effect that the accords provided a reasonable chance for achieving a tolerable peace between the South and North. Those who take this view do not deny that, in the best of circumstances, difficulties would have remained in implementing the accords, given the suspicion and hatred that persisted and the many imprecisions and deliberate ambiguities that characterized many provisions of the accords. Even so, it is contended that whatever hope there was for a tolerable peace was dashed by our behavior and the behavior of our ally.

The detailing of this behavior has been made on innumerable occasions and requires only the barest summary. Saigon, with our encouragement, hardly waited until the ink of the agreement was dry before initiating what amounted to offensive actions. Thieu almost immediately reneged on his pledge to release political prisoners, as he did with respect to the obligations entailed in setting up a National Council of National Reconciliation and Concord. The mechanism for broadening political activity in the South was thus subverted while the provisions for organizing free elections under international supervision were simply ignored. On the American side, a series of commitments, some public though others secret, presumably went unfulfilled. Among the latter are included the promise to withdraw all American civilians in the South who were engaged in the support of Saigon's armed forces and the undertaking to cease American air reconnaissance over North Vietnam.*

One might counter this indictment with the numerous violations of the Paris accords charged to the North Vietnamese and Vietcong, violations also alleged to have begun in the months immediately following conclusion of the accords. Would any useful purpose be served by doing so, and by entering into a detailed examination of the order and magnitude of the violations undertaken by the two sides in order to assess relative responsibility for the breakdown of the cease-fire agreement? It would not seem so. Even a casual rereading of the Paris accords only serves to reinforce the conclusion, apparent at the time they were negotiated, that their almost incredible ambiguities meant either that their successful implementation required maximum efforts toward mutual understanding and good will, or that their purpose was simply to provide the means for America's military disengagement while leaving the situation otherwise essentially unchanged. Since the former interpretation is either merely tendentious or absurd, or perhaps both, we are left with the latter interpretation. This being so, it is a largely useless exercise to ask who undermined the agreement. The agreement was made to be undermined; its provisions seemed almost designed to invite evasion and subversion.

The American negotiators may still be judged adversely for having concluded the cease-fire agreement. But fairness requires recognition that the alternatives were either roughly the kind of agreement that was concluded or no agreement at all. Whereas the former alternative permitted military disengagement and the return of American war prisoners, the latter alternative promised —at best—military disengagement. There was of course a third alternative that would have obtained military disengagement and the return of the prisoners of war. This was the acknowledgment of defeat and, as a consequence of such admission, the abandonment of an ally. It was not only the Nixon administration that was completely unwilling to contemplate this third alternative.

CONTINUED PAGE 6

* These and other secret commitments are discussed by Tad Szulc, "Beyond the Vietnam Cease-Fire Agreement," Foreign Policy (Summer 1974), pp. 21-69.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

So was the nation, though in lesser degree. In light of what we now know, it is easy and fashionable to say that the third alternative would have represented the course of wisdom. For it is only by the barest of subterfuges that we may now continue to pretend that we were not defeated in Vietnam. Pride often counts for more than wisdom, however, and particularly in the case of powerful nations. And even were it not for pride, there was always the question of what to do with those whose destiny we sought to determine, however misguidedly, and whom, though their destiny is no longer within our reach (if, indeed, it ever really was), we cannot with honor simply cast aside.

V

THERE is an almost instinctively negative reaction to once again raising the matter of honor in relation to Vietnam. The reaction is surely understandable, even if misplaced. Abused and perverted on so many occasions during the past decade in relation to the war, the American involvement in Vietnam has almost succeeded in giving honor a bad name. Are we to conclude from this experience, however, that there is no such thing as honor or that honor can have no relevance to the manner in which as a nation we behave toward others? Apparently not, for it is the most extreme opponents of the war who have themselves been most insistent on seeing Vietnam as raising above all a moral issue and therefore, by implication, a matter of honor. Whether morality, and honor, occupy so exalted a position in the affairs of nations is a question that need not be entered into here. It is sufficient to insist that honor does enter into such affairs and that nations may dishonor, and have dishonored, themselves.

There can be no objection, then, to raising the matter of honor at this late date and to ask what remaining obligations, if any, we have that have grown out of our role in the Vietnamese conflict. It is no criticism of the Secretary of State that he has seen fit to ask this question and to answer it. Mr. Kissinger believes that in the "moment of extremity" of an ally the test of our character as a people is whether we are willing to stand by a commitment earlier made and to continue aid to that ally. This is, to him, "an elementary question of what kind of a people we are . . . a fundamental question of how we are viewed by all other people, and it has nothing to do with the question of whether we should ever have gotten involved there [Indochina] in the first place." To desert one's ally even when the latter's cause has become extreme is to dishonor oneself. And so it is, provided the commitment itself was an honorable one and the recipient has fulfilled the conditions implied by the commitment. To argue that even a dishonorable commitment, once made, can only be abandoned at the cost of honor itself is simply perverse. To insist that the recipient of a commitment deserves one's continued loyalty even if he has failed to fulfill the conditions of the commitment is unreasonable.

Whether the commitment made to South Vietnam is judged more than a mistake is a question that need not be argued here. What is of relevance is whether the South Vietnamese government made reasonably effective use of such aid as was given it. For if it did not do so, the further question whether it was given "adequate" aid need not even be considered. Did our ally fulfill the elementary condition implied by the commitment? There is very little evidence to support the view that it did, and a great deal of evidence to support the view that it did not. By almost any reasonable standard of effectiveness of performance, and even assuming for the sake of argument the existence of certain shortages due to the alleged penury of the aid-giver, the indispensable condition of continued moral obligation simply was not met. What follows from this is not that one may view with indifference the plight of those remnants of an armed force which do remain willing and able to fight. There is, in fact, no generally satisfactory answer that can be given in such extreme and agonizing situations, save to say —and it is concededly not much—that such answer must be determined by practical as well as humanitarian criteria. On the major issue, however, the response seems quite clear: there remains no obligation to be violated.

These considerations have taken administration arguments, particularly those of Mr. Kissinger, at face value. But this surely cannot be the end of the matter. We are entitled to ask, why the extraordinary sensitivity shown, not merely over keeping commitments—this is altogether expected—but over the moral necessity of doing so? While the Secretary may not be altogether insensitive to moral issues in statecraft, as his critics so regularly depict him as being, no one can accuse him of ever having been obsessed with such issues. Clearly, he is obsessed with issues of credibility and prestige, and while the importance of these issues may be granted, they are not synonymous with moral issues. The suspicion accordingly must arise that the Secretary has sought to use the moral on behalf of the strategic, that he has been looking at strategic interests and presenting them in moral terms.

IF THERE is nothing heinous in this, it is also not particularly admirable, above all in the present agony of South Vietnam. Moral sensitivity, one would have thought, might well have been directed in other and rather obvious directions, while strategic interests were being displayed for what they are. One such direction moral sensitivity can take is toward those South Vietnamese whose lives may be placed in jeopardy under a Communist, or Communist-dominated, regime if only because of past associations with the Americans. No one knows how many such persons may fall into this, and still other, categories, but it would be rash to assume the number is small.

Those who have for so long pressed the specter of a "blood bath" cannot in good conscience remain silent today toward the one measure that could remove their fear. The responsibility for granting asylum must be seen as a kind of litmus-paper test of the sense of obligation we feel, if not toward all those who will be placed in danger for whatever reason in a new regime, then at least toward those who have compromised themselves through past association with us. If the question of numbers is raised, it is well to recall that we took in 600,000 refugees from Cuba during the years following Castro's accession to power. Yet in the majority of cases, there was no physical danger posed to the Cuban emigrés and little obligation on our part by virtue of our own actions, as there is in Vietnam.

CONTINUED PAGE 7

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Nor is it only a matter of simple moral obligation that is involved in the case of Vietnam; it is also a test of the racism with which we have been taxed by others, and particularly in our attitudes and actions toward Asians. A refusal to make every effort to take in those Vietnamese who wish to leave and whose position has been compromised by us will confirm, as perhaps nothing else could, the charge we have so indignantly denied throughout the war.

Beyond this, if we are so concerned with our image of ourselves in defeat, as well we should be, we cannot avoid facing the issue of American economic aid to a South Vietnam we no longer influence. It is now known that in March 1973, the United States and North Vietnam came close to an agreement on American aid to the North for reconstruction. The agreement proved abortive because of the Nixon administration's ire over Communist truce violations and public indignation, reflected in Congress, over Hanoi's treatment of American prisoners of war, then being released. If aid for reconstruction was nevertheless justified in principle in the case of the North in 1973, then there is surely as strong a case to be made today for aiding the South, or, for that matter, the whole of Vietnam. To be militarily frustrated, and eventually defeated, by so small a state is humiliating, and nothing we say can deny this. Even so, generosity in defeat is not demeaning and certainly not for a great power. There is no reason why we cannot be as generous in defeat today as we have been in victory in the past.

VI

THESE observations are not intended to convey the impression that the final reckoning in Vietnam must be seen only in moral terms. Although the moral dimension of any accounting we are to make is important, the strategic dimension obviously cannot be neglected. What I have objected to is a view that misreads, if it does not pervert, the nature of the moral obligation that emerged from our commitment to South Vietnam, and that does so out of concern for strategic interests. Moreover, considering the immediate area to which this view has been applied, one must amend the preceding sentence to read that a mistaken strategic interest is equated with a spurious moral obligation. Applied elsewhere, to areas of real interest and to conditions altogether different from those that prevailed in Vietnam, the effects of this argument could prove to be devastating.

It is the tone as much as the substance of administration reactions to what has happened in Vietnam that are disturbing. While many have in retrospect unfairly criticized the 1973 Paris accords, the principal architect of those accords also insists upon finding a meaning in them they did not have. The apparent intent is to relieve himself of any responsibility for recent events in Vietnam. Yet there is the more ominous suggestion in the Kissinger reaction that what might now happen elsewhere (the Middle East?) must be seen as a result of the nation's failure to have appreciated its interests in and to have stood by its commitments to South Vietnam. One can only trust that this is little more than a passing mood, a short-lived reaction to a failure that can no longer be obscured. If it is more than that, if it is indicative of a more persistent attitude that finds increasing expression in American policy, then the prospect beckons of a determination by our policy-makers to create their own dominoes.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CURRENT NEWS

PART I - EARLY BIRD EDITION - 0730

PART II - MAIN EDITION - PUBLISHED AT 1130

THIS PUBLICATION IS PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL NEWS ITEMS OF INTEREST TO THEM IN THEIR OFFICIAL CAPACITIES; IT IS NOT INTENDED TO SUBSTITUTE FOR NEWSPAPERS, PERIODICALS AND BROADCASTS AS A MEANS OF KEEPING INFORMED ABOUT THE NATURE, MEANING AND IMPACT OF NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL NEWS DEVELOPMENTS. USE OF THESE ARTICLES HERE, OF COURSE, DOES NOT REFLECT OFFICIAL ENDORSEMENT. FURTHER REPRODUCTION FOR PRIVATE USE OR GAIN IS SUBJECT TO THE ORIGINAL COPYRIGHT RESTRICTIONS.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 7, 1975

WASHINGTON POST 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

U.S. Halts Plane Pullout in Thailand

By Bruce Palling
Special to The Washington Post

BANGKOK, May 6—The U.S. embassy here agreed today to a "temporary suspension" of the withdrawal American-supplied aircraft flown into Thailand last week by fleeing south Vietnamese pilots.

The agreement follows the removal of all of the more sophisticated jet fighters and cargo planes in the past two days to the carrier Midway in the Gulf of Siam and to Clark Air Base in the Philippines.

The U.S. embassy here has refused to disclose any details of the plane withdrawal even though the Pentagon announced the move yesterday in Washington.

Newsmen on a press tour of the Utapao Air Base today saw about 40 to 50 aircraft on the base which had presumably come from South Vietnam.

(See PULLOUT, Pg.4)

BALTIMORE SUN 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

Soviet held ready to offer missile cuts after talks

By MICHAEL PARKS
Moscow Bureau of The Sun

Moscow—The Soviet Union is offering to negotiate reductions in the numbers of missiles allowed under strategic arms agreements with the United States once a new arms treaty is concluded, according to sources here.

The Soviet offer apparently is intended to improve prospects for fast agreement and ratification of the next treaty, whose broad terms were set in November at the Vladivostok summit meeting.

As the Kremlin sees it, the Ford administration would be able to use a public Soviet commitment to reduce the two superpowers' arsenals in order to overcome extensive criticism in the U.S. to the limits agreed upon at the Far Eastern Soviet port.

What Moscow hopes to gain beyond reduced opposition to the new agreement and to Soviet-American detente in general is not clear, however; some diplomatic sources have suggested, though, that the Soviet Union is seeking U.S. concessions on several highly technical but important issues in current negotiations on a treaty implementing the Vladivostok agreement.

The Soviet offer meets a key U.S. demand, which was incorporated in negotiations, to begin immediately after the conclusion of the next arms agreement to set lower ceilings on the numbers of strategic weapons and to curb development of new weapons.

The sponsors of the resolution—Senators Edward M. Kennedy (D., Mass.), Walter F. Mondale (D., Minn.) and Charles McC. Mathias, Jr. (R.,

(See SOVIET, Pg. 4)

NEW YORK TIMES 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

Standing by Commitments, Ford Assures U.S. Allies

By JAMES M. NAUGHTON
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 6 — President Ford, declaring that the United States had learned the lessons of Vietnam, said tonight that he would pursue a vigorous leadership "on a worldwide basis."

He acknowledged, in a nationally televised news conference, that United States allies had doubts, following the loss of Cambodia and Vietnam to the Communists, about this country's commitments.

But he said such doubts were "not a reality" because the United States would remain strong militarily and economically.

"We want our friends to know that we will stand by them and we want any potential adversaries to know that we will stand up to them," Mr. Ford asserted.

He also pledged "forward movements in foreign policy that will be beneficial to peace," including efforts to strengthen United States ties to South Korea and to reassure such Asian allies as Nationalist China, Indonesia and the Philippines of continuing support.

The President said that the "atmosphere is good" for a strategic arms limitation agreement with the Soviet Union, although the negotiations would be "hard."

(See FORD, Pg. 2)

WASHINGTON POST
7 MAY 1975 Pg.1

Pentagon Budget Slashed

By Michael Getler
Washington Post Staff Writer

The House Armed Services Committee yesterday voted a record $3.7 billion cut in the Defense Department's $29.8 billion request for new weapons but Pentagon critics on the committee called much of the reduction "phony."

Included in the cuts is $1.3 billion the Pentagon wanted in the next fiscal year for military aid to South Vietnam.

Rep. Les Aspin (D-Wis.), one of a handful of members on the traditionally pro-Pentagon panel who frequently challenge defense programs, said the Vietnam aid request is now "a moot point and shouldn't be considered as part of the overall cut."

(See BUDGET, Pg. 2)

GENERAL NEWS SUMMARY

FROM THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

MAY 7, 1975

World-Wide

FORD ASKED AMERICANS to welcome refugees from Indochina.

The President told a news conference he is "very upset" at reports of resistance to the refugees. He said he understood economic misgivings about the influx but added that only 35,000 of the estimated 120,000 refugees are likely to seek jobs and noted that the AFL-CIO yesterday urged union members to welcome them. Ford said the lessons of Vietnam have already been learned and a congressional inquiry would be divisive.

The U.S. will continue to be involved in Asia and will keep its commitments to Taiwan, the President said.

Ford reaffirmed his intention to run for the presidency in 1976 and said a GOP group led by Dean Burch will begin work on his campaign "in a very informal way." He said he thought Republican foreign achievements since 1968 and an expected economic upturn give him a good chance of winning.

Ford opposed registration of guns or their owners and said he isn't committed to

(See NEWS SUMMARY, Pg. 5)

JAMES KILLINGBECK, CHIEF, CURRENT NEWS BRANCH, OX 78765 HELEN YOUNG, ASSISTANT CHIEF

FOR SPECIAL RESEARCH SERVICES OR DISTRIBUTION CALL HARRY ZUBKOFF, CHIEF, EXECUTIVE AGENCY SERVICE, OX 52884

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK TIMES
7 MAY 1975 Pg. 30

President Assures Congress on Curbs For Nuclear Arms

WASHINGTON, May 6 (AP)—President Ford assured Congress today that his Administration was giving "priority concern" to preventing the proliferation of nuclear weapons or the acquisition of nuclear explosive material for possible nonpeaceful uses.

In a message to Congress, the President said, "Whatever efforts are needed to allow the United States and other countries to enjoy the benefits of nuclear power, without fear, will be taken by the Government of the United States."

Mr. Ford said the United States was taking the lead in proposing measures to prevent terrorist groups from capturing or sabotaging nuclear materials and facilities.

The President included with his message a report on United States laws and regulations governing nuclear exports and safeguards.

"Current laws provide ample authority to control the export and re-export of nuclear-related material, equipment and technology," Mr. Ford said.

But, he said, existing policies and regulations were constantly being reviewed and "changed as appropriate" to make them more effective.

He also said the United States was encouraging the strengthening of international safeguards through participation in international discussions and through the adoption of an internation l agreement.

FORD ... CONTINUED

The President declined at the outset to entertain the suggestion that a Congressional inquiry might somehow determine where the policy of five President ann six congresses had erred in Indochina. And he urged the nation to look ahead rather than back as it began the post-Vietnam era.

"It sees to e that it's over," Mr. Ford said of the Vietnam experience.

He said that the war had been "sad and tragic in many respects" and that it would merely foster continued divisiveness to "rehash allegations as to individuals that might be to blame, or administrations that might be at fault."

"I think the lessons of the past in Vietnam have already been learned," Mr. Ford declared "Learned by Presidents, learned by Congress, learned by the American people, and we should have our focus on the future."

The news conference, in the spacious theater in the Executive Office Building next to the White House, was Mr. Ford's first since the fall of Phnom Penh on April 17 and the surrender of Saigon Last Wednesday. As a result it was dominated by the causes and consequences of the two events, which Mr. Ford said last week "closes a chapter in the American experience."

The President, evidently pursuing domestic unity as a prelude to efforts at strengthening United States diplomacy, had set the tone for his appearance tonight by proposing that "reconciliation, not recrimination" be the theme of the post-Vietnam era.

The President was said to believe that if he did not rally Americans behind his policies allies and potential foreign opponents might conclude that the political instability that has marked the last decade in the United States was likely to continue.

At his last full-dress news conference, on April 3 in San Diego, Mr. Ford noted the refusal of Congress to supply military assistance to South Vietnam and Cambodia and said it was "up to the American people to pass judgment on who was at fault and where the blame may rest" if those two nations should fall.

More recently, however, the President has led the Administration away from such suggestions. Secretary of State Kissinger told a Washington audience that the Congressional verdict on military aid would be accepted "without recrimination or vindictiveness."

And Mr. Ford, in a speech at Tulane university in New Orleans on April 23, proposed "a great national reconciliation." The time has arrived, he said, "to look forward to an agenda for the future, to unity, to binding up the nation's wounds and restoring it to health and optimistic self-confidence."

To Confer With Premiers

The President will begin specific discussions on diplomatic relations tomorrow in a series of private meetings here with Prime Ministers Harold Wilson of Britain, Gough Whitlam of Australia and Wallace E. Rowling of New Zealand. On Thursday, he will confer with Prime Minister Lee Kwan Yew of Singapore.

Later this month Mr. Ford will embark on a European trip, his first as President, during which he will meet with Western leaders at a conference of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in Brussels. He will later to Spain, Austria and Italy and confer during the trip with President Anwar El-Sadat of Egypt.

Mr. Ford will meet her next month with Premier Yitzhak Rabin of Israel.

BUDGET ... CONTINUED

Another $1 billion was trimmed from the Navy's shipbuilding program, but no ship projects were actually cut back. The committee instead voted to defer a Navy request for money to cover anticipated contract claims and inflation on ships under construction.

"We're going to have to come up with that money and maybe more next year," Aspin said. "They just put it off, not cut it."

According to Aspin's arithmetic, the actual cuts in the panel's annual weapons procurement and research and development authorization bill amount to about $1.3 billion, not $3.7 billion.

The committee gave its full support to the $749 million Air Force request for its top priority B-1 bomber development project, and made a $45 million cut in the Navy's $2 billion request for its top-priority Trident missile-firing submarine.

The panel cut $260 million from Air Force plans to build a fleet of new radar-packed aircraft known as AWACS intended to warn of enemy air attack. The reductions limit the Air Force to the purchase of three rather than six planes next year.

The panel trimmed $185 million from another new plane the Air Force and White House want as a new airborne command post for the President in a nuclear emergency. The reduction keeps the project in development rather than allowing it to move into production.

The House committee—as in previous years—inserted an extra $115 million in the Defense budget to buy 24 more Texas-built A-7D attack planes for the National Guard. The Pentagon did not request these craft.

The House panel also denied a $300 million request by the Pentagon to set up a new fund that would allow quick replacement of weapons taken out of stockpiles for overseas sales.

In the Senate, the Pentagon also appeared to be avoiding, at least at this point, the major slashes in new weapons projects that some defense officials feared would be forthcoming from a new and more liberal Congress.

The Senate Armed Services Committee, meeting behind closed doors, voted 11 to 4 to approve five projects intended to improve the accuracy and lethality of long-range U.S. missiles

In so, doing the full committee overturned an earlier 3-to-2 vote by a subcommittee to kill these projects, which some critics say could stir up the arms race by threatening to knockout an opposing missile force in a surprise first strike.

The Senate panel, it was learned, also voted 9-to-6 to cut $222 million out of the B-1 project. But this reduction continues the B-1 in development and cuts out only the funds related to tooling up for actual production. The decision on whether to mass-produce the new plane is not scheduled to be made until November, 1976.

Because the government is moving toward a fiscal year that will eventually begin annually on Oct. 1, this year's budget request includes both the 12-month period from July 1, 1975 and an additional three-month transition period running from uly 1, 1976, to Oct. 1, 1976.

Thus, in the house committee action yesterday, a total of $1.7 billion was cut from the new authorization request of $28.2 billion for the 12 months of fiscal 1976. The Vietnam money and $300 million stockpile fund brought the total fiscal '76 request to $29.8 billion.

In addition, $390 million was trimmed from the $5.8 billion requested for new weapons procurement and development for the three-month transition period.

Aside from its fiscal actions, the House committee also tabled an amendment that would allow women to enter military academies and go into combat. Rep. Sam Stratton (D-NY) said he would take his academies campaign to the House floor but would probably drop the combat provision.

NEW YORK TIMES
7 MAY 1975 Pg. 67

Army on Airwaves

The Army, which like the other branches of the Armed forces is forbidden to use paid full-time advertising in recruiting, this week started its second test of the airwaves. Its a small one—$600,000 for 13 weeks on radio in 15 markets—and its being done by N. W. Ayer ABH International. The first test, in 1971, used both TV and radio by all accounts was very successful.

WASHINGTON POST
7 MAY 1975 Pg. 46

Spain Said to Want NATO Membership

According to an authoritative source in Washington, the Spanish government remains very much interested in NATO membership but recognizes that it continues to be unobtainable because of opposition from Denmark, Norway, Belgium, and to some extent, the Netherlands.

Spain wanted a firm bilateral defense guarantee from the United States but Washington balked at that, an American source said. The United States preference, is to obtain for Spain a direct NATO acknowledgment that U.S. access to bases in Spain contributes to NATO defense. This is the present focus of discussions, it was said.

It is questionable whether this can be arranged in time to be added to the NATO communique to be issued at the end of the forthcoming NATO summit conference in Brussels, however.

Events in Portugal are said to have underscored the importance of Spain to Western defense in the American perception. American diplomats have been telling their Spanish counterparts that European attitudes in time are likely to become more sympathetic to Spanish participation in NATO.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON POST - 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 46

Ford, Franco Seek to Heal Rift on Bases

By Miguel Acoca
Special to The Washington Post

MADRID, May 6—Wide differences between Washington and Madrid over continuation of U.S. military bases in Spain will be the key topic when President Ford visits here late this month for talks with Generalissimo Francisco Franco, informed sources said today.

While Spain is anxious to continue its military relationship with the United States, "We are not in the mood for just another piece of paper," a senior Spanish official said.

The Spanish bases are considered vital to the Western defense system particularly the U.S. nuclear submarine base at Rota in Southern Spain.

Pro-Arab Spain, however, has steadfastly refused to allow American use of the bases here to resupply Israel. It does not recognize Israel and there are no indications Spain intends to change its policy.

The hardened Spanish positions has become clear after four months of negotiations here and in Washington. The two countries, sources said, are far apart on the following:

- Continued American use of Torrejon, the big joint U.S.-Spain base in Madrid's suburbs. Spain also wants the Americans to giving up the mothballed Moron Air Base.
- A mutual security treaty.
- Modern military hardware for the Spanish armed forces.
- Contracts to manufacture U.S. weapons and components in Spain under licensing arrangements.

Coloring official Spanish attitudes toward the U.S. and a new agreement on the bases are such related matters as U.S. support of Morocco in its dispute with Spain over the Spanish Sahara and U.S. refusal to back Spain's case against Britain for the return of Gibraltar.

Franco, who at 82 sees his 36 years of authoritarian rule coming to a close, presumably would like to see these problems settled with American help before he fades from the scene.

Another thorny issue involves American strategy to link Spain to NATO. Spain has been excluded from the alliance because of Franco's association with the Axis powers in World War II.

Reflecting the view of the Spanish military, the air minister has declared publicly that Spain is not interested in joining NATO. The military also resent U.S. efforts to structure a "backdoor" NATO association for Spain through a joint declaration signed last summer. It said that the bilateral defense relationship "is complementary to that of existing security arrangements in the Atlantic framework and that equal treatment should be accorded to all the countries of the region."

Franco and the Spanish military were reportedly outraged by a recent U. S. weapons sale to Morocco, which is seeking to annex the phosphate-rich Spanish Sahara territory in northwest Africa and to oust Spain from two enclaves in Morocco.

Spanish officials are said to feel that the United States must recognize that Spain has been a faithful ally and that the bilateral relationship must be sharply upgraded to reflect present power realities in Europe and the Mediterranean.

It is felt that this is especially necessary following the U.S. setbacks in Indochina and political changes in Greece, Turkey and Portugal affecting the American military presence.

Franco invited President Ford upon learning that negotiations were proceeding so badly that they might not be finished by September, when the present agreement expires. He made it clear that, while he is eager to conclude a new bases agreement, any new accord must be rewarding not only politically but economically.

Spanish thinking has also been affected by the left-wing military government in neighboring Portugal. Spanish officials fear that if the worst predictions of Secretary of State Henry Kissinger come to pass and Portugal becomes a Communist-dominated country, Spain will become a target for subversion and guerrilla activities from Portugal, and they want guarantees of U.S. help.

Although Spain remains a politically restricted society, Spanish negotiators are conscious that Spanish public opinion is opposed to foreign military bases here. A newspaper yesterday criticized what it called plans to expand the joint Spanish-American air base at Zaragoza, which would become the main air facility if Torrejon is abandoned.

See RIFT, Pg. 4

BALTIMORE SUN - 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

House panel trims little from Ford military bid

By CHARLES W. CORDDRY
Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—The House Armed Services Committee approved yesterday a $32 billion military procurement bill —$3.7 billion less than President Ford asked—after sidelining a proposal to let women attend the service academies and become combat officers.

At the same time, the Senate Armed Services Committee dealt the Pentagon a sharp blow by striking from its version of the bill a $222 million sum requested to make preparations for production of the B-1 supersonic bomber.

The Senate panel left intact $726 million to continue research and development with four prototypes of the B-1, but its action on the advance production funds reflected increasing congressional concern about the prospective production cost—more than $80 million a plane—of the bomber.

In its action on the bill, in which it made no cuts in B-1 funds, the House reduced the administration's requests considerably less than the nominal $3.7 billion cut indicated.

For example, the cut included $1.3 billion that had been sought for military aid to South Vietnam, a matter now academic. Another $300 million that was disallowed would have been used to stockpile weapons for sales abroad.

A slash of about $1 billion in ship construction requests was mainly a cut in expected escalation of costs—in money, that is, that would not be spent until later years. The committee said it could not accept the Pentagon's escalation estimates at this time.

The House and Senate panels' proposals are for a 15-month period starting July 1 —instead of the usual 12 months—because the government next year is shifting the beginning of fiscal years to October 1. The Senate committee has not yet completed action on its version.

Representative Samuel S. Stratton (D., N.Y.), who tried unsuccessfully in the committee to win entry to the service academies for women, said he planned to take the battle to the House floor.

On a motion by Representative Lucien N. Nedzi (D., Mich.), who heads a manpower subcommittee, the Stratton proposal was tabled, 24 to 22. The Maryland committee member, Marjorie S. Holt (R., 4th) voted with Mr. Nedzi, who said there were issues other than sex discrimination, such as suits to establish quotas, that might have to be faced.

Mr. Stratton said the idea of combat conjures up pictures of women in foxholes, but that, in fact, they could serve in such roles as ship's officers and pilot instructors after leaving Annapolis, West Point or Colorado Springs.

Mr. Stratton told a reporter the General Accounting Office has made a study showing as many as 10 per cent of academy graduates do not get combat assignments anyway. He hopes to get a measure passed that will admit women to the academies and then let the controversy over combat duty be resolved at another time.

The annual procurement measure fixes ceilings on sums the services may spend on weapons research, development and production and military manpower. Except for certain increases in Army and Navy reserve strength (about 32,000 in all), the House committee approved Pentagon manpower proposals.

The panel voted for a 5 per cent limit on military pay raises for the January 1, 1975-June 30, 1976 period, provided that a similar kept on civilian raises in the federal establishment. It said that limit would save $828 million in 12 months, whereas a prospective 9 per cent increase would have added more than $2 billion to defense costs. Its net saving was arrived at after taking account of its ruling that proposed increases in military commissary prices be suspended.

The House committee shaved requests for several weapons systems, but in one case—A-7 attack planes for the National Guard—it added $115 million.

Originally yesterday, the Senate committee voted a $338 million cut in the B-1 request. On a motion of Senator Robert A. Taft, Jr. (R., Ohio), it restored $116 million by a 9-to-6 vote.

The Air Force had wanted the advance production money to buy materials and save time if it decided next year that the B-1 should go into production. Opponents argue that such action might have committed Congress prematurely to production.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON POST - 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 43

U.S., Soviets Back Nuclear Pact Again

GENEVA—In a message to the 60-nation conference reviewing the five-year-old nuclear nonproliferation President Ford said yesterday that support for it "is a major tenet of American policy."

The Soviet Union also reaffirmed support for the treaty but the Mexican delegate accused the two major nuclear powers that signed it of dragging their feet on disarmament.

U.S. delegate Fred C. Ikle said that "we have to concern ourselves seriously with the threat of theft and other criminal seizure of nuclear materialm" The Soviet representative also called for international measures to prevent nuclear thefts by criminals and terrorists.

SOVIET ... CONTINUED

Md.)—said their support of any new treaty would depend on acceptance of this condition.

Soviet negotiators at the Geneva talks, which are due to recess shortly, made the Kremlin offer, according to sources here, and it is now being conveyed to congressmen and others outside the administration who are interested in strategic arms limitations.

Over the past weekend, a leading Soviet specialist on American affairs, Georgy Arbatov, said in a Radio Moscow broadcast to the United States that conclusion of the treaty agreed upon at Vladivostok will make it possible "to effect a transition from arms limitation to their reduction."

Dr. Arbatov, director of the Institute for U.S. and Canadian Studies and a Kremlin adviser on foreign affairs, endorsed the resolution proposed by Mr. Kennedy, Mr Mondale and Mr. Mathias as "a very realistic approach to the problem."

Moscow is willing to make this pledge to negotiate reduced ceilings on strategic weapons, multiple warhead missiles and new weapons systems explicitly when the next treaty is concluded, sources here said, if necessary to insure congressional ratification of the pact without full-scale controversy.

Moscow is concerned that Soviet-American rapprochement might be endangered if the treaty is widely criticized.

"What would be very damaging to detente would be a repetition of the trade agreement affair," a Soviet source said, referring to the collapse of the 1972 trade agreement after Congress severely restricted Soviet-American trade terms to force increased emigration of Soviet Jews in a move Moscow interpreted as aimed primarily at undermining detente.

Dr. Arbatov's comments, putting on the record what is being said privately, were viewed as significant because of their timing just before a recess in the Geneva talks for consultations.

But Dr. Arbatov was reported to be speaking not only on behalf of these circles, often described as the doves in distinction to the Kremlin's military and ideological hawks, but on behalf of the whole Soviet leadership following a meeting two weeks ago of the Communist party's policy-making central committee.

That meeting firmly supported the Vladivostok agreement. The party leadership declared firmly that "political detente must be supplemented by the relaxation of tension in the military field and used for the reduction of armaments and the struggle for disarmament."

Presumably, the central committee overrode objections not only to the Vladivostok agreement—the meeting was followed by calls in Pravda, the party newspaper, to follow the party's foreign policy line—but also approved the proposed follow-up negotiations for the affirmation of the need for reductions in arms levels as an unexpected note of the committee resolution.

WASH. POST 5/7/75

By Jack Anderson and Les Whitten

Washington Whirl—President Ford has told subordinates that he will press Congress for a full $100 billion military budget, as evidence to the world that the United States isn't planning any more pullbacks . . . Before Congress votes more military money, some legislators intend to ask tough questions about the billions worth of equipment abandoned in South Vietnam. . .

RIFT -- CONTINUED

Recently a member of the rubber-stamp Parliament presented a plea asking the government to evict the United States from all the bases.

Ford will be arriving in Spain at a time of widespread speculation that Franco is preparing to yield power to Prince Juan Carlos de Borbon, 37, his designated successor. Reports that Franco's retirement is imminent have even slipped into the controlled Spanish press. Important establishment personalities have gone so far as to write articles suggesting Franco's retirement.

PULLOUT ... CONT'D

Sources on the base said that about 20 aircraft were carried from Utapao to the Midway by giant helicopters Sunday and Monday. At least two aircraft were reported seriously damaged when they fell from the helicopters—one on the Utapao runaway and one on the Midway.

The aircraft already removed include F-5 jet fighters, A-37 jet fighter-bombers and also C-130 cargo planes which were reported to have been flown direct to the Philippines.

The Thai government's request for a suspension followed contradictory statements by various members of the Cabinet, with some declaring that the affair was solely an American problem while others considered that the aircraft should be held by Thailand until the government decided their fate.

Hanoi radio has claimed that the aircraft are the property of the Provisional Revolutionary Government of South Vietnam and warned Thailand that any hesitancy about returning the planes could jeopardize relations between the two Vietnams and Thailand.

Thai Foreign Minister, Chatichai Choonhavan called the acting American ambassador, Edward Masters, in for a 25-minute talk on the matter today. Masters refused to answer any questions after the meeting.

Observers here consider it impossible that Thai military authorities did not know that the United States was taking the planes out of Thailand.

However, the armed forces are considered opposed to giving the aircraft to the Provisional Revolutionary Government. They are known to view the two Vietnams as posing the greatest military threat to Thailand. Additionally, the military leaders would be extremely reluctant to commit any hostile act towards the United States out of concern that U.S. military assistance program to Thailand be maintained at a high level.

Cynics say that the present situation is the best possible one for Thailand, with all of the sophisticated aircraft already gone and the Thai government now taking a "tough stand" to give the impression of surprise and anger at the unilateral action taken by the Americans.

There are, however, government officials who are genuinely angry at the United States for taking such action apparently without formal consultation.

To avoid the risky move of returning the other aircraft to South Vietnam, Prime Minister Kukrit Pramoj said the remaining aircraft will stay in Thai custody until peace and order have returned to South Vietnam and the ownership question can be determined.

Foreign Minister Chatichai has also asked to see the United States and South Vietnamese agreement on military aid, saying that if there is an agreement about the title reverting to the United States Thailand would not interfere. Chatichai also requested that a delegation from the Provisional Revolutionary Government come to Bangkok to negotiate the return of the aircraft and other military supplies brought in by fleeing Saigon government forces.

Such contradictory statements highlight the dilemma in which the Thai government now finds itself, in its efforts to be accomodating to both sides.

[Foreign Ministry sources said today that a five-member North Korean delegation will fly to Bangkok Wednesday for talks on establishing diplomatic relations, AFP reported from Bangkok.]

NEW YORK TIMES
7 MAY 1975
Pg. 22

U.S. SHIP WITH 200 REACHES SUBIC BAY

SUBIC BAY NAVAL STATION, The Philippines, May 6 (Reuters)—The Stoddert, last of 46 American Evacuation ships to leave South Vietnamese costal waters, reached the Subic Bay Naval Base today with 200 South Vietnamese refugees, 19 of whom had been rescued from a sinking boat.

The Stoddert, a guided missile destroyer, was expected to be followed into port by five other ships carrying more than 5,000 people.

The ships include a chartered South Korean ship and two South Vietnamese vessels.

A Subic Bay spokesman said that more than 40,000 refugees had been funneled through here in the last four days. Most were flown out in transport planes, to Guam to be processed for entry to the United States.

WASHINGTON POST
7 MAY 1975
Pg. 48

Japan-China Pact

Agence France-Presse

TOKYO, May 6—Japan and China exchanged verbal notes in Peking today on their intergovernmental shipping agreement, clearing the way for its implementation starting June 4.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WEDNESDAY MORNING, 7 MAY 1975

WASHINGTON STAR - 6 MAY 1975(7) Pg. 11

Schlesinger Reinforces View of CIA Role as Passive

By Jeremiah O'Leary
Washington Star Staff Writer

The finality of Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger's declaration that the CIA has never resorted to assassination could be construed as reinforcing the contention of administration sources that the agency discussed and knew about political murder plots but never was involved in a successful one.

Schlesinger made his statement late yesterday after testifying before the Rockefeller commission investigating illegal domestic activities of the CIA.

He emerged from his closed-door appearance and, unlike some former CIA officials, appeared almost eager to set the record straight. He said, "Let me make it very clear now that assassination has not been used as a tool by the CIA at any time, and I don't think that applies prospectively any more than it does retrospectively."

THE FORMER CIA director was even more emphatic in denying CIA involvement in the slaying of President John F. Kennedy.

"The suggestion of any CIA involvement is preposterous," Schlesinger said. "It is psychologically and intellectually impossible that the CIA could in any way be involved in the tragic event."

Analysis

He said any such suggestions could only emanate from sick imaginations. The agency's whole role, he said, has been to serve and protect the United States and its leaders.

Schlesinger refused to comment directly on reports of CIA involvement in plots to assassinate foreign leaders, but he said appropriate review bodies such as the Rockefeller commission and the congressional committees will want to review those issues.

THE SUM of Schlesinger's declarations are strongly supportive of statements to The Star by White House and CIA officials that the agency knew of, and even discussed, political murder but never was involved in a successful one.

This leaves open the implication that the CIA may have had direct involvement in plots for political murder that did not succeed — for example, perhaps plots against Fidel Castro, whose death was certainly desired by many Cubans. It is even more suggestive that the CIA knew of such plots but was not directly involved.

Commission officials said yesterday that the group, appointed by President Ford and headed by Vice President Nelson A. Rockefeller, is nearing the end of the labors it began last February. The hearings will be completed Monday, and then the commission will begin writing its report and recommendations for the President.

THE REPORT is to be handed to Ford on June 4 and will be released publicly soon after that. At that stage, the Senate Intelligence Committee, headed by Sen. Frank Church, D-Idaho, will commence its hearings into the activities of all American intelligence agencies. Its House counterpart is almost totally dormant.

Also testifying yesterday was Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger. He denied having any knowledge or involvement in either alleged CIA domestic spying or foreign assassination plots.

"Since I have been in Washington, the National Security Council or the NSC staff, or the assistant to the president for national security affairs (Kissinger's other title) did not concern themselves with domestic intelligence; nor were they informed about domestic intelligence," Kissinger declared.

Asked about allegations of CIA assassination plots, Kissinger said none of those allegations pertain to the period of his service in Washington from 1968 until the present.

ANOTHER WITNESS yesterday, former CIA Director John A. McCone (1961-1965) said, "During my term of office, there was no, absolutely no assassination plot against Castro or any other foreign leader.

McCone said such plots were not consistent with the moral values of the United States or the CIA.

NEWS SUMMARY -- CONTINUED

Attorney General Levi's proposal for a handgun ban in high-crime areas. Ford said his coming meetings with Egyptian and Israeli leaders won't be part of any new U.S. negotiating effort in the Mideast.

* * *

A WEAPONS BUDGET $3.7 billion below Ford's request cleared a House panel.

Besides eliminating a $1.3 billion budget request for military aid to South Vietnam, the House Armed Services Committee reduced by $260 million the authorization for Boeing's AWACS early-warning plane and cut $186 million of procurement money for the flying command post that U.S. officials would use during a nuclear attack. The total authorization approved for July 1, 1975, through Sept. 30, 1976, was $26.1 billion.

That could be cut further on the House floor or when appropriations are voted. But the sentiment for defense outbacks is being cooled by unemployment and the fall of two U.S. allies in Indochina.

The House panel tabled an amendment that would have let women enter military service academies and go into combat.

The Senate Armed Services Committee voted to cut $222 million in production-related money for the B1 bomber in fiscal 1976 and the following three months.

* * *

The U.S. removed from Thailand at least 25 of the estimated 125 warplanes flown there last week by fleeing South Vietnamese pilots. But then the removal was suspended in response to a request from the Thai government, which wants to evaluate U.S. claims to the planes. Vietnamese Communists have demanded that Thailand send them the planes.

* * *

Jordan's King Hussein said the Arab states are willing to make a final peace with Israel recognizing its right to exist on condition that Israel vacate all occupied territory and "recognize the legitimate rights of the Palestinians in their homeland."

* * *

Secretary of State Kissinger said that the U.S. "definitely isn't tilting toward the Arabs" and that "fairly large quantities" of arms have been shipped to Israel in the past month. It probably was a mistake, he said earlier in an NBC interview, to have made Vietnam a test case for U.S. policy.

* * *

Home-mortgage lenders reject almost twice as many applications from minorities as they do from whites, a Federal Reserve Board study of six metropolitan areas indicated. But the 1974 data aren't sufficient to determine that discrimination exists, the Fed said.

A bill to bar discrimination on the basis of age, race, religion or national origin in granting credit was passed unanimously by the House Banking Committee.

* * *

State and local governments plan to increase taxes $3.6 billion this year while reducing construction spending $1 billion and expenditures for services $3.3 billion, a congressional survey made public by Rep. William Moorhead (D., Pa.) indicated. Nearly half of state and local governments are cutting payrolls, eliminating about 140,000 jobs.

* * *

San Francisco anesthesiologists' strike to protest soaring malpractice-insurance rates spread to Los Angeles and San Diego, where a dozen hospitals were forced to cancel all but emergency surgery.

* * *

Mexico attacked the nuclear disarmament policies of the U.S. and Russia at a 56-nation Geneva conference that is reviewing the five-year-old treaty banning the spread of atomic weapons. But U.S. support for the treaty was reaffirmed in a message from President Ford.

* * *

A dozen tornadoes struck eastern Nebraska, killing at least two persons in Omaha and injuring scores more. Gov. James Exon mobilized the National Guard.

* * *

The nomination of Lt. Gen. Louis H. Wilson Jr. as Marine Corps commandant was approved by the Senate Armed Services Committee.

* * *

A Commonwealth of Nations summit meeting ended in Kingston, Jamaica, with presidents, premiers or chief delegates of 34 former British colonies warning of a race war in Rhodesia unless the majority blacks there are allowed to enter the government.

* * *

Sen. George McGovern (D., S.D.) called for an end to the U.S. trade boycott against Cuba as he arrived in Havana for an "educational" visit.

* * *

Saudi Arabia banned contraceptives after the World Moslem League ruled that birth control violates Islamic law.

* * *

Died: Joseph Cardinal Mindszenty, 83, former primate of the Roman Catholic Church in Hungary who was convicted of treason in a Communist trial in 1949, and later spent 15 years in asylum in the U.S. embassy in Budapest, in Vienna, of a heart attack following surgery; J. G. Underwood, 80, president and chief executive officer of Harsco Corp., in Harrisburg, Pa.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 19

Canada's air defense commitment

To stick with U.S.— but for how long?

By Don Sellar
Special to
The Christian Science Monitor

Ottawa

This week Canada is expected to renew its participation in the 18-year-old North American Air Defense Command (NORAD) agreement with the United States for at least five more years.

Defense Minister James Richardson, an enthusiastic NORAD supporter, will announce the decision to continue sharing with the U.S. in continental defense sometime before the current pact expires May 12.

The only uncertainty surrounding the new NORAD arrangement is the length of Canada's commitment. Mr. Richarson favors an unlimited term, but has been under pressure to opt for a five-year package.

A Parliamentary committee, dominated by members of the ruling Liberal Party, recently did some deep soul-searching about NORAD and concluded another review after five years would be in order.

Cabinet must decide

However, the cabinet, led by Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, will make the final judgment on the matter. If it decides on an indefinite term, Canada would want the option to withdraw on one year's notice.

NORAD, a sophisticated surveillnce system, currently costs about $1.4 billion a year to operate. The U.S. foots the bill for 90 percent of the command, whose headquarters are at Colorado Springs, Colorado.

Only once since NORAD was formed did Canada not sign a minimum five-year deal. That was in 1973, when the Trudeau Government, then a minority in Parliament, angered some American officials by settling on a two-year term which is now expiring.

Some of NORAD's critics have described the $140 million Canadian component of the system as a waste of money, although its proponents reply that an all-Canadian defense system would cost a great deal more than that.

Military picture changed

There is also the military-strategic argument which contends NORAD was designed to counter a Soviet manned bomber attack — a threat seen now as minimal at best.

But NORAD planners already have recognized the validity of that criticism, to some extent, by reducing the number of interceptor aircraft in the system to 500 from 2,000. At the same time, they have upgraded NORAD communications and tracking systems, and broadened its role.

Another line of attack against NORAD is the political-ideological argument which holds that Canada relinquishes its sovereignty by participating. At present, Americans are responsible for NORAD flights across vast tracts of Canadian landscape.

Canada has only one regional control center, at North Bay, Ontario, but this base is charged with responsibility for watching over part of the northeast U.S.

Edmonton base planned

The sovereignty argument against NORAD, however, may diminish further in the next two or three years, when Canada assumes responsibility for its own air space.

Last week, as a prelude to the renewal of NORAD, Mr. Richardson announced construction of a second Canadian regional base, at Edmonton, Alberta.

This $25 million installation will cover western Canadian air space previously handled from an American one. Under the new zone format, North Bay will assume responsibility for eastern Canadian air space and relinquish its role in the northeast U.S.

Defense Department sources in Ottawa say it could take two years or more before all the NORAD zones of responsibility are redrawn and the new Canadian installation at Edmonton is operational.

Had Canada failed to continue its NORAD obligations, officials here admit relations with the U.S. would have been dealt a stunning psychological blow.

But such a change in attitude by the Trudeau government would be startling, since only four years ago it declared the defense of North America to be its No. 2 priority in defense, behind only that of Canadian territory itself.

WALL STREET JOURNAL
7 MAY 1975 Pg. 24

Suit To Bar Vietnamese Asks Environment Data

Special to THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

SAN FRANCISCO—A federal district judge will hear a request today that no more South Vietnamese citizens be given refuge in the U.S. until an environmental impact statement is filed.

The suit was filed by Delta Citizens Group and James Shanks and William Shauer, two Sacramento businessmen, against Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, the Interior and Defense Department secretaries, and against the Immigration and Naturalization Service. It was transferred here from Sacramento.

The suit notes that an estimated 50,000 to 75,000 refugees will be immigrating with State Department help of up to $500 million. The suit says, "this is a major federal action with extensive national and local consequences," requiring an environmental impact statement under the National Environmental Policy Act.

It says the refugee program is a "monumental undertaking," with considerable consequences on U.S. citizens and that incoming refugees haven't been fully screened for communicable and contagious diseases.

The suit asks federal Judge Spencer Williams to issue a temporary restraining order that would halt any further entrance of South Vietnamese citizens into the U.S. and also halt further issuance of immigration permits to them.

NEW YORK TIMES 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 23

SAIGON SAYS CITY IS NORMAL AGAIN

HONG KONG, Wednesday, May 7 (Agence France-Presse)—The Saigon radio said yesterday that life had returned to normal in the South Vietnamese capital, with telephone lines functioning as before and well-stocked markets crowded with shoppers.

Thousands of Saigonese who had fled the city last week when the Communists took over were now said to be returning by bus.

Meanwhile, preparations were reported under way to celebrate the victory of the revolution.

Teachers belonging to patriotic associations were asked to meet yesterday afternoon to arrange a reception at which civilian and military leaders would presumably be presented to the people. Students were scheduled to meet last night.

It appeared that the celebration might be held some time today, one week after the city was surrendered to the Communists.

The radio said workers were busy at their jobs, noting that this was especially the case at the Sicovina textile factory, which has 1,000 employes.

Saigon bookstore owners were said to have tossed out all books that were regarded as useless or offensive.

Television Resumes

Among the indications that life had returned to normal, the radio said, was that a television station in the capital resumed operation Friday. In addition, an official newspaper published its first issue last Sunday.

A new administrative and moral order was reportedly being established in Saigon through the mobilization of volunteers, divided into several groups.

Medical aid was reported being handled by a group of 100 people, among them doctors and nurses.

Two groups of 50 volunteers each were said to be responsible for public order, while 120 people, divided into 17 teams, wearing civilian clothes and red armbands and carrying guns, were reported directing traffic.

The radio also mentioned a weapons reception group, staffed by 23 volunteers. They were said to have collected or requisitioned 4,323 guns of all kinds and undetermined quantities of grenades and ammunition.

Still another group of volunteers was said to be assigned to the distribution of revolutionary propaganda.

For the first time mention was made in a Vietnamese Communist broadcast of activities of Western journalists still in the city. They were said to have been present at Tan Son Nhut airport Friday to watch the first plane with the insignia of the Revolutionary Government to land there.

However, Western newsmen who last filed dispatches from Saigon last Wednesday, the day of the surrender, continued to be forbidden to send news out.

Broadcasts from both Saigon and Hanoi yesterday said a total of 13 South Vietnamese islands from the Gulf of Tonkin to the Gulf of Siam had been "liberated" in recent days, among them the prison islands of Son and Phu Quoc.

Some of the islands were in the Spratly group 200 miles or more east of the southern part of South Vietnam. But there was no mention of the Paracel Islands, which are east of Da Nang. This archipelago was occupied by Chinese forces in 1974 after brief fighting with South Vietnamese troops.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON POST
7 MAY 1975 Pg 8

Radio Jingle To Promote Army Career

United Press International

After a four-year hiatus the Army is seeking recruits again with paid radio jingles.

The 13-week campaign began in 15 cities Monday. Because the service is limited to a $600,000 budget, the ads will appear only on radio. In the spring of 1971 the Army had $10.6 million and advertised on television as well as radio.

The services have long asked radio and TV stations to broadcast free ads, but they usually appeared after midnight.

The 1971 campaign and the current one are both designed to attract volunteers for the infantry, artillery and armor. There is also a financial inducement because each volunteer for the combat branches gets a bonus of $1,500 to $2,500.

The 1971 ad campaign was considered a success by the Army, which got 10 times as many volunteers in the last month of the campaign as in the same month of the preceeding year. But in the first eight months of the current budget year, the Army reached only 76 per cent of its combat needs.

NEW YORK TIMES
7 MAY 1975, Pg 23

News Blackout May End

PARIS, May 6 (UPI)—Officials of the Revolutionary Government's mission here said today that foreign newsmen would soon be permitted to file dispatches from Saigon again.

WASHINGTON STAR 6 MAY 1975, Pg 3B (7)

'Politics' Charged in Plan To Shift P.G. Navy Office

By Brad Holt
Washington Star Staff Writer

"Keep My Chevy Off The Levee," proclaimed the sign held by an employe of the Naval Oceanographic Center.

About 1,300 center employes expect the Navy to transfer their Suitland office to the area of Bay St. Louis, Miss. and thus disrupt their lives—because of the move south itself, or because they will quit their jobs to stay in this area and then face the task of trying to find comparable work.

LAST NIGHT the employes, who perform scientific, engineering and environmental studies for the Navy as well as other federal and civilian agencies, had their chance to protest to the Navy. About 800 appeared at the Suitland High School cafeteria for a hearing on an environmental impact draft statement on the proposed move published by the Navy.

Among the 58 speakers who testified before a Navy hearing board were Maryland politicians from Congress, the state Senate and House of Delegates and the Prince Georges County government.

The politicians of the Free State were solidly behind their constituency—about 57 percent of those threatened by the move live in Prince Georges County.

U.S. Rep. Gladys N. Spellman, D-Md., told the crowd, "It disturbs me that the Navy thinks it can move people around like pieces on a chess board. They're dealing with disrupting families.

"For what reason?" she asked. "Politics," she answered.

BOTH THE oceanographic employes and the Maryland politicians pointed out that the center's annual payroll is about $25 million, which would leave Maryland along with the center. The proposed site, located in Mississippi close to the Louisiana state line, is sponsored by Sens. John Stennis, D-Miss., and Rusell Long, D-La., chairmen respectively of the Senate Armed Services and Finance Committees, last night's meeting was told.

Francis B. Francois, chairman of the Prince Georges County Council, said county officials "have been opposed to the move and that strong opposition still stands. The county executive and the County Council are ready to use every legal weapon available."

REP. MARJORIE S. HOLT, R-Md., read a letter written to Defense Secretary James Schlesinger from Reps. John M. Murphy, D-N.Y., and Charles A. Mosher, R-Ohio, respectively the chairman and ranking minority member of the oceanographic subcommittee of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. The letter announced oversight hearings on the proposed move to begin May 21 and asked for postponement of a "final decision on this transfer" until the hearings are completed.

THE NAVY STUDY, under the heading of "Adverse Environmental Effects," noted that "blacks, who comprise about 14 percent of the work force, may be reluctant to transfer to the proposed relocation site." The study notes that as many as 80 to 90 percent of the blacks may refuse transfer and that those who go "must consider the general attitudes of the majority populace toward minorities..."

Louise Driscoll, a deputy equal employment opportunity officer for the center who toured the area recently, said that "along the Gulf coast, everything is fine, but when you go inland, it's the old South. In the movie theaters, blacks are on one side and whites on the other; a black cop can't arrest a white man....It's very separate and very unequal."

Members of the Navy hearing board agreed with Mrs. Driscoll in her estimation of the racial situation but disagreed with statements about the availability of housing and the quality of education.

AT THE CLOSE of the hearing, members of the board told a reporter that there was adequate housing available near the Mississippi site.

WASHINGTON STAR 6 MAY 1975, Pg 11 (7)

Army Moving Its Prep School

Associated Press

Secretary of the Army Howard Callaway said Monday that the U.S. Military Academy Preparatory School will be moved this summer from Ft. Belvior, south of Washington, to Ft. Monmouth, N.J.

Involved are 325 students and 65 civilian and military instructors and administrators.

The Army said the shift will provide the shcool improved permanent facilities by the beginning of the 1976 session a year from August.

The Army said the transfer of the school to Ft. Monmouth will permit expansion of the Defense Systems Management School at Ft. Belvoir before January. The U.S. Military Academy Preparatory School prepares regular and reserve soldiers to qualify for entrance to West Point.

WASHINGTON POST 7 MAY 1975, Pg 43

For the Record

• Soviet Communist Party chief Brezhnev and Premier Kosygin will visit West Germany this year, the ruling Social Democratic Party announced in Bonn. The Soviet news agency Tass, meanwhile, said in Moscow that Kosygin will visit Libya the first half of this month.

LOS ANGELES TIMES 4 MAY 1975 (7)
Pg 6B

Californians Pressured Navy to Buy F-18, Critic Charges

DALLAS (AP)—The U.S. Navy has been pressured to spend $6 billion for a deficient fighter plane just to ease California's unemployment problems, according to U.S. Rep. Dale Milford (D-Tex.).

Milford said Saturday in a statement issued from his home that the Navy was pressured "in a demanding letter" to choose the F-18 fighter built by McDonnell-Douglas and Northrop in California. He said the plane is inferior to the LTV F-16 which the Air Force chose in January. Congress earlier had recommended the Navy and Air Force adopt the same new fighter plane.

"This letter clearly stated the demand that the award should go to Northrop because of California's high unemployment factor," Milford said. He said the letter was written by "the entire California (congressional) delegation."

Milford said the Navy's decision, which still requires congressional approval, is indefensible on the basis of the F-18's performance, economy or as the best combat plane available for Navy use.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WEDNESDAY MORNING, 7 MAY 1975

A035
R A
DEBATE 5-7
DAY LD
BY JOHN MILNE
WASHINGTON (UPI) -- THE SENATE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE HAS VOTED IN FAVOR OF THE "COUNTERFORCE" STRATEGY OF FIGHTING NUCLEAR WARS, WHICH SUPPORTERS SAY WOULD GIVE THE PRESIDENT MORE FLEXIBILITY IN RESPONDING TO CRISES.

OPPONENTS CONTEND "COUNTERFORCE" WOULD ADD NEW, DANGEROUS ELEMENTS OF RISK AND INSTABILITY TO RELATIONS BETWEEN NUCLEAR POWERS. THEY SAID TODAY THEY PLAN TO FIGHT THE DECISION IN THE WHOLE SENATE.

SOME SENATE SOURCES PREDICT A CONFRONTATION SIMILAR TO THE RECENT FIGHT OVER THE ANTIBALLISTIC MISSILE.

THE SENATE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE MET BEHIND CLOSED DOORS TUESDAY ON THE PENTAGON'S $10.2 BILLION RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT REQUEST. IT IS EXPECTED TO ANNOUNCE FINAL DECISIONS SOON, PERHAPS TODAY.

SOURCES NOT WISHING TO BE QUOTED BECAUSE THE COMMITTEE HAS NOT YET MADE ALL ITS DECISIONS SAID THE VOTE WAS 11-4 IN FAVOR OF $109 BILLION IN RESEARCH FOR FIVE "COUNTERFORCE" PROPOSALS. AN EXAMPLE OF ONE IDEA IS MARV, A NUCLEAR WARHEAD THAT CAN BE GUIDED TOWARD A TARGET AFTER IT IS FIRED. THE IDEA BEHIND "COUNTERFORCE" IS TO HAVE A MISSILE SO ACCURATE AND POWERFUL THAT IT CAN DESTROY AN ENEMY MISSILE BEFORE IT IS FIRED.

THE COMITTEE REVERSED THE RESEARCH SUBCOMMITTEE, HEADED BY SEN. THOMAS MCINTYRE, D-N.H., WHICH HAD ELIMINATED THESE PROJECTS. MCINTYRE IS ONE OF THE OPPONENTS WHO CALLS "COUNTERFORCE" DANGEROUS, IN HIS PHRASE, "PUTTING A HAIR TRIGGER ON NUCLEAR WAR."

THEY SAY IT IS ONLY A MATTER OF TIME UNTIL BOTH THE UNITED STATES AND THE SOVIET UNION GET THIS CAPABILITY, AND IF A CRISIS COMES BOTH SIDES WILL ITCH TO PUSH THE NUCLEAR BUTTON FIRST -- BECAUSE THE SECOND ONE COULD HAVE ITS NUCLEAR ARSENAL DESTROYED.

SUPPORTERS, WHO INCLUDE SECRETARY OF STATE HENRY KISSINGER AND SECRETARY OF DEFENSE JAMES SCHLESINGER, SAY "COUNTERFORCE" GIVES THE PRESIDENT ANOTHER MILITARY OPTION BETWEEN DOING NOTHING IN A CRISIS OR RISKING ALL-OUT NUCLEAR WAR.

THE SOURCES ALSO SAID THE COMMITTEE VOTED TO CUT $222.3 MILLION FROM THE $672 MILLION REQUEST FOR THE B1 BOMBER PROGRAM, AND PERMIT ONLY CONTINUED RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT, NOT PRODUCTION. THE SUBCOMMITTEE ORIGINALLY CUT $160.8 MILLION, AND THE COMMITTEE VOTED NARROWLY TO KEEP THE CUT. A LATER COMPROMISE CUT MORE, THE SOURCES SAID, AND IT PASSED 10-4.

CONSERVATIVES MAY ASK THE FULL SENATE TO RESTORE FUNDS FOR THE B1, DESIGNED AS THE NATION'S MAJOR HEAVY BOMBER FOR NUCLEAR WAR. THE HOUSE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE WAS KINDER TO THE CONTROVERSIAL PLANE, VOTING TUESDAY TO AUTHORIZE ALL THE PENTAGON ASKED.
UPI 05-07 03:42 AED

APB061
050

(BANGKOK) -- A REPORT BY THE SAIGON RADIO, MONITORED IN BANGKOK, SAYS A HUGE CROWD GATHERED AT THE FORMER PRESIDENTIAL PALACE TODAY. THE RADIO SAYS THE COMMANDING GENERAL OF THE SAIGON AREA PROMISED LENIENCY TO FORMER FOES OF THE VIET CONG AND RESPECT FOR LIVES AND PROPERTY OF FOREIGN RESIDENTS -- PROVIDING, HE SAID, THAT ''THEY EARN AN HONEST LIVING THROUGH CLEAN BUSINESS'' AND OBEY LAWS AND ORDERS.

GENENRAL TRAN VAN TRA, WHO LED THE ATTACK ON SAIGON IN THE 1968 TET OFFENSIVE, ALSO WARNED OF SEVERE PUNISHMENT AGAINST THOSE WHO -- AS HE PUT IT -- ''SEVER THEMSELVES FROM THE PEOPLE'' AND ''SERVE AS HENCHMEN FOR FOREIGN COUNTRIES.''
03:24AED 05-07-75

WALL STREET JOURNAL 7 MAY 1975, Pg 7

IBM Permits Army To Cancel Orders Without Any Penalty

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y. — International Business Machines Corp. said it has allowed the Army to cancel three remaining computers on a nine-computer contract without paying scheduled penalties of $9.6 million.

But IBM acknowledged — after a statement was issued by Rep. Jack Brooks, (D., Texas), chairman of the House government operations committee—that the Army was paying $6 million over current market prices for the six computers it is buying from IBM, and that the Army had violated federal law by signing the original contract.

"The Army has acknowledged a procedural error," an IBM spokesman said, commenting on a charge by Rep. Brooks that only the General Services Administration has legal authority to buy data processing equipment for the government.

IBM explained the $6 million price differential by noting that in 1973, when the agreement was reached, the price to the Army of $2.7 million for each of the six system 360, model 65 computers was "competitive" in the market. Since then the going price has dropped to $1.7 million, the spokesman said, because of "dynamics in the market" rather than any change in production costs.

IBM said the original contract, which was for up to 24 computer systems, was awarded by comeptitive bidding in 1967 but was revised by the Army and IBM in 1973 when Army requirements were reduced. Under that agreement, the Army was to pay $4.3 million for each computer if it purchased fewer than nine.

Rep. Brooks said the Army would purchase the other three computers on the open market, presumably at the lower price.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CURRENT NEWS

PART II - MAIN EDITION - 1130

THIS SUPPLEMENTS PART I-EARLY BIRD EDITION

THIS PUBLICATION IS PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL NEWS ITEMS OF INTEREST TO THEM IN THEIR OFFICIAL CAPACITIES. IT IS NOT INTENDED TO SUBSTITUTE FOR NEWSPAPERS, PERIODICALS AND BROADCASTS AS A MEANS OF KEEPING INFORMED ABOUT THE NATURE, MEANING AND IMPACT OF NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL NEWS DEVELOPMENTS. USE OF THESE ARTICLES HERE, OF COURSE, DOES NOT REFLECT OFFICIAL ENDORSEMENT. FURTHER REPRODUCTION FOR PRIVATE USE OR GAIN IS SUBJECT TO THE ORIGINAL COPYRIGHT RESTRICTIONS.

TUESDAY, MAY 6, 1975

BALTIMORE SUN
6 May 1975 Pg. 1

Phnom Penh said to order executions

By DEAN MILLS
Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—The State Department said yesterday that the new rulers of Cambodia have ordered the execution of all top political and military leaders of the old regime, down to the local level.

The order, if carried out, would mean the death of thousands of Cambodians who served under the defeated government of President Lon Nol.

American officials indicated that a program of mass reprisals would make the United States hesitant to recognize the new regime in Phnom Penh. Henry A. Kissinger, the Secretary of State, said in an interview televised yesterday that "very tragic and inhuman and barbarous things are going on."

"We don't regret not having recognized Cambodia immediately," he added.

Robert Anderson, the State Department spokesman, confirmed at a department press briefing reports of the execution orders given in radio transmissions intercepted by American intelligence.

And he said the United States has "information that in one outlying area this order was carried out and this involved 80. . .leaders and their wives."

But Mr. Anderson said information available to the United States is too fragmentary to indicate whether the execution orders have been carried out on a wide scale. There were solid indications, however, that the new leaders have been harsh in establishing their authority.

Western journalists who remained in Phnom Penh for the Communist takeover and who arrived in Thailand over the weekend have hinted darkly of severe measures taken by the new government, although they have foresworn writing directly on the subject for now for fear of harming those left behind.

PHNOM PENH...Pg. 2

WASHINGTON POST
6 May 1975 Pg. 1

Refugee Critics Shock Ford

By Carroll Kilpatrick
Washington Post Staff Writer

Congressional and public criticism of administration policy on the admission of Vietnamese refugees has shocked and disturbed President Ford, White House sources said yesterday.

The President is expected to express himself on the subject in strong terms at a televised news conference at 7:30 tonight, the first he has held since the surrender of Saigon.

The President was quoted by one source as having said "it is not the America I know" when informed of what some public figures and citizens have said about not wanting the Vietnamese to come to this country.

The President also is expected to discuss in public for the first time the consequences for this country of the Communist victories in Cambodia and Vietnam.

He asked Congress yesterday for $507 million to care for the Vietnamese refugees until they can find homes and jobs, and he is expected to defend his position that they should be welcome and that the United States owes them refuge.

Last week, through his press secretary, Mr. Ford said he was "proud" of what he had done to help evacuate Vietnamese who wanted to leave their country.

Yesterday, press secretary Ron Nessen, asked about reports of criticism of Graham A. Martin, ambassador to South Vietnam, quoted the President as strongly defending the ambassador and hailing the success of the evacuation.

"The President feels that Ambassador Martin accomplished an extraordinarily

CRITICS...Pg. 2

BALTIMORE SUN 6 May 1975 Pg. 8

Kissinger denies links to any CIA death plots

Washington (AP) — The Secretary of State, Henry A Kissinger, yesterday denied having any involvement in alleged Central Intelligence Agency domestic spying or foreign assassination plots.

"Since I have been in Washington, the National Security Council or the National Security Council staff or the assistant to the President for national security affairs did not concern themselves with domestic intelligence or were informed about domestic intelligence," Mr Kissinger told reporters after a two-hour-closed-door session with the Rockefeller commission.

Asked about allegations of CIA assassination plots, Mr. Kissinger chuckled and said, "None of those allegations pertain to any period of which I have personal knowledge."

The Defense Secretary, James R. Schlesinger, who headed the agency briefly in 1973, also testified and later told reporters that "assassination has not been used as a tool by the CIA at any time."

However, Mr. Schlesinger said he would have "no comment on allegations regarding the assassination of foreign leaders" and added that "there are questions here that the commission and the appropriate congressional bodies may wish to review."

Asked whether the CIA had undertaken domestic surveillance in response to White House pressure, Mr. Schlesinger said, "My recollection ... is that indeed there were expressions of interest on the part of senior officials of the government."

Asked if these expressions came from Mr. Kissinger, who ordinarily would direct CIA covert activities, Mr. Schlesinger indicated that the requests for domestic surveillance "came through channels other than national security channels."

Vice President Rockefeller, the commission chairman,

KISSINGER...Pg. 2

NEW YORK NEWS
6 May 1975 Pg. 2

U.S. Taking Viet Planes From Thais

Washington, May 5 (News Bureau) — Despite official Thai objections, the United States has begun removing the 125 U.S.-supplied military planes flown to Thailand by fleeing South Vietnamese pilots, the Pentagon said today.

Meantime, it was announced that the U.S. would reduce by about 25% the number of American troops and planes in Thailand. The number of troops will be cut from 25,000 to 19,500, mostly Air Force personnel.

Scheduled for removal next month are two squadrons of U.S. F-111 fighter-bombers (36 planes) and three squadrons of F-4 fighters (72 planes). The total of American planes currently in Thailand is 340, including 176 fighters; 16 F-4s configured for reconnaissance duty; 17 B-52 bombers; 12 AC-130 gunships, and a number of other aircraft of the liaison, spotter or utility types.

The U.S. troop reduction, disclosed earlier today in Bangkok, was described in a Thai Foreign Ministry statement as the first step in an effort to phase out the American military presence in Thailand by March 1976.

The decision to bring the South Vietnamese aircraft to the United States had not been disclosed previously.

The announcement came as Thai Foreogn Minister Chatichai Choonhavan said in Bangkok that the Thai Government would noretian the planes for the time being. He indicated that he wanted to discuss the matter with u.s. officials.

North Vietnam and the new Communist government of South Vietnam have demanded the return of all planes and ships

VIET PLANES...Pg. 2

JAMES KILLINGBECK, CHIEF, CURRENT NEWS BRANCH, OX 78765 HELEN YOUNG, ASSISTANT CHIEF

FOR SPECIAL RESEARCH SERVICES OR DISTRIBUTION CALL HARRY ZUBKOFF, CHIEF, EXECUTIVE AGENCY SERVICE, OX 52864

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK TIMES 6 May 1975 Pg. 1

Kissinger Denies Involvement In Domestic Spying by C.I.A.

By NICHOLAS M. HORROCK
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 5—Secretary of State Kissinger said today that he and the National Security Council had had no involvement in any domestic operations of the Central Intelligence Agency and that he had never "transmitted" to the agency any feeling of concern about domestic security on the part of President Nixon.

His statement was made to reporters after he testified before the Rockefeller Commission, which is investigating the C.I.A.

Richard Helms, former director of Central Intelligence had said in January that domestic operations were conducted in response to Presidential concern that foreign influences were controlling the domestic antiwar movement.

Mr. Kissinger's statement raised the question of whether the C.I.A.'s operations were outside the chain of command suggested by the National Security Act of 1947, which calls upon the C.I.A. to "perform such other functions and duties related to inelligence affecting the national security as the National Security Council may from time to time direct."

The present C.I.A. chief, William E. Colby, said in January that the agency conducted domestic intelligence gathering from 1970 until 1973 as an outgrowth of Presidential concern over radical activities.

This concern was expressed in the so-called Tuston plan, a proposed attack on radical movement that included burglaries, electronic surveillance and mail covers, which was prepared in 1970 but not implemented. The C.I.A., Mr. Colby has said, continued to gather information and maintain files on Americans even though the plan was not adopted.

The National Security Council, a national security advisery body, and the 40 committees are the normal conduits for commands to C.I.A. for instance, covert activity abroad is conducted either with the express approval of the 40 Committee or under the power of executive orders issued through the council. (The 40 Committee includes representatives from the major agencies of the intelligence community, Mr. Kissinger and members of the council.

But today, under questioning, Mr. Kissinger said that "since I have been in Washington, the National Security Council or the National Security Council staff or the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs did not concern themselves with domestic intelligence or were not informed about domestic inteligence.

Mr. Kissinger has directed the council since 1969 and his tenure covered the years 1970 until 1973, during which Mr. Colby sai dthat part of the domestic intelligence operation took place.

Vice President Rckefeller said today that there were other channels of cammand between the White House and the C.I.A. outside of the National Security Council and that these channels could have included President Nixon himself.

Mr. Kissinger also disavowed today any knowledge of alleged assassinations b ythe C.I.A. Each of the day's other witnesses—a former C.I.A. chief, John A. McCone, Secretary of Defense James M. Schlesinger, and a former White House aide, Walt Rostow — were asked about assassinations.

All denied direct knowledge. Mr. McCone said that during his term of office there was "absolutely no assassination plot or authorized assassination plot against Castro by the Cuban Premier, [Fidel Castro] or any other foreign leader."

Today's session was one of the last two in which the commission will hear witnesses. It has begpn to prepare its report, which is scheduled to be given to President Ford on June 6.

Mr. Schlesinger said what he recalled, from his internal investigation of C.I.A., indicated that what authorizations came in the summer of 1971 came through "channels other than the N.S.C."

The concern of the Nixon Administration with domestic radicals was synthesized in a plan written by John Charles Huston, then a White House aide, in the summer of 1970. The plan had been contributed to by members of the major intelligence agencies. It would have authorized, with Presidential approval, the use of burglaries, mail covers and electronic surveillance to gather intellegence about the domestic radical movement.

The plan was in effect for five days, but was rescinded when the late J. Edgar Hoover refused to allow the F.B.I. to be involved. It was not the only period in which the C.I.A. has conducted domestic intelligence, according to Mr. Colby, the agency head.

KISSINGER...Continued

briefing reporters on the day's session, confirmed that "there were many channels from the White House to the CIA" but refused to supply details or state where requests for domestic surveillance had originated.

Walt W. Rostow, Mr. Kissinger's predecessor as national security adviser, also appeared before the commission but declined any comment on his testimony.

John A. McCone, the central intelligence director during the early 1960's, also testified before the eight-member commission investigating allegations of CIA domestic wrongdoing.

Mr. McCone later told reporters he had to "plead ignorance" in response to questions about alleged plots against the life of Cuban Premier Fidel Castro. "During my term of office, there was no, absolutely no assassination plot or authorized assassination plot against Castro or any other foreign leader," Mr. McCone said.

Mr. Kissinger was asked by reporters about the future of a former CIA director, Richard M. Helms, now Ambassador to Iran. "Helms will remain ambassador to Iran," Mr. Kissinger said. "I have complete confidence in him."

Last January, Mr. Helms acknowledged publicly that a special counter-intelligence unit was set up within the CIA in response to presidential concern that domestic unrest was influenced from abroad.

VIET PLANES...Cont'd

bused by South Vietnamese to flee their country before it fell last week.

But Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger has said that the U.S. retained title to the planes.

In response to questions, a Pentagon spokesman said that some South Vietnamese C-130 transport planes were being flown from Thailand to Clark Air Force Base in the Philippines and that most of the other South Vietnamese planes were being removed by ship.

About 54 F-5 fighters and A-37 light attack bombers, formerly os the South Vietnamese Air Force — which was once the world's foruth largest — were being loaded on the aircraft carrier Midway off the Thai port of Sattahip, sources daid. Alos aboard the Midway were 48 U.S.-supplied helicopters, either from South Vietnam of Cambodia.

PHNOM PENH...Continued

Several officials speaking privately yesterday agreed with Mr. Anderson's observation that the information so far is too thin to judge whether mass executions have begun. But they said the execution orders given in the intercepted radio messages applied even to low-ranking political and military officials at local levels.

Given the insurgents' reputation for ruthlessness, some analysts here said, there was no reason to doubt that the orders were being carried out. Ronald H. Nessen, the White House press secretary, told reporters yesterday that "80 to 90 officers and their wives" had been executed in Cambodia. Mr. Nessen also said the United States has had "some reports" of executions of South Vietnamese officials.

CRITICS...Continued

difficult task under trying circumstances and did it well," Nessen said.

Declaring that Martin was responsible for the lives of Americans in Saigon and for maintaining the embassy to the end, Nessen said the President "thinks the results speak for themselves."

The Americans were evacuated safely as were thousands of Vietnamese, Nessen said.

Nessen said Mr. Ford appreciated the support of Gov. Reubin Askew of Florida and Gov. David Pryor, of Arkansas both Democrats, for refugee resettlement activities in their states.

Evacuees are being sent to Eglin Air Force Base in Florida, Ft. Chaffee in Arkansas and Camp Pendleton in California.

Asked if the President had thanked Democratic Gov. Edmund G. Brown Jr. of California, Nessen replied, "Why should he" Brown has complained of the new immigrants at a time when many Americans are unemployed.

While there have been reports of heavy mail to members of Congress opposing the admission of Vietnamese refugees, Nessen said White House mail favored their admission.

Of 7,600 letters received on the subject in the last month, 4,456 supported the President's policy, 2,936 opposed it and the remainder commented but stated no firm position, Nessen said.

Asked about a suggestion by Sen. George McGovern (D-S.D.) that some of the refugees would want to return to their homeland, Nessen said they left voluntarily and if some want to return they are free to do so.

Nessen confirmed earlier reports that the President has invited Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin to visit Washinton next month. The visit will take place June 11-12, Nessen said, for discussions of "matters of mutual interest and in order to further strengthen the friendly ties between the two countries."

Israeli officials were reportedly disturbed last week because the White House announced that the President would meet first with Egyptian President Anwar Sadat during Mr. Ford's trip to Europe.

The meeting with the Egyptian leader is scheduled for June 1-2 in Salzburg, Austria. The President will first attend a North Atlantic Treaty Organization summit meeting in Brussels May 29-30 and also visit Madrid and Rome before returning to Washington June 3 or 4.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II--Main Edition--6 May 1975

WASHINGTON POST 6 May 1975 Pg. 1

Vietcong Wins First U.N. Recognition

From News Dispatches

The new Communist government of South Vietnam has released all prisoners from the Conson Island prison where inmates were held in notorious "tiger cage" cells, the Vietcong radio said Monday.

The move came as the Vietcong's Provisional Revolutionary Government continued to tighten its control over the country and won its first recognition from the United Nations as the successor of the former Saigon government.

The PRG ordered all officials of the former government to report to authorities by Thursday and extended to May 31 the deadline for members of the defeated armed forces to turn themselves in. Saigon Radio also reiterated its order for military equipment to be turned in immediately.

The Vietcong's Giai Phong Radio, monitored by the Yugoslav news agency Tanjug, did not give the number of prisoners released from Conson Island prison, but it said they would be reunited with their families.

Former U.S. Rep. William R. Anderson (D-Tenn.) once referred to the "tiger cages" of Conson Island as "the most shocking treatment of human beings I have ever seen" after touring the prison where 10,000 persons were held, most of them for political reasons.

During the height of the U.S. opposition to involvement in the Vietnam war, reports on the "tiger cages" raised a furor in the United States. At one point, 116 South Vietnamese political prisoners claimed that they had been paralyzed from maltreatment on the island and from being kept in the "cages."

The radio also reported that former officials of the defeated Saigon government, including former President Duong Van (Big) Minh, had been returned to their families in Saigon.

The officials were told upon their release that it was hoped that they would contribute to rebuilding the country, the radio said. Minh responded by saying he "welcomed the victory of the liberation forces and said he was happy to be a citizen of the independent Vietnam," the radio said

Meanwhile, Saigons' new rulers ordered the immediate closure of all overseas missions set up by the previous government and indicated that the new envoys would be sent out soon to take over.

In a three-point directive, the Foreign Ministry ordered all heads of mission to cease operations and close their embassies and to draw up lists of documents, equipment and property for handover to new representatives who would be sent out soon, and warned that acts of sabotage and illegal removal of funds would be punished.

The directive was the new government's first order to the former government's dozens of embassies, the largest of which are in Washington and Paris.

Domestic proclamations by the PRG have dealt thus far with the reconstruction of the country and the establishment of administrative machinery. Essential services have reportedly been restored and many factories are said to be in full operation. Communications with the outisde world, however, have not been restored, and news has been confined to radio broadcasts monitored outside South Vietnam.

In Wellington, New Zealand, a U.N. official said that almost all the displaced persons in Vietnam are expected to be resettled in their villages by the end of May. The U.N. official said his agency, the U.N. High Commission for Refugees, is working closely with the new Saigon government to provide medicines, food, tools and seeds.

The North Vietnamese news agency in Hanoi reported that the television station in Hue has resumed broadcasting and Giai Phong Radio said a group of dancers from Hanoi performed in the former imperial capital on Sunday.

The radio also reported that Saigon citizens are scraping walls and cleaning up streets and market places. Old movie posters and posters of the Thieu regime have been replaced by revolutionary slogans, the radio said.

At the United Nations, the U.N. Economic and Social Council recognized the PRG as the successor government to the former Saigon regime yesterday, despite American "regrets" at the "premature" decision.

In a public debate on the recognition, other U.N. delegates suggested that the US. statement indicated that Washington would recognize the PRG "in the coming days."

U.S. representative Clarence Ferguson responded, "We will not recognize any government-in-exile, but that is not an either-or proposition. As of this moment, we do not recognize the authorities in Saigon."

Ferguson said the United States was "uncertain as to an eventuality of double representation."

The PRG's earlier application for membership in two U.N. bodies—the World Health Organization and the World Meteorological Organization—has indicated to some observers that the new Communist rulers in the South are preparing for a prolonged period of diplomatic activity independent of North Vietnam.

Yesterday's U.N. decision means that the PRG would succeed the government it defeated as an "observer" at the world body, but neither of the agency applications has been acted upon.

Monday's action at the United Nations was prompted by a request from Senegal that the PRG be invitec to attend the U.N. International Women's Year conference in Mexico City in July

Meanwhile, the Soviet news agency Tass reported that two Soviet ships had docked in Danang and brought 4,000 tons of food and fuel to the city. The Soviet vessels were the first ships to enter the port since the Communist government took control.

Western diplomats in Moscow said they expected the Soviet government to move quickly to supply the South Vietnamese Communists in a move to blunt Chinese influence in the area.

Neues Deutschland, the East German Communist Party newspaper reported from Saigon that the Danang harbor was reopened April 24.

Tass also reported that the new government's newspaper; Saigon Liberation, said that North Vietnamese and Vietcong forces killed or wounded more than 400,000 troops of the Saigon government in the final days of the war.

The Los Angeles Times quoted an American official as saying that 15 tons of gold remained in the vaults of the central bank when South Vietnam surrendered. The official said some efforts had been made to fly the gold out during the U.S. evacuation of the city.

NEW YORK NEWS 6 May 1975 Pg. 8

Says Egypt Fortifies Suez' Eastern Bank

By JOSEPH FRIED
Staff Correspondent of The News

Jerusalem, May 5—Israeli Defense Minister Shimon Peres charged today that Egypt had laid the military groundwork for a crossing of the Suez Canal, like the one that triggered the 1973 Mideast war.

Peres also disclosed for the first time that a Soviet spy ship had been operating off the Israeli coast for the last five years, using electronic equipment to monitor activities within Israel.

Peres told the Kresset that the Soviet Union had not only resumed the flow of weapons to the Arabs, but had considerably increased the numbers of shipments, including ammunition and spare parts for Soviet-made weapons already in Egypt.

Specifically, Peres said, the Kremlin was supplying Egypt with MIG-23 warplanes, surface-to-air missiles and spare parts for tanks and planes.

He said that Egypt had completed laying the groundwork for fortifications on the east bank of the Suez, where they could deploy forces to cross into Sinai.

Peres said that Egypt had been working on the east bank of the canal since the January 1974 signing of the separation-of-forces agreement with Israel following the Yom Kippur War in October 1973.

Peres said the new fortifications included gun emplacements, bunkers and ditches.

"They've set the stage for another invasion should Egypt decide to go to war again," sources said here. "So far, it appears to be a contingency effort, but all that could change overnight if the Egyptians decide to move their troops and weapons across the canal."

Peres' disclosure coincided with reports here that Egypt might shift additional troops to the east bank of the canal on grounds that they are required to protect the canal after it reopens June 5.

Others Aid Egypt

Israeli Transport Minsiter Gad Yacobi warned today that any such troop movement would "sabotage" efforts toward achieving a Mideast settlement.

Peres also disclosed that both Algeria and Saudi Arabia had bolstered Egypt's arsenal since the October 1973 war.

He said that Algeria had bought Soviet tanks and turned them over to Egypt and that the Saudis had transferred some of the Mirage jets it bought from France.

Peres added that Egypt was trying to buy military equipment in Western Europe, including France and Britain.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Air Defense System

WASHINGTON POST 6 May 1975 Pg. 14

U.S. to Sell Arms to Jordan

By Murrey Marder
Washington Post Staff Writer

The United States has agreed to supply Jordan with an air-defense system including Hawk ground-to-air missiles, American officials said yesterday.

Confirmation that Jordan's King Hussein last week won a specific U.S. commitment for the air defenses he long has sought came in an unusual sequence yesterday.

Earlier, State Department spokesman Robert Anderson was asked if the United States still held to its position that there will be no new American arms commitment to Israel, or its Arab adversaries, during the current reassessment of Middle East policy. Anderson said that still is U.S. policy and he was "unaware of any commitments that were made to King Hussein" during his talks here last week.

Officials later disclosed the weapons arrangement with Jordan. To defend official credibility, they described this as confirmation of an earlier intention, rather than a new commitment.

Hussein has cited Jordan's lack of air defense as the reason why Jordan participated only symbolically in the October, 1973, Arab-Israeli war.

U.S. officials said an American survey team was sent to Jordan and Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger last February told Hussein that the United States intended to supply the air-defense system. An official said "final agreement" was "reached on details" last week.

Components of the system, including Hawk missiles and antiaircraft guns, will not begin reaching Jordan until the fall, it was said.

Jordan is reported to have argued that if it did not get the air-defense system from the United States, it would have to go, through Syria, to the Soviet Union for arms help.

Before Hussein's visit to Washington, a report circulated that Syria and Jordan agreed to a joint military command, which would have access to Soviet weapons. U.S. officials expressed disbelief over the report and Hussein denied it in a television interview here on Sunday.

To counter charges of discrimination against Israel, U.S. officials emphasized that Israel continues to receive deliveries of American weapons from previous commitments. This includes, one source said, "quite a large number of tanks" in April.

Kissinger, in a "Today" show interview to be televised this morning (NBC, WRC), said President Ford had "set a tentative deadline" for the Mideast policy reassessment, but that was before Indochina events "took a great deal of our attention." It is "a mistake to believe that there will be some clear terminal date at which one can say from now on the assessment is completed," Kissinger said.

He said that "on the whole . . . the final decision will not be made until President Ford has had an opportunity to meet with the leaders of the countries principally concerned."

Referring to the advanced F-15 warplanes which Israel wants, Kissinger said such aircraft, "in any event, would not be delivered until the end of 1977, early 1978."

WASHINGTON POST 6 May 1975 Pg. C-1

Navy Move Plan Scored

By Harold J. Logan
Washington Post Staff Writer

Almost 700 persons indicated through speeches, signs and applause last night that they think the Navy's plan to shift its oceanographic office from Suitland to the Gulf Coast is ill-considered, politically motivated, and technically unwise.

The crown that overflowed the cafeteria at Suitland High School, where a public hearing was held on a Navy-prepared study of the environmental impact of the proposed move was made up of mostly middle class professional employees of the office who would be directly affected by its proposed relocation to Bay St. Louis, Miss.

Many of them indicated that they felt, as did oceanographer Lewis J. Franc, that politics, rather than Congress's stated effort to reduce the Navy's presence in the Washington area, is "what appears to be the primary driving force of relocating to the proposed site."

"The proponents (of the move) have argued again and again that it is not politically motivated; that it was only an accident that the loss of Congressman F. Edward Hebert's chair on the House Armed Services Committee concided with the sudden demise of Michoud, La., as a viable site for relocation."

The relocation of the facility, which employs 1,300 workers, is being pushed by Sen. John C. Stennis (D-Miss.), chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee and Sen. Russell B. Long (D-La.), chairman of the Finance Committee. One of the things at stake is the oceanographic offices' $25 million annual payroll.

Other testimony at the hearing focused on the almost 200 black persons who work at the office, and who are expected to oppose a move to the deep South.

Louise Driscoll, the deputy equal employment opportunity officer at the oceanographic office, said "EEO (equal employment opportunity) is hard enough right here. We don't need to go to Mississippi."

Mrs. Driscoll said she was one of several oceanographic office employees who visited the Bay St. Louis area and reported, "On the coast it's fine (for blacks), but don't go a mile inland. It is just like it was 100 years ago."

The environmental impact study that was the subject of the public hearing asserts that "potentially, as many as 80 to 90 per cent of the blacks may refuse transfer."

It also predicts that "relocation will likely cause a number of individuals to exercise their retirement options earlier than previously planned." The study says 268 oceanographic employees are eligible for part or full retirement.

The study contemplates that about 800 of the institute's 1,300 employees would make the move if it is approved by the Navy.

It predicts that the influx of oceanographic office employees would seriously strain the housing and public school capacities of the Bay St. Louis area.

The study predicts no serious negative impact of the move on the natural environment of Bay St. Louis.

Only one person testified in favor of the move. Mrs. William King spoke highly of the fishing, golf, and other recreational benefits of the Gulf area, and said its sunset "has been compared to those on the Riviera." She said the educational and cultural opportunities in the area 55 miles northeast of New Orleans are good.

CHICAGO TRIBUNE
6 May 1975 Pg. 13

U. S. takes 'wait, see' Viet stance

WASHINGTON [AP]—Secretary of State Henry Kissinger says the United States will watch the actions of the new Communist regime in Saigon before deciding whether to recognize it diplomatically.

"We now have to see what the conduct of this government is internationally and partially domestically," Kissinger said in an interview with Barbara Walters Monday on NBC's Today show.

"For example, we know that in Cambodia very tragic and inhuman and impoverished things are going on," Kissinger said. "We don't regret not having recognized Cambodia immediately."

Kissinger also said he doubts that Hanoi would have staged its successful military drive on Saigon if Watergate had not sapped Presidential power and Congress had not passed the war powers act.

"IN JANUARY '73 we did not foresee that Watergate would sap the executive authority of the United States to such a degree that flexibility of executive action inherently would be circumscribed," Kissinger said.

"We did not foresee that the Congress would pass a law which prohibited us from enforcing the Paris agreement and while we probably might have done nothing anyway, it makes a lot of difference for Hanoi whether it thinks the United States probably will not or whether it thinks that we certainly cannot," Kissinger said.

"I do not believe that Hanoi would have sent 19 of its 20 divisions south if these two things hadn't happened," he added.

THE SECRETARY also defended the Ford administration's refusal to reveal the contents of a January, 1973, letter in which former President Nixon promised Thieu the United States would use full force to punish any violations of the Paris peace agreement.

"If we begin revealing the contents of letters, simply because a senator, on top of it a Presidential candidate, but quite apart from this, a senator alleges that there is something in these letters, then Presidential correspondence will lose its private character," Kissinger said.

Sen. Henry M. Jackson [D., Wash.] had demanded that the administration reveal the contents of any secret commitments Nixon made to Thieu.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

EDITORIALS

CHICAGO TRIBUNE
6 MAY 1975

Our best military customers

For a time, $722 million was a familiar figure. It was the amount that President Ford on April 10 asked Congress to appropriate promptly for military aid to South Viet Nam. About the same time, Sen. Gaylord Nelson widely distributed a list of military sales to foreign countries in the current fiscal year thru March 26 [almost nine months]. The list was prepared by the Defense Security Assistance Agency. It is of interest to note that cash sales to each of three countries so far in fiscal 1975 exceeded $722 million. These countries and the amounts of their military purchases are: Iran, $1.9 billion; Saudi Arabia, $1.1. billion; and Israel, $806 million.

There is a big drop to fourth place, Kuwait, $332 million, and another drop to a clump of three, West Germany, South Korea, and Greece. China [Taiwan], Turkey, and Italy round out the top 10.

Tho $722 million is a large sum, $1.9 billion is much larger. It is more than a little startling to realize that arms sales to Iran, a country not very high in the awareness of most Americans, are large enough to bring that many petrodollars back to this country in nine months. It is surprising, too, to find military sales to Saudi Arabia running appreciably ahead of sales to Israel. And it is a corrective to the popular preoccupation with Europe [when we think of foreign affairs at all] to note that less than 8 per cent of the dollar volume of military sales to our 10 best customers goes to Europe. The other 92 per cent goes to Asia, most of it to western Asia—Iran, Saudi Arabia, Israel, Kuwait, and Turkey. And only a geographical technicality prevents adding Greece to that list.

Southeast Asia's prominence in the news should not obscure the fact that western Asia, alias the Near East, is a most explosive part of the world. In a paradoxical way, the fact that the United States is supplying both Saudi Arabia and Israel, both Greece and Turkey, both Iran and [in nonstrategic goods] the Soviet Union, may discourage massive detonation of the arsenals in that part of the world.

U. S. NEWS & WORLD REPORT
12 MAY 1975 (6)

★ ★ ★

The coming debate on funding for the controversial B-1 bomber is viewed on Capitol Hill as the main event in this year's congressional struggle over military spending. "It's going to be a now-or-never situation for the B-1," says one House strategist.

★ ★ ★

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR - 6 MAY 1975

Nuclear club: members only

How do the members of an elite and powerful club make everybody else happy not to join it?

This is a basic question posed to the countries already possessing nuclear weapons as Geneva talks begin in a renewed effort to prevent the potentially catastrophic spread of such weapons. How to deter the increasing number of countries developing a-capability to "go nuclear" if they choose?

The answers lie in reducing the apparent advantages of belonging to the nuclear weapons club — and reducing the disadvantages of staying out of it.

Specific means to these ends are being discussed in the conference to review the 1970 nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) which began in Geneva yesterday. Though public interest has not exactly been galvanized by the treaty with the jaw-breaking name, progress at the conference is vitally important if the lid is to be kept on what has so often been called the Pandora's box of nuclear proliferation.

The good news is that there is hope for such progress on the basis of new cooperative efforts by the United States and the Soviet Union. These are signaled by the joint release of policy reports on the subject by a panel of Americans and a panel of Russians under the auspices of the respective United Nations Associations of the two countries.

There are differences along with much fundamental agreement. Particularly significant is an increased Soviet disposition to talk "seriously" about pressing ahead with carrying out the terms of the NPT, according to Prof. Lincoln Bloomfield of the Center of International Studies at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, a panel member who met with the Russians in Moscow in March.

India's explosion of a nuclear device appeared to be one spur to the Soviet concern about further nuclear spread. With Israel, Brazil, and South Korea among several other nations discussed as potential nuclear powers, the whole world should share an urgency to answer that question of why any nonnuclear country should resist going nuclear.

The UN Association panel reports suggest various means of encouraging abstinence. For example:

• Internationally safeguarded help from the nuclear countries to the nonnuclear countries, including the use of peaceful nuclear explosions. This could remove pressure from countries to develop their own, perhaps less safe-guarded, efforts.

• Self-control by the nuclear countries in the development of weapons, while pursuing the NPT's provision for pushing toward a comprehensive test ban treaty. Salt II ought to be followed by a SALT III, suggests Professor Bloomfield, going beyond the limitation of strategic weapons to an actual cutting back on such weapons. Such steps could show the nuclear powers doing their part in reducing nuclear threat.

As the U.S. panel stated: "The most significant actions that the nuclear powers can take to discourage the spread of nuclear weapons will be major, prompt steps towards reducing their own nuclear capabilities. An international climate must be created in which the use of nuclear weapons in a military conflict is totally unacceptable and in which the political utility of possessing nuclear weapons steadily diminishes."

The steps are complicated, of course, so long as nuclear powers China and France remain outside the NPT. The review conference ought to work toward inducements to them to join in reducing arms. With all the danger of theft and misuse of spreading nuclear materials, the stricter safeguards recently proposed in a Vienna meeting of experts called by the International Atomic Energy Agency also need to be pursued.

The NPT review didn't make headlines yesterday. But its work is crucial to everybody's future.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR - 6 MAY 1975

Thailand and U.S. troops

Thailand is moving with characteristic alacrity to accommodate to the emerging communist dominance of Indo-China. The withdrawal over the next two months of another 7,500 American troops is a part of the process, begun long ago, of disengaging from the United States.

How far that process will be carried — some 19,500 U.S. troops will still remain — is not clear. Thailand's traditional, and shrewd, diplomacy has been to adjust to the realities of the moment in order to keep its independence. Hence Bangkok is trying hard not to offend the communists, which accounts too for its eagerness to be rid of the Cambodian refugees.

Treading the fine line between accommodation and independence will not be easy, especially in relations with Vietnam. Thailand also has a problem of communist insurgency, thought to be supported by the Chinese and North Vietnamese; serious battles took place only recently. The Thais may therefore wish to keep a certain American presence in their country.

One important factor in the equation is Peking. It is not known what the Chinese leaders really think, but comments made to foreign visitors suggest they look favorably on U.S. support for countries on the rim of Asia, including Thailand, in order to prevent Hanoi's domination of Indo-China and keep the Russians at bay. Peking would not, however, countenance the use of U.S. troops to fight domestic insurgencies.

Nor of course would the American Congress and public. Hence the question now is how American military power can best be used in Asia to keep the region stabilized and at the same time avoid local entanglements.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
16 APRIL 1975 (6 MAY)

It's Turkey's Move

One of the reasons given for Turkey's reluctance to compromise on the Cyprus issue was the unstable, interim status of the government in Ankara. Now, however, a new coalition has been formed by Premier Suleyman Demirel and it will be interesting to see if this results in making a small but meaningful compromise aimed at resuming the dialogue with Greece and the shipment of U.S. military aid to an important member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Compromise is possible by an announcement by Premier Demirel of intentions to resettle refugees uprooted as a result of Turkey's invasion of Cyprus and occupation of the northern one half of the island. It is possible by recognizing, at least in principle, the necessity of withdrawing the occupying forces and the desirability of unifying the island which would perhaps be given a federated status, but under a central government made up of Greek and Turkish Cypriots.

Without this sort of a compromise, Congress should reject pressure from the Ford Administration to lift the arms embargo from Turkey. Military aid would be resumed under a bill approved by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee by a nine-to-seven vote. We hope the Senate does not fall for the Administration's argument that NATO's eastern flank is being undermined by the embargo. The resumption of aid would further antagonize Greece and thus leave the eastern flank undermined. It would also make a mockery of U.S. laws which prohibit such military assistance to countries using U.S. arms to invade other countries.

The only way to restore NATO's health in the eastern Mediterranean is to settle the Cyprus issue and this requires certain compromises from a country whose invading forces are on foreign soil.

NEW YORK TIMES 6 MAY 1975

U.S. Foreign Policy: After Vietnam

To the Editor:

There are a number of points that deserve comment regarding Secretary of State Kissinger's recent observations about Vietnam.

First, it is not helpful to blame Congress for the debacle. Recent Congressional rejection of Administration requests for military aid contributed something to the decline in ARVN's will to resist. But after all, the main Washington decisions have been made by successive Administrations. Future problems press so hard upon us that this is not the time for a post mortem on Washington's role.

Secondly, the breathtaking collapse in Saigon surely results mainly from the internal inadequacies of the Saigon regime itself—its inability to inspire; its corrupt, incompetent military leadership; its rigid, unresponsive political structure. No amount of American aid could have made up for these chronic deficiencies as Saigon faced its Vietnamese enemies.

Thirdly, the collapse of Vietnam should have come as no surprise. This development has been expected in most of Southeast Asia ever since the cease-fire sprung American troops and established a complicated "political process" neither party seriously accepted. Most governments in Southeast Asia long ago prepared for the present contingency. The surprise is only that Saigon lasted so long and that the collapse, when it came, was so abrupt.

Fourthly, the Secretary is right that there will be "consequences" following on the abrupt American withdrawal, particularly in Thailand, Malaysia and South Korea. But it is not correct that statesmen in Western Europe and the Middle East, where our interests are so much more substantial and direct, will look on our withdrawal from Vietnam as a guide to our likely reactions to crises in their area. Their principal response is one of relief that now Washington is at last free to tackle more central issues.

There are humanitarian imperatives the President and Secretary rightly seek to cope with. These will require urgent actions by many concerned Americans, including the Congress.

Finally, now the President, the Secretary and the Congress must turn their serious and nonpolemic attention to the agenda of foreign-policy challenges before us. These include (1) the continuing risk of war in the Middle East; (2) the troubling ambiguities of "détente"; (3) the stalled progress in SALT; (4) American relations with Europe, Japan and the Asian giants of China and India, and (5) reshaping an economic order accommodating the many profound changes since Bretton Woods. These are of far greater urgency and consequence to our national interest than how or why our entanglement in Indochina came to such an end.

We now have an opportunity to revitalize that gift of innovative attacks on complex international problems which made American leadership of the postwar nineteen-forties and early nineteen-fifties so remarkable—and so widely welcomed.

(Prof.) HOWARD WRIGGINS
Director, Southern Asian Institute
Columbia University
New York, May 1, 1975

WASHINGTON STAR - 5 MAY 1975 (6)

Candor in Correspondence

The administration, we think, has been a good deal less than candid about the correspondence between former President Nixon and South Vietnamese President Nguyen Van Thieu previous to the signing of the Paris peace agreement in 1973. The private assurances given to Thieu, revealed in two letters made public here by a former cabinet minister in the Saigon government, go well beyond the promises admitted by the White House, that the United States would "react vigorously" in case of violations of the agreements by Hanoi.

As it turns out, the pledges were considerably more specific. In November of 1972, Thieu received from Nixon "my absolute assurance that if Hanoi fails to abide by the terms of this agreement it is my intention to take swift and severe retaliatory action. In January of the next year, a recalcitrant Thieu was offered "my assurance of continued assistance in the post-settlement period and that we will respond with full force should the settlement be violated by North Vietnam". It is quite understandable that the Saigon government should have taken these assurances as a promise that the United States would intervene, at least with massive air attacks, if the peace accords broke down.

Why is the Ford administration touchy about these communications between two former presidents? The presumption must be that they were made in good faith by Nixon. The reports that he had every intention of retaliating against massive North Vietnamese violations of the peace accords have not been denied. Nixon's sudden loss of authority as the result of his Watergate problems in the spring of 1973 is a quite logical explanation of why the projected air strikes on North Vietnamese military installations in South Vietnam were cancelled. It is true, of course, that private correspondence between heads of state are not normally made public. But in the present circumstances, with both president's out of office and one of the two governments no longer in existence, the argument of confidentiality carries little weight.

Nor do we believe that the Congress or the American people were deliberately deceived. In many public statements early in 1973, Nixon threatened retaliation against the North Vietnamese in terms very nearly as specific as those in his letters to Thieu. It was the circumstances that made these warnings, as they say, inoperative. As Nixon's authority crumbled under the weight of Watergate revelations, Congress passed specific legislation prohibiting the kind of relatiatory action that Nixon had pledged. After that, it is incredible that Thieu should have expected any American intervention, and in fact, there is sound evidence that he did not.

So why all the pussy-footing about the letters, which, in any case are already in the public domaine? The administrations's qualms in this matter simply feed charges from Senator Henry Jackson and others that it is once again covering up. President Ford, it seems to us, has nothing whatever to lose in making all of the correspondence public, and we urge him to do so forthwith.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II — Main Edition - 6 May 1975

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER - 6 MAY 1975

Consent is the foundation of foreign policy success

We aren't sure that there are any new lessons to learn from the Vietnam debacle, but there certainly is an old one. It is that no foreign policy of the U. S. government can be successful without the informed consent of the American people.

That may sound like a truism, but it seems necessary to state it because even the brilliant Secretary of State Henry Kissinger does not seem to have grasped it. In an interview yesterday on the NBC "Today" show, Mr. Kissinger reiterated a favorable theme. Reflecting on the debacle, he saw it stemming from the inability of the Executive Branch to conduct foreign policy as it saw fit.

"In January '73," he said, "we did not foresee that Watergate would sap the executive authority of the United States to such a degree that flexibility of executive action inherently would be circumscribed."

And he went on to say, "We did not foresee that the Congress would pass a law which prohibited us from enforcing the Paris agreement . . . I do not believe that Hanoi would have sent 19 of its 20 divisions south if these two things hadn't happened."

Looked at one way, this is a roundabout way of saying that Congress is to blame for America's failure to meet its commitments, but there are deeper implications as well.

Mr. Kissinger's approach rests on two untenable assumptions—that the Executive Branch, which is to say the President and himself, not necessarily in that order of importance, know the right course to follow in foreign affairs and that their action should not be "circumscribed" by public opinion.

One must grant, of course, that public opinion can be wrong. Still, it seems to us that when the people make erroneous judgments it is usually because they have not been given the facts on which to make right judgments.

And that is the history of our involvement in Southeast Asia—a history of an Executive Branch which, over the years, operated in secrecy and insisted on public acquiescence, not to say acclaim, without telling the public the truth. Many of the crimes of Watergate were themselves rooted in President Nixon's obsession with secrecy—the wiretapping of newsmen and officials on Mr. Kissinger's staff, for example, and the attempt, by a burglary, to "get something" on Dr. Daniel Ellsberg, who had revealed the secret study of the truth about our Vietnam involvement.

Secrecy breeds deceit, and deceit breeds distrust. The War Powers Act was not immaculately conceived. It was born of a congressional determination, reflecting public opinion, that never again would an Executive Branch deceive the American people into another shooting war.

That may be an inconvenience to the administration. The necessity of obtaining public consent to policy may also seem to be an inconvenience. Yet the very process of obtaining public consent can save policy-makers from their more egregious errors, for there is no better way of testing policy than to debate it openly. That, after all, is what democracy is all about.

What went wrong in Southeast Asia was not the inability of the Executive to pursue a policy but the policy itself, and if one lesson of America's defeat is that the Executive Branch can also be wrong, surely another is, as Averill Harriman put it, that "no foreign policy will stick unless the American people are behind it." And they cannot be expected to give any administration "flexibility" unless the administration gives them the facts.

NEW YORK TIMES - 6 MAY 1975

Choice for Portugal

Portugal's chances for peaceful progress toward political democracy, social reform and economic development now depend critically on the answer to one question:

What do the country's military rulers mean when they speak of "Portuguese socialism" as the goal of the revolution they launched with the overthrow of the fascist regime a year ago?

If they mean social democracy in the Western European mold—social reform, free speech and press, economic planning, state intervention or ownership in some sectors, private enterprise in others—they can be assured of a relatively smooth passage.

This pattern was supported by more than 63 per cent of the voters who marked their ballots for the Socialist and Popular Democratic parties in the election of a constituent assembly a few days ago. This direction would win immediate sympathy and support for Portugal from many European governments and presumably from the United States as well.

If, however, the military leaders are bent on pervasive Marxist socialism with no political democracy—the socialism clearly favored by one of the most orthodox Communist parties in the world, as well as by radical spokesmen for the Armed Forces Movement—Portugal faces a bleak future. The Portuguese will find they have exchanged a dictatorship of the right for one of the Marxist left.

To its credit, the Armed Forces Movement ignored Communist pleas for a delay and carried out a remarkably free election. The response—a 92 per cent turnout—was magnificent. But if the people demonstrated above all their desire to participate in the democratic process, they also indicated clearly the direction they wish to go. The Communists, far better organized at the outset than any other party and lavishly financed from abroad, got only 12.5 per cent of the votes. Only 7 per cent took the advice of some military leaders and cast blank ballots.

The wiser military chiefs surely realize that to ignore such decisive results will risk unrest and opposition to the legitimate goals of the 1974 revolution. But others behave as though the election had no significance whatever.

There can be no effective challenge to the authority of the Armed Forces Movement. All major parties have agreed, albeit under pressure, to a dominant military role in Portugal's political life for at least three years. But the hope must be that after the long night of fascism the military rulers will not substitute the ideas of a radical minority for the clearly expressed will of the people.

What those people were saying emphatically last week is that Portugal can have social reform, structural change and economic advance within a framework of democracy and a climate of freedom.

NEW YORK NEWS - 6 MAY 1975

THE AMERICAN WAY

The Ford administration will ask Congress for $507 million to pay the cost of bringing 125,000 Vietnamese refugees to this country and helping them to start new lives. That is in keeping with this nation's tradition of compassion and hospitality.

Honoring another cherished American principle, the refugees will be given a free choice whether to remain here, return home, or settle in another land. That, we hope, will still the vicious Communist lie that these people were "kidnaped" by the U.S.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

BOSTON GLOBE - 4 MAY 1975 (6)

Lessons from Vietnam

The greatest disaster in American foreign policy has ended at last. This country's intervention in Southeast Asia cost us more than 50,000 American lives and $150 billion in tax money. And, in the end, we got nothing for our effort but pain and humiliation.

If there is a single lesson in this terrible experience, it is that America's foreign policy has been isolated from the will of the people at home and has become increasingly out of touch with the ideals and aspirations of the people we aimed to help abroad — not just in Vietnam, but in places like Greece and Portugal, Chile and the Middle East.

In large part our deafness has stemmed from a dangerous overdependence by two Presidents on a single brilliant and tireless Secretary of State who was given free rein to promote what he saw as the best interests of the United States.

This has resulted in short-term gains without long-range solutions. It has made waste of a large and extremely capable State Department. And it has not only led to the neglect of areas beyond Dr. Kissinger's personal scrutiny but it has closed the Administration to valuable outside advice.

As Mary McGrory suggested last week, it was not until our young people "took up arms in the McCarthy campaign" and "evicted a President" that the ordinary citizen began to question our activities abroad. With the young people and their parents of the World War II generation in rout, grass roots resentment began to penetrate Congress.

American foreign policy has too often been regarded as the exclusive province of the President and his Secretary of State. Today Congress is taking an active interest in foreign policy. It should be a long time before any Administration is again allowed to lead the nation down the road of military intervention.

And, with the people still casting a suspicious eye on everything that happens in Washington, there is a fair chance that a consensus foreign policy can evolve.

It may be a dangerous process. The temper of the country is more isolationist than internationalist these days and, as James Q. Wilson points out in the Spring issue of "The Public Interest," there is a continuing decline in the people's trust in their government.

This could manifest itself in a Congress which substitutes obstruction for consideration and result in a foreign policy that is timid rather than cautious. Recent polls seem to suggest that the average citizen would just as soon forget Asia and the Asians and focus entirely on domestic matters.

But we cannot forget Asia — or Europe or Africa or Latin America or the Middle East. Americans must not give unwitting credence to the domino theory by reacting so strongly to the failure in Indochina that we abandon our commitments to the rest of the world rather than creatively modifying them. As President Kennedy once put it, "Domestic policy can defeat us; foreign policy will kill us."

Overall, our goal must be to get back to the point where the United States is respected for what it is, not for the power it wields.

What this country needs now is a new type of commitment. No longer can we rely on threats of arms and economic reprisal to get our way. In fact we should work to reduce the reliance on arms everywhere. And this process might well begin with a review of all of the 50 to 80 bilateral treaties now in existence that require the United States to use force on behalf of a perceived ally, regardless of our lasting national interest.

Our new commitment should be based on openness and on respect for the rights and interests of other nations as well as our own. Economic, technical and humanitarian aid should be based on mutual interest but they should not be used to curry favor with one people while letting another people become our enemy.

It will not be easy to change a foreign policy which has undergone little modification since the days of John Foster Dulles' brinksmanship. But change it we must, if we are to survive in a changing world.

BALTIMORE NEWS AMERICAN - 1 MAY 1975 (6)

The Taste Of Ashes

So it has ended at last, this Vietnamese war of more than 30 years, and perhaps the strongest first reaction was a sense of numbed surprise that the end came so quickly in the final cataclysm.

It is literally difficult to grasp that it really is all over, that unconditional surrender was given by the Saigon government to its Communist invaders, that it would do so with such meekness after so much suffering by its people over so many years.

The brutal fact is that Saigon was beaten and had absolutely no hope of victory left. In the face of forces armed by unlimited supplies from the Soviet Union and Red China, South Vietnam was doomed when the 74th Congress withheld similar aid from the United States.

It is unfair to blame Congress. Its members are elected to represent the views of the American public. And that public — in no uncertain terms—had signalled the hell with Vietnam and any further involvement in that country's troubles.

You have to face it. Following a generation of trying to help the south, a collapse of American will occurred when we got our own fighting men out of there through the Paris "peace" accords. The war had cost us over 50,000 dead, 300,000 wounded, some $140 billion and all kinds of damaging domestic divisions. Enough was enough.

Along with Saigon's surrender, a tragic chapter in this country's history thus has ended. Because of our failure to carry through in support of South Vietnam, a new and uncertain chapter in our future remains to be written.

The outlook is not encouraging, but the taste of ashes from our Vietnam defeat need not be as important as it may seem.

We can recapture lost credibility with our allies by keeping ourselves militarily strong — and henceforth living up to commitments made with the same kind of selective care taken by pragmatic bosses of the Communist world.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

FEATURES COLUMNISTS

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR - 6 MAY 1975

CIA view proved right Last days of Saigon:

By Daniel Southerland
Staff correspondent of
The Christian Science Monitor

Hong Kong

Graham Martin, the U.S. Ambassador to South Vietnam, is the target of much criticism for the hasty and disorderly way in which the last Americans and some of their Vietnamese friends were evacuated from Saigon.

But as time moves on, the critics are likely to focus increasingly on the more weighty issue of Mr. Martin's entire Vietnam policy and what embassy insiders began to describe openly in recent days as the Ambassador's "illusions" and "overoptimism."

Prominent among those insiders were Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) officials, who were painting a gloomier picture of Saigon's prospects for survival several weeks ago than Mr. Martin was.

Even well after the fall of the city of Da Nang at the end of March, the Ambassador persisted, according to embassy officials, in thinking that Saigon could hold the line at some point on the military front. The CIA, on the other hand, was convinced soon after the fall of Da Nang that the war was lost.

Last-ditch hopes held

With much of the country in Communist hands, Mr. Martin argued that the Communists actually held little more than "deficit," or nonproductive, areas, and that Saigon still had a hope of defending the more productive areas.

According to well-placed embassy sources, the CIA at that point saw the need to encourage the establishment of a new and more conciliatory leadership in Saigon. But Mr. Martin and some of his subordinates were advocating the formation of a "fighting cabinet" in Saigon under President Nguyen Van Thieu.

As it was, the "fighting cabinet" was ineffective, the CIA's pessimism over Saigon's prospects for survival seemed justified by further government retreats, and the CIA station chief in Saigon apparently had some success in helping persuade Mr. Martin that President Thieu's leadership was a liability.

It may remain one of those "ifs" of history, but some CIA officials are convinced that if Mr. Martin had foreseen more clearly the defeats that lay ahead of Saigon, he and Washington might have been able to move quickly enough to set up conditions for at least a gradual, phased Communist take-over, and a more graceful American exit, instead of the outright military take-over that eventually occurred.

Saigon bickered to the end

By the time Mr. Thieu resigned in late April and Saigon did shift to a negotiating posture, there was still much bickering among the Saigon politicians as to how power should be transferred from the old Thieu regime to a new "peace government."

The Communists began hardening their public position on negotiations, and, after halting major attacks for four or five days,

See CIA VIEW, Pg. 2-F

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER - 6 MAY 1975

Thais Want U. S. to Go, Not Afraid of Dominoes

By JAMES McCARTNEY
Inquirer Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon announced a 28 percent slash in U. S. troop strength in Thailand yesterday, raising new fears about tumbling "dominoes" in Southeast Asia.

The announcement, made jointly with the Thai government, cut authorized troop levels from 27,000 to 19,500 by the end of June. The announcement did not say how many of the 350 U. S. military planes remaining from the armada that bombed Cambodia and North and South Vietnam would be allowed to remain.

The new figure represented a sharp increase in the speed of U. S. troop withdrawals from Thailand, on the Indochina frontier, and could signal the beginning of the end of a U. S. military presence in Thailand.

The announcement, forced by Thai officials who have publicly demanded a total U. S. troop withdrawal by next March, could hardly have come at a more awkward time for the United States.

It came only a week after a total U. S. pullout from nearby South Vietnam, at a time when President Ford, Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger and other top officials have been attempting to reassure the world that U. S. commitments remain unaltered.

Thailand has long been considered the next major country that might be threatened with a Communist take-over, if the Communists won in Indochina, as they have now. It has been considered the next potential threatened "domino" in the much-discussed "domino theory."

But officials here do not believe that Thailand is under immediate military threat from Communists in Indochina. Instead, pressure on the United States to withdraw troops is coming from a shaky conservative government, under domestic political pressure to get rid of unpopular foreigners and pursue a more neutral policy.

In the classic "domino" theory, as first explained by President Dwight D. Eisenhower, the United States was supposed to give military assistance to threatened "dominoes." Now the Thais are not asking for U. S. help — they are asking the United States to leave.

The United States first sent major

See THAIS, Pg. 2-F

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
6 MAY 1975

U.S. looks beyond Vietnam

By Dana Adams Schmidt
Staff correspondent of
The Christian Science Monitor

Washington

The shape of U.S. foreign policy in the Far East — how will it emerge after the Vietnam experience?

U.S. leaders are groping for new plans for American influence and power — where to use it and to what ends.

The effort might be described as one intended to stop the trend that set in with Vietnam, to limit the damage, and make sure that other American commitments remain firm; to avoid future overcommitment without lapsing into isolation.

The President, who intends increasingly to take key policy decisions into his own hands, has made a commitment to maintain American strength. And Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger has talked about making a stand on a chain including Taiwan, Japan, and South Korea.

Now Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger and his Undersecretary for Political Affairs Joseph J. Sisco offer new insights into what they feel should lie ahead for the United States.

Dr. Kissinger in an appearance on the NBC "Today" show asserted that the major objectives of the United States "dictated by our history" remain unaffected.

"They are more difficult as a result of our setback, but we can master them and we will master them," he said. Recalling that "almost every great initiative in the postwar period has either been initiated by America or has been carried out with our strong support," he declared that "if we want to avoid a world of chaos, if we want to achieve a world of progress, the American role is absolutely imperative."

The problem, he said, "is to gear American commitments to American capabilities."

A major step toward cutting back on these commitments, meanwhile, was indicated by agreement between the United States and Thailand to reduce the American presence

See BEYOND VIETNAM, Pg. 2-F

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER
6 MAY 1975

The war machine: expensive

By WILLIAM VANCE
Inquirer Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — Throughout the war years we have been counseled by officialdom to look at the bright side and rejoice in the economic wonders wrought by high defense spending.

The multi-billion dollar defense budgets, we were led to believe, had a happy and healthy spinoff in terms of new jobs rippling through the economy.

Well, would you believe that those $80 billion military budgets actually were creating unemployment instead?

Would you believe that between 1968 and 1972, Pennsylvania and New Jersey were being robbed of an average 180,000 jobs a year because of the "negative impact" of defense spending.

That, at least, is the premise of an intriguing study that has just arrived here from the Public Interest Research Group in Michigan (PIRGIM).

The report relies heavily on the research and methodology employed by Yale Professor Bruce Russett, who analyzed 30 years of military spending for a book on the burdens of national defense.

Russett found that, yes, military spending does have a stimulative effect on some specific localities. But nationally, when spending on military goods goes up, spending on consumer-oriented items—clothing, food, cars, houses and the like — goes down.

For example, $1 billion spent on the military means $187 million will not be spent on civilian services, $163 million will not be spent on durable goods and $114 million will not be spent on housing, the analysis showed.

The study shows that military spending creates fewer jobs per billion dollars than any other government spending except the space program.

The real stunner here is in the translation to lost jobs.

Pennsylvania suffered the fifth worst negative employment impact in the nation, the study shows, with 127,000 "foregone" jobs, on an annual average, from 1968 to 1972. New Jersey was eighth with a minus 53,000 jobs, and Delaware was 24th with a minus 1,000.

In the five hardest-hit states — New York, Illinois, Michigan, Ohio and Pennsylvania — the number of jobs foregone because of high Pentagon budgets "averaged 85 percent of their total unemployment for 1968-72," the study says.

In all, 26 states lost jobs because of high military spending, including every major industrial state except Texas and California.

And despite defense-related job gains in the other states, the bottom line in PIRGIM'S analysis shows a net loss of 844,000 jobs for the U.S. as a whole.

THAIS -- CONTINUED

combat units to Thailand in 1962 and began a major buildup of air power for the Vietnam war on Thai bases in 1964.

U. S. troop strength reached a peak of 48,000 in 1969, under former President Richard M. Nixon. Major withdrawals began after the signing of the Vietnam peace accords in 1973.

U. S. officials apparently would like to maintain about 10,000 U. S. troops in Thailand, but the Thais apparently are under heavy pressure from student groups and others to force the United States out.

Thais also would like to improve relations with North Vietnam, now that North Vietnam has established itself as the dominant power in Indochina.

Thailand is not part of Indochina. The term refers to countries that were colonized by France, now known as Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia. Thailand is one of the few nations in the area that was never a colony for anyone. It maintained itself as a buffer state between British and French colonial interests in the area, often playing one great power off against another, with some success.

It is still a largely undeveloped country, operating under a so-called "constitutional" monarchy. People still fall on their knees before the king.

Only last week, Thailand's foreign minister angrily denounced the United States as a country without morals and vowed to expel U. S. servicemen within a year.

The foreign minister Chartichai Choonhavan, responded to remarks made in Washington by Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger, about a U. S. "obligation of a moral nature" to defend Thailand.

"Moral?" asked Choonhavan. "The United States does not have any morals at this point. They have already pulled out from Cambodia and South Vietnam, so we are going to have to depend on ourselves."

While State Department officials do not talk in terms of "moral" obligations to Thailand, they point out that the United States has had a mutual defense treaty with Thailand and other so-called "SEATO" countries in Asia since 1954.

The treaty requires that the United States come to the aid of Thailand in the event of "common danger" in "accordance with its constitutional processes."

In 1962, Secretary of State Dean Rusk embellished this obligation by stating publicly that the United States accepted a responsibility for defending Thailand regardless of what other SEATO nations might do.

Another matter causing tension between the U. S. and Thailand involves disposition of about 125 U. S.-built aircraft flown to U. S. bases in Thailand by fleeing South Vietnamese airmen.

The United States insists that it has title to the planes. Some Thai officials favor returning the planes to the new Communist government in South Vietnam. U. S. officials say the matter will be "negotiated." The Communists insist that they own the planes.

The Pentagon reported yesterday that it already had started to remove some of the planes, according to the Associated Press. A spokesman said the larger C-130s were being flown out and smaller aircraft such as helicopters were being loaded onto the carrier USS Midway off the Thai port of Sattahip.

CIA VIEW -- CONTINUED

they grew impatient and began pressing again militarily. The demoralized Saigon Army crumbled rapidly in the face of more concerted thrusts. And as senior Saigon Army officers began sending their families out of the country and then fleeing for their own lives, the smell of victory apparently became overpowering for the Communists. There was little left for them to do but walk into Saigon.

By late Monday, April 28, Ambassador Martin still thought the Communists probably would go through the motions of negotiating a final settlement that would amount to little more than a disguised surrender for Saigon but would permit the presence of a reduced U.S. Embassy staff in South Vietnam.

This view still prevailed at an embassy meeting that ended around 2 a.m. Tuesday. But by late that morning the risk that the Communists might soon overrun the city became apparent to all and the final evacuation was ordered.

Evacuation started late

Mr. Martin earlier had feared moving toward a complete evacuation of Americans, because he thought that it would amount to "pushing the panic button," and would undermine any further "will to resist" on the part of Saigon. A staged evacuation had been going on for weeks, but it had been orchestrated to give the impression that not all the Americans were leaving.

One mistake, in the view of many critics, was not to have evacuated earlier, along with their families, more of the Vietnamese who had worked for the Americans. But Ambassador Martin had thought he had more time to get them out. As it was, an undetermined number of these Vietnamese were left behind.

The irony was that some of the Vietnamese the Americans considered the most "deserving" were left behind, while quite a few corrupt officials and military officers, as well as bar girls and prostitutes, got out on the basis of personal friendships with Americans and hastily contrived "marriages."

About 180 Vietnamese, comprising employees of the U.S. Information Service (USIS) and their families, had gathered at the USIS offices in Saigon Tuesday to be taken to the airport. When buses for the airport began to load, people from the streets poured onto them, the employees were pinned inside the USIS compound, and left behind.

BEYOND VIETNAM -- CONTINUED

there by one-fourth, from 25,000 to 19,500. Some 350 aircraft, which once spearheaded American bombing of North Vietnam and Cambodia, are expected to be reduced proportionately

The reduction is a first step toward total withdrawal with 12 months demanded by the Thai Government.

That will leave the main American military presence in the form of the Seventh Fleet with its five aircraft carriers, about 40,000 men in South Korea, and a Marine division on Guam. The Philippines has asked for renegotiation of U.S. air and naval bases, Indonesia's anti-communist regime has shown signs of nervousness, and Japan is seeking to draw tighter the strands of the United States mutual defense commitment.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

U.S. NEWS & WORLD REPORT 12 MAY 1975 (6)

WHAT'S WRONG WITH THE MARINES?

There's unrest in the ranks, key weapons are short, career leathernecks are fed up. It's enough to raise fresh worries about the Corps' future.

Signs that the U.S. Marine Corps is fading as the nation's elite fighting force is a matter of deepening concern in Washington—and in the Corps itself.

The quality of the men who serve is a matter of widening debate. Desertions and court-martial convictions are climbing. Crime inside the barracks is rampant. Many career Marines are fed up and are getting out.

Key equipment is in short supply. Marines still lack the latest antitank missiles, though they already are being made available to Mideast nations. The Corps' own tank forces are approaching obsolescence.

Marine generals are wracked with dissension over the future of their service. A bitter fight over selection of a new Commandant was dampened only by President Ford's earlier-than-usual nomination April 30 of Lt. Gen. Louis H. Wilson Jr., to become the top Marine.

Lean and hard, or—? The Marines' top leadership agrees that the service has problems brought on by post-Vietnam stresses. But it maintains that corrections are under way and that the Corps is lean, hard and ready to meet any crisis. A growing number of Marine officers disagree.

Talks with high-level Marines both at headquarters and in the field as well as with other defense officials reflect the widespread alarm.

A chief concern is evidence that the quality of the men in the Corps has been sliding.

In an effort to reduce on-base thefts and fights, for instance, staff noncommissioned officers have returned to living in barracks as policemen, according to Marine officers.

A senior colonel relates that on Okinawa, "We have two fully armed sentries on duty at all armories at all times. Who are they protecting the armories against? Our own men."

"Disorder squads." The Marines on Okinawa, the colonel continues, were forced to form "disorder squads," which come on duty at 4 p.m. daily, equipped with night sticks, body armor and face protectors.

Figures provided by the Marines and the Department of Defense show this about changes in the Marines since the Corps quit drafting men in 1972:

- The Marine desertion rate per 1,000 men is more than double that of the Army—89 to 41. In 1971, rates were nearly reversed—Army, 73; Marines, 56.
- The U.S. Army is nearly four times the size of the 196,000-man Corps, yet 1,328 Marines were convicted of major crimes in federal and State courts in 1974, only slightly fewer than the 1,697 convictions of soldiers.
- On a percentage basis, the Marines led all the services in 1974 in issuing bad-conduct, undesirable and dishonorable discharges. This has been generally true since 1970. In previous years back to 1950, less-than-honorable discharges were about the same for the Marines and Army, with the Marines often showing fewer. In mitigation of these figures, Pentagon officials point out that the other services are more prone to release men who will accept discharges in lieu of a trial.
- At two Marine installations with a total Marine population of 43,931—Camp Lejeune, N.C., and Camp Pendleton, Calif.—court-martial convictions for felonies jumped from 91 during 1972 to 184 in 1974.

Public complaints. So troublesome have discipline and other personnel matters become that some Marines have begun complaining publicly.

Said former 1st Lt. David E. Kelly, who once served on Okinawa, in a recent magazine article that received wide attention: The Marine Corps has "antiquated equipment, living conditions far below those of the other services, poor training facilities and lack of discipline." He added:

"Too many of the quality Marines get out."

Over all, the Marines report few difficulties in meeting their goals in numbers of recruits. Men completing their first tour of duty are re-enlisting at a rate of 19 per cent, 7 percentage points higher than in 1972.

However, re-enlistment among career Marines is off, a fact that worries many officers. What's more, Marine officials have expressed concern over having to dip deeper into groups of men who have been high-school dropouts, in order to meet enlistment quotas.

No magic number? Several generals told U.S. News & World Report in private that they fear the Corps has become hypnotized by numbers at the expense of quality—that there is no magic in 196,000 Marines, the number supposedly needed to maintain three divisions and three air wings as required by law. Perhaps, they said, the solution lies in letting manpower levels drop to where the Corps winds up with only 150,000 "really good men."

Racial integration poses problems, too. Though only 20 per cent of the Corps is black, the combat and combat-support groups are 38 per cent black. Headquarters explains that blacks are generally less well educated and thus do not qualify for many specialist ratings.

Black-white relations have taken a turn for the better recently, with the introduction of compulsory race-relations studies. Clashes based on race have been halved in the past two years.

Equipment shortages. As if personnel problems were not enough, there are equipment shortages.

For one: Wire-guided TOW antitank missiles and shoulder-fired Dragon missiles are in the Army's inventory—and even those of some Middle Eastern nations. But the Marines have none. They still depend on recoilless rifles, their own tanks and air support to defeat enemy armor. Latest antiaircraft weapons, such as those used in the 1973 Israeli-Arab war, are making the air-support operation costly, however.

Modern tanks are in short supply. The Marines are authorized 408 M-60 tanks, which are heavily armored and mount a 105-mm gun. By the end of June, the Marines hope to have 120—which looks unlikely since they have only about 60 on hand and production lines are slow.

As the backbone of their armored forces, the Marines have 431 M-48 tanks with 90-mm guns.

Such tanks "are not considered viable battlefield opponents for Soviet tanks," states an Army report.

The Marines have two antiaircraft-missile battalions, but only one is equipped with the faster, more-accurate and improved Hawk missile, designed to hit low-flying planes.

In aircraft, the Marines are well supplied by their standards with fighter-bombers, such as the F-4 Phantom, and ground-attack planes—the A-4 Skyhawk and the A-6 Intruder. The marines are also up to strength in helicopters and in amphibious-landing vehicles.

Even if the Marines had the most advanced equipment available, they would have difficulty getting where they wanted to go.

Fewer transports. The Navy, which had 157 amphibious-warfare ships in 1968, now has only 66, scattered from Okinawa to the Mediterranean Sea.

There are some estimates that to assemble the ships, embark an assault force of 25,000 Marines and transport them to a distant point—say the Persian Gulf—would take at least 45 days.

It is a decision to buy an advanced weapon that has touched off one of the Corps' hottest disputes.

A number of generals are angered by a move to acquire four squadrons—48 planes—of Navy F-14 Tomcat fighters, costing 18 million dollars each.

The F-14, built by Grumman Aerospace Corporation, is an extremely fast and agile interceptor designed to shoot down enemy planes at great distances from aircraft carriers. It now is being modified to carry air-to-ground weapons although, as a manufacturer's representative noted, it would not have the accuracy of much cheaper planes.

The generals are questioning the wisdom of sending an aircraft with an 18-million-dollar price tag to do a job that is done better by one that costs less than 4

(See MARINES, Pg 4-F)

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON STAR 5 MAY 1975 (6)

The Credibility of U.S. Commitments

CROSBY NOYES

The question before the world in the wake of the debacle in Vietnam is the credibility of the American commitments. And for just about everyone, friend and foe alike, it is a very important question indeed.

There are three major elements involved. The first is how our adversaries — notably the Soviet Union and the People's Republic of China — view our performance in Vietnam.

The second is how those who depend on American power for their security view it. And finally, there is the question of how we view it ourselves.

So far as our adversaries are concerned, there probably is less to worry about, in the view of many diplomatic experts, than with the other two groups. The Chinese and Russians being somewhat cautious types, no very sweeping conclusions are likely to be drawn about Vietnam.

To be sure, the Americans intervened in the war and their allies were ultimately defeated. On the other hand, neither the Russians nor the Chinese intervened, except with military and economic aid, even when their allies were most hard-pressed.

The Russians, for their part, allowed the Arab armies to be defeated in 1967, without seriously impairing their credibility in Eastern Europe.

The general guess is that our adversaries will be cautious in pressing their luck. They may even be somewhat concerned that the United States could overreact to a new challenge in order to re-establish its credibility as a world power.

The attitude of our friends and allies obviously is ambiguous.

They are making the calculation that our real national interests were not involved in Vietnam and (hopefully) that they are involved in Western Europe, Japan, Israel and other areas.

The most confident are those with whom we have formal security commitments, such as NATO and the Japanese-American mutual security treaty. The least confident are those nations who rely on American power (like, say, Yugoslavia) but with whom we have no formal commitments of any kind.

Other countries with whom we have commitments, like Thailand or Taiwan, or even an American military presence, as in South Korea and the Philippines, are betraying a growing anxiety as the result of the outcome in Vietnam.

For them, the really critical question is how the American public itself will react to the defeat. And they suspect that they have something to worry about.

I can hardly blame them. They, like everyone else, have access to polls which show that the majority of Americans would intervene militarily to protect no foreign country in the world except Canada (which also happens to be one of the least-threatened areas in the world).

They, too, can read the endless pronouncements of our most eminent political leaders about the "lessons of Vietnam," the mistake that will never be repeated, the myth of American power, and so on.

To them, it adds up to a powerful new mood of isolationism in this country that leaves them feeling suddenly and uncomfortably naked. And that also is understandable.

MARINES -- CONTINUED

million.

Atop all this, the Corps' leaders are in turmoil over its future mission.

This furor burst out in the form of a bitter struggle over the successor to Gen. Robert E. Cushman, Jr., as Commandant later this year.

Inside war. "Old breed" Marines with 20 to 30 years of service said the infighting was the fiercest in their memory, fragmenting the upper echelons of the Corps.

Selection of General Wilson to take over as the next Commandant is expected to calm, though not necessarily end, the differences.

"We can live with him," said one general who has been critical of present leadership.

Many Marine generals considered the selection of the new Commandant more important at this time than in any other period since the 1930s when the Corps pioneered in amphibious assault. The reason lies in the fact that the new chief will play a major role in charting the course of the Corps for four years during a period of transition.

Since the Boxer Rebellion and U.S. intervention in China at the turn of the twentieth century, the Marines have been oriented toward operations in the Pacific Ocean basin and, closer to home, the Caribbean area.

An about-face. Now the Marines are beginning to look across the Atlantic, convinced that the nation is turning its back on most of Asia for the foreseeable future.

Many Marines believe their new areas of interest will stretch from Norway through Central Europe to the Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf—from the Arctic to the deserts.

> These are all high-risk areas in which heavy loss of men and material is a very real possibility if fighting comes about. It will be the new Commandant who will lay down guidelines for combat doctrine there, thus affecting training, as well as type and quality of material.

Despite the headaches facing the Corps, General Cushman believes the Marines are still the crack force they are designed to be.

Liking for violence. The Commandant told U.S. News & World Report he thought the personnel problems are being tackled properly; that most recruits who complete training go on to become good Marines.

The general noted that the Corps is "afflicted with all the ills that plague big cities."

He added that the Marines "no longer get the big strapping farm boys" but the ones who are street wise.

They come, the general felt, with problems of drugs, racial prejudice and "a greater propensity to violence."

One general, rated as a possible future Commandant, said: "Stability is a matter of great importance. When you have high-quality men, all the other problems take care of themselves—drugs, discipline, race and crime. . . .

"We need to reinvigorate ourselves. Overriding all else is something not really quantifiable, but it is a fact. That fact is that we can develop men who will go into battle and win—or they will die in the attempt."

The foregoing was reported by Bem Price of this magazine's staff, himself a Marine for 12 years.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

U.S. NEWS & WORLD REPORT 12 MAY 1975 (6)

THE CASE FOR MORE NUCLEAR CARRIERS

By Adm. Hyman G. Rickover, Authority on Atomic Warships

The Navy on May 3 commissioned the U.S.S. Nimitz, our second nuclear-powered aircraft carrier and our seventh nuclear-powered surface warship.

The Nimitz has a length of 1,092 feet, a flight-deck width of over 250 feet, and a combat-load displacement of nearly 95,000 tons, and can operate and provide sustained support for a naval air wing of about 100 aircraft. Her initial nuclear cores will provide her with enough fuel to carry out operations for the next 13 years, thus making her truly independent of propulsion-fuel logistic support. These cores contain energy equivalent to over 2 million tons of coal or 11 million barrels of oil—enough oil to fill a train of tank cars stretching from Washington to Boston.

Freedom from oil. The Nimitz marks the renaissance of a modern nuclear-powered surface Navy. Nuclear power in surface warships gives them the ability to operate continuously at high speed; this affords them protection not available to nonnuclear ships. This could mean the difference between victory and defeat in battle. As the number of our advance bases decreases and the size of the fleet continues to shrink, the need for ships independent of the logistic umbilical cord for oil will continue to increase.

Next to providing the major deterrent to all-out nuclear war, I believe that the most important mission of our Navy is to insure that our first-line naval striking forces can carry out their mission against threats potential enemies are presently developing. A significant portion of our major surface warships must be nuclear-powered or we may end up without a credible deterrent to aggressions which do not warrant escalation to a nuclear war.

For the foreseeable future, the aircraft carrier will be the principal offensive striking arm of the Navy in a nonnuclear war. No other weapon system under development can replace the long-range, sustained, concentrated firepower of the carrier air wing. Nuclear submarines and nuclear surface ships with antiair and antisubmarine capabilities are all needed to supplement and augment the capabilities of the nuclear carrier.

The U.S. Navy currently has 14 active aircraft carriers: the Enterprise, eight oil-fired Forrestal-class, large-deck carriers built in the 1950s and 1960s; three post World War II Midway-class carriers, and two World War II Essex-class carriers, the Oriskany and the Hancock. This is about half the 24 carriers the U.S. Navy had at the beginning of the Vietnam War.

It will be necessary to start building replacements for the eight Forrestal-class carriers soon just to sustain a 12-carrier force. With the declining number of overseas U.S. bases and the decreasing number of carriers, it is important that the new carriers we build be as capable as possible. The Nimitz and her sister ships are such carriers.

Our carriers are vulnerable to attack by Soviet sea-based cruise missiles—as are all surface ships. However, the first line of defense our surface ships have against such missiles and their launching platforms is carrier-based aircraft. Without carriers and their aircraft, other surface warships, replenishment ships and amphibious forces would be all much more vulnerable.

The nuclear-carrier task force with its capability of unlimited operation at high speed is the most powerful, least vulnerable surface-ship force in the history of naval warfare.

Some have objected to nuclear warships on the basis of higher initial-investment cost. In this regard, it should be borne in mind that the initial cost of conventional ships does not include the cost of oil. Recently, oil costs have risen dramatically.

It costs more than $25 a barrel to buy, store and deliver oil to Navy ships. At that rate, it would cost about 270 million dollars to provide the amount of oil for a conventionally powered carrier equivalent to the nuclear fuel in the Nimitz. That is almost three times the comparable cost of nuclear fuel for this type ship.

Nuclear ships are often compared in cost with cheaper conventional ships of much less military capability, the argument being that we should build more of the cheaper conventional ships rather than fewer of the nuclear ships. Yet study after study has shown that when all costs are considered, nuclear warships cost little more than conventional warships having the same weapons systems—and the nuclear warships are far superior militarily.

Further, the cost of war itself far exceeds any cost needed to be prepared to prevent a war. The best warships we can build are those which are never used in combat because they have served to prevent war.

At stake: "our survival." With the heavy military and nonmilitary demands on its budget, the United States must only spend where it is necessary and where the value received is clear. But the real value of having a Navy capable of countering the Soviet threat cannot be measured in dollars alone; our survival may also depend on it.

The Soviets recognize the importance of becoming the world's strongest sea power. We have now chosen not to challenge them with numbers of ships. For this reason, it is essential that the ships we do build are the most powerful and effective weapons we know how to build. This means nuclear propulsion for major warships. The penalty for any other approach is the steady erosion of our conventional military forces, with the consequent reduction in our influence and in our "options" in world affairs.

The alternative is to rely for our security on nuclear weapons. Their use could mark the supreme failure of mankind.

DEFENSE SPACE BUSINESS DAILY 5 MAY 1975 (6)

TUNNEY URGES SUPPORT FOR B-1. Sen. John Tunney (D-Calif.) has called on the Senate Armed Services Committee to provide the full funding requested for the B-1 bomber, asserting that the B-1 is necessary "to maintain the strategic arms balance and to demonstrate our willingness to support our commitments abroad by bolstering our defense at home."

He said that the B-1, which is an indispensable part of America's strategic deterrent, will provide the U. S. with "bargaining power" to encourage detente.

"It is important to demonstrate to the Soviets, the Chinese and whoever else might doubt the fiber of our determination that this country has not abandoned its role of world leadership and its dedication to a stable balance."

Tunney cited the major strategic advances made in recent years by the Soviets, including development of four new missile systems and a potentially strategic bomber (Backfire), and discounted the "many myths" brought up about the reliability, cost-effectiveness and usefulness of the B-1. "Study after study has demonstrated those concerns are unfounded," he said.

In addition to its strategic value, the senator reminded the committee, the B-1 will provide 41,300 jobs directly and another 62,000 indirectly to California, whose economy has been sagging. (see page 20, for Rep. Les Aspin's charges against the B-1 program)

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II--Main Edition--6 May 1975

DEFENSE SPACE BUSINESS DAILY 5 May 1975 (6)

ASPIN SAYS AIR FORCE HIDES B-1 COST OVERRUNS

Pentagon Denies Charges

Declaring that: "Whether to continue the B-1 program or not is one of the major issues facing the Congress in consideration of this year's defense budget," Rep. Les Aspin (D-Wis.) says the Air Force B-1 bomber has incurred "a cost overrun" of $225 million in its research program.

He cited a special General Accounting Office report which also said that General Electric, producer of the aircraft's engines, is expected to have "a cost overrun" of $75 million to $100 million.

Aspin has also charged that the Air Force "has attempted to gloss over cost increases" on the B-1 by "claiming the increases are caused by inflation and delays in the program." He noted that the Pentagon "blamed" economic escalation, schedule delays, estimated changes, and the inclusion of component improvement costs for the $1.9 billion cost increase during the final quarter of 1974.

A Pentagon official said the Air Force has not attempted to play down the cost increases in the B-1 program and has admitted before Congress that there has been cost growth in the program. It was pointed out that Air Force Secretary John McLucas recently told Congress that the Air Force expected a cost growth of 10-12 percent in the B-1 program, not including inflation.

As the official explained it, "if the Pentagon and the rest of the nation cannot keep up with inflation, how can the contractor keep up?"

Aspin was referring to the most recent Selected Acquisition Reports summary for Dec. 31, which the Pentagon released in March, which explained there had been an increase of $1.939 billion in the cost of the B-1 reflected during the final quarter of the year (Defense/Space Daily, March 26). Although Aspin does not break this cost increase down, the Pentagon reported in March that $1.007 billion was due to inflation, $375 million for increased lead time requirements and procurement schedule impact resulting from delayed start; $407 million for estimating changes, and $143 million for component improvement costs.

The Wisconsin congressman, frequent Pentagon critic, says the Air Force "has never publicly acknowledged there are direct cost overruns on various contracts." He said the "cost overruns are the direct result of mismanagement" on the part of General Electric and Rockwell International.

Aspin said the GAO report also states that "no minimum performance requirements" have been established for the B-1 -- "there is no way for Congress to know if the B-1 degrades below an acceptable performance."

GAO said there have been reductions in the supersonic and subsonic ranges, and an increase of about 5000 pounds in gross takeoff weight, with the current estimated gross takeoff weight 395,000 pounds-- "the maximum load the landing gear can tolerate."

Another charge made by the GAO is that the number of technical changes made in the B-1 that will be incorporated in the actual production "may be so significant that the test results will not be meaningful" or representative of the production aircraft.

The Air Force has admitted that it has had to reduce the speed capabilities of the B-1 as the aircraft has developed, but has emphasized that these reductions "did not degrade the capability of the B-1 to complete its mission."

It was explained that the gross weight of the B-1 was increased from the 360,000 pounds for the original vehicle to a planned 395,000 pounds, but the landing gear system has been redesigned to accommodate this increase. As for design changes, these are said to be less than 10 percent, "and not significant."

WASHINGTON POST 6 May 1975 Pg. B-11

The Federal Diary

By Mike Causey

* * *

Naval Oceanographic Office: Another hammer-lock has been placed on the Navy which is trying to move its Suitland-based unit to the Mississippi Gulf Coast.

The House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee has agreed to oversight hearings (via its Oceanography Subcommittee) into the move, which has been pushed by the powerful Mississippi-Louisiana congressional delegations. Washington area members of Congress got a boost two weeks ago when Sens. Warren Magnuson and Henry M. Jackson, both Democrats of Washington state, said they wanted the Suitland outfit to stay where it is.

The Navy has been looking, for many years, for a new locale that would please the politicians who control its budget as well as a succession of admirals who prefer sunny climates. When the Bay St. Louis, Miss., site was proposed by Armed Services Chairmen Sen. John Stennis and Rep. F. Edward Hebert (then House Committee chairman), it seemed to fit Navy's requirements perfectly.

It is rare that Navy has a chance of making three powerful legislators (Sen. Russell Long of the Appropriations Committee likes the idea, too) happy, at the "minimal" cost of disrupting the lives of only a few thousand employees and their families. So Navy studies were made and each concluded that the move should be made.

Rep. Marjorie Holt (R-Md.) has been punching the Navy goliath all along. She is the one responsible for getting a General Accounting Office probe of the move, and the upcoming hearings. She hopes the subcommittee (first meeting is May 21) will tell the Navy to delay any decision on the move until the GAO study is in. That is likely to be the end of September, and could knock Navy's secret timetable which calls for a go-decision within the next few weeks, so that the first workers can be transferred and in place by August. * * *

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON REPORT - APRIL 1975(6 MAY)

Is It Safe to Be an Ally of America?

Early this month I had lunch with Tran Kim Phuong, Saigon's Ambassador to the United States. The morning news had featured the fall of several leading cities in South Vietnam. The reports had told of the armies of South Vietnam in desperate retreat, as they sought to find positions where they might be able to use their ever-decreasing supplies of arms to greater advantage against the armies of the north.

As you might imagine, Ambassador Phuong was very discouraged. He found it almost impossible to believe the turn of events. As we talked, he sought a tactful way to express his disappointment at the decision of our Congress to abandon his country to the communist enemy. It was beyond his comprehension -- as it is beyond mine. With deep emotion, he spoke of the sacrifices in blood and resources his countrymen had made to defend themselves and to preserve their right to choose their own form of government. He recalled the clear and unmistakable pledge of our national leaders to supply his people with the military weapons necessary to defend themselves in order to get their approval of the inequitable Paris agreement negotiated by the U.S. and imposed on South Vietnam.

And he spoke, as best he could, about the terrible slaughter which was already taking place as the communist conquerors took over the land. In particular, he stressed that the first group of people being rounded up were those who had worked directly with the Americans -- from the chauffeurs to government officials.

After lunch, I found myself mulling over his remarks and thinking back to a preceding week when Tran Van Lam, the president of the South Vietnamese Senate, had come to the United States to try to tell our officials and the American people what lay ahead for South Vietnam if it did not receive the promised military aid from the U.S. [See WR 75-3 for report of press luncheon cosponsored by ASC and the Vietnamese-American Council for the Honorable Tran Van Lam.] On several occasions, U.S. Senators had left Mr. Lam and several of his colleagues from the South Vietnamese Senate cooling their heels in the anterooms for inexcusable periods of time. On one occasion, a senior U.S. Senator finally stormed out of his door after a long delay and shouted at the South Vietnamese group that he planned to vote against further aid and that he did not want to hear their side of the issue.

I also found myself reflecting on the many arguments being used to justify cutting off aid to South Vietnam. I was most offended by the argument that the South Vietnamese army did not have the courage to stand and fight. I was especially struck by the fact that the Members of our Congress making this charge were the same who were choking off the supplies essential to that army's survival. I could not help wondering how much courage those Members would have displayed if they had been faced by a horde of tanks and rocket launchers while all they had were a few bullets for their rifles -- and no hope for new supplies.

It Was Predictable

On our Washington Report radio program, General John E. Murray, top U.S. military representative in South Vietnam in 1973 and 1974 and one of America's foremost diplomatic authorities on Indo-China, recently conceded that Congress's refusal to provide the one-for-one replacement of arms and equipment provided by the Paris Peace Agreement led directly to the weakening and collapse of Saigon's morale. The North Vietnamese were badly beaten in 1972, General Murray noted, but we have thrown away all this and surrendered by default. What could have been a shining example of freedom in Southeast Asia has turned to ashes, and we cannot escape our role in it at all.

As General Murray said to our radio audience, "The tragedy was entirely predictable. It was predicted and was reported. My remarks have appeared in the press. My official reports have been passed through the Pentagon. Congressmen that I talked to would be upset about the situation. But it was like dropping a rose petal down the Grand Canyon and waiting for the echo. Nothing happened. Now everyone seems to be surprised.

"The Vietnamese were on a starvation diet. We cut their ammunition more than half, we cut their fuel back 85%, we stopped giving them combat rations, even their medical supplies were shorted. Batteries for communications -- things they needed to move, shoot and communicate -- they simply did not have. Their GI's, for example, used to have ten grenades pinned on them when they went into battle in the Delta. Now they were only permitted two and effectively that is only one, because they always keep one as a last resort. This end is, as I say, entirely predictable."

Our Vital Interests

The other argument that came to mind was the one that America's vital interests are not involved in Vietnam. This is the key argument. It has strong popular appeal. Saigon is a long way from Washington. But a moment of serious thought will show that the argument is supported by geography, not political reality. It is precisely this argument, however, which must be answered. If the answer is "yes," then there is some justification for our policy of abandoning Vietnam. If the answer is "no," then we are not only aiding and abetting in a tragedy of mammoth proportions, we are being foolish as well.

Recently I was talking with a distinguished U.S. diplomat regarding the far-reaching implications of our policies in Vietnam. He gave me some insight into their effects in the Middle East and Western Europe. He noted Dr. Kissinger's remarkably candid explanation of his recent failure to arrange a peace between Egypt and Israel. The solution Dr. Kissinger had proposed called for an Israeli withdrawal from much of the Sinai desert coupled to a pledge of support by the U.S. in the event that Egypt's minimum declaration of non-belligerency proved to be temporary. But, Dr. Kissinger admitted, Israel did not see a pledge by the United States as enough, in light of our failure to support our ally, South Vietnam.

In regard to Western Europe, he told me of a telephone conversation the day before with a colleague of his who was representing the United States at a major capital in Europe. His friend had relayed the amazement of the NATO diplomatic corps at the reaction of both the Congress and the Chief Executive to the events in Vietnam. The leading political figures in Western Europe, he reported, simply could not understand how the Chief Executive could enjoy a golfing vacation and the Congress an Easter recess while a country the United States had pledged to support was being destroyed by an invader. The political leaders of Europe were astounded that the President had not rushed back to Washington and convened the Congress in an emergency session.

In light of the makeup of the Congress these days, the President's request for $722 million in military and humanitarian aid was quite bold. But in view of the circumstances in Vietnam and throughout the world, his request was totally inadequate.

See IS IT SAFE?, Pg. 8-F

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Hanoi Thanks Americans Who Helped

There is also no question that communist leaders had gotten the message -- and a long time ago. The telegram from Dinh Ba Thi of North Vietnam, which caused the furor at the Academy Awards ceremony by expressing gratitude to those Americans who had contributed to the communist success in "liberating" South Vietnam, certainly indicated that the communists understood the realities -- including the fact that the Americans who had participated in producing and distributing the propaganda film "Hearts and Minds" had served the communist cause well.

One of the difficulties with Vietnam is that it has caused many Americans to focus on an immediate event and lose valuable perspective. From time to time, we need to drop back in time and broaden our view. As a starting point, it would be wise for us to remind ourselves that 20th century technology has compressed the globe, forced interdependence on independent states, and made all the nations of the earth neighbors -- for better or for worse. This condition means that every nation can be infected by a disease anywhere in the world body politic. All systems are interconnected. An anti-freedom malignancy anywhere will eventually affect us here.

National Self-Determination

In the interest of a politically healthy and stable world order, the United States has long advocated the self-determination of nations. First expressed by President Wilson at the conclusion of World War I, the principle holds that each nation has the right as an aspect of its sovereignty to select its own form of government. Wilson called for the creation of the League of Nations primarily as a means of providing for collective action against any aggressor nation which sought to impose its form of government on any other nation by force of arms.

In one sense, World War II was fought to reestablish the principle of self-determination. And it was the Soviet breach of that principle in Eastern Europe which started the Cold War.

In pursuit of the right of self-determination, the United States committed its military forces to combat in Korea -- far from America's shores -- because our leaders knew that if we failed to halt aggression there, we would legitimatize it by acquiescence. That is, we knew that if we did not act to stop aggression by North Korea, we would signal acceptance of it. In the instance of Korea, we participated with other allies under the flag of the United Nations.

In the case of Vietnam, we acted unilaterally to defend South Vietnam against military attack and to prevent North Vietnam from imposing on the South an unwanted political regime. Former Secretary of State Dean Rusk said it simply one time: "The trouble with North Vietnam is that it will not let its neighbors alone."

The Policy of Gradualism

Because our purpose in entering the war in Vietnam was not to destroy North Vietnam but to preserve South Vietnam's right of self-determination, we acted on the battlefield with great restraint. The official word was "gradualism." While we fought essentially a holding action, we urged North Vietnam to cooperate with us in a political solution to the problems of Indo-China, one which would in no way challenge the existence of North Vietnam -- even its preeminence -- but would respect the sovereignty of South Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia.

In the early years of the war, before the Soviets supplied North Vietnam with anti-aircraft missiles (SAMs) and supersonic interceptors, we could have physically destroyed North Vietnam in a few weeks with a fraction of our force of tactical and strategic aircraft using conventional bombs. But instead, we employed our sea and land based airpower against easily repaired supply routes -- primarily the Ho Chi Minh trail -- following a policy of tactical interdiction. And we used our considerable seapower in largely unproductive patrols along the coast of North Vietnam.

Some people have made the mistake of assuming that because our airpower did not destroy North Vietnam, it was incapable of doing so. In August 1967 the Senate Armed Services Committee released a study showing that only two percent of the targets for our bombers in North Vietnam recommended to the White House by the Joint Chiefs of Staff were approved. Instead of the JCS-recommended targets, others were substituted by a team of "experts" in the White House -- targets which had very little military significance -- "gradualism" targets.

I recall a story to illustrate this point which goes back to an early period in the war. The story was relayed by an Air Force friend. It appears that the Air Force recommended and the JCS approved as targets three airfields, all fairly close to Hanoi. They were: the main commercial field for Hanoi, a training base that had just received a new supply of Soviet MIG fighters, and a new airfield still under construction. The one the White House approved was the airfield under construction. And, one should remember, that target would have been among the two percent counted by the Senate Committee. You can imagine how unimportant militarily some of the targets must have been that were substituted by the White House selection team.

Never a Civil War

What makes our policies in Vietnam so incredible is that the war there was actually fought within the larger framework of the balance of power between the communist and free worlds. The war in Vietnam was never a civil war, in our eyes or in the eyes of Moscow and Peking. In their eyes, the war in Vientam was the test case for their new concept of "Wars of National Liberation." To us, the war was originally intended to signal to world communist leaders that we could not accept the right of communists to impose their form of government on a non-communist nation by military force.

In short, the location of the war was never a determining factor in its importance. To return to the figure of speech about disease in the world body politic, the aggression in Vietnam was simply the place where the political malignancy was erupting.

Our failure to fight in Vietnam in such a way as to destroy the malignancy means now that other outbreaks will surely take place elsewhere in the course of time. And everywhere the political health of the free world has been undermined.

A Policy of Phased Surrender

As Sir Robert Thompson, one of Britain's leading experts on Southeast Asia and guerrilla warfare, observed: "We are all becoming dominoes. The American retreat before Moscow, like that of Napoleon, is beginning to litter the route with corpses."

Sir Robert's graphic statement raises the question again which has troubled me for years, that our actions in Vietnam and elsewhere in the world have added up to a policy of phased surrender. I remember the blunt declaration by Dr. Slobodan M. Draskovich, a Serbian

See IS IT SAFE?, Pg. 9-F

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Joseph Kraft

WASHINGTON POST - 6 MAY 1975

Letting Go of the Vietnam Issue

A puzzle tinges the overwhelmingly hostile reaction of ordinary Americans to the Vietnamese refugees. The puzzle is why so many intelligent and well-educated Americans find the reaction puzzling. For the whole history of the war testifies that most Americans don't care beans about Vietnam.

Not because of what are called "racist" reasons. On the contrary, the true background lies in the strong, autonomous inner beat of American life.

The attention of 200 million throbbing operators is not readily gained by remote people in faraway places. Europe matters to the United States because so many Americans have roots there. Russia and China count because of sheer size and the impact of Titanic revolutions. So do the Japanese because of a sneaking suspicion they know how to build better mousetraps.

But Vietnam? New York, Chicago and San Francisco combined probably have fewer Vietnamese restaurants than Paris. The main point of perhaps the best American book on Vietnam—"Fire in the Lake" by Frances FitzGerald—is that Americans aren't into Vietnamese customs or culture. Even Miss FitzGerald had to rely on a French authority—Paul Mus—for her insights into the Vietnamese character.

American indifference to Vietnam shaped the two central features of the war—its massive and enduring character. In the early 1960s a group which I have called the "piano-wire hawks" argued that the Vietnam war—which they wanted to win—could only be won by following the lead of the insurgents. They felt the United States had to adopt guerrilla tactics—knife in the teeth and piano wire in the hand.

But that argument was always a non-starter. The American army and the American people were not about to change themselves into Vietnamese. So this country fought the war—as it was bound to fight the war—with planes and tanks and aircraft carriers and big battalions.

Connected reasons explain why the fighting went on so long. As early as the 1966 elections, I believe, and certainly by 1968, the majority of Americans were fed up with pouring out blood and taxes in Vietnam. If allowed to proceed unhampered by outside events, the Vietnamization program pushed by Defense Secretary Melvin Laird would probably have seen the United States out of the war long before 1973.

What got in the way was the anti-war movement—or at least that element of it which used Vietnam as a stick to beat the United States. Ordinary people may have had it with the war. But they didn't think the United States was a rotten country. They weren't that much down on the President, the military, the party system, the concept of loyalty and other features of American life which the war critics brought under fire.

So President Nixon was able to rally what he called the "silent majority." The antiwar movement was more than canceled. The war went on and on and on, even though hardly anybody wanted it.

The underlying reality, however, was that hardly anybody wanted it. The country, long sick of Vietnam, got sicker and sicker as events ground to their inevitable end.

So now more than ever the country wants to wash its hands of Vietnam. Hence the hostility to the refugees. It may not be a generous attitude. But it is not puzzling. It is natural and logical. Even healthy.

For the basic fact is that the Vietnam experience is not powerfully relevant to the present problems of the United States. Our difficulties did not lie in an all-powerful executive or an unruly military or an uncontrolled intelligence community—least of all in an imperial-minded people.

To harp on these matters is another form of the self-delusion expressed in the constant replaying of Watergate and the Kennedy assassination. It is a way of not facing up to the prime present problem—the unglamorous and morally neutral problem of making the domestic and world economy work.

Everybody knows the trouble laid up by the true believers who refuse to abandon the Vietnam war. Worse I think will ensue if the war critics prove as unwilling to let go of the Vietnam issue.

© 1975, Field Enterprises, Inc.

IS IT SAFE? -- CONTINUED

scholar of communism, who wrote in his book, Will America Surrender?, "Our policy of no-victory in Vietnam and our recent advances to China and Russia have made it unmistakably clear that the U.S. is pursuing a policy of historical surrender to communism." He explained, "There is no other name for a policy which rejects U.S. national interests as its permanent basis, and shuns the idea of asserting U.S. rights and will in the world as a danger to peace. . . . Only surrender and suicide can designate a policy which rejects and penalizes U.S. friends and allies, and helps and supports U.S. enemies in the world."

There is still another aspect about Vietnam which has received little attention. We are now in the act of acquiescing in a breach of an international agreement by a minor communist nation – not an agreement between a communist nation and some other free world nation – but one involving the United States of America. We negotiated and signed the Paris Peace Accord. And we are allowing North Vietnam to breach that Accord with impunity. The massive invasion of South Vietnam was a tearing up of that Accord and a direct challenge to the U.S.! We have not only failed to respond militarily. We have also failed to act diplomatically. Neither the U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. nor the Secretary of State has demanded that the U.N. impose sanctions against North Vietnam for its direct challenge to peace and to the sanctity of international agreements. Our President failed to ask the Congress for the right to use military power, if necessary, to force North Vietnam to comply with the terms of the Agreement. (Nor did he ask for further assistance to Cambodia.)

From the Far East, a valued friend of the U.S., President Ferdinand Marcos of the Philippines, declared recently that Congress's refusal to extend additional aid to our Indochina allies suggests strongly that the United States no longer considers Southeast Asia vital to its interests. Philippine authorities are now looking carefully at our bilateral defense pact and at our military base agreements to see whether they were mutually beneficial.

If our national leaders did not understand the importance and the implications of the tragedy in Vietnam, the policy-makers in the Middle East, Far East, and Western Europe certainly had no difficulty.

Our failure to take action against North Vietnam is especially significant to our allies around the world. Ambassador Phuong made the point clearly in a television interview recently when he said: ". . . the United States has not lived up to the Paris ceasefire agreement and the world probably would conclude that it is safer to be an ally of the Communists than the Americans."

If it can be argued that we do not have the military strength to follow any other policy than that of acquiescence in Cambodia and Vietnam, then we must ask, Why do we not have the sufficient strength?

If we are going to allow North Vietnam to breach the Paris Peace Accord, then why should Moscow not feel free to violate the SALT Agreements?

The clear answer to whether or not the communists can be trusted to keep other Detente agreements, such as the SALT Agreements, can be found in Vietnam!

The only remaining question is: what can we still do to prevent the tragic effects of our naivete in believing that the communists want a true Detente from being felt in our own land?

I am asking our National Strategy Committee to review our crumbling and discredited foreign policy and to make recommendations as to what must be done.

In the meantime, please note the recent assessment by the Foreign Policy Task Force of the Liberal Coalition for a Democratic Majority which is excerpted in the pages following.

John M. Fisher
President
American Security Council

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK TIMES 6 MAY 1975

Feuds and Bad Planning In Saigon Exit Recalled

By FOX BUTTERFIELD

Special to The New York Times

MANILA, May 5 — Although more than 100,000 Vietnamese successfully escaped from Saigon, the evacuation was marred by what diplomats and newsmen now recall as bad planning, bitter feuding between sections of the United States Mission and often an every-man-for-himself attitude.

As a result, many key Vietnamese officials and others who had long worked for the Americans were left behind. Many fearing reprisals from the Communists.

Moreover, the selection of those to be evacuated often seemed arbitrary. Dozens of prostitutes, for example, were taken out by American contractors and officials who listed them as wives or fiancées. But the chief spokesman for the Saigon Government and his staff, who would be major Communist targets, were apparently not helped despite repeated pleas.

In addition, same officials in the United States Embassy and Consulate — partly because of panic and partly out of concern for their own Vietnamese staffs —are known to have deceived each other or failed to notify subordinates about the final evacuation on Tuesday, endangering many lives.

In the end, no American officials are known to have been left behind, and the loss of life in the evacuation was minimal.

But the series of mix-ups and the haggling that accompanied the final American exit angered many American officials, and on the evacuation ships that carried them here they talked of their bitterness toward Ambassador Graham A. Martin.

It was Ambassador Martin, they say, who by delaying evacuation until the last possible minute — to avoid throwing Saigon into chaos — was responsible for the failure to rescue many endangered Vietnamese.

Some officials go further, accusing Mr. Martin of having been so isolated inside his walled embassy that he was blind to the inevitability of the Communist victory. The Ambassador, an aloof, secretive man who strongly supported former President Nguyen Van Thieu, became ill with pneumonia in the last few days before Washington finally ordered him, last Tuesday, to "pull the plug."

Leaving Saigon among the last American evacuees, the Ambassador boarded the Seventh Fleet flagship, the carrier Blue Ridge, and—except for a chance encounter with a few newsmen — remained unavailable to the press. He could not be asked about criticisms of his role.

According to knowledgeable diplomatic informants, when some American officials began to push for evacuation planning after the loss of the northern two-thinds of the country in March, Mr. Martin's opposition delayed it.

As a consequence, some parts of the United States Mission— composed of the embassy, the Agency for International Development, the United States Information Service, the Defense Attaché's Office and the Central Intelligence Agency — privately began their own withdrawal scheme.

This worked best for those institutions with their own air transportation and money to bribe Vietnamese officials and guards — namely the Defense Attachés office and the C.I.A. But the embassy and the aid and information agencies, which did not have their own "assets," in the popular term, were much less successful in getting their staffs out.

General Is Dismissed

On April 12, with North Vietnamese troops beginning to tighten around Saigon, Brig. Gen. Richard M. Baughn, the senior Air Force officer in the Defense Attaché's Office, was abruptly dismissed and transferred out of Vietnam by Ambassador Martin. According to military sources, he had angered the Ambassador by beginning to fly Vietnamese employes in the office to the Philippines aboard Air Force planes.

It was not until April 20, after the siege of Xuan Loc had begun 40 miles northeast of Saigon that Ambassador Martin on orders from Washington assented to the first legal evacuation flights by Air Force C-141 planes.

Thereafter the evacuation was pushed hard, with the embassy pressing the Saigon Government to accelerate granting exit permits and special passes for Vietnamese dependents and employes of Americans. In some cases the embassy actually helped in secretly taking Vietnamese out of the country without officials permission.

But there appeared to be little coordination or careful planning to separate cases of Vietnamese seriously endangered from those who merely wanted to leave.

Thus, for instance, a Vietnamese who had worked 10 years for the C.I.A. in Pleiku in the Central Highlands, before it was abandoned to the Communists, discovered no one in the embassy would help him when he managed to flee to Saigon. All his friends from the agency had already been transferred out of Vietnam and there was no one who recognized him.

But by contrast, on Saturday, April 26, a blue compact car of the type used by the embassy pulled up in front of Annie's Bar on Tu Do Street and took away three bar girls carrying suitcases.

Perhaps the worst case of confusion involved the United States Consulate General in Can Tho, the center of Military Region IV in the Mekong delta.

Officials from the consulate say they were never given any notice at all to evacuate their Vietnamese personnel until 11:30 Tuesday morning, when they were suddenly ordered to withdraw only their remaining Americans. By that time, the last emergency evacuation had already begun in Saigon.

As a result, the Con Tho office acting on its own at the last minute was able to get out only 42 of 573 Vietnamese employes, and 312 of over 3,000 Vietnamese dependents.

One Can Tho official who made three special trips to Saigon to discuss evacuation was reportedly turned away with the answer that Ambassador Martin would not accept puling out the Vietnamese employes

Another Can Tho official who was dispatched to Saigon over the last weekend to try to press for help in evacuating Vietnamese staff, was in the office of Donald Anderson, the embassy administrative officer in charge of pulling out field staff, on Tuesday morning when the order for final evacuation was given.

"Anderson got up and left his office with some of his own Vietnamese without telling our men anything," recalled a furious Can Tho official. "He just went out to get on an airplane with his people, leaving our man sitting there."

The Can Tho consulate at its own initiative had prepared several evacuation plans, including its main one using four Air America helicopters stationed in Can Tho. However, at 8 A.M. on Tuesday the local C.I.A. officials asked to borrow the four Air America helicopters for their own personnel and flew off to Saigon without returning the aircraft.

DEFENSE SPACE BUSINESS DAILY 5 MAY 1975 (6)

BILL PROPOSES REVIEW OF DOD CIVILIAN MANPOWER CHANGES

A 25-member, high-level commission which would seek to mitigate the economic effects resulting from the cutback of Defense Department civilian personnel employed at various military bases would be established under legislation introduced by Sen. Hirman Fong (D-Hawaii.).

The proposed Advisory Commission on Future Civilian Manpower Requirements at U.S. Military Installations, which would include the secretary of defense, would not be authorized to prevent closing or cutbacks at military bases directed by DOD. However, it would be authorized to find out what military installations are to be eliminated or cut back and to recommend "new ways to effectively utilize the changed status of the affected bases." It would also be authorized to: 1) Study the trends regarding the use and employment of civilians at U.S. bases and implications for the future use of such manpower. 2) Determine and project the impact that the withdrawal of U.S. troops from overseas bases and the reduction of the armed forces will have on various states and communities. 3) Make recommendations for lessening the economic impact of base closing; channeling the skills of those laid off into new fields of employment; retaining those laid off; and notifying the state and local communities at the earliest possible date of layoff plans.

In addition to the secretary of defense, the commission would include the secretaries of commerce and labor, the director of OBM, the chairman of the Civil Service Commission, five governors, five mayors, five country officers and five nongovernmental leaders.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II -- Main Edition -- 6 May 1975

WASHINGTON POST 6 MAY 1975

Israel Expects New U.S. Effort on Mideast

By John M. Goshko
Washington Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM, May 5—Israeli observers are convinced that America, now relieved of its responsibilities in vietnam, will soon launch a more intensified effort to defuse the Arab-Israeli conflict.

President Ford and Secretary of State Henry A. kissinger will meet Egyptian President Anwar Sadat in Europe the first week of June, and Israeli Premier Yitzhak Rabin will be Mr. Ford's guest in Washington on June 11 and 12.

Relations between Israel and the United States have been strained since March,when Kissinger's shuttle-diplomacy effort to mediate a further interim agreement between Israel and Egypt on troop pullbacks in the Sinai Peninsula failed.

Kissinger and Mr. Ford let it be known that they placed the main responsibility for the breakdown of those talks on Israeli inflexibility, and they ordered a complete "reassessment" fo U.S. policy in the Middle East. Since then; the Ford administration has continued to show annoyance at what it characterizes as Israel's shortsightedness and failure to recognize its own long-term interests.

Among other things, Washington has suspended negotiatios on supplying new arms to Israel and leaked word that Israel's pending request for $2.5 billion in military and economic aid during the coming fiscal year will be cut back substatially.

All this has caused great dismay within Israel, which looks to the United States as the ultimate guarantor of its existence.

In recent interviews, High-ranking officials of Rabin's government have frequently used such phrases as "tragic" and "deeply regretable" to describe the rift with Washington.

These same officials expressed a deep conviction, however, that Washington's tendency to blame Israel for the failure of the Kissinger mission is unfair and unjustified They left little doubt that the Rabin government badly wants to patch up the quarrel, but they also stressed that Israel will not accept a rapprochement on terms that it ragards as dangerous to its security.

This stance appears to have the overwhelming support of Israeli public opinion. The U.S. policy reassessment, which is widely regarded here as a psychological pressure tactic, has helped to solidify this support and may have hardened the Israeli position.

One foreign diplomat assesses the mood in more ominous terms, saying, "The Israelis are getting close to the point of developing a Samson-in-the-temple complex."

Officials in Rabin's government say that, in retrospect, they can see several reasons for the Kissinger mission's failure, and Vietnam is one to which they assign considerable prominence. By a strange quirk of timing, the situation in South Vietnam and Cambodia began to deteriorate just as Kissinger came to the Middle East.

The collapse of the peace agreements that Kissinger had negotiated in Vietnam made the Israelis skittish about the kind of accord he wanted them to strike with Egyptian President Anwar Sadat. In the Israeli view, this would have obliged them to give up very specific military advantages in exchange for vague, ill-defined assurances that the Israelis feel had been given to South Vietnam and that subsequently proved meaningless.

At the same time, the Israelis charge, the knowledge that his Vietnam accords were failing had a distracting effect on Kissinger. The officials leave little doubt of their belief that Kissinger and Mr. Ford wanted a diplomatic success in the Middle East to help compensate for the defeat in Indochina, and when this success proved to be beyond their grasp, they reacted by indulging in a fit of pique against Israel.

But, the officials add, they think that Kissinger's efforts would have failed even without the distorting effect of events in southeast Asia. The March negotiations, they say, revealed, perhaps for the first time, that a big gap exists between Kissinger's and the Rabin government's perceptions of how to resolve the Middle East crisis.

In pursuing his step-by-step diplomacy, Kissinger appeared to be going on the assumption that the nature of the problem —working out an Israeli withdrawal from occupied Arab territory—requires that the major concessions be made by Israel. Kissinger was said to consider this as working to Israel's long-term advantage, because it would lead in the end to the general Middle Eastern peace settlement that the Israelis want.

The Israelis, however, as one official said, "believe that the process should not be step-by-step but step-for-step," in which every significant Israeli concession should be matched by an Arab concession of roughly comparable weight. This would guarantee that neither side gained too lop-sided an advantage in the interim stages enroute to a final peace settlement.

In the March negotiations, for example, the Israelis say that they were willing to meet Egypt's demands for withdrawal from the Abu Rudeis oilfields on the Gulf of Suez and the strategic Mitla and Gidi passes in the Eastern Sinai Peninsula, but, they felt that they were entitled, in exchange, to an unequivocably clear-cut statement of non-belligerence from Egypt.

The Israelis contend that Kissinger accepted the Egyptian position—return of the passes and oil fields for an ambiguously worded statement of Egyptian intent—as the goal of the negotiations.

"I don't even think it could he described as a genuine negotiation," one official who took part in the talks sav. "In our view, the Egyptians hardly moved at all over the entire course of the negotiations. If anyone was inflexible, it was Sadat. For our part, we gave be described as a genuine neconsiderable ground from our opening position. But we got nothing of a matching nature in return—only pressure to give still more."

"Even then," he continues, "we were willing to go on bargaining and talking. But when we made clear that Egypt would have to make a better offer if we were to meet their full demands, Sadat apparently lost his temper and Kissinger apparently lost heart. It was they who broke off the negotiations, not us."

The officials say that the Rabin government would still react the same way under similar circumstances. As to the quarrel with Washington, they say that Rabin has decided to avoid exacerbating the situation by engaging in recriminations, and to wait instead for "practical signs" such as a resumption of arms aid talks.

In the meantime, Israel has carried out, a quiet reassessment of its own, dispatching a small army of former Cabinet ministers and other prominent figures to the United States to explain Israel's position and to test American public and political opinion. As a result, the government now feels that Israel's standing with the U.S public and Congress remains high and that its problems are primarily with the Ford administration.

Even so, the officials add the government regards Mr Ford and Kissinger as "friends" and is hopeful that the dispute with them can be resolved amicably. Official circles have been encouraged by the fact that the signals coming out of Washington in recent days had a noticeably more upbeat tone. Earlier this week, for example,

DEFENSE SPACE BUSINESS DAILY 2 MAY 1975 (6)

SECURITY OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS IN EUROPE IMPROVED--DOD. The Defense Department reported to Congress last week that the security of U. S. nuclear weapons in Europe has been improved since a senatorial team found some nuclear munitions being stored under lax security in the basement of an administration building in Europe in 1973. The DOD statement came in response to the release of a report Wednesday discussing the 1973 inspection by the Senate team.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II -- Main Edition -- 6 May 1975

WALL STREET JOURNAL 6 MAY 1975

Sadat's Diplomatic Offensive

By Ray Vicker

CAIRO -- America should say clearly whether it wishes to guarantee Israel within its borders or to guarantee Israel's occupation of lands taken from Arabs.

That is the thesis President Mohamed Anwar el Sadat will be expounding to President Ford at their forthcoming meeting in Salzburg, Austria June 1 and 2. And the Egyptian president is pushing the same theme hard in a round of diplomacy which seeks to rally world opinion against continued occupation by Israel of Arab lands seized in the 1967 war between Arabs and Israelis.

Here in Egypt, where the emphasis seems to be upon rebuilding the country rather than on war, there is strong support for the diplomatic offensive unleashed by President Sadat. There is also an attitude of injured indignation. In government ministries, on the campus of Cairo University, in homes of Egyptians one is constantly lectured that it has been Egypt which is seeking a real peace in this part of the world, that it is Israel which has been dragging its feet through Secretary of State Henry Kissinger's aborted shuttle diplomacy.

"I don't understand what is the matter with America, why it doesn't see that we are holding out a hand of friendship. We want peace. We want to work with America. Yet the United States does not use its strength for achieving peace. It treats us like . . . like lepers," says Mohamed Kamel Anous, director general in the ministry of foreign trade.

And at Cairo University, Mahmoud Gamel, a 23-year-old economics major, contends: "It should be obvious by now to everybody that there can be no peace in the Middle East when so much of our land still is occupied by the Jews. Yet America seems unwilling to even admit that for eight years the Jews have been sitting in the Sinai, in the West Bank of Jordan and on the Golan Heights, pumping our oil from the Sinai, building settlements on Arab lands and ignoring United Nations resolutions which call for withdrawal."

Blunt Speaking

In one recent speech, President Sadat bluntly said: "I say to the United States that it is high time for the United States to adopt a well defined attitude to be clear-cut and black and white. Is the U.S. defending Israel within its borders or is it defending Israel's occupation of the land usurped from Arabs? This should be made clear in the reevaluation of U.S. policy."

(To many observers, however, the definition of "occupied territory" is not so clear-cut. Most Israelis remain deeply suspicious of the Egyptian call for return of the land occupied in 1967. They argue that Egypt couples this demand with a further call for "justice to the Palestinians," who were displaced in the 1948 fighting that gave birth to the State of Israel. This further demand, argue the Israelis, may well mean that Egypt still wants to dismember their country as it existed before 1967. Certainly many Arabs, and particularly the Palestinians, consider all of Israel to be "occupied Arab territory.")

Questions raised by the Egyptian diplomatic offensive are somewhat embarrassing to President Ford's administration. Up to now, the U.S. has avoided any clear-cut answer to some of those questions. By inference, there is the implication that the U.S. does not favor annexation by Israel of those subjected lands. But that hasn't been spelled out.

Israelis strongly contend that a readjustment of borders was necessary for its defense, which means that Israel would not return to the so-called "Green Line."

> Egypt's president is pressing the U.S. to define its own policies concerning Israeli "security" and if that fails, to bring the issue home to the American public.

This is the border which had pertained before the 1967 war. However, Israel has not defined what it considers to be a "defensible" border.

In 1973, in one interview in the lobby of the Tel Aviv Hilton Hotel, General Ariel Sharon blandly declared that the most defensible border with Egpyt from his standpoint was the Suez Canal. Two days later, the Yom Kippur war (known as the "Ramadan war" here) proved that the Suez Canal wasn't so defensible after all.

Nevertheless, if you talk to 10 Israelis, you probably will obtain 10 different descriptions of what constitutes "defensible borders." And none of them are likely to involve returning to the Green Line, as Arabs insist.

In this age of long distance rockets, of supersonic planes and of murderous weaponry, no borders are any longer defensible in the static manner which usually is meant when the term is used. Perhaps the best way to work for peace is not to seek "defensible" borders which might prove as illusory as the impregnability of Israel's Bar Lev Line along the Suez Canal, but to try to diffuse the animosities which are the basic cause of trouble in the Mideast.

Israel, however, has committed itself to the "defensible borders" concept. This favors delay and more delay in the surrender of any occupied territory since any retreat at all is likely to antagonize some segments of the Israeli population. And the present government in Israel is not strong enough to risk any splintering of its support.

In the face of delay, Arabs have three basic choices: To press a diplomatic offensive hoping to achieve aims peacefully, to launch another war, or to fall back to a no-war-no-peace situation which most likely would lead to a war of attrition and then to a full fledged, bloody war, anyway.

With oil money pouring into Arab lands, time no longer is on the side of Israel, something which still has not sunk into many minds in Israel. That belief, though, is becoming more widespread in Western Europe, in Japan and among many Americans who have had opportunities to travel through Arab countries recently.

Another war, today, would be far bloodier than any so far in this part of the world. And the odds probably would favor Israel as the "victor" on the battlefield, without its being able to score such a resounding success that it also could dictate the peace. Only once did that opportunity appear, in 1967. Israel didn't rise to the occasion with the generous peace offer which might have led to peace, and the opportunity was lost.

So now, at a time when the world does not like military occupations, Israel finds it necessary to justify an occupation which it obviously wishes would continue indefinitely. Alleged "security" thus becomes the basic argument for such a policy. From the Israeli standpoint, it is a good debating position, for emotions may be touched easily with it. Who within a country could be against "security," for instance? Who would make political hay by arguing against it?

President Sadat's diplomatic offensive is a very clever gambit, too. He wants the U.S. to define its own policies concerning Israeli "security." If that doesn't come officially, he would like the American public to become so aware of the issues that people in the U.S. might pressure Washington to reassess its position. This would lift peace moves from the stagnant mire into which they fell after Secretary of State Kissinger shelved his shuttle diplomacy.

Prospects of War

If the Sadat offensive fails, then the Mideast could be heading directly for another war. This is something which should be understood now, with a whole lot more clarity than was the case in 1973. Well before the Yom Kippur (Ramadan) war, President Sadat advertised his desire to get things moving by booting Russians from positions of influence in Egypt. Both America and Israel ignored that action. Subsequently President Sadat indicated his intention to launch a war since nothing else seemed able to awake America and Israel. Again, few paid any attention to him. Yet war did come.

From the Egyptian standpoint, the timing of the current offensive could not be more advantageous. This offensive comes just at a time when the collapse of South Vietnam is bringing home to the American people the troubles which might stem from having the U.S. attempt to play policeman to the world. Secretary of State Kissinger has declared that one lesson to be learned from Vietnam is that "foreign policy must be sustained over decades if it is to be effective, and if it cannot be, then it has to be tailored to what is sustainable."

So Egyptians are asking: Is it American policy to defend Israel's occupation of Arab lands? And by implication there is another question: Does America really think that the affirmative can be sustained over decades in the face of bitter opposition from over 100 million Arabs plus literally over a 100 supporting nations?

And Vietnam provides lessons concerning what might happen if America is led to give guarantees which it can't sustain, say Egyptians. For Israel, there is a disturbing factor here, too. Suppose the U.S. clearly declares that it has no intention of guaranteeing Israeli possession of occupied lands? Then suppose another war starts, with Arabs claiming they seek only to win back occupied territories? What would the U.S. attitude be then?

Such questions are all involved in that thesis which President Sadat is expounding. Like it or not, the U.S. must consider them in reassessing its own Mideastern position.

Mr. Vicker is the Journal's senior international editor and is currently stationed in the Middle East.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR 6 MAY 1975

Jordanian paper says Israel masses troops

Amman, Jordan

Israel is massing troops and armor along the entire length of the Syrian and Jordanian cease-fire lines, the Jordanian newspaper Al-Destour asserted Monday.

There was no immediate comment from the Israeli, Syrian, or Jordanian commands.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

RADIO - TV DEFENSE DIALOG

RADIO TV REPORTS INC. WASH.,D.C., SUMMARIES NOT TO BE QUOTED.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 7, 1975 (BROADCASTS OF MAY 6, 1975)

SUMMARY OF NETWORK NEWS IN THIS ISSUE

John CHANCELLOR, Irving R. LEVINE, John COCHRAN, Catherine MACKIN, Lou ALLISON and Ray CULLEN, all of NBC, report on refugee related subjects. LEVINE reports that the AFL-CIO has come out in favor of resettling Vietnamese refugees. He includes a statement by AFL-CIO head George MEANY. COCHRAN reports by way of Republican congressional leaders President FORD's reaction to those who oppose resettlement of refugees. MACKIN reports on congressional reaction to the refugee aid bill. ALLISON reports on the arrival at Guam of sealifted refugees, including about 1,000 fishermen. CULLEN reports on the arrival of Nguyen Cao KY at Camp Pendleton, California and about his new status as a refugee. CHANCELLOR reports that the U.S. has agreed to stop removing aircraft flown by Vietnamese to Thailand, but that we have already removed a large portion of them.

CHANCELLOR and Kenley JONES, NBC, report on the Mid-East and a speech by King HUSSEIN of Jordan. CHANCELLOR reports that the U.S. has agreed to sell the Jordanians a Hawk missile system. JONES reports on HUSSEIN's speech in which he talked about Israeli peace conditions and Arab acquiescence. Included is an excerpt of an interview by Barbara WALTERS with Secretary KISSINGER. CHANCELLOR also reports that the U.S. and Russia called for a stoppage of lax security measures which might enable people to gain possession of nuclear materials. He reports that $222 million was cut from the B-1 funds and that an amendment calling for entrance of women into military academies was tabled.

Roger MUDD, Bob SCHIEFFER, Lesley STAHL, and Bruce DUNNING, all of CBS, report on refugee related events. SCHIEFFER reports by way of Republican congressional leaders Presidential reaction to opponents of refugee resettlement and that only 35,000 jobs are needed. STAHL reports that mail received at Capitol Hill is against resettlement and includes statements by congressmen on the subject. DUNNING reports on the arrival of sealifted refugees at Guam. MUDD reports that the U.S. has recovered 50 of the 120 Vietnamese planes which landed in Thailand.

Harry REASONER and Howard K. SMITH, ABC News, report on the arrival of the las U.S. Navy ship to leave Vietnam at Subic Bay; on the repossession of Vietnamese aircraft from Thailand by the U.S.; and that Australia has recognized the new Saigon regime and is willing to accept refugees.

REASONER reports on funding cuts for the Air Force's B-1 bomber; House committee approval of a $26 billion weapons bill; and the tabling of an amendment to allow women in military academies. REASONER and Ted KOPPEL, ABC, report on the Mid-East. KOPPEL reports on the reassessment of American foreign policy in the Mid-East, using as indicators U.S. approval of providing Jordan with an air defense system and inaction on Israeli requests for F-15s and other items.

Bruce MORTON, CBS Morning News, reports along with Ike PAPPAS on the phased shutdown of U.S. bases in Thailand and the removal of U.S. troops. PAPPAS also reports on the repossession of Vietnamese planes by the U.S. MORTON also includes a statement by State Department spokesman Robert ANDERSON who says that the Khmer Rouge are executing former Khmer officials and their wives.

Barbara WALTERS, the "Today" show NBC TV, interviews Secretary of State KISSINGER on the fall of Vietnam and Cambodia and their relation to detente; on China's position as a result of Indochina losses; and on the current situation in Thailand with respect to their withdrawal requests.

PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE SAFAA) AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL MATTERS WITHIN THEIR OFFICIAL RESPONSIBILITIES.

FOR INFORMATION REGARDING THIS PUBLICATION CALL MR. HARRY ZUBKOFF, OX 52888.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NBC NIGHTLY NEWS NBC TV
7:00 PM MAY 6

Vietnam Refugees

JOHN CHANCELLOR: Good evening. President FORD got a big assist today from organized labor in his efforts to get Vietnamese refugees settled in this country. This afternoon the executive council of the AFL-CIO held its regular quarterly meeting and to a lot of peoples' surprise produced a ringing endorsement of the President's plan to bring in up to 150,000 refugees, of whom 30-to-40,000 would need jobs. Irving R. Levine has the story.

IRVING R. LEVINE: The AFL-CIO leaders met after some union officials had objected to resettling Vietnam refugees. Afterwards George MEANY said that even with high unemployment the economy can absorb the Vietnamese and MEANY denounced critics.

GEORGE MEANY: Frankly I think the attitude of people who say dump these refugees in the sea, send them back, to me is really deplorable. If this great country can't absorb another 30 or 40,000 people and try to find some way for them to make a living then I feel we're -- in a sense we're denying our own heritage, we're denying the history, the background, the traditions of this country as a haven for the oppressed.

LEVINE: In practical terms George MEANY's words mean that AFL-CIO officials around the country are now forbidden from objecting to Vietnam refugees settling here. It also means that the AFL-CIO will use its influence in Congress to get President FORD the money to find homes and jobs for the refugees. Irving R. Levine, NBC News, Washington.

CHANCELLOR: Yet in the Congress there was little movement today on the President's request for $507 million for resettlement of the Vietnam refugees. There was a meeting at the White House between the President and Republican congressional leaders. One of them came out and quoted the President as saying opposition to the refugees makes him damned mad. Here's more on the refugee story from Washington.

JOHN COCHRAN: Republican congressional leaders told the President he will not get all the refugee aid he wants. There was some criticism of liberals who oppose the President's refugee program. Mr. FORD did not mention anyone by name, but after the meeting Senate Minority leader SCOTT had some sharp words about Senator George McGOVERN who went to Cuba after suggesting that some Vietnamese refugees would be better off in their own country.

SENATOR HUGH SCOTT: We're not running off to Cuba to divert attention from the serious problems, we're not asking that they go back in any sort of people killing program.

COCHRAN: So far mail coming into the White House indicates that Americans want to help the refugees as long as they don't stay here. By latest count the letters were running nearly two-to-one in favor of some kind of refugee aid. But the initial response to bringing the Vietnamese here shows a three-to-one margin against resettling them in the United States. The President told Republican leaders today that he is just burned up by liberal opponents of the resettlement program. Mr. FORD said, "these great humaniitarians, now damn it they want to turn their backs. We didn't do that with the Hungarians and the Cubans, and damn it we're not going to do it now." The President's language will be milder at tonight's news conference, but his aides say he will still make a strong appeal for public support of his refugee program. John Cochran, NBC News, the White House.

CATHERINE MACKIN: Mail received by leaders of Congress and those who represent states where the Vietnamese are being processed is not considered overly heavy, it's certainly not on the scale of a major issue like Watergate. But those who do write are virtually all against the new refugees because they think they'll take work away from them. Some in Congress think these fears result from early administration estimates that the refugees could run as high as a million. Nevertheless there is divided opinion in Congress over refugee aid.

SENATOR ROBERT BYRD: Now I have a feeling that the American people, with the 8.9 percent unemployment rate here and with the welfare caseload burgeoning, feel that this number of refugees could have an additional economic impact.

SENATOR ALAN CRANSTON: I don't think we can abandon them. The American history and heritage is to open our doors to those who flee what they may deem to be terror somewhere else. And I don't think that we can turn away from that historic policy.

MACKIN: It's too early to say whether President FORD will get the entire $507 million he's requested for refugee aid, but the leaders in Congress say there is no doubt that substantial humanitarian aid will be approved and that Congress will act soon. First the administration will have to answer a lot of questions about how the money will be spent and give assurances that state and local governments won't have to pay any of the refugee costs. Catherine MACKIN, NBC News, Washington.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

(Commercials)

CHANCELLOR: A week out of Phuoc Loc island, South Vietnam the freighter American Challenger arrived today in Guam with more than 5,000 South Vietnamese refugees aboard. The captain said he left behind possibly 50,000 people on Phuoc Loc and just off its shores in small boats and he added that three infants died aboard his ship while half a dozen more were born. Lou Allison reports.

LOU ALLISON: For the next 10 days American ships like this one will be bringing South Vietnamese refugees to Guam. In all the sealift will add 80,000 evacuees to the more than 50,000 who have begun moving through Guam by airlift. The first evacuation ship, the American Challenger, docked at the Guam Navy Station early Wednesday morning Guam time with more than 5,000 people aboard, people at sea for four weeks but most of them in good health and happy to be safe here. The American officials running operation "New Life" say they're marked changes as the flood of refugees continues to grow. They say these people and those on the other ships are much poorer than those who came before. These people told NBC News reporter Ngo Yen KY (?) that the largest single group of refugees aboard the American Challenger were penniless fishermen from the southern coast of Vietnam. The fishermen and their families, numbering more than 1,000, are actually North Vietnamese. They fled their homes more than 20 years ago to get away from the Communists then. In this rescue operation the evacuation ship had to leave thousands of people behind and the ship's captain said there was desperation among those left in their fishing boats.

***

The fishermen and their families may stay many months, perhaps years, in resettlement and training camps here or on the United States mainland. The fact that they were uprooted by war once before and resettled in South Vietnam with no other skills than fishing will make it much harder for them to start a new life in America and much harder for Americans to help them. Lou Allison, NBC News, Guam.

CHANCELLOR: The most prominent of the South Vietnamese refugees to arrive at Camp Pendleton, California is Nguyen Cao KY, former vice president of South Vietnam. KY is the man who said that any South Vietnamese leader who left the country in the face of enemy attack would be a coward, and then KY left. Ray Cullen has more on KY in the United States

RAY CULLEN: KY was escorted from the plane by military police who followed him only to the terminal. Otherwise there was no special security.

NGUYEN CAO KY: I will stay with them as a normal refugee.

REPORTER: Do you consider yourself a normal refugee?

KY: Personal I can live among my people here.

CULLEN: Former premier KY says he's just a normal refugee, but it's obvious he's trying to improve his image among his fellow countrymen. His actions today were not those of a regular refugee. Conscious of the cameras, KY walked freely around camp talking to both newsmen and evacuees. He said it was too cold to sleep last night and asked a Marine officer for heavier clothing and more bedding. There were no security guards and officials say he will be given no special treatment in processing. A woman cried as she told KY of losing two sons in the defense of South Vietnam. KY says he wants to leave the base as soon as possible and will then join his family in Washington. Ray Cullen, NBC News, Camp Pendleton, California.

CHANCELLOR: The United States promised Thailand today to stop removing planes flown to Utaphao Airbase in Thailand by South Vietnamese pilots escaping from the war. The United States made the promise after it took away many of the 120 planes involved. The smaller jet fighters were hooked onto big helicopters and flown to the carrier Midway in the Gulf of Siam. The Midway then sailed away. American sources in Thailand said that a number of C-130 transports, which is too big to be picked up any helicopter, were simply flown out of the country.

U.S. and Mid-East

CHANCELLOR: Secretary of State KISSINGER said today that the United States is definitely not tilting towards the Arabs in the Middle East. KISSINGER did confirm that the United States has agreed to sell Hawk missiles to Jordan. But he said American Mid-East policy is even handed. He said military equipment was sent to Israel under existing agreement. The United States has, however, put off any new arms agreement with

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Israel pending a reassessment of American policy. And Israel today expressed concern over the missile deal with Jordan. Jordan's King HUSSEIN, who is visiting this country, made an important speech in South Carolina today concerning Israel and the Arabs. Kenley Jones reports.

KENLEY JONES: HUSSEIN came to the Citadel, the military college of South Carolina, to receive an honorary doctor of law degree and to make what aides called a major foreign policy statement. The Jordanian King said the Arab nations have changed their policy since 1967 when they refused even to recognize the existence of Israel. He said Jordan, Egypt and Syria are all now ready, even eager, to negotiate a peace treaty.

KING HUSSEIN: We accept the conditions for peace that have been laid down; recognition of Israel, non-belligerence, Israel's right to exist within recognized borders, and our willingness to make and support a final peace. All of these we accepted on condition that Israel withdraw from all Arab territory and recognize the legitimate right of the Palestinians in their homeland. It is as simple as that.

JONES: HUSSEIN called on private citizens in this country, as well as the government, to put pressure on Israel to withdraw from the occupied territory. Kenley Jones, NBC News, Charleston, S.C.

CHANCELLOR: Secretary KISSINGER said the United States does not now have a peace plan for the Middle East. He said one reason for that is that events in Indochina have taken up so much time and attention. KISSINGER said these things in the second part of an interview with Barbara Walters broadcast this morning on the Today Show program. Here's part of that interview.

BARBARA WALTERS: Almost six weeks ago President FORD asked for a reassessment of our policy in the Middle East. Now I know you haven't finished the reassessment, it's said it will take another week or so. But can you tell us anything of what is in there.

SECRETARY KISSINGER: Well first of all when President FORD announced this and set a tentative deadline it was before events in Indochina took a great deal of our attention. Secondly it's a mistake to believe that there will be some clear terminal date at which one can say from now on the assessment is completed. But I believe that on the whole the decision -- the final decisions -- will not be made until President FORD has had an opportunity to meet with the leaders of the countries principally concerned. But the conclusion to which we have come is certainly to continue a major American effort to produce progress towards peace in the Middle East and not to permit a long period of stagnation.

Conference On Nuclear Materials

CHANCELLOR: The United States and the Soviet Union today called for international measures to stop nuclear materials from being stolen by criminals and terrorists. Delegates from both countries spoke at an international conference in Geneva.

Senate Committee Arms Cuts

CHANCELLOR: The Senate Armed Services Committee today cut $222 million from the B-1 bomber program. The committee voted about half a billion dollars for research and testing on the B-1. And the House Armed Services Committee tabled an amendment to let women into the military academies and go into combat.

CBS EVENING NEWS CBS TV
7:00 PM MAY 6

Vietnamese Refugees; Thailand

ROGER MUDD: Good evening. President FORD let it be known today he is disturbed by the public backlash against his plan to resettle thousands of Vietnamese refugees in the United States. The President's feelings were passed on by Republican congressional leaders after they met with him at the White House. We have reports from Bob Schieffer and Lesley Stahl.

BOB SCHIEFFER: During the meeting the President tried to counter fears that bringing the refugees into this country would only make the unemployment situation worse. He said only 35,000 of the 130,000 refugees expected here could be classified as head of households. Sixty percent of the group coming here will be children, he said, who will not be looking for jobs. Republican leader Hugh SCOTT said the President was dismayed at the anti-refugee sentiment being expressed in some quarters. Pressed later for the President's personal reaction, SCOTT described it this way.

SENATOR HUGH SCOTT: He -- I've forgotten the word he used -- but he expressed something that -- well yea I'll get around to that John -- he said something about it was shocking or he was amazed that there would be hesitancy shown and that criticism would erupt. And he said, in fact, in makes me damned mad -- I guess that is a reaction.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

SCHIEFFER: White House mail is running three-to-one against resettling the refugees in this country, but so far only 322 letters on the subject have been received. Mr. FORD is expected to say more about the public's reaction at tonight's news conference. Bob Schieffer CBS News, at the White House.

LESLEY STAHL: On Capitol Hill the mail is overwhelmingly hostile to the refugees, displaying little of the sense of moral obligation the White House is advocating. Some of the objections are racist. One letter from Nebraska reads: They bring only disease, corruption and apathy.' There's great anger because the refugees, the letters say, wouldn't stand up and fight the Communists. But most of the letters are about the economy.

SENATOR BYRD: The United States gave $150 billion and 56,000 lives and 306,000 casualties to help the South Vietnamese to have an opportunity to survive. (rest of statement same as Mackin report on NBC.)

STAHL: But most labor and political leaders disagree with the congressional mail.

MAN: There's no way I can see that we can turn our backs on the 100,000 there who chose freedom and that chose to escape from the tyranny. And we didn't do that with the Hungarian refugees and we didn't do that with the Cuban refugees and we can't do that now.

SENATOR GOLDWATER: We are a nation of immigrants. And to turn our backs on people who are fleeing from oppression, fleeing for their lives, and say to them that we're going to dump them in the sea. This to me is about as contrary to American tradition as anything that I ever heard of.

STAHL: The State Department says it has had to hire Kelly girls to take all the calls coming in offering to help the refugees. And the administration's refugee task force chief Dean BROWN held a press conference to respond to the criticism.

MAN: Well how do you respond to some people who feel, rightly or wrongly, that the government is ramming people down their throats?

DEAN BROWN: Well frankly, I don't respond to it, because I don't think the government is ramming anybody down anybody's throat. Because it's being taken on on a voluntary basis by the people that want to have them in their house.

STAHL: Lesley Stahl, CBS News, Washington.

MUDD: The United States today yielded to the Thai government and stopped removing American warplanes that fleeing South Vietnames had flown into Thailand. Both the U.S. and Saigon claimed the planes, about 120 of them and worth $330 million, and Thailand got caught in the middle of that dispute. The U.S. did not agree to the Thai request, however, until it reportedly recovered the 50 most expensive planes.

(Commercials)

MUDD: The last U.S. Navy ship used in the evacuation of Saigon reached Subic Bay in the Philippines with 177 refugees. After processing they will be transferred to Guam, where Bruce Dunning reports on the recent refugee arrivals.

BRUCE DUNNING: The people on this ship were just the beginning of the largest group of refugees yet to arrive. In the next week to ten days about 80,000 refugees are expected here by ship, a number almost equal to the entire population of Guam. Many of these people had fled from South Vietnam in small boats hoping to be picked up by ships out at sea. How many more set out to sea but were never picked up no one will ever know.

***

As the first arrivals continue their processing others waited for hours to debark from the ship. It took all night to unload the ship, and at dawn another ship entered the harbor with 6,000 more refugees. And there are more ships behind them arriving in a few days as the total of refugees continues to grow to well over 100,000. Bruce Dunning, CBS News, Guam.

MUDD: From Guam the refugees will be transferred to one of three military bases in the U.S.

ABC EVENING NEWS ABC TV
7:00 PM MAY 6

Vietnam Refugees; Thailand

HARRY REASONER: The last U.S. Navy ship to leave the waters off Vietnam arrived at Subic Bay in the Philippines with 177 refugees today. And the captain of a freighter that brought 5,000 refugees to Guam today said at least 50,000 Vietnamese were left behind in boats in the waters off Saigon. Among the new Vietnamese arrivals in Camp Pendleton, Calif.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

is former South Vietnamese premier and vice president Nguyen Cao KY. Flamboyant as ever, KY quickly made his presence known.

HOWARD K. SMITH: When the end came in South Vietnam last week South Vietnamese pilots flew 129 of their American made warplanes to Thailand. The Thai government said it would return those planes to the Communist regime in Saigon. But the U.S. had begun ferrying them out on the aircraft carrier Midway. Well today the Thai government demanded the U.S. stop removing those aircraft. The U.S. agreed, but it appeared that by then more than half the planes, the most valuable ones, were already moved out.

The Communist Vietcong flag was hoisted today over the South Vietnamese legation building in Paris. It was reported however, that France has not yet decided when an exchange of ambassadors with the new Saigon regime will take place. Australia meanwhile has announced it has officially recognized the new Communist government in South Vietnam but is also willing to accept Vietnamese refugees.

Armed Service Committee Cuts

REASONER: In a major setback for the Pentagon weapons program the Senate Armed Services Committee today cut $222 million from funds requested for development of the Air Force B-1 strategic bomber program. And the House Armed Services Committee approved a $26 billion weapons bill, three and a half billion less than President FORD requested. The House committee tabled an amendment to the bill to let women enter military academies and go into combat.

Weapons, U.S. and the Mid-East

REASONER: There are reports today of a new U.S. weapons committment to Jordan. But the administration says this does not indicate any change in Middle East policy. With President FORD scheduled to meet with leaders of both Egypt and Israel in the coming weeks, ABC diplomatic correspondent Ted Koppel puts the latest developments in perspective.

TED KOPPEL: The administration continues to insist that its reassessment of America's policies in the Middle East has not been completed. And yet when Jordan's King HUSSEIN wrapped up his talks here in Washington the other day he left with a committment that the United States will provide Jordan with an air defense system made up of Red Eye missiles, Hawk missiles and conventional anti-aircraft equipment. Israeli officials are furious. In the past, they point out, Jordan's excuse for staying largely on the sidelines of Arab-Israeli confrontations has been precisely its lack of a viable air defense system. Now, say the Israelis, one of the first necessary steps in the event of a new Middle East war would have to be the safeguarding of Israel's eastern front, a polite way of describing the forceful elimination of that Jordanian air defense system. What troubles the Israelis equally is that Egypt and Syria are receiving generous infusions of Soviet military equipment. In the meantime any discussion of selling the Israelis the sophisticated American F-15 aircraft or the Lance missile is being deferred until after the reassessment of America's Middle East policy is concluded. On the surface then the reassessment appears to be weighted rather unevenly against the Israelis. But what is emerging is not so much a new American policy as a new atmosphere in which to negotiate an Israeli-Egyptian agreement. Israeli officials are now letting it be known that they are willing to discuss a pullback from almost half of the Sinai to a line stretching from Bir El Mazar (?) in the north, along the heights of Gebel Yelich (?) to a point east of the Abu Rudeis oil fields. Their terms, the same as a couple of months ago, a formal Egyptian declaration of non-belligerency. Presumably when Israeli Prime Minister RABIN comes here to Washington on June 15th, President FORD will have given the Israelis a new gesture of support, the availability for example of those Lance missiles and F-15 jets. Israel, in other words, can be responding to American support rather than American pressure. By then Mr. FORD will also have met with Egypt's President SADAT at a time when America looks more even handed in its Middle East policy than ever before. On Capitol Hill today Secretary KISSINGER rejected any suggestion, however, that America is tilting towards the Arabs.

America's reassessment in the Middle East appears to be less a change in direction than a change in tactics. This is Ted Koppel, ABC News, Washington.

CBS MORNING NEWS CBS TV
7:00 AM MAY 6

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

U.S. Withdrawals From Thailand

BRUCE MORTON: The U.S. is going ahead with plans to pull troops out of Thailand. Ike Pappas reports.

IKE PAPPAS: Sources say the Pentagon plans to shut down one of the four air-bases the United States maintains in Thailand to coincide with the withdrawal of 7,500 Air Force personnel by the end of June. The United States maintains 350 aircraft in Thailand, an undisclosed number will also be removed. The Air Force operates four bases in Thailand, Udorn, Korat (?), Nakhon Phanom, and Utaphao. Pentagon sources would not reveal which base would be closed, they said only that the big American airfield at Utaphao, an airlift supply center during the Cambodian war, would remain in U.S. hands at least for the time being. Despite public demands by the Thais that the United States withdraw all military personnel by next year, it is still hoped by top Pentagon analysts that the Thais will agree to allow a small U.S. force to remain. They point out that Thailand and the United States are still members of SEATO. Most of the Thailand's military equipment is U.S. made, if the Thais insist on a total U.S. pullout, spare parts for that equipment may be hard to come by. The Thais might need that equipment to put down the threat of a Communist insurgency in their country. Negotiations will continue with Thailand on future American military withdrawals. On another matter the Thais last week said they intended to return to Communist officials in Saigon some 120 South Vietnamese Air Force planes and helicopters that were flown into Thailand during the evacuation. Defense Secretary SCHLESINGER protested this, saying that the United States holds title to that equipment since the aircraft are part of U.S. military aid. Yesterday the aircraft carrier Midway, in the Thai port of Sattahip, began loading smaller former South Vietnamese aircraft onto her flight deck for the trip to the United States. Larger planes, such as C-130s, will be flown out to U.S. bases. The value of the abandoned aircraft is put at $330 million. Ike Pappas, CBS News, Washington.

Report on Cambodia

MORTON: The administration has intercepted radio transmissions from Cambodia which indicate the Khmer Rouge have killed some Lon Nol government officers and their wives. State Department spokesman Robert Anderson.

ROBERT ANDERSON: Our information on what may be transpiring in Cambodia is fragmentary, but I can say that it is evident to us on the basis of reliable information that orders have been issued by the Khmer Rouge to their outlying commands to kill top military and political leaders at local levels. In addition in one outlying area this order has been carried out, resulting in the death of at least 80 Khmer leaders and their wives.

MORTON: White House press secretary Ron Nessen said the President was deeply bothered by that report.

TODAY SHOW NBC TV
7:00 AM MAY 6

Interview With Kissinger

JIM HARTZ: Now part two of Barbara Walters filmed interview with Secretary of State Henry KISSINGER, the first comprehensive interview he's granted since the fall of South Vietnam. Today Secretary KISSINGER talks about the domino theory and detente with the Soviet Union, among other things.

BARBARA WALTERS: We talk of detente with the Soviet Union, but how do we reconcile detente with a country that aids the collapse of an ally we're committed to defend?

SECRETARY OF STATE KISSINGER: We have to understand what detente represents. The Soviet Union is a country that we recognize as ideologically hostile. The Soviet Union is a great power that is in many parts of the world operating competitively with us. The Soviet Union is also a country that possesses an enormous nuclear arsenal and with which we have certain interests in common; such as the prevention of general nuclear war, such as limiting conflict in areas where both of us could get directly involved. And in those areas detente has worked reasonably well. What we cannot ask the Soviet Union to do is to keep itself from taking advantage of situations in which for whatever reasons we do not do what is required to maintain the balance. It is true that Soviet arms made the conquest of South Vietnam possible. It is also true that the refusal of American arms made the conquest of South Vietnam inevitable. And therefore, while the Soviet Union does have a heavy responsibility we cannot expect the Soviet Union to police the world for us, and we have to be mature enough to recognize that we have to coexist even in a competitive world and perhaps hopefully be able to moderate over a period of years the competition in peripheral areas. Now eventually the Soviet Union must realize that it is responsible for the consequences of its actions, even in peripheral areas. But as a basic relationship detente has never meant the absence of competition.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WALTERS: Where does China stand now as a result of the fall of Saigon?

SECRETARY KISSINGER: Well China now has 40 million Vietnamese on its frontiers that do not exactly suffer from a lack of confidence in themselves. I think China will look at the international situation from the point of view of the overall balance of power, from the point of view of its own national interests, and I think it will conclude that the policy that led it to undertake normalization of relations with the United States remain the best course for it. Just as we believe that the normalization of relations with the Peoples Republic of China is an important objective of American policy which will be maintained.

WALTERS: Mr. Secretary, Thailand's foreign minister has said all American soldiers will be totally gone from that country within one year. What does this mean to us?

SECRETARY KISSINGER: Basically, as we assess our policy around the world it is important to understand that the United States does not do favors to other countries by being in an alliance with them, nor do other countries do us a favor by being our ally. If other countries want us to withdraw our troops we will of course withdraw them. Our security can be protected in many ways. What it means, however, is that for the Thai leaders the last few months have been a traumatic experience. Thailand supported our efforts in Vietnam and in Indochina because it believed its own security was intimately connected with it. And it is well known that we use Thai bases for many of the operations of the Indochina war. So naturally the Thai leaders are concerned about what this means -- what our withdrawal from Cambodia and Vietnam means -- about our general attitude in foreign policy.

(Complete transcript available)

PANORAMA WTTG TV
12:30 PM MAY 6

Interview With John Lofton, et al

***

JOHN LOFTON: But I think you (Gloria EMMERSON) ought to be congratulated for your candor because there are many people like yourself who have postured as advocates of peace in Vietnam when what you desired all along was in fact a Communist victory.

But anyway that's not central to the point. You said that -- talking about North Vietnam -- you said it's more of a country with more spirit and there's more purpose -- which certainly could have been said of Nazi Germany too. But I think the South is a nightmare and nothing works there now. What interested me was what is it that you think works in North Vietnam?

GLORIA EMMERSON: Well let me just tell you what doesn't work. After all those preposterous years of mythology about how ARVN was doing well, we've seen the performance of a disgraced and decomposing army. Nothing works in the villages, nothing worked in the districts because military officers were running them. Nothing worked at any human level of the society. Money was the only thing that got you anything in South Vietnam at all.

***

LOFTON: In order to fight you must have not only will but bullets. And in the 19 day war in the Mid-East, 1973, the United States government gave Israel $700 million in military aid a week. And had that aid been withdrawn from Israel, Israel would have collapsed and been overrun also.

(complete transcript available)

PLEASE NOTE: Complete transcripts of the following are available:

Evening Edition EE TV April 25, 1975 Interview Sen. Percy.

Evening Edition EE TV April 24, 1975 Interview Ambassadors of Korea and the Philippines.

Walter Cronkite CBS Radio May 2, 1975 Commentary by Dan Rather on Vietnam.

News WTOP Radio May 3, 1975. Report from Vienna on Atomic Nonproliferation treaty.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CURRENT NEWS
SPECIAL EDITION

THIS PUBLICATION IS PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL NEWS ITEMS OF INTEREST TO THEM IN THEIR OFFICIAL CAPACITIES. IT IS NOT INTENDED TO SUBSTITUTE FOR NEWSPAPERS, PERIODICALS AND BROADCASTS AS A MEANS OF KEEPING INFORMED ABOUT THE NATURE, MEANING AND IMPACT OF NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL NEWS DEVELOPMENTS. USE OF THESE ARTICLES HERE, OF COURSE, DOES NOT REFLECT OFFICIAL ENDORSEMENT. FURTHER REPRODUCTION FOR PRIVATE USE OR GAIN IS SUBJECT TO THE ORIGINAL COPYRIGHT RESTRICTIONS.

6 MAY 1975 No. 4

COMMENTARY MAY 1975

Vietnam: The Final Reckoning

Robert W. Tucker

AT LAST, the final reckoning in Vietnam is at hand. Barring some unforeseen and unexpected reversal, the last act in what has seemed a never-ending drama has begun. How should we behave in the concluding phase of a conflict whose outcome we have for so long sought to influence? How should we act toward those we chose to support and whose destiny we presumed to guide? However one answers these questions, their importance is apparent. For what we ultimately learn, if anything, from this our first defeat in war will depend in large measure upon our collective memory of Vietnam. In turn, this memory will surely be affected by how we behave in the moment of defeat.

It may be argued that these are questions which should have been asked long ago, that at the very least they should have been asked in January 1973 when American military forces withdrew from Vietnam in accordance with the cease-fire agreements. In fact, they were only seldom raised. To be sure, many have asked how the war, and continued American support of South Vietnam, might be ended. But few have permitted themselves the assumption that these questions would one day have to be raised and answered in the circumstances we now face. The unwelcome truth is that most of us have been loath to confront the issues we have now been forced to confront. The sudden and dramatic turn in the course of the war has brought us to the full accounting we have so long sought to avoid making and one we have been encouraged to avoid making by those bearing official responsibility for American policy. If there is a pervasive air of unease over Vietnam today, it must be largely attributed to the realization that this dreaded accounting can no longer be put off.

At the same time, it is necessary to stress that this accounting is of a special sort and, as such, not to be equated simply, or perhaps even primarily, with conventional diplomatic-strategic calculations. It is not President Ford's falling dominoes and the presumably vital American security interests thereby jeopardized that have given rise to the unease. Nor is it Secretary Kissinger's strictures on the indivisibility of peace and the effects on American global interests in abandoning an ally (South Vietnam) in its moment of extremity. These arguments, invoked from the outset of the American involvement in Vietnam, are still not without some effect. But the effect appears rather minimal, and this quite apart from whatever intrinsic merit the arguments might have. Indeed, it may well be that the world of the middle 1970's gives a considerably greater plausibility to such arguments than did the world of the early-to-middle 1960's. Certainly, the American position in the world today is not one that will bear favorable comparison with the American position of a decade ago. These considerations apart, the point remains that the altogether familiar arguments of the administration in response to the recent events in Vietnam are markedly less persuasive than they were in earlier years, and even in the earlier years of American involvement in the war their persuasiveness was limited. The currents of public opinion, and of a substantial portion of elite opinion as well, are running in directions other than those set out by the President and his Secretary of State in defining American security interests both in, and affected by, Indochina.

Nor does it seem plausible that the unease over the impending dénouement in Vietnam is a response to expected recriminations—already surfaced by leading administration figures—over "who lost Vietnam." If anything, these recriminations are likely to still much of the unease that does clearly exist by submerging it in domestic political considerations. There is little the Ford administration can reasonably expect to gain by assigning the loss of Vietnam to the Democratically-controlled Congress accused of having been niggardly in the amount of support it was prepared to give South Vietnam, though there is a good deal the administration could quite possibly lose. This is so if only for the reason that the administration must contend with something approaching the status of a law of politics: re-

CONTINUED PAGE 2

ROBERT W. TUCKER, whose article, "Oil: The Issue of American Intervention," in our January issue has provoked worldwide discussion, is professor of international relations at John Hopkins and the author of several books on world affairs and American foreign policy. He wishes to thank his colleague, Professor Piero Gleijeses, for invaluable help in preparing this article.

JAMES KILLINGBECK, CHIEF, CURRENT NEWS BRANCH, OX 78765 HELEN YOUNG, ASSISTANT CHIEF
FOR SPECIAL RESEARCH SERVICES OR DISTRIBUTION CALL HARRY ZUBKOFF, CHIEF, EXECUTIVE AGENCY SERVICE, OX 52684

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

sponsibility for what happens at a given time falls upon those who currently hold power. To escape the operation of this law, however cruel and unjust it may in practice occasionally prove, the present power holders must make a persuasive demonstration that Vietnam might—even would—have been saved had it not been for a recalcitrant and penurious Congress. Given the difficulties of such demonstration, the prospects that it might succeed cannot be rated very bright. Clearly, it will take a good deal more in the way of "proof" than merely to argue that Vietnam would have been saved had Congress only complied with whatsoever requests for aid were made by the executive.

More generally, the circumstances of 1975 simply do not favor in the case of Vietnam even a mini-repetition of the earlier Republican "loss-of-China" gambit. It is not only that in the present case a Republican administration will have presided over the "loss," but that it will have done so in a period when détente with the Soviet Union (and, in lesser degree, with China) has been the great desideratum of policy. How is one to explain simply and persuasively to the great public that those who have been so instrumental in bringing about the loss by presumably being more generous with their ally than we have been with ours, are nevertheless the states with which we must continue to seek closer and more understanding relationships? The initiated may find little trouble in grasping these subtleties of statecraft, though in the case of the Soviet Union even many of the initiated are evidently beginning to experience some difficulty. It seems doubtful, though, that the public will be able to follow this logic.

Yet the charge against Congress of "losing Vietnam" may still elicit a strong public response simply by virtue of the blood and treasure the American people have sacrificed in Vietnam. To invoke this particular logic, to tell the people that its sacrifice has been in vain because in the end this sacrifice was willfully betrayed by those who refused to comply with the administration's requests, would be reckless and irresponsible in the extreme. It would recall a dark and shameful chapter in our history and, in doing so, it would put an even more miserable end to an involvement that has been marked throughout by little else than misery. Despite the occasional intimation that charges reminiscent of McCarthyism may yet be raised, it is difficult to believe we have in recent recriminations more than misguided, though understandable, efforts to prod a Congress no longer willing passively to accept either the judgments or the requests of the executive branch on Indochina—and, for that matter, on foreign policy generally.

II

The question persists: Why the unease in watching the dénouement in Vietnam?* Why do I feel uneasy in observing a tragedy the last act of which can come as no surprise? Clearly, it is not because of any regret over a position of opposition taken and held for more than a decade. In retrospect, there is no apparent reason for altering that position today. I remain persuaded that the American involvement in Vietnam represented, more than anything else, the triumph of an expansionist and imperial interest which, by the 1960's, had submerged the narrower and more conventional security interest the policy of containment initially expressed. Without question, the involvement in Vietnam was also a legacy of the classic cold war, of the momentum generated by the cold war, and of the habits of thought and action the years of intense conflict had encouraged. Yet the greatest legacy of the classic cold war was the gradual submission of the narrower interest that containment initially expressed in the larger interest of maintaining under American leadership a stable and congenial global order. Vietnam was perceived as a threat to this larger interest, and it was the preservation of this larger interest—an imperial interest—that must ultimately explain Vietnam. In the purpose of maintaining a particular vision of world order, in the equation of this order with American security, in the hubris of those who led the nation into war, and in the reluctance to withdraw from a conflict that could not be "won" without resort to odious measures, Vietnam affords a classic case of an imperial war.

Thus the United States involvement in Vietnam was not primarily due to intellectual error, as the prevailing liberal orthodoxy on the war would have it. Nor can it be adequately explained either in terms of an ideological obsession pursued for its own sake or, with more plausibility, in terms of the domestic constraints of anti-Communism. These and similar explanations of the policy that led to Vietnam give to this policy a quality of disinterestedness it did not possess and a quality of innocence it did not have. That policy was not the work of incompetent ideologues who were blind to political realities and oblivious to age-old considerations of interest. It was the work of men who, though they obviously made mistakes, wished to preserve America's global preponderance, and who not unreasonably saw in Vietnam a threat to the nation's preeminent position. In the manner of all imperial visions, the vision of a preponderant America was solidly rooted in the will to exercise dominion over others, however benign the intent of those who entertained the vision. That this will was commonly cloaked in such disarming terms as "liberal internationalism" does not alter the reality. The policy of intervention—of liberal intervention—that culminated in Vietnam was the expected response of an imperial power with a vital interest in maintaining an order that, quite apart from the material benefits it conferred, had become synonymous with the nation's vision of its role in history.

Yet even for one who opposed this vision and the results to which it finally led in Vietnam, there is something awesome and disquieting in the swiftness with which so many have apparently abandoned it in the conviction that we have entered a new period of world history. It may of

CONTINUED PAGE 3

* It is perhaps well to emphasize that "unease" is used here in a sense to be distinguished from the unease that arises simply from witnessing death and destruction (and, in this instance, the sense of shame among many South Vietnamese that an ordeal many bore with so much courage and dignity has been mocked by the behavior of an army in defeat). We all feel uneasy in the face of the suffering of others, quite apart from whether or not we have had any role in, or relationship to, that suffering. In the case of Vietnam, however, the particular unease experienced today stems in large part from the role we have played in the war and the nagging doubts almost all must feel about that role. Then, too, unease might in part stem from the self-deceptions that have been entertained almost to the very end.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

course be argued that the vision has not in fact been abandoned, only the methods by which it was formerly sustained. But given the world in which foreign policy must still be conducted, the abandonment of these methods is very likely to leave the vision little more than an empty shell. Indeed, the abandonment of these methods may well result in jeopardizing narrower and more traditional security interests. In any event, it is in the excess of Vietnam that we may find a root cause—perhaps the root cause—of an outlook today that promises to be as indiscriminate in its anti-interventionism as was the interventionism of only yesterday. If some of the now visible consequences of this sudden change are to be deplored, this consideration cannot alter the judgment rendered on our involvement in Vietnam. On the contrary, it can only strengthen the judgment made on the intrinsic folly of that involvement.

III

We come closer to answering the question of why the sense of unease over Vietnam once it is acknowledged that we never honestly faced the issue of how we were to disengage entirely from an enterprise—and this regardless of the consequences—which, even though we should never have undertaken it, we nevertheless did undertake. To have faced up to this issue necessarily meant facing up to its probable consequences—indeed, to its almost certain consequences—and this we could not bring ourselves to do. At least, this is true for almost all of those who, however opposed to American involvement in Vietnam, have not been sympathetic to the cause of the other side in the conflict. A very small minority apart, then, the rest of us have sought, whether consciously or unconsciously, varying ways to escape from confronting the issue we now find we can no longer avoid.

Although few were ever seriously persuaded that Vietnamization would really work, many nevertheless managed to find comfort in the promise that it might do so. Even so, the seductive promise of Vietnamization itself necessarily implied the indefinite continuance of American aid to South Vietnam, both economic and military, or at least so long as the war continued and the North continued to receive help from its allies. To agree to the one—Vietnamization—while denying the other—aid for an indefinite period—was either obtuse or insincere, provided that the South Vietnamese government and army made reasonably effective use of such aid. Moreover, experience had amply demonstrated that "reasonably effective use" in the South Vietnamese context could only be realistically interpreted with some looseness, unless it too was to prove no more than a deceptive—or self-deceptive—formula.

The premise underlying Vietnamization, and thus the implicit obligation to continue aid support, was not the representative character of the South Vietnamese government. On this all-important point, there has been, and remains even today, much confusion. It is true that, during the years Vietnamization was pushed as a way to disengage from direct participation in the conflict, many argued that such assistance as we might later provide would never be effectively used in the absence of a more representative government. Whether subsequent events have confirmed this long-held view must at least remain unclear in one respect, since we have no way of knowing whether a more representative government would in fact have made better use of the aid South Vietnam was given in the period following the American withdrawal. The contrary position is not self-evident, despite the tendency of its proponents to assume that it is. There have been governments before which, while broadly representative, have nevertheless shown themselves incompetent to conduct a war effectively. Moreover, in the case of South Vietnam a government more representative than the Thieu government—though a government that excluded the Vietcong—would still be one that represented disparate political factions which have always been largely devoid of any real popular support. After so many years of discussion and debate, we still do not have a plausible, let alone a persuasive, picture of the kind of government that would have elicited such support in South Vietnam. It is, after all, quite possible that none would have done so.

At any rate, this much at least is clear: if the strategy of disengaging from direct involvement in the war did not mean the abandonment of the South, it implied the commitment in principle to continued economic and military aid after disengagement was completed. It is disingenuous to argue today, though many do, that this strategy implied no commitment of aid, certainly no commitment of military aid, and that if such commitment was undertaken it was done in secret. The argument is disingenuous because the strategy of disengagement was largely based upon just such a commitment, and this was generally understood and accepted at the time. Nor is it relevant, in contending the contrary, to point to the instrument that completed and formalized American disengagement, the January 1973 Vietnam cease-fire agreement.* For that instrument did not have as its purpose the specification of commitments undertaken by the United States toward its ally, and it is captious to pretend otherwise.

It is for these reasons that it is difficult to gainsay the position of the Secretary of State in urging a review of the "public debate during the period that these [1973] agreements were negotiated to see what the imperatives were of the administration in negotiating these settlements" (although it is rather startling to find the Secretary making so ardent an appeal to a process he discouraged at the time). "There was never any proposition," Mr. Kissinger went on to insist at his March 26 news conference, "that the United States would withdraw and cut off aid, and these agreements were negotiated on the assumption that the United States would continue economic and military aid to South Vietnam."

The record broadly supports these assertions. Although in the press conferences and other public statements made at the time by Nixon administration officials in explaining the agreements the military aid question was played down, it was nevertheless answered in a manner that was clear enough given the circumstances. Thus Kissinger himself declared in a news conference immedi-

CONTINUED PAGE 4

* The "Agreement on Ending the War and Restoring Peace in Vietnam" was concluded in Paris on January 23, 1973, the parties to it being the United States, North Vietnam, South Vietnam, and the Provisional Revolutionary Government of South Vietnam (PRG). It was attended by various protocols, thus giving rise to such varying descriptions as the cease-fire agreement(s), the Paris accords, etc., and subsequently transmitted to Congress in the form of an executive agreement.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

ately following the conclusion of the Paris accords that the United States would continue to provide South Vietnam with "that military aid which is permitted by the agreement" (that is, to replace used-up equipment on a one-for-one basis with identical equipment) and went on to state: "The United States is prepared to gear that military aid to the action of other countries and not to treat it as an end in itself. . . ." Similar statements were made in subsequent official explanations of the cease-fire agreement. When Thieu visited President Nixon in early April 1973, the joint communiqué issued at the end of the talks reaffirmed, though in guarded terms, what was by then a well-understood position. And in considering the administration's aid requests for Vietnam in the spring of 1973, Congress not only proved quite uncritical in its examination of the requests but appeared to take for granted a continuing commitment to military aid.

It is necessary to review these events, since memories are often quite short, even over issues that once aroused deep passions. The view that the American government, with the knowledge of Congress and the public, undertook no commitment to the government of South Vietnam in the course of disengaging from active participation in the war, may be true in the narrow legalistic sense, but it is only in this sense that it is true. The commitment the American government did evidently undertake was not unconditional. Few, if any, such commitments between states are. It was conditioned on the performance of the South Vietnamese and, of course, on the behavior of the North. But a commitment there was, and it is not only misleading but somehow demeaning to attempt to deny this today.

IV

IN SOME MEASURE, the argument that has gone on over whether we have had a commitment to aid South Vietnam may be seen as one manifestation of the temptation to believe that we were deceived throughout the course of the war by whichever administration was in power—though above all by the Nixon administration. And where we were not deceived, it is tempting to believe that our will, however inarticulately it might have been expressed, was simply ignored by those who bore official responsibility for conducting Vietnam policy. It is tempting to believe this—indeed, the temptation verges on a compulsion—since it relieves us of a responsibility that, for good reason, we do not wish to bear. In fact, the deception of the public and the ignoring of its will do not contrast so markedly with a number of other chapters in post-World War II foreign policy. Moreover, it is often forgotten how frequently in the course of the war deceptions were exposed and secret undertakings uncovered. This is true even of the Nixon years when secrecy and deception, particularly with respect to Vietnam, were carried to yet new extremes. Prior to Watergate, however, they did not represent a political liability for Mr. Nixon. Quite the contrary: if anything, the Nixon Vietnam policy, despite its manner of execution, ultimately turned out to be a factor contributing to his 1972 victory.

Nor is this all. The public will—one uses that shadowy concept with diffidence, though use it we must—was not subverted in the case of Vietnam, not even by Richard Nixon. It may fairly be charged that Nixon exploited this will for his own purposes. But if he did so successfully, it was because this will remained profoundly ambivalent toward the war. Though clearly desiring to get out of the conflict from 1968 on, the public never accepted the stark prospect of defeat. Nor, for that matter, did a majority of the foreign-policy elites, and this despite their opposition to the war. Nixon instinctively recognized this ambivalence, and it dictated his Vietnamese strategy throughout. By changing the costs of the war to the nation,* while effectively exploiting public unwillingness to accept undisguised defeat, the President was able to marshal broad domestic support in 1972 for measures that carried the war as never before to North Vietnam. The relative absence of opposition to the war in the last six months of direct American involvement indicated that public—and also, in substantial measure, elite—disaffection with the war had been largely a function of costs (and, of course, the absence of definitive results). This may be a depressing conclusion to reach, but it is one that is difficult to avoid.

The 1973 cease-fire agreement preserved virtually intact the belief that if we had not won the war, we also had not lost it, that we had not been defeated. This being achieved, the public could readily endorse, and was only too willing to endorse, Nixon's "peace with honor." The President and his principal national-security assistant, for their part, were almost as eager as the public to achieve American disengagement. In addition to its role as the most troublesome of domestic issues, continued American involvement in the war was seen as a constant threat to further progress in détente with the great Communist powers. The Paris accords, particularly coming in the aftermath of the last and greatest display of American air power, satisfied Nixon's and Kissinger's dual requirement that American withdrawal not be seen by the public as a defeat, thereby not jeopardizing the domestic support needed for "larger policies," and by allies and adversaries as an erosion of the nation's prestige and credibility.

IT MAY BE no more than poetic justice that the man who negotiated the Paris cease-fire accords has recently suffered so much criticism for efforts that were almost universally acclaimed at the time. But if Henry Kissinger merits condemnation for what is rapidly becoming in the eyes of growing legions of critics a veritable catalogue of sins, it is difficult to see why the Paris accords should be counted among these sins. Admittedly, the Nobel Peace Prize appeared at the time, and appears even more so today, a rather excessive appraisal of the Kissinger handiwork. But the present condemnation of that handiwork seems only slightly less excessive. For even if it is true, and it is true, that the Paris accords amounted to a delayed and ultimately miserable death sentence for South Vietnam, this condemns the Kissinger efforts only if it is plausible to argue

CONTINUED PAGE 5

* To this nation, and not to the Vietnamese, South or North. The key was the reduction of American casualties and the build-up of American firepower. In 1972, the virtual disappearance of what had once been a strong anti-war movement testified to the effectiveness of the Nixon strategy. Elite groups were almost as vulnerable to the strategy as the general public, though they indignantly denied being so. Yet the record is clear that it was American casualties—and, of course, the draft—which above all supported the anti-war movement.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

that the results could have been otherwise and better.

No doubt, the results could have been otherwise and better had more favorable terms for the South been extracted from Hanoi. But more favorable terms could only have meant, in the main, the complete withdrawal from the South of the North's forces (together with some mechanism for enforcing the withdrawal), and on this critical issue Hanoi had remained intractable for years. There is no evidence we have that Hanoi might have been induced to alter its position on this issue, short of an American threat literally to destroy the North. Save for a handful of unreconstructed hawks on the war, nearly everyone else drew back in horror at the very suggestion. Indeed, the terms that Kissinger did finally get, though legitimizing the North's presence in the South, might (no more is claimed) still have given the South an indefinite lease on life had they been accompanied by the meaningful prospect that the American bombers would return should the North again initiate large-scale military action. Kissinger evidently wanted to retain that option—he strongly hinted so publicly at the time—but he was effectively deprived of it only months later by a President in decline and a Congress that forbade American military forces from engaging in hostile acts in or over Indochina. Once it was made clear that the bombers would not return, there remained no effective means of protecting the South, whether from its own misdeeds or from its endemic vulnerability to large-scale attacks by Hanoi's forces, and it is difficult to fault Kissinger's plaintive comment to this effect in his March 26 news conference.

It has been argued that better terms for South Vietnam might have been gained had the United States agreed to Hanoi's longstanding demand for an unconditional American withdrawal and Thieu's removal. But these terms would have been tantamount to American acknowledgment of an undisguised defeat and, for this reason alone, were out of the question. Even so, it obviously does not follow that if these demands had been accepted, Hanoi would then have been willing to withdraw its forces from South Vietnam. At least, this does not follow in the absence of a government in Saigon that at the least included, if it was not dominated by, the Vietcong. With or without Thieu, Hanoi gave every indication that its forces were in the South to stay.

There remains the view that even given the terms of the Paris accords the results for South Vietnam could have been otherwise and better had Saigon and the United States made a sincere attempt to abide by the terms of the cease-fire. Moreover, this argument runs, had the provisions of the cease-fire agreement been carried out by Saigon and this government, there would have been no need to send additional military aid—or, alternatively, even if the need still had arisen, it might well have been kept to very modest proportions.

Clearly, what is implied here is an overall judgment on the nature of the Paris accords, and it is a judgment to the effect that the accords provided a reasonable chance for achieving a tolerable peace between the South and North. Those who take this view do not deny that, in the best of circumstances, difficulties would have remained in implementing the accords, given the suspicion and hatred that persisted and the many imprecisions and deliberate ambiguities that characterized many provisions of the accords. Even so, it is contended that whatever hope there was for a tolerable peace was dashed by our behavior and the behavior of our ally.

The detailing of this behavior has been made on innumerable occasions and requires only the barest summary. Saigon, with our encouragement, hardly waited until the ink of the agreement was dry before initiating what amounted to offensive actions. Thieu almost immediately reneged on his pledge to release political prisoners, as he did with respect to the obligations entailed in setting up a National Council of National Reconciliation and Concord. The mechanism for broadening political activity in the South was thus subverted while the provisions for organizing free elections under international supervision were simply ignored. On the American side, a series of commitments, some public though others secret, presumably went unfulfilled. Among the latter are included the promise to withdraw all American civilians in the South who were engaged in the support of Saigon's armed forces and the undertaking to cease American air reconnaissance over North Vietnam.*

One might counter this indictment with the numerous violations of the Paris accords charged to the North Vietnamese and Vietcong, violations also alleged to have begun in the months immediately following conclusion of the accords. Would any useful purpose be served by doing so, and by entering into a detailed examination of the order and magnitude of the violations undertaken by the two sides in order to assess relative responsibility for the breakdown of the cease-fire agreement? It would not seem so. Even a casual rereading of the Paris accords only serves to reinforce the conclusion, apparent at the time they were negotiated, that their almost incredible ambiguities meant either that their successful implementation required maximum efforts toward mutual understanding and good will, or that their purpose was simply to provide the means for America's military disengagement while leaving the situation otherwise essentially unchanged. Since the former interpretation is either merely tendentious or absurd, or perhaps both, we are left with the latter interpretation. This being so, it is a largely useless exercise to ask who undermined the agreement. The agreement was made to be undermined; its provisions seemed almost designed to invite evasion and subversion.

The American negotiators may still be judged adversely for having concluded the cease-fire agreement. But fairness requires recognition that the alternatives were either roughly the kind of agreement that was concluded or no agreement at all. Whereas the former alternative permitted military disengagement and the return of American war prisoners, the latter alternative promised —at best—military disengagement. There was of course a third alternative that would have obtained military disengagement and the return of the prisoners of war. This was the acknowledgment of defeat and, as a consequence of such admission, the abandonment of an ally. It was not only the Nixon administration that was completely unwilling to contemplate this third alternative.

CONTINUED PAGE 6

* These and other secret commitments are discussed by Tad Szulc, "Beyond the Vietnam Cease-Fire Agreement," Foreign Policy (Summer 1974), pp. 21-69.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

VIETNAM: THE FINAL RECKONING...Continued

So was the nation, though in lesser degree. In light of what we now know, it is easy and fashionable to say that the third alternative would have represented the course of wisdom. For it is only by the barest of subterfuges that we may now continue to pretend that we were not defeated in Vietnam. Pride often counts for more than wisdom, however, and particularly in the case of powerful nations. And even were it not for pride, there was always the question of what to do with those whose destiny we sought to determine, however misguidedly, and whom, though their destiny is no longer within our reach (if, indeed, it ever really was), we cannot with honor simply cast aside.

V

THERE is an almost instinctively negative reaction to once again raising the matter of honor in relation to Vietnam. The reaction is surely understandable, even if misplaced. Abused and perverted on so many occasions during the past decade in relation to the war, the American involvement in Vietnam has almost succeeded in giving honor a bad name. Are we to conclude from this experience, however, that there is no such thing as honor or that honor can have no relevance to the manner in which as a nation we behave toward others? Apparently not, for it is the most extreme opponents of the war who have themselves been most insistent on seeing Vietnam as raising above all a moral issue and therefore, by implication, a matter of honor. Whether morality, and honor, occupy so exalted a position in the affairs of nations is a question that need not be entered into here. It is sufficient to insist that honor does enter into such affairs and that nations may dishonor, and have dishonored, themselves.

There can be no objection, then, to raising the matter of honor at this late date and to ask what remaining obligations, if any, we have that have grown out of our role in the Vietnamese conflict. It is no criticism of the Secretary of State that he has seen fit to ask this question and to answer it. Mr. Kissinger believes that in the "moment of extremity" of an ally the test of our character as a people is whether we are willing to stand by a commitment earlier made and to continue aid to that ally. This is, to him, "an elementary question of what kind of a people we are . . . a fundamental question of how we are viewed by all other people, and it has nothing to do with the question of whether we should ever have gotten involved there [Indochina] in the first place." To desert one's ally even when the latter's cause has become extreme is to dishonor oneself. And so it is, provided the commitment itself was an honorable one and the recipient has fulfilled the conditions implied by the commitment. To argue that even a dishonorable commitment, once made, can only be abandoned at the cost of honor itself is simply perverse. To insist that the recipient of a commitment deserves one's continued loyalty even if he has failed to fulfill the conditions of the commitment is unreasonable.

Whether the commitment made to South Vietnam is judged more than a mistake is a question that need not be argued here. What is of relevance is whether the South Vietnamese government made reasonably effective use of such aid as was given it. For if it did not do so, the further question whether it was given "adequate" aid need not even be considered. Did our ally fulfill the elementary condition implied by the commitment? There is very little evidence to support the view that it did, and a great deal of evidence to support the view that it did not. By almost any reasonable standard of effectiveness of performance, and even assuming for the sake of argument the existence of certain shortages due to the alleged penury of the aid-giver, the indispensable condition of continued moral obligation simply was not met. What follows from this is not that one may view with indifference the plight of those remnants of an armed force which do remain willing and able to fight. There is, in fact, no generally satisfactory answer that can be given in such extreme and agonizing situations, save to say —and it is concededly not much—that such answer must be determined by practical as well as humanitarian criteria. On the major issue, however, the response seems quite clear: there remains no obligation to be violated.

These considerations have taken administration arguments, particularly those of Mr. Kissinger, at face value. But this surely cannot be the end of the matter. We are entitled to ask, why the extraordinary sensitivity shown, not merely over keeping commitments—this is altogether expected—but over the moral necessity of doing so? While the Secretary may not be altogether insensitive to moral issues in statecraft, as his critics so regularly depict him as being, no one can accuse him of ever having been obsessed with such issues. Clearly, he is obsessed with issues of credibility and prestige, and while the importance of these issues may be granted, they are not synonymous with moral issues. The suspicion accordingly must arise that the Secretary has sought to use the moral on behalf of the strategic, that he has been looking at strategic interests and presenting them in moral terms.

IF THERE is nothing heinous in this, it is also not particularly admirable; above all in the present agony of South Vietnam. Moral sensitivity, one would have thought, might well have been directed in other and rather obvious directions, while strategic interests were being displayed for what they are. One such direction moral sensitivity can take is toward those South Vietnamese whose lives may be placed in jeopardy under a Communist, or Communist-dominated, regime if only because of past associations with the Americans. No one knows how many such persons may fall into this, and still other, categories, but it would be rash to assume the number is small.

Those who have for so long pressed the specter of a "blood bath" cannot in good conscience remain silent today toward the one measure that could remove their fear. The responsibility for granting asylum must be seen as a kind of litmus-paper test of the sense of obligation we feel, if not toward all those who will be placed in danger for whatever reason in a new regime, then at least toward those who have compromised themselves through past association with us. If the question of numbers is raised, it is well to recall that we took in 600,000 refugees from Cuba during the years following Castro's accession to power. Yet in the majority of cases, there was no physical danger posed to the Cuban emigrés and little obligation on our part by virtue of our own actions, as there is in Vietnam.

CONTINUED PAGE 7

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Nor is it only a matter of simple moral obligation that is involved in the case of Vietnam; it is also a test of the racism with which we have been taxed by others, and particularly in our attitudes and actions toward Asians. A refusal to make every effort to take in those Vietnamese who wish to leave and whose position has been compromised by us will confirm, as perhaps nothing else could, the charge we have so indignantly denied throughout the war.

Beyond this, if we are so concerned with our image of ourselves in defeat, as well we should be, we cannot avoid facing the issue of American economic aid to a South Vietnam we no longer influence. It is now known that in March 1973, the United States and North Vietnam came close to an agreement on American aid to the North for reconstruction. The agreement proved abortive because of the Nixon administration's ire over Communist truce violations and public indignation, reflected in Congress, over Hanoi's treatment of American prisoners of war, then being released. If aid for reconstruction was nevertheless justified in principle in the case of the North in 1973, then there is surely as strong a case to be made today for aiding the South, or, for that matter, the whole of Vietnam. To be militarily frustrated, and eventually defeated, by so small a state is humiliating, and nothing we say can deny this. Even so, generosity in defeat is not demeaning and certainly not for a great power. There is no reason why we cannot be as generous in defeat today as we have been in victory in the past.

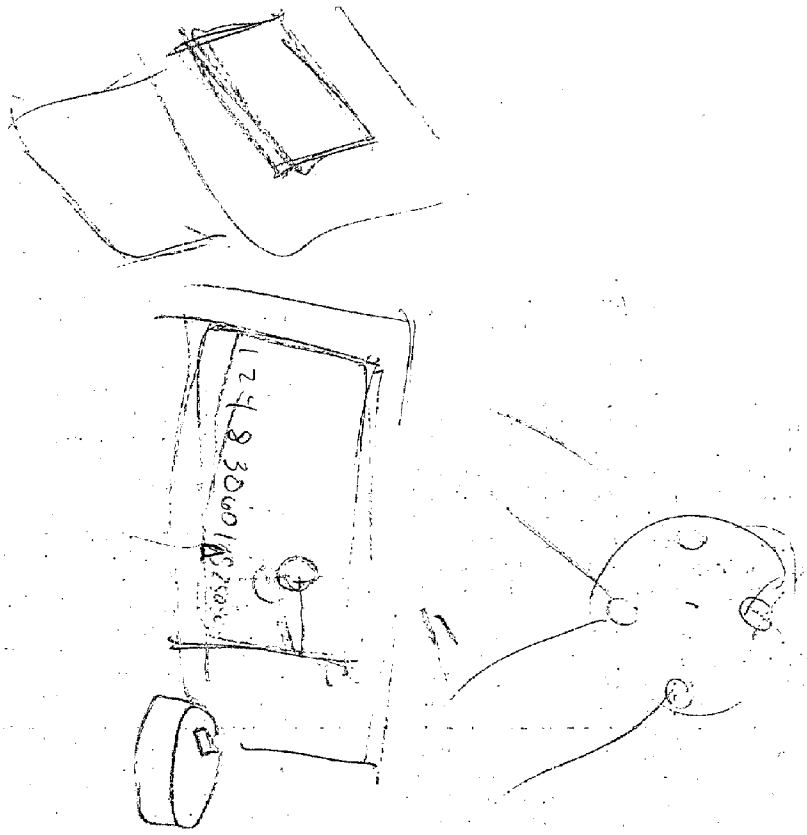
VI

THESE observations are not intended to convey the impression that the final reckoning in Vietnam must be seen only in moral terms. Although the moral dimension of any accounting we are to make is important, the strategic dimension obviously cannot be neglected. What I have objected to is a view that misreads, if it does not pervert, the nature of the moral obligation that emerged from our commitment to South Vietnam, and that does so out of concern for strategic interests. Moreover, considering the immediate area to which this view has been applied, one must amend the preceding sentence to read that a mistaken strategic interest is equated with a spurious moral obligation. Applied elsewhere, to areas of real interest and to conditions altogether different from those that prevailed in Vietnam, the effects of this argument could prove to be devastating.

It is the tone as much as the substance of administration reactions to what has happened in Vietnam that are disturbing. While many have in retrospect unfairly criticized the 1973 Paris accords, the principal architect of those accords also insists upon finding a meaning in them they did not have. The apparent intent is to relieve himself of any responsibility for recent events in Vietnam. Yet there is the more ominous suggestion in the Kissinger reaction that what might now happen elsewhere (the Middle East?) must be seen as a result of the nation's failure to have appreciated its interests in and to have stood by its commitments to South Vietnam. One can only trust that this is little more than a passing mood, a short-lived reaction to a failure that can no longer be obscured. If it is more than that, if it is indicative of a more persistent attitude that finds increasing expression in American policy, then the prospect beckons of a determination by our policy-makers to create their own dominoes.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED



DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CURRENT NEWS

PART I - EARLY BIRD EDITION - 0730

PART II - MAIN EDITION - PUBLISHED AT 1130

THIS PUBLICATION IS PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL NEWS ITEMS OF INTEREST TO THEM IN THEIR OFFICIAL CAPACITIES. IT IS NOT INTENDED TO SUBSTITUTE FOR NEWSPAPERS, PERIODICALS AND BROADCASTS AS A MEANS OF KEEPING INFORMED ABOUT THE NATURE, MEANING AND IMPACT OF NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL NEWS DEVELOPMENTS. USE OF THESE ARTICLES HERE, OF COURSE, DOES NOT REFLECT OFFICIAL ENDORSEMENT. FURTHER REPRODUCTION FOR PRIVATE USE OR GAIN IS SUBJECT TO THE ORIGINAL COPYRIGHT RESTRICTIONS.

TUESDAY, MAY 6, 1975

NEW YORK TIMES
6 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

MOVE FOR BIG CUTS IN DEFENSE WANES

By LESLIE H. GELB
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 5—Congressional liberals and moderates, having held their ground against the Ford Administration on the issue of aid to Indochina, are backing away from their earlier intention of challenging the Administration anew with attempts to make record cuts in defense spending and to reduce overseas forces.

Interviews with more than two dozen Democratic legislators and staff aides have made it clear that most of the legislators want to avoid signaling other nations that the United States is entering an isolationist period and to avoid being tagged by the Ford Administration as isolationists themselves.

At a private meeting of about 30 liberal members of the staffs of the Senate and House of Representatives last Friday, some of those present said it was implicitly agreed to seek a cut of about 7 per cent in the Pentagon's $104.7-billion budget. Before the unraveling of the American position in Indochina many of these aides and their bosses were talking of at least 10 per cent.

The Senate majority leader, Mike Mansfield of Montana, is reliably reported to be unlikely to offer his amendment, as he has done since 1966, to withdraw the bulk of American forces in Europe.

These are but two of many examples of tactical maneuvering among Capital Hill Democrats as they try to evaluate domestic and foreign reaction to the fall of the Saigon and Phnom Penh governments.

The cautionary note was particularly pronounced among those who have fueled foreign-policy confrontations with Republican Administrations in recent years. An aide to a prom-

(See CUTS, Pg. 2)

WASHINGTON POST 6 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

Thailand to Return Planes To U.S., Pentagon Says

From News Dispatches

Despite warnings from Saigon and Hanoi, Thailand is returning to the United States the 120 U.S.-made aircraft flown there by fleeing South Vietnamese airmen, the Pentagon announced yesterday.

A Pentagon spokesman said that most of the warplanes, including C-119 and C-47 cargo planes and F-5 and A-37 fighters, were being dismantled and returned to the United States by ship, but that C-130 transports were being flown directly to Clark Air Base in the Philippines.

The planes had been assigned to the defeated South Vietnamese government under military aid agreements, but the new Communist government in Saigon, the Provisional Revolutionary Government, claimed that the planes belonged to it.

Hanoi pressured Bangkok to return the U.S.-made planes to Saigon, but Thai Foreign Minister Chatichai Choonhaven had earlier said his government would keep the planes.

(See PLANES, Pg. 2)

GENERAL NEWS SUMMARY
FROM THE WALL STREET JOURNAL
MAY 6, 1975
World-Wide

INDOCHINA REFUGEE AID of $507 million was asked by President Ford.

The resettlement money, for 125,000 to 150,000 refugees expected to come to the U.S., would supplement $98 million already available from a fund for postwar Vietnam reconstruction. Four days ago the House rejected a $327 million aid bill, partly because it included authority for use of U.S. troops in an evacuation. The $507 million Mr. Ford wants would be spent from now through Sept. 30, 1977, for medical care, education, transportation and food.

Seeking to overcome public opposition to accepting the refugees, the administration promised it wouldn't resettle any in economically depressed areas. Up to 10% of the refugees may go to other countries.

(See NEWS SUMMARY, Pg. 8)

NEW YORK TIMES 6 MAY 1975 Pg. 3

U.S Will Provide Jordan With Defensive Missiles

By BERNARD GWERTZMAN
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 5—The United States has reached final agreement with Jordan on the sale of a modern HAWK air defense system, a State Department official said today.

The accord, which will outfit the Jordanians with sophisticated surface-to-air missiles, was made final while King Hussein was in Washington last week for talks with President Ford, Secretary of State Kissinger and other officials.

The official refused to disclose how many batteries of missiles the Jordanians would receive or how much they would cost, but another official estimated the cost to be at least $100-million, over a period of years.

The disclosure of the sale of the missiles, long sought by King Hussein to modernize his air defenses, came on the same day that the White House announced that President Ford would follow up his meeting with President Anwar el-Sadat of Egypt next month in Europe by conferring in Washington on June 11 and 12 with Premier Yitzhak Rabin of Israel.

The meeting with Mr. Rabin was set up in recent days after Mr. Ford had decided to meet with President Sadat in Salzburg, Austria, on June 1 and 2 while on an extended European trip.

Officials Chagrined

State Department officials were somewhat chagrined by the disclosure of the HAWK sale, since at the regular news conference this afternoon, Robert Anderson, the department spokesman, had said that no new military commitments were being made to any Middle East country while the American policy reassessment was going

(See MISSILES, Pg.2)

NEW YORK TIMES
6 MAY 1975 Pg. 14

Pentagon Hit For Strategy On A-War

United Press International

The Pentagon is planning a strategy that "puts a hair trigger on nuclear war," Sen. Thomas J. McIntyre (D-N.H.) said yesterday.

McIntyre said the Pentagon's chief ally in the effort is Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.), a contender for the 1976 Democratic presidential nomination.

McIntyre said Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger is seeking nuclear weapons that would not just destroy an enemy but would be so accurate they could destroy Soviet missiles before they are fired.

A debate on the subject is expected today in the Senate Armed Services Committee meeting. Both McIntyre and Jackson chair Armed Services subcommittees.

"If you threaten your adversary's missiles, even if you are only preparing for a limited nuclear war, he may reasonably fear that you are preparing to take his deterrent away with a pre-emptive first strike. In a period of crisis, this fear is a motive to strike you first," McIntyre said.

"It means your own missiles are more attractive targets and it consequently puts a hair trigger on nuclear war."

JAMES KILLINGBECK, CHIEF, CURRENT NEWS BRANCH, OX 78765 HELEN YOUNG, ASSISTANT CHIEF

FOR SPECIAL RESEARCH SERVICES OR DISTRIBUTION CALL HARRY ZUBKOFF, CHIEF, EXECUTIVE AGENCY SERVICE, OX 52884

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

MISSILES ... CONT'D

on.

The United States has already held up delivery of the Lance surface-to-surface missile to Israel and told an evaluation team to delay its arrival here for testing the F-15 fighter.

But the department said late today that the agreement to sell the HAWK system to Jordan was reached "in principle" when Mr. Kissinger was in Jordan last November. A Pentagon survey team went to Jordan in February to make specific recommendations, the official said. Thus, in the department view, those was not a new commitment to Jordan. It said a decision would be made on the Israeli Lance in due course.

King Hussein, in a speech today at Florida State University that will in essence be given again tomorrow at the Citadel, in Charleston, S. C., said that Jordan, Egypt and Syria were ready to make peace with Israel if Israel withdrew from all territory occupied in the June, 1967, war, and recognized the "legitimate rights of the Palestinian people."

The Israelis, however, have refused to give up all occupied territory, insisting that at least some of it would have to be retained for security reasons.

Meetings Called Crucial

Administration officials have described Mr. Ford's coming meetings with Mr. Sadat and Mr. Rabin as crucial to the American decision on how to proceed toward keeping momentum alive for a Middle East settlement.

The Administration believes another Geneva conference seems inevitable, but it would like to see whether either Egypt or Israel, or both, are willing to make the concessions to revive the possibility of a step-by-step agreement.

The diplomatic effort was set back in March when Mr. Kissinger failed to bring about a new Egyptian-Israeli limited agreement in Sinai. Since then the Ford Administration has been conducting a widely publicized reassessment of its Mideast policies.

Mr. Kissinger, in an interview taped last Saturday and being shown in segments on the Today show of NBC, said in tomorrow's installment that the United States did not have a plan it would present to Egypt and Israeli now.

Risk Is Cited

"But we do have the conviction that a prolonged stalemate in the Middle East involves a high risk of another Middle East war with major consequences for the possibilities of a conflict with the Soviet Union and with a major impact on the economies of all of the industrialized nations, including us," he said.

Mr. Kissinger said that after the Sadat and Rabin meetings, "we will formulate a precise American policy."

He said there was no "terminal date" for the reassessment, and that the final decisions would not be made until Mr. Ford had conferred with key leaders. Mr. Kissinger also said that the United States would "stand by our existing commitments" to Israel.

The American commitment to Israel was forcefully stated by Senator Edward M. Kennedy in a speech to a leadership meeting of the National Conference on Soviet Jewry, which met here for two days.

The Massachusetts Demoerat, after making a strong plea for the Ford Administration to make the issue of stepped-up Jewish emigration a priority matter with Soviet leaders, said "our commitment to Israel's independent future will persist."

The conference, which is an umbrella organization for American Jewish groups interested in improving the treatment and emigration of Soviet Jews, also heard from Senator Henry M. Jackson, Democrat of Washington, who argued strongly against any Administration effort to change the current law that keeps trade benefits from the Soviet Union and other Communist countries unless they give assurances of liberalized emigration procedures.

In a statement issued at the end of the conference, the leadership group "condemned" what it called a "continuing anti-Semitic propaganda campaign,, in the Soviet Union. It also called upon Mr. Ford to take strong steps on behalf of Soviet Jews.

CUTS ... CONTINUED

inent northeastern Democraticis Senator said: "He does not want to rock a boat that's already rocking. But this is a transitory situation. The idea is to maintain the status quo until he can figure out where to go next."

An important Senate committee aide, relating conversations with several committee members, commented, "Look, what they're in effect saying is that we took the heat over Vietnam and we don't want to take the responsibility if anything goes wrong anywhere else."

Other Signs of Pattern

There were other indications of what almost all of those interviewed depicted as a short-term pattern, along these lines:

¶Senator Sam Nunn, Democrat of Georgia, a member of the Armed Services committee, who went to South Korea several months ago, then drafted a proposal to phase down the 42,000-man American force tiere. He has now shelved it.

¶The House Democratic leader, Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. of Massachusetts, was a principal co-sponsor of a move last year to reduce American forces overseas by 100,000. This year is said, he is against associating himself with it.

¶Two liberal Democratic Representatives, Les Aspin of Wisconsin and James W. Symington of Missouri, are circulating a resolution reaffirming United States treaty commitments. They have 51 co-sponsors, many of whom have been arguing that American power s overextended.

Proposals Rejected

The maneuvering among Democrats on the Pentagon budget for the fiscal year beginning in July started last month. The new Senate Budget Committee rejected proposals by two Democrats, Joseph R. Biden Jr of Delaware and James Abourezk of South Dakota, that would have made major reductions in spending for national security. Edmund S. Muskie of Maine and Walter F. Mondale of Minnesota, both leading liberal Democrats, voted in the negative.

Mr. Mondale said in a telephone interview: "The Vietnam situation does paitn a different picture for us. It's very important not to signal the Russians and others that we're giving up, the Congress decided against the war in Vietnam. We did not vote to become an isolationist country."

Last year Mr. Mondale voted for the Mansfield moves to cut American forces in Europe and to withdraw and deactivate 76,000 troops overseas. This year, Mr. Mondale said, he would not vote for such measures.

A number of Mr. Mondale's colleagues made similar remarks in interviews, but they would not permit their names to be used.

Focus on New Request

The staff meeting on the defense budget Friday was organized by Senators Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Alan Cranston of California. According to several of those present, the discussion focused on the Pentagon's new request for $28.5-billion for procurement of weapons and for research and development.

"Everyone more or less assumed that a $4-to-$5-billion cut was all that was possible or wise given the current climate," a participant said.

Another related: "What we agreed on was to get a debate started on questioning the assumptions that underlie the Pentagon request. We were not aiming so much at the authonization bills that will be coming up for a vote soon but for the vote on appropriations which will come several months from now and for next year."

Representative Aspin said he was trying to get hi5ecolleagues to "draw a distinction between troop-cut amendments and proposals to cut unnecessary weapons systems." He added: "Our desire to reaffirm commitments should not blind us to cutting other defense programs.

Avoiding a Meat Ax

Mr. Mondale, who also said he wanted to reduce specific weapons systems but not attack the budget with a meat ax, explained: "The course of detente with Moscow has proved more difficult than the Administration stated and than I anticipated two years ago."

Many of those interviewed said their thinking had been affected by as-yet unpublished studies by the Brookings Institution. The maxiumimum cut in defense procurement advanced by the Brookings experts this year was $1.9-billion, the figures much larger in previous years.

In the Senate many interviewed also indicated a desire to find some way of lifting the prohibition on military aid to Turkey. Congress voted last year to stop further aid after Turkey invaded Cyprus. "If we could vote in secret session with no press leaks," a senator said, "we'd reverse ourselves on this issue by a large majority."

A sampling of sentiment in the House still showed a majority in favor of maintaining the ban until progress we was made in the Cyprus negotiations.

PLANES ... CONTINUED

Liberation Radio from Saigon broadcast a condemnation of Thailand and said, "It is time for Thailand to reconcile its policy toward Vietnam or Vietnam will reciprocate accordingly." Hanoi Radio had said that returning the planes to Saigon "would be an important contribution to normalization of relations . . . and peace in the region."

In Bangkok, meanwhile, a Thai government communique announcing the reduction of U.S. military personnel by 7,500 "places" by the end of next month made no mention of closing any of the four remaining American bases or of any reduction in the 350 American aircraft now in the country.

The current level of U.S. military strength in Thailand is reportedly 25,000 servicemen.

The new civilian Thai government declared upon taking office in March that all American forces would have to leave Thailand within 12 months, but few observers think this is likely. The governing coalition is shaky and unlikely to be in office within a year, and there is considerable opposition to the withdrawals from the rightist Thai armed forces.

"The military do not want this to happen" because they feel that without the continued presence of American bases "they would be unable to get as much U.S. military assistance as they presently get," said a Foreign Ministry source. "They consider this equipment vital to combat the insurgency."

Within the past few weeks, a spate of well-publicized Thai Communist insurgent attacks in northern and northeastern Thailand have provided useful ammunition for the military, he said.

Elements of the Foreign Ministry and the civilian government, however, see the continuing U.S. military presence here as preventing any attempt at rapprochement with North Vietnam. Hanoi has already said that it will not talk with the Thai government until all foreign troops are withdrawn from the country.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

TUESDAY MORNING, 6 MAY 1975

BALTIMORE SUN
6 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

U.S. cuts forces in Thailand

By CHARLES W. CORDDRY
Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—The United States and Thailand announced yesterday a new reduction of more than 25 per cent in American military manpower and an unspecified cut in the number of U.S. aircraft still stationed on Thai air bases.

At the same time, the Defense Department disclosed that, despite Thai objections, it is removing from Thailand about 120 American-built planes and 48 helicopters in which South Vietnamese Air Force personnel and other South Vietnamese had fled as Saigon's fall became imminent.

Thailand, seeking to improve relations with Hanoi, had tried to impound the aircraft, it was reported, while it considered demands that they be returned to Vietnam. Their retrieval apparently constitutes the largest success the United States has had in regaining any of the more than $5 billion worth of U.S.-supplied materiel in South Vietnam as North Vietnamese forces swarmed over the country.

The Washington-Bangkok announcement on cuts in American Air Force personnel and aircraft left unanswered the question of the future of an American military presence in Thailand. The Thais want the Americans out by next March.

The Pentagon said yesterday the new reduction is a continuation of decreases that have been going on since late 1973 and negotiations about the future are in progress.

Though Bangkok, now adjusting its policy toward North Vietnam, could capitalize on yesterday's announcement, it was not clear here whether further reductions than those already planned—but unannounced—now will take place by the new June 30 deadline.

It is known, for example, that there were 345 American aircraft of all types on four Thai bases at the start of this month and that plans already called for withdrawing a total of 108 F-111 and F-4 jet combat planes by June 30. The 36 F-111's are to return to their base in Nevada while the 72 F-4's are slated for distribution to units on Okinawa.

Among the additional planes that now may be put on the list, some military observers thought, are 17 B-52 bombers still stationed at Thailand's Utapao base.

The official announcement said only that "authorized" manpower strength would be cut back by June 30 from 27,000 to a new ceiling of 19,500 and that specific units to go would be determined later. The actual strength is about 25,000.

When withdrawals began in September, 1973, the United States had about 43,000 military men and 720 aircraft in Thailand. Thai bases housed forces used in the bombing of North Vietnam. Thai soldiers fought the Communists in South Vietnam.

Now Thailand, experiencing increased insurgency in its northern areas, is revamping policies and Hanoi had said one way to do so would be to return the American-built aircraft in which South Vietnamese fled.

The United States, which claimed title to the planes, thwarted any such outcome when it flew some to the Philippines and loaded others on the aircraft carrier Midway, which pulled up to the Thai port of Sattahip at the start of the weekend.

The Midway, it was reported here, had 27 A-37 attack bombers lifted aboard by helicopters and 24 F-5 jet fighters brought out by barge. It also took on 48 helicopters. A range of larger planes, including 8 C-130 transports, flew out of Utapao.

The retrieval of South Vietnamese Air Force aircraft left possibly 900 planes, including perhaps 200 combat types, in South Vietnam in unknown condition. The total would be about half the strength of the South Vietnamese Air Force at the start of Hanoi's offensive.

A Defense Department official, Erich F. Von Marbod, was in Saigon just before the country fell, trying to assess the extent of losses in American-supplied equipment. He is expected here soon with a report.

The best estimate officials have, meanwhile, is that there was more than $5 billion worth, but a large portion of it unusable.

NEW YORK TIMES - 6 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

U.S. Gets From Thailand Planes Flown by Refugees

By JOHN W. FINNEY
Special to The New York Times

WASINGTON, May 5 — The Defense Department disclosed today that the United States had started removing from Thailand many of the 120 planes flown there by fleeing South Vietnamese pilots last week before the Communists took control in Saigon.

Both North Vietnam and the new Saigon Revolutionary Government demanded that Thailand turn over the planes, but Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger said at a Pentagon news conference last Thursday that the United States still retained title to the aircraft, which it supplied to the former South Vietnamese Government under the military aid program.

The United States also announced jointly with the Thai Government today that the 25,000-man American military force in Thailand would be reduced by about 25 per cent in the next two months.

The Thai Foreign Ministry in Bangkok described the reduction as part of a program to phase out an American military presence in Thailand by next March in accordance with a policy announced when the current Government took office this March.

United States officials, however, were much less emphatic on this point.

The troop reduction is part of a gradual withdrawal of United States troops that was under way before the surrender of Saigon to the Communists. In the wake of the Communist take-over, however, a question is now arising whether Thailand will permit a residual American force to remain.

Both the removal of the American-built aircraft, begun after initial Thai objectives, and the scheduled troop reductions underscored the uncertainties and strains that have grown in relations between the United States and Thailand—which are allies in the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization—with the fall of the American-supported Government in South Vietnam.

Thailand's Premier, Kukrit Pramoj, said after the surrender of Saigon that his Government would enter into negotiations with the Vietnamese Communists concerning return of the planes. But after the American position was enunciated, Thai officials said they would have to re-examine the issue.

Over the weekend, the aircraft carrier Midway anchored off the Thai port of Sattahip and, according to Pentagon officials, began loading 54 F-5 fighter planes and A-37 light attack bombers. Some C-130 transport planes were being flown from Thaillan to Clark Air Base in the Philippines.

Some Unite to Be Withdrawn

A joint American-Thai announcement on troops said the authorized strength of United States forces in Thailand would be reduced from the present approved level of 27,000 to 19,500 by the end of June. The actual strength now is 25,000 men, most of them in the Air Force.

Along with the troop reduction, the United States is due to withdraw some of the Air Force squadrons now stationed in Thailand. The Air Force has about 350 planes in Thailand, including about 200 fighter-bombers and 12 B-52 strategic bombers.

Ron Nessen, the Presidential press secretary, predicted today that there would be further reductions in the United States force in Thailand and said that if the Thai Government wanted all the Americans withdrawn, "then, of course, they will be withdrawn."

In the view of State and Defense Department officials, however, the Thai Government is still divided on whether all American forces should be removed.

One element in the Thai Government, apparently led by Foreign Minister Chatichai Choonhavan, is demanding that American servicemen be removed as quickly as possible. But according to United States officials, there is another strong element that is inclined to permit a continuing American military presence in Thailand, at least until Bangkok can reassess its policy in the new situation in Southeast Asia.

"They are obviously searching for a new policy," one official said, "and for the moment are uncertain what to do about an American military presence."

WASHINGTON POST
6 MAY 1975 Pg. 2

2 Top Officers Of Marines Ask to Retire

Associated Press

Rebuffed by civilian leaders, the two top officers of the Marine Corps have asked for early retirements, Pentagon sources said yesterday.

Gen. Robert E. Cushman Jr., Marine commandant, and Gen. Earl D. Anderson, assistant commandant, have submitted letters asking for retirment July 1, the sources said.

Secretary of the Navy J. William Middendorf II is expected to approve.

The two generals acted less than a week after President Ford followed the recommendation of Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger and Middendorf and nominated Lt. Gen. Louis Wilson, a Medal of Honor winner, to succeed Cushman.

Cushman, whose four-year term normally would end Dec. 31, supported Anderson to follow him as chief of the 196,000-member Marine Corps. Rarely has a Marine commandant given up his post before finishing his full term.

Cushman has told newsmen that he would lose about $300 a month in retirement pay if he stayed on beyond September because of a technical quirk in the law. Anderson also would stand to lose the same amount, sources said.

The sources said it would be incorrect to say that Cushman and Anderson were fired.

But one official said that, while Cushman and Anderson made their own decisions on retirement, there was "encouragement" from senior civilian officials.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

The Washington Merry-Go-Round

THE WASHINGTON POST Tuesday, May 6, 1975 B13

Detente Draining U.S. Technology

By Jack Anderson and Les Whitten

The diplomatic cables have brought reassurances from Moscow that detente is not dead.

The Politburo has dropped hard-liner Alexander Shelepin and has reaffirmed its support of party chairman Leonid Brezhnev's accommodation with the West. In deference to detente, the Kremlin has even refrained from crowing over the U.S. setback in Southeast Asia.

But while detente has brought a welcome relaxation of tensions, the United States has paid a price that the American people haven't been told about. Detente also has produced a technology drain from the United States to the Soviet Union that has cost the United States millions of dollars, thousands of jobs and some valuable scientific secrets.

Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) has become so concerned about the economic consequences and potential danger to national security that he has ordered a Senate investigation.

Here are the details:

The Soviet-American scientific cooperation has been largely one-way. Soviet technology lags years behind ours in most important fields, including agriculture, deep-sea exploration, computers, aircraft development, and space science.

The Russians have little to offer and much to gain, therefore, from the technological exchange. With the active encouragement of the State and Commerce departments, American firms have exported, or are planning to export, millions of dollars worth of technological information and products.

This has upset U.S. intelligence analysts who believe the Soviets are trying to exploit American technology primarily for military purposes.

Finished products are sold to the Soviets, who often put them to military use. Several American firms are bargaining to sell advanced computers and airplanes to the Soviet Union. These models are far more sophisticated than anything the Soviets have produced.

U.S. firms also sell licenses that permit the Soviets to build the products. In such instances, the Soviets buy everything, including blueprints.

Valuable information is released even before contracts are signed. The Soviets dangle lucrative contracts in front of U.S. companies, and while negotiations are in progress, the Soviets seek detailed technical information and send engineering teams to inspect U.S. plants. By the time they leave, one source said, "They have stolen the candy store."

U.S. companies also have offered to build and operate plants for the Soviets. Several proposals are under consideration to build huge, sophisticated airplane manufacturing complexes in the Soviet Union.

Scientists, students and technicians also are exchanged. Under one recent program, 38 Russian students came to the United States to study science, engineering, business, and computers. In exchange, 38 American students went to the Soviet Union and studied history, political science, sociology, and literature.

Experts estimate that at least half the Russians who come to the United States under the exchange programs report back to the KGB, the Soviet security police. The FBI has asked for additional agents to watch them while they are in the United States.

On the other hand, virtually every American male who goes to Moscow for more than two weeks finds himself with a Russian girl friend who wants to "practice her English," intelligence sources told us. Most of the girls are believed to be KGB agents, who are fluent in English.

As an illustration of the technology drain, the Soviets are taking advantage of detente to catch up with the United States in computer science, the key to America's overall technological superiority.

The Soviets are at least 10 years behind in computer development. They have produced one computer of significant capacity, and it would take about 32 of them to equal one top-line U.S. computer.

The Soviets would be further behind if the West had not sold them some advanced computers. One U.S. firm, Control Data Corp., has signed preliminary agreements to help the Soviets build plants to manufacture computers and peripheral equipment.

The Soviets have made sure they will receive considerable technology in the bargain. One agreement, signed Oct. 19, 1973, calls for the "exchange of scientific and technical information; organization of lectures, symposium and demonstrations of the production samples; (and) joint research, development and testing, exchange of research results and experience."

The Soviets also are eager to catch the United States in production of wide-bodied jets. They have one on the drawing board that will come off the production line in 1980. Even then, it will be inferior to current U.S. models.

Holding out possible contracts, the Soviets have obtained detailed plans for wide-bodied jets from Boeing, Lockheed and McDonnell Douglas. A team of about 40 Soviet specialists has visited plants of each company.

Detente may well be Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger's crowning achievement, but it has been a headache for the FBI and the Central Intelligence Agency.

1975, United Feature Syndicate

WASHINGTON POST - 6 MAY 1975 Pg. 10

Lon Nol Officers, Wives Reportedly Are Killed

United Press International

The White House yesterday said intercepted Cambodian radio transmissions indicated that 80 or 90 Cambodian military officers and their wives have been killed by the Khmer Rouge since the fall of Phnom Penh.

Press secretary Ron Nessen said President Ford was "deeply bothered" by the reports and particularly the killing of the wives.

Nessen said the intercepted report also indicated that executions, mostly against military officers of the Lon Nol government, were continuing.

Nessen said that despite censorship in neighboring South Vietnam "some reports" have filtered out of executions of policemen and others in the Communist-held areas of South Vietnam. So such executions had been reported in Saigon, Nessen said.

Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger, apparently referring to the reported Cambodia Killings, said yesterday in a televisied interview," . . We know that in Cambodia very tragic and inhuman and barbarous things are going on." Kissinger cited this as the reason why the United States has not immediately recognized the new Cambodian regime.

Both Time and Newsweek magazines, in this week's editions, report executions of army and government officials in Cambodia.

Time said Mr. Ford revealed the killing of high-ranking officers to republican congressmen last week.

"They killed the wives, too," time quoted Mr. Ford as saying. "They said the wives were just the same as their husbands. This is a horrible thing to report to you, but we are certain that our sources are accurate."

Newsweek quoted a U.S. official as saying "thousands have already been executed," and the figure could rise to "tens of thousands of Cambodians loyal to the Lon Nol regime."

WASHINGTON POST - 6 MAY 1975 Pg. 3

Vietnamese Arms Asked for Rhodesia

Agence France-Presse

KINGSTON, May 5—The Rev. Ndabaningi Sithole, Rhodesidan black nationalist leader, has appealed for the arms used by the Vietnamese to be diverted to "freedom fighters" in his country.

The Rev. Sithole, president of the Zimbabwe African National Union and member of an African National Council delegation in Jamaica, said that if blacks in Rhodesia fighting against white-minority rule could get the arms used by similar fighters in Vietnam, "We would get our liberation in the twinkling of an eye."

Speaking at a public meeting last night, he also announced that the Tanzanian government had made available a base camp for military training in that country previously used by Mozambique Liberation Front Fighters.

NEW YORK TIMES - 6 MAY 1975 Pg. 14

U.S. Protests to Denmark, After Premier's Policy Attack

Special to The New York Times

COPENHAGEN, May 5 — A United States Embassy official said here today that a "sharp protest" had been made to the Danish Government over its criticism of American policies in Vietnam.

The protest, made on Friday by Ambassador Philip K. Crowe, was "necessary to clear the air," the embassy spokesman said. "We just wanted to remind the Danes that there is another side of the story in Vietnam."

The protest followed a comment by Premier Anker Jorgensen of Denmark that United States policies were "far too narrow and too conservative." Mr. Jorgensen said: "The United States has completely misjudged the situation in Vietnam and has based its action on a mistaken ideological basis."

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK TIMES 6 MAY 1975, Pg 20

'Will Korea Be Next?'

Both North and South Appear to Expect Country to Be New Asian Trouble Spot

By RICHARD HALLORAN
Special to The New York Times

SEOUL, South Korea, May 2—With the fall of anti-Communist governments in South Vietnam and Cambodia, the question that has already raced through the capitals of Northeast Asia, and most notably this one, is: Will South Korea be next? President Park Chung Hee clearly thinks ttha South Korea may be the next trouble spot. In a speech just before Saigon fell, he said: "I have repeatedly emphasized that the Communists in North Korea appear to have set 1975 as the year of aggression against the South."

News Analysis

President Kim Il Sung of North Korea equally clearly would like it to be. He has never wavered from his stated objective of reuniting Korea under his rule. Only his tactics have changed and he has recently resumed a belligerent posture.

The major powers involved in this region—the United States, the Soviet Union, China and Japan—seem to hope not. They want to avoid upsetting the delicate balance of power that serves the national interests of each.

U.S. Security Treaty

That is especially true of the United States, which has just finished one land war in Asia and appears to have little taste for another. But it is already involved, having a security treaty that commits American forces to help defend South Korea and being the only foreign nation with troops—about 38,000 of them — on the Korean peninsula.

Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger told newsmen in Washington Thursday that he "would not anticipate that anyone would challenge the U.S. presence" in Korea. But it has been challenged verbally by the North Koreans almost daily and neither the Americans nor anyone else may be able to control the situation.

The influence of the big powers on the Korean peninsula is tenuous. President Park and President Kim are not susceptible to outside persuasion these days. The South Koreans only on their own terms. The North Koreans have shown consummate skill in retaining their independence of their Chinese and Russian allies by playing one against the other.

South Korean and Western analysts of North Korea point to three temptations for Marshal Kim. One is obviously the Communist successes in Cambodia and Vietnam that must fan his own desire to achieve a similar victory.

A second is the deepening trend toward isolationism in the United States. A recent poll indicated that 65 per cent of Americans would oppose United States intervention in a new Korean war and only 14 per cent would approve.

Moreover, the United States is preoccupied with the aftermath of the Vietnam war, the crisis in the Middle East, international economic disruptions and a variety of domestic problems. President Kim has a record of provocation when American attention is elsewhere.

The third, and most important, temptation is the continuing and spreading unrest in South Korea caused by President Park's repressive politics. There has been a steady erosion of popular support for Mr. Park's Government similar to that leading, in the eyes of many observers in Asia, to the downfall of the South Vietnamese regime.

South Koreans of all political persuasions and Western diplomats agree that there is almost no evidence of pro-Communist or pro-North Korean sympathy among the South Koreans. But the disillusion with President Park may be weakening their will to resist North Korean subversion.

The temptations on President Park's side appear less substantial but not absent. He may see merit in a pre-emptive strike to stop the North Koreans before they get started. Mr. Park seemed to lean toward that in his speech last week, when he said: "If the North Korean Communists provoke another war, we must immediately deter it and give them a decisive counterattack at the initial place of aggression. We should thus destroy their vain dream of allegedly revolutionizing the South."

President Park may also be tempted to strike north if he becomes desperate as his political backing at home continues to erode.

Status Quo Preferred

In any event, the dangers of a rapid escalation from low level are recognized by south Korean and Western analysts here. For that reason, they say, none of the major powers favors a conflict and all prefer things as they are.

The Chinese do not want to jeoparsize the detente with the United States that helps them fend off their major adversaries, the Russians. They do not want to send troops to help Worth Korea since that would weaken their defenses against the Soviet Union. That seemed clear from public statements made during President Kim's recent trip to Peking.

(See KOREA, Pg 6)

WASHINGTON POST 6 MAY 1975 Pg. 13

S. Korea Confident Of U.S. Backing

By Ian MacKenzie
Reuter

SEOUL—South Korea's leaders have reacted with outward calm to the Communist takeover in Cambodia and South Vietnam, but they warn of the dangers of a North Korean attack on the south through "miscalculation."

"We are quite confident now that the U.S. government commitment to defend South Korea) would be dutifully abided by," Foreign Minister Kim Dong-Jo said in an interview.

He said the presence of American troops in South Korea—there are about 38,000 U.S. servicemen now in the country—was a very strong factor to discourage a northern invasion of the South.

"It is quite true, however, the (North Korean President) Kim Il-Sung may miscalculate the real intentions of the U.S. Government," he added.

"He may attack South Korea in view of the developments in Phnom Penh and Saigon. He may miscalculate."

North Korea meanwhile accused the Unites States of plotting to "move the center of the military strategy for Asian aggression to South Korea" after American setbacks in Indochina.

The accusation came in a North Korean News Agency commentary on statements by Defense Secretary James Schlesinger at a press conference in Washington Thursday in which he said he did not anticipate any challenge to the U.S. presence in Korea.

In a nationally televised broadcast 24 hours before the Saigon government capitulated, South Korean President Park Chung-Hee warned: "I believe the danger of the North Korean Communist clique playing with fire is greater this year than ever before."

But in an apparent attempt to allay apprehension among the people here, he added: "Should the North Korean Communist clique provoke a war, we shall inflict a decisive and fatal blow on them in an initial stage and crush their fantasy of taking over the South."

Western diplomatic and military sources in Seoul discount the likelihood of a Communist invasion of the South, although none of them deny that the possibility does exist.

Foreign Minister Kim said in his interview that the lesson to be learned from Indochina was that nations should be strong and self-reliant.

"We could see in Phnom Penh, in Saigon, that without having any strength there are no negotiations, no compromise, only surrender," he said.

The collapse of South Vietnam has undoubtedly had some psychological effect on South Korea in that 50,800 Koreans at a time served there for several years, a force second only to that of the United States in size.

But a more important factor in arousing speculation here about North Korean intentions was the recent hurriedly arranged visit by President Kim Il-sung to Peking as the South Vietnamese military crumbled before the advance of the North Vietnamese and Vietcong.

The Foreign Ministry in Seoul condemned the joint communique at the end of the visit as encouraging North Korea to make further provocations against the South and said it "intends no contribution either to easing tension or establishing peace on the Korean Peninsula.

The ministry took particular exception to a speech by the North Korean leader at a welcoming banquet in Peking in which it quoted him as saying: "If a war breaks out or a revolution occurs in South Korea, we will not look on with our arms folded . . . and we have already made every possible preparation for the revolutionary events.

"With the dawn of the outbreaks of revolution in South Korea, we will positively support the South Korean people."

However, diplomatic sources said the tone of the North Korean's speeches and the Southern response were very much in line with previous statements.

Diplomats in Seoul note that the North Koreans have to conduct a delicate balancing act between China and the Soviet Union and Kim now is expected to make a trip to Moscow in the near future to maintain the balance.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

LOS ANGELES TIMES 5 MAY 1975 (6) Pg. 10

Turkey May Go to Libya for Arms, Official States

Foreign Minister Denounces American Embargo on Weapons as 'Inconceivable and Unacceptable'

BY JOE ALEX MORRIS JR.
Times Staff Writer

ANKARA—Turkey will look elsewhere, possibly to one of Israel's most implacable enemies, for its defense needs if the U.S. Congress does not lift its arms embargo on sales to this nation, Foreign Minister Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil said.

"Libya has given us a carte blanche," Caglayangil said in a weekend interview.

Any such move would threaten the delicate balance of power in the eastern Mediterranean by strengthening Turkey's ties to one of the most outspoken foes of the Jewish state. Turkey's relations with Israel have been traditionally friendly. But this largely Moslem country is currently seeking to improve its ties to its oil-rich Arab neighbors.

Caglayangil did not elaborate, but Foreign Ministry sources said the Libyans, in recent contacts, had promised to "cover our needs." The two countries recently exchanged ambassadors for the first time.

The foreign minister denounced the U.S. arms embargo, which went into effect Feb. 5, as "inconceivable and unacceptable." It was passed by Congress in an effort to force Turkey into a more conciliatory stance on the deadlocked Cyprus issue.

Turkey gets well over 90% of its military equipment from the United States but American diplomats here agree with the Turks that the congressional move backfired and merely stiffened Turkish resistance. There have been threats to close U.S. defense installations here, starting with secret listening posts monitoring the Soviet Union which operate directly under U.S. military supervision and have no direct connection to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, which Turkey has no intention of leaving.

As Caglayangil put it: "If the embargo is not lifted, Turkey will feel herself free to react accordingly. This will inevitably have its effects on the common defense installations in Turkey."

The senior Turkish diplomat said the Vietnam debacle had increased Turkey's sense of insecurity about being overly dependent on the United States in its military ties. "The situation in Vietnam brings questions to mind about the future," he said.

"I wouldn't say I've lost my confidence in the United States, but I can't say I've maintained it either."

At the same time, he expressed confidence that Congress would see the light and lift the embargo. "It's obvious Congress was at fault. I don't think it will continue," he added.

Turkish officials made it clear they would seek additional military aid from their NATO allies should the embargo continue. The West German government has already decided to resume its military assistance, and Italy is said here to be receptive to the idea.

But neither is prepared to step in and fill the gap created by the U.S. cutoff of military assistance and arms sales to Turkey.

2A

NEW YORK TIMES 6 MAY 1975, Pg 1

VICTORS EMPTYING CAMBODIAN CITIES, WASHINGTON TOLD

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 5—State Department officials said today that they believed that the Cambodian Communists had forcibly evacuated virtually the entire population of Phnom Penh soon after they took power in the capital early last month.

At least two other cities—Kompong Chhang and Siem Reap—were reported all but emptied, the officials added.

A State Department spokesman said today that on the basis of "reliable information," Washington had learned that "orders were issued by the Khmer Rouge to their outlying commands to kill top political and military leaders around the country" who had been in the old American-backed Government.

Both the White House and the State Department said that there was solid intelligence information that in at least one outlying area, 80 to 90 Cambodian military officers and their wives had been killed.

From Intercepted Messages

The Cambodian Communists, who have always been something of a mystery to Washington, are generally believed to be determined to reconstruct the Cambodian society without outside intervention or assistance. American officials report no requests from the new Government for any kind of aid.

The information from Cambodia comes from intercepted communications within the country as well as from the fragmentary reports that the French government was able to receive from its mission in Phnom Penh, the only foreign embassy that went on operating after the fall of the American-supported Government. The journalists who arrived in Thailand from Cambodia on Saturday have agreed among themselves on a news embargo to insure the safety of the foreigners remaining in the country.

One Washington official said that it did not seem that the Communists were carrying out large-scale massacres or bloodbaths, but rather were following a policy of "pretty brutal repression," particularly in scattering the population.

Vietnam Executions Reported

Secretary of State Kissinger said in an interview televised today that "very tragic and inhuman and barbarous things" had been going on in Cambodia since the Communist-backed insurgents captured Phnom Penh.

Mr. Kissinger did not go into detail in the interview, which was taped Saturday and shown on the NBC "Today" show, but Ron Nessen, the White House press secretary, said today that "there is enough evidence of executions and repression to know there are reprisals going on."

He also said that there were unverified reports from South Vietnam that in some areas, such as Da Nang, there had been executions of policemen or other officials.

NEW YORK TIMES
6 MAY 1975, Pg 45

Co. Mary E. Clarke was nominated yesterday to be director of the Women's Army Corps and the fifth woman general in Army history. If confirmed she will succeed Brig. Gen. Mildred Bailey, who is retiring.

KOREA -- CONTINUED

In addition, a North Korean victory leading to a totally Communist Korea might alarm the Japanese into a major armament program. Conversely, a South Korean victory would put the armies of an American ally on Chinese borders.

The Russians, for similar reasons, do not want to clash directly with the United States. They do not want to weaken their defenses against China. They would not want a North Korean victory to lead to a heavily armed Japan. Nor would they want victorious South Koreans a few miles from their huge naval base in Vladivostok. The Japanese, who have little influence on the Korean peninsula, fear being dragged into a war by the United Stated, which has major bases in Japan to support troops in Korea. They also like a divided Korea as a buffer between Japan and China and the Soviet Union.

The Chinese have some political influence over President Kim as he was once a member of the Chinese Communist party and has ideological, racial and cultural identities with China. They can restrain him slightly by reducing their arms supply and economic aid.

Peking Commitment Seen

But South Korean analysts contend that the Chinese, as the advocates of wars of national liberation, must give President Kim tacit political endorsement. His allies must back him so long as he refrains from all-out war that might involve them and undertakese subversion and guerrilla warfare under the guise of a South Korean revolution.

The Russians, who put Marshal Kim into power in 1945, have even less influence today. They could cut off weapons and logistic support but the North Koreans have been stockpiling for years.

President Kim has been reported to be planning a trip to Moscow soon to continue his maneuvering between the Russians and Chinese. Most analysts here believe that the Russians cannot afford to give him less than the Chinese.

American influence on the South Koreans appears equally weak. President Park has ignored admonitions from President Ford and other American officials that he must lift his repression or see a cut in American support.

Technically, South Korean troops are under American command as they are part jof the United Nations forces here, a residue from the Korean war. Those forces are commanded by an American general, but that is regarded here as little more than a piece of paper.

The major American restraint over South Korea is air power. The South Korean Air Force is less potent than that of North Korean, and Seoul is thus dependent on American air cover.

WASHINGTON POST
6 MAY 1975, Pg 5

Pentagon Budget

The House Armed Services Committee tentatively agreed to cut at least $3.6 billion from the Pentagon's requested budget for the fiscal year beginning July 1, congressional sources said.

The committee, which is scheduled to vote on the entire defense authorization today, agreed to eliminate entirely the $1.3 billion sought for military aid to South Vietnam. Another $2.3 billion reduction was tentatively made in the Pentagon's procurement and research and development accounts. Sources said no major programs were killed but several were ordered reduced in scope.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK TIMES
6 MAY 1975

Congress's 'Inaction' On War

By Thomas F. Eagleton

This unfortunate decision raises grave questions about the willingness of Congress to fulfill its constitutional responsibilities. The President obviously had no authority to use the United States forces to rescue foreign nationals in Vietnam. Yet our forces evacuated thousands of Vietnamese. Asked to explain, President Ford tried to justify his action on "moral" rather than legal grounds. Yet Congress let the precedent stand. Future Presidents might now conclude that the Commander in Chief had an inherent right to do what Mr. Ford did.

The failure of the war-powers resolution to specify those emergency situations wherein the President may unilaterally commit United States forces to battle has left the war powers of Congress and the President as vague as ever.

Lacking such a statutory definition, power accrues to the branch that invokes it. And, once again, in rescuing foreign nationals from Vietnam the President has invoked powers the Founders did not grant the Presidency.

The President can move all too quickly to usurp Congressional powers. He has only to order troops into battle. Congress, on the other hand, can only impose its will through the legislative process.

That is the tragedy of the House's recent action. On the verge of reimposing itself in the decision-making process, Congress rejected the opportunity to legislate.

From the beginning the debate over the President's request for "clarification" was marked by distrust of the executive branch, fear of military reinvolvement in Vietnam, and a conspicuous lack of confidence that a law, however tightly drafted, would be faithfully executed. In the end, liberals, long disenchanted by the imperial Presidency they helped create, unintentionally threw their considerable weight in the direction of Presidential omnipotence.

To avoid the remotest of possibilities—that President Ford would send forces back into Vietnam despite his written promise not to—Congress chose to leave a precedent for unilateral and unrestricted Presidential rescue authority.

White House references to "moral" justification and the pleasure Congress seems to derive in abrogating its constitutional responsibilities should alarm those who see the rule of law as America's primary source of strength.

Congress has again failed to act in a forthright and timely manner to proscribe a Presidential war-making initiative. By its inaction, and by its refusal even to provide expost facto authorization for the Vietnam evacuation, Congress has once again shirked its constitutional duty.

Thomas F. Eagleton, junior Democratic Senator From Missouri, is author of "War and Presidential Power: A Chronicle of Congressional Surrender."

NEW YORK TIMES - 6 MAY 1975

U.S. Trustworthiness

By Robert Kleiman

LONDON—The post-Vietnam questioning in Europe on whether American security assurances can still be trusted is scheduled to produce a ringing reaffirmation of confidence on May 29-30 at the NATO summit conference in Brussels. But that is unlikely to end the questioning.

A subtle but important change has occurred in the character of this unusual meeting of chiefs of government—only the third in the 26 years of the West's grand alliance—since it was proposed by British Foreign Secretary James Callaghan. The proposal first was made to Secretary Kissinger during his brief London stopover March 23 en route from his Mideast failure to a Washington divided over the impending defeat in Indochina.

British correspondents and diplomats in Washington were reporting rising pressure for the resignation of the Republican Secretary of State, whom Britain's socialist Foreign Secretary regarded as the main point of strength in the Ford Administration and the chief hope of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

"We must save Henry," Mr. Callaghan reportedly told his closest associates; he evidently also foresaw an American trauma dangerous to Western solidarity that might be eased if the European allies rallied around. But in the weeks that since have passed, the primary concern has shifted from Kissinger's fate to Europe's.

Most Europeans are less troubled by American disengagement from Indochina, which they favored years before most Americans, than by the way it was done.

The key NATO governments have noted that Congress for six months withheld all major replacement equipment and half or more of the fuel, ammunition, spare parts and maintenance aid needed by the South Vietnamese armed forces; triggering the retreat order that led to rout.

They see an isolationist trend in American opinion with only 39 per cent in a national Harris poll prepared to defend West Europe, 34 per cent Berlin and half that number such Asian areas as Taiwan and South Korea.

Finally, the impotence of the post-Watergate Administration in the face of these challenges has raised questions about the solidity of America's commitments everywhere.

"After the first betrayal of a lover, the second is much easier," said a former Belgian cabinet minister. "I've experienced that."

In separate London conversations, a Labor Cabinet minister and a leading member of the former Conservative Government said, "Europe is not Vietnam," adding that vital American interests were involved in West Europe. But within minutes each independently recalled the long, tortuous effort of Franklin D. Roosevelt to come to Europe's support in World War II and, had it not been for Pearl Harbor, the likelihood that American intervention would have been delayed much longer.

"Europe is not Vietnam." One hears the same supposedly reassuring phrase in Paris, Brussels, Bonn. Unlike the Nixon-Thieu letters, the NATO alliance is based on a binding treaty, ratified by Congress, open and above board. Right? Wrong. On American insistence, the treaty binds no one to anything. It obligates each of its 15 members in the event of an attack only to take "such action as it deems necessary" through its "constitutional processes." That means Congress will decide.

NATO theology has it that West Europe's security is assured by the presence of American troops, which would trigger American tactical and strategic nuclear forces if threatened with defeat. But Congressional visitors in recent weeks have told Europeans they strongly favor American troop reductions.

As for American strategic forces, not since John F. Kennedy in 1963 has an American President said to Europeans, "The United States will risk its cities to defend your freedom." After many years of denials, official American doctrine now acknowledges the declining credibility of the nuclear guarantee in an era of strategic parity. Vietnam has carried that decline further.

There is renewed talk in Brussels, Paris and Bonn of a European defense community, presumably including a European nuclear force based on the French and British deterrents. Some of President Giscard d'Estaing's advisers want to start by putting France's new tactical nuclear weapons at the disposal of West German forces under a system of joint control.

Neutralism looks more attractive to others. The left wing of West Germany's Socialist party argues for withdrawal of American troops as untrustworthy and no longer needed anyway because of détente. Neutralist tendencies are growing in Portugal, Spain, Italy, Greece and Turkey.

Just as Thailand and the Philippines are moving toward neutralism and South Korea is attempting to acquire nuclear know-how, Vietnam has given many West Europeans the feeling that they must move toward the neutralization or nuclearization of Europe—or both. It's a trend that, after Vietnam, will not be halted by lip-service at a NATO summit meeting to the steadiness of the American commitment and Europe's confidence in it.

Robert Kleiman is a member of the Editorial Board of The Times.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON POST
6 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

Kissinger: No Role in CIA Spying

By William Greider
Washington Post Staff Writer

Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger denied yesterday that he had anything to do with the Central Intelligence Agency's controversial domestic spying operations during the Nixon administration.

Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger added later that the CIA did get direction for the activities from other unnamed "senior officials" in the Nixon White House.

The two Cabinet officers appeared separately yesterday for private testimony before the Rockefeller commission which is investigating alleged violations by the CIA of its charter prohibiting domestic intelligence collection.

Former CIA Director Richard Helms has insisted that any "domestic" operations launched by the CIA were in response to the expressed concern of two Presidents—Lyndon B. Johnson and Richard M. Nixon.

As the President's national security adviser, Kissinger is responsible for affairs of the National Security Council, which is supposed to direct the CIA.

But Kissinger told reporters that neither he nor the NSC ever got into domestic spying, suggesting that if the CIA got such orders, it received them directly from the President or from other White House aides.

"Since I have been in Washington," Kissinger said, 'the NSC or the NSC staff or the assistant to the President for national security affairs did not concern themselves with domestic intelligence or were not informed about domestic intelligence."

When Kissinger was asked about Helms' statement attributing the surveillance operations to presidential concern, Kissinger replied: "No such presidential concern was transmitted through me or through the NSC."

Schlesinger, a former director of the CIA, added another dimension when he appeared later before reporters following his private testimony. Based on his own investigation, Schlesinger supported the accounts of both Kissinger and Helms.

"My recollection, the whole tone of the agency would suggest that, indeed, there were expressions of interest on the part of senior officials of the government," Schlesinger said.

He would not elaborate on who those officials were, but he cited, by way of example, the pre-Watergate episode involving the CIA and the White House "plumbers" when presidential assistant John D. Ehrlichman contacted the intelligence agency for help.

Schlesinger made a general denial that the CIA used assassination as a "tool" but he would not discuss the allegations that the CIA was involved in plots aimed at several foreign leaders.

He did denounce as "simply preposterous" the various popular theories that link the CIA to the slaying of President John F. Kennedy.

When Kissinger entered the press room for his statements, he made a joking reference to a harsh attack which former CIA Director Helms made last week on CBS correspondent Daniel Schorr. Helms called Schorr a string of names, including a sexual epithet.

Kissinger quipped: "Where's Dan Schorr? I have a new word for him."

That matter, he noted "had come through channels other than the NSC channels from senior White House officials."

Both Cabinet officers also apparently dealt in private testimony with the allegations of CIA involvement in foreign assassination attempts, though neither would say much about the subject to reporters.

When a reporter asked Kissinger if his testimony touched on the issue of assassinations, the Secretary chuckled.

"I have said that I will not go into any further details," Kissinger replied. "At any event, none of these allegations occurred, pertained to any period in which I have personal knowledge."

NEWS SUMMARY -- CONTINUED

South Vietnam's new rulers said they had begun freeing political prisoners from Con Son island off the Mekong delta.

Cambodia's Khmer Rouge government has executed 80 or 90 top officers of the Lon Nol army and their wives, and the killings apparently are continuing, the White House said it had learned through intercepted Khmer Rouge communications.

U.S. troops in Thailand will be reduced to 18,500 from 27,000 by June as part of what Thailand said was a program to end the American military presence there by next March.

* * *

No-fault car insurance legislation setting federal standards is still opposed by the Ford administration, which prefers that states adopt the concept piecemeal, Transportation Secretary William Coleman told Congress. Two Cabinet officers, apparently including Coleman, had urged Ford to back federal standards.

* * *

Social Security trustees announced a sharp increase in the system's projected deficit over the extremely long term, as expected, but the deficit won't require a big rise in payroll levies until later. The combined employer and employe payroll tax need only climb about one percentage point for the short term, although it eventually will have to go up 5.3 points to keep the program solvent, the Ford administration said.

* * *

A compromise strip-mining bill won speedy Senate approval and was sent to the House, where a vote was expected tomorrow. The bill, designed to limit damage to the environment from surface mining of coal, is similar to legislation vetoed in 1974.

* * *

An extra $385 million for the federal food-stamp program for this fiscal year was asked by President Ford.

* * *

Eighteen antiwar protesters lost a $1-million damage suit against H. R. Haldeman, Charlotte, N.C., policemen and others who the plaintiffs contended had unconstitutionally barred them from a 1971 rally at which Nixon spoke.

* * *

Rep. Wilbur Mills returned to Congress after a five-month absence for treatment of alcoholism. The Arkansas Democrat, who lost his Ways and Means Committee chairmanship because of his alcoholism and involvement with a stripper, said he feels fine.

* * *

Ford's Interior Secretary nominee, Stanley Hathaway, conceded to a Senate committee that a report defending his environmental record as Wyoming governor was incomplete. Environmentalists have criticized the report as misleading and Hathaway's efforts as weak.

* * *

Secretary of State Kissinger denied any involvement in alleged CIA domestic spying or assassination plots. He testified before the Rockefeller commission on intelligence, along with Defense Secretary Schlesinger and former CIA director John McCone, both of whom also denied that the agency plotted any killings.

* * *

The U.S. agreed to sell Jordan Hawk antiaircraft missiles, the Associated Press said. The reported promise was made to King Hussein when he visited Washington last week.

Israeli Premier Yitzhak Rabin will meet June 11-12 with President Ford in Washington, 10 days after Ford returns from a conference with Egyptian President Anwar Sadat in Salzburg, Austria.

* * *

Two top Marine Corps officers have asked for early retirement less than a week after President Ford nominated Lt. Gen. Louis Wilson as commandant, the Associated Press said. They are Gen. Robert E. Cushman Jr., whose term as commandant expires Dec. 31, and Gen. Earl E. Anderson, assistant commandant; who was backed by Cushman for the top post.

* * *

A Pulitzer Prize for public service was given to the Boston Globe for coverage of that city's school-desegregation crisis. The award for national reporting went to a team from the Philadelphia Inquirer for stories on inequities in federal taxation, and two Chicago Tribune reporters won the international coverage prize for a series on African and Indian famines. The Xenia, Ohio, Gazette was honored for coverage of a tornado.

The Pulitzer Prize for biography went to Robert Caro for "The Power Broker—Robert Moses and the Fall of New York." Edward Albee won the drama award for "Seascape," the history prize was given to Dumas Malone for five volumes on Jefferson and Michael Shaara won the fiction award for "The Killer Angels."

* * *

The nuclear nonproliferation treaty, signed in 1969, came up for its first review with nonnuclear nations accusing the U.S. and Russia of accelerating the arms race.

* * *

Died: Kenneth Keating, 74, ambassador to Israel, former New York GOP congressman and senator and ex-ambassador to India, in New York, of a heart attack; Bernard Ridder, 92, chairman emeritus of Ridder Publishing Inc., in West Palm Beach, Fla. Services for Samuel Colt, 82, former chairman and president of Bankers Trust, will be held today in Westhampton Beach, N.Y., where he died Friday.

APB072
(BANGKOK) -- A BANGKOK GOVERNMENT SPOKESMAN SAID TODAY THAT THAILAND HAS DECIDED TO HOLD ONTO ALL VIETNAMESE AIRCRAFT BROUGHT IN BY FLEEING PILOTS. THE THAI GOVERNMENT REPORTEDLY HAS URGED THE U-S NOT TO REMOVE ANY OF THE AIRCRAFT FROM THAI SOIL. THE DECISION CAME AFTER THE UNITED STATES REPORTEDLY REMOVED AT LEAST 25 SOUTH VIETNAMESE WARPLANES THAT ARE THE CENTER OF CONTROVERY BETWEEN THAILAND, THE U-S AND VIETNAM.
WITNESSES REPORT A BIG U-S JOLLY GREEN GIANT HELICOPTER PLUCKED SOUTH VIETNAMESE JETS FROM THE AIR BASE AT UTAPAO (OO'-TUH-POW) SUNDAY AND YESTERDAY AND CARRIED THEM OFF TO AN UNKNOWN DESTINATION.
04:06AED 05-06-75

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CURRENT NEWS

PART II - MAIN EDITION - 1130

THIS SUPPLEMENTS PART I-EARLY BIRD EDITION

THIS PUBLICATION IS PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL NEWS ITEMS OF INTEREST TO THEM IN THEIR OFFICIAL CAPACITIES. IT IS NOT INTENDED TO SUBSTITUTE FOR NEWSPAPERS, PERIODICALS AND BROADCASTS AS A MEANS OF KEEPING INFORMED ABOUT THE NATURE, MEANING AND IMPACT OF NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL NEWS DEVELOPMENTS. USE OF THESE ARTICLES HERE, OF COURSE, DOES NOT REFLECT OFFICIAL ENDORSEMENT. FURTHER REPRODUCTION FOR PRIVATE USE OR GAIN IS SUBJECT TO THE ORIGINAL COPYRIGHT RESTRICTIONS.

MONDAY, MAY 5, 1975

WASHINGTON POST 3 May 1975 Pg. 9 (5)

Shah Wants U.S. Navy Out

By Gavin Young
London Observer

TEHRAN, May 2—The shah of Iran wants any permanent American military presence removed from the Persian Gulf area, including the American naval base in Bahrain.

At the same time, Shah Mohamed Reza Pahlavi said in an interview this week, he expects Iraq to agree to a similar exclusion of Soviet bases in the Gulf.

In his hillside palace outside Tehran, the shah said: "We both want to keep third parties out." He went on to say that he would favor some sort of council or conference of Gulf states to cope with local problems of whatever kind.

"But," he added, "I would rather the suggestion came from someone else." It will probably come from Saddam Hussein, who is vice president and the effective leader of Iraq.

Monarchial Iran and socialist Iraq have been bitter rivals for years and have regularly feuded over their borders. But in March, they suddenly resolved their differences and settled their border dispute.

The new friendship of the two main military powers in the world's principal oil producing area was signified this week as Iraq's strongman, Saddam Hussein, came to Teheran and stood shoulder-to-shoulder with the shah.

The only American base in the immediate area, at Bahrain, is small. It normally serves a mere three ships — a 13,000-ton flagship and two destroyers.

Its commander has said: "We are just here to show the flag to the emergent nations out here." Neither Iran nor Iraq feels it needs to be shown any outsider's flag.

The Soviets claim to have no foreign bases. But they make frequent and regular use of Umm al Qasr, Iraq's Persian Gulf port, as well as installations in South Yemen and Somalia, U.S. officials have said.

The Soviet navy keeps one to two dozen ships on station

See SHAH...Pg. 3

BALTIMORE SUN
5 May 1975 Pg. 1

Security force put in Saigon

By EDWARD K. WU
Hong Kong Bureau of The Sun

Hong Kong—A military control commission for the Saigon area, chaired by Col. Gen. Tran Van Tra, who engineered the devastating 1968 Tet offensive, has been formed, Hanoi's Vietnam News Agency reported yesterday.

The broadcast monitored here said the new administrative body was aimed at "quickly restoring public security and order in the city, building a new revolutionary order, consolidating and developing the right of the masses to be masters of their city and rapidly nomalizing the life of the population of all strata in the city."

In a separate broadcast, the Viet Cong Giai Phong (liberation) press agency was quoted as reporting that thousands of officers and men of the former South Vietnamese armed forces had reported themselves to the new "People's Liberation Army," in the last few days.

Among them were said to be 6 colonels, 6 lieutenant colonels and 1,491 other officers. Many ships anchored at offshore islands flew white flags and gave themselves up while the officers aboard two ships sailed from Poulo Condor Islands and handed them over to the new Navy, the news agency said.

All those who brought their ships "back to the revolution" were treated by the Revolutionary Government according to its announced policies of leniency and reward, the broadcast added.

(Radio reports from South

See SAIGON...Pg. 2

NEW YORK TIMES (5)
3 May 1975 Pg. 27

CONGRESS DEFIED BY NAVY ON PLANE

By JOHN W. FINNEY
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 2—The Navy, in defiance of a Congressional injunction for interservice cooperation, has decided to build a fighter plane different from the Air Force's.

It announced today that as a "low cost" fighter for the nineteen-eighties, it had selected a twin-engine plane developed by the McDonnell Douglas Corporation and the Northrop Corporation. The Air Force had previously selected a single-engine plane made by the General Dynamics Corporation.

If the Navy's selection is approved by the Department of Defense and Congress, it plans to build 800 of the planes at a total cost of $7-billion. The plane, which would enter the fleet in 1981, would replace the F-4 as the principal fighter-bomber of the carrier fleet.

It was far from certain, however, that Congress would approve the Navy's decision. In an attempt to develop some similarity in the weapons used by the services, a House-Senate conference committee specified in this year's appropriations bill that for its future fighter, the Navy was to produce a "derivative" of the air combat fighter selected by the Air Force.

ffficial Explains Stand

The Air Force earlier this year selected the F-16 developed by General Dynamics as its "low cost" fighter of the future. In refusing to go along with that selection, the Navy chose a version of Northrop's F-17 that had been rejected by the Air Force.

David S. Potter, Under Secretary of the Navy, said that a version of the F-17 had been selected because it was "more suitable" for carrier operations —in terms of landing speed, visibility and fuselage strength —than the F-16 was. In addition, for safety reasons, the

See NAVY...Pg. 2

NEW YORK TIMES
4 May 1975 Pg. 1 (5)

PRESIDENT VOWS NATION WILL KEEP PLEDGES ABROAD

By RICHARD L. MADDEN
Special to The New York Times

NORFOLK, Va., May 3—Four days after the evacuation of the remaining Americans from South Vietnam, President Ford pledged today that the United States would keep its commitments abroad and would remain militarily strong.

Speaking at piersidé ceremonies at the commissioning of the nuclear aircraft carrier U.S.S. Nimitz, the world's largest warship, Mr. Ford told an applauding crowd of more more than 10,000 that jammed Pier 12 under sunny skies:

"We are strong, we will continue to be strong. We will keep our commitments, and we will remain a great country."

Symbol of 'Determination'

Without directly mentioning the concerns of some allies about the recent collapse of United States-supported governments in Cambodia and South Vietnam, Mr. Ford said that the Nimitz was joining the fleet "at an auspicious moment, when our determination to strengthen our ties with allies across both great oceans and to work for peace and stability around the world requires clear demonstration."

He said that the Nimitz, the nation's second nuclear-powered carrier, along with other American forces worldwide, would make "critically important contributions toward world peace.

With the carrier at his back Mr. Ford said he saw the Nimitz "as a symbol of the vast

See PRESIDENT...Pg. 2

JAMES KILLINGBECK, CHIEF, CURRENT NEWS BRANCH, OX 78765 HELEN YOUNG, ASSISTANT CHIEF

FOR SPECIAL RESEARCH SERVICES OR DISTRIBUTION CALL HARRY ZUBKOFF, CHIEF, EXECUTIVE AGENCY SERVICE, OX 52884

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

SAIGON...
Continued

Vietnam said former Navy men were being urged to bring in their warships from off the coast and not "run after the Americans," the Associated Press said.

["To run after the Americans is to run into a dead-end, without your family and without your country," the broadcast was quoted as saying. "What a disaster to be away from your children, your wife and your country when your nation is unified."

[Meanwhile, Reuter said the North Vietnamese Army newspaper Quan Doi Nhan reported that Gen. Duong Van (Big) Minh, the last South Vietnamese president who served only two days before surrendering, has been released. The report in the North Vietnamese paper said General Minh and other members of his short-lived administration are in Saigon and have not been asked to leave the country.

[The AP reported that Saigon radio broadcasts monitored in Thailand indicated that General Minh, might have a role in the new order, but it did not say what it might be. One broadcast said that after General Minh and his aides surrendered they were given a briefing on the new policies and told not to worry.

[Other broadcasts said the Revolutionary Government, which took over after Saigon's surrender last Wednesday, directed South Vietnamese diplomats to turn over money and embassy property to the new regime. They also announced that it wants South Vietnam's place at the United Nations, the AP reported. South Vietnam has had observer status at the world body.

[In Paris, government officials said 38 French journalists and photographers who had stayed in Saigon were being well treated and the new authorities were acting "in a reassuring fashion."]

The newly formed military commission will include five vice chairmen and five other members, among the several public figures well known to the people of Saigon, such as Dr. Nguyen Van Thu, as well as the Revolutionary Government's vice minister of economy, Vuong Ky Hiep.

The commission, the Vietnam News Agency said, has called on the "People's Liberation Forces" (Viet Cong) in and around Saigon to stand combat ready, maintain public order and security, defend the city and implement the policies of the Revolutionary Government.

The radio announcement about General Tra said the 11-man commission he heads is assigned to protect Saigon and adjacent Gia Dinh province. General Tra also was the chief Viet Cong delegate to the Joint Military Commission set up in 1973 under the so-called Paris peace accords.

Another broadcast by the Giai Phong press agency said the Revolutionary Government's Foreign Ministry yesterday served formal notes to the governments of Thailand, the Philippines, Malaysia and Singapore pressing for the return of South Vietnamese planes and warships, which members of the former government and armed forces took with them when they fled the country.

It reiterated its earlier statement that the Revolutionary Government, having replaced the Saigon regime, is the legal owner of these planes and ships.

The Philippines, Malaysia and Singapore have not made known their position on the planes and ships. Thailand has impounded the aircraft and vessels with its prime minister hinting that they might be returned to Saigon, but the defense minister, contradicting the prime minister, said subsequently he thought they should go to the United States.

[The Soviet new agency Tass said, according to the AP, that thousands of servicemen turned over to authorities their arms, machinery and equipment, registered themselves and then were permitted to go to their homes.

[Earlier Saigon broadcasts said soldiers of the defeated forces had to register by Wednesday or face punishment. A reward was promised for compliance, but there was no indication what it would be.]

PRESIDENT...
Continued

power, productive skill and economic strength of America and so would others around the world.

'Readiness and Flexibility'

He added: "To all, this great ship is visible evidence of our commitment to friends and allies and our capability to maintain those commitments."

He said the evacuation of Americans and South Vietnamese from Saigon last Tuesday demonstrated the "readiness and flexibility" of aircraft carriers "in the successful execution of national policy."

Without the five carriers that operated off South Vietnam and the Marine and Air Force helicopters that flew from their flight decks, he said, "we could not have rescued all the remaining American citizens and thousands of endangered Vietnamese from Saigon within 20 hours."

The crowd interrupted the President with applause as he congratulated the evacuation force for "the work that was done."

Mr. Ford stood at attention on an elevator of the huge carrier as the orders to "Take the first watch" and "Break the commission pennant" were given, officially marking the Nimitz as a ship of the United States Navy.

The President noted that he had served as "a lowly lieutenant" on the aircraft carrier Monterey under Admiral of the Fleet Chester W. Nimitz in the Pacific during World War II. That carrier, he noted, would probably fit on the hangar deck of the Nimitz.

U.S. Strength Emphasized

Both Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger, who introduced the President, and Mr. Ford used the occasion to reaffirm that the United States would remain strong.

Mr. Schlesinger said that Mr. Ford had declared with "unmistakable clarity" that the United States "will maintain a military balance around the world."

Mr. Ford said the ship was a "double symbol for today's challenges." He said the Nimitz was a symbol of the United States's resources, skill, energy "and of our massive but controlled military strength." He added:

"Whether her mission is one of defense, diplomacy or humanity, the Nimitz will command awe and admiration from some, caution and circumspection from others, and respect from all."

He praised Admiral Nimitz who died in 1966 at the age of 80, as a man who "learned by his mistakes and was tolerant of others—but always in command."

Admiral Nimitz, he said, had "turned defeat into victory and made the broad Pacific again worthy of its name."

"It is my determination to keep it that way, the way all the oceans and continents ought to be," Mr. Ford said. "But Fleet Admiral Nimitz and this fine ship both tell us that controlled strength is the sure guarantor of peace."

Before flying back to Washington in early afternoon, Mr. Ford joined Capt. Bryan W. Compton Jr., the skipper of the Nimitz, on the hangar deck to cut an 1,800-pound commissioning cake—a white layer cake covered with chocolate frosting. The President cut a slice with a sword handed to him by Captain Compton and then ate the slice.

NAVY...
Continued

Navy has traditionally preferred a two-engine plane for carrier use.

At the same time, Mr. Potter acknowledged that the Navy's choice had the "unfortunate quality" that it "clearly does not meet the language" contained in the appropriations bill.

In aerospace circles, suspicions were expressed that the Navy would not be too upset if Congress refused to finance the production of the new plane, which has been designated the F-18.

Only under considerable pressure from the Defense Department and Congress did the Navy consent to study a new fighter plane based on the competing F-16 and F-17. The Navy's preference, according to industry officials, would be to develop its own plane from scratch or expand production of the F-14 fighter built by Grumman Aerospace Corporation on Long Island.

Costs Are Estimated

At this point Congress would presumably be reluctant to go along with production of the F-14, because of its high cost, now planned. But the argument is being made in industry and Navy circles that if more F-14's were produced, instead of the F-18, the price of the plane could be reduced significantly.

Excluding research costs, the F-14 is costing about $12.8-million per plan. Mr. Potter estimated the production cost of the F-18 at $5.8 million (in 1975 dollars), but when research and other expenses are included, the cost would come to $7.8-million per plane.

The cost of the Air Force's F-16 is rising, and some Air Force and industry officials are suggesting that it might be almost as cheap to build more of the F-15, the new complex fighter plane of the Air Force.

A Basic Challenge

Both the Navy and Air Force, therefore, the raising a basic challenge to the "HI-LO" concept advanced by the Defense Department and endorsed by Congress as a way to stem the ever spiraling costs of major weapons. Under this concept, the services would build expensive planes to fight in "high-threat" areas and less expensive planes for "low threat" areas.

The Navy's selection could also complicate the efforts of the Defense Department to prevail upon a European consortium of Denmark, Norway, Belgium and the Neatherlands to buy the F-16 as their future fighter. Until now, most of the European nations had been inclined to go along with the Air Force's selection of the F-16 as the superior plane, but they could have second thoughts now that the Navy has selected a version of the F-17.

The Navy plane would be produced by McDonnell Douglas at St. Louis, Mo., with Northrop, which developed the design, producing parts at its plant in Hawthorne, Calif. The enginees would be produced by General Electric Company at West Lynn, Mass.

NEW YORK NEWS
3 May 1975 Pg. 73 (5)

Scrub Spy Plane Test

Cape Canaveral, May 2 (UPI) —A flight test of a new Air Force robot spy plane was cancelled today because of instrumentation problems. An Air Force spokesman said that the test would probably be rescheduled for Monday. The test flight was scrapped when technicians discovered an altimeter in the YQM-98-A Compass was not reading properly.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II--Main Edition--5 May 1975
WASHINGTON POST 5 May 1975 Pg. 39

Ford Reassures U.S. Allies

By George C. Wilson
Washington Post Staff Writer

NORFOLK, Va., May 3—President Ford said today that the United States will keep its commitments to its friends around the world.

Speaking at commissioning ceremonies for the nuclear-powered aircraft carrier Nimitz, the President said, "We are strong, we will continue to be strong, we well keep our commitments."

Mr. Ford barely mentioned Vietnam in his speech at the Norfolk naval station, a sharp contrast to President Nixon's remarks on the same pier two years ago this month.

"Without the fine aircraft carriers which served as the nucleus of our forces operating off South Vietnam," the President said in his only reference to Indochina, and the "heroic performance" of service personnel involved in the evacuation effort, "we could not have rescued all of the remaining American citizens and thousands of endangered Vietnamese from Saigon within 20 hours."

Referring to the USS Nimitz as a symbol of American power in the world, Mr. Ford said that the attack carrier "joins the fleet at an auspicious moment, when our determination to strengthen our ties with allies across both great oceans, and to work for peace and stability around the world, requires clear demonstration."

"To all, this great ship is visible evidence of our commitment to friends and allies and our capability to maintain those commitments," Mr. Ford said.

Adm. James L. Holloway III, chief of naval operations, called the Nimitz "the most powerful warship in the world." The carrier is named after the late Fleet Adm. Chester W. Nimitz, a World War II naval hero.

The USS Nimitz today became the second nuclear-powered carrier in the Navy fleet. The other, the USS Enterprise, was commissioned 14 years ago.

The last attack carrier commissioned by the Navy was the John F. Kennedy, which went into service in September, 1968. It is powered by conventional fuel as a result of the Navy losing an argument over its propulsion to Defense Secretary Robert S. McNamara.

The Navy said today that the Nimitz cost $684 million—not counting the price of the 100 aircraft that go aboard her. The Navy estimated in 1968 that the Nimitz would cost $240 million less—or $544 million. The Nimitz's two nuclear reactors can drive the 1,092-foot ship for 13 years without refueling, according to the Navy, and its top speed is more than 30 knots.

The 95,000-ton ship will have a crew of 6,286, many of whom are needed to operate and repair its elaborate electronics systems for modern warfare. The flight deck is 4½ acres.

The Soviet Union has not built such giant attack carriers, opting for smaller carriers about half the size of the Enterprise and the Nimitz. The Soviet carriers are used for helicopters and planes that can take off on their own from the deck rather than being catapulted, the launching method aboard U.S. Navy carriers.

The U.S. Navy is working on sister ships to the Nimitz. The Eisenhower nuclear-powered attack carrier has been launched and is expected to be finished within two or three years. The keel has been laid on the Vinson, a third big nuclear carrier, slated to be ready in the 1980s.

SHAH...Continued

in the Indian Ocean near the tanker routes exiting the Persian Gulf. The Soviets have been there since 1968. Increasingly, the U.S. Navy is sending bigger ships, including carriers, into the Indian Ocean to counter the Soviet presence.

Last year an American carrier sailed into the Persian Gulf for the first time in a quarter century.

The shah's opposition to the foreign presence does not mean he is turning anti-American. Last year Iran was the largest buyer of American weapons and this month he will visit President Ford.

He is now awaiting delivery of no less than 80 F-14 Tomcat fighters from the U.S., as well as 141 F-5 fighters to add to his 100 Phantoms.

But there is no doubt of the intensity of the Iranian feeling that superpowers from East or West are unwanted. Prime Minister Amir Abbas Hoveyda, in another palace in Tehran, said: "We shouldn't have third parties coming in. We, the Gulf states, can keep the peace in this area."

And the point was stressed yet again in a conversation with another official, Interior Minister Jamshid Amouzegar. "His Majesty wants all bases removed," Amouzegar said.

The Shah says he wants to defuse the chances of war in his part of the world. The danger stems from the rapid arms buildup which is a feature of all the newly rich oil states. It also lies in the neat certainty that in another Arab-Israeli war, the Arab oil states will cut fuel supplies to the United States again. The shah has said Iran will not join such a boycott and did not join in 1973.

The Shah is continuing to improve relations with Arab nations. President Anwar Sadat of Egypt has just flown to Tehran. There have long been excellent relations with Jordan; the shah was in Saudi Arabia just before the Iraqi's visit here to consult with King Khalid.

The result of all this cannot yet be forecast. But one thing is certain: Iranians and Arabs are seeking to build their own form of peaceful coexistence—with diminished risk of disruption by the superpowers—in an area where war could spell catastrophe.

BALTIMORE SUN 3 May 1975 Pg. 1 (5)

Defiant Navy opts for F-18

By CHARLES W. CORDDRY
Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—The Navy, flying in the face of a congressional order, yesterday chose a new twin-engine aircraft for development as its lightweight fighter of the 1980's instead of adopting the single-engine plane already chosen by the Air Force.

A production run of 800 of the new F-18 jets, the number the Navy wants, would cost about $7 billion, officials said.

The Navy's selection of the F-18 over the Air Force F-16, which was picked in January, not only runs counter to congressional instructions but may complicate negotiations involving jet fighter sales to North Atlantic Treaty Organization allies and other foreign purchasers.

A production team of McDonnell Douglas Corporation of St. Louis and Northrop Corporation of Hawthorne, Calif., won the Navy competition over a team of General Dynamics Corporation of Fort Worth and LTV Aerospace Corporation of Dallas. General Dynamics will build the Air Force F-16.

The F-16, which the Navy said would be cheaper but not as suitable for carriers, is in competition with a French fighter plane for large sales to a NATO consortium made up of Norway, Denmark, Belgium and the Netherlands.

The European countries have yet to decide, but are said to lean toward the American plane. A new entry, the F-18, may complicate negotiations or, on the other hand, open the door to new sales in the Persian Gulf Area.

When it approved a sum of $20 million last year for starting development of a new Navy plane, a Senate-House conference committee on appropriations said a prerequisite for using the funds must be the "adaptation of the selected Air Force" fighter.

"Future funding," the panel also said, "is to be contingent upon the capability of the Navy to provide a derivative of the selected Air Force" plane.

The Navy now has chosen a derivative, not of the F-16, but of the Northrop fighter that lost the Air Force competition.

Asked about this at a press conference yesterday, the under secretary of the Navy, David S. Potter, replied: "It is perfectly clear this does not meet the language of the congressional report."

He said that was an "unfortunate" aspect of the Navy decision, but the service was "optimistic" about changing congressional minds and winning assent for the big F-18 program now envisioned.

There may be a good basis for the Navy optimism. Unemployment is greater now than when the appropriations panel issued its order, with a view to military economizing. This is especially so in the southern California area where much of the F-18 work would be done and where Northrop lost out on the Air Force contract.

Moreover, the selection of General Dynamics to build the Air Force plane in Texas was hotly opposed by the California and Massachusetts delegations, which lavishly praised the Northrop entry with claims that it was better for both the American services and for foreign sales.

The Californians represent the state where the losing Air Force plane would have been built and where components of the winning Navy plane would be built for assembly in St Louis. The Navy's engines would be built in Massachusetts, as those for the losing Air Force jet would have been, by General Eelectric Company in West Lynn.

The Navy awarded McDonnell Douglas and Northrop a $44 million engineering contract yesterday, and a $2 million award went to General Electric.

An oddity of the announcement was that James R Schlesinger, the defense secretary, has not yet given his full approval to the Navy enterprise.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK NEWS 5 May 1975 Pg. 39

Congress Eying Fast Viet Aid

Package Would Cover Resettlement Costs

Washington, May 4 (UPI)— With the number of South Vietnamese refugees rising, Congress hopes to take swift action on an aid package to cover their evacuation and resettlement costs.

Rep. Thomas Morgan (D-Pa.) plans to summon administration officials this week to determine the number of refugees that will be absorbed and the cost of resettling them.

An early indication of the cost and the number of refugees to be resettled will come when L. Dean Brown, director of the special intragency task force on Indochina, appears tomorrow before a House refugees subcommittee led by Morgan.

Despite pleas from Morgan and President Ford, the House last week junked a Senate-passed bill that would have provided some money for the refugees.

The House voted, 246 to 162, against a bill authorizing $327 million in humanitarian aid, partly because it also contained authority for Ford to use American troops to evacuate Vietnamese, and partly because some of the aid was earmarked for delivery to South Vietnam.

The bill had been passed by the Senate before the fall of South Vietnam, but was not called up in the House until after Saigon's surrender.

Estimates late last week showed that about 120,000 South Vietnamese had been evacuated or had managed to escape the Communist takeover of South Vietnam.

A State Department official said that when Ford told House Speaker Carl Albert the administration would need at least $400 million, the estimate was based on 70,000 refugees settling in the United States. He said that double the number of refugees would mean double the cost.

Up to now, refugee costs have been paid out of a general fund for Indochina reconstruction. The administration says these funds will run out in a week to 10 days.

NEW YORK TIMES 5 May 1975 Pg. 14

ABANDONED ARMS PILED AROUND HUE

By DANIEL DE LUCE
The Associated Press

HUE, South Vietnam, May 3 — American military ejuipment estimated to be worth $100-million is strewn like a gigantic junkpile along the Hue estuary where Saigon's defeated armored and infantry forces tried to escape by sea in late March.

A spokesman for the new Revolutionary Government said earlier in Da Nang that 103,000 of the enlisted men and noncommissioned officers of the former South Vietnamese Army who had been taken prisoner had already been released to return to their homes.

Some former war prisoners were seen in the areas around Hue working in rice fields.

From the watchtower of the former army base here, one can see about 600 burned-out vehicles in one group of abandoned equipment. Other equipment is scattered for miles along the highway connecting Hue with Tan My harbor, leading to the South China Sea.

Vehicles Made to Run

Former drivers and mechanics of the defeated army's armored regiments are now working under the supervision of army officers of the Revolutionary Government in making tanks, armored cars, trucks and other vehicles run again.

Three mechanics from the old army who were putting a group of diesel forklift trucks in operational order were permitted a pause from work to answer visitors' translated questions.

All said that they were working for the victorious revolutionary army by day and were going home to their families in the neighborhood at night. When Saigon's forces collapsed at Hue, they had not tried to retreat further but reported to the authorities as soon as possible.

Some captured M-48 tanks still have "United States Army" painted in white on them. On the dirt shoulders of the highway are belts of .50-caliber machine-gun ammunition, hand grenades, artillery shells still in the original packing and many other items.

Equipment Almost New

Revolutionary Government forces are salvaging steel pontoons and steel bridging along the estuary. The equipment seems almost new.

A revolutionary army officer at a captured supply base said that of some 3,000 military vehicles left along the estuary, more than 200 had been sunk, most of them self-propelled guns and armored cars. He added that 60 of the M-48 tanks that fell into his army's hands had been cleaned up and sent south with the Communist forces.

He said that six self-propelled 175-mm. long-range artillery pieces were recovered here and that four were now in combat condition and were with the revolutionary forces in the south.

Driving to Hue over Hai Van Pass from Da Nang, this correspondent saw heavy southbound military traffic for most of the 60 miles on Route 1. Along with Soviet-made armor were some tanks from the Saigon army's American supplies.

An Unusual Mixture

In the military truck convoys there was a mixture of Soviet, Chinese and American vehicles.

Along the route thousands of acres of rice were being harvested. Teams of seven or eight young men were cutting rice stalks and tying them in sheaves. The young men were dressed in green military tunics and shorts.

Through an interpreter, the leader of one of these teams said that he and his men had come from a nearby village and that all had served at one time in Saigon's army. Some had served until very recently, he added.

4

WASHINGTON POST
4 May 1975 Pg.16(5)

Hanoi Asks Return of S. Viet Jets

North Vietnam formally urged Thailand yesterday to return to the Provisional Revolutionary Government planes and ships that fleeing South Vietnamese took to Thai territory.

"In the interest of relations between the Democratic Republic of North Vietnam and Thailand and peace in the entire region, the North Vietnamese government hopes that the Thai government will respond positively to these (PRG) demands, by restoring immediately to the PRG all planes and ships taken to Thailand illegally during the flight by the Saigon administration and army," a Foreign Ministry statement in Hanoi said.

The PRG has claimed that the planes, numbering almost 130, were "stolen" and that they belong to the new government.

The United States claims that the planes are U S. property under a military aid agreement.

Thai Foreign Minister Chatichai Choonhavan said earlier yesterday that the planes have been "temporarily impounded" and that the Thai government has not yet decided what to do about them.

The PRG has formally requested Malaysia, Singapore and the Philippines, as well as Thailand, to return planes and ships taken by fleeing South Vietnamese. In a diplomatic note, the PRG said it has exercised governmental control in South Vietnam since April 30 and under international law the equipment should be returned.

WASHINGTON POST
5 May 1975 Pg.16

26,000 Reach Philippines On 11 Ships

From News Dispatches

More than 26,000 refugees from South Vietnam arrived at Subic Bay in the Philippines yesterday aboard 11 ships of the American evacuation fleet. Among them was the last American ambassador to the defeated Saigon government, Graham Martin.

Martin, described as "crusty as usual" by one embassy official, flew by helicopter to the U.S. embassy in Manila. Former South Vietnamese Premier Nguyen Cao Ky, who arrived with Martin, flew directly to Guam, as did most of the others who arrived yesterday.

U. S. officials on Guam said that they now are expecting upward of 80,000 people to go through their evacuation center, an increase of 17,000 from previous official estimates.

In Hong Kong, about 4,500 refugees who had been rescued from a sinking South Vietnamese ship, arrived aboard the Danish freighter that rescued them.

A Defense Ministry spokesman in Singapore said that more than 3,700 refugees are aboard some 25 vessels anchored in waters off Singapore and Malaysia. The spokesman said the refugees have requested fresh supplies and have asked diplomats for permission to continue their voyages to Guam, the Philippines and other countries.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

EDITORIALS

NEW YORK TIMES - 5 MAY 1975

Ford-Brezhnev Summit

Postponement of the Ford-Brezhnev summit conference until the autumn is due primarily to technical difficulties in completing the Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty (SALT II) outlined in Vladivostok last November. The technical obstacles themselves can only be overcome by political compromises at the highest level, and these compromises have become difficult to tackle when détente and the broader Soviet-American relationship are under increasing strain.

Since the Vladivostok summit, the Soviet Union has repudiated the trade-emigration compromise laboriously worked out by Secretary of State Kissinger. Leonid Brezhnev has been seriously ill, and a struggle for the Kremlin succession may be under way. American mediation to achieve a second disengagement agreement by Israel and Egypt has broken down. Moscow now is maneuvering for a major Middle East role, as advocate of a united Arab position at a renewed Geneva Conference. Soviet arms in Indochina and Syria, Soviet diplomacy in the Middle East and Soviet-oriented Communist parties in Portugal and Italy have all contributed to a gradual destabilization of the world situation, from Saigon to Jerusalem. The NATO-Warsaw Pact talks in Vienna on mutual force reductions have bogged down, as have the Soviet-American negotiations to limit underground nuclear tests. The collapse of Cambodia and South Vietnam have turned tension into trauma, at least for the United States.

In these circumstances it is difficult to conceive of positive results emerging from a Brezhnev-Ford meeting before more progress has been made on the specific problems confronting the SALT negotiators. These involve means of verification and identification of sophisticated missiles on each side. The fact remains that Moscow and Washington have one overwhelming common interest, with priority over all other disputes: the nuclear arms race must be curbed.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
5 MAY 1975

A communist Saigon

Saigon's new revolutionary regime has lost no time in taking the kind of steps that explain why many Vietnamese did not want to live under communism — and why many Americans over the years were prepared to support their anticommunist struggle. If the first, sketchy reports can be trusted, the communists moved swiftly to shut down the press, control the labor movement, and nationalize agriculture, business, and industry. "Revolutionary committees" have been formed, purportedly to protect government property, and it is as easy to predict ensuing years of repression as it was to anticipate the kind of drastic measures already announced.

Surely the freedom-loving world must deplore the revolutionary government's onslaughts on liberty as much as those perpetrated by Thieu, to the dismay of Americans whose taxes supported him.

On the positive side is the apparent absence so far of the bloodbath some had expected. And such reforms as the closing down of the brothels are welcome steps away from the demoralizing legacy of the war years.

Certainly the massive task of restoring the war's destruction and building a viable economy require both strong leadership and national efforts. There has to be understanding of the Vietnamese people as they go about their task — more understanding than the American Government has displayed in the past. But this does not mean blindness to the enormous cost imposed on human individuality by the system now becoming rooted in Saigon.

CHICAGO TRIBUNE - 5 MAY 1975

Containing the A-bomb

Fourteen years of disarmament conferences have not conditioned us to look upon yet another one with much optimism, and the nonproliferation talks that open in Geneva Monday come at an especially delicate time. But the very inauspiciousness of the timing may in fact prove to be a boon —for several reasons.

For one thing, the remaining loopholes in the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty of 1968 have aroused growing concern. Altho the more than 80 nations which originally signed it have complied with its terms, India—a nonsigner —has tested a nuclear device. The atomic bomb has spread despite the treaty. Can this kind of loophole be closed?

For another thing, the nuclear disarmament which really should accompany nonproliferation has not progressed as welwl as hoped. The SALT II understanding which President Ford and Chairman Brezhnev reached last year at Vladivostok permits fearful arsenals to remain in the hands of the two superpowers. This is a state of affairs that satisfies no one.

For a third thing, the United States is going thru a post-Viet Nam reappraisal of its foreign policy, and no one knows precisely what changes will emerge. Yet the nonproliferation treaty relies largely on the confidence which nations not possessing nuclear warheads place in their alliances with nations which do have the bomb. Canada, West Germany, and Japan are conspicuous examples of countries which easily could produce nuclear weapons but do not. All are allied with the U.S. and logically may wonder now what those alliances really mean.

Finally, there is evidence that the U.S. and the Soviet Union have independently developed a laser technique which vastly simplifies the task of extracting explosive Uranium 235 from Uranium 238. The cost of the operation is drastically reduced, say its developers, perhaps placing the creation of nuclear weapons within the reach of the poorest nations or even terriorist gangs. Few people can view this prospect with comfort.

Dr. Fred C. Ikle, director of the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency and a practical man accustomed to looking harsh reality in the face, is mildly optimistic.

He has spoken of "several imaginative solutions" to the problem of nations ramming their way into the nuclear weapons club. While he did not elaborate, he called them feasible. Two legislative steps which he does stress are export controls and financial support for international safeguards.

In Dr. Ikle's mind the big question is whether nonnuclear countries will agree [and mean it] not to acquire nuclear weapons. And he says: "The answer is this: A nation will agree if, in its judgment, its security is served by doing so."

This means, clearly, that we must have a world in which superpowers make sincere efforts to achieve nuclear disarmament, in which they maintain dependable alliances with nonnuclear nations, and in which the peaceful blessings of nuclear power are made available to all men.

That is a simple formula, easy to understand, but difficult to attain. The most powerful argument for it is necessity. Unless the atomic bomb "haves" and "have nots" can agree on some such formula, life will be increasingly risky for all of us.

Looked at in those stark terms, the Geneva meeting seems critically important indeed.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR - 5 MAY 1975

On winning refugee-aid support

We share President Ford's disappointment with the attitudes reflected in the debate over and defeat of the South Vietnamese refugee-aid bill. Mr. Ford said of the one-sided (246-to-162) vote in the House: "This action does not reflect the values we cherish as a nation of immigrants."

But the White House will hardly persuade Congress to a different point of view by attempting to shame it. A new Gallup poll on the issue of permitting South Vietnamese evacuees to live in the U.S. showed the congressmen not far off the mark of public sentiment. By a margin of 54 percent to 37 percent, citizens opposed such relocation.

As a first step, the White House will have to come up with a new piece of legislation. The $327 million refugee-aid bill rejected by the House had a serious defect. It contained the clause giving the President authority to use troops for evacuating citizens. New legislation, such as that being readied by Senators Javits and Pell, can now deal strictly with the humanitarian aspects of the problem.

As a second step, the White House should address the attitude of the public, which, as Mr. Ford said of Congress, "reflects fear and misunderstanding rather than charity and compassion." The White House cannot ignore the pervasive feeling that America's own underemployed and overtaxed merit attention. It need not go so far as Gov. Edmund Brown Jr. of California, who had his state's million unemployed in mind when he called for a Vietnamese aid bill that would provide "jobs for Americans first." But it would help Mr. Ford's effort to secure refugee aid financing if he would show more regard for his country's native jobless.

At base, the exact price of resettling the Vietnamese refugees is not the issue — whether it takes the $327 million the House rejected or the $500 million the White House says is needed. Nor is the issue the sharing of jobs or communities. The issue is whether America's conclusion of the Vietnamese adventure is to be humane and generous, or self-seeking and mean.

The refugee aid is needed. It should be voted.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK NEWS - 4 MAY 1975 (5)

THE LINGERING QUESTIONS

There is a desire on the part of many Americans to banish from their minds all thought of the long U.S. involvement in Indochina and the ignominious end to which it came.

President Ford

The yearning for blissful forgetfulness is understandable. No nation or people likes to dwell on its failures or defeats.

But if we are to approach sensibly the business of working out what President Gerald R. Ford has called "an agenda for the future" in world affairs, we cannot dismiss Vietnam as though it never happened.

Above all, we cannot afford to regard that 14-year-ordeal as an irrational aberration, an erratic lunge off an established course.

The decision to commit American arms and manpower to Vietnam was, in fact, the logical extension of the policy of containment—opposing the spread of communism. It began with the Truman Doctrine and was continued through the Marshall Plan, the Korean war, the Atlantic Alliance, and a whole series of regional and bilateral defense pacts.

Leading statesmen in both parties had a hand in fashioning that policy, and it met with overwhelming popular approval.

The experience in Vietnam calls for the most searching and sober reassessment of our global objectives, how we are to pursue them, and the means available to carry them out. It is a matter of—

THE UTMOST IMPORTANCE

—that Americans set about this task coolly and calmly—but with full awareness that there is an urgent need for clear-cut answers. There are scores of nations throughout the world who ranged themselves at our side on the basis of U.S. assurances of aid and protection, and now are wondering how valid those pledges are.

To arrive at an intelligent and realistic plan for the conduct of our foreign relations, it is necessary to accept some basic truths.

The first of these is that communism remains a potent threat to world peace and our national security. Leadership and tactics may change in the Kremlin and Peking. But their appetite for expansion—by subversion or aggression—remains as keen as ever.

Such being the case, it follows that however weary Americans may be of bearing the burden of Free World leadership, we cannot lay it down now. No other nation or combination of nations is capable of providing the balancing power needed to check Communist ambitions.

And to fulfill that role, it is essential that we have not only a clear-sighted foreign policy, but also the strength to back it up. Without credible military might to deter a potential aggressor, even the most clever, adroit diplomacy is helpless.

It is vital that all Americans, not just our officials in the White House and on Capitol Hill, recognize these facts. For, in a democracy, all depends on——and the firmness of will with which the people support the efforts and programs of their leaders.

THE UNITY OF PURPOSE

It should be clear to every citizen that what we face is not a choice between difficult and easy alternatives—any course will be hard.

The idea of withdrawal and abdication, of turning our back upon responsibility, may appeal to the faint of heart and those selfish souls who believe that we could insure our own safety by throwing our allies to the wolves.

But a weak America, or one withdrawn into the shell of isolationism, would create a dangerous state of instability, and with it a direct threat to our security and our very existence.

The Vietnam episode has shaken the nation's confidence in itself. But we have survived other crises, and we can surmount this one, if we here and now resolve to meet it with the same determination and vigor that brought the U.S. to greatness.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR - 5 MAY 1975

Mr. Ford's opportunity

As the dust settles in Indo-China, President Ford is wasting no time taking the diplomatic initiative. Later this month he will attend a meeting of NATO, meet with President Sadat, and make a swing to Italy and Spain.

This will be Mr. Ford's first trip to Europe and he apparently thinks it an auspicious time to show the American flag. He seeks to project an image of vigorous U.S. foreign policy, reassert Washington's determination to meet its commitments, and reexamine with allies and friends the problems that lie ahead.

Most significantly, perhaps, the trip will expose Mr. Ford personally to such leaders as President Sadat and enhance his education in foreign policy. In recent weeks the President has been stressing that he, not Henry Kissinger, is making the decisions. And while the Secretary of State will continue to play a dominant role, it should help lift the sense of personal responsibility he has shouldered as well as clear the air of criticism of him if the President takes more of the limelight.

This he must do now with wise leadership. There has been all too much self-conscious talk about the loss of America's prestige and strength. It will be U.S. actions now not merely words that will demonstrate its resolve to remain vigorously — but intelligently — involved. The past few months have seen some sharp reverses of U.S. policy but the scoreboard is not unrelievedly gloomy.

• On the Middle East front everyone is talking about going back to Geneva but, curiously, no one is yet fixing a date. The way still is left open to a resumption of negotiations on an Israeli-Egyptian accord, although it is certain Dr. Kissinger would not return to the region unless he could count on a successful outcome.

• The West's relations with the Soviet Union are in a state of suspension. The SALT talks are stalled, several issues still hold up a European security conference, and Brezhnev's visit to Washington has been postponed. But it is significant that the Russians have not unduly exploited the American defeat in Vietnam. They reportedly were even helpful in securing a communist lull in the fighting around Saigon in the last days, all of which suggests that they want to keep detente going.

• All across Europe of course are clouds of political and economic uncertainty. The crisis on Cyprus remains unresolved and U.S.-Turkish ties are still strained. The events in Portugal, where the Communists recently were dealt a setback, nonetheless pose crucial questions for NATO and have implications for neighboring Spain and Italy.

The agenda for Mr. Ford is thus full. We doubt America's allies think the U.S. is headed down the road of isolationism and retreating from world responsibilities. They in fact are probably relieved that it no longer has Indo-China to absorb its energies. But they clearly are concerned about the direction now of American foreign policy, and the President will have the opportunity to set a sensible course.

WASHINGTON STAR
4 MAY 1975 (5)

Bloodbath Reported in Cambodia

NEW YORK (UPI) — A massive bloodbath has begun in Cambodia and thousands have already been executed according to a U.S. official, Newsweek magazine reports.

Newsweek said the reports came from intercepts of Khmer Rouge radio communications picked up by U.S. intelligence. The intercepts were said to indicate that the first victims were to be all officers of the Cambodian army down to the rank of second lieutenant and their wives.

Newsweek said sources told it that intercepts of the official Khmer Rouge radio transmissions gave the orders for the executions and that field radio reports indicated they were being carried out. They quoted the sources as saying the killings were not isolated cases but part of a full-fledged campaign.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK TIMES - 4 MAY 1975 (5)

After Vietnam

The American role in Vietnam ended as it had begun —in a muddle of misconceptions. Initially, a handful of American advisers were expected to shape and sustain an independent South Vietnam; in the end, one more consignment of American arms was expected to save a regime that never took root. In the intervening fifteen years, an anticolonial nationalism had evolved into an anti-American tide.

Past errors must not now be compounded by a misreading of their meaning for the future. This country's failure in Indochina is, as President Ford has so succinctly stated, neither the end of the world nor the end of America's role in the world. Contrary to the view reiterated by Defense Secretary Schlesinger last week, disengagement from a civil war in which the United States should never have become engaged need not shake this country's position in the world.

Only the most simplistic assessment of a major power's international role could portray the end of the American involvement in Vietnam and Cambodia as tantamount to a retreat into isolationism. The recognition that its power has limits does not render the United States powerless. A new consciousness that power must be used wisely, without exaggerated faith in its military application alone, is a far cry from isolationism.

This country's tragic misadventure in Indochina in no way diminishes the need to keep and make international commitments. The painful lesson of Vietnam, however—especially in its later phases—is a compelling message to future Presidents that they cannot make foreign commitments without the full knowledge and approval of Congress and the American people.

* * *

To view the War Powers Act as an indication that Congress has turned isolationist is to ignore the lesson of the Pentagon Papers, the Tonkin Gulf resolution, the clandestine war in Cambodia and the secret commitments contained in correspondence between former Presidents Nixon and Thieu.

In 1969, before he became Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, Henry Kissinger wrote that while "a new international order is inconceivable without a significant American contribution," the complexities of a changing world made it impossible "to impose an American design" or to "bring about domestic transformations in 'emerging countries'."

It surely was not the mark of isolationism when, with a prescience that was to fall victim to events in Vietnam, Mr. Kissinger then inveighed eloquently against "an undifferentiated globalism." Nothing that happened in Vietnam can be construed as an argument against future American commitments to aid friendly nations whose people stand ready to defend their own independence and in whose support the United States has a national interest.

Speaking at Princeton University in 1954, George F. Kennan warned: "If there is any great lesson we Americans need to learn . . . it is that we must be gardeners and not mechanics in our approach to world affairs." As long as the United States is on the side of men's aspirations, Mr. Kennan suggested, "we can afford to be patient, and even occasionally suffer reverses, placing our confidence in the longer and deeper workings of history."

There is an unbreakable link between the successful implementation of American principles at home and the nation's capacity to exert leadership abroad. An instant, small but significant test of this understanding will be in the manner of the American people's welcome to Vietnamese refugees. For the long term, we as Americans need to regain enough confidence in ourselves to spurn both isolationism and the temptation to improve the world by forcing it into the American image.

BALTIMORE SUN - 3 MAY 1975(5)

Sailing Out of Greece

The agreement between Greece and the United States to end home port rights for elements of the Sixth Fleet near Athens is a constructive step toward re-establishing decent relations with Greece. America's military departure from Greece will go beyond this agreement, with the effect of weakening American power in the Eastern Mediterranean and possibly weakening Greece's defenses, though the final extent is not established. American involvement in Greece goes back to the early postwar years. The home port arrangement was negotiated only in 1972-73. That momentary expansion of base rights jeopardized the longer-term relationship.

In his prime ministry from 1955 to 1963, Constantine Caramanlis worked for a close Graeco-American relationship. Now in his return to power he is reducing it and has withdrawn Greece from the NATO command. What went wrong was that after the tyranny of the colonels descended on Greece in 1967, the United States converted its alliance with that nation into an alliance with its despotic rulers, or seemed to in Greek eyes. The home port deal symbolized the perversion of the relationship. The overthrow of the military dictatorship made the resulting anti-Americanism as inevitable as it was unnecessary. A greater distance from the hated regime of 1967-'74 would have insured a firmer friendship and more durable base rights. Short-sighted advantage is not realism. The very presence of American servicemen and dependents became a disturbing factor.

The six destroyers that have called Athens home can operate out of Norfolk. In their absence, the damage to relationships can undergo repair. There is little hope of full Greek return to NATO activities, however, until after achievement of a Cyprus accord. And whoever ruled in Athens, there would be scant hope of using Greek facilities to help Israel in wartime, because the Greek nationals widely engaged in commerce in the Arab world are hostage to Arab governments' good will toward Athens. The American exodus from Greece looks at first blush like part of a worldwide withdrawal. It turns not on military defeat in Asia, however, but on having backed in Greek internal affairs what turned out to be not only the wrong but also the losing side.

NEW YORK TIMES - 3 MAY 1975 (5)

Silence

Vice President Rockefeller has broken his silence about Governor Rockefeller's silence during the decade of war in Vietnam. He told the National Urban Coalition that the reason he declined to criticize Washington was that it would have diminished the flow of Federal aid to Albany. And he added that, by keeping quiet, he succeeded in increasing the amount of money returned to this state during his administration.

Apart from what his comment says about the White House in the Vietnam years, Mr. Rockefeller's explanation does little credit to the former Governor or to his concept of political leadership at either state or national level. It was the failure to say that the emperors in Washington were often unclothed that contributed to the disaster in Vietnam. Men of stature—Governor Rockefeller as well as Vice President Rockefeller—have a responsibility to speak out on vital issues, and to refuse to be blackmailed into silence. Otherwise, their silence may speak for them all too loudly.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II -- Main Edition -- 5 May 1975

WASHINGTON POST - 4 MAY 1975 (5)

'Dear President Thieu'

RELEASE OF THE text of two letters that President Nixon wrote President Thieu removes what few doubts remained about the nature of Mr. Nixon's promises to meet with force any North Vietnamese violations of the Paris Accords. On Nov. 14, 1972, he pledged "swift and severe retaliatory action" and on Jan. 5, 1973, he promised to "respond with full force." Against these words one must set Henry Kissinger's statement on Jan. 25, 1973, the day the accords were signed: "There are no secret understandings." Would we react with force to North Vietnamese violations? he was asked. He replied, "I don't want to speculate on hypothetical situations that we don't expect to arise." With the Nixon letters now published, presumably the Ford administration will stop pretending that nothing was offered secretly that was not explained publicly at the time. That argument is over.

But what about Mr. Nixon? Reflect on the nature of the policy that he inherited and that he himself pursued, one of conducting a limited war whose success depended on convincing the enemy that the United States would hang in indefinitely and on convincing an increasingly restive American public that the United States would get out. Concealment and dissimulation were not arbitrary, a mere bureaucratic convenience: they were fundamental to the nature of the policy. At virtually any point in the war, to have informed the public of the costs and risks that officials privately felt lay ahead would have invited the public's refusal to go along, which in turn would have invited a level of dissent that Hanoi could only take as evidence that the United States would not hang in. In brief, the policy could not succeed if the people were to be told the full truth about it. Its fundamental flaw, in fact, may well have been its incompatibility with the workings of a free and open society.

So it was from the beginning in Vietnam, throughout the war, and at the end. President Thieu was deeply alarmed—and, as events showed, not without reason—that the Paris Accords let North Vietnam keep troops in the South. But President Nixon was determined to end American involvement in the war and to recover American POWs. And for the latter purpose, if not the former, he required an agreement not only between the United States and Hanoi but between Hanoi and Saigon. To gain Mr. Thieu's support for the necessary accords, Mr. Nixon thus found it necessary to promise "full force." Had he not made that promise, South Vietnam might have balked at the withdrawal of the remaining American troops, denounced Washington and refused to sign the agreements with Hanoi. Had he made the promise public, North Vietnam might have refused to accept the cease-fire terms with the South. This almost certainly would have torpedoed the agreement on the POWs because all of the various two-sided agreements between the various parties—Hanoi, Saigon and Washington—were interlocked and conditioned on each other. Congress and the American public, of course, would have gone up the wall. Mr. Nixon was the prisoner of his own policy.

This certainly does not mean that the principle of lying to one's public is tolerable or that secret commitments to acts of war are acceptable. The appropriate "lesson" is not so much that statesmen should never lie as it is that they should not conceive and conduct policies whose success depends on lying. In Vietnam, it became clear that the necessary foundation of a policy of limited war—a clear impression, conveyed to the enemy, that the United States would stick it out—collapsed. As, little by little, the public's sense of the reality of Vietnam grew, its taste for prosecuting a war there shrank. Unless President Nixon was prepared to change his policy and to declare that the United States would no longer have anything to do with trying to shape the outcome in Vietnam—in which case he might have been able to recover the POWs but might also have had some difficulty extracting the American troops as well as civilians still in South Vietnam — he was caught in the trap from which he tried to escape by his secret assurances to President Thieu.

NEW YORK TIMES - 3 MAY 1975 (5)

Toward a New Life

America's better instincts are on trial. There is simply no way to shed the responsibility, proclaimed throughout our country's history, for providing a haven to those fleeing from persecution and conquest.

Gov. David Pryor of Arkansas set a needed tone of sympathetic welcome yesterday as the first planeload of Vietnamese refugees touched down at Fort Smith. He received the simple and eloquent reply from a Saigon doctor: "We thank you for giving us the chance to make our lives again."

Of all the waves of large-scale immigration which have reached this country's shores, this must be the least expected, most disorganized and least prepared. Misunderstandings and confusion may be inevitable under the tragic and chaotic circumstances under which nearly a hundred thousand people have left their homeland in the past few weeks to make their way to the United States. The brunt of the first inflow is being felt in a few communities across the country, not unnaturally provoking some nervousness among surprised local residents who had been given little or no advance guidance.

However—even if the number of eventual refugees reaches the 150,000 mark, as Administration coordinators now speculate—the fact is that this figure is but a fraction of the number of Cubans who were welcomed here after the Castro regime took power, and it is well below the total flow of immigrants whom the country accepts routinely in an ordinary year.

* * *

Uncertainty about funding is the most immediate limitation to the resettlement effort. The principle is generally accepted that resettlement is a Federal obligation, not the responsibility of any local authorities; it is now up to both Administration and Congress to produce an appropriation bill to fund the immediate costs of transporting, housing and feeding the Vietnamese refugees who are under American protection.

The makeshift measure which the House of Representatives rejected Thursday hardly began to recognize this problem, and further confused the point with other issues of evacuation and humanitarian aid in Indochina, many of which have been overtaken by events.

It is easy to be cynical about the agility with which some of Saigon's political and economic élite may have been able to get themselves and their wealth out of their country; but to focus on a handful of such individuals is to distort the wider reality: the bulk of the immigrants have arrived here penniless, fleeing for their lives in search of freedom. Hard-pressed immigration authorities are nowhere near providing a breakdown of occupations; it is nevertheless evident that among the refugees are many thousands of persons capable of making a genuine contribution to American society, once they find themselves.

As the Bicentennial approaches, the people of this country have an unexpected occasion to reaffirm the principles on which American society was founded. The United States can be proud to give people in need the chance to make their lives again.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

FEATURES COLUMNISTS

WASHINGTON STAR 3 MAY 1975 (5)

U.S. Undecided on Indochina Policy

By Henry S. Bradsher
Washington Star Staff Writer

Analysis

While the silence which enveloped Phnom Penh two weeks ago is now descending on Saigon, broken only by military government decrees, the U.S. government is undecided about what new policy to adopt toward Cambodia and Vietnam.

The old expression from the Communist victory in China 26 years ago about "waiting for the dust to settle" has itself been dusted off and is circulating again.

Officials think it will be a long time before any sort of normal relations with the two new regimes is possible. Even if the United States decides to hold out the hand of diplomatic contact — and such a decision might be a long, controversial way off — it seems doubtful that the new Communist officials in either Indochinese capital would want to take it immediately.

Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger said Tuesday the United States "will not recognize an exile government of South Vietnam." Neither is it going to support a Cambodian exile regime, other officials say.

THE POSSIBILITY of American humanitarian aid to either country is uncertain.

Both regimes have announced peaceful policies of nonalignment. The Provisional Revolutionary Government (PRG) in Saigon has said it is ready to establish relations with all countries, while the Cambodians have been more withdrawn and suspicious of foreigners so far.

In one of the conferences which have been held within the U.S. government in recent days on what new attitude to adopt, one official observed that American relations with countries which have just gone under Communist rule have historically had three initial aspects.

One is to ostracize the new regime, trying to block it out of normal relations with the rest of the world. A second is to freeze its assets within American control and choke down trade. And the third is to help or even to organize armed resistance.

The immediate question being debated in Washington is whether to go for ostracism even though many other nations are declaring recognition of the new regimes in Phnom Penh and Saigon. The debate is a long way from any decision.

LEGAL STEPS have already been taken to control trade with Cambodia under the old laws against selling strategic goods to Communist countries. Similar action against South Vietnam is likely soon.

The more touchy economic ques-

(See POLICY, Pg. 2-F)

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER 4 MAY 1975 (5)

The next challenge may come in Korea

By GEORGE F. WILL

WASHINGTON — The morning after the U. S. presence was plucked off the roof of the Saigon embassy thereby ending U. S. instruction on the theme that aggression does not pay, the Washington Post headlined its editorial: "Deliverance."

Of course we have been delivered from Cambodia and South Vietnam. But these may be just the first choruses of a song with many choruses.

Unless the North Korean government is more obtuse than we can reasonably hope that it is, it has learned a lesson about the perils of aggression in its part of the world. The lesson is: Twenty-five years after the start of the Korean War, the U. S. public and the U. S. Congress which reflects the public, will not abide further use of U. S. force in Asia.

Perhaps it is true that (to paraphrase Neville Chamberlain on Czechoslovakia) South Korea is not worth the bones of a single American soldier. But true or not, when push comes to shove in Korea, there will be, from the start, an intense, substantial and growing minority in Congress convinced that is true.

And all the arguments successfully used against the U. S. involvement on the Indochina peninsula will be dusted off — if there has been time for dust to gather — and used with regard to the Korean peninsula.

South Korea, like South Vietnam, is a long way away; its people are culturally (not to mention — and please do not mention it — racially) different; few American tourists or Fulbright scholars send back postcards and bring back warm memories from there; the South Korean government is imperfect; it is "unnatural" for Korea to be divided; the disappearance of South Korea would not immediately, directly discomfort Louisville; Soviet and Chinese support for a North Korean invasion obviously is consistent with the prevailing theory of detente.

So, if — no, when — North Korea gins up a confrontation along the 39th parallel, Congress will gin up an investigation of press freedom in South Korea. The result will be a report on the moral inadequacies of the South Korean government.

True, U. S. forces already are in place in Korea, in what it pleases us to call a "deterrent posture." But if push comes to shove there, the congressional push will be for an exercise of our imperial capacity for evacuation.

The Washington Post says, correctly, that "foreign policy proceeds a great deal more from the character and outlook of a people than from the specific manipulations of public men." But then the Post goes on to say, soothingly, that the U. S. still has great power "measured in conventional military and economic terms."

This leaves unanswered two related questions about the nature of power and the current character and outlook of the American people.

Is it not the case that power without the will to use it is not power at all? What reason is there to believe that the manipulations of the public men, especially in Congress (where there are never more than a few members willing to stray from the straight and narrow path of subservience to opinion polls), do not faithfully reflect the outlook and character of the American people?

Many nations have based their security plans on the assumption that the U. S. has the will to make its power an actuality. Now these nations may conclude that it is prudent to assume the worst about the willingness of the U. S. to make its power felt.

So South Korea, Japan, Pakistan, and Israel, among others, may find it prudent to develop nuclear weapons, nuclear non-proliferation agreements notwithstanding. All these nations have the capacity to build such weapons, and recent events may have given these nations an incentive to do so.

That is the nature of the world into which we have been delivered from the roof in Saigon.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

POLICY -- CONTINUED

tion is ownership of assets. The United States has asserted its right to planes and ships which it provided to the two one-time allies and were taken abroad when their capitals fell.

This has provoked angry statements. The North Vietnamese foreign ministry accused the United States yesterday of "feverishly carrying out the plan of plundering hundreds of airplanes and dozens of sea-going ships. . . ."

American help for resistance movements, a tradition that goes back to the sending of U.S. troops into Russia after the Bolshevik Revolution in 1917, is a more complicated problem. Congressional opinion has turned sharply against such Central Intelligence Agency adventures as the "secret war" in Laos during the 1960s.

ONE OF THE most genuinely popular Cambodian leaders, former Premier In Tam, crossed the border into Thailand two weeks ago with 200 armed followers. He was quoted as saying he might try to organize resistance to the Khmer Rouge regime in Phnom Penh. Nothing further had been heard from him since.

Officials here say no decision has been taken on what the United States should do if armed resistance develops in Cambodia. Some observers doubt that resistance could develop without a decision for U.S. aid to it.

President Ford told some members of Congress a few days ago that the Communists in Cambodia have already executed some 80 civilian and military leaders in order to prevent any resistance to their rule.

Other sources say that the executions were on the basis of orders sent out by the Khmer Rouge military command after it captured Phnom Penh April 17. Provincial subcommands were sent lists of persons who, along with their wives and children, should be killed if captured, the official sources said.

IN VIETNAM, some resistance was reported continuing several days after Saigon fell Tuesday. Officials here mentioned the areas inhabited by the Cao Dai and Hoa Hao religious minorities and by the Montagnard tribal groups in the highlands.

It was not clear, however, whether this would be cleaned up by the victorious Communist armies or might develop into the same kind of guerrilla warfare that the Viet Cong long waged.

The PRG's military command has called for an end to all resistance and warned of harsh measures against anyone who fails to accept the new order.

Initial reports indicate that the PRG has taken a far more hospitable attitude toward the foreigners left in Saigon than the Khmer Rouge did toward those who stayed in Phnom Penh. The Vietnamese Communists were also better organized and better disciplined as an army when they took over their capital.

The Khmer Rouge refused to facilitate the evacuation of foreigners who had sought refuge in the French Embassy. It rejected French and U.N. requests to let planes remove them, and finally put them on trucks heading for the Thai border.

THE CAMBODIAN Communists were showing signs of hostility toward those foreign governments which had continued to recognize the Lon Nol regime almost to its end, and this hostility was taken out on diplomats and other foreigners left in Phnom Penh. A report yesterday said the old embassies had been "destroyed," but observers doubted that this meant the buildings had been razed.

In the first few days of PRG military control in Saigon, reports from the Japanese Embassy and others there indicated that foreigners were being protected and allowed to live fairly normally.

The chairman of the PRG's advisory council, Nguyen Huu Tho, said recently that his government wanted normal relations with all. It will also "accept the contributions of all countries, not excluding the United States, in the scientific, technical and economic fields, on the basis of respect of our sovereignty and of mutual interests," he said.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR 5 MAY 1975

Washington Letter

Ford's post-Vietnam policy: beyond his control?

By Godfrey Sperling Jr.
Washington

A long-time watcher of United States foreign policy who has a particularly close relationship with the President looked away from a TV chronicling of the last days of U.S. involvement in Vietnam to make this comment:

"The question everyone seems to be asking is 'Where does the President take us from here?' I think that the problem in foreign relations is much more profound than that.

"First, does America really know what it wants to do? And, second, can the President get the country to decide? There is, you know, this growing neoisolationism which might well shape an uncertain U.S. course." He continued soberly, even sadly:

"Have we become an unpredictable world force? That, I think, is the real question. Will other nations no longer know with any certainty what we will do — what commitments we will keep? And how can the President himself be certain? Can the President make the U.S. policy predictable, with opposition in Congress making this course difficult?"

If the President shares any of this uncertainty, he isn't showing it. And he clearly is taking the tack that the United States, now that its involvement in Vietnam is over, will resume its traditional role of leadership in global affairs.

To those nations that might feel uncertain about the U.S. and its will to fulfill commitments both Mr. Ford and his Secretary of State are saying, as Dr. Kissinger said in his press conference on April 29, "No lesson should be drawn by the enemies of our friends from the experiences in Vietnam."

Dr. Kissinger, when asked whether other dominoes might fall to the communists in the wake of Vietnam, said: "There is no question that the outcome in Indo-China will have consequences not only in Asia, but on many other parts of the world. To deny these consequences is to miss the possibility of dealing with them. So I believe there will be consequences. But I am confident that we can deal with them."

Here was a Secretary of State who, right at the moment of one of this country's greatest embarrassments, was talking quite tough — of the United States being able to "deal" with domino-related "consequences."

And the President's whole approach now is one that says, in effect: "We are not retreating from world leadership — we are not moving away from a policy of internationalism which this government embraced after World War II." His speech at Notre Dame University underscored this thesis.

Then the President said at Tulane University: "Today America can regain the sense of pride that existed before Vietnam. . . . I ask that we accept the responsibility of leadership as a good neighbor to all peoples and an enemy of none."

"The 'new' foreign policy agenda," the President told the student audience, "must place a high priority on the need to stop the spread of nuclear weapons and to work for the mutual reduction of strategic arms and control of other weapons." He added: "I must say, parenthetically, the successful negotiations at Vladivostok, in my opinion, are just beginning."

So the President is using almost every forum now to try to dispel any doubts about his and the United States's resolve to stay right in the power center wherever global policy is made. That's what his trip to Brussels and the NATO meeting in late May is all about. And he hopes, too, within months to show that the U.S. is able to be just as influential in summit diplomacy as before the Vietnam disaster. Such a display of clout will be a prime objective in the President's meeting here with Brezhnev this fall and his get-together with leaders in Peking soon thereafter.

When reminded of these presidential efforts to resume America's "business-as-usual" role in world affairs, the veteran observer quoted at the beginning said:

"I hope the President is right. But I think he's going to find that he is bucking a strong tide of resistance right within his own country. Now I am not saying the U.S. won't continue to be a world leader. All I am suggesting is that after Vietnam our influence abroad may be less — that the desire of the American people to be influential abroad may be less. And that we may become a different — less certain — factor in the shaping of world policy. The President may well find that this shift in viewpoint — in Congress and among the American people — will reshape his foreign policy role no matter what he says and does. I think it likely will be beyond his control."

Mr. Sperling is chief of the Washington bureau of The Christian Science Monitor.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II -- Main Edition -- 5 May 1975

NEW YORK TIMES 4 MAY 1975 (5)

Hanoi's Military Miracle Was In Its Flexibility

By DREW MIDDLETON

The tanks and infantry of the North Vietnamese Army, streaming down Saigon's boulevards last week, signalled the end of an amazing military achievement. The army of an underdeveloped country had survived for years the onslaught of up to half a million American troops and the world's most advanced air forces and then broken the military power of American-armed South Vietnam.

How were they able to do it? Preliminary Pentagon assessments suggest that the superior motivation and fighting qualities of the northern armies were important factors. But they were not the only ones. The North Vietnamese were not bare-footed ideologues who overcame superior forces by valor and esprit de corps alone. They were well-trained, well-led, and, in the final campaign, equipped with some of the best weapons, particularly artillery, that the Soviet Union could provide.

Directing this strategy was Gen. Vo Nguyen Giap, one of Asia's ablest military leaders, who has led operations against the French, the Americans and the South Vietnamese, each time with notable success.

General Giap in his book "Banner of People's War," outlined his strategy of a dual approach. At the outset when revolutionary forces are weak, he said, "they must tirelessly carry out guerrilla war and partial insurrection" to "maintain their offensive impetus." But he noted that only through "regular" that is conventional, war in which regular troops "fight in a concentrated manner and the armed services are combined," can "the revolutionaries annihilate important forces of the enemy" and "liberate vast areas of land."

Using General Giap's advice, Hanoi over the years fought two differing types of war, shifting from one tactical approach to another as the enemy's position dictated.

For most of their war against the Americans, the North Vietnamese sought to minimize enemy strengths. Hanoi recognized early in the fighting that it would be suicidal in most cases to employ conventional tactics against the American superiority in firepower—heavy bombers, fighter-bombers, artillery and infantry weapons—and in mobility from the lavish use of helicopters.

The wisdom of that approach was emphasized during the one year, 1967, when Hanoi tried a conventional defense against Operations Cedar Falls and Junction City. The two operations were carried out by American forces assisted by troops from one South Vietnamese division and took place in northern Tay Ninh province close to the Cambodian frontier. The northerners were badly mauled.

A 'Vanishing' Defense

Thereafter they avoided encounters with large American forces. When the Americans planned to "sweep" an area, the North Vietnamese regulars, benefiting from consistently accurate intelligence, simply left.

A major exception to these tactics came in 1968 when the North launched the Tet offensive against 36 of Vietnam's 44 provincial capitals. The operation at the time was judged as a military failure and a political success. Objective estimates are that the North Vietnamese and the Southern revolutionary force casualties were 30 per cent of approximately 55,000 troops engaged and American analysts believed that the Communists would thereafter be precluded from attempting a similar offensive. In the light of their victory, that assessment was premature. Politically, the offensive fed antiwar sentiment in the United States, spreading the belief that this was a war the United States could not win, and should not have been involved in in the first place.

Hanoi returned to small unit operations against the Americans and slightly larger attacks on the South Vietnamese and to the systematic extension of influence in rural areas.

By that time the flow of Soviet arms, rifles, machine guns, mines, mortars, rockets and light field pieces, was increasing. These were the right weapons for the type of war the North Vietnamese had in mind. It was a formless war with no coherent fronts, no safe rear areas.

Hanoi's over-all strength increased in the 'seventies and so did the North's tactical options. The Americans were thinning out. A new South Vietnamese Army was taking the field following the "Vietnamization" program.

By 1972, the North judged it was time to try another venture in conventional war. The North Vietnamese offensive registered some gains but could not overcome the new South Vietnamese Army supported by American air power and advised by the United States Army.

By March of this year, the North was prepared for another offensive. There were by Western estimates at least 140,000 regulars in South Vietnam. Soviet heavy equipment, tanks, heavy guns and antiaircraft missiles and guns had brought the army's inventory to a point where it matched and in tanks and artillery surpassed that of South Vietnam.

With one exception, the North fought a conventional war, showing a skillful control of large units, divisions and regiments, which had been absent in 1972. The exception was that the entire offensive was conducted without air power. The North used Soviet 122 mm and 130 mm artillery to soften Southern positions, neutralize airfields and to harass the South Vietnamese forces in retreat. A network of agents, built up in ten years of war, instead of reconnaissance flights, provided intelligence. Mobility rested not on transport aircraft or helicopters but on a combination of Molotova trucks and hard-marching infantry.

Only at Xuan Loc were they halted. There are indications that Hanoi was tempted to draw all of South Vietnam's remaining divisions into that battle and win a set-place victory comparable to that over the French at Dien Bien Phu 21 years earlier.

The high command rejected the temptation, reckoning correctly that the southern forces were near collapse and that the isolation of their troops at Xuan Loc and the neutralization of Saigon's main air base at Bien Hoa would end the campaign and the war.

Alternatively over the years, the North used whatever tactics suited the situation. They were guerrillas when the Americans were present in force, conventional formations when they faced only the South Vietnamese. The result was a 16-year display of tactical flexibility that, despite all setbacks and all apparent odds, achieved victory.

Drew Middleton is military correspondent for The New York Times.

AEROSPACE DAILY 30 APRIL 1975 (5 MAY)

SOVIETS LAUNCH ANOTHER MOLNIYA 1

The Soviet Union launched a Molniya 1 communications satellite yesterday into an orbit of 63 degrees with a 40,848 kilometer apogee in the northern hemisphere and a 468 km perigee in the southern hemisphere. Period was 12 hours, 17 minutes.

* * *

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON POST 4 APRIL 1975(5)

Rowland Evans and Robert Novak

South Korea as a Nuclear Power

A chilling byproduct of the Vietnam debacle is the possibility of South Korea's developing its own nuclear capability out of fear that the United States can no longer be counted a dependable ally.

Seoul's defense always has been predicated on a combined U.S.-South Korean air force combating an invasion from Communist North Korea. Based on the Vietnam experience, the Koreans now have good reason to fear Congress would rule out any American combat. That would guarantee North Korean air superiority.

To compensate for that, there is active consideration in Seoul for developing a nuclear deterrent—well within its technological means. Ironically, then, determination by the U.S. Congress to keep hands off all Asian wars will encourage nuclear proliferation and might lead to World War III.

Long concerned about Pyongyang's military preparations, the Seoul government became particularly alarmed by the April 18-26 visit to Peking by President Kim Il Sung of North Korea—his first official trip to China in 14 years. Was he there to ask for arms and moral support in a renewed Korean war?

The Republic of Korea army outnumbers the northerners 560,000 to 410,000. But South Korea's air force has only 210 combat aircraft to the North's 598. Nuclear capability would more than make up the difference.

●

Stung by published reports that President Ford will not be a presidential candidate next year, top White House aides held their first campaign-planning session last weekend behind closed doors.

With counselor Robert Hartmann, Mr. Ford's long-time confidant, presiding over the Saturday planning session, the small group of aides quickly agreed on this: It is dangerously late to start planning a presidential campaign for a candidate who has never run for national office, whose credibility as President is widely disparaged and who is still not perceived in the public mind as having decided to run.

Thus, the meeting reached these conclusions:

• A planning committee must be named quickly and given three months to draft overall campaign strategy which will be divided into three parts: the preconvention period, the convention itself and the fall campaign.

• The new, crazy-quilt campaign expenditures law must be thoroughly researched. It is filled with potholes and boobytraps that no one in the White House is even close to defining.

• A campaign organization, geared into the Republican National Committee, must be ready to take over from the planning group. Mr. Ford's old friend and congressional crony, Melvin R. Laird, has flatly refused to be full-time campaign chairman. So that spot may go to a former or incumbent governor (possibly ex-Gov. Winfield Dunn of Tennessee) or congressman (possibly Rep. Al Quie of Minnesota).

One likely choice for the top operating job in the still-unformed planning committee is Jack Mills, tobacco industry lobbyist here and a former Republican political operative with close ties to Laird and the President.

Present at last Saturday night's planning session were White House aides: Hartmann's two assistants, Gwen Anderson and Jack Calkins, among others. But one surprise was a Commerce Department bureaucrat (social and economic statistics administrator) named Edward F. Failor.

A former Iowa Republican operative and backroom power in the national Young Republican politics, Failor was a member of the secret "attack group" of President Nixon's 1972 campaign. He has close ties to the Republican Party's right wing, where Mr. Ford is in serious trouble.

● ●

A stiff but unpublicized demarche from the U.S. embassy in Bangkok has dissuaded Thailand's government from turning over to Vietnamese Communists up to 120 U.S.-supplied war planes flown into Thailand by South Vietnamese pilots seeking asylum.

Thai Foreign Minister Chaichai Chunhawan, hell-bent for accommodation with Hanoi, announced the planes would be given to the Communist victors. But the United States informed Bangkok in unequivocal terms that the planes legally belong to the United States, and Bangkok agreed.

What made Chaichai so quixotic is the fact that Hanoi is sending U.S. M16 automatic rifles, abandoned by South Vietnamese soldiers, to Communist guerrillas in Northeast Thailand. Now the United States may give the abandoned planes to Thailand for anti-guerrilla action—if Thailand is willing to risk taking them.

George F. Will WASHINGTON POST 3 MAY 1975(5)

When Power Is Not Power

The morning after the U.S. presence was plucked off the roof of the Saigon embassy, thereby ending U.S. instruction on the theme that aggression does not pay, The Washington Post headlined its editorial: "Deliverance."

The Prayer Book speaks of being compassed about with songs of deliverance, but one must interrupt the current singing to inquire: Deliverance from what, into what?

Of course we have been delivered from Cambodia and South Vietnam. But these may be just the first choruses of a song with many choruses.

Unless the North Korean government is more obtuse than we can reasonably hope it is, it has learned a lesson about the perils of aggression in its part of the world. The lesson is: Twenty-five years after the start of the Korean War, the U.S. public and the U.S. Congress, which reflects the public, will not abide further use of U.S. force in Asia.

Perhaps it is true that (to paraphrase Neville Chamberlain on Czechoslovakia) South Korea is not worth the bones of a single American soldier. But true or not, when push comes to shove in Korea, there will be, from the start, an intense, substantial and growing minority in Congress convinced that is true.

And all the arguments successfully used against the U.S. involvement on the Indochina peninsula will be dusted off—if there has been time for dust to gather—and used with regard to the Korean peninsula.

South Korea, like South Vietnam, is a long way away; its people are culturally (not to mention—and please do not mention it—racially) different; few American tourists or Fulbright scholars send back postcards and bring back warm memories from there; the South Korean government is imperfect; it is "unnatural" for Korea to be divided; the disappearance of South Korea would not immediately, directly discomfort Louisville; Soviet and Chinese support for a North Korean invasion obviously is consistent with the prevailing theory of detente.

So, if—no, when—North Korea gins up a confrontation along the 38th parallel, Congress will gin up an investigation of press freedom in South Korea. The result will be a report on the moral inadequacies of the South Korean government.

True, U.S. forces already are in place in Korea, in what it pleases us to call a "deterrent posture." But if push comes to shove there, the congressional push will be for an exercise of our imperial capacity for evacuation.

The Washington Post says, correctly, that "foreign policy proceeds a great deal more from the character and outlook of a people than from the specific manipulations of public men." But then The Post goes on to say, soothingly, that the U.S. still has great power "measured in conventional military and economic terms."

This leaves unanswered two related questions about the nature of power and the current character and outlook of the American people.

Is it not the case that power without the will to use it is not power at all? What reason is there to believe that the manipulations of the public men, especially in Congress (where there are never more than a few members willing to stray from the straight and narrow path of subservience to opinion polls), do not faithfully reflect the outlook and character of the American people?

Many nations have based their security plans on the assumption that the United States has the will to make its power an actuality. Now these nations may conclude that it is prudent to assume the worst about the willingness of the United States to make its power felt.

So South Korea, Japan, Pakistan and Israel, among others, may find it prudent to develop nuclear weapons, nuclear non-proliferation agreements notwithstanding. All these nations have the capacity to build such weapons, and recent events may have given these nations an incentive to do so.

That is the nature of the world in to which we have been delivered from the roof in Saigon.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II -- Main Edition -- 5 May 1975

WALL STREET JOURNAL - 5 MAY 1975

What Follows Vietnam?

By Arthur Schlesinger Jr.

A miserable war has come to a miserable conclusion. Now we must consider what the Indochina episode has done to the position of the United States in the world.

The Ford administration argues, or at least began by arguing, that the downfall of the Saigon government is a grave and fateful defeat for the United States, and that our failure to go the last mile with General Thieu is proof that no ally should trust us in the future. Even though the administration, in its zigzags of the last fortnight, has somewhat backed away from these arresting propositions, they will be heard again, especially (as Vice President Rockefeller has candidly said) during the 1976 campaign. They are entitled to discussion on their merits. But what is initially peculiar is the masochistic relish with which our government for a couple of crucial weeks demanded that the rest of the world look on the United States as a feeble, undependable and perfidious nation.

Thus the President of the United States felt it urgent to proclaim to the planet that the "present tragic situation in South Vietnam would not have occurred" had the United States only carried out "its commitment" to Saigon. The Secretary of State of the United States talked of the deliberate destruction of an ally and wondered whether any foreign state could believe in America again. The Secretary of Defense of the United States condemned our aid to South Vietnam as "niggardly." What a band of patriots! When has any government ever conducted such a strange campaign against its own country? One does not recall Khrushchev, for example, after he took his missiles out of Cuba, explaining to the world that he had betrayed his commitments and deserted an ally; nor de Gaulle when he gave up in Algeria.

Of course, if these things were true, a strong case could be made for saying them. But have we, for example, really proved to the rest of the world that no ally can hereafter trust the United States? If 50,000 American dead, $150 billion, inflation and recession in the domestic economy were not enough in President Ford's eyes to prove our fidelity to alleged commitments to Saigon, one can only conclude that he feels—or felt when he spoke in this vein—that we were committed to guarantee the Saigon regime in perpetuity.

It is hard to believe that our President was "absolutely convinced," as he claimed to the American Society of Newspaper Editors on April 16, that, if Congress only voted $722 million more in military aid, "the South Vietnamese could stabilize the military situation." His protege General Thieu certainly did not believe that. "I have told the Americans," he had said 12 days earlier, "that we need at least $1.5 billion per year to defend the entire territory of South Vietnam." President Ford's contention that further military aid to Thieu's army in 1975 could accomplish what half a million American troops on the ground had failed to accomplish in 1968 is surely one of the more prodigious fantasies of the decade. A wiser President might have noted the extraordinary things the United States has done over the last dozen years to preserve South Vietnam from communism and have concluded that, as President Kennedy said in 1963, "In the final analysis, it is their war. They are the ones who have to win it or lose it."

Nor is it any more probable that this need be taken as a fateful American defeat —unless, of course, our leaders succeed in convincing the rest of the world that this is the case. Most of the world had long since come to regard our intervention in Vietnam as senseless and mistaken. Does the Ford administration seriously believe that other countries would have respected us more if we had persisted in a foolish and futile policy? The decision to withdraw from an exposed and vulnerable position and to establish ourselves on a defensible line is rather more likely to increase than to reduce the confidence of other governments in our leadership. I do not know anyone who has argued that the Soviet Union destroyed its influence and credibility by pulling its missiles out of Cuba, or France by leaving Algeria.

Fortunately, despite the administration's clamor, most countries will note that our fundamental sources of power, as Henry Brandon of the London Sunday Times recently put it, remain intact. One doubts whether in the long run other states will be unduly impressed by President Ford's bizarre exercise in national masochism. Life will go on, even without President Thieu. I remember President Kennedy saying during the Bay of Pigs, "What is prestige? Is it the shadow of power or the substance of power?" He had no doubt that it was the substance of power. The American failure to attain unattainable ends in Indochina will not greatly affect the substance of power. This is surely the point the President, the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Defense should have been making during the last fortnight instead of insisting to the world that America was an unreliable friend on the road back to isolationism.

Board of Contributors

This isolationist theory is not only gratuitously damaging to our world position; it is quite false. The idea that, if we decline to go the last mile in Vietnam, we have turned isolationist is ridiculous. The choice is not between fighting everywhere and fighting nowhere. The choice is between a policy of globalism, according to which our interests are omnipresent everywhere on the planet, and a policy of responsible internationalism founded on a realistic view of the national interest. This choice expresses what has been the latent division in the internationalist camp since Pearl Harbor—the division, in essence, between the messianists and the realists.

Vietnam brought that division into the open. Our great champions of realism in foreign affairs—Walter Lippmann, Hans Morgenthau, George Kennan, Reinhold Niebuhr—were entirely consistent in favoring American participation in the Second World War and in opposing the Americanization of the war in Vietnam. In the first case, American vital interests were clearly involved. German victory would have produced a direct threat to the security of the United States. In the second case, American vital interests were clearly not involved. North Vietnamese victory will not produce a direct threat to the security of the United States.

The argument that it would was founded in assumptions derived from another age—from the age of Stalin, when communism was a relatively unitary and coordinated international movement serving as an arm of the Soviet Union. But nationalism has long since undermined the old Stalinist empire. The victory of Hanoi, as we now belatedly understand, will not mean an automatic extension of Soviet power—or, for that matter, of Chinese power. It will simply mean the enlargement of a national Communist state which will continue to respond to national motives and may even want American support to reduce its dependence on Moscow and Peking. The result will unquestionably be tough for the people of South Vietnam. But it is beyond our power to do for the people of South Vietnam what they do not seem inclined to do for themselves. No country can dedicate itself to world salvation without destroying its own integrity and safety.

George Washington long ago called it "a maxim founded on the universal experience of mankind, that no nation is to be trusted farther than it is bound by its interest." Any nation that acts beyond its interest is likely to become a bull elephant in the world, incalculable, destructive, leaving ruin in its path. Any government that makes "commitments" beyond the national interest is a menace not only to the world but to its own citizens.

The great danger now—a real danger considering the highly emotional state of our leaders—is that we will try to throw our weight around somewhere else on the theory that this will show we have not been intimidated by defeat in Vietnam. Again, the shadow of power; not the substance of power. For our real power remains unaltered. We have just as many nuclear weapons, just as strong an army, navy and air force, just as strong (or weak) a national economy. Withdrawal from Vietnam, among other things, will permit us at last to concentrate our concern on really essential allies and interests. A wise national leadership would tell the world that the legacy of Indochina is, not the defeat of the United States and the loss of American credibility, but the rejection of a hopeless policy of indiscriminate, illegitimate and sentimental world-saving and the return to earlier ideas of realistic and responsible internationalism.

This would mean a reexamination of the whole process of commitment and a repudiation of the Ford administration's recent argument that a President can secretly make "moral" commitments that supersede the legal commitments required by the American Constitution. It would mean, I trust, relentless skepticism about any thought on foreign policy emanating from the Pentagon. Richard J. Levine's devastating piece in this newspaper on April 23 began, "Rarely has a Defense Secretary been so probably and consistently wrong as James Schlesinger was in his public statements about the Vietnam war last month." The piece was especially disheartening because the military in 1975 repeated every military misjudgment with which the American people have been drearily familiar since 1961 and before. How many times do we have to be taught this particular lesson?

American foreign policy after Vietnam will not become mindlessly isolationist. It will, however, begin to bear a clear and demonstrable relationship to the primary interests of the United States. Secondary interests certainly exist, but secondary interests call for secondary, not primary, involvement. The Indochina folly, one trusts, will banish forever the dreams of glory, the illusions of American omniscience and omnipotence, the fantasies of universal responsibility and universal control, that have led to such shameful and atrocious results. If we had national leadership with a sense of history, we would now be rejoicing that, having finally freed ourselves from an unnecessary and disastrous obsession, we can start to play a role in the world consistent with our character as a people and our dignity as a democratic republic.

Mr. Schlesinger is Albert Schweitzer Professor of the Humanities at the City University of New York and winner of Pulitzer prizes in history and biography. He is also a member of the Journal's Board of Contributors, five distinguished professors who contribute periodic articles reflecting a broad range of views.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

April 30, 1975 (5 MAY) Aerospace Daily

AF TO GIVE PROXMIRE AWACS DEMONSTRATION COST DATA

Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) has been advised by the Air Force that he will be provided with information on what it cost to stage this week's flight demonstrations of the Airborne Warning and Control System (AWACS) at Andrews AFB, Md., (DAILY, April 29) and how much manpower was required.

A spokesman for the senator said yesterday an "interim" answer had been received to a request sent last week to Air Force Secretary John L. McLucas, and inserted by Proxmire in the Congressional Record. The response said the request had been received only on Monday but that AF headquarters was assembling data Proxmire wanted--total cost of making the Boeing AWACS aircraft available, broken down by direct and indirect costs, as well as a breakdown of the number of people involved.

In his letter to McLucas, the senator also asked for the secretary's "thinking as to why this apparent public relations effort is being made at this time."

In remarks on the Senate floor last Friday, Proxmire said it would be "amusing" if it did not "involve so much money" that the Air Force decided to bring the AWACS plane to the base near Washington, D.C., and conduct a series of flights for selected members of Congress and the press "at precisely the moment that the House Armed Services Committee is considering how much money to pump into the program."

Proxmire noted that Sen. Thomas F. Eagleton (D-Mo.) "has time and again pointed out the deficiencies of the aircraft," and that "expert testimony from the General Accounting Office (GAO) has shown that it is susceptible to cheap countermeasures of a not so sophisticated origin."

A spokesman for Eagleton said yesterday the Missouri senator was one of those invited to the Andrews demonstration but had not attended. However, Eagleton issued a statement Monday, charging that the Air Force had launched "an expensive Madison Avenue public relations effort to sell AWACS to Congress."

In addition to the Andrews display, he pointed out, the Air Force has been demonstrating AWACS in Europe since April 3, and last week Director of Defense Research & Engineering Dr. Malcolm Currie discussed AWACS at the spring session of the NATO Conference of National Armaments Directors (CNAD). "I understand that Dr. Currie planned to ask the NATO ministers to endorse an AF draft," Eagleton said, "which stated that they would recommend the purchase of AWACS to their respective governments if ...Congress approved AWACS production."

"This is a traditional ploy," he said, in which DOD is "simply trying to use NATO as leverage. Endorsement of (Currie's) statement is a far cry from an agreement to actually purchase the planes--particularly since it is common knowledge that NATO has as many doubts that the system will work as has our own (GAO). I am sure that Congress will be impressed with nothing short of an actual commitment of NATO funds for AWACS.

"This is simply another move--and a costly one at that--in the (AF) game to get AWACS into production before the proper testing has been done to prove once and for all the system will work in a combat situation."

Eagleton said NATO had earlier issued a classified report "critical" of AWACS.

An Eagleton staff aide said he understood that the CNAD meeting did not produce the ministers' statement of recommendation that DOD had sought.

The aide said that there was "no question but that AWACS works in a non-combat area" and "we know it can see targets." The issue, he said, is whether it can see all the targets that might be present in a combat situation.

* * *

CHICAGO TRIBUNE 4 MAY 1975 (5)

Cost of war in lives, dollars

WHEN THE AMERICAN colors were quickly and unceremoniously retired in Viet Nam April 29, the United States ended more than 20 years of involvement in the country's fight for independence.

The war cost Americans $140 billion, nearly 57,000 dead servicemen, another 900 still missing, and 303,669 wounded. More than 250,000 South Vietnamese soldiers were killed and another 783,000 were wounded.

THE JUNGLE fight against communism in the lush, tropical country began long before the first American combat Marines landed at Da Nang in 1965. Every President since Harry S. Truman was involved in the war.

By 1954, the U. S. was supplying almost $3 billion to the French effort to maintain its colonial empire—about 80 per cent of the total French cost.

When President Kennedy was inaugurated in 1961, there were 685 military personnel in South Viet Nam. He sent the first combat troops there that year. By 1968, the time of the major Tet offensive, there were more than a half million.

THE WAR ended officially for the U. S. March 29, 1973, when the last American soldier came home.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II -- Main Edition -- 5 May 1975

NEW YORK NEWS - 4 MAY 1975(5)

Domino Theory Faces a Stern Test

By JAMES WIEGHART and FRANK JACKMAN
Of The News Washington Bureau

WITHIN HOURS after the gold-starred red-and-blue flag of the Viet Cong was raised over Saigon last week came the first stirrings of change. After nearly three decades, America was no longer the dominant power in Southeast Asia, and the aftershock was being felt in capitals across the world.

Item: In Bangkok, Thai Foreign Minister Chartchai Choonhavan let it be known that a "substantial" withdrawal of the 25,000-man American force there would start Monday. "The amount will be enormous and will surprise a lot of people," he said. The clear hope was that it would surprise -- and please -- Hanoi.

Item: In Jakarta, Indonesia's foreign minister, Adam Malik, suggested that if Thailand and the Philippines were to take over the U.S. military bases in their respective countries, it would contribute to "greater stability" in Southeast Asia.

'Reassuring' Filipino Bases

Item: In Manila, Philippines President Ferdinand Marcos hinted that perhaps it was time for his country to "reassess" its defense arrangements with the United States. He said he was ready to take over the big U.S. Air Force and Navy bases in the Philippines, including Clark Field and Subic Bay.

Item: In Tokyo, Japanese leaders, while privately assuring American diplomats that they did not subscribe to the "domino theory," were recommending to the Miki government that it might be a good idea to scrap the U.S.-authored anti-militarist policy that has prevailed since Gen. Douglas MacArthur's post-World War II regency, and think about rearming.

Item: In Washington, Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.), long an advocate of bringing American troops home from Western Europe, told reporters that the U.S. might also to "withdraw on a gradual basis" the 32,000 soldiers stationed in South Korea.

Cable traffic between Washington and foreign capitals was heavy as ambassadors conferred with their governments on the new turn of events; some foreign envoys were called home for consultations, and, overseas, U.S. ambassadors were invited in for a little polite grilling by foreign ministers.

The key word -- in Washington and in capitals around the world -- was "reassessment." Foreign leaders wanted to know: Where do we go from here? What does the American defeat in Indochina mean to the rest of the world? And, very privately behind closed doors (because Washington can be very mean when aroused), how can we profit from American disarray?

The general feeling was that American foreign policy -- so solid, so predictable for so many years -- was on the verge of change. And in the relationships of nations, change means the unknown, and the unknown implies peril.

The signals from Washington were as simple and straightforward as the White House and the State Department could make them. Friendly governments were assured over and over that the United States would honor its commitments. Potential adversaries were told, publicly and privately, that it would be wrong to conclude from the U.S. failure to use military force to reverse the tide in Vietnam that the United States would shy away from using force in backing up its premises in other parts of the world.

"Let no potential adversary believe that our difficulties or our debates mean a slackening of our national will," said President Ford. "We will stand by our friends, we will honor our commitments, and we will uphold our country's principles."

Secretary of State Kissinger was equally emphatic. "No lessons should be drawn by the enemies of our friends from the experience in Vietnam," he said.

And yet . . .

Each country must look to its own well-being. No leader can afford to ignore the possible implications of the Vietnam debacle. Kissinger realizes this. While steadfastly refusing -- in public, at least -- to discuss what Vietnam might mean to the nation's foreign policy, he concedes "that the outcome in Indochina will have consequences not only in Asia, but in many other parts of the world."

Foremost in the thinking of American policy makers in the weeks and months ahead will be three key areas of the globe -- Asia and the Pacific; the Middle East; and Western Europe.

Warning signals are already flashing in Southeast Asia as Thailand and Malaysia ponder the new reality -- a Communist Indochina dominated by a united Vietnam.

The Hanoi government has for years been supplying and training insurgents in northwest Thailand, partly in retaliation for Thai support of the U.S. effort in Vietnam -- including agreement to permit B-52s to be stationed at giant bases at Udorn and Utapao for bombing raids over both North and South Vietnam -- and partly because it is the nature of Ho Chi Minh's legacy to support revolution.

Thai's Placate Hanoi

Clearly, Thailand's demands for "substantial" American withdrawal are an effort to accommodate Hanoi, or at least to temper North Vietnam's anger. The Thais are the only people of the Indochinese peninsula who have never been colonized; theirs is a heritage of independence, from the days when a friendly King Mongkut offered Abraham Lincoln elephants to help fight the Civil War down to the present.

During World War II, the Thais managed to make an accommodation with the Japanese for years, only to rise up in revolt practically on the eve of V-J Day to gain belated credit as a U.S. ally.

Whether the Thais, who have retained their strong instinct for self-preservation, can pull another last-minute reversal -- perhaps by seeking an accommodation with China -- remains to be seen. But whatever the outcome, they will probably find themselves in Hanoi's orbit for some time to come.

Malaysia has for years been fighting terrorists -- mostly of Chinese extraction -- along its northern border with Thailand, but it is not believed that Communist victory in Indochina will have any significant impact unless the local insurgents are able to recruit native Malaysian leadership. The Malaysian government may decide to ease over to a more neutralist stance, however, just to be on the safe side.

The one bright spot is Singapore, whose respected pro-Western leader, Lee Kuan Yew, ridicules the domino theory as "cold hash." Under Lee's leadership, Singapore has retained -- even improved -- her position as the crossroads of Asia and a model of dynamic development.

Lee's realistic assessment of the future calls for "a continuing American naval presence and increased economic relations" to help Southeast Asia "adjust less abruptly and to make the task of learning to live with a Communist Indochina less painful."

Indonesia, the most powerful nation in Southeast Asia in terms of population, natural resources and potential wealth, is somewhat protected by the sea from direct pressure from Indochina. The island country's Chinese-oriented Communist Party was virtually wiped out during the bloody army coup that toppled the late President Sukarno in 1965. An estimated 250,000 Indonesians were put to death with great ferocity at that time.

Loose Government Control

But the Indonesian archipelago extends 3,000 miles, and loose control by the central government in Jakarta, plus chronic economic difficulties, could make some of the weaker links in the island chain vulnerable to Communist inroads.

In an apparent effort to head off any Red incursion financed by outsiders, there are indications that the Jakarta government may lead a move toward neutralism by the Association of Southeast Asian Nations, which numbers nearly every country of consequence among its membership.

As for the Philippines, President Marcos' threat to take over U.S. bases and ask the 19,000 American servicemen to leave is probably not as serious as it has been made out to be.

Long troubled by Communist-dominated guerrillas on the main island of Luzon, and preoccupied by another struggle with secessionist Moslems on the southern island of Mindanao, Marcos periodically cranks up his "Yankee-go-home" theme to undercut dissident elements in Manila who seek to exploit residual anti-American sentiment for their own ends.

But the Philippines are notoriously corrupt, even by lax Asian standards, and the trail of graft and official thievery extends right up to the President himself. This, plus Marcos' harsh repression of political opponents -- including such extortionate twists as demanding large bribes to free political internees, then welshing on the deal -- could open the door to a popular uprising which the Communists would surely exploit.

With the exception of Japan, South Korea is the strongest bastion of pro-Americanism on the Asian-Pacific rim. There is no sign that President Park Chung Hee -- who ordered out an unbelievable 2 million Koreans to greet the late President Johnson on his trip through Seoul nine years ago -- would favor any reduction in the U.S. troop level in his

See DOMINO THEORY, Pg. 8-F

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

With Saigon's fall

CHICAGO TRIBUNE - 4 MAY 1975(5)

U.S. policy becomes biggest domino

By Jim Squires

WASHINGTON—Being finally ou. of Viet Nam hardly altered the bitter conviction of United States Ambassador Graham Martin that his country had let down the South Vietnamese.

"If we had kept our commitments," grumbled the embattled diplomat aboard the rescue carrier U. S. S. Blue Ridge, "we wouldn't have had to evacuate."

Back home, an almost tearful Henry Kissinger was predictably philosophical in defeat. "One lesson we must learn from this experience," he said, "is that we must be careful of the commitments we make, but that we should scrupulously honor those commitments."

IN THE WAKE of the nation's most disastrous foreign experience, the concern of Kissinger and Martin about U. S. commitments is shared by the world. Specifically, what is the U. S. position and how good it its word?

The most revealing answer to that question is that there is how no answer, nor, in fact, anyone in the U. S. government who can really speak for it.

The administration of President Ford maintains publicly, which it must do, that indeed there is a U S. foreign policy which assures that the U. S. will keep its existing commitments. This policy dictates that U. S. enemies should not take the Viet Nam fiasco to mean it will not keep its word elsewhere—specifically in the more than 40 other nations whose defense the U. S. under writes n one way or another.

This policy, whether articulated by Kissinger, Defense Secretary James Schlesinger, or Ford himself, warns the world that while the U. S. would not rush to the aid of the last remaining pro-American government in Indochina—in Laos—don't try anything in Japan, or South Korea, the Middle East, or Western Europe.

Despite this rather consistent public stance, there is hardly a corner of the world where U. S. policy is not now destined for a "reassessment" of one kind or another.

As Kissinger said after the final American had left Saigon:

"We will have to assess the impact of Indochina on our allies and on other countries in that area and on their perceptions of the U. S.

"We will have to assess also the role the U. S. can responsibly play over an indefinite period of time, because surely another lesson we should draw from the Indochina experience is that foreign policy must be sustained over decades if it is to be effective."

BENEATH ALL the reassessment talk is the clearest lesson of the Viet Nam war—that an administration's foreign policy is meaningless unless the public and the Congress are united behind it.

And, says Sen. (Adlai Stevenson III (D., Ill.) accenting that lack of unity. "We have no foreign policy now."

What, for example, would the U. S. do tomorrow if its mutual defense treaty with another faraway nation faced immediate military challenge? Altho it is not now expected, such a test could come in South Korea where the U. S. has 38 000 American troops and is firmly and legally bound in support of a government with lousy character references.

Contemplating a hypothetical attack by the North, a ranking U. S. official confidently predicted last week that the U. S. would respond accordingly, using its military troops. After all, they have been stationed there for 22 years for that reason.

But how long would such a move be supported by a public and a Congress still reeling from another war that cost 56,000 U. S. lives and $200 billion?

PUBLICLY, most politicians express their support of the American commitment in South Korea, noting that Dean Acheson's declaration that South Korea was outside the U. S. defense perimeter prompted an attack by the North.

But at the same time, none seem sure what the Congress would do if faced with authorizing sustained military action there.

"There are certainly some doubts about Korea," says Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D., Minn.)," especially considering the disillusionment with the Seoul government."

Personally, Humphrey says he would favor honoring the commitment. But like others he was not at all opposed to country.

See U.S. POLICY, Pg. 9-F

DOMINO THEORY -- CONTINUED

Oddly, the Communist victory in Indochina appears to have stengthened the U.S. position in South Korea—and Park's authoritarian government—because it raised the threat of another invasion from the Communist north, thus drawing closer all elements in fearful Seoul.

On the day Phnom Penh fell to the Khmer Rouge, North Korea's maximum leader, Kim Il Sung, left for Peking, along with the chief of staff of his army and his air force commander. It was Kim's first visit in 14 years, and he reportedly plans to follow it with a trip to Moscow.

The very public visit and Kim's loud celebration of the North Vietnamese success in "reuniting" their homeland—a 30-year goal he has vowed to achieve in Korea—rekindled invasion fears in the south and helped quiet Park's liberal opposition.

Despite American weariness, the Ford administration clearly will have to stand fast in Korea or face total loss of credibility around the world because the U.S. has an ironclad commitment, dating back 22 years, to come to South Korea's defense in the face of aggression.

Genuine high-level American concern over the prospects of another Korean conflict—this one without even token UN support—was eased considerably when the Peking government quietly passed the word to Washington after the Kim visit that they would not sanction any Korean "adventure."

In fact, Chinese hatred and fear of Soviet expansion runs so deep that Peking probably prefers a continued American presence in Asia as a hedge against Russian domination.

The close Japanese-American relationship—keystone of U.S. policy in the Pacific since postwar reconstruction days—is not significantly altered by the fall of Indochina in the view of most analysts. On the contrary, Vietnam's fate seems likely to muffle strident left-wing demands for U.S. military withdrawal from Japan and Okinawa.

But there is a danger that Indochina's fate could awaken long dormant Japanese militarism, and this could, in turn, pose a long-term threat to peace and stability in Asia. There are painful memories in Peking, Manila and other Asian capitals of the Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere of World War II, and Japan has even more economic power today.

A rearmed Japanese superstate with its insatiable appetite for oil and other resources might well become a formidable U.S. rival, rather than a partner, in the Pacific.

As in Asia, the issue in the Middle East and Europe may be summed up in one word—credibility.

European diplomats in Washington said that for the most part their governments viewed the American withdrawal from Indochina with relief. It was felt that now the U.S. could devote more of its energies and attention to the grave economic and other problems facing its natural allies among the Western industrial nations.

Ford Will Give Assurances

Most NATO governments were pleased by Ford's plan to attend the alliance foreign ministers' meeting in Brussels at the end of May to present his reassurances about U.S. intentions, an indication that there must have been some doubts in Europe, however faint.

Egypt and Israel, both of whom have relied on the U.S. role as "honest broker" in the Middle East, are the two countries in that area most directly reliant on U.S. credibility.

Thus the major chore of the Ford administration in foreign policy is to repair the damage Vietnam has done to America's image and credibility abroad. But the No. 2 job is to start repairing it at home. As House Republican Leader John J. Rhodes (Ariz.) remarked the other day, "When our ambassador leaves Vietnam by an emergency evacuation helicopter with the flag draped over his knees—why, you can't get any lower than that. It has to go up from here."

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II -- Main Edition -- 5 May 1975

NEW YORK TIMES - 4 MAY 1975 (5)

Moscow Sees the Chance To Fill a Diplomatic Void

By CHRISTOPHER S. WREN

MOSCOW—"Détente or not, you can't expect the Russians not to try to pick up the marbles," observed an American diplomat recently. He alluded to the diplomatic opportunities presented by American setbacks from Indochina to the Middle East.

There is little doubt that the Russians recognize their chance to expand both influence and prestige. Their immediate concern has been that in entering the areas where United States diplomacy has been conspicuously unsuccessful, they avoid bumping into the Americans on their way out.

Prime among the Kremlin's current goals is to lessen the risk of nuclear confrontation with the Americans by working out the offensive arms accord outlined at the Vladivostok meeting. Despite the collapse of the trade agreement last January, the Soviets continue to view Soviet-American trade as an essential means of infusing the Soviet economy with needed technology.

Any doubts about accommodation with the West seem to have been dispelled in the vote of confidence that the April Plenum of the Communist party leadership gave party chief Leonid Brezhnev. The Plenum stressed that his policy of détente offered the Soviet Union and its allies "favorable external conditions for further progress along the path of building Socialism and Communism."

The Plenum also noted that "a substantial turn, which is exerting a great influence on the strengthening of universal peace, has taken place in relations between the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A.," according to a report in Pravda.

There seems to be some awareness that the climate of accommodation has made Washington eager to avoid a clash with Moscow. Recent events may have persuaded the hardliners in the Kremlin that they can have their détente and profit from it, too.

Options on Indochina

In South Vietnam, Moscow noted the fall of Saigon last week by duly weighing in with congratulations from the Kremlin leadership to "the courageous patriots" of the victorious Communist forces. Yet even at the end, the Russians were cautious not to castigate the Americans directly, though they have otherwise supported Hanoi's policies. Following the fall of Pnom Penh, the Russians had similarly pledged support for the Khmer Rouge, though here it appeared a more patent attempt to catch up with the Chinese.

An evident satisfaction at seeing the Americans out of Indochina has been tempered here by some private concern that in the long run the Chinese may become the ideological victors in Vietnam.

The Soviets had leaned toward a more political settlement that would give them a role as superpower broker for Communist interests.

One non-Communist Asian diplomat here feels such concern may be well-founded, noting that the Russians with their European-oriented outlook may inherit some of the distrust that the French and Americans engendered in Southeast Asia.

Yet it has also been noted here that the history of Indochina is largely resistance to the Chinese. The Russians hope that their patronage may help Hanoi to stake out an independent position, and give the Soviets a solid foothold in the area.

Options on the Mideast

At the same time, the Soviets are likely to take advantage of any anti-American backlash in Asia, including expanding their naval presence in the Indian Ocean. One Western diplomat has suggested that he would not be surprised to see Soviet ships eventually paying port calls to an American ally like the Philippines.

In the Middle East, Moscow has made careful preparations for a reconvening of the Geneva conference that it has advocated for so long. In less than two weeks, ranking official delegations were summoned from Iraq, Egypt and Syria, with a further visit by Yasir Arafat of the Palestinian Liberation Organization last week.

The Kremlin, determined to see the new diplomatic offensive a success, has stressed the need for Arab consensus and cooperation at Geneva. Apparently intending to undercut Israeli objections to pulling out of the occupied Arab lands, Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko has emphasized that the Soviet Union is prepared to help offer "the strictest guarantees" for Israel's existence.

In Portugal, the Soviets have denied complicity in the leftist political swing, though their sympathies have been clear. The relatively poor showing of the Communists in last week's elections was overlooked. The immediate Soviet response was that the Portuguese had still opted for the Socialist course, but Soviet officials seemed relieved that the Portuguese Army remained in control. Moscow seems determined to go slowly on Portugal so as not to alarm other West European nations and upset Soviet hopes for a meeting of heads of state as a windup to the current European security talks.

Despite the Kremlin's expanded number of options, one Western European diplomat has detected some Soviet concern that the United States, in pulling away from Asia, may become more committed to Europe and the interests of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Soviet officials have said that they do not really expect the United States to retreat into isolationism. In seeking to replace the Americans elsewhere, the Russians may find themselves back in a region that touches most directly on Moscow's interests.

Christopher S. Wren is bureau chief of The New York Times in Moscow.

U.S. POLICY -- CONTINUED

another good hard look at where our national interest lies in relation to that part of the world.

Rep. John Anderson [R., Ill.], with the reputation as a good pulsetaker in the House, says that while he would honor the South Korean treaty he could not rule out the possibility of a congressional decision which "concludes it is 10,000 miles away and not a matter of immediate concern."

Obviously, some alliances are more important than others and are not subject to the same "close call" debate in Congress as South Korea. But it is hard to grasp a consensus of opinion on the real U. S. national interests in Japan, Western Europe and even North America.

Should the U. S. withdraw its troops from Thailand but leave them in Philippines? Should it recall American forces from South Korea but leave them in West Germany?

Should it aid a pro-American government anywhere, knowing that at some point it must prop it up with American military air or watch it fall to an ideological adversary?

PRESUMABLY, the reassessment that will follow the Viet Nam defeat will provide the answers. But will they be answers the country can unite behind?

Sen. Charles Percy [R., Ill.], a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, says the reassessment must be a common one carried out by Congress as well as the executive branch. "It is clear that commitments by the President alone are meaningless unless they have advice and consent of Congress," says Percy.

Whether the administration welcomes it or not, the Percys, the Humphreys and the Andersons of Congress are planning an important role in the reshaping of American foreign policy.

The task of putting all those eggs in a single basket may well be a far greater challenge than any so far faced by Kissinger or Ford. But until it is done, no one can really speak for America.

Jim Squires is the chief of The Tribune's Washington bureau

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON STAR
4 MAY 1975(5)

U.S., Soviet On Carpet Over Arms

By Henry S. Bradsher
Washington Star Staff Writer

A conference to review the way a 1968 international treaty against the spread of nuclear weapons' ownership has been working opens tomorrow in Geneva with the United States and the Soviet Union expected to be cast in the role of co-defendants.

The nonproliferation treaty (NPT) was signed by many countries on the understanding that they would not seek nuclear weapons while those already having them, particularly the two superpowers, would restrain their own arms race.

But both Washington and Moscow have continued to improve and expand their nuclear armaments. Advance indications are that a number of countries will complain at the month-long Geneva conference about this.

Some are also expected to demand that the superpowers promise not to use nuclear weapons first in any conflict. Such a promise is considered impossible by U.S. officials because it would undermine the confidence of North Atlantic Treaty Organization allies in American protection.

AMONG THE MANY American critics of U.S. government arms control policy, there is a suspicion that the NPT review is being approached with an attitude simply of trying to limit the damage from propagandistic attacks, rather than with any constructive hopes for furthering the cause of avoiding a dangerously nuclear-armed world.

High administration sources deny this. They talk of emphasizing the need for better controls on present nuclear materials and other steps which might be taken.

The sources cite recent hopeful developments. Six countries have added their adherence to the treaty, and there is greater consciousness of the need for protection against nuclear materials falling into terrorist hands.

The Treaty on the Nonproliferation of Nuclear Weapons began to be signed on July 1, 1968, and entered into force March 5, 1970. With five new ratifications on Friday, 91 nations have now become parties to it and 17 more have signed but not ratified.

Adherents agree not to transfer nuclear weapons or nuclear explosives to any nation not already having them, and those without them agree not to acquire them. They also agree to observe safeguards preventing the diversion of nuclear material from peaceful to military purposes.

THE TREATY also provides for a conference five years after it entered into force to review its operations.

The U. S. delegation will be headed by Dr. Fred C. Ikle, director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency.

In a speech last month, Ikle warned that "the news on nuclear proliferation is bad. Several countries, not now nuclear-weapons states, appear to be making determined efforts to acquire a capability that would enable them to build their own atomic bombs...peaceful technology provides not only the means but also the cover...."

Ikle has on several occasions listed India, Israel, Brazil and Argentina as countries that have said they will not adhere to the treaty. Outside experts add Pakistan, South Africa, Egypt and possibly other countries to the list of potential nuclear powers.

The treaty permits any adherent to withdraw from its commitment to abjure nuclear weapons if it feels its national interests are jeopardized. Or, Ikle has noted, it "could simply violate the treaty." The treaty lacks the teeth of an enforcing mechanism.

INDIA'S EXPLOSION last May 18 of what it called a peaceful nuclear device gave a sense of urgency to advocates of NPT.

Despite Indian disclaimers, it has been widely assumed that India is developing — or has developed — nuclear weapons. Yet India is already the overwhelmingly dominant power in its immediate region without such weapons, point out observers who refer to the Indian subcontinent without reference to India's border with an antagonistic, nuclear-armed China.

The assumption of weapons theorists had always been that a weaker power would always be the first to seek nuclear weapons in its region as a "quick fix." Israel is often cited in this context.

Now, if a stronger power is going to move ahead to nuclear weaponry, everyone else will be dragged behind it, many observers fear. There is considerable apprehension about South America, for instance, as well as the Middle East and the Indian subcontinent.

The answer from many non-nuclear countries to pleas from the big, already strong nations to abjure nuclear weapons has been that they must have a promise of "no first use" from nuclear powers. China has repeatedly said, since exploding its first nuclear device in 1964, that it would never be first.

THE UNITED STATES is particularly sensitive on this point at a time when Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger is already arguing that American credibility was put in doubt by the debacle in Indochina.

The Soviet bloc greatly outnumbers NATO in troops and non-nuclear weaponry in Europe. American nuclear weapons are the main balancing factor.

The United States is unwilling to do anything now which might endanger its credibility as a reliable ally, and so must politely but flatly reject any idea of promising to restrict itself on defending NATO with nuclear weapons, officials say.

The Friday ratifications of NPT came from the five members of the European Atomic Energy Community (EURATOM), Belgium, West Germany, Italy, Luxembourg and The Netherlands. A week earlier, South Korea ratified, although hostile North Korea is not a party to the treaty. Japan has recently taken steps bringing it close to ratification.

Administration officials found these moves particularly encouraging because now all major industrial countries which could fairly quickly and easily make their first nuclear weapons — especially West Germany and Japan — have agreed not to do so.

THE FEARS of accidental or criminal diversion of nuclear materials into weapons has been growing in recent years. This problem will be a major item in Geneva.

The U. S. General Accounting Office has warned that the Army and Navy have been transporting nuclear warheads without adequate security precautions against accidental damage or theft. The Army uses ordinary commercial trucks to carry warheads over public streets and highways without much protection, it said.

Similar reports from other countries about weapons and nuclear components from power stations have alarmed officials of many countries. They have worried about the possibility that terrorists might use the readily available nuclear technological data to convert stolen materials into major international blackmail tools.

WASHINGTON POST
3 MAY 1975(5)

Nuclear Report

UNITED NATIONS—The only way to stop the spread of nuclear weapons, said a report issued by the U.N. Associaton of the United States, is for the United States to agree to join with other suppliers of nuclear material and know how to bar nuclear sales to nations that fail to accept international safeguards.

The alternative, the panel report said, would be "a world saturated with weapons of mass destruction."

The panel report was issued in connection with a conference of 85 nations that have ratified the five-year-old nonproliferation treaty to ban the spread of nuclear weapons.

CHICAGO TRIBUNE - 4 MAY 1975(5)

Days before end of war, work pressed forward on construction near Saigon of a monument to American GIs who fought in South Viet Nam. Following is a Defense Department list of casualties in American wars. Figures prior to World War I are based on incomplete data and Confederate figures for the Civil War are estimates.

	Battle Deaths	Other Deaths	Wounded
Revolutionary War	4,435	Unknown	6,188
War of 1812	2,260	Unknown	4,505
Mexican	17,733	11,550	4,152
Civil War
Union	140,414	224,097	281,881
Confederate	74,524	85,297	Unknown
Spanish-American	385	2,061	1,662
World War I	53,402	63,114	204,002
World War II	291,557	113,842	607,846
Korean	33,629	20,617	103,284
Viet Nam	46,229	10,326	303,654

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CHICAGO TRIBUNE 4 MAY 1975 (5) Part II -- Main Edition -- 5 May 1975

Japan's Army hobbled by costs, doubts

Tokyo (AP)—Thirty years after the crushing defeat of World War II, Japan's once mighty military establishment is hobbled by inflation, public indifference, detente and doubts about its right to exist.

Down to a mere 232,936 men —33,000 below authorized strength—the nation's Self Defense Force is only the palest shadow of the tough, old Imperial Army of 5 million that conquered much of Asia and the South Pacific.

Seventy years ago Japan established itself as a military power in Asia with its victory in the Russo-Japanese war. Now it is a world power without heavy bombers, long-range missiles, aircraft carriers, atom bombs or other weapons associated with offensive warfare.

One reason so puny a force is protecting a nation of 110 million is psychological, a nationwide revulsion against atomic warfare and against the militarism of the 1930's and 1940's that brought Japan close to extinction as a nation and created a country of dedicated pacifists.

The second is constitutional. Under the American-inspired 1947 Constitution, Japan renounced war as a sovereign national right, and stated: "Land, sea and air forces, as well as other war potential, will never be maintained."

It is this provision that prompts many Japanese to question the right of the Self Defense Force to exist. It is also why Japan has joined no regional security alliances, and sent no combat soldiers overseas since 1945.

The third reason is economic. Japan's youths just out of high school have, until recently, preferred to take the examinations that put them on the economic escalator as lifetime employees of big business. Though high school graduates get a respectable salary in the new Army—$194 monthly and 5.2 months of bonus pay yearly—private industry pays more. To many Japanese youths, the Army is a short adventure, not a career.

A downturn in the economy has resulted in a slight increase in enrollments recently. But 20,000 men of the all-volunteer forces quit each year. The Self Defense Agency says there is no money for a concentrated enlistment drive to bridge the gap.

Finally, Japan can maintain so small an Army at a bargain basement price—less than 1 per cent of the gross national product—because under a 25-year-old security treaty the United States guarantees to come to its assistance in case of attack.

That Japan has a military force at all is due to an anxious afterthought: the Korean war in 1950 and the Communist conquest of China the year before persuaded U.S. and Japanese leaders that Japan needed at least a nominal protective shield of its own to confront what they saw as a widening Communist threat to North Asia.

Aware of questions surrounding the birth of the defense force, successive conservative governments have adopted a low posture to gain it public acceptance. Accenting peace and its purely defensive role, they have involved it in a variety of community services from flood control to rescue work after earthquakes and typhoons.

The militaristic stigma clings to today's ground, maritime and air defense troops, self-effacing and public-spirited though they are. For a time, troops were too ashamed to wear their uniforms in public. Universities refused to accept them as undergraduates. Left-wing political parties portrayed them as germs of an aborning militarism.

The problem still confronts Prime Minister Takeo Miki. In a January budget address to the parliament, he said: "Let me stress again that the Self Defense Forces will not be able to manifest their true worth as long as they remain aloof and isolated from the people."

Most Japanese discount the possibility in this different day and age that the fledgling force—there are 153,658 men in the Army, 38,196 in the Navy and 41,090 in the Air Force—contain the seed of rebellion or incident militarism.

They cite the unsuccessful effort of Yukio Mishima, the novelist, to rally 2,000 Self Defense soldiers behind him for a coup d'etat just before his flamboyant suicide in 1970. His fervent plea to rise up for the emperor and restore the old martial virtues was met with derision.

That anxiety over the Self Defense Force is not entirely without foundation, however, was demonstrated in early February. A Socialist member of the Diet disclosed then that a group of Self Defense officers had organized a study and research group that envisaged a coup to overthrow any future progressive government.

The defense agency's director general, Michita Sakata, explained the group drew up the theoretical plan in 1971, that it was a private initiative, not connected with defense agency, and the group had been disbanded. Despite these disclaimers, leftists were not reassured.

The defense program is buffeted today by a new and unexpected enemy—inflation. The current five-year buildup plan was budgeted for $15.4 billion. With nearly one year left to go, it has eaten up $14.3 billion and the new estimate is for a total of $20 billion.

This means that 20,000 tons of planned naval construction will have to be delayed as well as acquisition of new tanks and remodeled ground support fighter planes.

Perhaps more damaging than inflation is the sense of uncertainty that pervades the Self Defense Force itself.

"Our position today is dubious," one soldier said. "We are neither fish nor fowl. We carry out our mission almost by stealth. This has to be changed. We must become legal."

The question of the Self Defense Force's legality is in the courts. One lower court ruled that it was illegal and the appeal is pending.

This has given rise to pressure for revision of the famed Article 9 (no war, no military establishment) of the Constitution.

Leftists in the parliament stand resolutely in the way of revision, a process that would require a two-thirds vote of the parliament. They argue that the Defense Force should be disbanded, that Japan should adopt a policy of unarmed neutrality, and that once revision begins it will erode the many American-inspired freedoms Japanese now enjoy.

Neither revision or the U.S.-Japan Security Treaty are burning issues today. Some members of the Miki government are reported to have discussed revision recently, but if they did, it has been hushed up.

AEROSPACE DAILY 30 APRIL 1975 (5 MAY)

HIGH DEFENSE SPENDING REDUCES JOBS POTENTIAL, NEW STUDY SAYS

A new study by a Michigan research group "smashes the myth promoted by big defense contractors that high defense spending means more jobs" and shows that an $80 billion defense budget actually costs the nation 840,000 jobs annually, Rep. Les Aspin (D-Wis.) has reported.

The study, by the Lansing-based Public Interest Research Group in Michigan (PIRGM), analyzes on a state-by-state basis the employment difference between spending for defense and cutting taxes and spending the same amount of money in the private sector, Aspin said in a statement Monday.

According to the study, he added, each $1 billion decrease in defense spending, together with a corresponding cut in taxes, nets an increase of 10,600 jobs.

PIRGM's analysis examines five key sectors of the economy, he continued, and on the basis of a statistical study done at Yale University determines how much job growth is passed up by an economy spending on defense, with its high cost per job created, rather than spending in the public sector or returning the money through tax cuts.

Most major industrial states "lost" jobs in the analysis, although a few gained employment from high defense spending. Principal losers, according to the study, were New York--426,000 jobs; Illinois--174,000; Michigan--172,000; Ohio--146,000; Pennsylvania--127,000; and Wisconsin--72,000. Biggest gainers were Texas---133,000; California--97,000; and Virginia--56,000.

In the five largest losing states, Aspin noted, the study indicates that the jobs lost averaged 85% of the average total unemployment between 1968 and 1973.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II -- Main Edition -- 5 May 1975
WASHINGTON POST (PARADE) 4 MAY 1975 (5)

Is the Pentagon Tinkering Too Much With the Weather?

by Phil Stanford

WASHINGTON, D.C.

The first time anyone used weather modification as a weapon was in 1963 when the CIA tried to make it rain on Buddhists demonstrating against the government of South Vietnam. "They would just stand around during the demonstrations when the police threw tear gas at them," a former agent told a reporter, "but we noticed that when the rains came they wouldn't stay on." So the CIA decided to give nature a hand.

Last year the Department of Defense admitted that from 1967 to 1972 it conducted extensive rainmaking operations—called Operation Popeye—over the Ho Chi Minh Trail in Southeast Asia. The object was to make the trail so muddy that the North Vietnamese couldn't move supplies into the South.

Military scientists have learned how to disperse cold fog by seeding the fog with dry ice or silver iodide. One reason for getting rid of fog is to clear runways or the flight decks of aircraft carriers to make them safe for landings. Another reason would be to clear away the fog covering bombing targets.

The U.S. Navy is working on what it describes as "defensive" weather modification. "Potential enemies," says a Navy document, may use weather modification techniques "to produce environmental conditions which benefit their own forces or limit the effectiveness of our forces."

Experts agree that the Soviet Union and the U.S. already have the ability to use weather modification as a local, battlefield weapon. A number of scientists are concerned that weather modification might also be used on a larger scale as a strategic weapon. In Senate hearings last year, Dr. Gordon MacDonald of Dartmouth College and a former member of the Council on Environmental Quality, named several kinds of global weather war that may be possible within the next decade or so.

It is already possible, MacDonald said, for man to trigger earthquakes by injecting fluids into faults in the earth's crust. These earthquakes could be used to set off tsunamis—giant tidal waves—that could wipe out coastal cities.

"Another possibility," said MacDonald, "is to melt the bottom of the Antarctic ice cap and cause tidal waves of one sort or another by having the ice slide more rapidly out into the ocean than it otherwise would."

'Holes' in ozone layer

Another would be to create "holes" in the ozone layer of the earth's atmosphere for the purpose of bombarding another country with ultraviolet rays. Ultraviolet rays are what cause suntan or sunburn. Ordinarily they are filtered out of sunlight by the ozone in the upper atmosphere. However, it is possible to make temporary holes in the ozone layer, letting the ultraviolet radiation through undiminished. "If the full force of it were experienced," says MacDonald, "it would be fatal to all life—including farm crops and herds—that could not take shelter."

Another possibility comes from Dr. Pierre St. Amand, the director of the Navy's weather modification research program. While Dr. MacDonald has been one of the leaders of the scientific community in attempting to have weather war outlawed, Dr. St. Amand is one of its most prominent defenders.

"Assume for a minute," St. Amand told a Congressional committee, "that a large country exists in which a nonirrigable crop must be planted and matured so that the country has adequate food and foreign exchange. It might, to take a negative viewpoint, be advantageous to cause heavy rain during planting season to preclude sprouting and growth, and then to cause severe and protracted drought during the growing season."

Now that it is clear that governments can use weather modification as a weapon—today on a limited scale, tomorrow perhaps almost without limit—some members of Congress are taking an interest in placing a ban on weather war. From the beginning the leader in this effort has been Sen. Claiborne Pell (D., R.I.), who in 1973 persuaded the Senate to pass a resolution asking the Administration to seek negotiations with Russia on banning weather modification for war. This year Reps. Donald Fraser (D., Minn.) and Gilbert Gude (R., Md.) are offering a similar resolution in the House. Gude also plans to introduce legislation that would take all weather research away from the military.

Naturally, both ideas—a ban on the use of weather modification for war and Gude's plan to get the military out of the weather modification business altogether—have encountered considerable opposition from the Pentagon. There is no good reason, Pentagon spokesmen argue, why weather modification should not be considered just another weapon—for the benefit and protection of our own fighting men.

Dr. St. Amand, speaking for those who oppose a ban on weather war, takes an example from World War II to support his case. What would have happened, he asks, if we had been able to use weather modification at the Battle of the Bulge when American troops were surrounded by the Germans and a heavy cover of fog prevented our Air Force from dropping in supplies and ammunition? "The American troops were short on food, ammunition and fuel, and were unable to advance," says St. Amand. "This advance was critical to obtaining the fall of Germany while the Wehrmacht was still reeling from earlier reverses.

Shorter war?

"A portion of the time this fog was supercooled. Available techniques can now, with a very high reliability, clear supercooled fog in a matter of 30 or 40 minutes. It would have shortened World War II by several weeks if the technology had then been available. Would it have been wrong to use the technology? I think not."

Opponents of a ban also argue that weather warfare is actually more humane than guns or bombs. Is it less cruel, they ask, to destroy an infantry company with high explosives or to immobolize it with excessive rainfall? (Those who support a ban say that since both would be used—rain and bombs—this argument is somewhat misleading.)

The supporters of a ban on military weather modification base their case on three main arguments. First, they say that despite recent advances there is still much that is not known about weather modification. The consequences of weather modification operations are really unpredictable. Second, weather modification would very likely involve civilians. This is prohibited by the rules of war.

Finally, say those who want weather war outlawed, even the most limited uses of weather modification tend to open up a Pandora's Box of horrors. If we accept weather modification as a very limited battlefield weapon, the next step is a slightly less limited operation—and the next step is the use of the same techniques to alter the climate of an entire country.

As a result of pressure by Congress and concerned scientists, delegations from Russia and the United States have begun meeting to consider negotiations on outlawing weather war. At this point the meetings are preliminary—just meetings to plan meetings—and it is unclear how far either side is willing to go in renouncing this new weapon that both are developing. However, it is surely a start in the right direction.

Members of Congress, scientists—and just plain citizens who like to keep their weather reports separate from the latest news from the latest battlefront—will be watching closely.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

RADIO - TV DEFENSE DIALOG

RADIO TV REPORTS INC. WASH., D.C., SUMMARIES NOT TO BE QUOTED.

TUESDAY, MAY 6, 1975 (BROADCASTS OF MAY 5, 1975)

SUMMARY OF NETWORK NEWS IN THIS ISSUE

John CHANCELLOR, Catherine MACKIN, George LEWIS, David BRINKLEY, and Jack PERKINS, all of NBC, report on Vietnam refugees and Asia. MACKIN reports that Director Dean BROWN went before a House subcommittee and said that about 30,000 jobs will be needed for Vietnamese refugees and was questioned concerning the resettlement effort. LEWIS reports that a large number of Vietnamese refugees who fled by sea are being picked up by the U.S. Navy and other ships or who headed for Subic Bay or Guam. BRINKLEY comments on arguments for the resettlement of refugees into the U.S. and on arguments against the influx of evacuees. PERKINS reports on why the Thai government is asking the U.S. to remove troops and airplanes from Thailand. He interviews the Thai Prime Minister who states that he does not believe Hanoi will invade Thailand; that he would like still to be friends with the U.S.; and that he is asking for the removal of troops because it compromises Thailand in its neighbors' eyes. CHANCELLOR reports on the Presidential request for $507 million for resettlement of refugees; on reports coming from Saigon and on Thai requests for American withdrawal. CHANCELLOR also reports on rumors that the Khmer Rouge have begun executions and that General CUSHMAN will resign early. CHANCELLOR reports that KISSINGER denies any knowledge about alleged assassination attempts on foreign leaders and includes an excerpt of an interview with KISSINGER done by Barbara Walters, concerning detente and the recent events in Indochina.

Roger MUDD, Bob SCHIEFFER and Murray FROMSON, all of CBS, report on Vietnam refugees and Thailand. SCHIEFFER gives a breakdown of the money requested for resettlement of refugees by President FORD. FROMSON has a report on Thailand and includes a statement by the Thai Prime Minister who discounts the domino theory and says Thailand should depend more on itself for its defense. MUDD reports on the influx of refugees on Guam; on statements by Nguyen Cao KY saying that THIEU was responsible for what happened in Vietnam not the U.S.; and on withdrawals of U.S. forces from Thailand.

MUDD, CBS, reports that President FORD will not promise to deliver weapons to Israel in upcoming meetings with RABIN, but that Jordan is getting a Hawk ground-to-air missile system. MUDD and Daniel SCHORR also report on CIA investigations. SCHORR reports that the ROCKEFELLER Commission is concentrating on allegations that CIA tried assassinations; that KISSINGER denies knowledge of any such attempts; and that Secretary SCHLESINGER discounted charges that the CIA killed KENNEDY. MUDD also reports that both Gen. CUSHMAN and Gen. ANDERSON are going to retire early and that Lt. Gen. WILSON will become the top Marine.

Howard K. SMITH, Sam DONALDSON, Harry REASONER, Jerry KING, Frank TOMLINSON, Jim GIGGANS, and Tom JARRIEL, all of ABC, have reports. DONALDSON reports on Judiciary subcommittee hearings on Vietnamese refugees and resettlement. KING reports on conditions on Guam for the refugees. TOMLINSON reports on troop withdrawals from Thailand and that the U.S. has recovered 120 Vietnamese planes. GIGGANS reports on reasons for the policy shift in Thailand as regards American withdrawals. JARRIEL reports that mail at the White House is running in favor of the President and that he praised Ambassador MARTIN for the evacuation.

Barbara WALTERS, the "Today" show for NBC, interviews Secretary of State KISSINGER about whether or not the loss of Vietnam is considered a defeat for America and about resistance by Americans to the influx of Vietnamese refugees. KISSINGER cites as precedent the Cuban and Hungarian evacuees and gives the reasons behind accepting the Vietnamese.

PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE SAFAA, AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL MATTERS WITHIN THEIR OFFICIAL RESPONSIBILITIES.

FOR INFORMATION REGARDING THIS PUBLICATION CALL MR. HARRY ZUBKOFF, OX 52884

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NBC NIGHTLY NEWS NBC TV
7:00 PM MAY 5

News About Vietnamese Refugees and Asia

JOHN CHANCELLOR: Good evening. The FORD administration today asked the Congress for more than half a billion dollars for Vietnamese refugees and said it must have the money within a week. Speed is necessary, according to the Director of the refugee task force, because a $98 million fund now being used for refugees will be used up in a week. That money had been earmarked for post-war reconstruction in Vietnam. And the administration told a House committee today the number of refugees could rise to 150,000. The request for the money, $507 million, ran into immediate Congressional resistance. Catherine Mackin covered the story.

CATHERINE MACKIN: Dean BROWN, Director of President FORD's refugee program said he is working with non-voluntary organizations inside the United States on placing the refugees and that a priority is to resettle them in areas where they will not compete with Americans who are having trouble finding jobs.

DIRECTOR DEAN BROWN: We have agreed with them that the new arrivals should be dispersed as evenly and equitably as possible throughout the United States, avoiding in particular resettlement in economically hard pressed areas.

REPRESENTATIVE: Would you attempt to describe for the committee how many jobs might be needed by these refugees?

DIRECTOR BROWN: I would say that of 150,000 entering, we're talking about probably 30,000 heads of households, 30,000 jobs, sir.

REPRESENTATIVE DODD: There is a tremendous hesitancy on my part anyway to support individuals who are more capable of sustaining themselves economically than I am.

DIRECTOR BROWN: We're not going to be spending money on resettlement of people that have money. No way.

MACKIN: The committee also wanted to know what is being done about those South Vietnamese who misused American war funds or otherwise engaged in wartime stealing and torture, including imprisoned people in tiger cages. The answer is they will be admitted to the United States because even though some of them may be suspected of these crimes, none of them have been convicted, and to be kept out of this country they must be proven criminals. Catherine Mackin, NBC News, at the Capitol.

CHANCELLOR: Senator George McGOVERN thinks that most refugees would be better off back in Vietnam. Today he introduced a bill in the Senate which would allow them to go back if they wish to go, at American government expense.

(Commercials)

The State Department today set up a toll free telephone number for Americans who wish to sponsor Vietnamese families who are settling in the United States. The number is 800-368-1180.

About 30,000 of the South Vietnamese refugees are those who got away from their homeland on South Vietnamese naval vessels. It was a big, crowded flotilla and it's arrived at Subic Bay in the Philippines. George Lewis has that story.

GEORGE LEWIS: The collapse of South Vietnam sent hundreds of ships, boats and barges fleeing into the South China Sea, a flotilla of refugees. No one knows the exact number and no one seems to know exactly what to do with all of them. Many were taken aboard U.S. Navy and merchant marine ships after spending several days in the hot sun with little food or water. Some were bound for Guam, others to the Philippines. The main responsibility for sorting out all the refugees and finding places for them to live rests with the United States government. It's going to be a huge task because there are far more people than anyone had expected. Among the refugees are men who deserted the army and air force in the last days of the fighting. Many just laid down their weapons and ran, they said it was useless to continue battling, their generals had escaped and they were outnumbered by the other side. For these men staying alive was more important than dying for a lost cause. U.S. officials said considering the way the refugees got out of Vietnam, the number of sick and injured was relatively small. There was little trouble providing first aid for the refugees. The big problems are yet to come. The U.S. Government will have to feed, clothe and house all of them while they try to pick up their lives. They head for a country that accepts them reluctantly and they worry about the future hardships they may have to face. George Lewis, NBC News, Hong Kong.

CHANCELLOR: The evacuation of the South Vietnamese refugees produced an unexpected reaction here in the United States. David Brinkley's Journal tonight discusses that reaction and some reasons for it. David.

DAVID BRINKLEY: The President wants money to bring in and resettle many as many as 150,000 Vietnamese refugees. But it is not certain he will get all he wants because it appears there is a rising public opposition. There are no polls yet and no precise figures on how many Americans want or don't want to accept and care for the Vietnamese, but it is clear the opposition is substantial. A survey of 50 members of Congress showed their mail from home was heavily against taking them in, and these opinions are beginning to be reflected in the congressmens' public remarks. Senator McGOVERN, for one, said he though about 90 percent for their own good, about 90 percent of the Vietnamese should be given free rides back home. Senator JAVITS of New York said his parents were immigrants and he found that attitude appalling. The objection usually raised is that a time of high unemployment is no time to take in refugees from anywhere, since they may make it worse. But in the public reactions being sent to Washington there are other objections, stated or implied. One is that people suspect this will turn into another social and welfare problem and they feel the country has more than enough of these already; and the desire to put an unpleasant experience into the past and keep it there, and to resist anything, including resettlement, that will hang around to remind them of it.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

(Commercials)

CHANCELLOR: All the news out of South Vietnam today comes from various Communist sources. It includes the following. Thousands of officers and men of the old South Vietnamese navy have surrendered their ships to the revolutionary government. The government emptied the so-called "Tiger Cages" on Con Son island of its political prisoners and gave remnants of the Saigon army until the end of this month to surrender. Two Soviet freighters put into Da Nang with food and other aid, and Saigon's Tansonnhut Airport was reopened. Finally, former president Duong Van MINH, known as "Big" MINH, has been released from detention.

Both Thailand and the United States agreed today to remove almost 10,000 of the 25,000 American servicemen in Thailand over the next two months. Thailand wants the rest of them out in a year, but that's negotiable. The Pentagon said it is flying out of Thailand some of the 120 planes flown to that country by fleeing South Vietnamese pilots. And Thailand now treads a delicate course between the United States and the victors in Indochina. Jack Perkins, who is travelling in SE Asia, is assessing the effects of that victory. Tonight he reports from Bangkok.

JACK PERKINS: The new Prime Minister of Thailand has told NBC News that he does not believe that it is Hanoi's intention next to try to overrun Thailand. He does not believe that. But there is evidence in intelligence reports here that that is Hanoi's intention and there are those in Thai government who fear it and believe the Prime Minister is to sanguine about the dangers that face this country. They look at the map. In the north and NE of their country there are bands of Communist guerrillas active. They've been there for 10 years but of late they are more aggressive and more numerous than ever. Intelligence reports now figure there are 9,000 soldiers armed by Hanoi, many trained in Hanoi, and 50,000 active Communist supporters in these regions. Across the border in Laos a complete network of roads has been built and supply depots and a command structure apparently for just one reason, to supply a war against Thailand. Hanoi Radio has been saying most every day that Thailand is the next target for liberation, and now that its troops will not be otherwise occupied there are those in Thailand who fear that the time has come. But the new Prime Minister is not one of them. Prime Minister Kukrit PRAMOTCH (?).

PRIME MINISTER KUKRIT PRAMOTCH: I think it depends on us not on North Vietnam alone.

PERKINS: Well do you believe that North Vietnam has such an intention? And or capability?

PRIME MINISTER PRAMOTCH: I don't think so personally. No.

PERKINS: You don't feel any...

PRIME MINISTER PRAMOTCH: Well they might have aims of increasing their political influence and power and all that, but I don't think they will resort to direct invasion.

PERKINS: Prime Minister, you have asked that American troops be withdrawn from your country within the next year. What would you see after that as America's role in this part of the world?

PRIME MINISTER PRAMOTCH: Well I certainly would like to be friendly with the United States. We would like to feel that the United States is there ready to help us in time of danger or trouble.

PERKINS: Do you believe that?

PRIME MINISTER PRAMOTCH: I would like to but it's been very difficult. But I can see now the presence of the United States troops in this country is merely to compromise us in the eyes of the other countries -- that we are the U.S. lackies and all that sort of thing.

PERKINS: Trojan horse...

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

PRIME MINISTER PRAMOTCH: Yes, and from the fact that I know the United States is not helping us very much by way of military aid and (unintelligible), because of Congress I suppose. You can blame everything on Congress. Yes, American funds, yes. There it is.

PERKINS: Is that why you've asked American troops to be withdrawn from Thailand?

PRIME MINISTER PRAMOTCH: Yes, I think it would help clear the air around us.

PERKINS: Within a year Americans will be gone from these bases in Thailand. The Thais figure it would cost two billion dollars a year to maintain the bases for themselves. They can't afford it, so they won't. What will become of them? A Thai official said, Utaphao, when the B-52s are gone, we'll probably use to dry tapioca root. Thailand is a survivor. Throughout the centuries of all the nations of SE Asia only Thailand has never been colonized or overrun. It has always managed, as they like to say here, to bend with the wind like a stalk of bamboo. And so today Thailand is asking the United States to get its troops out of here so that it will not look like a U.S. lackey anymore. And it is trying to get as friendly as it can with Peking and Hanoi, in that way to bend to the new winds it feels blowing across SE Asia today. Jack Perkins, NBC News, Bangkok.

Cushman to Resign

CHANCELLOR: The Associated Press reported today that Gen. Robert CUSHMAN, the outgoing commandant of the Marine Corps, is taking the highly unusual step of resigning early. Instead of leaving at the end of this year, CUSHMAN will leave on the 1st of July. The reason may be that CUSHMAN is dissatisfied because the President didn't go along with his recommendations for a successor.

Excerpt of Interview With Kissinger

CHANCELLOR: Secretary of State KISSINGER spent two hours today behind closed doors with the ROCKEFELLER Commission on the CIA. And then he told reporters he never had any involvement in CIA domestic spying or plots to assassinate foreign leaders. The Secretary of State has also taped a long interview with Barbara WALTERS of the Today program. One of the subjects discussed was detente with the Soviet Union. The Secretary of State pointed out that the Soviet Union had played what he called a moderately constructive role in the South Vietnamese evacuation. And he had some other things to say about South Vietnam and the Soviet Union.

SECRETARY OF STATE KISSINGER: What we cannot ask the Soviet Union to do is to keep itself from taking advantage of situations in which for whatever reasons we do not do what is required to maintain the balance. It is true that Soviet arms made the conquest of South Vietnam possible. It is also true that the refusal of American arms made the conquest of South Vietnam inevitable. And therefore while the Soviet Union does have a heavy responsibility, we cannot expect the Soviet Union to police the world for us, and we have to be mature enough to recognize that we have to co-exist, even in a competitive world, and perhaps hopefully be able to moderate over a period of years the competition in peripheral areas. Now eventually the Soviet Union must realize that it is responsible for the consequences of its actions, even in peripheral areas. But as a basic relationship, detente has never meant the absence of competition.

Khmer Rouge Executions

CHANCELLOR: The White House and the State Department said today that the victorious Khmer Rouge rebels in Cambodia have executed 80 or 90 officers of the defeated Cambodian army and their wives. Newsweek magazine said it was told by an American official that thousands have already been executed in Cambodia. There is no direct confirmation of these reports since Cambodia is cutoff from the rest of the world.

(Interview with West German photographer FROEHDER and film report of fall of Phnom Penh.)

CBS EVENING NEWS CBS TV
7:00 PM MAY 5

Vietnamese Refugees; Guam; Thailand

ROGER MUDD: Good evening. The FORD administration said today it will need more than $500 million over the next two years for about 130,000 Vietnamese refugees. The Congress will have to approve that sum. We have reports from Bob Schieffer at the White House and Lesley Stahl at the Capitol.

BOB SCHIEFFER: White House officials gave this breakdown on how the money will be spent: $185 million will be used to pay for the refugees' food and other daily needs over the next 90 days; $99 million is transportation costs to get them from Guam and Wake Island to relocation bases in this country; $78 million will be paid to charitable agencies which will help the refugees resettle and find jobs; another $125 million is for reimbursing the states and other agencies for welfare costs and to pay for such things as medicaid and vocational and language training; another $20 million will finance transportation for the 20,000 Vietnamese who are expected to settle eventually in other countries. In all more than 100,000 Vietnamese are expected to settle in this country. They have cost $70 million so far, the money coming from a special $98 million fund which will be exhausted within another week. Spokesman Ron Nessen says unless Congress approves the President's new requests there will be no money available to care for the refugees when that special fund runs out. Bob Schieffer, CBS News, the White House.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

***

MUDD: The Pacific island of Guam is bracing for a new influx of 80,000 Vietnamese refugees, almost equal to Guam's normal population. One of the refugees who stopped at Guam on route to the United States was former premier Nguyen Cao KY. He said his country's defeat was not the fault of the United States but rather of former South Vietnamese president THIEU, whom KY referred to as a criminal.

NGUYEN CAO KY: I know for sure that my people will not ask too much from you. They will not be a burden for American people or for other people. They are suffering for 30 years of war now, so they can support suffer. All what happened today for us, for our nation is THIEU's fault and only Mr. THIEU's fault.

MUDD: KY is expected to arrive tomorrow at El Toro Marine Air Station in California.

(Commercials)

The Pentagon plans to shutdown one of the four U.S. airbases in Thailand according to Ike Pappas. This will coincide with the phased withdrawal of more than one-fourth of the 25,000 U.S. servicemen now in Thailand. The pullout is at the request of the Thai government which said last week it no longer wants to depend on the United States for security. Murray Fromson has the first of two reports on how recent Communist takeovers in South Vietnam and Cambodia will effect Thailand.

MURRAY FROMSON: In the days before television focused on it, guerrilla warfare in SE Asia drew some attention from Hollywood. The "Ugly American" 1963, the story of Communist insurrection in the mythical kingdom of Sarakan. In the film U.S. Ambassador Marlon BRANDO got some advice from the country's prime minister.

ACTOR: When the worst part of a nightmare has been realized, there's nothing very much left to be afraid of, is there?

FROMSON: Today the man who acted that part is the actual Prime Minister of Thailand, Kukrit PRAMOT (?), journalist, actor, scholar, politician. As a leading journalist before the collapse of Indochina, Kukrit was among those who supported the U.S. role in Vietnam and the American presence in Thailand. As the Prime Minister, events of the past few weeks have caused him to adjust his views.

P.M. PRAMOT: The domino theory is purely an American invention, because ten years ago the United States wanted very much, for reasons of its own, to be involved in the affairs of this part of the world. And the domino theory sort of justified its involvement. It's just we've got to change our policy to conform with what has been happening in our neighboring countries. But at the same time we would like to still remain friends with the United States. And that friendship doesn't necessarily mean that we've got to keep the American military presence within our country. It has made us rather sort of careless in our own defense. We have been for the past decade hoping that if should anything happen to us the United States would be there to help. With the result that we haven't really made ourselves ready for whatever is to come. Now we're changing that, we want to stand on our own feet.

FROMSON: Unlike the plot of the "Ugly American" there's no end in sight for the Thai insurgents. The Prime Minister says it's a problem we'll have to solve by ourselves, not like the movie, with American advice. Murray Fromson, CBS News, Bangkok.

Aid To Israel and Jordan

MUDD: The White House said today that President FORD will meet Israeli Premier RABIN in Washington on June 11th and 12th. And during that meeting Mr. FORD will not promise Israel any new arms deliveries, according to Marvin Kalb. But sources told Kalb, and the State Department has confirmed, that the U.S. has promised to sell Jordan the Hawk ground-to-air missile system.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Investigation of CIA

MUDD: President FORD ordered an investigation of the CIA because of alleged domestic spying. But now the focus of that has shifted. Daniel Schorr reports.

DANIEL SCHORR: The ROCKEFELLER Commission started on the last of its five months of probing into CIA was reported zeroing in on assassination plots, especially against Fidel CASTRO. Secretary of State KISSINGER, denying any involvement himself, indicated this was an issue.

SECRETARY KISSINGER: I said that I would not go into any further details of this -- in any event none of these allegations occurred during the period -- pertained to any period in which I had personal knowledge.

SCHORR: KISSINGER would not say what he testified about events before his time, before 1969. Defense Secretary SCHLESINGER briefly CIA chief in 1972 was sure of one thing, the CIA was not involved in the assassination of President KENNEDY.

DEFENSE SECRETARY SCHLESINGER: The suggestion that there is any involvement of the CIA to my mind is simply preposterous. It is psychologically and emotionally unacceptable.

SCHORR: SCHLESINGER was asked whether reprisal for plots against CASTRO could have figured in the motive for the KENNEDY assassination.

SECRETARY SCHLESINGER: Well I understand what you're saying and I'll have no comments on that at this time.

SCHORR: No one today admitted authorizing assassination plots, no one quite denied there may have been some. Daniel Schorr, CBS News, Washington.

Cushman and Anderson to Resign

MUDD: The two top officers in the Marine Corps, General Robert CUSHMAN and General Earl ANDERSON, the Asst. Commandant, reportedly have asked for early retirement and the Pentagon is expected to approve. CUSHMAN, whose term runs until December, has been supporting ANDERSON to be his successor. But last week President FORD nominated Lt. Gen. Louis WILSON for the post.

ABC EVENING NEWS ABC TV
7:00 PM MAY 5

Vietnamese Refugees; Thailand

HOWARD K. SMITH: The FORD administration set a price tag today on its program to care for and resettle refugees from Vietnam and Cambodia. The total cost the administration estimated at more than $600 million, $507 millions of which still need to be authorized by Congress. ABC Capitol Hill correspondent Sam Donaldson has the story.

SAM DONALDSON: A House Judiciary subcommittee was told today that the administration's money request is based on a new, higher refugee estimate. Ambassador Dean BROWN said as many as 150,000 Vietnamese may seek asylum in the United States, up from the previous estimate of 130,000. The subcommittee wanted to know how many jobs would be needed.

DEAN: I would say that of 150,000 entering, we're talking about probably 30,000 heads of households, 30,000 jobs, sir.

DONALDSON: Ambassador BROWN and Immigration Director CHAPMAN were questioned closely about letting in undesirables. The law keeps out convicted criminals. But some members thought conviction should not be the only test of criminality.

WOMAN REP.: I'm not sure that there's anything in the existing immigration laws that would prohibit the entry of persons who were involved in police torture methods or running the tiger cages or theft and corruption.

MAN REP.: I think we have to screen the people that are coming into this country. And there are probably more people who are deserving of coming into this country that are still in Vietnam that I would rather see here than some criminal who happened to escape. And it's not a hard fact that I'm willing to swallow.

BROWN: Well it's not a hard fact that are any such, but I would just...

DIRECTOR CHAPMAN: The question is that any person setting foot on U.S. soil under the provisions of the asylum protocol is entitled to apply for asylum, he cannot be returned forcibly to his country of origin. So here they are.

DONALDSON: Congressional mail has been running heavily against taking in the Vietnamese. But with other nations so far reluctant to shoulder much of the load, Ambassador BROWN said the only other choices are to force them back to Vietnam or leave them at sea. No one today spoke up for either of those. Sam Donaldson, ABC News, Capitol Hill.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

HARRY REASONER: Former South Vietnamese premier Nguyen Cao KY was among the thousands of refugees to arrive in Guam today. But Marshall KY didn't stay long, he was quickly processed through immigration and flown to California. ABC's Jerry King has been on Guam talking with some of the refugees there, and he's found that while many of them are not happy with their lives now they feel they made the right decision in leaving Vietnam.

JERRY KING: Nguyen Xuan CAO at 61 says he's too old for "Operation Newlife" to matter much to him. The same is true for his wife Ha, who's 60. Years ago they started afresh after evacuating North Vietnam. This time they fled Saigon for the sake of Tranh, at 17 their youngest son. Like 6,000 others CAO lives in tent city on Guam. It's not much, but at least it's not South Vietnam. That new life is not very exciting these days, too much time to think whether it was right to leave -- most believe so -- and how they and their children will fare in America. Optimism reigned supreme. Mostly though they wait. The conditions are primitive. It takes awhile before such amenities as showers are installed to meet the demands. Electricity is on a when and if basis. Ice is also a much sought after commodity. Its supply sometimes is haphazard, but in the 85 degree weather there's a certain pride in its possession. The evacuees are assigned to their tents where Navy personnel administer quick lessons in the art of assembling camp cots. These camps were designed as temporary quarters. But each day the arrivals far outnumber the departures. At the present rate many are likely to still be here several weeks from now. These evacuees brought little here but their memories and an almost childlike faith that somehow everything will work out. But right now for most of them the future is almost as uncertain as it is for the friends and relatives they left behind. Jerry King, ABC News, tent city on Guam.

REASONER: The new government in Saigon has applied for membership in a number of United Nations organizations. Diplomats say the applications indicate the Saigon government is planning to operate independently from North Vietnam for a prolonged period of time.

(Commercials)

SMITH: In one of the first significant after effects of the Communist victories in Cambodia and Vietnam, a major withdrawal of U.S. troops from Thailand was announced today. We have raports first from ABC Pentagon correspondent Frank Tomlinson.

FRANK TOMLINSON: There are now about 25,000 American troops in Thailand. By the end of June 7,500 of those will be withdrawn under an agreement made with the former Thai government. The present Thai government wants all Americans out, reportedly in a year. Here in the Pentagon officials say that's a negotiable item and won't go into details. Meanwhile, some of those 120 American supplied planes flown out of Vietnam to Thailand are being recovered by the United States. Some are being place onboard the carrier Midway at a Thai port. The planned U.S. withdrawal from Thailand will have many political ramifications. Here with a report is ABC's Jim Giggans.

JIM GIGGANS: After Vietnam and Cambodia, Thailand could be considered the third American defeat in Indochina. The Thai's demand of a phased withdrawal of American planes and airmen from its soil is a harsh slap in the face of the United States, no matter how much Washington tries to soften the sting. Bases like this one at Utaphao, with its awesome concentration of American airpower, were always a symbol of American military preeminence in Asia. But for the Thais, once that pre-eminence was questioned, so was the value of allowing the bases to remain on Thai soil. Most Thais feel now that their country is surrounded by Communists or socialist neighbors, the traditional alliances with American are a liability.

THAI: If America wants to aid us, any aid should come in the form of economic aid. I would like to say is a rather poor country, you see.

THAI: In spite of our change of policy -- that is in spite the fact that we are going nearer and nearer towards Peking -- I really hope that the Americans would not take this shift of our foreign policy as anti-Americanism.

GIGGANS: Bangkok is industrious, prosperous and hasn't known war for generations. They've handled this feat with an impressive dexterity in political accomodation. What the Thais want more than anything else is continued peace, and they feel the only way to insure that is to back away from the United States. This is Jim Giggans, ABC News, in Bangkok.

REASONER: The White House began a campaign today to counter growing political criticism over the administration's handling of events in SE Asia during the last several weeks. White House correspondent Tom Jarriel reports.

DECLASSIFIED

TOM JARRIEL: President FORD would like to put Vietnam behind him, but the problem of the refugees and the trauma of the Indochina defeat on U.S. allies is continuing to burden him. In defending the President's unilateral decision to evacuate 150,000 Vietnamese from their homeland, the President's news secretary today gave the White House mail count. Of 7,600 letters received 4,400 support the President and 2,900 oppose him. On another potential political controversy White House spokesman Ron Nessen had words of praise from the President for Ambassador Graham MARTIN's final frantic evacuation of Americans from Saigon. The 11th hour move under fire in which four Marines died was well done, according to the President, because MARTIN brought the Americans out safely. On the diplomatic front the President begins a month of post-Vietnam fence mending. The Prime Ministers of Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand and Singapore will be calling on him this week, anxious to know where the line against Communist expansion in Asia is going to be drawn. It apparently won't be at Thailand, because a White House official says today if the Thais want us out we'll leave. Tom Jarriel, ABC News at the White House.

THE TODAY SHOW NBC TV
7:00 AM MAY 5

Interview With Secretary Kissinger

JIM HARTZ: Over the weekend Barbara Walters interviewed Secretary of State Henry KISSINGER. It was his first comprehensive interview since the fall of Vietnam. And here is part one of their discussion.

BARBARA WALTERS: We are about to celebrate our Bicentennial, is Vietnam our first defeat of 200 years?

SECRETARY KISSINGER: Well when a nation is engaged in a major effort for ten years and then doesn't achieve its basic objectives, you have to say it's a significant setback, yes.

WALTERS: Is Vietnam our first defeat in 200 years?

SECRETARY KISSINGER: Well that depends how you address the War of 1812 and other events. It's a significant setback.

WALTERS: You are responsible for the airlift of more than 100,000 Vietnam refugees. How do you answer the American people who are worried about further economic deprivation and are resisting the arrival of these refugees?

SECRETARY KISSINGER: Well, it has been the American tradition to take refugees throughout our history, even from countries to which we had no special obligations. We took 675,000 Cuban refugees. We took, I think, over 150,000 Hungarian refugees. Here is a country in which for 15 years we were engaged in a major effort in which hundreds of thousands of people cooperated with us in the belief that the United States would see this effort through. The least we owe these people, those who were most seriously endangered, is that we make an effort to evacuate them. And I think when the American people reflect about our obligation they will recognize that we couldn't decently do anything else. The number is about 120,000. It is one of the things that we can be proud of having achieved and I think it is a national duty to help them. Moreover I believe that the impact in any one locality is going to be absolutely minimal.

***

Items of relevance to DOD from the CBS Morning News and Today Show NBC News from May 5, 1975 have not been included because of insufficient space.

PLEASE NOTE: Complete transcripts of the following are available:

Special: Vietnam Epilogue PBS TV April 29, 1975

Vietnam: Lessons Learned, Prices Paid ABC TV April 29, 1975.

News WTOP Radio May 2, 1975 Navy Selects new plane.

News WTOP TV May 4, 1975 Military praised for evacuation efforts.

Today Show May 5, 1975 Report on AF air show.

DECLASSIFIED

CURRENT NEWS
WEEKEND EDITION

THIS PUBLICATION IS PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL NEWS ITEMS OF INTEREST TO THEM IN THEIR OFFICIAL CAPACITIES. IT IS NOT INTENDED TO SUBSTITUTE FOR NEWSPAPERS, PERIODICALS AND BROADCASTS, AS A MEANS OF KEEPING INFORMED ABOUT THE NATURE, MEANING AND IMPACT OF NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL NEWS DEVELOPMENTS. USE OF THESE ARTICLES HERE, OF COURSE, DOES NOT REFLECT OFFICIAL ENDORSEMENT. FURTHER REPRODUCTION FOR PRIVATE USE OR GAIN IS SUBJECT TO THE ORIGINAL COPYRIGHT RESTRICTIONS.

FRIDAY PM 2 MAY THRU 4 MAY 1975

BALTIMORE SUN 3 May 1975 Pg. 1

Viet refugee total now put at 110,500

By DEAN MILLS
Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—The State Department said yesterday that the total number of refugees leaving South Vietnam is now estimated at about 110,500, and that money is "urgently" needed to handle those who will come to the United States.

The new total includes about 30,000 additional refugees who escaped South Vietnam on a flotilla of gunboats, patrol boats, and other small South Vietnamese Navy craft. They are sailing toward the Philippines under United States Navy escort.

In addition, State Department officials say, there are about 13,000 South Vietnamese who came to the United States for study, military training, or other reasons and are expected to remain.

That brought the number of refugees to about 123,500 so far. Pentagon officials said that there are also from 50,000 to 80,000 refugees aboard small fishing boats and other vessels in the South China Sea.

The officials said that those spotted in the open sea would be picked up by the United States, but there was no way of estimating how many of them might reach American ships. Joseph Laiton, a Pentagon spokesman, said yesterday that American ships have now withdrawn to more than 35 miles off the Vietnamese coast.

The administration has the authority to admit up to 132,000 refugees to the United States on "parole" status, a category which allows them to stay and work in the country but without the standing of "permanent resident" status.

Robert L. Funseth, a State Department spokesman, said yesterday in announcing the latest figures that the administration regrets the failure of Congress to pass a bill this week giving emergency funds to handle the refugees.

"We urgently need money," he said. "We have sufficient funds for only a week to 10

See REFUGEE, Pg. 2

NEW YORK TIMES
4 May 1975 Pg. 1

SAIGON SAYS HANOI BEGINS REBUILDING OF SOUTH VIETNAM

The Saigon radio announced yesterday that North Vietnam had undertaken a vast reconstruction program in South Vietnam to provide jobs and to begin reversing the devastation of 30 years of war.

The broadcasts, monitored in Bangkok Thailand, said that people would have to work more hours each day. But they also held out the vision of new roads linking the cities of North and South Vietnam and of free-flowing travel and new accommodations.

Customary channels of communications with Saigon have been cut since Wednesday, when a new Communist regime seized the city and assumed power. Saigon broadcasts are providing what little news there is under the aegis of the new government.

Reorganization Under Way

The radio suggested that a wholesale reorganization of the country was under way. The regime, which previously announced the nationalization of all farms, factories and businesses, and ordered the suspension of unauthorized publications, took over the labor movement on Friday and began organizing "Revolutionary People's Committees" yesterday.

The committees were being formed throughout the country, ostensibly to protect government property. The Saigon radio said that 5,000 people in the Saigon area had signed up for duty.

All members of the defeated South Vietnamese mili-

See HANOI, Pg. 2

WASHINGTON STAR 3 May 1975 Pg. 2

Controversial Jet Picked by Navy

By Vernon A. Guidry Jr.
Washington Star Staff Writer

The Navy has selected a design for its new air combat fighter that is likely to encounter serious trouble in Congress and which does not yet have the full approval of Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger.

The Navy yesterday announced it has selected a derivative of the Northrup Corporation's YF17 fighter prototype that will be designated the F18. McDonnell Douglas will be the prime contractor for the Navy version and Northrup will be a subcontractor.

The announcement had been expected, but the acknowledgment that Schlesinger had not approved full-scale development of the plane surprised observers.

UNDER SECRETARY of the Navy David S. Potter said he hoped to have Schlesinger's full blessing within the next few days. Potter said the announcement of contractor selection prior to Schlesinger's full approval was made to avoid premature news leaks and ease the atmosphere so that discussion of the plane's future could be held openly. There already were leaks of the Navy choice.

The selection ended a design competition between Navy versions of the YF17 and the YF16 lightweight fighter prototype produced by General Dynamics. Both planes were built for an Air Force air combat fighter prototype competition which the General Dynamics plane won. The Air Force plans to buy 650 YF16s.

The Navy expects to purchase 600 to 900 of its plane which will be designed as a fighter-bomber.

THE NAVY was under strong pressure to accept a version of the fighter selected by the Air Force. A conference report on the fiscal 1975 defense appropriation bill said future funding of the Navy's air combat fighter "is to be contingent upon the capability of the Navy to produce a derivative of the selected Air Force combat fighter design."

Potter acknowledged that the "Navy selection has the unfortunate property" of not complying with that demand.

Potter said he hopes to sell the plane to Congress, adding "it is perfectly clear this does not meet" Congress' wish that maximum use be made of Air Force's combat fighter technology and hardware.

But before he can sell Congress he must convince Schlesinger, whose reservations were said to center on "black box" electronics for the plane. The question, said Potter, is how much of the electronics in the Air Force version can be used by the Navy.

As far as the basic choice was concerned, Potter said the Navy did not feel it could make single-engine YF16 "carrier suitable," that is, give it a slow enough approach speed and a structural toughness to withstand catapult take-offs and tailhook landings on aircraft carriers. The twin engines of the Navy selection also had greater

See JET, Pg. 2

JAMES KILLINGBECK, CHIEF, CURRENT NEWS BRANCH, OX 78765 HELEN YOUNG, ASSISTANT CHIEF

FOR SPECIAL RESEARCH SERVICES OR DISTRIBUTION CALL HARRY ZUSKOFF, CHIEF, EXECUTIVE AGENCY SERVICE, OX 52884

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK TIMES 3 May 1975 Pg. 1

Ford Plans to Visit Spain And Italy to Bolster Ties

By BERNARD GWERTZMAN
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 2—The White House announced today that President Ford on his coming European trip would not only meet in Austria with President Anwar el-Sadat of Egypt but would also visit Spain and Italy to bolster ties with those key Mediterranean countries.

On June 1 and 2, Mr. Ford will confer in Salzburg, Austria, with Mr. Sadat on what are being called crucial talks on the further course of Middle East diplomatic efforts.

Informed diplomats in Cairo say that the meeting between Mr. Ford and Mr. Sadat means that Egypt continues to look on the United States as the main power in the search for a Middle East settlement despite setbacks from the fall of Saigon and the failure of Secretary of State Kissinger's Middle East diplomacy in March.

Mr. Ford is also concerned about stability in the Mediterranean region, particularly in nearby Portugal, Administration officials said today, and wants to reaffirm American ties to Spain, where a leadership change is expected, and to Italy, which is facing severe economic and political problems.

The original purpose of what will be Mr. Ford's first trip to Europe as President was to confer with Western leaders at a meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, in Brussels on May 29 and 30 on ways of strengthening the alliance.

The White House announced today that Mr. Ford would go to Madrid on May 31 and June 1 for talks with Generalissimo Francisco Franco, the chief of state, and other Spanish officials, including Prince Juan Carlos, the designated heir.

Mr. Ford, who will probably meet with Premier Yitzhak Rabin of Israel in Washington later in June, will discuss with Mr. Sadat ways of increasing American economic aid to Egypt.

In Salzburg, Mr. Ford will meet also with the Austrian Chancellor, Bruno Kreisky, before going to Rome on June 3 to confer with President Giovanni Leone and other Italian officials.

During the Rome visit, Mr. Ford will have an audience with Pope Paul VI.

Administration officials said that they knew that the Israelis might resent the decision by Mr. Ford to meet with Mr. Sadat before seeing Mr. Rabin.

They said that to a certain degree this decision was a deliberate sign of Washington's recent coolness toward Israel and its appreciation of Egypt following the breakdown in March of Secretary of State Kissinger's efforts to bring about a new Egyptian-Israeli accord on Sinai.

Mr. Ford and Mr. Kissinger believe that Mr. Sadat was forthcoming in those negotiations and that Mr. Rabin's Government was shortsighted in not accepting a possible package arrangement.

But the Administration officials said there was every intention for Mr. Ford to meet with Mr. Rabin, probably the week of June 8.

Now in the final stages of its own reassessment of policies toward the Middle East, the Ford Administration views Mr. Sadat as a pivotal figure.

Mr. Ford and Mr. Kissinger regard Mr. Sadat as a major force for moderation in the area, without whose support all negotiating efforts would fail. The Salzburg meeting is being described here as important to reaffirm the American appreciation of Mr. Sadat's position.

In addition to various peace moves, Mr. Ford and Mr. Sadat will also discuss future American economic and technical aid to Egypt, now going through an economic crisis.

Mr. Sadat has indicated a desire to orient his economy toward the West and the Administration wants to encourage this process.

Publicly, Mr. Sadat is committed to a reconvening of the Middle East peace conference at Geneva. Mr. Ford will seek to learn whether there is a possibility of a new effort at step-by-step approach before the Geneva conference is called back into session.

White House aides are describing the European trip as Mr. Ford's first significant effort at projecting his own image as a foreign-policy leader. But he will as usual rely on Mr. Kissinger.

Mr. Ford's discussions with Mr. Sadat and Mr. Rabin will have some urgency because of the expiration of the mandates for United Nations peace-keeping forces in late July.

A lack of diplomatic progress by then might lead to a refusal by Egypt and Syria to extend the mandates, a move that would seriously increase tensions in the area.

REFUGEE... Continued

days."

State Department officials said about $103 million for the refugee operation has been available from existing funds —$98 million in unused aid funds for South Vietnam and Cambodia, and $5 million from a special fund for refugees and migration. About $60 million of that has already been spent.

The House rejected Thursday a bill which would have provided $327 million in emergency refugee aid. Many congressmen voted against the bill because of a provision that would have given the President retroactive permission to use troops in the evacuation operation. Some House leaders predicted that a new aid bill, without that controversial provision, could be passed by the Congress.

There has been relatively little response so far to the United States' appeal to other countries to take in some of the Vietnamese. Only Australia, France, and Canada have indicated publicly that they would accept refugees.

HANOI Continued

tary forces were ordered to register with the new regime or face punishment. The radio said that 1,000 officers and men of the former government's navy had surrendered, bringing with them their vessels from an offshore island.

Ships Being Registered

Meantime, a new program was launched to register all ships, and a maritime transport office was set up. Shipowners were ordered to register ocean-going vessels and river craft of 16 tons and over.

The new Saigon government continued to consolidate its administration with the appointment of an 11-member committee for the military management of the capital. Gen. Tran Van Tra, former head of the South Vietnamese Communist delegation to the military talks with the previous government, was named chairman of the committee, the radio reported.

While normal communications were cut for the fourth day in a row, the French Government said in Paris that its embassy in Saigon had reported in a radio transmission that foreign residents were in good health and being well treated. It also said that life in Saigon appeared to be returning to normal.

Production Resuming

Hsinhua, the Chinese press agency, said in another dispatch from Hanoi, that South Vietnamese workers in Saigon, Da Nang, Hue and other cities were returning to their jobs and that factories were resuming production.

The agency also said that electricity plants and water-supply companies in Ban Me Thuot, Pleiku, Kontum, Hue, Da Nang and Nha Trang had resumed operations interrupted by recent fighting.

Apparently, one of the new Government's principal problems will be the provision of jobs for hundreds of thousands of former soldiers. The Saigon radio gave few details about Hanoi's reconstruction program.

But it said that roads were to be built linking the South with northern cities. And it said the North Vietnamese Government was building more hotels to accommodate people in the South who wish to visit Hanoi and other northern cities.

In Jakarta, Indonesia, Chau Phong, the acting head of the South Vietnamese National Liberation Front, discounted rumors of a federation of the Indochina states as "nonsense." He also said there was no chance that war could spread to other countries of Southeast Asia.

Mr. Chau said that his Government was following a "good-neighbor policy" and was prepared to have diplomatic relations with the United States if Washington was willing to respect South Vietnam's sovereignty.

Meantime, however, the Saigon radio said that the new Government had condemned the United States for "stealing" aircraft, vessels and other equipment from South Vietnam. It said the Government was urging the United States to return the material immediately from the Philippines, Thailand, Malaysia, Singapore and Taiwan. This was an allusion to equipment used in the evacuation of tens of thousands of South Vietnamese.

JET... Continued

appeal.

WHEN THE Air Force announced its selection in January, it said the YF16 was clearly ahead on both performance and price. Potter said the Navy version of the YF17 would cost 2 to 3 percent more than the proposed version of the YF16. But he said wing and engine improvements to the new version of the YF17 had made its performance comparable to its competitor.

The Air Force plane will cost about $6.7 million a copy. Potter said he could not give specific overall cost on a proposed purchase of 800 planes by the Navy, but agreed to a rough estimate of about $7.8 million a copy for the Navy F18. The surprising manner in which the announcement was made and the acknowledgment that the selection did not follow the wishes of Congress prompted questions about how seriously the program was being pursued. Potter declared the Navy is firmly behind its air combat fighter program.

Some observers have suggested that the Navy was unhappy with the idea and would prefer more F14s, the ultra-sophisticated Navy fighter that carries a price tag of $17.8 million. Potter said it would not.

But, he added, should the air combat fighter program fall through, the most likely alternative would be to buy more F14s.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON POST 3 MAY 1975

Thai Aide Calls U.S. Immoral

Ties Strained By Saigon's Plane Demand

From News Dispatches

Thailand's foreign minister angrily denounced the United States as a country without morals Friday and vowed to expel all American servicemen within a year as scheduled.

Responding to remarks made Thursday in Washington by Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger about the U.S. "obligation of a moral nature" to defend Thailand, Thai Foreign Minister Chartichai Choonhavan said sarcastically in Bangkok:

"Moral? The United States does not have any morals at this point. They have already pulled out from Cambodia and South Vietnam, so we are going to have to depend on ourselves."

U.S.-Thai relations were likely to be further strained by the demand reiterated Friday in Hanoi and Saigon that "stolen property" including aircraft, ships and gold taken by fleeing South Vietnamese refugees be returned to South Vietnam.

The demand, issued by North Vietnam and the new Vietcong government in Saigon, seemed to be aimed particularly at Thailand, where 129 South Vietnamese warplanes and other aircraft landed early this week during the Communist takeover of Saigon.

Thai Prime Minister Kukrit Pramoj said that the planes would be returned to the new Saigon government, but Schlesinger said the U.S.-made planes still belong to the United States under military aid agreements.

Chartichai soft-pedaled the prime minister's statement about the planes. "This a very sensitive subject," he said. "According to the law they belong to us at the moment, but we will have to look into the commitments between the United States and Vietnam."

Thai Defense Minister Pramarn Adireksarn said earlier that the planes cannot be handed over to the Vietcong because documentary evidence shows they belong to the United States. "They must be taken out of Thailand by the Americans themselves," he said. "We cannot return them to the Vietcong."

In his news conference Friday, however, Chartichai contradicted Schlesinger's reference to a U.S. "residual force" remaining in Thailand. "We will carry on the withdrawal and they [the American soldiers] will all be totally gone within one year as stated in our policy and approved by the Parliament," he said. "We insist on doing it."

Meanwhile, normal communications with Saigon were out for the third straight day, and there were no direct reports from news agencies. Radio broadcasts monitored in Bangkok, however, told of rapid developments in the South Vietnamese capital aimed at reorganizing the nation into a Communist state.

Saigon's citizenry was urged by the Vietcong's Liberation Radio to participate in a week long cleanup campaign to remove what a broadcast called "dirty garbage left over by the former government."

Citizens and soldiers were asked to throw away old flags, posters and pictures of former officials, to raise Vietcong flags and revolutionary mottos over streets, houses and buildings and to clear garbage and dirt from the streets and canals.

"Everyone must obey all orders given by the Revolutionary Government because we have a new city, a progressive and revolutionized city," said the broadcast.

Reuter correspondent Bernard Edinger, in Saigon, reported the city was calm.

A brief message from the French-born correspondent —one of three Reuter reporters in the South Vietnamese capital—said he and his colleagues were "safe and working in a relaxed atmosphere," but that they were unable to file news stories because normal communications were broken.

Some correspondents have been able to get some messages and brief dispatches out of Saigon through diplomatic channels of communication.

Diplomatic sources in Bangkok, in radio contact with Saigon, said that all the French nationals who remained in Saigon when the Vietcong took over are safe and well.

Many were said to be living in two centers set up by the embassy at a hospital and a high school where there were supplies of food and medicine. Others were said to have continued living at home without difficulty.

The radio also broadcast a third possible name for the capital of South Vietnam. The Communist leaders had first said Saigon would be renamed Ho Chi Minh City to honor the late Vietnamese revolutionary. Later a hyphenated form of both was suggested—"Saigon-Ho Chi Minh." A broadcast Friday told the capital's inhabitants that the city has been renamed "Uncle Ho the Great."

Diplomatic sources in Bangkok said that the new government is expected to issue entry visas within a week to diplomats representing countries with which it has relations.

Observers believe that such action could mean the restoration of air transport between Saigon and the rest of the world.

In New York, an official of the United Nations said that eight officials of the organization who remained in Saigon were continuing to channel aid from the U.N. Children's Fund and the High Commissioner for Refugees through the Vietnamese Red Cross.

Diplomats and their families based in Laos and Thailand to represent the former Saigon government have applied for political asylum in the United States, a spokesman for the diplomats said in Bangkok.

The diplomats were told their request would be forwarded to Washington, he added.

Hanoi's Vietnam News Agency Friday broadcast what happened when Communist forces seized the Presidential Palace in Saigon Wednesday.

Hanoi's Vietnam News Agency said the recently installed President Duong Van (Big) Minh and other South Vietnamese leaders were waiting, seated in two rows of chairs.

"Gen. Minh stood up and said: 'The revolution has come. You have come. We have been waiting for you since morning to arrange to hand over power,'" it said.

"In a gentle yet firm voice the Liberation Army officer replied: 'Now that the revolution has seized complete power, the former administration has been overthrown. No one can hand over what they have lost.'"

Agence France-Presse reported that the menu for the evening meal was found in a drawer in Minh's desk.

The Vietcong captors then ordered that the defeated authorities should be fed like an army in the field on rice and canned meat.

WASHINGTON POST

4 MAY 1975

Military Pension Change to Be Sought

The Defense Manpower Commission is to recommend to Congress that the cost-of-living adjustment formula for military retirees be changed so that pensions won't increase faster than inflation.

The commission voted Friday to include two recommendations in the interim report it is to present to Congress May 16.

The first calls for a change in the current pension adjustment formula, which over the long term causes pensions to rise faster than the consumer price index.

The second puts forth a specific new formula proposed by commission staff experts.

In presenting the proposed formula, staff member E. N. Devine told the commission it had been adapted with modification from a formula which the Associated Press devised Feb. 16 in a story about the cost-of-living adjustments.

That story detailed how overpayments to both civilian and military retirees under the existing formula could total $100 billion or more by 1990.

Commission calculations since that story appeared have confirmed the estimate of the potential overpayment.

The commission directed that the proposed formula be sent to other concerned government agencies as well. Other proposals to revamp the existing formula are pending in Congress, the Civil Service Commission and the Office of Management and Budget.

The Defense Manpower Commission is halfway through a two-year study of military manpower issues. Although its retirement focus is on the military, the same adjustment formula is used for both military and civilian retirees from federal service.

WASHINGTON POST

4 MAY 1975

Scheel to Visit U.S.

Agence France-Presse

BONN, May 3—West German President Walter Scheel will pay a state visit to the United States June 16 to 19, it was officially announced here today.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON POST 4 MAY 1975

Marcos Seen Serious on Study of U.S. Links

By Don Oberdorfer
Washington Post Foreign Service

MANILA, May 3—In the past two weeks the conviction has grown steadily among Filipinos and Americans alike that President Ferdinand E. Marcos is serious about his announced "reassessment" of security ties and military base agreements with the United States.

Day after day, Marcos is having more to say in polite but unmistakable language about the "reassessment."

One day he assures foreign investors that a final agreement will be "to the satisfication of both parties" in keeping with the fact that the United States is "a staunch and old ally."

Another day he extols self-reliance in a speech to the Philippine air force, pointing to "the trap of overdependence on other nations, friendly or not" and wondering aloud if South Vietnam would not have been better off to have relied on its own will and strength "rather than on the power and the wealth of another nation."

Inside the government, option studies are underway on the future of Subic Naval Base and Clark Air Base, which are among the largest and most important U.S. installations in Southeast Asia. One of the most interesting ideas being studied is a "pay as you use" plan under which U.S. warships at Subic, for example, would be charged fixed sums each time they pull up to the dock. reprovision themselves or use the extensive overhaul facilities. Subic would become a Philippine-operated industrial and port facility, with the United States one of several potential users.

Such a plan presupposes the early end of the present bases agreement, under which the United States maintains an unfettered lease on the Philippine facilities for 16 more years, until 1991. The United States has openly expressed willingness to renegotiate the bases arrangement, which dates from 1947.

Last Monday, the Philippine Foreign Ministry informed the United States in a diplomatic note of its "understanding" that Vietnamese military personnel or political refugees would not be brought ashore at Subic or Clark and that all Vietnamese evacuees would stay no longer than three days at the United States bases.

As a result of this, the United States suddenly speeded up its airlift of refugees from Clark to Guam, Wake Island and U.S. points and began making plans for the U.S.-Vietnamese flotilla on the South China Sea to bypass Subic Bay if at all possible.

U.S. officials said American warships, military sealift charters and Vietnamese naval craft are likely to stop only briefly at Subic for reprovisioning and adjustment of loads before heading east across the Pacific to Guam. Many of the Vietnamese refugees may be required to remain aboard their ships while these operations take place at the Philippine base.

Some Philippine news services, including the official Philippine News Agency, have carried warnings by the Philippine military liaison officer at Clark that former Vietnamese Premier Nguyen Cao Ky and other senior officials will be detained if they set foot on Philippines' soil.

NEW YORK NEWS 4 MAY 1975

N. Vietnam Warns U.S. To Pull Out of Korea

Tokyo, May 3 (UPI) — North Vietnam said today that the United States must withdraw its troops from Korea or risk an even worse defeat than the loss of Cambodia and South Vietnam to the Communists.

"If the Ford clique does not want to suffer a heavier defeat in Korea and Asia, it must change its policy on Korea and withdraw all its aggression troops and lethal weapons from South Korea at an early date," Hanoi's official Vietnam News Agency said in a broadcast monitored here.

"There can be no pretext whatsoever for the U.S. imerialist aggressor forces to remain in South Korea any longer.

"A Virule ntChallenge"

"The U.S. imperialists' plot to retain their aggressor forces in South Korea and intensify aggressive maneuvers against our country is a virulent challenge and an unpardonable criminal act against the entire Korean people."

The broadcast attacked Defense Secretary James Schlesinger for saying at a Pentagon news conference Thursday that South Korea was a forward defense area of the United States and that U.S. forces would remain there even after the completion of a South Korean arm ymodernization program.

The North Vietnamese called Schlesinger a "nortorious warlord of U.S. imperialism."

WASHINGTON POST
4 MAY 1975

Weapons in Japan

TOKYO—The newspaper Yomiuri Shimbun reported that Japan has agreed to allow the United States to base nuclear weapons here in the event of an emergency affecting either Japan or South Korea.

Quoting a source close to the ruling Liberal Democratic Party, the newspaper said the promise was made by Foreign Minister Kiichi Miyazawa during his visit to Washington last month.

WASHINGTON POST
3 MAY 1975

5 European Lands Ratify A-Curb Pact

United Press International

Five members of the European Economic Community—Belgium, West Germany, Italy, Luxembourg and the Netherlands—became full members of the nuclear nonproliferation treaty yesterday.

The ambassadors of the five countries formally presented their governments' instrument of ratification of the treaty at a ceremony at the State Department.

Their adherence to the treaty brings to 91 the number of countries that are now full parties to the treaty. An additional 17 countries have signed the treaty but have not yet ratified it.

Deputy Secretary of State Robert Ingersoll said that yesterday's events were "an extraordinarily important development in the life of the treaty."

He added: "The treaty now enjoys the support of the world's largest single group of industrial states, states which are numbered among the principal manufacturers and exporters of nuclear equipment and technology and are also among the principal consumers of nuclear energy."

Ingersoll said that the ratification added "significant momentum to the global effort to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons and to the goal of nuclear arms control."

NEW YORK TIMES
4 MAY 1975

45 Unwilling Exiles Petition to Go Back To South Vietnam

AGANA, Guam, May 3 (Reuters)—Forty-five South Vietnamese Air Force mechanics, unwillingly exiled from their country when their pilots flew to Thailand last Tuesday at the height of the shelling of Saigon's airport, petitioned President Ford today to let them return home.

The eyes of many of them brimming with tears, they presented a petition to a refugee camp commander here asking the President to, "send us back to South Vietnam as soon as possible no matter what the Communist government has reserved for us."

They said that they were ordered aboard the planes by their officers as shells hit Tan Son Nhut air base and panic-stricken air force families scrambled aboard. They said that they were not aware that the planes were leaving the country, but thought that they were going to air bases further south out of the range of the fighting.

When they arrived at U Taphao Air Base in Thailand, they said, they begged Thai and United States authorities to leave them in small boats near the South Vietnam coast or let them walk across Cambodia.

"But they would not listen to our pleas,' Sgt. Nguyen Van Hien said today at a refugee camp here where all 45 were flown yesterday.

"We lined up and told the Thais to do us a favor and just shoot us because without our families we don't want to live," he said.

M. Sgt. Tien Thanh Thong said that after this they were given a number of shots on the understanding they were getting inoculations. The shots drugged them and they were carried aboard the plane, he said.

Their petition said: "Most of us still have our families in Vietnam and we would not, for any price, wish to live by ourselves in a foreign country."

Some cried openly as they pulled their wallets from their jacket pockets and showed reporters pictures of their wives and children.

Asked what reception he thought he might get from the new Communist government, Sergeant Thong said:

"We are not afraid of the Communists doing bad things to us. Even if we go back and the Communists sentence us to death the one thing we will ask is that they let us see our families before we die."

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

EDITORIALS

BALTIMORE SUN - 4 MAY 1975

Vietnamese Refugees

Saigon collapsed just as Congress was writing an evacuation plan requiring that no more U S forces be used than were needed to remove the Americans Any extraction of Vietnamese was to be subordinate to the American evacuation President Ford honored those requirements, in spirit and in letter, even though war in Saigon moved faster than legislation in Washington He apparently personally stopped the ambassador's attempt to stretch the requirements to bring out more Vietnamese His acceptance of congressional intent might have helped bridge the gap his predecessors left between President and Congress, had he appealed promptly for congressional ratification of his action Instead, Mr Ford and his press secretary offered testy answers when asked about legal authority for the action.

That did not take the country back to Nixonian contempt for laws and lawmakers, but it was an unnecessary step in that direction It had a predictable effect on a Congress still smarting from Mr Ford's earlier try at making it a scapegoat for Vietnam's collapse. The House overwhelmingly rejected a bill providing retroactive legitimacy for the evacuation and money for the refugees. The President condemned the House vote as "unworthy," though he seemed to have changed his own mind twice in two days on whether he wanted the bill passed.

What is unworthy is the national spectacle of President and Congress pointlessly bickering over the evacuation as tens of thousands of homeless Vietnamese arrive in the United States. Both branches are in danger of letting a procedural dispute thwart purposes on which all Americans can agree Congress does not mean to deny the refugees help, and a separate bill to help them may yet pass. It is not too late for Mr Ford to ask ratification of the evacuation, perhaps even specifying dates to allay any congressional fear of writing a blank check. He should make that appeal—and Congress should honor it—because what he did was right and deserves a clear legal record. Making the appeal would reaffirm Mr Ford's sensitivity to Constitutional scruples and sound a reassuring echo from days when Presidents like Truman and Eisenhower publicly worried over such legalities. Congressional approval would show the nation its government is united in welcoming homeless Vietnamese.

Those Vietnamese felt their lives threatened by association with Americans or with a government Americans backed Most can have left their familiar world only in deep anguish. Few know what they will find here. Still fewer can have understood circumstances that make their arrival even harder than that of earlier refugees. They come when jobs are scarce, and some voices already protest on that ground. The same association with the American effort that impelled many to leave makes them suspect to some anti-war Americans, who might normally lead this country's natural compassion.

The Vietnamese are few, compared with some refugee movements here or with 400,000 immigrants we accept annually. Not all of them will need jobs. If Congress and President turn from bickering to planning, the refugees can be guided away from the most depressed areas Maryland, where unemployment is less than in many places, can expect significant numbers of Vietnamese, and they will be welcome because they need to be welcome. They will be bewildered by American commonplaces ranging from supermarkets to the idea that rice grows in dry fields. Many will find that complex skills acquired over a lifetime—transplanting paddy rice, or practicing French-style law—no longer help. Some will be incredulous that every child gets free schooling, but few will miss its meaning for their children. Marylanders will find that many of the new neighbors share their fondness for crabs, which Vietnamese serve in countless irresistible ways. That will be only a small sample of how America will be enriched, as it has been by cultural diversity gained whenever it has welcomed the unwanted or endangered of other lands.

CHICAGO TRIBUNE
3 MAY 1975

The refugees

Those who are grumbling about the influx of Vietnamese refugees are hardly a credit to their country. They include a good many among the House majority that on Thursday rejected a bill to provide money to care for the refugees [ostensibly because it included a now moot provision authorizing the use of United States troops to evacuate them].

But a few liberal Democrats, never very fond of the Thieu regime, have voiced an underlying complaint that caring for the refugees will take money that should go to our own poor.

This attitude is disgraceful. The grumblers might have been justified in complaining that a good many people got out of Viet Nam who didn't really deserve to and that others who should have been rescued from the Communists weren't. It does appear that a rather motley assortment of prostitutes, grafters, dope peddlers, and distant relatives of deserving refugees muscled their way aboard the evacuation planes and fishing boats, and in the haste and confusion of the evacuation this may have been inevitable. There will no doubt be demands that the evacuation be investigated, and there's no reason to oppose them.

But it also appears that most of the 90,000 or so who escaped from Saigon [or were "forcibly evacuated," according to the inverted jargon of the Communists] fall into one of two legitimate categories. They are either legitimate dependents of Americans who are entitled to enter under existing law and presumably will not become dependent on the government. Or they are former members of the South Vietnamese army or police, former employes of the Saigon government or the American embassy, or members of other "high risk" categories who had worked in collaboration with the United States and who would very likely be executed by the Communists. In view of our part in the war, it would be unthinkable to deny them sanctuary.

These people can't be compared to immigrants who come here illegally simply to earn money to send home. They are more like the Cubans who fled here to escape Castro's Communism—and most of these Cubans have proved intelligent and useful members of the community. Communism, after all, rarely appeals to those who have something to offer only to those who think they deserve more.

NEW YORK NEWS - 5 MAY 1975 (4)

WELCOME THE REFUGEES

There is grumbling—with racial overtones—that the 100,000 Vietnamese refugees will put an added burden on the taxpayer and steal jobs from Americans.

They'll Be Assets

We don't agree in any way, shape or form.

These s e l f i s h, short-sighted complaints are unworthy of our shining tradition of compassion, and are inaccurate to boot.

Many of the refugees have relatives already in the U.S. who will help look after them. They will be dispersed so that no section of the country will b e a r a disproportionate burden.

Probably only 20,000 of them will be looking for jobs. A surprisingly high percentage of these are middle and upper-class professionals we can well use — lawyers, doctors, college teachers.

In welcoming them, we are carrying out our splendid tradition of offering refuge to the homeless and the tempest-tossed.

We succored victims of famine and revolution in the 18th and 19th Centuries—they were our ancestors. We gave haven to those who suffered the Nazi pogroms, those who fled Red tyranny in Hungary and Cuba.

America can easily absorb this wave of immigration and thus reinvigorate herself as each wave in the past invigorated her.

Most of all, we will be fulfilling our destiny, the destiny that Emma Lazarus so hauntingly described in her inscription for the Statue of Liberty:

A mighty woman with a torch, whose flame
Is the imprisoned lightning, and her name
Mother of exiles.

WASHINGTON POST
5 MAY 1975 (4)

Troops in Thailand

BANGKOK—At least 7,000 U.S. troops will be withdrawn from Thailand by the end of July, according to Deputy Prime Minister Pramarn Adireksan.

Meanwhile, Foreign Minister Chatichai Choonhavan denied a local press report which quoted him as saying that half of the 23,000 U.S. troops in Thailand would be withdrawn by the end of June.

From staff reports and news dispatches

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

SAN DIEGO UNION - 20 APRIL 1975 (4 MAY)

Defense Priority Vital

Budget committees of the House and Senate are proposing cuts of as much as $5 billion in the $95 billion defense budget submitted by President Ford for 1975-76. Moreover, both the House and Senate versions of the proposed budget still carry deficits exceeding the $60 billion which the President hopes to maintain as a ceiling. Clearly, there may be even greater pressure on defense spending before the 1975 battle of the budget is over.

Congress is following a familiar scenario: if there is a squeeze on funding for social programs, look for "fat" in the defense budget to make up the difference. It is this approach to budgeting in recent years that has been eating into the strength of our armed forces as inflation pushed up the cost of military hardware and the all-volunteer program sharply increased the cost of manpower. The result is that the Soviet Union, which has been beefing up its military power steadily, is approaching a cross-over point which would leave the United States of America confronted for the first time since World War II by a potential enemy with military superiority.

There are staggering implications in the possibility that the Russians could confront the world with an acknowledged superiority in military power. Detente would become a meaningless exercise under such conditions. U.S. leadership in the Free World—especially among nations that consider themselves "non-committed" to East or West—would lose any claim to confidence.

Congress must let go of the idea that the amount it budgets for defense can be determined by how much it wants to spend on something else. Our domestic problems have nothing to do with the range and accuracy of Soviet missiles, for instance, or the number of tanks deployed by Communist armies in Eastern Europe. Such factors, however, determine what is adequate for our defense and the role our armed forces must play in mutual security alliances in Europe and the Far East.

The temptation for Congress to shift resources away from defense again this year is great because of the demand for federal dollars for welfare, unemployment relief and other anti-recession programs. However, this year it is most important that the United States assert its determination to stay militarily strong.

The credibility of the United States as a world power has been seriously shaken by our performance as an ally of Cambodia and South Vietnam. We are trying to assure all those nations which respect our power—including both our potential enemies and our allies who rely on us for their security—that our backing away from a Communist challenge in Southeast Asia is not a portent of the future.

Some historians believe the most significant event of the 1960s was that the United States declined to use its obvious military superiority to turn back a threat to the independent nations of Indochina. It would be disastrous if that is followed in the 1970s by a conscious decision of the United States to forfeit its military superiority to the Soviet Union.

NEW YORK TIMES - 5 MAY 1975 (4)

CAMBODIAN OFFICERS REPORTED EXECUTED

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 4—Administration sources said today that intelligence reports indicated some Cambodian military officers "less than 100—had been executed by the new Government.

An official indicated that the reports were sketchy and said that he could not identify any of the military personnel or the circumstances under which they had been slain.

A White House spokesman said, meanwhile, that he could not confirm a report in the current issue of Time magazine quoting President Ford as informing Republican Congressional leaders of the killings.

"They killed the wives, too," the President said to have told the leaders at a meeting last week. "They said the wives were just the same as the husbands. This is a horrible thing to report to you, but we are certain that our sources are accurate."

Time said 80 Cambodian officers had been executed by the new Government.

NEW YORK TIMES
5 MAY 1975 (4)

Thoughts on Detente

To the Editor:

William Safire's April 14 column, "Ending World War II," gives Americans the wrong picture of the present situation in Europe . was misleading in its emphasis that détente in Europe and the successful conclusion of the European Security Conference are advantageous only to the Soviet Union.

The development of international relations in Europe over the last few years testifies to the fact that the positive changes on the Continent meet the interest of the peoples of both Eastern and Western Europe. Furthermore, the article does not take one very important fact into consideration. The Soviet Union and other socialist countries actually initiated the European Security Conference to improve the European political climate. However, the progress made in promoting détente in Europe is the result of the united efforts by 35 countries, including the United States.

Indeed, could the treaties on the inviolability of existing borders, signed by the U.S.S.R., Poland, the German Democratic Republic and Czechoslovakia with the Federal Republic of Germany, have been possible were they in the interests of the socialist countries alone? Could the conclusion of the quadripartite agreement on West Berlin and the international recognition of the G.D.R. have been possible if these were advantageous only to one faction? Could today's trade exchanges, amounting to many billions of dollars and involving almost all of the Eastern and Western states, be advantageous to only one faction?

Of course, we know that both in the U.S.A. and Western Europe certain forces are attempting to undermine the process of détente. It is a pity that a respected newspaper like The Times should play into their hands.

Thirty years ago, in the long and grim struggle against the aggressor, the Soviet Union played a decisive role. Winston Churchill said, "It is the Russian army that tore the guts out of the German military machine." It is our country that was the main force which blocked German fascism's path to world rule. At the same time, the defeat of fascism was a common victory for the freedom-loving nations of the United States, Britain and others in the anti-Hitler coalition.

If one attempts to relate the "End of World War II" to the European problems of today, I think one must not forget that during the war years countries with different social systems convincingly proved the possibility of cooperation in the efforts to defeat an aggressor. Now such cooperation is perhaps even more important —because it is a question of combining efforts to prevent a thermonuclear war.

VLADISLAV KOZYAKOV

Moscow, April 25, 1975

The writer is a Moscow radio commentator.

2—E

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON POST
5 MAY 1975 (4)

Turkish Alert

ANKARA — Deputy Premier Alpaslan Turkes said Turkish troops along the Aegean coast and in Thrace are on alert and are being reinforced to counter an alleged military buildup by Greece.

Turkes reiterated earlier government statements that the Greeks were militarizing the Dodecanese islands off Turkey's southwestern coast. "We are taking necessary security measures," Turkes said.

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER 4 MAY 75

Victims are our responsibility

"They say it's a lot colder here than in Vietnam," a woman said to our reporter, Wendell Rawls Jr., in Fort Smith, Ark., as the military post awaited the arrival of 500 Vietnamese refugees. "With a little luck, maybe the refugees will take pneumonia and die."

Similar views have been expressed elsewhere in the country. In Niceville, Fla., where 1,500 refugees were being placed at an Air Force base, a woman said, "There's no telling what kind of diseases they'll be bringing with them." In Seattle, the city council disgraced itself by voting down a resolution that would have welcomed the fleeing Vietnamese.

In some instances, the views may reflect an honest fear based on a U. S. unemployment rate of 9.1 percent and other national anxieties. Yet if honest, the fear is misplaced. A majority of the refugees are, as immigration officials note, members of families, Vietnamese and American. Leaders of organized labor, sensitive to the job issue, have themselves urged that immigration bars be lifted for these victims of war. A nation of 210 million people can surely assimilate 70,000 or 80,000 more.

In other instances, however, anti-Vietnamese feelings have been a manifestation of a domestic disease — an ugly underside of American life.

It is the kind of prejudice that Irish, Italians, East Europeans and others have experienced when they came to this country, and in the case of the Vietnamese, it is compounded by race prejudice — the atavistic fear of the "Yellow Peril."

Yet this nation has another side — a tradition of compassion for the suffering and asylum for refugees of wars and prejudice abroad—and it is to this that responsible leaders and decent citizens will address themselves.

This nation has a particular responsibility for the Vietnamese, for whatever one may say of our intervention in their country, they are its victims, and they deserve our help. The tragedy of our intervention in Southeast Asia would only be made worse if we as Americans were to turn away from our best instincts and highest ideals.

CHICAGO TRIBUNE 2 MAY 1975 (4)

America's first defeat

Our first concern, in the wake of South Viet Nam's surrender, is how it affects the lives of the people of that country. But in the longer run, the important thing will be how it affects the people of the United States.

For the first time in history, the United States has been on the losing side of a war. But like most wars, it never touched American territory or brought bombing raids to our cities, so it is a defeat which many Americans prefer not to regard as such. It was a sort of voluntary defeat, or default, if you will; to listen to some, you'd even think it was a triumph.

The result has been a tendency to confuse goals and strategy—to conclude that because we stumbled into this war unwisely and handled it abominably, our principles are somehow suspect and our behavior immoral. The next step—and it is already surfacing—is to conclude that because the sacrifices we made for Viet Nam proved in vain, we should reject any commitments that might mean future sacrifices, even where our interests are greater and freedom is more real than was true of Viet Nam.

If the United States were to yield to this new isolationism, it would be the greatest tragedy of the Viet Nam War. Whatever mistakes we made in Viet Nam, and there were plenty, there is nothing wrong in the desire to cooperate with others in the defense of freedom against Communist aggression. Ben Franklin's warning about hanging together or hanging separately was never more applicable.

In the Communist countries, citizens are constantly forced to make sacrifices to further the political goals of their governments—sacrifices in their standard of living, in their freedom of movement and communication, in their access to news, and in many other ways.

It's blind nonsense to think that our own liberty will take care of itself while we sit in our comfortable family rooms watching television reports of whole nations being plowed under by Communist invasion or subversion [between commercials for dandruff remover, detergents, and dog food], while we angle for ways to work less and collect more, usually from the government; and while we demand that the government "protect" us in an ever widening variety of ways.

It is rare today to hear a politician even suggest that the defense of the American way of life may call for sacrifices. Barry Goldwater was excoriated for saying so. It has become widely fashionable to confuse freedom with permissiveness—the freedom to do only what we want when we want, with little thought of others or of the future, and to break promises when we decide they shouldn't have been made.

Certainly military treaties are not the only way or even the best way to deter Communism. Our economic power, exerted thru trade, and the great historic power of example are at least as important. What's more, Viet Nam may not have been the right place to make a military commitment.

But we did make a commitment; we didn't keep it; and in the eyes of much of the world we let down our friends. However we may try to rationalize the unpleasant facts, other countries will judge our remaining and future commitments accordingly. Until we restore confidence in us, our friends will be less willing to take risks in the defense of freedom and the enemies of freedom will be bolder in pressing their demands. And the next challenge is likely to come sooner than we would like, perhaps in Thailand or perhaps in Korea. There is no time for delay in recreating a foreign policy that is viable and persuasive. There is much studying to do in order to avoid another Viet Nam.

The first sound bit of advice comes from Secretary Kissinger himself: that we "be careful about the commitments we make and determined to follow those we do make." We cannot conduct foreign policy by improvisation; it "will have to be sustained over the decades." And since we've learned that the White House cannot pursue a foreign policy that the people and Congress have turned against, this means that our policy must be openly arrived at [in contrast to Viet Nam], indentifiable, and persuasively related to our national interests. Ideals can't just float around in a vacuum; they must be embodied in something tangible if public support is not to wither away at the first sign of danger.

If the American people resign themselves to the feeling that freedom will survive without any effort on our part—with no commitments no risk of sacrifice. Then they will have abandoned the essential ingredient of freedom. In that event there will be little chance of adopting any successful foreign policy and none at all of regaining the confidence of other free countries whose support and cooperation are necessary but who are increasingly uninterested in making any sacrifice themselves — especially since the fall of Saigon. One lesson of Viet Nam is that we can no longer act alone as the world's policeman.

If, on the other hand, we can accept the defeat in Viet Nam without rejecting the principle of collective security for freedom, then there is good reason for hope.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON POST - 5 MAY 1975 (4)

The Congressional Budget

FOR THE FIRST time in their history, the two houses of Congress have now committed themselves to ceilings on the budget and its deficit. In the case of the House of Representatives, it was an exceedingly close shave. The Democratic leadership was able to carry the budget resolution by only four votes over an unlikely alliance of fiscal conservatives who thought the deficit much too high and social activists who thought it much too low. A precedent of great importance to congressional politics is being hammered out here. The Budget Act of 1974 is beginning to bite. The new process will mean a vast improvement in fiscal legislation, but it won't be confortable for a Congress that is used to voting on appropriations piecemeal—and not voting on deficits at all.

At first glance, it might look as though there were a great storm building up between President Ford and Congress over next year's deficit. On Wednesday, Mr. Ford urged Congress again to hold it down to $60 billion. On Thursday, both houses passed resolutions putting it up in the range of $70 billion. But the longer you look at the difference, the less substantial it becomes.

Take, for example, the money that the federal government gets when it sells off-shore drilling leases to oil companies. The off-shore receipts are always an interesting figure in the budget, because of the peculiar way in which the accounts are kept. These receipts are subtracted from the spending column, rather than being added to the revenue column. If a President wants to hold down the spending total in his budget, one of the more tempting devices is to push up the estimate of offshore lease sales. In his budget last January Mr. Ford said that he expected an unprecedentedly large return of $8 billion from off-shore lease auctions next year. A good many people in Congress think that $4 billion would be a much more realistic figure, in view of the enormously complex environmental and legal issues yet to be resolved. If you agree, then you would also agree that both the spending and deficit figures in the President's budget are understated by $4 billion.

Other examples involve welfare benefits already set by law. Congress thinks that more people are going to be eligible for them next year than the President does. The point here is that this dispute often revolves around economic forecasting, not welfare policy. In the brief Senate debate, one senior Republican, Sen. Henry L. Bellmon of Oklahoma, chided the administration for a "lack of candor" in continuing to estimate its budget deficit at $60 billion and warned Mr. Ford that "he is using figures that will not be borne out by events."

The largest issues now lie not between the President and Congress, but between the congressional budget resolutions and the congressional committees that are going to have to operate under them. It is the first time, remember, that Congress as a whole has attempted to impose limits on the substantive committees before they take up the separate authorization and appropriation bills. The President's budget comes to $355 billion. The House voted for a spending limit of $368 billion. But the estimates of the House's various substantive committees, added together, come to $398 billion. In the case of defense, the President is asking for $94 billion in outlays next year. The substantive committees in the House would increase it by $2 billion. But the House as a whole voted, in its resolution, to hold defense down to $90 billion. Congress can, of course, vote in the course of coming months to raise the appropriation for defense. But it will then have to vote to raise the deficit.

As the roll calls last week showed, a good many congressmen are extremely sensitive about voting for deficits. When the House Budget Committee originally offered the resolution, it set a deficit of $73 billion. The resolution passed only after a considerable exercise of ingenuity on the floor that reduced the fatal number to a round $70 billion.

The question, in the end, is not whether the deficit is big or small, but whether it is rationally related to economic policies that Congress means to pursue. So far the new budget process seems to be off to a good start. It is forcing Congress to think about the impact of the budget as a whole. The votes last week call for federal spending that is somewhat more of a stimulant to the economy than President Ford's budget would be But it is not, on present evidence, dangerously inflationary. If Congress can maintain discipline over its committees through the summer, it may at last produce a strong and coherent alternative to the administration's budget.

NEW YORK TIMES - 5 MAY 1975 (4)

'We Have No Choice'

The antagonistic response of some Americans in and out of Congress to the prospect of granting refuge in the United States to 150,000 Vietnamese seeking asylum here recalls the worst days of McCarranism a quarter century ago. At that time, the late Senator McCarran of Nevada became the odious symbol for all that was ungenerous in the American attitude toward the admission of political and other refugees after World War II. A recrudescent McCarranism is the last thing Americans should want to see today.

The most immediate and obvious way for the Congress to demonstrate that Americans have not lost their moral sense as a result of the Vietnam tragedy is to grant President Ford's urgent request for sufficient funds to meet the expenses of transporting, housing and resettling those Vietnamese refugees who have managed to escape to this country. Senators Javits of New York and Pell of Rhode Island are sponsoring a bill to provide the requisite funds; the ultimate shame of American involvement in the Vietnam war would be the hesitation—or, worse yet, refusal—to accept this much responsibility.

In fact, one of the few shreds of glory that the United States has been able to retrieve from the closing days—or years—of the Vietnam war consists of the success of the tremendous air and sea lift that rescued so many thousands of Vietnamese who had been associated in one way or another with the American involvement.

* * *

The attitude expressed by a few public officials—including Governor Brown of California—and many private citizens to the effect that the influx of Vietnamese is unwelcome because they will take needed jobs from Americans may be understandable but it is unwarranted. As Representative Morris Udall of Arizona has sensibly pointed out, the incoming Vietnamese will comprise a minuscule fraction of the labor force (certainly not more than one-tenth of 1 per cent); they total less than half the number of immigrants normally admitted to the United States annually; they are less than one-fifth the number of Cubans who came here after the Castro revolution. "We have no choice," says Mr. Udall, "except to take them in."

He is right, on the grounds of humanitarianism, of decency and of political freedom—and as much for our own self-respect as for the Vietnamese.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Weekend Edition - 4 May 1975

FEATURES COLUMNISTS

CHICAGO TRIBUNE - 5 MAY 1975(4)

Aides blame Martin for chaos in Saigon

By Ronald Yates
Far East Correspondent
Chicago Tribune Press Service

ON BOARD U.S.S. OKINAWA—The last days of the American embassy in Saigon were full of confusion and uncertainty and during much of the time Ambassador Graham Martin kept evacuation plans to himself, refusing to divulge them even to Washington, embassy sources have told The Tribune.

"At one point Washington called some of the third echelon people to find out just how many Americans there were in Viet Nam because Martin had not cooperated in sending them an accurate figure," one source said.

Other embassy sources said they feared that Martin had opted to "go down with the ship," and up until the very end was not convinced the city should have been evacuated.

"THAT'S WHY thousands of American's Vietnamese employes are still in Saigon and may face punishment from the North Vietnamese," said one source. "The embassy just waited too long to give evacuation orders."

That the end of America's involvement in Viet Nam was an emotional blow to Martin was obvious to much of the embassy staff which on the day of the evacuation observed Martin walking brazenly out an embassy gate around which were gathered thousands of Vietnamese.

"He said he was going to walk to his home a few blocks away," said one embassy source. "And when a Marine guard told him it was too dangerous, Martin replied he would walk across Viet Nam if he wanted to."

"I THINK the fact that South Viet Nam was dying and dying faster than anybody ever thought it would, created a lot of emotional strain on the ambassador," said one official.

The scene at the embassy a week before the evacuation was one of almost total confusion as even close Martin aides were kept in the dark about evacuation plans, according to one source.

Corrpespondents who asked about the plans were told quite frankly that no one had been told anything about leaving. It was known to them, however, that several hundred embassy dependents had been flown out of Saigon several weeks before.

"AMBASSADOR MARTIN was very nervous and seemed to think there was still some hope that South Viet Nam could hang on if a political solution could be worked out," said one source.

See MARTIN, Pg. 2-F

WASHINGTON STAR - 4 MAY 1975

Ford Eyes Asian Defense

By Jeremiah O'Leary
Washington Star Staff Writer

President Ford's meetngs here this week with the prime ministers of Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand and Singapore take on new significance in light of the fall of South Vietnam and Cambodia and the shifting power balance in the Far East.

The increasing tendencies of Thailand and the Philippines to put some distance between themselves and the United States in the face of the new situation has prompted Washington to turn its attention to the Five Power Treaty nations: Britain, Australia, New Zealand, Singapore and Malaysia. The main thrust of U.S. policy now, analysts believe, will be to try to develop a new line of defense on the outer periphery of Asia from South Korea, through Japan, Taiwan and the Five Power nations.

BUT THE linchpin of the Five Power allies is the huge Singapore naval base and its oil tank farm. Singapore is strategically located on the Straits of Malacca, which the U.S. Seventh Fleet must use when it passes between the Pacific and the Indian Ocean.

The British are pulling out of their Singapore naval base in April 1976, leaving it in the hands of Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew. And while Washington's strategic planners have no intention of trying to negotiate a takeover of the British base, the United States is extremely eager to have access to it as well as to the vital refueling capacity at Singapore.

Lee, who meets with Ford and Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger on Thursday, is reportedly determined to make the base facilities available to all comers, including the Soviet navy. U.S. officials have expected Lee, as the leader of a small nation, to take this position.

For the United States, the prime concern is access to the refueling facilities for extended fleet operations, especially since Congress has refused to permit the Navy to expand its facilities on the Indian Ocean island of Diego Garcia. A New Zealand newspaper has reported that the United States may attempt to work out an arrangement for use of Singapore through New Zealand, America's ally in the ANZUS pact with the Australians.

The difficulty is that both Australia and New Zealand currently have Labor governments which are not eager to be identified with U.S. military moves in the area. Some experts believe the United States can deal directly with Singapore on the refueling question, while others believe it ought to be done in conjunction with New Zealand because of the close ties between Singapore and New Zealand.

THE MEETINGS with Prime Ministers Harold Wilson of Great Britain, Wallace E. Rowling of New Zealand and Gough Whitlam of Australia on Wednesday were set up long before the American departure from Indo-China. Wilson, Rowling and Whitlam, like Lee, are coming to Washington from a meeting in Jamaica of British Commonwealth prime ministers. U.S. officials say the conferences are not a result of the collapse of Cambodia and South Vietnam.

But they concede that the new situation unquestionably adds new urgency to discussions of the relationship between America and the governments of the Five Power Pact.

There is a perceptible acceleration of meetings between U.S. officials and foreign leaders in the near future, with President Ford involving himself personally in most of the meetings both here and abroad.

TOMORROW, Archbishop Makarios, leader of the Greek Cypriots, meets with Kissinger here. This is significant because of the current meetings in Vienna between Turkish Cypriot leader Rauf Denktash and his Greek counterpart, Glafcos Clerides. Kissinger is pressing hard for some compromise that will appease the U.S. Congress and bring the two NATO allies back into the fold.

On Thursday also, Kissinger will head the U.S. delegation to the meeting of the General Assembly of the Organization of American States and is expected to spend considerable time at the OAS through the weekend.

Premier Johannes den Uyl of the Netherlands will visit Ford and Kissinger here May 14, and the Shah of Iran makes a state visit to Washington May 15 and 16. The President and Kissinger will go to Europe May 28 for a two-day NATO summit meeting in Brussels, followed by visits to Madrid May 31 and June 1, to Salzburg, Austria, June 1 and 2, for meetings with Egyptian President Anwar Sadat and a visit to Rome June 2.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Weekend Edition -- 4 May 1975
CHICAGO TRIBUNE - 4 MAY 1975

Asian leaders unsure of U.S. commitments

By Robert Kaylor

BANGKOK—Faced with a Communist-dominated Indochina sooner than many of them expected, and unsure of what to do about it, Asian leaders worry whether the United States will live up to other security commitments in the region.

In Thailand, America's last military foothold on mainland Southeast Asia, the government talks about the 350 U. S. warplanes and 25,000 GIs being out within a year. "They all might as well be back in Nebraska eating ice cream if they're not going to do anything," said one official.

In the Philippines, President Ferdinand Marcos says it may be time to reassess a defense arrangement dating to 1951 and warns he is ready to take over giant U. S. Air and Naval bases if necessary.

THAILAND AND the Philippines are members of the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization [SEATO] of which the United States is a signatory. The SEATO treaty provides that if one member is attacked the others would react according to their constitutional principles, a vague commitment at best.

In Japan, some members of the ruling party have suggested that the government consider scrapping the anti-militarist policy that has been the basis of the country's foreign relations since World War II. They want the country to be ready to manufacture nuclear weapons because they believe the United States cannot be trusted to live up to its side of the security pact.

Most leaders in this part of the world have long expected that someday they would have to live with a Communist Indochina. But it has come with shocking swiftness. They are far from agreed on the best way to face it.

Indonesian Foreign Minister Adam Malik says that if Thailand and the Philippines take over American bases in their countries, it will help to achieve stability in Southeast Asia. Officials elsewhere note, however, that Malik's island nation is the farthest removed from Communist Indochina.

The "domino theory" that small nations will topple one after the other is out of favor in much of the world these days. But recent events in Indochina have provoked an upsurge of insurgent activity in the region and for many worried Southeast Asians the theory is very much alive.

In Thailand, which lies along the western flank of Indochina, some senior officials are known to believe that within three years the country may be in a life or death struggle with rebels.

SOME ASIAN leaders voice the hope that after the 1976 election in the United States the impasse between the White House and Congress that blocked further aid to South Viet Nam will be resolved.

"The United States has lost its prestige and its will for the time being," says one Asian figure known and respected around the world. "But it still remains the most powerful nation. It still has the most to offer us and can do the most for us."

This Asian adds, however, that future agreements with the United States will have to be open, not secret, and approved by Congress.

Among themselves the countries most affected by Indochina have formed the five-member Association of Southeast Asian Nations [ASEAN]. But there are bound to be weakneness in any organization of nations that have not always gotten along with each other.

Robert Kaylor is a correspondent for United Press International.

LOS ANGELES TIMES
2 MAY 1975

There is no evidence to indicate a recent worldwide Soviet naval exercise involved a mock nuclear attack on the United States, Navy officials said in Washington. Columnist Jack Anderson reported the exercise began with a simulated Soviet nuclear attack on the United States. The Navy said the exercise concerned itself mainly with anit-submarine, anti-convoy and anti-carrier tactics.

LOS ANGELES TIMES
2 MAY 1975

U.S. Army deserter William Brindle won a last-minute reprieve against being returned to his unit in West Germany when the high court in London granted him leave to appeal Brindle's case is considered by lawyers to be of great importance to other U.S. deserters who are returnable to their units under North Atlantic Treaty Organization commitments. His appeal is due to be heard in about three weeks when the Home Office and American military authorities are expected to be represented.

WALL STREET JOURNAL
5 MAY 1975(4)

Control Data Defense Job

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

MINNEAPOLIS — Control Data Corp. said that its contract with the Air Force is expected to be a "break-even" operation instead of the loss anticipated earlier. Amendment of the contract, which is for development of a large computer-based logistics system, changed the prospect, the company added.

At the end of 1974, Control Data set up a special charge of about $6 million to provide for the anticipated loss.

MARTIN -- CONTINUED

However, embassy sources told The Tribune that the political department of the embassy had informed Martin that there was no hope of any kind of political settlement.

"He just seemed to ignore that advice and it wasn't until most of the people in the political section were told to start working on the evacuation and to stop their political work that it was apparent they would be leaving shortly," one source said.

AS A RESULT of Martin's action, embassy sources charged, the embassy compound on the day of the evacuation was transformed into a horror show with desperate Americans climbing frantically over the high embassy wall while thousands of frightened Vietnamese screamed and shouted in the street.

This correspondent and other Americans wandered for almost an hour in the streets of Saigon before we found the right evacuation pickup point because the embassy had not kept us informed of where we were supposed to go. Some Americans did not get out of the country and were left behind simply because they were not told where they should go to be picked up.

AFTER TAN SON NHUT air base was bombed Monday by the North Vietnamese and shelled early Tuesday morning, Martin ordered his limousine to drive him to the base so he could personally assess the damage.

"Apparently he wanted to see for himself just how bad it was," said one source. "And what was really frightening was that he may have based his recommendation to evacuate on what he saw. If he had seen the wrong things, we might still be in Saigon."

While Martin was driving to Tan Son Nhut, thousands of North Vietnamese troops were entering the outskirts of Saigon. There they paused, almost as if they were waiting for the American evacuation to begin.

"I'M SURE THE NVA [North Vietnamese Army] let us leave because even tho every evacuation chopper received some kind of fire from the ground I had the feeling they could have shelled the hell out of the embassy and shot down several choppers if they really had wanted to," said one source.

"But what makes many of us who worked at the embassy angry is that Martin took numerous calculated risks that he didn't have to take and in that way endangered the lives of every American being evacuated," the source added.

"In fact," he source continued, "as far as I am concerned the blood of the two Marines killed by shelling at Tan Son Nhut on the morning of the evacuation is on Martin's hands."

FORMER EMBASSY employes have hinted that there should be a Congressional investigation into Martin's handling of the evaucation and that they would be willing to testify at such a probe.

"There was no reason for us to wait until the last possible moment to leave," said one source. "By doing that those two Marines at Tan Son Nhut were killed, more than 1,000 Americans lost most of their property because they couldn't take it with them, and Vietnamese who were supposed to get out didn't."

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON STAR 4 MAY 1975

CARL T. ROWAN

Have We Learned Anything?

What a humiliating way for two decades of U.S. involvement in Vietnam to end.

With a new "leader" of the people for whom we sacrificed so much ordering us out within hours, and with the enemy we fought so long pounding on the doors of Saigon, we hustled our last citizens out in a panicky helicopter retreat. Then the South Vietnamese surrendered.

It is inescapable that for a long time we shall ask ourselves and each other some painful questions about this military debacle and human tragedy.

Did the leaders of North Vietnam really sense something about our national character when they boasted a decade ago that the North Vietnamese were prepared to fight for 10 or 20 years, but that the American people would not have the stomach to sustain a long struggle? What was it that kept the Viet Cong and the North Vietnamese so highly motivated, even in the face of merciless bombings, when there was no comparable fervor on the part of South Vietnamese troops? Is it a simple matter of the Communist forces truly believing that they were liberators, throwing out the last of the foreigners, whereas the South Vietnamese troops always had a gut feeling that they were defenders of an older order in which outsiders and their wealthy, corrupt Vietnamese lackeys controlled everything?

We can abuse ourselves and each other for a generation and longer with such questions about the who and why of Vietnam. But the only meaningful question in the long run is: What have we learned, if anything?

World politics changed empires profoundly during the 20 years or so that we were thrashing around in Indochina.

- As old colonial empires were dissolved, dozens of new nations entered the United Nations, wiping out a political dominance the United States once enjoyed there. Americans are faced with the question of whether to woo these often-exasperating "third world" countries or to adopt a posture of haughty disgust and say, "To hell with them and the United Nations."
- Latin Americans, who a generation ago could be counted on to side with the United States in most any major international dispute, have become intensely independent and sometimes harshly critical of their giant neighbor.
- With much of the world's vital raw material (bauxite, rubber, petroleum, tin) no longer controlled directly by European colonial powers, the United States' economic well-being is far more dependent on her bilateral relations with new, small nations.

Consider Latin America alone. Our troubles there are serious, and they involve much more than Cuba's move to communism, Chile's drift first into Marxism, then right-wing dictatorship, or Peru's defection from the solidly pro-U.S. bloc.

Not just Latin leftists but even Latin oligarchists, dictators and autocrats are angry over the recent trade bill which they

(SEE LEARNED.....Pg. 4-F)

BALTIMORE SUN 4 MAY 1975

Joseph Kraft

The Fall of South Vietnam Need Not Spell Disaster for U.S.

Washington.

Most people here and abroad long ago discounted the possibility of anything but an American setback as the eventual outcome in Southeast Asia. Bad as the scene was, accordingly, the surrender in Saigon does not have to spell prolonged trouble.

On the contrary, a terrible burden has finally lifted from the United States, thus presenting an opportunity for a more effective policy in areas that truly count. So the end in Vietnam could mean deliverance or disaster—and which one depends on the behavior of American officials.

One encouraging portent is the state of domestic opinion. Americans have been steeling themselves against the unhappy ending for months. By huge majorities, the Congress, acting at the clear direction of the country, has repeatedly resisted appeals for more military aid to Southeast Asia. Because previous American efforts were so ample: because the majority against throwing good money after bad was so broad, and because the pseudo-commitments of Mr. Nixon were so illegitimate, it will not be easy to finger any particular group as responsible for defeat.

Nor does there have to be a turning inward in disgust on a scale that would justify that dirty epithet, neo-isolationist. Whether in corporations, unions, farms, universities or government, whether as investors, consumers, travelers, students or policymakers, Americans are bound by hoops of steel with foreign lands. Having liquidated the primary source of division in foreign policy, Americans can realistically think of rebuilding the consensus about national security which marked pre-Vietnam days.

The foreign outlook is not worse. A few countries—Thailand, the Philippines and perhaps Singapore—will have to scramble to undo the opportunism which made them strive to be No. 1 boys for Lyndon Johnson or Richard Nixon in times past.

But the most important Asian countries—notably Japan which has diplomatic relations with North Vietnam and a working aid program—have already made adjustments to the new reality without fraying American ties. The European allies, and most of the countries of Africa, Latin America, the Near East and South Asia, are going to find it easier—not harder—to reach common ground with the United States now that Vietnam, a prime source of discord, is out of the way.

The more so as the Communist world is showing unexampled restraint about events in Southeast Asia. The Russians and Chinese—pushed years ago by the desire for rapport with Washington into an awkward stance toward Hanoi—now sound almost neutral. Note, for example, the miraculously dispassionate rhetoric of Tass, the Soviet news agency, in announcing the surrender: "A most dangerous seat of international tension has been liquidated."

In these conditions, the fear of great new danger seems highly exaggerated. The talk of Communist assaults on Thailand, South Korea or Formosa, in particular, ignores the military and political realities—not to mention the cool relations between China and Russia.

In the Middle East, the Israelis will perhaps be even more suspicious about settling with the Arabs on the basis of an American guarantee. But the true lesson, and one which the United States can now drive home to the Israelis, is that over-persistence does not pay off; that it makes sense to settle with the Arabs now, before the tide of their power swells in a way that will belittle the surge of Communist strength in Southeast Asia.

The unfinished business of detente with Russia can plainly go forward more safely than before. Washington no longer has to pay Moscow exorbitant fees—such as the wheat deal—for a hands-off policy in Vietnam.

Perhaps most important, there is a chance for some steady and serious high-level attention to a prime international problem which the United States has been pleased to ignore. That is the international economic problem, engaging recession, inflation, gyrating commodity prices, uncertain currency rates and, in some case, national bankruptcies.

But America's influence in the world can be made whole again if there is a truce in the guerrilla war now waging between the executive and the Congress. Some reponsibility for more reliable performance surely devolves upon the Congress. But the key lies with the Secretary of State. The future of the American role requires that he be more explicit about his purposes, that he confide in more than a few subordinates, that he allow some others to play some hands, that he cease blaming whatever goes wrong on others, that he take economic issues and libertarian causes more seriously. If he cannot make these changes, he has become more a part of the problem than of the solution, and he should draw the consequences.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK NEWS 4 MAY 1975

Grim Lessons of Vietnam: Will We Remember?

By JERRY GREENE

Washington, May 3—It is doubtful that more than a few political or military leaders here or elsewhere will learn or remember any of the lessons that America's disaster in Vietnam is supposed to hold for future guidance.

If the statesmen and generals of oncoming generations do profit from the mistakes, it will be the first time in anybody's history that such had been the case after a frightful war.

But certain self-evident truths are currently receiving grave consideration at the Pentagon, and some military types are hoping that the State Department and the White House will take due note of at least one of them: If it is not absolutely necessary for survival, the U.S. should not get into another war in this century, and never again without overwhelming public support.

CAPITOL STUFF

No More Token Warfare

A corollary hope heard frequently is that should war come again, American forces would not be fed in piecemeal but thrown in full blast with the intent to stay.

Perhaps a detailed analysis of past wars might provide some suggestions for improvement in diplomatic technique or military operations resulting from experience gained the hard way. If so, the positives would be far outweighed by the negatives.

The record of the Korean War is replete with blunders. For all the prideful histories, memoirs and biographies that have poured off the presses in the victorious Allied nations, World War II was packed with errors, mistakes and misjudgments. World War I's record was worse, and only in recent years have we learned that faulty coal bunkering—not an enemy mine—apparently blew up the battleship Maine to trigger the Spanish-American War.

The Cue From Mao

During Vietnam, some politico-military strategists around the White House went ape over the discovery of guerrilla warfare, making the sayings of Chairman Mao required reading—all that stuff about fishes in the sea when they meant fighting men surrounded by a friendly and supporting civilian populace.

The enthusiasts had forgotten that Chairman Mao apparently borrowed much of his thought from a U.S. Marine Corps field manual issued 40-odd years ago, an instruction book written from experience in Central America. Guerrilla operations are as old as warfare; they were used extensively in the American Revolution, even around Brooklyn.

Here We Go Again

The military leaders of course will be trying, in the immediate future, to apply the tactical lessons of the Vietnam battlefields in planning for the future and in training of a post-Vietnam generation of troops. It takes a while to forget; combat characters who have been shot at usually remember a little longer and better than the statesmen.

But eventually human nature will exert itself and it will be back to the old routine, differing only as necessity dictates as a result of advanging technology.

It is technology that will assure one change, however, when and if war comes again. Like Vietnam, the next one will be played out in prime time television back home.

Vietnam was the nation's first televised, uncensored war and for all practical purposes, censorship is dead. Censorship can keep bad news from the homefolks as well as military secrets from the enemy.

But the feeling is strong, and growing, among the military, that in any new war the fighting forces should let it all hang out, that the civilians back home might as well become paritcipants to the fullest electronic extent possible.

Last Days of Censorship

Interestingly enough, Maj. Gen. Gordon Hill, chief of information for the Army and a veteran of Vietnam, is a leading advocate of the idea that censorship should be abolished. He thinks that because of mobility and modern communications it would be impossible to impose censorship and that hiding the harsh realities in today's world would serve no useful purpose.

Gen. Hill thinks that essential military information could be safeguarded by cooperative ground rules, as in Vietnam. Naturally, some generals oppose the thought, insisting that censorship could be vital in a nuclear war.

It is safe to say that in a nuclear war people would do what they had to do to survive—those left after the initial explosions of incoming ICBMs.

(LEARNED....CONT'D.)

say adds more "Hickenlooper amendments" under which Latin American countries can be punished economically if they are naughty politically.

Rodolfo Silva, the new ambassador from Costa Rica, said to me recently: "There have been three periods of genuine hope in Latin America — when Roosevelt declared his 'Good Neighbor Policy,' when Kennedy announced his 'Alliance for Progress' and when Kissinger proposed a 'New Dialogue.' The 'new dialogue' ended before it was begun."

Have we learned from Vietnam that tanks and bombers cannot save a situation once we let a whole nation, or even a continent, come to believe that we stand for unjust exploitation?

Are we now ready to turn some of our attention and resources toward those peoples on whom we have lavished mostly neglect and indifference in recent years? The answers hold the key to this country's future position in a sharply-reordered and still-changing world.

WASHINGTON STAR 2 MAY 1975

Ford, Tunisian Premier Confer on Mideast

President Ford reaffirmed during an hour's meeting yesterday with Tunisian Premier Hedi Noura his determination to avoid a stalemate in Middle East peacemaking efforts.

Noura plans to visit Atlanta, New York, Chicago and San Francisco.

WASHINGTON STAR 2 MAY 1975

Jackson Stalks Secret Commitments

Sen. 'henry M. Jackson, D-Wash., has renewed his demand that Congress be given "all documentation" relating to private commitments by former President Richard M. Nixon to South Vietnam President Nguyen Van Thieu.

"It is a grotesque and dangerous situation when the Congress and the people of the United States have to rely on foreign officials to reveal in their own time and for their own purposes vital communications," Jackson said yesterday.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Weekend Edition -- 4 May 1975

Treaty Conference to Open

WASHINGTON POST 5 MAY 1975 (4)

A-Bomb Proliferation Feared

By Thomas O'Toole
Washington Post Staff Writer

"Some years ago," President Muammar Qaddafi of Libya siad earlier this year, "we could hardly procure a fighter squadron. Tomorrow we will be able to buy an atom bomb and all its parts. The nuclear monoply is about to be broken."

Now, as the first Review Conference on the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty opens in Geneva, nuclear weapons experts fear that Quaddafi may be half right: while atomic bombs are not for sale like jet fighters, the day of the nuclear monoply may indeed be over.

The monopoly was first cracked a year ago by India, and fears are rising that India will soon detonate its second atomic bomb, possibly before the year is out. If that occurs, Pakistan is expected to follow —and if that happens, others will not be far behind.

"The real monster down the road is nuclear proliferation," said a senior State Department official who asked not to be identified. "It is so far down the road that people can't get terribly serious about it, but I think it is inevitable that there will be three or four new nuclear powers in the next 10 years."

Ironically, this kind of pessimism is being voiced at a time when, on the surface, things look the brightest they have in years. he Euratom countries —Italy, West Germany, Belgium, the Netherlands and Luxembourg, which share their nuclear technology—last week ratified the non-proliferation treaty, which prohibits their bearing nuclear arms. Japan is expected to ratify soon.

All this was orchestrated to open the first review conference for the NPT, which begins today in Geneva. The conference is expected to run the month of May, during which every effort is to be bent to bring into the fold the 17 countries that have not ratified the treaty and the more than 30 countries that have not even signed it.

The NPT prohibits the spread of nuclear weapons, limiting them to those countries that already possessed them in 1968 when it was signed by the United States, the Soviet Union and Great Britain.

France, China and India also have the bomb but have not signed the treaty.

What worries disarmament experts is that, while the Euratom countries have ratified the treaty and Japan is about to, there may be a move afoot by two or three countries of the Third World to disavow the non-proliferation treaty.

Nobody mentions any names, but intelligence sources say they wouldn't be surprised to see at least one and possibly two Third World nations withdraw from the treaty during this month's review conference.

"And if anybody pulls out of the NPT, there will be a flood of countries pulling out," one source said. "The world has changed since the 18th of May (the day India exploded its first nuclear bomb last year), and other countries now see the bomb as a way of expressing their natialism and their sentiments about things, all at the same time."

In addition the astronomical price of oil has eliminated it as an energy source for all but the richest nations, and even they are turning to uranium for their electrical supply.

An estimated 15 nations now have nuclear power, a number that will double in five years and triple in 10.

The nations having nuclear power or about to have it include some with large armies which fear they may have to use armed force someday, notably Korea, Iran, Pakistan, Israel, Saudi Arabia, South Africa, Argentina and Brazil.

It's true that nuclear power doesn't mean nuclear weapons, but it's a step closer. Another step is the reprocessing chemical technology that makes possible the extraction of plutonium from spent uranium fuel, a technique used by everybody but the Chinese to fashion there first atomic bomb.

Few reprocessing plants are operating anywhere in the world yet, partly because of bugs in the machinery and partly because there isn't enough spent uranium around to need reprocessing.

Meanwhile, spent fuel is being stored in large tanks on the sites of the power plants.

But the time is fast approaching when the spent fuel will have to be reprocessed, if only to avoid having giant radioactive storage farms next to every nuclear plant.

Also reprocessing is economical, since plutonium removed from spent fuel can itself be used as a nuclear power source.

Korea and Iran have already approached the United States, asking for licenses to build their own reprocessing plants. Argentina is insisting on its own reprocessing plant if it is to buy any more nuclear power plants from the United States. Brazil feels the same way, if only to avoid the embarrassment of having to ask Argentina to reprocess its fuel at some future date.

This poses a dilemma for the United States, which can refuse to sell reprocessing plants abroad. If it does, it must agree to reprocess spent fuel from overseas, meaning the United States would become the world's garbage dump for the residual atomic waste left by the process.

"The way to do it is to have fuel reprocessing plants built in a relatively few locations of the world," Mason Willrich, professor of law at the University of Virginia, told the Senate Government Operations Committee, whose members are sponsoring a bill to put limits on nuclear export.

"These facilities would be multinationally owned, subject to international inspection and would be large enough to meet the needs of nuclear power plants throughout an entire region of the world."

India showed the rest of the world how to get an atomic bomb on its own. Back in 1960, Canada built a research reactor in India. This reactor produced about 22 pounds of plutonium every year, though it was locked up in the spent uranium fuel. Canada had no safeguards for the plutonium, just the uranium.

With a little French help, India built its own plutonium extraction plant. It used the first 25 pounds of extracted plutonium for its first bomb. It now has about 220 pounds in storage, enough for 10 more bombs. India is building at Madras two huge power plants, which themselves will produce 240 pounds of plutonium every year.

Intelligence sources believe India will detonate a second bomb soon, possibly before the year is out. India's first bomb won it a lot of self-esteem.

A second will win it even more, sources say, as well as convince Pakistan once and for all to duplicate the Indian experience.

NEW YORK TIMES 5 MAY 1975 (4)

Mushrooms for Dinner

By Stuart Symington

WASHINGTON—On April 2, the news media reported that an Argentine legislator had introduced a bill calling for his Government to develop nuclear weapons. This was a clear indication of the pressures on a growing number of governments to "go nuclear."

The possibility that nuclear weapons may soon be in the hands of many more governments—as well as terrorist or criminal groups—is one of the gravest security issues facing the United States.

Our nuclear forces, upon which we place our main reliance to deter any major would-be aggressor, were not planned to protect us in a world in which nuclear-armed groups abound. But such a world is now close on the horizon.

Economic costs and technical restraints are no longer decisive factors in preventing other countries or nongovernmental groups from acquiring various types of nuclear explosive devices.

Furthermore, respected nuclear physicists tell us that between 100,000 and one million people throughout the world now have the basic information necessary to assemble nuclear weapons.

Today more than 50 countries have nuclear reactors. Not including the five nuclear powers—the United States, Soviet Union, Britain, China and France—as well as India, which recently exploded an atomic device, about 30 countries currently possess weapons quantities of plutonium that could be used in a bomb development program.

Enough plutonium has already been produced in the nuclear plants of these 30 countries to build some 9,000 nuclear weapons, each with the same destructive power as the bomb dropped on Hiroshima. And five years from now that number is projected to reach 50,000.

Moreover, half of these same 30 countries, plus two of the nuclear powers (France and China), have refused to ratify the 1970 Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, which forbids the acquisi-

(See MUSHROOMS, Pg. 6-F)

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Weekend Edition -- 4 May 1975

NEW YORK TIMES 4 MAY 1975,

U.S.S. Nimitz, the Navy's Newest and Biggest Vessel

By DREW MIDDLETON
Special to The New York Times

NORFOLK, Va., May 3—The U.S.S. Nimitz, at 95,000 tons the largest aircraft carrier ever built, was commissioned into the Atlantic fleet today with President Ford as godfather.

When she has taken aboard an air wing of approximately 100 tactical aircraft, the Nimitz will be not only the largest but also the most powerful surface warship in the world, according to Navy sources. Powered by two nuclear reactors, she is designed to operate for 13 years without refueling.

The carrier, which will probably be deployed in the Mediterranean, also represents, with her aircraft, a $1-billion-plus bet by the Navy that, in war, attack carriers with their attendant destroyers and protective aircraft will survive attacks from the submarine and cruise-missile armed surface ships in whose construction the Soviet Navy has specialized.
of nuclear-powered guided-mis-

The Nimitz is also the largest symbol of the "new Navy" that is slowly replacing older surface ships and submarines, some of them of World War II vintage. She is the first of a class of three ships and the first nuclear carrier to be commissioned since the Enterprise in 1961.

The other ships of the Nimitz class are the Dwight D. Eisenhower, which will probably be commissioned in the middle of 1977, and the Carl Vinson, scheduled for service in 1980.

These nuclear carriers will be escorted by a new class of nuclear-powered guided-missile frigate, the first of which, the California and the South Carolina, have been commissioned.

Navy sources say that with such frigates in service with nuclear-powered carrier task forces the United States "will have the capability to deploy these forces on very short notice to any spot in the world to react to any situation that calls for the application of this type of pressure."

The Virginia class of three frigates with approximately the same characteristics as the California will be commissioned this year and next, providing similar protection for carrier task forces.

Modernization Program

The modernization program includes 30 Spruance class destroyers driven by gas turbines, 12 nuclear-powered attack submarines of the Los Angeles class and the Pegasus class of patrol hydrofoil missile ships armed with the Harpoon, the Navy's most formidable anti-ship missile.

With Navy ship strength lower than at any time since before Pearl Harbor in 1941, the modernization program has had to concentrate on quality to balance the rapidly expanding Soviet navy.

The program, a senior officer said, is not intended to "replace ships on a one-for-one basis" but to introduce new classes of ships "that are significantly more capable than their predecessors and that are designed to respond to an increasingly complex range of missions."

The program is expensive. The Nimitz, with her aircraft, cost approximately $1-billion; her sister ships will probably cost more. The Trident nuclear-powered, ballistic-missile submarine is expected to cost about $1-billion with the first of the class expected late in this decade.

Priority was given to combat ships. Modernization of support vessels has lagged and there will be more than 50 World War II ships of this type in the active fleet by the end of the fiscal year 1977.

32-Ship Plan Urged

The Navy has proposed a 32-ship building program beginning this year that will include 10 fleet oilers, five destroyer tenders, two submarine tenders, two ammunition ships, three combat stores ships and 10 ocean tugs.

The American concept of surface sea power, senior officers concede, has not changed since 1945. American naval strength remains based on attack carriers despite the advent of a Soviet undersea and surface fleet that naval intelligence believes was designed with the elimination of American carriers in mind.

"The United States is putting all her naval eggs in one basket," a British admiral remarked recently, "and a very expensive basket it is, too."

The survivability of the modern carrier in conventional or nuclear war is one of the most hotly debated issues in naval strategic thinking.

Advocates of the attack submarine and the cruise-missile armed surface ship argue that "the potential adversary," meaning the Soviet Union, would deploy so many of these vessels that at least one, but probably more, would be able to launch ruinous attacks on carriers.

Admirals Reply

The carrier admirals, who retain a dominant position within the Navy, have a series of answers. One is that the carrier's protective forces on the surface or in the air would be able to cope with either submarines or surface ships because of the increased sophistication of detection devices and long-range weapons systems.

Another is that the new American attack submarines are the best answer to Soviet submarines and that, in company with aircraft such as the F-14 Tomcat and the new nuclear-powered frigates, they would be able to minimize attacks on carriers.

Finally, it is argued, that carriers over the years have proved to be very durable warships capable of sustaining direct hits or serious accidents without serious interference to their fighting capabilities. Survivability under nuclear attack, it was conceded, is a different problem.

The Nimitz-class carriers have another attribute—speed. The Navy says they will move "in excess of 30 knots" but foreign navies regard this as a gross understatement. The Nimitz's nuclear reactors can operate for 13 years, the equivalent of steaming 800,000 to 1 million miles, before refueling. The energy equivalent in fuel oil is estimated at 426 million gallons.

A Small Island

The Nimitz's proportions are those of a small island. She has an over-all length of 1,092 feet and an extreme breadth of 252 feet. The flight deck covers about four and one-half acres. There are accommodations aboard for 6,282 although her complement will be about 300 officers and 5,400 enlisted men.

She has four aircraft elevators and four catapults. The latter are controlled by a new system. Two bubble-topped control centers stand ready under the flight deck and are elevated to it to fire the catapults.

After commissioning, the Nimitz will go to sea for a brief period for testing her flight deck and electronic gear. She is expected to sail for the Guantánamo Bay naval base in Cuba in July to conduct qualifications and readiness exercises for from six to eight weeks.

In the autumn the Nimitz will return to Norfolk for minor repairs and modifications and in 1976 she will sail on her first deployment, probably with the Sixth Fleet in the Mediterranean.

MUSHROOMS -- CONTINUED

tion or distribution of nuclear explosive devices.

Growing worldwide diffusion of nuclear technology and fuel also increases the opportunity for theft and usage by terrorist and criminal groups. We should be especially concerned with the possibility of piracy of nuclear materials in transport, or in a foreign country where security measures might not be as effective as in the United States.

It is not inconceivable that an international black market in stolen nuclear materials—possibly complete nuclear weapons—could develop.

What can be done to prevent the cancer of nuclear weapons from spreading throughout the world? Here are some suggestions:

● When the parties to the non-proliferation treaty meet in Geneva next month to review its operation, the Ford Administration should avail itself of this key opportunity to help shape policies necessary to gain additional membership in the treaty and strengthen its safeguards.

● In order to tighten control over nuclear materials, countries supplying nuclear fuel should carry out a comprehensive plan for the enrichment, reprocessing and/or leasing of world fissionable materials, and should not supply any nuclear materials to nations that have not agreed to accept International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards on all their nuclear programs.

● The International Atomic Energy Agency should be empowered to develop and supervise security arrangements designed to protect nuclear materials from theft. At a minimum, the agency could exercise periodic surveillance over nationally-operated security systems.

● Until such adequate safeguards and security arrangements have been developed, nations supplying nuclear materials should put a freeze on the further reprocessing of plutonium.

● To discourage non-nuclear nations from embarking upon nuclear weapons programs, the nuclear powers should make a concerted effort both to put an end to their own arms race and to provide security assurances to non-nuclear states that nuclear weapons will not be used against them. At a minimum, the former effort would require the United States and the Soviet Union to negotiate various types of reductions in nuclear weapons.

We must learn to handle the growing danger of this nuclear proliferation before it handles us.

Stuart Symington, Democrat of Missouri, is a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and chairman of the Military Applications Subcommittee of the Joint Atomic Energy Committee.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON STAR 2 MAY 1975 Weekend Edition -- 4 May 1975

Missile Pact Floundering On Numbers

By Henry S. Bradsher
Washington Star Staff Writer

Soviet-American efforts to convert the Vladivostok agreement on strategic nuclear weapons into a binding treaty will recess shortly in deadlock on the main issue of verifying numbers of missile warheads, according to senior administrations officials.

After three months of negotiations in Geneva, the two sides are unable to agree on how to count missiles in the limit of 1,320 that can have multiple independently targeted warheads.

Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger has said that the issue is one on which the United States is "going to be adamant and will not yield, which is non-negotiable...." The Soviet Union is not yielding, either.

THE ADMININSTRATION feels that useful clarifictions have been worked out in Geneva on the agreement which President Ford and the Soviet Communist party's Secretary-General Leonid I. Brezhnev made at Vladivostok last Nov. 23.

Congressional critics found the hastily written agreement to be vague in its restriction on the arms race and too high in its overall limit of 2,400 strategic weapons systems for each side, including the 1,320 missiles with multiple warheads.

The central issue of verifying that a treaty is being observed now requires further top-level decisions. The Geneva talks which began Jan. 30 will recess for an indefinite period to permit direct contacts between Washington and Moscow.

SENIOR OFFICIALS here expect Kissinger to meet with the Soviet Ambassador to Washington, Anatoly F. Dobrynin, to try to work out the verification problem. How soon that will happen is unclear.

Kissinger might have to go to Moscow to deal directly with Brezhnev, the officials suggested, as was needed before the original Strategic Arms Limitation Agreement — SALT I — in 1972 and before the Vladivostok meeting.

Such a trip is, in any event, expected to occur before Brezhnev comes to the United States. His visit is now tentatively scheduled for September or October, but its timing is at least partly dependent upon reaching agreement to sign an arms treaty.

THE PLAN is to have Brezhnev and Ford sign the new treaty — SALT II — which the negotiators have been trying unsuccessfully to get written.

Senior officials here think that the Soviets are under more pressure than the Ford administration to get a treaty signed this year, and therefore might be willing to compromise on verification.

The official reasoning is that Brezhnev wants to wrap up the treaty as a personal triumph before a Communist party congress meets next February. Brezhnev, who at the age of 68 is in poor health, might retire then or shortly after.

An additional factor, officials think, is that the party congress will consider the next Soviet five-year economic development plan. Armaments programs are a critical element in deciding on economic priorities for the five-year period, with a SALT II treaty making possible larger allocations to civilian programs such as agricultural improvements to which Brezhnev is committed.

ASIDE FROM Soviet political and economic factors, there are American political reasons for Moscow to want to conclude a treaty this year, U.S. officials feel.

They say it would be unlikely that during a presidential election year here any treaty could be concluded because it would be too controversial on Capitol Hill.

Therefore, if the Soviets miss this chance, a treaty might not be possible until 1977. Such a delay would eliminate much of the money-saving possibilities of checking the arms race which the Vladivostok agreement was supposed to offer.

Despite this reasoning in high administration circles, officials concede that the obstacles to getting a treaty signed are considerable.

AFTER THE AMERICAN and Soviet delegations in Geneva each presented in February a draft treaty based on its interpretation of the Vladivostok agreement, three main areas of conflict emerged.

One was whether the Soviet Backfire bomber would be counted as a strategic weapon within the overall limitation of 2,400. The second was whether U.S. bombers equipped with long-range cruise missiles would be counted.

The third point — the one that senior officials say is the heart of the problem — involves what to count within the limitation of only 1,320 missiles with multiple warheads, or MIRVs.

Kissinger said after the meeting in Vladivostok that "we cannot accept their assertion that a missile they have tested as a MIRV isn't MIRVed....

"THE ONE PRINCIPLE on which we're going to be adamant and will not yield, which is non-negotiable, is that any missile that has been tested with a MIRV mode successfully, I mean if they've run five or six tests, will be counted as a MIRVed missile when it is deployed," Kissinger said.

Three new Soviet missiles are involved. They are the SS17, which American experts believe can carry four warheads; the SS18 with five to eight warheads; and the SS19 with four to six warheads. All have a range of more than 5,500 nautical miles.

The deployment of MIRVed SS17 and SS19 missiles in launching silos requires silo modifications that U.S. reconnaissance satellites could see, and therefore this country could tell whether to count them in the 1,320.

BUT THE HUGE new SS18, whose ability to deliver a 15,000 pound nuclear payload of warheads dwarfs any American missile, is the unknown in any verification arrangement.

Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger said Jan. 14 that the United States had "confirmed evidence" that the Soviet Union had begun deployment of SS18 missiles. Since SS18s have been tested with eight large MIRVs, this country will count all deployed SS18s within the 1,320 limit, Schlesinger said.

Kissinger said earlier that this basis of counting had been put to the Soviets at Vladivostok. "They have never rejected it. They've also never accepted it."

But in Geneva the Soviets have recently refused to agree that a whole class of missiles like the SS18 should be counted against their 1,320 limit just because of tests.

"If they reject the verification formula," Kissinger said in December, "unless there is enormous ingenuity in which we come up with another one, I really wouldn't know where to begin.

"I think if they reject verification it will be very hard to conceive how there can be a deal," he added.

THE PROBLEM NOW, five months after Kissinger made that statement, is to find a way around the Soviet rejection in order to break the deadlock in negotiations on a treaty.

Kissinger added last December that, "if we find out by next April that they are stalling on verification...because they won't agree to really the only reasonable inspection system that can be designed," then the administration would have a much better chance of getting additional armament money out of Congress.

So far, however, the administration has not publicly accused the Soviets of stalling, nor has it approached Congress for more money to continue the arms race on the basis of admitting that SALT II has broken down. Officials are not yet ready to draw the conclusion of a breakdown, and are in fact optimistic that something will turn up.

DEFENSE SPACE BUSINESS DAILY 30 APRIL 1975 (4 MAY)
MCGOVERN ASKS FOR BAN ON CRUISE MISSILES. Sen. George McGovern (D-S. Dak.), a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Arms Control Subcommittee, has written Secretary of State Henry Kissinger urging a ban on the development and deployment of cruise missiles, a substantial reduction in total strategic delivery vehicles and MIRV vehicles, and a ban on nuclear weapons testing.

Earlier, former Defense Department SALT negotiator Paul H. Nitze, had warned the committee against the Soviet movement to include air-launched cruise missiles of over 600 kilometer range in the total delivery limitation of 2400 vehicles (Defense/Space Daily, April 29). Nitze also disagreed with McGovern that the U. S. lead in delivery vehicles was more important than throw-weight.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Weekend Edition -- 4 May 1975

WASHINGTON POST 4 MAY 1975

The Roots of Our Vietnam Involvement

Jack Anderson

The late Nikita Khrushchev sized up the Vietnam War during a talk with U.S. Ambassador Llewellyn Thompson in July 1962. As Thompson later recounted the conversation in a secret cable, Khrushchev told him brusquely: "In South Vietnam, the United States has stumbled into a bog."

How did we happen to get mired for a decade in the Vietnam bog? Perhaps I can help answer this historic question. The two men who called the shots during this crucial period, John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson, discussed their decisions with me off the record. I have found my notes of these conversations.

In the early 1960s, the Pentagon tried to pressure President Kennedy to send combat troops to Vietnam. A combat force was needed, the Joint Chiefs urged, to defend U.S. facilities and to bolster the South Vietnamese.

Kennedy told me he had no intention of sending a military expedition to Vietnam. The Bay of Pigs had taught him, he said, not to trust the Pentagon's advice. Vietnam could become a Sea of Pigs, he feared, sucking the U.S. deeper and deeper into the maelstrom.

He was troubled, nevertheless, by the infiltration of North Vietnamese regulars into the south. He described this movement of troops and arms across international boundaries as "a new form of aggression."

But the way to fight a guerrilla war, he suggested, was with guerrilla tactics. He wanted to develop the best counter-insurgency force in the world and send them to Vietnam to train the South Vietnamese in anti-guerrilla warfare, he said.

Kennedy rejected the Pentagon's call to send combat troops to Vietnam, but as a compromise, he sent over more military advisers and technicians.

He became increasingly skeptical, however, of U.S. involvement in the Vietnam jungles. Shortly before his death, he indicated to me that he wanted to pull all American military people out of Vietnam. He asked me what I thought the political repercussions would be.

In more positive language, he told Senate Democratic leader Mike Mansfield in mid-1963 that he had made up his mind to end the American presence in Vietnam. "He felt we had made an error. He was going to order a gradual withdrawal," Mansfield told me.

Lyndon Johnson was cautioned against escalating the Vietnam War. The most urgent warning came from Under Secretary of State George Ball. "The South Vietnamese are losing the war to the Vietcong," he told the new President. "No one can assure you that we can beat the Vietcong or even force them to the conference table on our terms, no matter how many hundred thousand white, foreign troops we deploy . . .

"The decision you face now, therefore, is crucial. Once large numbers of U.S. troops are committed to direct combat . . . we will have started a well-nigh irreversible process. Our involvement will be so great that we cannot—without national humiliation—stop short of achieving our complete objectives.

"Of the two possibilities, I think humiliation would be more likely than the achievement of our objectives—even after we have paid the terrible price."

Tragically for the United States, Johnson preferred the advice of the military brass who assured him that a show of force would prevent a Communist takeover of Vietnam.

Johnson spoke to me about Vietnam on three or four occasions. Each time, he repeated two statements. "They're not going to say Lyndon Johnson lost Vietnam," he would declare. He would also interject: "Lyndon Johnson isn't going to be the first American President to lose a war."

The Republican charges in the 1950s that the Democrats had "lost China" clearly had left a deep impression upon Johnson. He was determined not to be the victim of another "soft on communism" campaign.

Thus the United States, the mightiest military power the world has ever known—supreme on the seas and invincible in the skies—was out-mancuvered in South Vietnam by ragtag guerrillas, most of whom were simple peasants.

Armed with crude weapons manufactured in makeshift jungle arsenals, they fought a war of improvisation. Some of their heaviest weapons were mortars that could be dismantled and carried in three parts. They marched on sandals hacked from old truck and airplane tires, slept in hammocks made from the nylon of our parachutes. Wicks enclosed in the metal of used cartridges provided just enough light to tread jungle trails at night. And they could survive for days on packets of rice.

Although substantially surpassed in manpower and firepower, the Vietcong's crude style of warfare, not unlike that used by our own forefathers to wrest independence from the British, often confounded those who fought by the book.

Worse, the U.S. buildup played into the hands of the Communist propagandists who were able to portray the war as a struggle between the American "imperialists" and Vietnamese "people." Intensive anti-American indoctrination gave point and purpose to the Communist jungle fighters.

Of course, their real support came from North Vietnam, which smuggled troops and supplies over the network of jungle paths. This infiltration approached the dimensions of a backdoor invasion after the United States began pouring troops into South Vietnam.

The American people not only gave 56,226 lives to the South Vietnamese cause; they also poured an estimated $150 billion into South Vietnam. In contrast, North Vietnam's allies furnished no troops and contributed less than $10 billion to Hanoi.

But once the U.S. pulled out, the South Vietnamese surrendered without fighting a major battle.

© 1975, United Feature Syndicate

The Washington Merry-Go-Round THE WASHINGTON POST Monday, May 5, 1975.

Ford Stuck With Saigon Rhetoric

By Jack Anderson and Les Whitten

President Ford has been trying delicately to extricate his foot from his mouth ever since the Saigon surrender.

The sudden collapse of South Vietnam caught him with some bygone rhetoric stuck in his throat. He has been obliged to make some quick revisions, to wit:

•The President had persistently sounded the warning that the United States would lose credibility with its other allies if more military aid wasn't rushed to Saigon. The new line, according to our White House sources, is that U.S. credibility remains high and that our allies can depend upon U.S. commitments.

•The President had preached that a Communist victory in Vietnam would cause its Asian neighbors to fall like dominoes. Now he is spreading the word that he doesn't believe the domino theory after all.

•Mr. Ford had implied that Congress was to blame for South Vietnam's military reverses because of its refusal to vote more aid. This line was eagerly adopted by Saigon leaders looking for a scapegoat for their own mishandling of the war. Now the President is trying to correct the impression that the United States was responsible for the fall of South Vietnam.

•Mr. Ford had called for an emergency appropriation of $700 million in military aid to save Saigon. Simultaneously, the Joint Chiefs of Staff urged that billions of dollars' worth of military equipment should be hauled out of South Vietnam before it fell into Communist hands. It would have made the President look silly, however, to remove weapons while he was pushing for more military aid.

Therefore, American Ambassador Graham Martin blocked U.S. forces from salvaging an enormous arsenal, which the Communists have inherited. The irony is that the North Vietnamese now possess far more U.S. equipment than they ever received from their Russian and Chinese allies. This contradicts the administration line that Hanoi got more military assistance than did Saigon. # # #

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON STAR
2 MAY 1975

Mary McGrory

Israel Case Really Differs From Vietnam

By Mary McGrory
Washington Star Staff Writer

If the Israelis really believed the terrible accusations recently heard about our inconstancy as allies, they must be nervous.

The sources were the best, the President and the Secretary of State. In the frantic days when they were trying to deny the inevitable in South Vietnam, the two authorities practically told the world that America had lost its soul because it was unwilling to provide $722 million more aid to the dying client state in South Vietnam.

The President completely understood President Thieu's retreat and the flight of the troops. Our failure had "demoralized" them.

The Secretary of State depicted the imminent collapse as a "grievous blow" to our prestige and credibility.

"We cannot abandon friends in one part of the world without jeopardizing the security of friends everywhere," he said ominously.

ISRAEL, WHICH depends on us for survival, may have regarded all this as the irrational protests of officials trying to handle this nation's first defeat. Or they may have regarded it as a threat. The President has since retreated from Valhalla, and the Secretary of State declared that we are "fully committed to the survival of Israel."

The Israelis are under a cloud with the Secretary of State for their contribution to the failure of his personal diplomacy in the area. Although at the time he assured the Jewish leaders that he understood perfectly their refusal to accept a settlement without Egyptian guarantees of non-belligerency, he later "on background" deplored their inflexibility.

Point of View

Step-by-step diplomacy having failed, the next step is a conference of all parties at Geneva, with the U.S. and the Soviet Union at the head of the table.

The leader of the largest Israeli opposition coalition, Menahem Begin has been visiting here, and at a National Press Club speech went to great pains to point out that there is no resemblance, beyond a common reliance on the U.S. — now concluded in one case—between Israel and Vietnam. Usrael asks only for arms, not men.

THE DIFFERENCE had already been noted here. Richard Nixon used to complain about the "hypocrisy" of the Vietnam doves who were Israeli hawks, but they were never self-conscious about it. Israel is a democratic state, for one thing, and the U.S. commitment is not only moral, but emotional as well. The oil crisis did not seriously alter that perception although it complicated the equation.

Despite its failure to burnish Kissinger's reputation, Israel might be, in the end, the beneficiary of the setback in Vietnam. It could provide the first test of what Kissinger calls "the global perception of our will."

Both he and the President have been telling the Soviet Union not to conclude from their gains in Indochina that they can take advantage of us elsewhere. Israel could be used to refute their own claims of our untrustworthiness as an ally.

The new "abrasiveness" which Kissinger is alleged to believe should characterize our world stance in the post-Vietnam era could be demonstrated in behalf of Israel.

THE ISRAELIS, who argue a great deal among themselves in the way of democratic societies, are divided over the proposals they will take to Geneva. The Rabin Government has declared its willingness to abandon 1967 territorial gains in the Sinai and on the West Bank. The opposition according to Begin, is unwilling to give up the West Bank.

Congress, which is increasingly assertive about its foreign policy role, may press Kissinger for some statement of the U.S. position and intentions before the conference convenes. This goes against his grain, but secret personal diplomacy having taken its lumps in both the Middle East and the Far East, is increasingly in disrepute.

All sides may want to know where they are going before they start out.

Sen. George McGovern, (D-S.D.,) was told during his recent tour of Israel and the Arab states that "step-by-step" diplomacy didn't work because it required a step in the dark.

One Arab official told him, "You can't climb a ladder when there is no house to lean it against."

WASHINGTON POST 3 MAY 1975

Clayton Fritchey

Egypt: Guns and Butter?

In the process of reorganizing the Egyptian government, President Anwar Sadat has just vowed to stamp out corruption, check inflation and concentrate on prosperity and social justice for all—in keeping naturally with the doctrine of the late Gamal Abdel Nasser, his predecessor.

If only Sadat really meant this it would be the best news of the year, for it would signify that Egypt at last was about to put its long-postponed war against domestic poverty ahead of its war with Israel. But don't count on it.

As 23 years of bitter experience under the leadership of Nasser and Sadat have time and again shown, Egypt can't simultaneously whip both poverty and Israel. In fact, up to now, it hasn't been able to whip either one, although it has made four unsuccessful military efforts against Israel.

In contrast, no consistent, sustained effort has ever been made to win the war against poverty, which continues to blight the existence of the vast majority of Egyptians. Even with outside help, this poor underdeveloped country cannot possibly build a prosperous economy while at the same time building and maintaining an enormously costly military establishment.

It has been estimated that the overall military and economic cost of Egypt's long-continued state of belligerency against Israel exceeds $50 billion, an astronomical sum for a country that has been so chronically bankrupt that it has to live off handouts from much smaller but richer Arab nations.

In a remarkably frank interview with Philip Geyelin, editorial page editor of The Washington Post, President Sadat recently acknowledged that "we have spent $10 billion on our armed forces which should have been used for domestic purposes." Egypt, it should be noted, also owes Russia $7 billion more for arms.

Yet there is no evidence that Sadat is now prepared to take the necessary steps—and risks—to reverse Egypt's priorities by subordinating military expenditures to domestic development and reform.

It is a sad and depressing perversion of the socialist dreams that distinguished the Nasser revolution more than two decades ago but were sidetracked when Nasser became obsessed with personal dreams of glory as leader of the Arab world and leader of the crusade against Israel.

Nasser always promised guns and butter, but delivered only guns. With his death in 1970, and the advent of Sadat, fresh hopes were raised, for the new president, less vainglorious and more politically supple than his predecessor, looked for a while like a leader who was clever enough to produce the butter without losing the support of his generals and the backing of his Arab allies.

Nobody, it now appears, is that clever. Sadat of course, would like to enjoy arms from Russia, cash from Saudi Arabia, military co-ordination from Syria, real estate from Israel, goodwill and grants from the United States and deference from the Palestine Liberation Organization.

It's a balancing act that is probably beyond the skill of even a virtuoso tightrope walker like Sadat. He's still dancing around on the high wire, but the net had better be kept handy. To put it another way, it's going to be increasingly difficult for him to keep playing one interest off against another.

The coming Geneva conference on the Middle East could last a long time, particularly if the principals want to avoid a showdown, but it's a good bet that in the end Sadat will never put Egyptian peace and prosperity ahead of belligerence toward Israel if it means alienating his old Arab and Soviet patrons.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Weekend Edition -- 4 May 1975

WASHINGTON STAR 2 MAY 1975 (4)

Portugal's Election and Detente's Future

SMITH HEMPSTONE

The course of events in Portugal during the next six months will indicate just how serious the Soviet Union is about detente with the United States.

Last week, in their first free elections in 50 years, the Portuguese demonstrated conclusively — by a 4-1 majority — that they have not the slightest interest in coming under Communist rule.

In elections for a 247-member constituent assembly that will draw up a new constitution, Mario Soares' Socialist party picked up 38 percent of the vote, the center-left Popular Democratic party was a strong runner-up with more than 26 percent of the vote and the Communists, by far the richest and best-organized of Portugal's 12 legal parties, finished a distant third with less than 13 percent of the 5.5 million votes.

Despite all manner of harassment, the only mildly conservative party allowed to field candidates, the Social Democratic Center, received 7.5 percent of the vote. Three small Communist-front parties picked up a total of 6.4 percent.

Portugal's leftist military government, which a year ago ousted the right-wing dictatorship that had run the little Iberian nation for nearly half a century, did everything possible to discourage the electorate from taking the election seriously.

Early in March, leftist elements apparently provoked and then easily crushed an abortive anti-government coup, in the aftermath of which moderate elements were purged from the armed forces elective councils. Many moderate and conservative civilians also were jailed.

The Communist-dominated High Revolutionary Council, after banning conservative parties from the elections to the constitutent assembly, then forced all parties participating in the election to sign a pact giving the military the right to dictate the general lines of the new constitution, to retain ultimate power for a period of from three to five years and to choose the president, prime minister and defense and economic ministers.

Having created a heads-I-win, tails-you-lose situation, the radical military leaders then urged the voters to cast blank ballots as votes of no-confidence in all the parties. Precisely 7 percent of the ballots cast were found to be blank or spoiled.

Prime Minister Vasco Goncalves, a leftist general who is reported by some to be a clandestine member of the Communist party, told newsmen after the election that the results would not alter the government's drive to build a socialist state.

But — and this is where the Soviet Union comes in — the extent to which the Portuguese Communist party and its leftist allies are able to impose their will in contravention to that of the people will depend largely on the Kremlin.

The Portuguese party, which reportedly received more than $40 million from the Russians in the past year to finance its activities, is more subservient than most Western European Communist groups to the dictates of Moscow.

The United States, in the interest of detente, did not intervene in 1968 when the Soviet Union imposed its will on Czechoslovakia, a member of the Warsaw Pact. It is at least possible that the Kremlin will understand that it stands to lose more than it might gain by permitting the Portuguese Communist party and its allies to abrogate the will of the people of Portugal, a member of the NATO pact.

A Communist coup d'etat in Portugal or an attempt to rig or postpone the legislative elections scheduled within the next six months would prove conclusively that detente is but a cruel illusion.

WALL STREET JOURNAL 5 MAY 1975 (4)

Power Play in Portugal

By Bowen Northrup

LISBON—Ah, sweet victory. And how fleeting it can be.

Portugal's Socialist Party took a solid 38% of the vote in the April 25 election, and another more or less "centrist" party took 26%, while the Communists got a paltry 12.5%. It was a clear endorsement of moderation. Socialist style, and a rebuff for the Moscow-oriented Communists.

Alas, power in Portugal doesn't necessarily reside in the political parties, and the military men who are governing apparently don't feel bound to pay much heed to the voice of the voters. Within a week of the election, the Communists have scored several triumphs while the Socialists have been dealt some smarting blows.

In frustration thousands of Socialists marched through central Lisbon Friday night, shouting "Socialism yes, dictatorship no" and "The Socialist Party won." Watching warily were 300 heavily armed troops on trucks and armored cars—a force rarely seen even during the height of last month's heated electioneering demonstrations.

Most significant of the Communist moves was the announcement of the Armed Forces Movement (MFA) that official government endorsement was being given to the Communist-run trade union group called Intersindical. It is to be the country's only authorized trade union confederation.

Centralizing the trade unions has been in the offing for some time. Some kind of control was urgently needed; labor agitation since the "Revolution of the Flowers" a year ago has brought chaos to much of the economy.

Intersindical really was the only plausible claimant for the central role. The Socialists fought the concept of a single authorized confederation. But a government decree, issued on May Day to boot, confirmed the selection of the Communist group.

The Communists, naturally, have been grounded in worker support since the Portuguese Communist Party was founded in 1921. During the Fascist decades when the Communist Party went underground, party members moved into positions of power in the old state-organized unions.

The selection of Intersindical gives the well-organized Communists another powerful weapon. They already are strong in the printing unions, among bank clerks, and in other sectors; now they can hope to expand and consolidate, particularly among such unions as those in shipbuilding and steel that have been favoring unions to the left of the Communists.

Intersindical is bound to be a powerful tool for future political campaigns. Institutionalized, its role could be major in negotiating wage rates and working conditions and in speaking for the bulk of the nation's working people. Proportionately, Intersindical could hope to have more influence than the big Communist federations in Italy and France.

It all left the Socialist leadership, and the sizable bloc of Socialist workers, angry and frustrated, and the scornful treatment of Mario Soares, the Socialist leader, at a May Day rally only served to fan their frustration. The event seems to have been skillfully choreographed by the Communists.

Intersindical organized the rally, and the prime minister, Brig. Gen. Vasco dos Santos Goncalves, was on the platform with Communist leader Alvaro Cunhal, emphasizing that the government imprimatur was on the Communist group.

Socialist leader Soares, attempting to enter the rally with his entourage, was held up by Communist marshalls at the gate although several thousand Socialist workers already were inside the rally. Mr. Soares finally managed to work his way into the rally and exchanged hot words with the military leaders present. There were reports that he might be carpeted later for the episode.

Mr. Soares, who has ties with the Labor Party in Britain and West Germany's Social Democrats, has been in increasingly bad repute with leftist MFA leaders in any case. Prime Minister Goncalves has made sardonic remarks about the Socialist's European connections.

Mr. Soares has the right credentials. He was in exile for many years and received a hero's welcome when he came home after the revolution. "He is the Socialist Party," says a Lisbon observer. Mr. Soares may be the best known politician in the countryside.

But he faces formidable obstacles, not least among them the skillful maneuvering of Communist leader Cunhal (who once was his instructor at school). About two weeks ago Mr. Soares was asked about the extent of Communist influence in Portugal.

"It has been exaggerated," he said.

Will he soon be ready to revise that estimate? Mr. Cunhal (who has even better credentials, with more than a decade each in Salazar prisons and in exile) gives the impression of moving inexorably along a path that was charted carefully during all the years in the wilderness.

He follows adroitly the current Communist tactic of working within established parliamentary systems. The Communists have managed to make their programs seem almost indistinguishable from that of the government. This hasn't hurt Mr. Cunhal's standing with leading members of the military.

The Communist strategy functions smoothly on many levels, according to students of the party. For instance, one of the occupational groups they have courted most assiduously has been the bank clerks. Alliances with the lower middle class are favored and the bank clerks play a role in the financial institutions (now nationalized) that were a pillar of the old regime.

There also has been an effort to woo small businessmen, who are the bulwark of the economy and therefore a force to be reckoned with. And overall the party has sought to convey an image of moderation and respectability, playing down its Soviet connections and emphasizing its Portuguese nationalism.

The election results suggest that the electorate hasn't been swayed. But in a fluid situation like Portugal's there are other ways to power than through the ballot box. And there is time; Mr. Cunhal, having spent decades in waiting, isn't likely to spoil his chance by intemperate haste now.

Mr. Northrup is a member of the Journal's London bureau.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CURRENT NEWS

PART I - EARLY BIRD EDITION - 0730

PART II - MAIN EDITION - PUBLISHED AT 1130

THIS PUBLICATION IS PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL NEWS ITEMS OF INTEREST TO THEM IN THEIR OFFICIAL CAPACITIES; IT IS NOT INTENDED TO SUBSTITUTE FOR NEWSPAPERS, PERIODICALS AND BROADCASTS AS A MEANS OF KEEPING INFORMED ABOUT THE NATURE, MEANING AND IMPACT OF NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL NEWS DEVELOPMENTS. USE OF THESE ARTICLES HERE, OF COURSE, DOES NOT REFLECT OFFICIAL ENDORSEMENT. FURTHER REPRODUCTION FOR PRIVATE USE OR GAIN IS SUBJECT TO THE ORIGINAL COPYRIGHT RESTRICTIONS.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 7, 1975

WASHINGTON POST 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

U.S. Halts Plane Pullout in Thailand

By Bruce Palling
Special to The Washington Post

BANGKOK, May 6—The U.S. embassy here agreed today to a "temporary suspension" of the withdrawal American-supplied aircraft flown into Thailand last week by fleeing south Vietnamese pilots.

The agreement follows the removal of all of the more sophisticated jet fighters and cargo planes in the past two days to the carrier Midway in the Gulf of Siam and to Clark Air Base in the Philippines.

The U.S. embassy here has refused to disclose any details of the plane withdrawal even though the Pentagon announced the move yesterday in Washington.

Newsmen on a press tour of the Utapao Air Base today saw about 40 to 50 aircraft on the base which had presumably come from South Vietnam.

(See PULLOUT, Pg.4)

BALTIMORE SUN 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

Soviet held ready to offer missile cuts after talks

By MICHAEL PARKS
Moscow Bureau of The Sun

Moscow—The Soviet Union is offering to negotiate reductions in the numbers of missiles allowed under strategic arms agreements with the United States once a new arms treaty is concluded, according to sources here.

The Soviet offer apparently is intended to improve prospects for fast agreement and ratification of the next treaty, whose broad terms were set in November at the Vladivostok summit meeting.

As the Kremlin sees it, the Ford administration would be able to use a public Soviet commitment to reduce the two superpowers' arsenals in order to overcome extensive criticism in the U.S. to the limits agreed upon at the Far Eastern Soviet port.

What Moscow hopes to gain beyond reduced opposition to the new agreement and to Soviet-American detente in general is not clear, however; some diplomatic sources have suggested, though, that the Soviet Union is seeking U.S. concessions on several highly technical but important issues in current negotiations on a treaty implementing the Vladivostok agreement.

The Soviet offer meets a key U.S. demand, which was incorporated in negotiations, to begin immediately after the conclusion of the next arms agreement to set lower ceilings on the numbers of strategic weapons and to curb development of new weapons.

The sponsors of the resolution—Senators Edward M. Kennedy (D., Mass.), Walter F. Mondale (D., Minn.) and Charles McC. Mathias, Jr. (R.,

(See SOVIET, Pg. 4)

NEW YORK TIMES 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

Standing by Commitments, Ford Assures U.S. Allies

By JAMES M. NAUGHTON
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 6 — President Ford, declaring that the United States had learned the lessons of Vietnam, said tonight that he would pursue a vigorous leadership "on a worldwide basis."

He acknowledged, in a nationally televised news conference, that United States allies had doubts, following the loss of Cambodia and Vietnam to the Communists, about this country's commitments.

But he said such doubts were "not a reality" because the United States would remain strong militarily and economically.

"We want our friends to know that we will stand by them and we want any potential adversaries to know that we will stand up to them," Mr. Ford asserted.

He also pledged "forward movements in foreign policy that will be beneficial to peace," including efforts to strengthen United States ties to South Korea and to reassure such Asian allies as Nationalist China, Indonesia and the Philippines of continuing support.

The President said that the "atmosphere is good" for a strategic arms limitation agreement with the Soviet Union, although the negotiations would be "hard."

(See FORD, Pg. 2)

WASHINGTON POST
7 MAY 1975 Pg.1

Pentagon Budget Slashed

By Michael Getler
Washington Post Staff Writer

The House Armed Services Committee yesterday voted a record $3.7 billion cut in the Defense Department's $29.8 billion request for new weapons but Pentagon critics on the committee called much of the reduction "phony."

Included in the cuts is $1.3 billion the Pentagon wanted in the next fiscal year for military aid to South Vietnam.

Rep. Les Aspin (D-Wis.), one of a handful of members on the traditionally pro-Pentagon panel who frequently challenge defense programs, said the Vietnam aid request is now "a moot point and shouldn't be considered as part of the overall cut."

(See BUDGET, Pg. 2)

GENERAL NEWS SUMMARY

FROM THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

MAY 7, 1975

World-Wide

FORD ASKED AMERICANS to welcome refugees from Indochina.

The President told a news conference he is "very upset" at reports of resistance to the refugees. He said he understood economic misgivings about the influx but added that only 35,000 of the estimated 120,000 refugees are likely to seek jobs and noted that the AFL-CIO yesterday urged union members to welcome them. Ford said the lessons of Vietnam have already been learned and a congressional inquiry would be divisive.

The U.S. will continue to be involved in Asia and will keep its commitments to Taiwan, the President said.

Ford reaffirmed his intention to run for the presidency in 1976 and said a GOP group led by Dean Burch will begin work on his campaign "in a very informal way." He said he thought Republican foreign achievements since 1968 and an expected economic upturn give him a good chance of winning.

Ford opposed registration of guns or their owners and said he isn't committed to

(See NEWS SUMMARY, Pg. 5)

JAMES KILLINGBECK, CHIEF, CURRENT NEWS BRANCH, OX 78765 HELEN YOUNG, ASSISTANT CHIEF

FOR SPECIAL RESEARCH SERVICES OR DISTRIBUTION CALL HARRY ZUBKOFF, CHIEF, EXECUTIVE AGENCY SERVICE, OX 52884

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK TIMES
7 MAY 1975 Pg. 30

President Assures Congress on Curbs For Nuclear Arms

WASHINGTON, May 6 (AP)—President Ford assured Congress today that his Administration was giving "priority concern" to preventing the proliferation of nuclear weapons or the acquisition of nuclear explosive material for possible nonpeaceful uses.

In a message to Congress, the President said, "Whatever efforts are needed to allow the United States and other countries to enjoy the benefits of nuclear power, without fear, will be taken by the Government of the United States."

Mr. Ford said the United States was taking the lead in proposing measures to prevent terrorist groups from capturing or sabotaging nuclear materials and facilities.

The President included with his message a report on United States laws and regulations governing nuclear exports and safeguards.

"Current laws provide ample authority to control the export and re-export of nuclear-related material, equipment and technology," Mr. Ford said.

But, he said, existing policies and regulations were constantly being reviewed and "changed as appropriate" to make them more effective.

He also said the United States was encouraging the strengthening of international safeguards through participation in international discussions and through the adoption of an internation l agreement.

FORD ... CONTINUED

The President declined at the outset to entertain the suggestion that a Congressional inquiry might somehow determine where the policy of five Presidents and six congresses had erred in Indochina. And he urged the nation to look ahead rather than back as it began the post-Vietnam era.

"It sees to e that it's over," Mr. Ford said of the Vietnam experience.

He said that the war had been "sad and tragic in many respects" and that it would merely foster continued divisiveness to "rehash allegations as to individuals that might be to blame, or administrations that might be at fault."

"I think the lessons of the past in Vietnam have already been learned," Mr. Ford declared "Learned by Presidents, learned by Congress, learned by the American people, and we should have our focus on the future."

The news conference, in the spacious theater in the Executive Office Building next to the White House, was Mr. Ford's first since the fall of Phnom Penh on April 17 and the surrender of Saigon Last Wednesday. As a result it was dominated by the causes and consequences of the two events, which Mr. Ford said last week "closes a chapter in the American experience."

The President, evidently pursuing domestic unity as a prelude to efforts at strengthening United States diplomacy, had set the tone for his appearance tonight by proposing that "reconciliation, not recrimination" be the theme of the post-Vietnam era.

The President was said to believe that if he did not rally Americans behind his policies allies and potential foreign opponents might conclude that the political instability that has marked the last decade in the United States was likely to continue.

At his last full-dress news conference, on April 3 in San Diego, Mr. Ford noted the refusal of Congress to supply military assistance to South Vietnam and Cambodia and said it was "up to the American people to pass judgment on who was at fault and where the blame may rest" if those two nations should fall.

More recently, however, the President has led the Administration away from such suggestions. Secretary of State Kissinger told a Washington audience that the Congressional verdict on military aid would be accepted "without recrimination or vindictiveness."

And Mr. Ford, in a speech at Tulane university in New Orleans on April 23, proposed "a great national reconciliation." The time has arrived, he said, "to look forward to an agenda for the future, to unity, to binding up the nation's wounds and restoring it to health and optimistic self-confidence."

To Confer With Premiers

The President will begin specific discussions on diplomatic relations tomorrow in a series of private meetings here with Prime Ministers Harold Wilson of Britain, Gough Whitlam of Australia and Wallace E. Rowling of New Zealand. On Thursday, he will confer with Prime Minister Lee Kwan Yew of Singapore.

Later this month Mr. Ford will embark on a European trip, his first as President, during which he will meet with Western leaders at a conference of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in Brussels. He will later to Spain, Austria and Italy, and confer during the trip with President Anwar El-Sadat of Egypt.

Mr. Ford will meet her next month with Premier Yitzhak Rabin of Israel.

BUDGET ... CONTINUED

Another $1 billion was trimmed from the Navy's shipbuilding program, but no ship projects were actually cut back. The committee instead voted to defer a Navy request for money to cover anticipated contract claims and inflation on ships under construction.

"We're going to have to come up with that money and maybe more next year," Aspin said. "They just put it off, not cut it."

According to Aspin's arithmetic, the actual cuts in the panel's annual weapons procurement and research and development authorization bill amount to about $1.3 billion, not $3.7 billion.

The committee gave its full support to the $749 million Air Force request for its top priority B-1 bomber development project, and made a $45 million cut in the Navy's $2 billion request for its top-priority Trident missile-firing submarine.

The panel cut $260 million from Air Force plans to build a fleet of new radar-packed aircraft known as AWACS intended to warn of enemy air attack. The reductions limit the Air Force to the purchase of three rather than six planes next year.

The panel trimmed $185 million from another new plane the Air Force and White House want as a new airborne command post for the President in a nuclear emergency. The reduction keeps the project in development rather than allowing it to move into production.

The House committee—as in previous years—inserted an extra $115 million in the Defense budget to buy 24 more Texas-built A-7D attack planes for the National Guard. The Pentagon did not request these craft.

The House panel also denied a $300 million request by the Pentagon to set up a new fund that would allow quick replacement of weapons taken out of stockpiles for overseas sales.

In the Senate, the Pentagon also appeared to be avoiding, at least at this point, the major slashes in new weapons projects that some defense officials feared would be forthcoming from a new and more liberal Congress.

The Senate Armed Services Committee, meeting behind closed doors, voted 11 to 4 to approve five projects intended to improve the accuracy and lethality of long-range U.S. missiles

In so doing the full committee overturned an earlier 3-to-2 vote by a subcommittee to kill these projects, which some critics say could stir up the arms race by threatening to knockout an opposing missile force in a surprise first strike.

The Senate panel, it was learned, also voted 9-to-6 to cut $222 million out of the B-1 project. But this reduction continues the B-1 in development and cuts out only the funds related to tooling up for actual production. The decision on whether to mass-produce the new plane is not scheduled to be made until November, 1976.

Because the government is moving toward a fiscal year that will eventually begin annually on Oct. 1, this year's budget request includes both the 12-month period from July 1, 1975 and an additional three-month transition period running from uly 1, 1976, to Oct. 1, 1976.

Thus, in the house committee action yesterday, a total of $1.7 billion was cut from the new authorization request of $28.2 billion for the 12 months of fiscal 1976. The Vietnam money and $300 million stockpile fund brought the total fiscal '76 request to $29.8 billion.

In addition, $390 million was trimmed from the $5.8 billion requested for new weapons procurement and development for the three-month transition period.

Aside from its fiscal actions, the House committee also tabled an amendment that would allow women to enter military academies and go into combat. Rep. Sam Stratton (D-NY) said he would take his academies campaign to the House floor but would probably drop the combat provision.

NEW YORK TIMES
7 MAY 1975 Pg. 67

Army on Airwaves

The Army, which like the other branches of the Armed forces is forbidden to use paid full-time advertising in recruiting, this week started its second test of the airwaves. Its a small one—$600,000 for 13 weeks on radio in 15 markets—and its being done by N. W. Ayer ABH International. The first test, in 1971, used both TV and radio by all accounts was very successful.

WASHINGTON POST
7 MAY 1975 Pg. 46

Spain Said to Want NATO Membership

According to an authoritative source in Washington, the Spanish government remains very much interested in NATO membership but recognizes that it continues to be unobtainable because of opposition from Denmark, Norway, Belgium, and to some extent, the Netherlands.

Spain wanted a firm bilateral defense guarantee from the United States but Washington balked at that, an American source said. The United States preference, is to obtain for Spain a direct NATO acknowledgment that U.S. access to bases in Spain contributes to NATO defense. This is the present focus of discussions, it was said.

It is questionable whether this can be arranged in time to be added to the NATO communique to be issued at the end of the forthcoming NATO summit conference in Brussels, however.

Events in Portugal are said to have underscored the importance of Spain to Western defense in the American perception. American diplomats have been telling their Spanish counterparts that European attitudes in time are likely to become more syimpathetic to Spanish participation in NATO.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON POST - 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 46

Ford, Franco Seek to Heal Rift on Bases

By Miguel Acoca
Special to The Washington Post

MADRID, May 6—Wide differences between Washington and Madrid over continuation of U.S. military bases in Spain will be the key topic when President Ford visits here late this month for talks with Generalissimo Francisco Franco, informed sources said today.

While Spain is anxious to continue its military relationship with the United States, "We are not in the mood for just another piece of paper," a senior Spanish official said.

The Spanish bases are considered vital to the Western defense system particularly the U.S. nuclear submarine base at Rota in Southern Spain.

Pro-Arab Spain, however, has steadfastly refused to allow American use of the bases here to resupply Israel. It does not recognize Israel and there are no indications Spain intends to change its policy.

The hardened Spanish positions has become clear after four months of negotiations here and in Washington. The two countries, sources said, are far apart on the following:

- Continued American use of Torrejon, the big joint U.S.-Spain base in Madrid's suburbs. Spain also wants the Americans to giving up the mothballed Moron Air Base.
- A mutual security treaty.
- Modern military hardware for the Spanish armed forces.
- Contracts to manufacture U.S. weapons and components in Spain under licensing arrangements.

Coloring official Spanish attitudes toward the U.S. and a new agreement on the bases are such related matters as U.S. support of Morocco in its dispute with Spain over the Spanish Sahara and U.S. refusal to back Spain's case against Britain for the return of Gibraltar.

Franco, who at 82 sees his 36 years of authoritarian rule coming to a close, presumably would like to see these problems settled with American help before he fades from the scene.

Another thorny issue involves American strategy to link Spain to NATO. Spain has been excluded from the alliance because of Franco's association with the Axis powers in World War II.

Reflecting the view of the Spanish military, the air minister has declared publicly that Spain is not interested in joining NATO. The military also resent U.S. efforts to structure a "backdoor" NATO association for Spain through a joint declaration signed last summer. It said that the bilateral defense relationship "is complementary to that of existing security arrangements in the Atlantic framework and that equal treatment should be accorded to all the countries of the region."

Franco and the Spanish military were reportedly outraged by a recent U. S. weapons sale to Morocco, which is seeking to annex the phosphate-rich Spanish Sahara territory in northwest Africa and to oust Spain from two enclaves in Morocco.

Spanish officials are said to feel that the United States must recognize that Spain has been a faithful ally and that the bilateral relationship must be sharply upgraded to reflect present power realities in Europe and the Mediterranean.

It is felt that this is especially necessary following the U.S. setbacks in Indochina and political changes in Greece, Turkey and Portugal affecting the American military presence.

Franco invited President Ford upon learning that negotiations were proceeding so badly that they might not be finished by September, when the present agreement expires. He made it clear that, while he is eager to conclude a new bases agreement, any new accord must be rewarding not only politically but economically.

Spanish thinking has also been affected by the left-wing military government in neighboring Portugal. Spanish officials fear that if the worst predictions of Secretary of State Henry Kissinger come to pass and Portugal becomes a Communist-dominated country, Spain will become a target for subversion and guerrilla activities from Portugal, and they want guarantees of U.S. help.

Although Spain remains a politically restricted society, Spanish negotiators are conscious that Spanish public opinion is opposed to foreign military bases here. A newspaper yesterday criticized what it called plans to expand the joint Spanish-American air base at Zaragoza, which would become the main air facility if Torrejon is abandoned.

See RIFT, Pg. 4

BALTIMORE SUN - 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

House panel trims little from Ford military bid

By CHARLES W. CORDDRY
Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—The House Armed Services Committee approved yesterday a $32 billion military procurement bill —$3.7 billion less than President Ford asked—after sidelining a proposal to let women attend the service academies and become combat officers.

At the same time, the Senate Armed Services Committee dealt the Pentagon a sharp blow by striking from its version of the bill a $222 million sum requested to make preparations for production of the B-1 supersonic bomber.

The Senate panel left intact $726 million to continue research and development with four prototypes of the B-1, but its action on the advance production funds reflected increasing congressional concern about the prospective production cost—more than $80 million a plane—of the bomber.

In its action on the bill, in which it made no cuts in B-1 funds, the House reduced the administration's requests considerably less than the nominal $3.7 billion cut indicated.

For example, the cut included $1.3 billion that had been sought for military aid to South Vietnam, a matter now academic. Another $300 million that was disallowed would have been used to stockpile weapons for sales abroad.

A slash of about $1 billion in ship construction requests was mainly a cut in expected escalation of costs—in money, that is, that would not be spent until later years. The committee said it could not accept the Pentagon's escalation estimates at this time.

The House and Senate panels' proposals are for a 15-month period starting July 1 —instead of the usual 12 months—because the government next year is shifting the beginning of fiscal years to October 1. The Senate committee has not yet completed action on its version.

Representative Samuel S. Stratton (D., N.Y.), who tried unsuccessfully in the committee to win entry to the service academies for women, said he planned to take the battle to the House floor.

On a motion by Representative Lucien N. Nedzi (D., Mich.), who heads a manpower subcommittee, the Stratton proposal was tabled, 24 to 22. The Maryland committee member, Marjorie S. Holt (R., 4th) voted with Mr Nedzi, who said there were issues other than sex discrimination, such as suits to establish quotas, that might have to be faced.

Mr. Stratton said the idea of combat conjures up pictures of women in foxholes, but that, in fact, they could serve in such roles as ship's officers and pilot instructors after leaving Annapolis, West Point or Colorado Springs.

Mr. Stratton told a reporter the General Accounting Office has made a study showing as many as 10 per cent of academy graduates do not get combat assignments anyway. He hopes to get a measure passed that will admit women to the academies and then let the controversy over combat duty be resolved at another time.

The annual procurement measure fixes ceilings on sums the services may spend on weapons research, development and production and military manpower. Except for certain increases in Army and Navy reserve strength (about 32,000 in all), the House committee approved Pentagon manpower proposals.

The panel voted for a 5 per cent limit on military pay raises for the January 1, 1975-June 30, 1976 period, provided that a similar kept on civilian raises in the federal establishment. It said that limit would save $828 million in 12 months, whereas a prospective 9 per cent increase would have added more than $2 billion to defense costs. Its net saving was arrived at after taking account of its ruling that proposed increases in military commissary prices be suspended.

The House committee shaved requests for several weapons systems, but in one case—A-7 attack planes for the National Guard—it added $115 million.

Originally yesterday, the Senate committee voted a $338 million cut in the B-1 request. On a motion of Senator Robert A. Taft, Jr. (R., Ohio), it restored $116 million by a 9-to-6 vote.

The Air Force had wanted the advance production money to buy materials and save time if it decided next year that the B-1 should go into production. Opponents argue that such action might have committed Congress prematurely to production.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON POST - 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 43

U.S., Soviets Back Nuclear Pact Again

GENEVA—In a message to the 60-nation conference reviewing the five-year-old nuclear nonproliferation President Ford said yesterday that support for it "is a major tenet of American policy."

The Soviet Union also reaffirmed support for the treaty but the Mexican delegate accused the two major nuclear powers that signed it of dragging their feet on disarmament.

U.S. delegate Fred C. Ikle said that "we have to concern ourselves seriously with the threat of theft and other criminal seizure of nuclear materialm" The Soviet representative also called for international measures to prevent nuclear thefts by criminals and terrorists.

SOVIET ... CONTINUED

Md.)—said their support of any new treaty would depend on acceptance of this condition.

Soviet negotiators at the Geneva talks, which are due to recess shortly, made the Kremlin offer, according to sources here, and it is now being conveyed to congressmen and others outside the administration who are interested in strategic arms limitations.

Over the past weekend, a leading Soviet specialist on American affairs, Georgy Arbatov, said in a Radio Moscow broadcast to the United States that conclusion of the treaty agreed upon at Vladivostok will make it possible "to effect a transition from arms limitation to their reduction."

Dr. Arbatov, director of the Institute for U.S. and Canadian Studies and a Kremlin adviser on foreign affairs, endorsed the resolution proposed by Mr. Kennedy, Mr Mondale and Mr. Mathias as "a very realistic approach to the problem."

Moscow is willing to make this pledge to negotiate reduced ceilings on strategic weapons, multiple warhead missiles and new weapons systems explicitly when the next treaty is concluded, sources here said, if necessary to insure congressional ratification of the pact without full-scale controversy.

Moscow is concerned that Soviet-American rapprochement might be endangered if the treaty is widely criticized.

"What would be very damaging to detente would be a repetition of the trade agreement affair," a Soviet source said, referring to the collapse of the 1972 trade agreement after Congress severely restricted Soviet-American trade terms to force increased emigration of Soviet Jews in a move Moscow interpreted as aimed primarily at undermining detente.

Dr. Arbatov's comments, putting on the record what is being said privately, were viewed as significant because of their timing just before a recess in the Geneva talks for consultations.

But Dr. Arbatov was reported to be speaking not only on behalf of these circles, often described as the doves in distinction to the Kremlin's military and ideological hawks, but on behalf of the whole Soviet leadership following a meeting two weeks ago of the Communist party's policy-making central committee.

That meeting firmly supported the Vladivostok agreement. The party leadership declared firmly that "political detente must be supplemented by the relaxation of tension in the military field and used for the reduction of armaments and the struggle for disarmament."

Presumably, the central committee overrode objections not only to the Vladivostok agreement—the meeting was followed by calls in Pravda, the party newspaper, to follow the party's foreign policy line—but also approved the proposed follow-up negotiations for the affirmation of the need for reductions in arms levels as an unexpected note of the committee resolution.

WASH. POST 5/7/75

By Jack Anderson and Les Whitten

Washington Whirl—President Ford has told subordinates that he will press Congress for a full $100 billion military budget, as evidence to the world that the United States isn't planning any more pullbacks . . . Before Congress votes more military money, some legislators intend to ask tough questions about the billions worth of equipment abandoned in South Vietnam. . .

RIFT -- CONTINUED

Recently a member of the rubber-stamp Parliament presented a plea asking the government to evict the United States from all the bases.

Ford will be arriving in Spain at a time of widespread speculation that Franco is preparing to yield power to Prince Juan Carlos de Borbon, 37, his designated successor. Reports that Franco's retirement is imminent have even slipped into the controlled Spanish press. Important establishment personalities have gone so far as to write articles suggesting Franco's retirement.

PULLOUT ... CONT'D

Sources on the base said that about 20 aircraft were carried from Utapao to the Midway by giant helicopters Sunday and Monday. At least two aircraft were reported seriously damaged when they fell from the helicopters—one on the Utapao runaway and one on the Midway.

The aircraft already removed include F-5 jet fighters, A-37 jet fighter-bombers and also C-130 cargo planes which were reported to have been flown direct to the Philippines.

The Thai government's request for a suspension followed contradictory statements by various members of the Cabinet, with some declaring that the affair was solely an American problem while others considered that the aircraft should be held by Thailand until the government decided their fate.

Hanoi radio has claimed that the aircraft are the property of the Provisional Revolutionary Government of South Vietnam and warned Thailand that any hesitancy about returning the planes could jeopardize relations between the two Vietnams and Thailand.

Thai Foreign Minister, Chatichai Choonhavan called the acting American ambassader, Edward Masters, in for a 25-minute talk on the matter today. Masters refused to answer any questions after the meeting.

Observers here consider it impossible that Thai military authorities did not know that the United States was taking the planes out of Thailand.

However, the armed forces are considered opposed to giving the aircraft to the Provisional Revolutionary Government. They are known to view the two Vietnams as posing the greatest military threat to Thailand. Additionally, the military leaders would be extremely reluctant to commit any hostile act towards the United States out of concern that U.S. military assistance program to Thailand be maintained at a high level.

Cynics say that the present situation is the best possible one for Thailand, with all of the sophisticated aircraft already gone and the Thai government now taking a "tough stand" to give the impression of surprise and anger at the unilateral action taken by the Americans.

There are, however, government officials who are genuinely angry at the United States for taking such action apparently without formal consultation.

To avoid the risky move of returning the other aircraft to South Vietnam, Prime Minister Kukrit Pramoj said the remaining aircraft will stay in Thai custody until peace and order have returned to South Vietnam and the ownership question can be determined.

Foreign Minister Chatichai has also asked to see the United States and South Vietnamese agreement on military aid, saying that if there is an agreement about the title reverting to the United States Thailand would not interfere. Chatichai also requested that a delegation from the Provisional Revolutionary Government come to Bangkok to negotiate the return of the aircraft and other military supplies brought in by fleeing Saigon government forces.

Such contradictory statements highlight the dilemma in which the Thai government now finds itself, in its efforts to be accomodating to both sides.

[Foreign Ministry sources said today that a five-member North Korean delegation will fly to Bangkok Wednesday for talks on establishing diplomatic relations, AFP reported from Bangkok.]

NEW YORK TIMES
7 MAY 1975
Pg. 22

U.S. SHIP WITH 200 REACHES SUBIC BAY

SUBIC BAY NAVAL STATION, The Philippines, May 6 (Reuters)—The Stoddert, last of 46 American Evacuation ships to leave South Vietnamese costal waters, reached the Subic Bay Naval Base today with 200 South Vietnamese refugees, 19 of whom had been rescued from a sinking boat.

The Stoddert, a guided missile destroyer, was expected to be followed into port by five other ships carrying more than 5,000 people.

The ships include a chartered South Korean ship and two South Vietnamese vessels.

A Subic Bay spokesman said that more than 40,000 refugees had been funneled through here in the last four days. Most were flown out in transport planes, to Guam to be processed for entry to the United States.

WASHINGTON POST
7 MAY 1975
Pg. 48

Japan-China Pact

Agence France-Presse

TOKYO, May 6—Japan and China exchanged verbal notes in Peking today on their intergovernmental shipping agreement, clearing the way for its implementation starting June 4.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WEDNESDAY MORNING, 7 MAY 1975

WASHINGTON STAR - 6 MAY 1975(7) Pg. 11

Schlesinger Reinforces View of CIA Role as Passive

By Jeremiah O'Leary
Washington Star Staff Writer

The finality of Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger's declaration that the CIA has never resorted to assassination could be construed as reinforcing the contention of administration sources that the agency discussed and knew about political murder plots but never was involved in a successful one.

Schlesinger made his statement late yesterday after testifying before the Rockefeller commission investigating illegal domestic activities of the CIA.

He emerged from his closed-door appearance and, unlike some former CIA officials, appeared almost eager to set the record straight. He said, "Let me make it very clear now that assassination has not been used as a tool by the CIA at any time, and I don't think that applies prospectively any more than it does retrospectively."

THE FORMER CIA director was even more emphatic in denying CIA involvement in the slaying of President John F. Kennedy.

"The suggestion of any CIA involvement is preposterous," Schlesinger said. "It is psychologically and intellectually impossible that the CIA could in any way be involved in the tragic event."

Analysis

He said any such suggestions could only emanate from sick imaginations. The agency's whole role, he said, has been to serve and protect the United States and its leaders.

Schlesinger refused to comment directly on reports of CIA involvement in plots to assassinate foreign leaders, but he said appropriate review bodies such as the Rockefeller commission and the congressional committees will want to review those issues.

THE SUM of Schlesinger's declarations are strongly supportive of statements to The Star by White House and CIA officials that the agency knew of, and even discussed, political murder but never was involved in a successful one.

This leaves open the implication that the CIA may have had direct involvement in plots for political murder that did not succeed — for example, perhaps plots against Fidel Castro, whose death was certainly desired by many Cubans. It is even more suggestive that the CIA knew of such plots but was not directly involved.

Commission officials said yesterday that the group, appointed by President Ford and headed by Vice President Nelson A. Rockefeller, is nearing the end of the labors it began last February. The hearings will be completed Monday, and then the commission will begin writing its report and recommendations for the President.

THE REPORT is to be handed to Ford on June 4 and will be released publicly soon after that. At that stage, the Senate Intelligence Committee, headed by Sen. Frank Church, D-Idaho, will commence its hearings into the activities of all American intelligence agencies. Its House counterpart is almost totally dormant.

Also testifying yesterday was Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger. He denied having any knowledge or involvement in either alleged CIA domestic spying or foreign assassination plots.

"Since I have been in Washington, the National Security Council or the NSC staff, or the assistant to the president for national security affairs (Kissinger's other title) did not concern themselves with domestic intelligence; nor were they informed about domestic intelligence," Kissinger declared.

Asked about allegations of CIA assassination plots, Kissinger said none of those allegations pertain to the period of his service in Washington from 1968 until the present.

ANOTHER WITNESS yesterday, former CIA Director John A. McCone (1961-1965) said, "During my term of office, there was no, absolutely no assassination plot against Castro or any other foreign leader.

McCone said such plots were not consistent with the moral values of the United States or the CIA.

NEWS SUMMARY -- CONTINUED

Attorney General Levi's proposal for a handgun ban in high-crime areas. Ford said his coming meetings with Egyptian and Israeli leaders won't be part of any new U.S. negotiating effort in the Mideast.

* * *

A WEAPONS BUDGET $3.7 billion below Ford's request cleared a House panel.

Besides eliminating a $1.3 billion budget request for military aid to South Vietnam, the House Armed Services Committee reduced by $260 million the authorization for Boeing's AWACS early-warning plane and cut $186 million of procurement money for the flying command post that U.S. officials would use during a nuclear attack. The total authorization approved for July 1, 1975, through Sept. 30, 1976, was $26.1 billion.

That could be cut further on the House floor or when appropriations are voted. But the sentiment for defense cutbacks is being cooled by unemployment and the fall of two U.S. allies in Indochina.

The House panel tabled an amendment that would have let women enter military service academies and go into combat.

The Senate Armed Services Committee voted to cut $222 million in production-related money for the B1 bomber in fiscal 1976 and the following three months.

* * *

The U.S. removed from Thailand at least 25 of the estimated 125 warplanes flown there last week by fleeing South Vietnamese pilots. But then the removal was suspended in response to a request from the Thai government, which wants to evaluate U.S. claims to the planes. Vietnamese Communists have demanded that Thailand send them the planes.

* * *

Jordan's King Hussein said the Arab states are willing to make a final peace with Israel recognizing its right to exist on condition that Israel vacate all occupied territory and "recognize the legitimate rights of the Palestinians in their homeland."

* * *

Secretary of State Kissinger said that the U.S. "definitely isn't tilting toward the Arabs" and that "fairly large quantities" of arms have been shipped to Israel in the past month. It probably was a mistake, he said earlier in an NBC interview, to have made Vietnam a test case for U.S. policy.

* * *

Home-mortgage lenders reject almost twice as many applications from minorities as they do from whites, a Federal Reserve Board study of six metropolitan areas indicated. But the 1974 data aren't sufficient to determine that discrimination exists, the Fed said.

A bill to bar discrimination on the basis of age, race, religion or national origin in granting credit was passed unanimously by the House Banking Committee.

* * *

State and local governments plan to increase taxes $3.6 billion this year while reducing construction spending $1 billion and expenditures for services $3.3 billion, a congressional survey made public by Rep. William Moorhead (D., Pa.) indicated. Nearly half of state and local governments are cutting payrolls, eliminating about 140,000 jobs.

* * *

San Francisco anesthesiologists' strike to protest soaring malpractice-insurance rates spread to Los Angeles and San Diego, where a dozen hospitals were forced to cancel all but emergency surgery.

* * *

Mexico attacked the nuclear disarmament policies of the U.S. and Russia at a 56-nation Geneva conference that is reviewing the five-year-old treaty banning the spread of atomic weapons. But U.S. support for the treaty was reaffirmed in a message from President Ford.

* * *

A dozen tornadoes struck eastern Nebraska, killing at least two persons in Omaha and injuring scores more. Gov. James Exon mobilized the National Guard.

* * *

The nomination of Lt. Gen. Louis H. Wilson Jr. as Marine Corps commandant was approved by the Senate Armed Services Committee.

* * *

A Commonwealth of Nations summit meeting ended in Kingston, Jamaica, with presidents, premiers or chief delegates of 34 former British colonies warning of a race war in Rhodesia unless the majority blacks there are allowed to enter the government.

* * *

Sen. George McGovern (D., S.D.) called for an end to the U.S. trade boycott against Cuba as he arrived in Havana for an "educational" visit.

* * *

Saudi Arabia banned contraceptives after the World Moslem League ruled that birth control violates Islamic law.

* * *

Died: Joseph Cardinal Mindszenty, 83, former primate of the Roman Catholic Church in Hungary who was convicted of treason in a Communist trial in 1949, and later spent 15 years in asylum in the U.S. embassy in Budapest, in Vienna, of a heart attack following surgery; J. G. Underwood, 80, president and chief executive officer of Harsco Corp., in Harrisburg, Pa.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 19

Canada's air defense commitment

To stick with U.S.— but for how long?

By Don Sellar
Special to
The Christian Science Monitor

Ottawa

This week Canada is expected to renew its participation in the 18-year-old North American Air Defense Command (NORAD) agreement with the United States for at least five more years.

Defense Minister James Richardson, an enthusiastic NORAD supporter, will announce the decision to continue sharing with the U.S. in continental defense sometime before the current pact expires May 12.

The only uncertainty surrounding the new NORAD arrangement is the length of Canada's commitment. Mr. Richarson favors an unlimited term, but has been under pressure to opt for a five-year package.

A Parliamentary committee, dominated by members of the ruling Liberal Party, recently did some deep soul-searching about NORAD and concluded another review after five years would be in order.

Cabinet must decide

However, the cabinet, led by Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, will make the final judgment on the matter. If it decides on an indefinite term, Canada would want the option to withdraw on one year's notice.

NORAD, a sophisticated surveillnce system, currently costs about $1.4 billion a year to operate. The U.S. foots the bill for 90 percent of the command, whose headquarters are at Colorado Springs, Colorado.

Only once since NORAD was formed did Canada not sign a minimum five-year deal. That was in 1973, when the Trudeau Government, then a minority in Parliament, angered some American officials by settling on a two-year term which is now expiring.

Some of NORAD's critics have described the $140 million Canadian component of the system as a waste of money, although its proponents reply that an all-Canadian defense system would cost a great deal more than that.

Military picture changed

There is also the military-strategic argument which contends NORAD was designed to counter a Soviet manned bomber attack — a threat seen now as minimal at best.

But NORAD planners already have recognized the validity of that criticism, to some extent, by reducing the number of interceptor aircraft in the system to 500 from 2,000. At the same time, they have upgraded NORAD communications and tracking systems, and broadened its role.

Another line of attack against NORAD is the political-ideological argument which holds that Canada relinquishes its sovereignty by participating. At present, Americans are responsible for NORAD flights across vast tracts of Canadian landscape.

Canada has only one regional control center, at North Bay, Ontario, but this base is charged with responsibility for watching over part of the northeast U.S.

Edmonton base planned

The sovereignty argument against NORAD, however, may diminish further in the next two or three years, when Canada assumes responsibility for its own air space.

Last week, as a prelude to the renewal of NORAD, Mr. Richardson announced construction of a second Canadian regional base, at Edmonton, Alberta.

This $25 million installation will cover western Canadian air space previously handled from an American one. Under the new zone format, North Bay will assume responsibility for eastern Canadian air space and relinquish its role in the northeast U.S.

Defense Department sources in Ottawa say it could take two years or more before all the NORAD zones of responsibility are redrawn and the new Canadian installation at Edmonton is operational.

Had Canada failed to continue its NORAD obligations, officials here admit relations with the U.S. would have been dealt a stunning psychological blow.

But such a change in attitude by the Trudeau government would be startling, since only four years ago it declared the defense of North America to be its No. 2 priority in defense, behind only that of Canadian territory itself.

WALL STREET JOURNAL
7 MAY 1975 Pg. 24

Suit To Bar Vietnamese Asks Environment Data

Special to THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

SAN FRANCISCO—A federal district judge will hear a request today that no more South Vietnamese citizens be given refuge in the U.S. until an environmental impact statement is filed.

The suit was filed by Delta Citizens Group and James Shanks and William Shauer, two Sacramento businessmen, against Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, the Interior and Defense Department secretaries, and against the Immigration and Naturalization Service. It was transferred here from Sacramento.

The suit notes that an estimated 50,000 to 75,000 refugees will be immigrating with State Department help of up to $500 million. The suit says, "this is a major federal action with extensive national and local consequences," requiring an environmental impact statement under the National Environmental Policy Act.

It says the refugee program is a "monumental undertaking," with considerable consequences on U.S. citizens and that incoming refugees haven't been fully screened for communicable and contagious diseases.

The suit asks federal Judge Spencer Williams to issue a temporary restraining order that would halt any further entrance of South Vietnamese citizens into the U.S. and also halt further issuance of immigration permits to them.

NEW YORK TIMES 7 MAY 1975 Pg. 23

SAIGON SAYS CITY IS NORMAL AGAIN

HONG KONG, Wednesday, May 7 (Agence France-Presse) —The Saigon radio said yesterday that life had returned to normal in the South Vietnamese capital, with telephone lines functioning as before and well-stocked markets crowded with shoppers.

Thousands of Saigonese who had fled the city last week when the Communists took over were now said to be returning by bus.

Meanwhile, preparations were reported under way to celebrate the victory of the revolution.

Teachers belonging to patriotic associations were asked to meet yesterday afternoon to arrange a reception at which civilian and military leaders would presumably be presented to the people. Students were scheduled to meet last night.

It appeared that the celebration might be held some time today, one week after the city was surrendered to the Communists.

The radio said workers were busy at their jobs, noting that this was especially the case at the Sicovina textile factory, which has 1,000 employes.

Saigon bookstore owners were said to have tossed out all books that were regarded as useless or offensive.

Television Resumes

Among the indications that life had returned to normal, the radio said, was that a television station in the capital resumed operation Friday. In addition, an official newspaper published its first issue last Sunday.

A new administrative and moral order was reportedly being established in Saigon through the mobilization of volunteers, divided into several groups.

Medical aid was reported being handled by a group of 100 people, among them doctors and nurses.

Two groups of 50 volunteers each were said to be responsible for public order, while 120 people, divided into 17 teams, wearing civilian clothes and red armbands and carrying guns, were reported directing traffic.

The radio also mentioned a weapons reception group, staffed by 23 volunteers. They were said to have collected or requisitioned 4,323 guns of all kinds and undetermined quantities of grenades and ammunition.

Still another group of volunteers was said to be assigned to the distribution of revolutionary propaganda.

For the first time mention was made in a Vietnamese Communist broadcast of activities of Western journalists still in the city. They were said to have been present at Tan Son Nhut airport Friday to watch the first plane with the insignia of the Revolutionary Government to land there.

However, Western newsmen who last filed dispatches from Saigon last Wednesday, the day of the surrender, continued to be forbidden to send news out.

Broadcasts from both Saigon and Hanoi yesterday said a total of 13 South Vietnamese islands from the Gulf of Tonkin to the Gulf of Siam had been "liberated" in recent days, among them the prison islands of Son and Phu Quoc.

Some of the islands were in the Spratly group 200 miles or more east of the southern part of South Vietnam. But there was no mention of the Paracel Islands, which are east of Da Nang. This archipelago was occupied by Chinese forces in 1974 after brief fighting with South Vietnamese troops.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON POST
7 MAY 1975 Pg 8

Radio Jingle To Promote Army Career

United Press International

After a four-year hiatus, the Army is seeking recruits again with paid radio jingles.

The 13-week campaign began in 15 cities Monday. Because the service is limited to a $600,000 budget, the ads will appear only on radio. In the spring of 1971 the Army had $10.6 million and advertised on television as well as radio.

The services have long asked radio and TV stations to broadcast free ads, but they usually appeared after midnight.

The 1971 campaign and the current one are both designed to attract volunteers for the infantry, artillery and armor. There is also a financial inducement because each volunteer for the combat branches gets a bonus of $1,500 to $2,500.

The 1971 ad campaign was considered a success by the Army, which got 10 times as many volunteers in the last month of the campaign as in the same month of the preceeding year. But in the first eight months of the current budget year, the Army reached only 76 per cent of its combat needs.

NEW YORK TIMES
7 MAY 1975, Pg 23

News Blackout May End

PARIS, May 6 (UPI)—Officials of the Revolutionary Government's mission here said today that foreign newsmen would soon be permitted to file dispatches from Saigon again.

WASHINGTON STAR 6 MAY 1975, Pg 3B (7)

'Politics' Charged in Plan To Shift P.G. Navy Office

By Brad Holt
Washington Star Staff Writer

"Keep My Chevy Off The Levee," proclaimed the sign held by an employe of the Naval Oceanographic Center.

About 1,300 center employes expect the Navy to transfer their Suitland office to the area of Bay St. Louis, Miss. and thus disrupt their lives—because of the move south itself, or because they will quit their jobs to stay in this area and then face the task of trying to find comparable work.

LAST NIGHT the employes, who perform scientific, engineering and environmental studies for the Navy as well as other federal and civilian agencies, had their chance to protest to the Navy. About 800 appeared at the Suitland High School cafeteria for a hearing on an environmental impact draft statement on the proposed move published by the Navy.

Among the 58 speakers who testified before a Navy hearing board were Maryland politicians from Congress, the state Senate and House of Delegates and the Prince Georges County government.

The politicians of the Free State were solidly behind their constituency—about 57 percent of those threatened by the move live in Prince Georges County.

U.S. Rep. Gladys N. Spellman, D-Md., told the crowd, "It disturbs me that the Navy thinks it can move people around like pieces on a chess board. They're dealing with disrupting families.

"For what reason?" she asked. "Politics," she answered.

BOTH THE oceanographic employes and the Maryland politicians pointed out that the center's annual payroll is about $25 million, which would leave Maryland along with the center. The proposed site, located in Mississippi close to the Louisiana state line, is sponsored by Sens. John Stennis, D-Miss., and Rusell Long, D-La., chairmen respectively of the Senate Armed Services and Finance Committees, last night's meeting was told.

Francis B. Francois, chairman of the Prince Georges County Council, said county officials "have been opposed to the move and that strong opposition still stands. The county executive and the County Council are ready to use every legal weapon available."

REP. MARJORIE S. HOLT, R-Md., read a letter written to Defense Secretary James Schlesinger from Reps. John M. Murphy, D-N.Y., and Charles A. Mosher, R-Ohio, respectively the chairman and ranking minority member of the oceanographic subcommittee of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. The letter announced oversight hearings on the proposed move to begin May 21 and asked for postponement of a "final decision on this transfer" until the hearings are completed.

THE NAVY STUDY, under the heading of "Adverse Environmental Effects," noted that "blacks, who comprise about 14 percent of the work force, may be reluctant to transfer to the proposed relocation site." The study notes that as many as 80 to 90 percent of the blacks may refuse transfer and that those who go "must consider the general attitudes of the majority populace toward minorities..."

Louise Driscoll, a deputy equal employment opportunity officer for the center who toured the area recently, said that "along the Gulf coast, everything is fine, but when you go inland, it's the old South. In the movie theaters, blacks are on one side and whites on the other; a black cop can't arrest a white man....It's very separate and very unequal."

Members of the Navy hearing board agreed with Mrs. Driscoll in her estimation of the racial situation but disagreed with statements about the availability of housing and the quality of education.

AT THE CLOSE of the hearing, members of the board told a reporter that there was adequate housing available near the Mississippi site.

WASHINGTON STAR 6 MAY 1975, Pg 11 (7)

Army Moving Its Prep School

Associated Press

Secretary of the Army Howard Callaway said Monday that the U.S. Military Academy Preparatory School will be moved this summer from Ft. Belvior, south of Washington, to Ft. Monmouth, N.J.

Involved are 325 students and 65 civilian and military instructors and administrators.

The Army said the shift will provide the shcool improved permanent facilities by the beginning of the 1976 session a year from August.

The Army said the transfer of the school to Ft. Monmouth will permit expansion of the Defense Systems Management School at Ft. Belvoir before January. The U.S. Military Academy Preparatory School prepares regular and reserve soldiers to qualify for entrance to West Point.

WASHINGTON POST 7 MAY 1975, Pg 43

For the Record

• Soviet Communist Party chief Brezhnev and Premier Kosygin will visit West Germany this year, the ruling Social Democratic Party announced in Bonn. The Soviet news agency Tass, meanwhile, said in Moscow that Kosygin will visit Libya the first half of this month.

LOS ANGELES TIMES 4 MAY 1975 (7)
Pg 6B

Californians Pressured Navy to Buy F-18, Critic Charges

DALLAS (AP)—The U.S. Navy has been pressured to spend $6 billion for a deficient fighter plane just to ease California's unemployment problems, according to U.S. Rep. Dale Milford (D-Tex.).

Milford said Saturday in a statement issued from his home that the Navy was pressured "in a demanding letter" to choose the F-18 fighter built by McDonnell-Douglas and Northrop in California. He said the plane is inferior to the LTV F-16 which the Air Force chose in January. Congress earlier had recommended the Navy and Air Force adopt the same new fighter plane.

"This letter clearly stated the demand that the award should go to Northrop because of California's high unemployment factor," Milford said. He said the letter was written by "the entire California (congressional) delegation."

Milford said the Navy's decision, which still requires congressional approval, is indefensible on the basis of the F-18's performance, economy or as the best combat plane available for Navy use.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WEDNESDAY MORNING, 7 MAY 1975

A035
R A
DEBATE 5-7
DAY LD
BY JOHN MILNE

WASHINGTON (UPI) -- THE SENATE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE HAS VOTED IN FAVOR OF THE "COUNTERFORCE" STRATEGY OF FIGHTING NUCLEAR WARS, WHICH SUPPORTERS SAY WOULD GIVE THE PRESIDENT MORE FLEXIBILITY IN RESPONDING TO CRISES.

OPPONENTS CONTEND "COUNTERFORCE" WOULD ADD NEW, DANGEROUS ELEMENTS OF RISK AND INSTABILITY TO RELATIONS BETWEEN NUCLEAR POWERS. THEY SAID TODAY THEY PLAN TO FIGHT THE DECISION IN THE WHOLE SENATE.

SOME SENATE SOURCES PREDICT A CONFRONTATION SIMILAR TO THE RECENT FIGHT OVER THE ANTIBALLISTIC MISSILE.

THE SENATE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE MET BEHIND CLOSED DOORS TUESDAY ON THE PENTAGON'S $10.2 BILLION RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT REQUEST. IT IS EXPECTED TO ANNOUNCE FINAL DECISIONS SOON, PERHAPS TODAY.

SOURCES NOT WISHING TO BE QUOTED BECAUSE THE COMMITTEE HAS NOT YET MADE ALL ITS DECISIONS SAID THE VOTE WAS 11-4 IN FAVOR OF $109 BILLION IN RESEARCH FOR FIVE "COUNTERFORCE" PROPOSALS. AN EXAMPLE OF ONE IDEA IS MARV, A NUCLEAR WARHEAD THAT CAN BE GUIDED TOWARD A TARGET AFTER IT IS FIRED. THE IDEA BEHIND "COUNTERFORCE" IS TO HAVE A MISSILE SO ACCURATE AND POWERFUL THAT IT CAN DESTROY AN ENEMY MISSILE BEFORE IT IS FIRED.

THE COMITTEE REVERSED THE RESEARCH SUBCOMMITTEE, HEADED BY SEN. THOMAS MCINTYRE, D-N.H., WHICH HAD ELIMINATED THESE PROJECTS. MCINTYRE IS ONE OF THE OPPONENTS WHO CALLS "COUNTERFORCE" DANGEROUS, IN HIS PHRASE, "PUTTING A HAIR TRIGGER ON NUCLEAR WAR."

THEY SAY IT IS ONLY A MATTER OF TIME UNTIL BOTH THE UNITED STATES AND THE SOVIET UNION GET THIS CAPABILITY, AND IF A CRISIS COMES BOTH SIDES WILL ITCH TO PUSH THE NUCLEAR BUTTON FIRST -- BECAUSE THE SECOND ONE COULD HAVE ITS NUCLEAR ARSENAL DESTROYED.

SUPPORTERS, WHO INCLUDE SECRETARY OF STATE HENRY KISSINGER AND SECRETARY OF DEFENSE JAMES SCHLESINGER, SAY "COUNTERFORCE" GIVES THE PRESIDENT ANOTHER MILITARY OPTION BETWEEN DOING NOTHING IN A CRISIS OR RISKING ALL-OUT NUCLEAR WAR.

THE SOURCES ALSO SAID THE COMMITTEE VOTED TO CUT $222.3 MILLION FROM THE $672 MILLION REQUEST FOR THE B1 BOMBER PROGRAM, AND PERMIT ONLY CONTINUED RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT, NOT PRODUCTION. THE SUBCOMMITTEE ORIGINALLY CUT $160.8 MILLION, AND THE COMMITTEE VOTED NARROWLY TO KEEP THE CUT. A LATER COMPROMISE CUT MORE, THE SOURCES SAID, AND IT PASSED 10-4.

CONSERVATIVES MAY ASK THE FULL SENATE TO RESTORE FUNDS FOR THE B1, DESIGNED AS THE NATION'S MAJOR HEAVY BOMBER FOR NUCLEAR WAR. THE HOUSE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE WAS KINDER TO THE CONTROVERSIAL PLANE, VOTING TUESDAY TO AUTHORIZE ALL THE PENTAGON ASKED.

UPI 05-07 03:42 AED

APB061
050

(BANGKOK) -- A REPORT BY THE SAIGON RADIO, MONITORED IN BANGKOK, SAYS A HUGE CROWD GATHERED AT THE FORMER PRESIDENTIAL PALACE TODAY. THE RADIO SAYS THE COMMANDING GENERAL OF THE SAIGON AREA PROMISED LENIENCY TO FORMER FOES OF THE VIET CONG AND RESPECT FOR LIVES AND PROPERTY OF FOREIGN RESIDENTS -- PROVIDING, HE SAID, THAT "THEY EARN AN HONEST LIVING THROUGH CLEAN BUSINESS" AND OBEY LAWS AND ORDERS.

GENENRAL TRAN VAN TRA, WHO LED THE ATTACK ON SAIGON IN THE 1968 TET OFFENSIVE, ALSO WARNED OF SEVERE PUNISHMENT AGAINST THOSE WHO -- AS HE PUT IT -- "SEVER THEMSELVES FROM THE PEOPLE" AND "SERVE AS HENCHMEN FOR FOREIGN COUNTRIES."

03:24AED 05-07-75

WALL STREET JOURNAL 7 MAY 1975, Pg 7

IBM Permits Army To Cancel Orders Without Any Penalty

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y. — International Business Machines Corp. said it has allowed the Army to cancel three remaining computers on a nine-computer contract without paying scheduled penalties of $9.6 million.

But IBM acknowledged — after a statement was issued by Rep. Jack Brooks, (D., Texas), chairman of the House government operations committee—that the Army was paying $6 million over current market prices for the six computers it is buying from IBM, and that the Army had violated federal law by signing the original contract.

"The Army has acknowledged a procedural error," an IBM spokesman said, commenting on a charge by Rep. Brooks that only the General Services Administration has legal authority to buy data processing equipment for the government.

IBM explained the $6 million price differential by noting that in 1973, when the agreement was reached, the price to the Army of $2.7 million for each of the six system 360, model 65 computers was "competitive" in the market. Since then the going price has dropped to $1.7 million, the spokesman said, because of "dynamics in the market" rather than any change in production costs.

IBM said the original contract, which was for up to 24 computer systems, was awarded by competitive bidding in 1967 but was revised by the Army and IBM in 1973 when Army requirements were reduced. Under that agreement, the Army was to pay $4.3 million for each computer if it purchased fewer than nine.

Rep. Brooks said the Army would purchase the other three computers on the open market, presumably at the lower price.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CURRENT NEWS

PART II - MAIN EDITION - 1130

THIS SUPPLEMENTS PART I-EARLY BIRD EDITION

THIS PUBLICATION IS PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL NEWS ITEMS OF INTEREST TO THEM IN THEIR OFFICIAL CAPACITIES; IT IS NOT INTENDED TO SUBSTITUTE FOR NEWSPAPERS, PERIODICALS AND BROADCASTS AS A MEANS OF KEEPING INFORMED ABOUT THE NATURE, MEANING AND IMPACT OF NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL NEWS DEVELOPMENTS. USE OF THESE ARTICLES HERE, OF COURSE, DOES NOT REFLECT OFFICIAL ENDORSEMENT. FURTHER REPRODUCTION FOR PRIVATE USE OR GAIN IS SUBJECT TO THE ORIGINAL COPYRIGHT RESTRICTIONS.

TUESDAY, MAY 6, 1975

BALTIMORE SUN
6 May 1975 Pg. 1

Phnom Penh said to order executions

By DEAN MILLS
Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—The State Department said yesterday that the new rulers of Cambodia have ordered the execution of all top political and military leaders of the old regime, down to the local level.

The order, if carried out, would mean the death of thousands of Cambodians who served under the defeated government of President Lon Nol.

American officials indicated that a program of mass reprisals would make the United States hesitant to recognize the new regime in Phnom Penh. Henry A. Kissinger, the Secretary of State, said in an interview televised yesterday that "very tragic and inhuman and barbarous things are going on."

"We don't regret not having recognized Cambodia immediately," he added.

Robert Anderson, the State Department spokesman, confirmed at a department press briefing reports of the execution orders given in radio transmissions intercepted by American intelligence.

And he said the United States has "information that in one outlying area this order was carried out and this involved 80. . .leaders and their wives."

But Mr. Anderson said information available to the United States is too fragmentary to indicate whether the execution orders have been carried out on a wide scale. There were solid indications, however, that the new leaders have been harsh in establishing their authority.

Western journalists who remained in Phnom Penh for the Communist takeover and who arrived in Thailand over the weekend have hinted darkly of severe measures taken by the new government, although they have foresworn writing directly on the subject for now for fear of harming those left behind.

PHNOM PENH...Pg. 2

WASHINGTON POST
6 May 1975 Pg. 1

Refugee Critics Shock Ford

By Carroll Kilpatick
Washington Post Staff Writer

Congressional and public criticism of administration policy on the admission of Vietnamese refugees has shocked and disturbed President Ford, White House sources said yesterday.

The President is expected to express himself on the subject in strong terms at a televised news conference at 7:30 tonight, the first he has held since the surrender of Saigon.

The President was quoted by one source as having said "it is not the America I know" when informed of what some public figures and citizens have said about not wanting the Vietnamese to come to this country.

The President also is expected to discuss in public for the first time the consequences for this country of the Communist victories in Cambodia and Vietnam.

He asked Congress yesterday for $507 million to care for the Vietnamese refugees until they can find homes and jobs, and he is expected to defend his position that they should be welcome and that the United States owes them refuge.

Last week, through his press secretary, Mr. Ford said he was "proud" of what he had done to help evacuate Vietnamese who wanted to leave their country.

Yesterday, press secretary Ron Nessen, asked about reports of criticism of Graham A. Martin, ambassador to South Vietnam, quoted the President as strongly defending the ambassador and hailing the success of the evacuation.

"The President feels that Ambassador Martin accomplished an extraordinarily

CRITICS...Pg. 2

BALTIMORE SUN 6 May 1975 Pg. 8

Kissinger denies links to any CIA death plots

Washington (AP) — The Secretary of State, Henry A Kissinger, yesterday denied having any involvement in alleged Central Intelligence Agency domestic spying or foreign assassination plots.

"Since I have been in Washington, the National Security Council or the National Security Council staff or the assistant to the President for national security affairs did not concern themselves with domestic intelligence or were informed about domestic intelligence," Mr. Kissinger told reporters after a two-hour-closed-door session with the Rockefeller commission.

Asked about allegations of CIA assassination plots, Mr. Kissinger chuckled and said, "None of those allegations pertain to any period of which I have personal knowledge."

The Defense Secretary, James R. Schlesinger, who headed the agency briefly in 1973, also testified and later told reporters that "assassination has not been used as a tool by the CIA at any time."

However, Mr. Schlesinger said he would have "no comment on allegations regarding [the assassination of] foreign leaders" and added that "there are questions here that the commission and the appropriate congressional bodies may wish to review."

Asked whether the CIA had undertaken domestic surveillance in response to White House pressure, Mr. Schlesinger said, "My recollection ... is that indeed there were expressions of interest on the part of senior officials of the government."

Asked if these expressions came from Mr. Kissinger, who ordinarily would direct CIA covert activities, Mr. Schlesinger indicated that the requests for domestic surveillance "came through channels other than national security channels."

Vice President Rockefeller, the commission chairman,

KISSINGER...Pg. 2

NEW YORK NEWS
6 May 1975 Pg. 2

U.S. Taking Viet Planes From Thais

Washington, May 5 (News Bureau) — Despite official Thai objections, the United States has begun removing the 125 U.S.-supplied military planes flown to Thailand by fleeing South Vietnamese pilots, the Pentagon said today.

Meantime, it was announced that the U.S. would reduce by about 25% the number of American troops and planes in Thailand. The number of troops will be cut from 25,000 to 19,500, mostly Air Force personnel.

Scheduled for removal next month are two squadrons of U.S. F-111 fighter-bombers (36 planes) and three squadrons of F-4 fighters (72 planes). The total of American planes currently in Thailand is 340, including 176 fighters; 16 F-4s configured for reconnaissance duty; 17 B-52 bombers; 12 AC-130 gunships, and a number of other aircraft of the liaison, spotter or utility types.

The U.S. troop reduction, disclosed earlier today in Bangkok, was described in a Thai Foreign Ministry statement as the first step in an effort to phase out the American military presence in Thailand by March 1976.

The decision to bring the South Vietnamese aircraft to the United States had not been disclosed previously.

The announcement came as Thai Foreogn Minister Chatichai Choonhavan said in Bangkok that the Thai Government would aorctian the planes for the time being. He indicated that he wanted to discuss the matter with u.s. officials.

North Vietnam and the new Communist government of South Vietnam have demanded the return of all planes and ships

VIET PLANES...Pg. 2

JAMES KILLINGBECK, CHIEF, CURRENT NEWS BRANCH, OX 78765 HELEN YOUNG, ASSISTANT CHIEF.
FOR SPECIAL RESEARCH SERVICES OR DISTRIBUTION CALL HARRY ZUBKOFF, CHIEF, EXECUTIVE AGENCY SERVICE, OX 52884

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK TIMES 6 May 1975 Pg. 1

Kissinger Denies Involvement In Domestic Spying by C.I.A.

By NICHOLAS M. HORROCK
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 5—Secretary of State Kissinger said today that he and the National Security Council had had no involvement in any domestic operations of the Central Intelligence Agency and that he had never "transmitted" to the agency any feeling of concern about domestic security on the part of President Nixon.

His statement was made to reporters after he testified before the Rockefeller Commission, which is investigating the C.I.A.

Richard Helms, former director of Central Intelligence had said in January that domestic operations were conducted in response to Presidential concern that foreign influences were controlling the domestic antiwar movement.

Mr. Kissinger's statement raised the question of whether the C.I.A.'s operations were outside the chain of command suggested by the National Security Act of 1947, which calls upon the C.I.A. to "perform such other functions and duties related to inelligence affecting the national security as the National Security Council may from time to time direct."

The present C.I.A. chief, William E. Colby, said in January that the agency conductec domestic intelligence gathering from 1970 until 1973 as an outgrowth of Presidential concern over radical activities.

This concern was expressed in the so-called Tuston plan, a proposed attack on radical movement that included burglaries, electronic surveillance and mail covers, which was prepared in 1970 but not implemented. The C.I.A., Mr. Colby has said, continued to gather information and maintain files on Americans even though the plan was not adopted.

The National Security Council, a national security advisery body, and the 40 committees are the normal conduits for commands to C.I.A. for instance, covert activity abroad is conducted either with the express approval of the 40 Committee or under the power of executive orders issued through the council. (The 40 Committee includes representatives from the major agencies of the intelligence community, Mr. Kissinger and members of the council.

But today, under questioning, Mr. Kissinger said that "since I have been in Washington, the National Security Council or the National Security Council staff or the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs did not concern themselves with domestic intelligence or, were not informed about domestic inteligence.

Mr. Kissinger has directed the council since 1969 and his tenure covered the years 1970 until 1973, during which Mr. Colby sai dthat part of the domestic intelligence operation took place.

Vice President Rckefeller said today that there were other channels of cammand between the White House and the C.I.A. outside of the National Security Council and that these channels could have included President Nixon himself.

Mr. Kissinger also disavowed today any knowledge of alleged assassinations b ythe C.I.A. Each of the day's other witnesses—a former C.I.A. chief, John A. McCone, Secretary of Defense James M. Schlesinger, and a former White House aide, Walt Rostow — were asked about assassinations.

All denied direct knowledge, Mr. McCone said that during his term of office there was "absolutely no assassination plot or authorized assassination plot against Castro by the Cuban Premier, [Fidel Castro] or any other foreign leader."

Today's session was one of the last two in which the commission will hear witnesses. It has begpn to prepare its report, which is scheduled to be given to President Ford on June 6.

Mr. Schlesinger said what he recalled, from his internal investigation of C.I.A., indicated that what authorizations came in the summer of 1971 came through "channels other than the N.S.C."

The concern of the Nixon Administration with domestic radicals was synthesized in a plan written by John Charles Huston, then a White House aide, in the summer of 1970. The plan had been contributed to by members of the major intelligence agencies. It would have authorized, with Presidential approval, the use of burglaries, mail covers and electronic surveillance, to gather intellegence about the domestic radical movement.

The plan was in effect for five days, but was rescinded when the late J. Edgar Hoover refused to allow the F.B.I. to be involved. It was not the only period in which the C.I.A. has conducted domestic intelligence, according to Mr. Colby, the agency head.

KISSINGER...Continued

briefing reporters on the day's session, confirmed that "there were many channels from the White House to the CIA" but refused to supply details or state where requests for domestic surveillance had originated.

Walt W. Rostow, Mr. Kissinger's predecessor as national security adviser, also appeared before the commission but declined any comment on his testimony.

John A. McCone, the central intelligence director during the early 1960's, also testified before the eight-member commission investigating allegations of CIA domestic wrongdoing.

Mr. McCone later told reporters he had to "plead ignorance" in response to questions about alleged plots against the life of Cuban Premier Fidel Castro. "During my term of office, there was no, absolutely no assassination plot or authorized assassination plot against Castro or any other foreign leader," Mr. McCone said.

Mr. Kissinger was asked by reporters about the future of a former CIA director, Richard M. Helms, now Ambassador to Iran. "Helms will remain ambassador to Iran," Mr. Kissinger said. "I have complete confidence in him."

Last January, Mr. Helms acknowledged publicly that a special counter-intelligence unit was set up within the CIA in response to presidential concern that domestic unrest was influenced from abroad.

VIET PLANES...Cont'd

bused by South Vietnamese to flee their country before it fell last week.

But Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger has said that the U.S. retained title to the planes.

In response to questions, a Pentagon spokesman said that some South Vietnamese C-130 transport planes were being flown from Thailand to Clark Air Force Base in the Philippines and that most of the other South Vietnamese planes were being removed by ship.

About 54 F-5 fighters and A-37 light attack bombers, formerly os the South Vietnamese Air Force — which was once the world's foruth largest — were being loaded on the aircraft carrier Midway off the Thai port of Sattahip, sources daid. Alos aboard the Midway were 48 U.S.-supplied helicopters, either from South Vietnam of Cambodia.

PHNOM PENH...Continued

Several officials speaking privately yesterday agreed with Mr. Anderson's observation that the information so far is too thin to judge whether mass executions have begun. But they said the execution orders given in the intercepted radio messages applied even to low-ranking political and military officials at local levels.

Given the insurgents' reputation for ruthlessness, some analysts here said, there was no reason to doubt that the orders were being carried out. Ronald H. Nessen, the White House press secretary, told reporters yesterday that "80 to 90 officers and their wives" had been executed in Cambodia. Mr. Nessen also said the United States has had "some reports" of executions of South Vietnamese officials.

CRITICS...Continued

difficult task under trying circumstances and did it well," Nessen said.

Declaring that Martin was responsible for the lives of Americans in Saigon and for maintaining the embassy to the end, Nessen said the President "thinks the results speak for themselves."

The Americans were evacuated safely as were, thousands of Vietnamese, Nessen said.

Nessen said Mr. Ford appreciated the support of Gov. Reubin Askew of Florida and Gov. David Pryor of Arkansas both Democrats, for refugee resettlement activities in their states.

Evacuees are being sent to Eglin Air Force Base in Florida, Ft. Chaffee in Arkansas and Camp Pendleton in California.

Asked if the President had thanked Democratic Gov. Edmund G. Brown Jr. of California, Nessen replied, "Why should he" Brown has complained of the new immigrants at a time when many Americans are unemployed.

While there have been reports of heavy mail to members of Congress opposing the admission of Vietnamese refugees, Nessen said White House mail favored their admission.

Of 7,500 letters received on the subject in the last month, 4,456 supported the President's policy, 2,936 opposed it and the remainder commented but stated no firm position, Nessen said.

Asked about a suggestion by Sen. George McGovern (D-S.D.) that some of the refugees would want to return to their homeland, Nessen said they left voluntarily and if some want to return they are free to do so.

Nessen confirmed earlier reports that the President has invited Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin to visit Washinton next month. The visit will take place June 11-12, Nessen said, for discussions of "matters of mutual interest and in order to further strengthen the friendly ties between the two countries."

Israeli officials were reportedly disturbed last week because the White House announced that the President would meet first with Egyptian President Anwar Sadat during Mr. Ford's trip to Europe.

The meeting with the Egyptian leader is scheduled for June 1-2 in Salzburg, Austria. The President will first attend a North Atlantic Treaty Organization summit meeting in Brussels May 29-30 and also visit Madrid and Rome before returning to Washington June 3 or 4.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II--Main Edition--6 May 1975

WASHINGTON POST 6 May 1975 Pg. 1

Vietcong Wins First U.N. Recognition

From News Dispatches

The new Communist government of South Vietnam has released all prisoners from the Conson Island prison where inmates were held in notorious "tiger cage" cells, the Vietcong radio said Monday.

The move came as the Vietcong's Provisional Revolutionary Government continued to tighten its control over the country and won its first recognition from the United Nations as the successor of the former Saigon government.

The PRG ordered all officials of the former government to report to authorities by Thursday and extended to May 31 the deadline for members of the defeated armed forces to turn themselves in. Saigon Radio also reiterated its order for military equipment to be turned in immediately.

The Vietcong's Giai Phong Radio, monitored by the Yugoslav news agency Tanjug, did not give the number of prisoners released from Conson Island prison, but it said they would be reunited with their families.

Former U.S. Rep. William R. Anderson (D-Tenn.) once referred to the "tiger cages" of Conson island as "the most shocking treatment of human beings I have ever seen" after touring the prison where 10,000 persons were held, most of them for political reasons.

During the height of the U.S. opposition to involvement in the Vietnam war, reports on the "tiger cages" raised a furor in the United States. At one point, 116 South Vietnamese political prisoners claimed that they had been paralyzed from maltreatment on the island and from being kept in the "cages."

The radio also reported that former officials of the defeated Saigon government, including former President Duong Van (Big) Minh, had been returned to their families in Saigon.

The officials were told upon their release that it was hoped that they would contribute to rebuilding the country, the radio said. Minh responded by saying he "welcomed the victory of the liberation forces and said he was happy to be a citizen of the independent Vietnam," the radio said

Meanwhile, Saigons' new rulers ordered the immediate closure of all overseas missions set up by the previous government and indicated that the new envoys would be sent out soon to take over.

In a three-point directive, the Foreign Ministry ordered all heads of mission to cease operations and close their embassies and to draw up lists of documents, equipment and property for handover to new representatives who would be sent out soon, and warned that acts of sabotage and illegal removal of funds would be punished.

The directive was the new government's first order to the former government's dozens of embassies, the largest of which are in Washington and Paris.

Domestic proclamations by the PRG have dealt thus far with the reconstruction of the country and the establishment of administrative machinery. Essential services have reportedly been restored and many factories are said to be in full operation. Communications with the outisde world, however, have not been restored, and news has been confined to radio broadcasts monitored outside South Vietnam.

In Wellington, New Zealand, a U.N. official said that almost all the displaced persons in Vietnam are expected to be resettled in their villages by the end of May. The U.N. official said his agency, the U.N. High Commission for Refugees, is working closely with the new Saigon government to provide medicines, food, tools and seeds.

The North Vietnamese news agency in Hanoi reported that the television station in Hue has resumed broadcasting and Giai Phong Radio said a group of dancers from Hanoi performed in the former imperial capital on Sunday.

The radio also reported that Saigon citizens are scraping walls and cleaning up streets and market places. Old movie posters and posters of the Thieu regime have been replaced by revolutionary slogans, the radio said.

At the United Nations, the U.N. Economic and Social Council recognized the PRG as the successor government to the former Saigon regime yesterday, despite American "regrets" at the "premature" decision.

In a public debate on the recognition, other U.N. delegates suggested that the US. statement indicated that Washington would recognize the PRG "in the coming days."

U.S. representative Clarence Ferguson responded, "We will not recognize any government-in-exile, but that is not an either-or proposition. As of this moment, we do not recognize the authorities in Saigon."

Ferguson said the United States was "uncertain as to an eventuality of double representation."

The PRG's earlier application for membership in two U.N. bodies—the World Health Organization and the World Meteorological Organization—has indicated to some observers that the new Communist rulers in the South are preparing for a prolonged period of diplomatic activity independent of North Vietnam.

Yesterday's U.N. decision means that the PRG would succeed the government it defeated as an "observer" at the world body, but neither of the agency applications has been acted upon.

Monday's action at the United Nations was prompted by a request from Senegal that the PRG be invited to attend the U.N. International Women's Year conference in Mexico City in July.

Meanwhile, the Soviet news agency Tass reported that two Soviet ships had docked in Danang and brought 4,000 tons of food and fuel to the city. The Soviet vessels were the first ships to enter the port since the Communist government took control.

Western diplomats in Moscow said they expected the Soviet government to move quickly to supply the South Vietnamese Communists in a move to blunt Chinese influence in the area.

Neues Deutschland, the East German Communist Party newspaper reported from Saigon that the Danang harbor was reopened April 24.

Tass also reported that the new government's newspaper, Saigon Liberation, said that North Vietnamese and Vietcong forces killed or wounded more than 400,000 troops of the Saigon government in the final days of the war.

The Los Angeles Times quoted an American official as saying that 15 tons of gold remained in the vaults of the central bank when South Vietnam surrendered. The official said some efforts had been made to fly the gold out during the U.S. evacuation of the city.

NEW YORK NEWS 6 May 1975 Pg. 8

Says Egypt Fortifies Suez' Eastern Bank

By JOSEPH FRIED
Staff Correspondent of The News

Jerusalem, May 5—Israeli Defense Minister Shimon Peres charged today that Egypt had laid the military groundwork for a crossing of the Suez Canal, like the one that triggered the 1973 Mideast war.

Peres also disclosed for the first time that a Soviet spy ship had been operating off the Israeli coast for the last five years, using electronic equipment to monitor activities within Israel.

Peres told the Kresset that the Soviet Union had not only resumed the flow of weapons to the Arabs, but had considerably increased the numbers of shipments, including ammunition and spare parts for Soviet-made weapons already in Egypt.

Specifically, Peres said, the Kremlin was supplying Egypt with MIG-23 warplanes, surface-to-air missiles and spare parts for tanks and planes.

He said that Egypt had completed laying the groundwork for fortifications on the east bank of the Suez, where they could deploy forces to cross into Sinai.

Peres said that Egypt had been working on the east bank of the canal since the January 1974 signing of the separation-of-forces agreement with Israel following the Yom Kippur War in October 1973.

Peres said the new fortifications included gun emplacements, bunkers and ditches.

"They've set the stage for another invasion should Egypt decide to go to war again," sources said here. "So far, it appears to be a contingency effort, but all that could change overnight if the Egyptians decide to move their troops and weapons across the canal."

Peres' disclosure coincided with reports here that Egypt might shift additional troops to the east bank of the canal on grounds that they are required to protect the canal after it reopens June 5.

Others Aid Egypt

Israeli Transport Minsiter Gad Yacobi warned today that any such troop movement would "sabotage" efforts toward achieving a Mideast settlement.

Peres also disclosed that both Algeria and Saudi Arabia had bolstered Egypt's arsenal since the October 1973 war.

He said that Algeria had bought Soviet tanks and turned them over to Egypt and that the Saudis had transferred some of the Mirage jets it bought from France.

Peres added that Egypt was trying to buy military equipment in Western Europe, including France and Britain.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Air Defense System

WASHINGTON POST 6 May 1975 Pg. 14

U.S. to Sell Arms to Jordan

By Murrey Marder
Washington Post Staff Writer

The United States has agreed to supply Jordan with an air-defense system including Hawk ground-to-air missiles, American officials said yesterday.

Confirmation that Jordan's King Hussein last week won a specific U.S. commitment for the air defenses he long has sought came in an unusual sequence yesterday.

Earlier, State Department spokesman Robert Anderson was asked if the United States still held to its position that there will be no new American arms commitment to Israel, or its Arab adversaries, during the current reassessment of Middle East policy. Anderson said that still is U.S. policy and he was "unaware of any commitments that were made to King Hussein" during his talks here last week.

Officials later disclosed the weapons arrangement with Jordan. To defend official credibility, they described this as confirmation of an earlier intention, rather than a new commitment.

Hussein has cited Jordan's lack of air defense as the reason why Jordan participated only symbolically in the October, 1973, Arab-Israeli war.

U.S. officials said an American survey team was sent to Jordan and Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger last February told Hussein that the United States intended to supply the air-defense system. An official said "final agreement" was "reached on details" last week.

Components of the system, including Hawk missiles and antiaircraft guns, will not begin reaching Jordan until the fall, it was said.

Jordan is reported to have argued that if it did not get the air-defense system from the United States, it would have to go, through Syria, to the Soviet Union for arms help.

Before Hussein's visit to Washington, a report circulated that Syria and Jordan agreed to a joint military command, which would have access to Soviet weapons. U.S. officials expressed disbelief over the report and Hussein denied it in a television interview here on Sunday.

To counter charges of discrimination against Israel, U.S. officials emphasized that Israel continues to receive deliveries of American weapons from previous commitments. This includes, one source said, "quite a large number of tanks" in April.

Kissinger, in a "Today" show interview to be televised this morning (NBC, WRC), said President Ford had "set a tentative deadline" for the Mideast policy reassessment, but that was before Indochina events "took a great deal of our attention." It is "a mistake to believe that there will be some clear terminal date at which one can say from now on the assessment is completed," Kissinger said.

He said that "on the whole ... the final decision will not be made until President Ford has had an opportunity to meet with the leaders of the countries principally concerned."

Referring to the advanced F-15 warplanes which Israel wants, Kissinger said such aircraft, "in any event, would not be delivered until the end of 1977, early 1978."

WASHINGTON POST 6 May 1975 Pg. C-1

Navy Move Plan Scored

By Harold J. Logan
Washington Post Staff Writer

Almost 700 persons indicated through speeches, signs and applause last night that they think the Navy's plan to shift its oceanographic office from Suitland to the Gulf Coast is ill-considered, politically motivated, and technically unwise.

The crown that overflowed the cafeteria at Suitland High School, where a public hearing was held on a Navy-prepared study of the environmental impact of the proposed move was made up of mostly middle class professional employees of the office who would be directly affected by its proposed relocation to Bay St. Louis, Miss.

Many of them indicated that they felt, as did oceanographer Lewis J. Franc, that politics, rather than Congress's stated effort to reduce the Navy's presence in the Washington area, is "what appears to be the primary driving force of relocating to the proposed site."

"The proponents (of the move) have argued again and again that it is not politically motivated; that it was only an accident that the loss of Congressman F. Edward Hebert's chair on the House Armed Services Committee concided with the sudden demise of Michoud, La., as a viable site for relocation."

The relocation of the facility, which employs 1,300 workers, is being pushed by Sen. John C. Stennis (D-Miss.), chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee and Sen. Russell B. Long (D-La.), chairman of the Finance Committee. One of the things at stake is the oceanographic offices' $25 million annual payroll.

Other testimony at the hearing focused on the almost 200 black persons who work at the office, and who are expected to oppose a move to the deep South.

Louise Driscoll, the deputy equal employment opportunity officer at the oceanographic office, said "EEO (equal employment opportunity) is hard enough right here. We don't need to go to Mississippi."

Mrs. Driscoll said she was one of several oceanographic office employees who visited the Bay St. Louis area and reported, "On the coast it's fine (for blacks), but don't go a mile inland. It is just like it was 100 years ago."

The environmental impact study that was the subject of the public hearing asserts that "potentially, as many as 80 to 90 per cent of the blacks may refuse transfer."

It also predicts that "relocation will likely cause a number of individuals to exercise their retirement options earlier than previously planned." The study says 268 oceanographic employees are eligible for part or full retirement.

The study contemplates that about 800 of the institute's 1,300 employees would make the move if it is approved by the Navy.

It predicts that the influx of oceanographic office employees would seriously strain the housing and public school capacities of the Bay St. Louis area.

The study predicts no serious negative impact of the move on the natural environment of Bay St. Louis.

Only one person testified in favor of the move. Mrs. William King spoke highly of the fishing, golf, and other recreational benefits of the Guf area, and said its sunset "has been compared to those on the Riviera." She said the educational and cultural opportunities in the area 55 miles northeast of New Orleans are good.

CHICAGO TRIBUNE
6 May 1975 Pg. 13

U.S. takes 'wait, see' Viet stance

WASHINGTON [AP]—Secretary of State Henry Kissinger says the United States will watch the actions of the new Communist regime in Saigon before deciding whether to recognize it diplomatically.

"We now have to see what the conduct of this government is internationally and partially domestically," Kissinger said in an interview with Barbara Walters Monday on NBC's Today show.

"For example, we know that in Cambodia very tragic and inhuman and impoverished things are going on," Kissinger said. "We don't regret not having recognized Cambodia immediately."

Kissinger also said he doubts that Hanoi would have staged its successful military drive on Saigon if Watergate had not sapped Presidential power and Congress had not passed the war powers act.

"IN JANUARY '73 we did not foresee that Watergate would sap the executive authority of the United States to such a degree that flexibility of executive action inherently would be circumscribed," Kissinger said.

"We did not foresee that the Congress would pass a law which prohibited us from enforcing the Paris agreement and while we probably might have done nothing anyway, it makes a lot of difference for Hanoi whether it thinks the United States probably will not or whether it thinks that we certainly cannot," Kissinger said.

"I do not believe that Hanoi would have sent 19 of its 20 divisions south if these two things hadn't happened," he added.

THE SECRETARY also defended the Ford administration's refusal to reveal the contents of a January, 1973, letter in which former President Nixon promised Thieu the United States would use full force to punish any violations of the Paris peace agreement.

"If we begin revealing the contents of letters, simply because a senator, on top of it a Presidential candidate, but quite apart from this, a senator alleges that there is something in these letters, then Presidential correspondence will lose its private character," Kissinger said.

Sen. Henry M. Jackson [D., Wash.] had demanded that the administration reveal the contents of any secret commitments Nixon made to Thieu.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

EDITORIALS

CHICAGO TRIBUNE
6 MAY 1975

Our best military customers

For a time, $722 million was a familiar figure. It was the amount that President Ford on April 10 asked Congress to appropriate promptly for military aid to South Viet Nam. About the same time, Sen. Gaylord Nelson widely distributed a list of military sales to foreign countries in the current fiscal year thru March 26 [almost nine months]. The list was prepared by the Defense Security Assistance Agency. It is of interest to note that cash sales to each of three countries so far in fiscal 1975 exceeded $722 million. These countries and the amounts of their military purchases are: Iran, $1.9 billion; Saudi Arabia, $1.1. billion; and Israel, $806 million.

There is a big drop to fourth place, Kuwait, $332 million; and another drop to a clump of three, West Germany, South Korea, and Greece. China [Taiwan], Turkey, and Italy round out the top 10.

Tho $722 million is a large sum, $1.9 billion is much larger. It is more than a little startling to realize that arms sales to Iran, a country not very high in the awareness of most Americans, are large enough to bring that many petrodollars back to this country in nine months. It is surprising, too, to find military sales to Saudi Arabia running appreciably ahead of sales to Israel. And it is a corrective to the popular preoccupation with Europe [when we think of foreign affairs at all] to note that less than 8 per cent of the dollar volume of military sales to our 10 best customers goes to Europe. The other 92 per cent goes to Asia, most of it to western Asia—Iran, Saudi Arabia, Israel, Kuwait, and Turkey. And only a geographical technicality prevents adding Greece to that list.

Southeast Asia's prominence in the news should not obscure the fact that western Asia, alias the Near East, is a most explosive part of the world. In a paradoxical way, the fact that the United States is supplying both Saudi Arabia and Israel, both Greece and Turkey, both Iran and [in nonstrategic goods] the Soviet Union, may discourage massive detonation of the arsenals in that part of the world.

U. S. NEWS & WORLD REPORT
12 MAY 1975 (6)

★ ★ ★

The coming debate on funding for the controversial B-1 bomber is viewed on Capitol Hill as the main event in this year's congressional struggle over military spending. "It's going to be a now-or-never situation for the B-1," says one House strategist.

★ ★ ★

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR - 6 MAY 1975

Nuclear club: members only

How do the members of an elite and powerful club make everybody else happy not to join it?

This is a basic question posed to the countries already possessing nuclear weapons as Geneva talks begin in a renewed effort to prevent the potentially catastrophic spread of such weapons. How to deter the increasing number of countries developing a capability to "go nuclear" if they choose?

The answers lie in reducing the apparent advantages of belonging to the nuclear weapons club — and reducing the disadvantages of staying out of it.

Specific means to these ends are being discussed in the conference to review the 1970 nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) which began in Geneva yesterday. Though public interest has not exactly been galvanized by the treaty with the jaw-breaking name, progress at the conference is vitally important if the lid is to be kept on what has so often been called the Pandora's box of nuclear proliferation.

The good news is that there is hope for such progress on the basis of new cooperative efforts by the United States and the Soviet Union. These are signaled by the joint release of policy reports on the subject by a panel of Americans and a panel of Russians under the auspices of the respective United Nations Associations of the two countries.

There are differences along with much fundamental agreement. Particularly significant is an increased Soviet disposition to talk "seriously" about pressing ahead with carrying out the terms of the NPT, according to Prof. Lincoln Bloomfield of the Center of International Studies at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, a panel member who met with the Russians in Moscow in March.

India's explosion of a nuclear device appeared to be one spur to the Soviet concern about further nuclear spread. With Israel, Brazil, and South Korea among several other nations discussed as potential nuclear powers, the whole world should share an urgency to answer that question of why any nonnuclear country should resist going nuclear.

The UN Association panel reports suggest various means of encouraging abstinence. For example:

• Internationally safeguarded help from the nuclear countries to the nonnuclear countries, including the use of peaceful nuclear explosions. This could remove pressure from countries to develop their own, perhaps less safe-guarded, efforts.

• Self-control by the nuclear countries in the development of weapons, while pursuing the NPT's provision for pushing toward a comprehensive test ban treaty. Salt II ought to be followed by a SALT III, suggests Professor Bloomfield, going beyond the limitation of strategic weapons to an actual cutting back on such weapons. Such steps could show the nuclear powers doing their part in reducing nuclear threat.

As the U.S. panel stated: "The most significant actions that the nuclear powers can take to discourage the spread of nuclear weapons will be major, prompt steps towards reducing their own nuclear capabilities. An international climate must be created in which the use of nuclear weapons in a military conflict is totally unacceptable and in which the political utility of possessing nuclear weapons steadily diminishes."

The steps are complicated, of course, so long as nuclear powers China and France remain outside the NPT. The review conference ought to work toward inducements to them to join in reducing arms. With all the danger of theft and misuse of spreading nuclear materials, the stricter safeguards recently proposed in a Vienna meeting of experts called by the International Atomic Energy Agency also need to be pursued.

The NPT review didn't make headlines yesterday. But its work is crucial to everybody's future.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR - 6 MAY 1975

Thailand and U.S. troops

Thailand is moving with characteristic alacrity to accommodate to the emerging communist dominance of Indo-China. The withdrawal over the next two months of another 7,500 American troops is a part of the process, begun long ago, of disengaging from the United States.

How far that process will be carried — some 19,500 U.S. troops will still remain — is not clear. Thailand's traditional, and shrewd, diplomacy has been to adjust to the realities of the moment in order to keep its independence. Hence Bangkok is trying hard not to offend the communists, which accounts too for its eagerness to be rid of the Cambodian refugees.

Treading the fine line between accommodation and independence will not be easy, especially in relations with Vietnam. Thailand also has a problem of communist insurgency, thought to be supported by the Chinese and North Vietnamese; serious battles took place only recently. The Thais may therefore wish to keep a certain American presence in their country.

One important factor in the equation is Peking. It is not known what the Chinese leaders really think, but comments made to foreign visitors suggest they look favorably on U.S. support for countries on the rim of Asia, including Thailand, in order to prevent Hanoi's domination of Indo-China and keep the Russians at bay. Peking would not, however, countenance the use of U.S. troops to fight domestic insurgencies.

Nor of course would the American Congress and public. Hence the question now is how American military power can best be used in Asia to keep the region stabilized and at the same time avoid local entanglements.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
16 APRIL 1975 (6 MAY)

It's Turkey's Move

One of the reasons given for Turkey's reluctance to compromise on the Cyprus issue was the unstable, interim status of the government in Ankara. Now, however, a new coalition has been formed by Premier Suleyman Demirel and it will be interesting to see if this results in making a small but meaningful compromise aimed at resuming the dialogue with Greece and the shipment of U.S. military aid to an important member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Compromise is possible by an announcement by Premier Demirel of intentions to resettle refugees uprooted as a result of Turkey's invasion of Cyprus and occupation of the northern one half of the island. It is possible by recognizing, at least in principle, the necessity of withdrawing the occupying forces and the desirability of unifying the island which would perhaps be given a federated status, but under a central government made up of Greek and Turkish Cypriots.

Without this sort of a compromise, Congress should reject pressure from the Ford Administration to lift the arms embargo from Turkey. Military aid would be resumed under a bill approved by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee by a nine-to-seven vote. We hope the Senate does not fall for the Administration's argument that NATO's eastern flank is being undermined by the embargo. The resumption of aid would further antagonize Greece and thus leave the eastern flank undermined. It would also make a mockery of U.S. laws which prohibit such military assistance to countries using U.S. arms to invade other countries.

The only way to restore NATO's health in the eastern Mediterranean is to settle the Cyprus issue and this requires certain compromises from a country whose invading forces are on foreign soil.

NEW YORK TIMES 6 MAY 1975

U.S. Foreign Policy: After Vietnam

To the Editor:

There are a number of points that deserve comment regarding Secretary of State Kissinger's recent observations about Vietnam.

First, it is not helpful to blame Congress for the debacle. Recent Congressional rejection of Administration requests for military aid contributed something to the decline in ARVN's will to resist. But after all, the main Washington decisions have been made by successive Administrations. Future problems press so hard upon us that this is not the time for a post mortem on Washington's role.

Secondly, the breathtaking collapse in Saigon surely results mainly from the internal inadequacies of the Saigon regime itself—its inability to inspire; its corrupt, incompetent military leadership; its rigid, unresponsive political structure. No amount of American aid could have made up for these chronic deficiencies as Saigon faced its Vietnamese enemies.

Thirdly, the collapse of Vietnam should have come as no surprise. This development has been expected in most of Southeast Asia ever since the cease-fire sprung American troops and established a complicated "political process" neither party seriously accepted. Most governments in Southeast Asia long ago prepared for the present contingency. The surprise is only that Saigon lasted so long and that the collapse, when it came, was so abrupt.

Fourthly, the Secretary is right that there will be "consequences" following on the abrupt American withdrawal, particularly in Thailand, Malaysia and South Korea. But it is not correct that statesmen in Western Europe and the Middle East, where our interests are so much more substantial and direct, will look on our withdrawal from Vietnam as a guide to our likely reactions to crises in their area. Their principal response is one of relief that now Washington is at last free to tackle more central issues.

There are humanitarian imperatives the President and Secretary rightly seek to cope with. These will require urgent actions by many concerned Americans, including the Congress.

Finally, now the President, the Secretary and the Congress must turn their serious and nonpolemic attention to the agenda of foreign-policy challenges before us. These include (1) the continuing risk of war in the Middle East; (2) the troubling ambiguities of "détente"; (3) the stalled progress in SALT; (4) American relations with Europe, Japan and the Asian giants of China and India, and (5) reshaping an economic order accommodating the many profound changes since Bretton Woods. These are of far greater urgency and consequence to our national interest than how or why our entanglement in Indochina came to such an end.

We now have an opportunity to revitalize that gift of innovative attacks on complex international problems which made American leadership of the postwar nineteen-forties and early nineteen-fifties so remarkable—and so widely welcomed.

(Prof.) Howard Wriggins
Director, Southern Asian Institute
Columbia University
New York, May 1, 1975

WASHINGTON STAR - 5 MAY 1975 (6)

Candor in Correspondence

The administration, we think, has been a good deal less than candid about the correspondence between former President Nixon and South Vietnamese President Nguyen Van Thieu previous to the signing of the Paris peace agreement in 1973. The private assurances given to Thieu, revealed in two letters made public here by a former cabinet minister in the Saigon government, go well beyond the promises admitted by the White House, that the United States would "react vigorously" in case of violations of the agreements by Hanoi.

As it turns out, the pledges were considerably more specific. In November of 1972, Thieu received from Nixon "my absolute assurance that if Hanoi fails to abide by the terms of this agreement it is my intention to take swift and severe retaliatory action. In January of the next year, a recalcitrant Thieu was offered "my assurance of continued assistance in the post-settlement period and that we will respond with full force should the settlement be violated by North Vietnam". It is quite understandable that the Saigon government should have taken these assurances as a promise that the United States would intervene, at least with massive air attacks, if the peace accords broke down.

Why is the Ford administration touchy about these communications between two former presidents? The presumption must be that they were made in good faith by Nixon. The reports that he had every intention of retaliating against massive North Vietnamese violations of the peace accords have not been denied. Nixon's sudden loss of authority as the result of his Watergate problems in the spring of 1973 is a quite logical explanation of why the projected air strikes on North Vietnamese military installations in South Vietnam were cancelled. It is true, of course, that private correspondence between heads of state are not normally made public. But in the present circumstances, with both president's out of office and one of the two governments no longer in existence, the argument of confidentiality carries little weight.

Nor do we believe that the Congress or the American people were deliberately deceived. In many public statements early in 1973, Nixon threatened retaliation against the North Vietnamese in terms very nearly as specific as those in his letters to Thieu. It was the circumstances that made these warnings, as they say, inoperative. As Nixon's authority crumbled under the weight of Watergate revelations, Congress passed specific legislation prohibiting the kind of relatiatory action that Nixon had pledged. After that, it is incredible that Thieu should have expected any American intervention, and in fact, there is sound evidence that he did not.

So why all the pussy-footing about the letters, which, in any case are already in the public domaine? The administrations's qualms in this matter simply feed charges from Senator Henry Jackson and others that it is once again covering up. President Ford, it seems to us, has nothing whatever to lose in making all of the correspondence public, and we urge him to do so forthwith.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER - 6 MAY 1975

Consent is the foundation of foreign policy success

We aren't sure that there are any new lessons to learn from the Vietnam debacle, but there certainly is an old one. It is that no foreign policy of the U. S. government can be successful without the informed consent of the American people.

That may sound like a truism, but it seems necessary to state it because even the brilliant Secretary of State Henry Kissinger does not seem to have grasped it. In an interview yesterday on the NBC "Today" show, Mr. Kissinger reiterated a favorable theme. Reflecting on the debacle, he saw it stemming from the inability of the Executive Branch to conduct foreign policy as it saw fit.

"In January '73," he said, "we did not foresee that Watergate would sap the executive authority of the United States to such a degree that flexibility of executive action inherently would be circumscribed."

And he went on to say, "We did not foresee that the Congress would pass a law which prohibited us from enforcing the Paris agreement . . . I do not believe that Hanoi would have sent 19 of its 20 divisions south if these two things hadn't happened."

Looked at one way, this is a roundabout way of saying that Congress is to blame for America's failure to meet its commitments, but there are deeper implications as well.

Mr. Kissinger's approach rests on two untenable assumptions—that the Executive Branch, which is to say the President and himself, not necessarily in that order of importance, know the right course to follow in foreign affairs and that their action should not be "circumscribed" by public opinion.

One must grant, of course, that public opinion can be wrong. Still, it seems to us that when the people make erroneous judgments it is usually because they have not been given the facts on which to make right judgments.

And that is the history of our involvement in Southeast Asia—a history of an Executive Branch which, over the years, operated in secrecy and insisted on public acquiescence, not to say acclaim, without telling the public the truth. Many of the crimes of Watergate were themselves rooted in President Nixon's obsession with secrecy—the wiretapping of newsmen and officials on Mr. Kissinger's staff, for example, and the attempt, by a burglary, to "get something" on Dr. Daniel Ellsberg, who had revealed the secret study of the truth about our Vietnam involvement.

Secrecy breeds deceit, and deceit breeds distrust. The War Powers Act was not immaculately conceived. It was born of a congressional determination, reflecting public opinion, that never again would an Executive Branch deceive the American people into another shooting war.

That may be an inconvenience to the administration. The necessity of obtaining public consent to policy may also seem to be an inconvenience. Yet the very process of obtaining public consent can save policy-makers from their more egregious errors, for there is no better way of testing policy than to debate it openly. That, after all, is what democracy is all about.

What went wrong in Southeast Asia was not the inability of the Executive to pursue a policy but the policy itself, and if one lesson of America's defeat is that the Executive Branch can also be wrong, surely another is, as Averill Harriman put it, that "no foreign policy will stick unless the American people are behind it." And they cannot be expected to give any administration "flexibility" unless the administration gives them the facts.

NEW YORK TIMES - 6 MAY 1975

Choice for Portugal

Portugal's chances for peaceful progress toward political democracy, social reform and economic development now depend critically on the answer to one question:

What do the country's military rulers mean when they speak of "Portuguese socialism" as the goal of the revolution they launched with the overthrow of the fascist regime a year ago?

If they mean social democracy in the Western European mold—social reform, free speech and press, economic planning, state intervention or ownership in some sectors, private enterprise in others—they can be assured of a relatively smooth passage.

This pattern was supported by more than 63 per cent of the voters who marked their ballots for the Socialist and Popular Democratic parties in the election of a constituent assembly a few days ago. This direction would win immediate sympathy and support for Portugal from many European governments and presumably from the United States as well.

If, however, the military leaders are bent on pervasive Marxist socialism with no political democracy—the socialism clearly favored by one of the most orthodox Communist parties in the world, as well as by radical spokesmen for the Armed Forces Movement—Portugal faces a bleak future. The Portuguese will find they have exchanged a dictatorship of the right for one of the Marxist left.

To its credit, the Armed Forces Movement ignored Communist pleas for a delay and carried out a remarkably free election. The response—a 92 per cent turnout—was magnificent. But if the people demonstrated above all their desire to participate in the democratic process, they also indicated clearly the direction they wish to go. The Communists, far better organized at the outset than any other party and lavishly financed from abroad, got only 12.5 per cent of the votes. Only 7 per cent took the advice of some military leaders and cast blank ballots.

The wiser military chiefs surely realize that to ignore such decisive results will risk unrest and opposition to the legitimate goals of the 1974 revolution. But others behave as though the election had no significance whatever.

There can be no effective challenge to the authority of the Armed Forces Movement. All major parties have agreed, albeit under pressure, to a dominant military role in Portugal's political life for at least three years. But the hope must be that after the long night of fascism the military rulers will not substitute the ideas of a radical minority for the clearly expressed will of the people.

What those people were saying emphatically last week is that Portugal can have social reform, structural change and economic advance within a framework of democracy and a climate of freedom.

NEW YORK NEWS - 6 MAY 1975

THE AMERICAN WAY

The Ford administration will ask Congress for $507 million to pay the cost of bringing 125,000 Vietnamese refugees to this country and helping them to start new lives. That is in keeping with this nation's tradition of compassion and hospitality.

Honoring another cherished American principle, the refugees will be given a free choice whether to remain here, return home, or settle in another land. That, we hope, will still the vicious Communist lie that these people were "kidnaped" by the U.S.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

BOSTON GLOBE - 4 MAY 1975 (6)

Lessons from Vietnam

The greatest disaster in American foreign policy has ended at last. This country's intervention in Southeast Asia cost us more than 50,000 American lives and $150 billion in tax money. And, in the end, we got nothing for our effort but pain and humiliation.

If there is a single lesson in this terrible experience, it is that America's foreign policy has been isolated from the will of the people at home and has become increasingly out of touch with the ideals and aspirations of the people we aimed to help abroad — not just in Vietnam, but in places like Greece and Portugal, Chile and the Middle East.

In large part our deafness has stemmed from a dangerous overdependence by two Presidents on a single brilliant and tireless Secretary of State who was given free rein to promote what he saw as the best interests of the United States.

This has resulted in short-term gains without long-range solutions. It has made waste of a large and extremely capable State Department. And it has not only led to the neglect of areas beyond Dr. Kissinger's personal scrutiny but it has closed the Administration to valuable outside advice.

As Mary McGrory suggested last week, it was not until our young people "took up arms in the McCarthy campaign" and "evicted a President" that the ordinary citizen began to question our activities abroad. With the young people and their parents of the World War II generation in rout, grass roots resentment began to penetrate Congress.

American foreign policy has too often been regarded as the exclusive province of the President and his Secretary of State. Today Congress is taking an active interest in foreign policy. It should be a long time before any Administration is again allowed to lead the nation down the road of military intervention.

And, with the people still casting a suspicious eye on everything that happens in Washington, there is a fair chance that a consensus foreign policy can evolve.

It may be a dangerous process. The temper of the country is more isolationist than internationalist these days and, as James Q. Wilson points out in the Spring issue of "The Public Interest," there is a continuing decline in the people's trust in their government.

This could manifest itself in a Congress which substitutes obstruction for consideration and result in a foreign policy that is timid rather than cautious. Recent polls seem to suggest that the average citizen would just as soon forget Asia and the Asians and focus entirely on domestic matters.

But we cannot forget Asia — or Europe or Africa or Latin America or the Middle East. Americans must not give unwitting credence to the domino theory by reacting so strongly to the failure in Indochina that we abandon our commitments to the rest of the world rather than creatively modifying them. As President Kennedy once put it, "Domestic policy can defeat us; foreign policy will kill us."

Overall, our goal must be to get back to the point where the United States is respected for what it is, not for the power it wields.

What this country needs now is a new type of commitment. No longer can we rely on threats of arms and economic reprisal to get our way. In fact we should work to reduce the reliance on arms everywhere. And this process might well begin with a review of all of the 50 to 80 bilateral treaties now in existence that require the United States to use force on behalf of a perceived ally, regardless of our lasting national interest.

Our new commitment should be based on openness and on respect for the rights and interests of other nations as well as our own. Economic, technical and humanitarian aid should be based on mutual interest but they should not be used to curry favor with one people while letting another people become our enemy.

It will not be easy to change a foreign policy which has undergone little modification since the days of John Foster Dulles' brinksmanship. But change it we must, if we are to survive in a changing world.

BALTIMORE NEWS AMERICAN - 1 MAY 1975 (6)

The Taste Of Ashes

So it has ended at last, this Vietnamese war of more than 30 years, and perhaps the strongest first reaction was a sense of numbed surprise that the end came so quickly in the final cataclysm.

It is literally difficult to grasp that it really is all over, that unconditional surrender was given by the Saigon government to its Communist invaders, that it would do so with such meekness after so much suffering by its people over so many years.

The brutal fact is that Saigon was beaten and had absolutely no hope of victory left. In the face of forces armed by unlimited supplies from the Soviet Union and Red China, South Vietnam was doomed when the 74th Congress withheld similar aid from the United States.

It is unfair to blame Congress. Its members are elected to represent the views of the American public. And that public — in no uncertain terms—had signalled the hell with Vietnam and any further involvement in that country's troubles.

You have to face it. Following a generation of trying to help the south, a collapse of American will occurred when we got our own fighting men out of there through the Paris "peace" accords. The war had cost us over 50,000 dead, 300,000 wounded, some $140 billion and all kinds of damaging domestic divisions. Enough was enough.

Along with Saigon's surrender, a tragic chapter in this country's history thus has ended. Because of our failure to carry through in support of South Vietnam, a new and uncertain chapter in our future remains to be written.

The outlook is not encouraging, but the taste of ashes from our Vietnam defeat need not be as important as it may seem.

We can recapture lost credibility with our allies by keeping ourselves militarily strong — and henceforth living up to commitments made with the same kind of selective care taken by pragmatic bosses of the Communist world.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

FEATURES COLUMNISTS

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR - 6 MAY 1975

CIA view proved right Last days of Saigon:

By Daniel Southerland
Staff correspondent of
The Christian Science Monitor
Hong Kong

Graham Martin, the U.S. Ambassador to South Vietnam, is the target of much criticism for the hasty and disorderly way in which the last Americans and some of their Vietnamese friends were evacuated from Saigon.

But as time moves on, the critics are likely to focus increasingly on the more weighty issue of Mr. Martin's entire Vietnam policy and what embassy insiders began to describe openly in recent days as the Ambassador's "illusions" and "overoptimism."

Prominent among those insiders were Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) officials, who were painting a gloomier picture of Saigon's prospects for survival several weeks ago than Mr. Martin was.

Even well after the fall of the city of Da Nang at the end of March, the Ambassador persisted, according to embassy officials, in thinking that Saigon could hold the line at some point on the military front. The CIA, on the other hand, was convinced soon after the fall of Da Nang that the war was lost.

Last-ditch hopes held

With much of the country in Communist hands, Mr. Martin argued that the Communists actually held little more than "deficit," or nonproductive, areas, and that Saigon still had a hope of defending the more productive areas.

According to well-placed embassy sources, the CIA at that point saw the need to encourage the establishment of a new and more conciliatory leadership in Saigon. But Mr. Martin and some of his subordinates were advocating the formation of a "fighting cabinet" in Saigon under President Nguyen Van Thieu.

As it was, the "fighting cabinet" was ineffective, the CIA's pessimism over Saigon's prospects for survival seemed justified by further government retreats, and the CIA station chief in Saigon apparently had some success in helping persuade Mr. Martin that President Thieu's leadership was a liability.

It may remain one of those "ifs" of history, but some CIA officials are convinced that if Mr. Martin had foreseen more clearly the defeats that lay ahead of Saigon, he and Washington might have been able to move quickly enough to set up conditions for at least a gradual, phased Communist take-over, and a more graceful American exit, instead of the outright military take-over that eventually occurred.

Saigon bickered to the end

By the time Mr. Thieu resigned in late April and Saigon did shift to a negotiating posture, there was still much bickering among the Saigon politicians as to how power should be transferred from the old Thieu regime to a new "peace government."

The Communists began hardening their public position on negotiations, and, after halting major attacks for four or five days,

See CIA VIEW, Pg. 2-F

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER - 6 MAY 1975

Thais Want U. S. to Go, Not Afraid of Dominoes

By JAMES McCARTNEY
Inquirer Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon announced a 28 percent slash in U. S. troop strength in Thailand yesterday, raising new fears about tumbling "dominoes" in Southeast Asia.

The announcement, made jointly with the Thai government, cut authorized troop levels from 27,000 to 19,500 by the end of June. The announcement did not say how many of the 350 U. S. military planes remaining from the armada that bombed Cambodia and North and South Vietnam would be allowed to remain.

The new figure represented a sharp increase in the speed of U. S. troop withdrawals from Thailand, on the Indochina frontier, and could signal the beginning of the end of a U. S. military presence in Thailand.

The announcement, forced by Thai officials who have publicly demanded a total U. S. troop withdrawal by next March, could hardly have come at a more awkward time for the United States.

It came only a week after a total U. S. pullout from nearby South Vietnam, at a time when President Ford, Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger and other top officials have been attempting to reassure the world that U. S. commitments remain unaltered.

Thailand has long been considered the next major country that might be threatened with a Communist takeover, if the Communists won in Indochina, as they have now. It has been considered the next potential threatened "domino" in the much-discussed "domino theory."

But officials here do not believe that Thailand is under immediate military threat from Communists in Indochina. Instead, pressure on the United States to withdraw troops is coming from a shaky conservative government, under domestic political pressure to get rid of unpopular foreigners and pursue a more neutral policy.

In the classic "domino" theory, as first explained by President Dwight D. Eisenhower, the United States was supposed to give military assistance to threatened "dominoes." Now the Thais are not asking for U. S. help — they are asking the United States to leave.

The United States first sent major

See THAIS, Pg. 2-F

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
6 MAY 1975

U.S. looks beyond Vietnam

By Dana Adams Schmidt
Staff correspondent of
The Christian Science Monitor
Washington

The shape of U.S. foreign policy in the Far East — how will it emerge after the Vietnam experience?

U.S. leaders are groping for new plans for American influence and power — where to use it and to what ends.

The effort might be described as one intended to stop the trend that set in with Vietnam, to limit the damage, and make sure that other American commitments remain firm; to avoid future overcommitment without lapsing into isolation.

The President, who intends increasingly to take key policy decisions into his own hands, has made a commitment to maintain American strength. And Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger has talked about making a stand on a chain including Taiwan, Japan, and South Korea.

Now Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger and his Undersecretary for Political Affairs Joseph J. Sisco offer new insights into what they feel should lie ahead for the United States.

Dr. Kissinger in an appearance on the NBC "Today" show asserted that the major objectives of the United States "dictated by our history" remain unaffected.

"They are more difficult as a result of our setback, but we can master them and we will master them," he said. Recalling that "almost every great initiative in the postwar period has either been initiated by America or has been carried out with our strong support," he declared that "if we want to avoid a world of chaos, if we want to achieve a world of progress, the American role is absolutely imperative."

The problem, he said, "is to gear American commitments to American capabilities."

A major step toward cutting back on these commitments, meanwhile, was indicated by agreement between the United States and Thailand to reduce the American presence

See BEYOND VIETNAM, Pg. 2-F

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER
6 MAY 1975

The war machine: expensive

By WILLIAM VANCE
Inquirer Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — Throughout the war years we have been counseled by officialdom to look at the bright side and rejoice in the economic wonders wrought by high defense spending.

The multi-billion dollar defense budgets, we were led to believe, had a happy and healthy spinoff in terms of new jobs rippling through the economy.

Well, would you believe that those $80 billion military budgets actually were creating unemployment instead?

Would you believe that between 1968 and 1972, Pennsylvania and New Jersey were being robbed of an average 180,000 jobs a year because of the "negative impact" of defense spending.

That, at least, is the premise of an intriguing study that has just arrived here from the Public Interest Research Group in Michigan (PIRGIM).

The report relies heavily on the research and methodology employed by Yale Professor Bruce Russett, who analyzed 30 years of military spending for a book on the burdens of national defense.

Russett found that, yes, military spending does have a stimulative effect on some specific localities. But nationally, when spending on military goods goes up, spending on consumer-oriented items—clothing, food, cars, houses and the like — goes down.

For example, $1 billion spent on the military means $187 million will not be spent on civilian services, $163 million will not be spent on durable goods and $114 million will not be spent on housing, the analysis showed.

The study shows that military spending creates fewer jobs per billion dollars than any other government spending except the space program.

The real stunner here is in the translation to lost jobs.

Pennsylvania suffered the fifth worst negative employment impact in the nation, the study shows, with 127,000 "foregone" jobs, on an annual average, from 1968 to 1972. New Jersey was eighth with a minus 53,000 jobs, and Delaware was 24th with a minus 1,000.

In the five hardest-hit states — New York, Illinois, Michigan, Ohio and Pennsylvania — the number of jobs foregone because of high Pentagon budgets "averaged 85 percent of their total unemployment for 1968-72," the study says.

In all, 26 states lost jobs because of high military spending, including every major industrial state except Texas and California.

And despite defense-related job gains in the other states, the bottom line in PIRGIM'S analysis shows a net loss of 844,000 jobs for the U.S. as a whole.

THAIS -- CONTINUED

combat units to Thailand in 1962 and began a major buildup of air power for the Vietnam war on Thai bases in 1964.

U. S. troop strength reached a peak of 48,000 in 1969, under former President Richard M. Nixon. Major withdrawals began after the signing of the Vietnam peace accords in 1973.

U. S. officials apparently would like to maintain about 10,000 U. S. troops in Thailand, but the Thais apparently are under heavy pressure from student groups and others to force the United States out.

Thais also would like to improve relations with North Vietnam, now that North Vietnam has established itself as the dominant power in Indochina.

Thailand is not part of Indochina. The term refers to countries that were colonized by France, now known as Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia. Thailand is one of the few nations in the area that was never a colony for anyone. It maintained itself as a buffer state between British and French colonial interests in the area, often playing one great power off against another, with some success.

It is still a largely undeveloped country, operating under a so-called "constitutional" monarchy. People still fall on their knees before the king.

Only last week, Thailand's foreign minister angrily denounced the United States as a country without morals and vowed to expel U. S. servicemen within a year.

The foreign minister Chartichai Choonhavan, responded to remarks made in Washington by Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger, about a U. S. "obligation of a moral nature" to defend Thailand.

"Moral?" asked Choonhavan. "The United States does not have any morals at this point. They have already pulled out from Cambodia and South Vietnam, so we are going to have to depend on ourselves."

While State Department officials do not talk in terms of "moral" obligations to Thailand, they point out that the United States has had a mutual defense treaty with Thailand and other so-called "SEATO" countries in Asia since 1954.

The treaty requires that the United States come to the aid of Thailand in the event of "common danger" in "accordance with its constitutional processes."

In 1962, Secretary of State Dean Rusk embellished this obligation by stating publicly that the United States accepted a responsibility for defending Thailand regardless of what other SEATO nations might do.

Another matter causing tension between the U. S. and Thailand involves disposition of about 125 U. S.-built aircraft flown to U. S. bases in Thailand by fleeing South Vietnamese airmen.

The United States insists that it has title to the planes. Some Thai officials favor returning the planes to the new Communist government in South Vietnam. U. S. officials say the matter will be "negotiated." The Communists insist that they own the planes.

The Pentagon reported yesterday that it already had started to remove some of the planes, according to the Associated Press. A spokesman said the larger C-130s were being flown out and smaller aircraft such as helicopters were being loaded onto the carrier USS Midway off the Thai port of Sattahip.

CIA VIEW -- CONTINUED

they grew impatient and began pressing again militarily. The demoralized Saigon Army crumbled rapidly in the face of more concerted thrusts. And as senior Saigon Army officers began sending their families out of the country and then fleeing for their own lives, the smell of victory apparently became overpowering for the Communists. There was little left for them to do but walk into Saigon.

By late Monday, April 28, Ambassador Martin still thought the Communists probably would go through the motions of negotiating a final settlement that would amount to little more than a disguised surrender for Saigon but would permit the presence of a reduced U.S. Embassy staff in South Vietnam.

This view still prevailed at an embassy meeting that ended around 2 a.m. Tuesday. But by late that morning the risk that the Communists might soon overrun the city became apparent to all and the final evacuation was ordered.

Evacuation started late

Mr. Martin earlier had feared moving toward a complete evacuation of Americans, because he thought that it would amount to "pushing the panic button," and would undermine any further "will to resist" on the part of Saigon. A staged evacuation had been going on for weeks, but it had been orchestrated to give the impression that not all the Americans were leaving.

One mistake, in the view of many critics, was not to have evacuated earlier, along with their families, more of the Vietnamese who had worked for the Americans. But Ambassador Martin had thought he had more time to get them out. As it was, an undetermined number of these Vietnamese were left behind.

The irony was that some of the Vietnamese the Americans considered the most "deserving" were left behind, while quite a few corrupt officials and military officers, as well as bar girls and prostitutes, got out on the basis of personal friendships with Americans and hastily contrived "marriages."

About 180 Vietnamese, comprising employees of the U.S. Information Service (USIS) and their families, had gathered at the USIS offices in Saigon Tuesday to be taken to the airport. When buses for the airport began to load, people from the streets poured onto them, the employees were pinned inside the USIS compound, and left behind.

BEYOND VIETNAM -- CONTINUED

there by one-fourth, from 25,000 to 19,500. Some 350 aircraft, which once spearheaded American bombing of North Vietnam and Cambodia, are expected to be reduced proportionately

The reduction is a first step toward total withdrawal with 12 months demanded by the Thai Government.

That will leave the main American military presence in the form of the Seventh Fleet with its five aircraft carriers, about 40,000 men in South Korea, and a Marine division on Guam. The Philippines has asked for renegotiation of U.S. air and naval bases, Indonesia's anti-communist regime has shown signs of nervousness, and Japan is seeking to draw tighter the strands of the United States mutual defense commitment.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

U.S. NEWS & WORLD REPORT 12 MAY 1975 (6)

WHAT'S WRONG WITH THE MARINES?

There's unrest in the ranks, key weapons are short, career leathernecks are fed up. It's enough to raise fresh worries about the Corps' future.

Signs that the U.S. Marine Corps is fading as the nation's elite fighting force is a matter of deepening concern in Washington—and in the Corps itself.

The quality of the men who serve is a matter of widening debate. Desertions and court-martial convictions are climbing. Crime inside the barracks is rampant. Many career Marines are fed up and are getting out.

Key equipment is in short supply. Marines still lack the latest antitank missiles, though they already are being made available to Mideast nations. The Corps' own tank forces are approaching obsolescence.

Marine generals are wracked with dissension over the future of their service. A bitter fight over selection of a new Commandant was dampened only by President Ford's earlier-than-usual nomination April 30 of Lt. Gen. Louis H. Wilson Jr., to become the top Marine.

Lean and hard, or—? The Marines' top leadership agrees that the service has problems brought on by post-Vietnam stresses. But it maintains that corrections are under way and that the Corps is lean, hard and ready to meet any crisis. A growing number of Marine officers disagree.

Talks with high-level Marines both at headquarters and in the field as well as with other defense officials reflect the widespread alarm.

A chief concern is evidence that the quality of the men in the Corps has been sliding.

In an effort to reduce on-base thefts and fights, for instance, staff noncommissioned officers have returned to living in barracks as policemen, according to Marine officers.

A senior colonel relates that on Okinawa, "We have two fully armed sentries on duty at all armories at all times. Who are they protecting the armories against? Our own men."

"Disorder squads." The Marines on Okinawa, the colonel continues, were forced to form "disorder squads," which come on duty at 4 p.m. daily, equipped with night sticks, body armor and face protectors.

Figures provided by the Marines and the Department of Defense show this about changes in the Marines since the Corps quit drafting men in 1972:

- The Marine desertion rate per 1,000 men is more than double that of the Army—89 to 41. In 1971, rates were nearly reversed—Army, 73; Marines, 56.
- The U.S. Army is nearly four times the size of the 196,000-man Corps, yet 1,328 Marines were convicted of major crimes in federal and State courts in 1974, only slightly fewer than the 1,697 convictions of soldiers.
- On a percentage basis, the Marines led all the services in 1974 in issuing bad-conduct, undesirable and dishonorable discharges. This has been generally true since 1970. In previous years back to 1950, less-than-honorable discharges were about the same for the Marines and Army, with the Marines often showing fewer. In mitigation of these figures, Pentagon officials point out that the other services are more prone to release men who will accept discharges in lieu of a trial.
- At two Marine installations with a total Marine population of 43,931—Camp Lejeune, N.C., and Camp Pendleton, Calif.—court-martial convictions for felonies jumped from 91 during 1972 to 184 in 1974.

Public complaints. So troublesome have discipline and other personnel matters become that some Marines have begun complaining publicly.

Said former 1st Lt. David E. Kelly, who once served on Okinawa, in a recent magazine article that received wide attention: The Marine Corps has "antiquated equipment, living conditions far below those of the other services, poor training facilities and lack of discipline." He added:

"Too many of the quality Marines get out."

Over all, the Marines report few difficulties in meeting their goals in numbers of recruits. Men completing their first tour of duty are re-enlisting at a rate of 19 per cent, 7 percentage points higher than in 1972.

However, re-enlistment among career Marines is off, a fact that worries many officers. What's more, Marine officials have expressed concern over having to dip deeper into groups of men who have been high-school dropouts, in order to meet enlistment quotas.

No magic number? Several generals told U.S. News & World Report in private that they fear the Corps has become hypnotized by numbers at the expense of quality—that there is no magic in 196,000 Marines, the number supposedly needed to maintain three divisions and three air wings as required by law. Perhaps, they said, the solution lies in letting manpower levels drop to where the Corps winds up with only 150,000 "really good men."

Racial integration poses problems, too. Though only 20 per cent of the Corps is black, the combat and combat-support groups are 38 per cent black. Headquarters explains that blacks are generally less well educated and thus do not qualify for many specialist ratings.

Black-white relations have taken a turn for the better recently, with the introduction of compulsory race-relations studies. Clashes based on race have been halved in the past two years.

Equipment shortages. As if personnel problems were not enough, there are equipment shortages.

For one: Wire-guided TOW antitank missiles and shoulder-fired Dragon missiles are in the Army's inventory—and even those of some Middle Eastern nations. But the Marines have none. They still depend on recoilless rifles, their own tanks and air support to defeat enemy armor. Latest antiaircraft weapons, such as those used in the 1973 Israeli-Arab war, are making the air-support operation costly, however.

Modern tanks are in short supply. The Marines are authorized 408 M-60 tanks, which are heavily armored and mount a 105-mm gun. By the end of June, the Marines hope to have 120—which looks unlikely since they have only about 60 on hand and production lines are slow.

As the backbone of their armored forces, the Marines have 431 M-48 tanks with 90-mm guns.

Such tanks "are not considered viable battlefield opponents for Soviet tanks," states an Army report.

The Marines have two antiaircraft-missile battalions, but only one is equipped with the faster, more-accurate and improved Hawk missile, designed to hit low-flying planes.

In aircraft, the Marines are well supplied by their standards with fighter-bombers, such as the F-4 Phantom, and ground-attack planes—the A-4 Skyhawk and the A-6 Intruder. The marines are also up to strength in helicopters and in amphibious-landing vehicles.

Even if the Marines had the most advanced equipment available, they would have difficulty getting where they wanted to go.

Fewer transports. The Navy, which had 157 amphibious-warfare ships in 1968, now has only 66, scattered from Okinawa to the Mediterranean Sea.

There are some estimates that to assemble the ships, embark an assault force of 25,000 Marines and transport them to a distant point—say the Persian Gulf—would take at least 45 days.

It is a decision to buy an advanced weapon that has touched off one of the Corps' hottest disputes.

A number of generals are angered by a move to acquire four squadrons—48 planes—of Navy F-14 Tomcat fighters, costing 18 million dollars each.

The F-14, built by Grumman Aerospace Corporation, is an extremely fast and agile interceptor designed to shoot down enemy planes at great distances from aircraft carriers. It now is being modified to carry air-to-ground weapons although, as a manufacturer's representative noted, it would not have the accuracy of much cheaper planes.

The generals are questioning the wisdom of sending an aircraft with an 18-million-dollar price tag to do a job that is done better by one that costs less than 4

(See MARINES, Pg 4-F)

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON STAR 5 MAY 1975 (6)

The Credibility of U.S. Commitments

CROSBY NOYES

The question before the world in the wake of the debacle in Vietnam is the credibility of the American commitments. And for just about everyone, friend and foe alike, it is a very important question indeed.

There are three major elements involved. The first is how our adversaries — notably the Soviet Union and the People's Republic of China — view our performance in Vietnam.

The second is how those who depend on American power for their security view it. And finally, there is the question of how we view it ourselves.

So far as our adversaries are concerned, there probably is less to worry about, in the view of many diplomatic experts, than with the other two groups. The Chinese and Russians being somewhat cautious types, no very sweeping conclusions are likely to be drawn about Vietnam.

To be sure, the Americans intervened in the war and their allies were ultimately defeated. On the other hand, neither the Russians nor the Chinese intervened, except with military and economic aid, even when their allies were most hard-pressed.

The Russians, for their part, allowed the Arab armies to be defeated in 1967, without seriously impairing their credibility in Eastern Europe.

The general guess is that our adversaries will be cautious in pressing their luck. They may even be somewhat concerned that the United States could overreact to a new challenge in order to re-establish its credibility as a world power.

The attitude of our friends and allies obviously is ambiguous.

They are making the calculation that our real national interests were not involved in Vietnam and (hopefully) that they are involved in Western Europe, Japan, Israel and other areas.

The most confident are those with whom we have formal security commitments, such as NATO and the Japanese-American mutual security treaty. The least confident are those nations who rely on American power (like, say, Yugoslavia) but with whom we have no formal commitments of any kind.

Other countries with whom we have commitments, like Thailand or Taiwan, or even an American military presence, as in South Korea and the Philippines, are betraying a growing anxiety as the result of the outcome in Vietnam.

For them, the really critical question is how the American public itself will react to the defeat. And they suspect that they have something to worry about.

I can hardly blame them. They, like everyone else, have access to polls which show that the majority of Americans would intervene militarily to protect no foreign country in the world except Canada (which also happens to be one of the least-threatened areas in the world).

They, too, can read the endless pronouncements of our most eminent political leaders about the "lessons of Vietnam," the mistake that will never be repeated, the myth of American power, and so on.

To them, it adds up to a powerful new mood of isolationism in this country that leaves them feeling suddenly and uncomfortably naked. And that also is understandable.

MARINES -- CONTINUED

million.

Atop all this, the Corps' leaders are in turmoil over its future mission.

This furor burst out in the form of a bitter struggle over the successor to Gen. Robert E. Cushman, Jr., as Commandant later this year.

Inside war. "Old breed" Marines with 20 to 30 years of service said the infighting was the fiercest in their memory, fragmenting the upper echelons of the Corps.

Selection of General Wilson to take over as the next Commandant is expected to calm, though not necessarily end, the differences.

"We can live with him," said one general who has been critical of present leadership.

Many Marine generals considered the selection of the new Commandant more important at this time than in any other period since the 1930s when the Corps pioneered in amphibious assault. The reason lies in the fact that the new chief will play a major role in charting the course of the Corps for four years during a period of transition.

Since the Boxer Rebellion and U.S. intervention in China at the turn of the twentieth century, the Marines have been oriented toward operations in the Pacific Ocean basin and, closer to home, the Caribbean area.

An about-face. Now the Marines are beginning to look across the Atlantic, convinced that the nation is turning its back on most of Asia for the foreseeable future.

Many Marines believe their new areas of interest will stretch from Norway through Central Europe to the Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf—from the Arctic to the deserts.

> These are all high-risk areas in which heavy loss of men and material is a very real possibility if fighting comes about. It will be the new Commandant who will lay down guidelines for combat doctrine there, thus affecting training, as well as type and quality of material.

Despite the headaches facing the Corps, General Cushman believes the Marines are still the crack force they are designed to be.

Liking for violence. The Commandant told U.S. News & World Report he thought the personnel problems are being tackled properly; that most recruits who complete training go on to become good Marines.

The general noted that the Corps is "afflicted with all the ills that plague big cities."

He added that the Marines "no longer get the big strapping farm boys" but the ones who are street wise.

They come, the general felt, with problems of drugs, racial prejudice and "a greater propensity to violence."

One general, rated as a possible future Commandant, said: "Stability is a matter of great importance. When you have high-quality men, all the other problems take care of themselves—drugs, discipline, race and crime. . . .

"We need to reinvigorate ourselves. Overriding all else is something not really quantifiable, but it is a fact. That fact is that we can develop men who will go into battle and win—or they will die in the attempt."

The foregoing was reported by Bem Price of this magazine's staff, himself a Marine for 12 years.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

U.S. NEWS & WORLD REPORT 12 MAY 1975 (6)

THE CASE FOR MORE NUCLEAR CARRIERS

By Adm. Hyman G. Rickover, Authority on Atomic Warships

The Navy on May 3 commissioned the U.S.S. Nimitz, our second nuclear-powered aircraft carrier and our seventh nuclear-powered surface warship.

The Nimitz has a length of 1,092 feet, a flight-deck width of over 250 feet, and a combat-load displacement of nearly 95,000 tons, and can operate and provide sustained support for a naval air wing of about 100 aircraft. Her initial nuclear cores will provide her with enough fuel to carry out operations for the next 13 years, thus making her truly independent of propulsion-fuel logistic support. These cores contain energy equivalent to over 2 million tons of coal or 11 million barrels of oil—enough oil to fill a train of tank cars stretching from Washington to Boston.

Freedom from oil. The Nimitz marks the renaissance of a modern nuclear-powered surface Navy. Nuclear power in surface warships gives them the ability to operate continuously at high speed: this affords them protection not available to nonnuclear ships. This could mean the difference between victory and defeat in battle. As the number of our advance bases decreases and the size of the fleet continues to shrink, the need for ships independent of the logistic umbilical cord for oil will continue to increase.

Next to providing the major deterrent to all-out nuclear war, I believe that the most important mission of our Navy is to insure that our first-line naval striking forces can carry out their mission against threats potential enemies are presently developing. A significant portion of our major surface warships must be nuclear-powered or we may end up without a credible deterrent to aggressions which do not warrant escalation to a nuclear war.

For the foreseeable future, the aircraft carrier will be the principal offensive striking arm of the Navy in a nonnuclear war. No other weapon system under development can replace the long-range, sustained, concentrated firepower of the carrier air wing. Nuclear submarines and nuclear surface ships with antiair and antisubmarine capabilities are all needed to supplement and augment the capabilities of the nuclear carrier.

The U.S. Navy currently has 14 active aircraft carriers: the Enterprise; eight oil-fired Forrestal-class, large-deck carriers built in the 1950s and 1960s; three post World War II Midway-class carriers, and two World War II Essex-class carriers, the Oriskany and the Hancock. This is about half the 24 carriers the U.S. Navy had at the beginning of the Vietnam War.

It will be necessary to start building replacements for the eight Forrestal-class carriers soon just to sustain a 12-carrier force. With the declining number of overseas U.S. bases and the decreasing number of carriers, it is important that the new carriers we build be as capable as possible. The Nimitz and her sister ships are such carriers.

Our carriers are vulnerable to attack by Soviet sea-based cruise missiles—as are all surface ships. However, the first line of defense our surface ships have against such missiles and their launching platforms is carrier-based aircraft. Without carriers and their aircraft, other surface warships, replenishment ships and amphibious forces would be all much more vulnerable.

The nuclear-carrier task force with its capability of unlimited operation at high speed is the most powerful, least vulnerable surface-ship force in the history of naval warfare.

Some have objected to nuclear warships on the basis of higher initial-investment cost. In this regard, it should be borne in mind that the initial cost of conventional ships does not include the cost of oil. Recently, oil costs have risen dramatically.

It costs more than $25 a barrel to buy, store and deliver oil to Navy ships. At that rate, it would cost about 270 million dollars to provide the amount of oil for a conventionally powered carrier equivalent to the nuclear fuel in the Nimitz. That is almost three times the comparable cost of nuclear fuel for this type ship.

Nuclear ships are often compared in cost with cheaper conventional ships of much less military capability, the argument being that we should build more of the cheaper conventional ships rather than fewer of the nuclear ships. Yet study after study has shown that when all costs are considered, nuclear warships cost little more than conventional warships having the same weapons systems—and the nuclear warships are far superior militarily.

Further, the cost of war itself far exceeds any cost needed to be prepared to prevent a war. The best warships we can build are those which are never used in combat because they have served to prevent war.

At stake: "our survival." With the heavy military and nonmilitary demands on its budget, the United States must only spend where it is necessary and where the value received is clear. But the real value of having a Navy capable of countering the Soviet threat cannot be measured in dollars alone: our survival may also depend on it.

The Soviets recognize the importance of becoming the world's strongest sea power. We have now chosen not to challenge them with numbers of ships. For this reason, it is essential that the ships we do build are the most powerful and effective weapons we know how to build. This means nuclear propulsion for major warships. The penalty for any other approach is the steady erosion of our conventional military forces, with the consequent reduction in our influence and in our "options" in world affairs.

The alternative is to rely for our security on nuclear weapons. Their use could mark the supreme failure of mankind.

DEFENSE SPACE BUSINESS DAILY 5 MAY 1975 (6)

TUNNEY URGES SUPPORT FOR B-1. Sen. John Tunney (D-Calif.) has called on the Senate Armed Services Committee to provide the full funding requested for the B-1 bomber, asserting that the B-1 is necessary "to maintain the strategic arms balance and to demonstrate our willingness to support our commitments abroad by bolstering our defense at home."

He said that the B-1, which is an indispensable part of America's strategic deterrent, will provide the U.S. with "bargaining power" to encourage detente.

"It is important to demonstrate to the Soviets, the Chinese and whoever else might doubt the fiber of our determination that this country has not abandoned its role of world leadership and its dedication to a stable balance."

Tunney cited the major strategic advances made in recent years by the Soviets, including development of four new missile systems and a potentially strategic bomber (Backfire), and discounted the "many myths" brought up about the reliability cost-effectiveness and usefulness of the B-1. "Study after study has demonstrated those concerns are unfounded," he said.

In addition to its strategic value, the senator reminded the committee, the B-1 will provide 41,300 jobs directly and another 62,000 indirectly to California, whose economy has been sagging. (see page 20, for Rep. Les Aspin's charges against the B-1 program)

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

DEFENSE SPACE BUSINESS DAILY 5 May 1975 (6)

ASPIN SAYS AIR FORCE HIDES B-1 COST OVERRUNS

Pentagon Denies Charges

Declaring that: "Whether to continue the B-1 program or not is one of the major issues facing the Congress in consideration of this year's defense budget," Rep. Les Aspin (D-Wis.) says the Air Force B-1 bomber has incurred "a cost overrun" of $225 million in its research program.

He cited a special General Accounting Office report which also said that General Electric, producer of the aircraft's engines, is expected to have "a cost overrun" of $75 million to $100 million.

Aspin has also charged that the Air Force "has attempted to gloss over cost increases" on the B-1 by "claiming the increases are caused by inflation and delays in the program." He noted that the Pentagon "blamed" economic escalation, schedule delays, estimated changes, and the inclusion of component improvement costs for the $1.9 billion cost increase during the final quarter of 1974.

A Pentagon official said the Air Force has not attempted to play down the cost increases in the B-1 program and has admitted before Congress that there has been cost growth in the program. It was pointed out that Air Force Secretary John McLucas recently told Congress that the Air Force expected a cost growth of 10-12 percent in the B-1 program, not including inflation.

As the official explained it, "if the Pentagon and the rest of the nation cannot keep up with inflation, how can the contractor keep up?"

Aspin was referring to the most recent Selected Acquisition Reports summary for Dec. 31, which the Pentagon released in March, which explained there had been an increase of $1.939 billion in the cost of the B-1 reflected during the final quarter of the year (Defense/Space Daily, March 26). Although Aspin does not break this cost increase down, the Pentagon reported in March that $1.007 billion was due to inflation, $375 million for increased lead time requirements and procurement schedule impact resulting from delayed start; $407 million for estimating changes, and $143 million for component-improvement costs.

The Wisconsin congressman, frequent Pentagon critic, says the Air Force "has never publicly acknowledged there are direct cost overruns on various contracts." He said the "cost overruns are the direct result of mismanagement" on the part of General Electric and Rockwell International.

Aspin said the GAO report also states that "no minimum performance requirements" have been established for the B-1 -- "there is no way for Congress to know if the B-1 degrades below an acceptable performance."

GAO said there have been reductions in the supersonic and subsonic ranges, and an increase of about 5000 pounds in gross takeoff weight, with the current estimated gross takeoff weight 395,000 pounds-- "the maximum load the landing gear can tolerate."

Another charge made by the GAO is that the number of technical changes made in the B-1 that will be incorporated in the actual production "may be so significant that the test results will not be meaningful" or representative of the production aircraft.

The Air Force has admitted that it has had to reduce the speed capabilities of the B-1 as the aircraft has developed, but has emphasized that these reductions "did not degrade the capability of the B-1 to complete its mission."

It was explained that the gross weight of the B-1 was increased from the 360,000 pounds for the original vehicle to a planned 395,000 pounds, but the landing gear system has been redesigned to accommodate this increase. As for design changes, these are said to be less than 10 percent, "and not significant."

WASHINGTON POST 6 May 1975 Pg. B-11

The Federal Diary

By Mike Causey

* * *

Naval Oceanographic Office: Another hammer-lock has been placed on the Navy which is trying to move its Suitland-based unit to the Mississippi Gulf Coast.

The House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee has agreed to oversight hearings (via its Oceanography Subcommittee) into the move, which has been pushed by the powerful Mississippi-Louisiana congressional delegations. Washington area members of Congress got a boost two weeks ago when Sens. Warren Magnuson and Henry M. Jackson, both Democrats of Washington state, said they wanted the Suitland outfit to stay where it is.

The Navy has been looking, for many years, for a new locale that would please the politicians who control its budget as well as a succession of admirals who prefer sunny climates. When the Bay St. Louis, Miss., site was proposed by Armed Services Chairmen Sen. John Stennis and Rep. F. Edward Hebert (then House Committee chairman), it seemed to fit Navy's requirements perfectly.

It is rare that Navy has a chance of making three powerful legislators (Sen. Russell Long of the Appropriations Committee likes the idea, too) happy, at the "minimal" cost of disrupting the lives of only a few thousand employees and their families. So Navy studies were made and each concluded that the move should be made.

Rep. Marjorie Holt (R-Md.) has been punching the Navy goliath all along. She is the one responsible for getting a General Accounting Office probe of the move, and the upcoming hearings. She hopes the subcommittee (first meeting is May 21) will tell the Navy to delay any decision on the move until the GAO study is in. That is likely to be the end of September, and could knock Navy's secret timetable which calls for a go-decision within the next few weeks, so that the first workers can be transferred and in place by August.

* * *

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON REPORT - APRIL 1975(6 MAY)

Is It Safe to Be an Ally of America?

Early this month I had lunch with Tran Kim Phuong, Saigon's Ambassador to the United States. The morning news had featured the fall of several leading cities in South Vietnam. The reports had told of the armies of South Vietnam in desperate retreat, as they sought to find positions where they might be able to use their ever-decreasing supplies of arms to greater advantage against the armies of the north.

As you might imagine, Ambassador Phuong was very discouraged. He found it almost impossible to believe the turn of events. As we talked, he sought a tactful way to express his disappointment at the decision of our Congress to abandon his country to the communist enemy. It was beyond his comprehension -- as it is beyond mine. With deep emotion, he spoke of the sacrifices in blood and resources his countrymen had made to defend themselves and to preserve their right to choose their own form of government. He recalled the clear and unmistakable pledge of our national leaders to supply his people with the military weapons necessary to defend themselves in order to get their approval of the inequitable Paris agreement negotiated by the U.S. and imposed on South Vietnam.

And he spoke, as best he could, about the terrible slaughter which was already taking place as the communist conquerors took over the land. In particular, he stressed that the first group of people being rounded up were those who had worked directly with the Americans -- from the chauffeurs to government officials.

After lunch, I found myself mulling over his remarks and thinking back to a preceding week when Tran Van Lam, the president of the South Vietnamese Senate, had come to the United States to try to tell our officials and the American people what lay ahead for South Vietnam if it did not receive the promised military aid from the U.S. [See WR 75-3 for report of press luncheon cosponsored by ASC and the Vietnamese-American Council for the Honorable Tran Van Lam.] On several occasions, U.S. Senators had left Mr. Lam and several of his colleagues from the South Vietnamese Senate cooling their heels in the anterooms for inexcusable periods of time. On one occasion, a senior U.S. Senator finally stormed out of his door after a long delay and shouted at the South Vietnamese group that he planned to vote against further aid and that he did not want to hear their side of the issue.

I also found myself reflecting on the many arguments being used to justify cutting off aid to South Vietnam. I was most offended by the argument that the South Vietnamese army did not have the courage to stand and fight. I was especially struck by the fact that the Members of our Congress making this charge were the same who were choking off the supplies essential to that army's survival. I could not help wondering how much courage those Members would have displayed if they had been faced by a horde of tanks and rocket launchers while all they had were a few bullets for their rifles -- and no hope for new supplies.

It Was Predictable

On our Washington Report radio program, General John E. Murray, top U.S. military representative in South Vietnam in 1973 and 1974 and one of America's foremost diplomatic authorities on Indo-China, recently conceded that Congress's refusal to provide the one-for-one replacement of arms and equipment provided by the Paris Peace Agreement led directly to the weakening and collapse of Saigon's morale. The North Vietnamese were badly beaten in 1972, General Murray noted, but we have thrown away all this and surrendered by default. What could have been a shining example of freedom in Southeast Asia has turned to ashes, and we cannot escape our role in it at all.

As General Murray said to our radio audience, "The tragedy was entirely predictable. It was predicted and was reported. My remarks have appeared in the press. My official reports have been passed through the Pentagon. Congressmen that I talked to would be upset about the situation. But it was like dropping a rose petal down the Grand Canyon and waiting for the echo. Nothing happened. Now everyone seems to be surprised.

"The Vietnamese were on a starvation diet. We cut their ammunition more than half, we cut their fuel back 85%, we stopped giving them combat rations, even their medical supplies were shorted. Batteries for communications -- things they needed to move, shoot and communicate -- they simply did not have. Their GI's, for example, used to have ten grenades pinned on them when they went into battle in the Delta. Now they were only permitted two and effectively that is only one, because they always keep one as a last resort. This end is, as I say, entirely predictable."

Our Vital Interests

The other argument that came to mind was the one that America's vital interests are not involved in Vietnam. This is the key argument. It has strong popular appeal. Saigon is a long way from Washington. But a moment of serious thought will show that the argument is supported by geography, not political reality. It is precisely this argument, however, which must be answered. If the answer is "yes," then there is some justification for our policy of abandoning Vietnam. If the answer is "no," then we are not only aiding and abetting in a tragedy of mammoth proportions, we are being foolish as well.

Recently I was talking with a distinguished U.S. diplomat regarding the far-reaching implications of our policies in Vietnam. He gave me some insight into their effects in the Middle East and Western Europe. He noted Dr. Kissinger's remarkably candid explanation of his recent failure to arrange a peace between Egypt and Israel. The solution Dr. Kissinger had proposed called for an Israeli withdrawal from much of the Sinai desert coupled to a pledge of support by the U.S. in the event that Egypt's minimum declaration of non-belligerency proved to be temporary. But, Dr. Kissinger admitted, Israel did not see a pledge by the United States as enough, in light of our failure to support our ally, South Vietnam.

In regard to Western Europe, he told me of a telephone conversation the day before with a colleague of his who was representing the United States at a major capital in Europe. His friend had relayed the amazement of the NATO diplomatic corps at the reaction of both the Congress and the Chief Executive to the events in Vietnam. The leading political figures in Western Europe, he reported, simply could not understand how the Chief Executive could enjoy a golfing vacation and the Congress an Easter recess while a country the United States had pledged to support was being destroyed by an invader. The political leaders of Europe were astounded that the President had not rushed back to Washington and convened the Congress in an emergency session.

In light of the makeup of the Congress these days, the President's request for $722 million in military and humanitarian aid was quite bold. But in view of the circumstances in Vietnam and throughout the world, his request was totally inadequate.

See IS IT SAFE?, Pg. 8-F

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Hanoi Thanks Americans Who Helped

There is also no question that communist leaders had gotten the message -- and a long time ago. The telegram from Dinh Ba Thi of North Vietnam, which caused the furor at the Academy Awards ceremony by expressing gratitude to those Americans who had contributed to the communist success in "liberating" South Vietnam, certainly indicated that the communists understood the realities -- including the fact that the Americans who had participated in producing and distributing the propaganda film "Hearts and Minds" had served the communist cause well.

One of the difficulties with Vietnam is that it has caused many Americans to focus on an immediate event and lose valuable perspective. From time to time, we need to drop back in time and broaden our view. As a starting point, it would be wise for us to remind ourselves that 20th century technology has compressed the globe, forced interdependence on independent states, and made all the nations of the earth neighbors -- for better or for worse. This condition means that every nation can be infected by a disease anywhere in the world body politic. All systems are interconnected. An anti-freedom malignancy anywhere will eventually affect us here.

National Self-Determination

In the interest of a politically healthy and stable world order, the United States has long advocated the self-determination of nations. First expressed by President Wilson at the conclusion of World War I, the principle holds that each nation has the right as an aspect of its sovereignty to select its own form of government. Wilson called for the creation of the League of Nations primarily as a means of providing for collective action against any aggressor nation which sought to impose its form of government on any other nation by force of arms.

In one sense, World War II was fought to reestablish the principle of self-determination. And it was the Soviet breach of that principle in Eastern Europe which started the Cold War.

In pursuit of the right of self-determination, the United States committed its military forces to combat in Korea -- far from America's shores -- because our leaders knew that if we failed to halt aggression there, we would legitimatize it by acquiescence. That is, we knew that if we did not act to stop aggression by North Korea, we would signal acceptance of it. In the instance of Korea, we participated with other allies under the flag of the United Nations.

In the case of Vietnam, we acted unilaterally to defend South Vietnam against military attack and to prevent North Vietnam from imposing on the South an unwanted political regime. Former Secretary of State Dean Rusk said it simply one time: "The trouble with North Vietnam is that it will not let its neighbors alone."

The Policy of Gradualism

Because our purpose in entering the war in Vietnam was not to destroy North Vietnam but to preserve South Vietnam's right of self-determination, we acted on the battlefield with great restraint. The official word was "gradualism." While we fought essentially a holding action, we urged North Vietnam to cooperate with us in a political solution to the problems of Indo-China, one which would in no way challenge the existence of North Vietnam -- even its preeminence -- but would respect the sovereignty of South Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia.

In the early years of the war, before the Soviets supplied North Vietnam with anti-aircraft missiles (SAMs) and supersonic interceptors, we could have physically destroyed North Vietnam in a few weeks with a fraction of our force of tactical and strategic aircraft using conventional bombs. But instead, we employed our sea and land based airpower against easily repaired supply routes -- primarily the Ho Chi Minh trail -- following a policy of tactical interdiction. And we used our considerable seapower in largely unproductive patrols along the coast of North Vietnam.

Some people have made the mistake of assuming that because our airpower did not destroy North Vietnam, it was incapable of doing so. In August 1967 the Senate Armed Services Committee released a study showing that only two percent of the targets for our bombers in North Vietnam recommended to the White House by the Joint Chiefs of Staff were approved. Instead of the JCS-recommended targets, others were substituted by a team of "experts" in the White House -- targets which had very little military significance -- "gradualism" targets.

I recall a story to illustrate this point which goes back to an early period in the war. The story was relayed by an Air Force friend. It appears that the Air Force recommended and the JCS approved as targets three airfields, all fairly close to Hanoi. They were: the main commercial field for Hanoi, a training base that had just received a new supply of Soviet MIG fighters, and a new airfield still under construction. The one the White House approved was the airfield under construction. And, one should remember, that target would have been among the two percent counted by the Senate Committee. You can imagine how unimportant militarily some of the targets must have been that were substituted by the White House selection team.

Never a Civil War

What makes our policies in Vietnam so incredible is that the war there was actually fought within the larger framework of the balance of power between the communist and free worlds. The war in Vietnam was never a civil war, in our eyes or in the eyes of Moscow and Peking. In their eyes, the war in Vientam was the test case for their new concept of "Wars of National Liberation." To us, the war was originally intended to signal to world communist leaders that we could not accept the right of communists to impose their form of government on a non-communist nation by military force.

In short, the location of the war was never a determining factor in its importance. To return to the figure of speech about disease in the world body politic, the aggression in Vietnam was simply the place where the political malignancy was erupting.

Our failure to fight in Vietnam in such a way as to destroy the malignancy means now that other outbreaks will surely take place elsewhere in the course of time. And everywhere the political health of the free world has been undermined.

A Policy of Phased Surrender

As Sir Robert Thompson, one of Britain's leading experts on Southeast Asia and guerrilla warfare, observed: "We are all becoming dominoes. The American retreat before Moscow, like that of Napoleon, is beginning to litter the route with corpses."

Sir Robert's graphic statement raises the question again which has troubled me for years, that our actions in Vietnam and elsewhere in the world have added up to a policy of phased surrender. I remember the blunt declaration by Dr. Slobodan M. Draskovich, a Serbian

See IS IT SAFE?, Pg. 9-F

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II -- Main Edition -- 6 May 1975

Joseph Kraft

WASHINGTON POST - 6 MAY 1975

Letting Go of the Vietnam Issue

A puzzle tinges the overwhelmingly hostile reaction of ordinary Americans to the Vietnamese refugees. The puzzle is why so many intelligent and well-educated Americans find the reaction puzzling. For the whole history of the war testifies that most Americans don't care beans about Vietnam.

Not because of what are called "racist" reasons. On the contrary, the true background lies in the strong, autonomous inner beat of American life.

The attention of 200 million throbbing operators is not readily gained by remote people in faraway places. Europe matters to the United States because so many Americans have roots there. Russia and China count because of sheer size and the impact of Titanic revolutions. So do the Japanese because of a sneaking suspicion they know how to build better mousetraps.

But Vietnam? New York, Chicago and San Francisco combined probably have fewer Vietnamese restaurants than Paris. The main point of perhaps the best American book on Vietnam—"Fire in the Lake" by Frances FitzGerald—is that Americans aren't into Vietnamese customs or culture. Even Miss FitzGerald had to rely on a French authority—Paul Mus—for her insights into the Vietnamese character.

American indifference to Vietnam shaped the two central features of the war—its massive and enduring character. In the early 1960s a group which I have called the "piano-wire hawks" argued that the Vietnam war—which they wanted to win—could only be won by following the lead of the insurgents. They felt the United States had to adopt guerrilla tactics—knife in the teeth and piano wire in the hand.

But that argument was always a non-starter. The American army and the American people were not about to change themselves into Vietnamese. So this country fought the war—as it was bound to fight the war—with planes and tanks and aircraft carriers and big battalions.

Connected reasons explain why the fighting went on so long. As early as the 1966 elections, I believe, and certainly by 1968, the majority of Americans were fed up with pouring out blood and taxes in Vietnam. If allowed to proceed unhampered by outside events, the Vietnamization program pushed by Defense Secretary Melvin Laird would probably have seen the United States out of the war long before 1973.

What got in the way was the anti-war movement—or at least that element of it which used Vietnam as a stick to beat the United States. Ordinary people may have had it with the war. But they didn't think the United States was a rotten country. They weren't that much down on the President, the military, the party system, the concept of loyalty and other features of American life which the war critics brought under fire.

So President Nixon was able to rally what he called the "silent majority." The antiwar movement was more than canceled. The war went on and on and on, even though hardly anybody wanted it.

The underlying reality, however, was that hardly anybody wanted it. The country, long sick of Vietnam, got sicker and sicker as events ground to their inevitable end.

So now more than ever the country wants to wash its hands of Vietnam. Hence the hostility to the refugees. It may not be a generous attitude. But it is not puzzling. It is natural and logical. Even healthy.

For the basic fact is that the Vietnam experience is not powerfully relevant to the present problems of the United States. Our difficulties did not lie in an all-powerful executive or an unruly military or an uncontrolled intelligence community—least of all in an imperial-minded people.

To harp on these matters is another form of the self-delusion expressed in the constant replaying of Watergate and the Kennedy assassination. It is a way of not facing up to the prime present problem—the unglamorous and morally neutral problem of making the domestic and world economy work.

Everybody knows the trouble laid up by the true believers who refuse to abandon the Vietnam war. Worse I think will ensue if the war critics prove as unwilling to let go of the Vietnam issue.

© 1975, Field Enterprises, Inc.

IS IT SAFE? -- CONTINUED

scholar of communism, who wrote in his book, Will America Surrender?, "Our policy of no-victory in Vietnam and our recent advances to China and Russia have made it unmistakably clear that the U.S. is pursuing a policy of historical surrender to communism." He explained, "There is no other name for a policy which rejects U.S. national interests as its permanent basis, and shuns the idea of asserting U.S. rights and will in the world as a danger to peace. . . . Only surrender and suicide can designate a policy which rejects and penalizes U.S. friends and allies, and helps and supports U.S. enemies in the world."

There is still another aspect about Vietnam which has received little attention. We are now in the act of acquiescing in a breach of an international agreement by a minor communist nation – not an agreement between a communist nation and some other free world nation – but one involving the United States of America. We negotiated and signed the Paris Peace Accord. And we are allowing North Vietnam to breach that Accord with impunity. The massive invasion of South Vietnam was a tearing up of that Accord and a direct challenge to the U.S.! We have not only failed to respond militarily. We have also failed to act diplomatically. Neither the U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. nor the Secretary of State has demanded that the U.N. impose sanctions against North Vietnam for its direct challenge to peace and to the sanctity of international agreements. Our President failed to ask the Congress for the right to use military power, if necessary, to force North Vietnam to comply with the terms of the Agreement. (Nor did he ask for further assistance to Cambodia.)

From the Far East, a valued friend of the U.S., President Ferdinand Marcos of the Philippines, declared recently that Congress's refusal to extend additional aid to our Indochina allies suggests strongly that the United States no longer considers Southeast Asia vital to its interests. Philippine authorities are now looking carefully at our bilateral defense pact and at our military base agreements to see whether they were mutually beneficial.

If our national leaders did not understand the importance and the implications of the tragedy in Vietnam, the policy-makers in the Middle East, Far East, and Western Europe certainly had no difficulty.

Our failure to take action against North Vietnam is especially significant to our allies around the world. Ambassador Phuong made the point clearly in a television interview recently when he said: ". . . the United States has not lived up to the Paris ceasefire agreement and the world probably would conclude that it is safer to be an ally of the Communists than the Americans."

If it can be argued that we do not have the military strength to follow any other policy than that of acquiescence in Cambodia and Vietnam, then we must ask, Why do we not have the sufficient strength?

If we are going to allow North Vietnam to breach the Paris Peace Accord, then why should Moscow not feel free to violate the SALT Agreements?

The clear answer to whether or not the communists can be trusted to keep other Detente agreements, such as the SALT Agreements, can be found in Vietnam!

The only remaining question is: what can we still do to prevent the tragic effects of our naivete in believing that the communists want a true Detente from being felt in our own land?

I am asking our National Strategy Committee to review our crumbling and discredited foreign policy and to make recommendations as to what must be done.

In the meantime, please note the recent assessment by the Foreign Policy Task Force of the Liberal Coalition for a Democratic Majority which is excerpted in the pages following.

John M. Fisher
President
American Security Council

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK TIMES 6 MAY 1975

Feuds and Bad Planning In Saigon Exit Recalled

By FOX BUTTERFIELD

Special to The New York Times

MANILA, May 5 — Although more than 100,000 Vietnamese successfully escaped from Saigon, the evacuation was marred by what diplomats and newsmen now recall as bad planning, bitter feuding between sections of the United States Mission and often an every-man-for-himself attitude.

As a result, many key Vietnamese officials and others who had long worked for the Americans were left behind. Many fearing reprisals from the Communists.

Moreover, the selection of those to be evacuated often seemed arbitrary. Dozens of prostitutes, for example, were taken out by American contractors and officials who listed them as wives or fiancées. But the chief spokesman for the Saigon Government and his staff, who would be major Communist targets, were apparently not helped despite repeated pleas.

In addition, same officials in the United States Embassy and Consulate — partly because of panic and partly out of concern for their own Vietnamese staffs —are known to have deceived each other or failed to notify subordinates about the final evacuation on Tuesday, endangering many lives.

In the end, no American officials are known to have been left behind, and the loss of life in the evacuation was minimal.

But the series of mix-ups and the haggling that accompanied the final American exit angered many American officials, and on the evacuation ships that carried them here they talked of their bitterness toward Ambassador Graham A. Martin.

It was Ambassador Martin, they say, who by delaying evacuation until the last possible minute — to avoid throwing Saigon into chaos — was responsible for the failure to rescue many endangered Vietnamese.

Some officials go further, accusing Mr. Martin of having been so isolated inside his walled embassy that he was blind to the inevitability of the Communist victory. The Ambassador, an aloof, secretive man who strongly supported former President Nguyen Van Thieu, became ill with pneumonia in the last few days before Washington finally ordered him, last Tuesday, to "pull the plug."

Leaving Saigon among the last American evacuees, the Ambassador boarded the Seventh Fleet flagship, the carrier Blue Ridge, and—except for a chance encounter with a few newsmen — remained unavailable to the press. He could not be asked about criticisms of his role.

According to knowledgeable diplomatic informants, when some American officials began to push for evacuation planning after the loss of the northern two-thinds of the country in March, Mr. Martin's opposition delayed it.

As a consequence, some parts of the United States Mission— composed of the embassy, the Agency for International Development, the United States Information Service, the Defense Attaché's Office and the Central Intelligence Agency — privately began their own withdrawal scheme.

This worked best for those institutions with their own air transportation and money to bribe Vietnamese officials and guards — namely the Defense Attachés office and the C.I.A. But the embassy and the aid and information agencies, which did not have their own "assets," in the popular term, were much less successful in getting their staffs out.

General Is Dismissed

On April 12, with North Vietnamese troops beginning to tighten around Saigon, Brig. Gen. Richard M. Baughn, the senior Air Force officer in the Defense Attaché's Office, was abruptly dismissed and transferred out of Vietnam by Ambassador Martin. According to military sources, he had angered the Ambassador by beginning to fly Vietnamese employes in the office to the Philippines aboard Air Force planes.

It was not until April 20, after the siege of Xuan Loc had begun 40 miles northeast of Saigon that Ambassador Martin on orders from Washington assented to the first legal evacuation flights by Air Force C-141 planes.

Thereafter the evacuation was pushed hard, with the embassy pressing the Saigon Government to accelerate granting exit permits and special passes for Vietnamese dependents and employes of Americans. In some cases the embassy actually helped in secretly taking Vietnamese out of the country without officials permission.

But there appeared to be little coordination or careful planning to separate cases of Vietnamese seriously endangered from those who merely wanted to leave.

Thus, for instance, a Vietnamese who had worked 10 years for the C.I.A. in Pleiku in the Central Highlands, before it was abandoned to the Communists, discovered no one in the embassy would help him when he managed to flee to Saigon. All his friends from the agency had already been transferred out of Vietnam and there was no one who recognized him.

But by contrast, on Saturday, April 26, a blue compact car of the type used by the embassy pulled up in front of Annie's Bar on Tu Do Street and took away three bar girls carrying suitcases.

Perhaps the worst case of confusion involved the United States Consulate General in Can Tho, the center of Military Region IV in the Mekong delta.

Officials from the consulate say they were never given any notice at all to evacuate their Vietnamese personnel until 11:30 Tuesday morning, when they were suddenly ordered to withdraw only their remaining Americans. By that time, the last emergency evacuation had already begun in Saigon.

As a result, the Con Tho office acting on its own at the last minute was able to get out only 42 of 573 Vietnamese employes, and 312 of over 3,000 Vietnamese dependents.

One Can Tho official who made three special trips to Saigon to discuss evacuation was reportedly turned away with the answer that Ambassador Martin would not accept puling out the Vietnamese employes

Another Can Tho official who was dispatched to Saigon over the last weekend to try to press for help in evacuating Vietnamese staff, was in the office of Donald Anderson, the embassy administrative officer in charge of pulling out field staff, on Tuesday morning when the order for final evacuation was given.

"Anderson got up and left his office with some of his own Vietnamese without telling our men anything," recalled a furious Can Tho official. "He just went out to get on an airplane with his people, leaving our man sitting there."

The Can Tho consulate at its own initiative had prepared several evacuation plans, including its main one using four Air America helicopters stationed in Can Tho. However, at 8 A.M. on Tuesday the local C.I.A. officials asked to borrow the four Air America helicopters for their own personnel and flew off to Saigon without returning the aircraft.

DEFENSE SPACE BUSINESS DAILY 5 MAY 1975 (6)

BILL PROPOSES REVIEW OF DOD CIVILIAN MANPOWER CHANGES

A 25-member, high-level commission which would seek to mitigate the economic effects resulting from the cutback of Defense Department civilian personnel employed at various military bases would be established under legislation introduced by Sen. Hirman Fong (D-Hawaii.).

The proposed Advisory Commission on Future Civilian Manpower Requirements at U.S. Military Installations, which would include the secretary of defense, would not be authorized to prevent closing or cutbacks at military bases directed by DOD. However, it would be authorized to find out what military installations are to be eliminated or cut back and to recommend "new ways to effectively utilize the changed status of the affected bases." It would also be authorized to: 1) Study the trends regarding the use and employment of civilians at U.S. bases and implications for the future use of such manpower. 2) Determine and project the impact that the withdrawal of U.S. troops from overseas bases and the reduction of the armed forces will have on various states and communities. 3) Make recommendations for lessening the economic impact of base closing; channeling the skills of those laid off into new fields of employment; retaining those laid off; and notifying the state and local communities at the earliest possible date of layoff plans.

In addition to the secretary of defense, the commission would include the secretaries of commerce and labor, the director of OBM, the chairman of the Civil Service Commission, five governors, five mayors, five country officers and five nongovernmental leaders.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II -- Main Edition -- 6 May 1975

WASHINGTON POST 6 MAY 1975

Israel Expects New U.S. Effort on Mideast

By John M. Goshko
Washington Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM, May 5—Israeli observers are convinced that America, now relieved of its responsibilities in vietnam, will soon launch a more intensified effort to defuse the Arab-Israeli conflict.

President Ford and Secretary of State Henry A. kissinger will meet Egyptian President Anwar Sadat in Europe the first week of June, and Israeli Premier Yitzhak Rabin will be Mr. Ford's guest in Washington on June 11 and 12.

Relations between Israel and the United States have been strained since March,when Kissinger's shuttle-diplomacy effort to mediate a further interim agreement between Israel and Egypt on troop pullbacks in the Sinai Peninsula failed.

Kissinger and Mr. Ford let it be known that they placed the main responsibility for the breakdown of those talks on Israeli inflexibility, and they ordered a complete "reassessment" fo U.S. policy in the Middle East. Since then; the Ford administration has continued to show annoyance at what it characterizes as Israel's shortsightedness and failure to recognize its own long-term interests.

Among other things, Washington has suspended negotiatios on supplying new arms to Israel and leaked word that Israel's pending request for $2.5 billion in military and economic aid during the coming fiscal year will be cut back substatially.

All this has caused great dismay within Israel, which looks to the United States as the ultimate guarantor of its existence.

In recent interviews, High-ranking officials of Rabin's government have frequently used such phrases as "tragic" and "deeply regretable" to describe the rift with Washington.

These same officials expressed a deep conviction, however, that Washington's tendency to blame Israel for the failure of the Kissinger mission is unfair and unjustified They left little doubt that the Rabin government badly wants to patch up the quarrel, but they also stressed that Israel will not accept a rapprochement on terms that it ragards as dangerous to its security.

This stance appears to have the overwhelming support of Israeli public opinion. The U.S. policy reassessment, which is widely regarded here as a psychological pressure tactic, has helped to solidify this support and may have hardened the Israeli position.

One foreign diplomat assesses the mood in more ominous terms, saying, "The Israelis are getting close to the point of developing a Samp-son-in-the-temple complex."

Officials in Rabin's government say that, in retrospect, they can see several reasons for the Kissinger mission's failure, and Vietnam is one to which they assign considerable prominence. By a strange quirk of timing, the situation in South Vietnam and Cambodia began to deteriorate just as Kissinger came to the Middle East.

The collapse of the peace agreements that Kissinger had negotiated in Vietnam made the Israelis skittish about the kind of accord he wanted them to strike with Egyptian President Anwar Sadat. In the Israeli view, this would have obliged them to give up very specific military advantages in exchange for vague, ill-defined assurances that the Israelis feel had been given to South Vietnam and that subsequently proved meaningless.

At the same time, the Israelis charge, the knowledge that his Vietnam accords were failing had a distracting effect on Kissinger. The officials leave little doubt of their belief that Kissinger and Mr. Ford wanted a diplomatic success in the Middle East to help compensate for the defeat in Indochina, and when this success proved to be beyond their grasp, they reacted by indulging in a fit of pique against Israel.

But, the officials add, they think that Kissinger's efforts would have failed even without the distorting effect of events in southeast Asia. The March negotiations, they say, revealed, perhaps for the first time, that a big gap exists between Kissinger's and the Rabin government's perceptions of how to resolve the Middle East crisis.

In pursuing his step-by-step diplomacy, Kissinger appeared to be going on the assumption that the nature of the problem —working out an Israeli withdrawal from occupied Arab territory—requires that the major concessions be made by Israel. Kissinger was said to consider this as working to Israel's long-term advantage, because it would lead in the end to the general Middle Eastern peace settlement that the Israelis want.

The Israelis, however, as one official said, "believe that the process should not be step-by-step but step-for-step," in which every significant Israeli concession should be matched by an Arab concession of roughly comparable weight. This would guarantee that neither side gained too lop-sided an advantage in the interim stages enroute to a final peace settlement.

In the March negotiations, for example, the Israelis say that they were willing to meet Egypt's demands for withdrawal from the Abu Rudeis oilfields on the Gulf of Suez and the strategic Mitla and Gidi passes in the Eastern Sinai Peninsula, but, they felt that they were entitled, in exchange, to an unequivocably clear-cut statement of non-belligerence from Egypt.

The Israelis contend that Kissinger accepted the Egyptian position—return of the passes and oil fields for an ambiguously worded statement of Egyptian intent—as the goal of the negotiations.

"I don't even think it could he described as a genuine negotiation," one official who took part in the talks sav. "In our view, the Egyptians hardly moved at all over the entire course of the negotiations. If anyone was inflexible, it was Sadat. For our part, we gave be described as a genuine neconsiderable ground from our opening position. But we got nothing of a matching nature in return—only pressure to give still more."

"Even then," he continues, "we were willing to go on bargaining and talking. But when we made clear that Egypt would have to make a better offer if we were to meet their full demands, Sadat apparently lost his temper and Kissinger apparently lost heart. It was they who broke off the negotiations, not us."

The officials say that the Rabin government would still react the same way under similar circumstances. As to the quarrel with Washington, they say that Rabin has decided to avoid exacerbating the situation by engaging in recriminations, and to wait instead for "practical signs" such as a resumption of arms aid talks.

In the meantime, Israel has carried out a quiet reassessment of its own, dispatching a small army of former Cabinet ministers and other prominent figures to the United States to explain Israel's position and to test American public and political opinion. As a result, the government now feels that Israel's standing with the U.S public and Congress remains high and that its problems are primarily with the Ford administration.

Even so, the officials add the government regards Mr Ford and Kissinger as "friends" and is hopeful that the dispute with them can be resolved amicably. Official circles have been encouraged by the fact that the signals coming out of Washington in recent days had a noticeably more upbeat tone. Earlier this week, for example,

DEFENSE SPACE BUSINESS DAILY 2 MAY 1975 (6)

SECURITY OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS IN EUROPE IMPROVED--DOD. The Defense Department reported to Congress last week that the security of U. S. nuclear weapons in Europe has been improved since a senatorial team found some nuclear munitions being stored under lax security in the basement of an administration building in Europe in 1973. The DOD statement came in response to the release of a report Wednesday discussing the 1973 inspection by the Senate team.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WALL STREET JOURNAL 6 MAY 1975

Sadat's Diplomatic Offensive

By Ray Vicker

CAIRO — America should say clearly whether it wishes to guarantee Israel within its borders or to guarantee Israel's occupation of lands taken from Arabs.

That is the thesis President Mohamed Anwar el Sadat will be expounding to President Ford at their forthcoming meeting in Salzburg, Austria June 1 and 2. And the Egyptian president is pushing the same theme hard in a round of diplomacy which seeks to rally world opinion against continued occupation by Israel of Arab lands seized in the 1967 war between Arabs and Israelis.

Here in Egypt, where the emphasis seems to be upon rebuilding the country rather than on war, there is strong support for the diplomatic offensive unleashed by President Sadat. There is also an attitude of injured indignation. In government ministries, on the campus of Cairo University, in homes of Egyptians one is constantly lectured that it has been Egypt which is seeking a real peace in this part of the world, that it is Israel which has been dragging its feet through Secretary of State Henry Kissinger's aborted shuttle diplomacy.

"I don't understand what is the matter with America, why it doesn't see that we are holding out a hand of friendship. We want peace. We want to work with America. Yet the United States does not use its strength for achieving peace. It treats us like . . . like lepers," says Mohamed Kamel Anous, director general in the ministry of foreign trade.

And at Cairo University, Mahmoud Gamel, a 23-year-old economics major, contends: "It should be obvious by now to everybody that there can be no peace in the Middle East when so much of our land still is occupied by the Jews. Yet America seems unwilling to even admit that for eight years the Jews have been sitting in the Sinai, in the West Bank of Jordan and on the Golan Heights, pumping our oil from the Sinai, building settlements on Arab lands and ignoring United Nations resolutions which call for withdrawal."

Blunt Speaking

In one recent speech, President Sadat bluntly said: "I say to the United States that it is high time for the United States to adopt a well defined attitude to be clear-cut and black and white. Is the U.S. defending Israel within its borders or is it defending Israel's occupation of the land usurped from Arabs? This should be made clear in the reevaluation of U.S. policy."

(To many observers, however, the definition of "occupied territory" is not so clear-cut. Most Israelis remain deeply suspicious of the Egyptian call for return of the land occupied in 1967. They argue that Egypt couples this demand with a further call for "justice to the Palestinians," who were displaced in the 1948 fighting that gave birth to the State of Israel. This further demand, argue the Israelis, may well mean that Egypt still wants to dismember their country as it existed before 1967. Certainly many Arabs, and particularly the Palestinians, consider all of Israel to be "occupied Arab territory.")

Questions raised by the Egyptian diplomatic offensive are somewhat embarrassing to President Ford's administration. Up to now, the U.S. has avoided any clear-cut answer to some of those questions. By indirection, there is the implication that the U.S. does not favor annexation by Israel of those subjected lands. But that hasn't been spelled out.

Israelis strongly contend that a readjustment of borders was necessary for its defense, which means that Israel would not return to the so-called "Green Line."

Egypt's president is pressing the U.S. to define its own policies concerning Israeli "security" and if that fails, to bring the issue home to the American public.

This is the border which had pertained before the 1967 war. However, Israel has not defined what it considers to be a "defensible" border.

In 1973, in one interview in the lobby of the Tel Aviv Hilton Hotel, General Ariel Sharon blandly declared that the most defensible border with Egypt from his standpoint was the Suez Canal. Two days later, the Yom Kippur war (known as the "Ramadan war" here) proved that the Suez Canal wasn't so defensible after all.

Nevertheless, if you talk to 10 Israelis, you probably will obtain 10 different descriptions of what constitutes "defensible borders." And none of them are likely to involve returning to the Green Line, as Arabs insist.

In this age of long distance rockets, of supersonic planes and of murderous weaponry, no borders are any longer defensible in the static manner which usually is meant when the term is used. Perhaps the best way to work for peace is not to seek "defensible" borders which might prove as illusory as the impregnability of Israel's Bar Lev Line along the Suez Canal, but to try to diffuse the animosities which are the basic cause of trouble in the Mideast.

Israel, however, has committed itself to the "defensible borders" concept. This favors delay and more delay in the surrender of any occupied territory since any retreat at all is likely to antagonize some segments of the Israeli population. And the present government in Israel is not strong enough to risk any splintering of its support.

In the face of delay, Arabs have three basic choices: To press a diplomatic offensive hoping to achieve aims peacefully, to launch another war, or to fall back to a no-war-no-peace situation which most likely would lead to a war of attrition and then to a full fledged, bloody war, anyway.

With oil money pouring into Arab lands, time no longer is on the side of Israel, something which still has not sunk into many minds in Israel. That belief, though, is becoming more widespread in Western Europe, in Japan and among many Americans who have had opportunities to travel through Arab countries recently.

Another war, today, would be far bloodier than any so far in this part of the world. And the odds probably would favor Israel as the "victor" on the battlefield, without its being able to score such a resounding success that it also could dictate the peace. Only once did that opportunity appear, in 1967. Israel didn't rise to the occasion with the generous peace offer which might have led to peace, and the opportunity was lost.

So now, at a time when the world does not like military occupations, Israel finds it necessary to justify an occupation which it obviously wishes would continue indefinitely. Alleged "security" thus becomes the basic argument for such a policy. From the Israeli standpoint, it is a good debating position, for emotions may be touched easily with it. Who within a country could be against "security," for instance? Who would make political hay by arguing against it?

President Sadat's diplomatic offensive is a very clever gambit, too. He wants the U.S. to define its own policies concerning Israeli "security." If that doesn't come officially, he would like the American public to become so aware of the issues that people in the U.S. might pressure Washington to reassess its position. This would lift peace moves from the stagnant mire into which they fell after Secretary of State Kissinger shelved his shuttle diplomacy.

Prospects of War

If the Sadat offensive fails, then the Mideast could be heading directly for another war. This is something which should be understood now, with a whole lot more clarity than was the case in 1973. Well before the Yom Kippur (Ramadan) war, President Sadat advertised his desire to get things moving by booting Russians from positions of influence in Egypt. Both America and Israel ignored that action. Subsequently President Sadat indicated his intention to launch a war since nothing else seemed able to awake America and Israel. Again, few paid any attention to him. Yet war did come.

From the Egyptian standpoint, the timing of the current offensive could not be more advantageous. This offensive comes just at a time when the collapse of South Vietnam is bringing home to the American people the troubles which might stem from having the U.S. attempt to play policeman to the world. Secretary of State Kissinger has declared that one lesson to be learned from Vietnam is that "foreign policy must be sustained over decades if it is to be effective, and if it cannot be, then it has to be tailored to what is sustainable."

So Egyptians are asking: Is it American policy to defend Israel's occupation of Arab lands? And by implication there is another question: Does America really think that the affirmative can be sustained over decades in the face of bitter opposition from over 100 million Arabs plus literally over a 100 supporting nations?

And Vietnam provides lessons concerning what might happen if America is led to give guarantees which it can't sustain, say Egyptians. For Israel, there is a disturbing factor here, too. Suppose the U.S. clearly declares that it has no intention of guaranteeing Israeli possession of occupied lands? Then suppose another war starts, with Arabs claiming they seek only to win back occupied territories? What would the U.S. attitude be then?

Such questions are all involved in that thesis which President Sadat is expounding. Like it or not, the U.S. must consider them in reassessing its own Midcastern position.

Mr. Vicker is the Journal's senior international editor and is currently stationed in the Middle East.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR 6 MAY 1975

Jordanian paper says Israel masses troops

Amman, Jordan

Israel is massing troops and armor along the entire length of the Syrian and Jordanian cease-fire lines, the Jordanian newspaper Al-Destour asserted Monday.

There was no immediate comment from the Israeli, Syrian, or Jordanian commands.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CURRENT NEWS
SPECIAL EDITION

THIS PUBLICATION IS PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL NEWS ITEMS OF INTEREST TO THEM IN THEIR OFFICIAL CAPACITIES; IT IS NOT INTENDED TO SUBSTITUTE FOR NEWSPAPERS, PERIODICALS AND BROADCASTS AS A MEANS OF KEEPING INFORMED ABOUT THE NATURE, MEANING AND IMPACT OF NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL NEWS DEVELOPMENTS. USE OF THESE ARTICLES HERE, OF COURSE, DOES NOT REFLECT OFFICIAL ENDORSEMENT. FURTHER REPRODUCTION FOR PRIVATE USE OR GAIN IS SUBJECT TO THE ORIGINAL COPYRIGHT RESTRICTIONS.

6 MAY 1975 No. 4

COMMENTARY MAY 1975

Vietnam: The Final Reckoning

Robert W. Tucker

AT LAST, the final reckoning in Vietnam is at hand. Barring some unforeseen and unexpected reversal, the last act in what has seemed a never-ending drama has begun. How should we behave in the concluding phase of a conflict whose outcome we have for so long sought to influence? How should we act toward those we chose to support and whose destiny we presumed to guide? However one answers these questions, their importance is apparent. For what we ultimately learn, if anything, from this our first defeat in war will depend in large measure upon our collective memory of Vietnam. In turn, this memory will surely be affected by how we behave in the moment of defeat.

It may be argued that these are questions which should have been asked long ago, that at the very least they should have been asked in January 1973 when American military forces withdrew from Vietnam in accordance with the cease-fire agreements. In fact, they were only seldom raised. To be sure, many have asked how the war, and continued American support of South Vietnam, might be ended. But few have permitted themselves the assumption that these questions would one day have to be raised and answered in the circumstances we now face. The unwelcome truth is that most of us have been loath to confront the issues we have now been forced to confront. The sudden and dramatic turn in the course of the war has brought us to the full accounting we have so long sought to avoid making and one we have been encouraged to avoid making by those bearing official responsibility for American policy. If there is a pervasive air of unease over Vietnam today, it must be largely attributed to the realization that this dreaded accounting can no longer be put off.

At the same time, it is necessary to stress that this accounting is of a special sort and, as such, not to be equated simply, or perhaps even primarily, with conventional diplomatic-strategic calculations. It is not President Ford's falling dominoes and the presumably vital American security interests thereby jeopardized that have given rise to the unease. Nor is it Secretary Kissinger's strictures on the indivisibility of peace and the effects on American global interests in abandoning an ally (South Vietnam) in its moment of extremity. These arguments, invoked from the outset of the American involvement in Vietnam, are still not without some effect. But the effect appears rather minimal, and this quite apart from whatever intrinsic merit the arguments might have. Indeed, it may well be that the world of the middle 1970's gives a considerably greater plausibility to such arguments than did the world of the early-to-middle 1960's. Certainly, the American position in the world today is not one that will bear favorable comparison with the American position of a decade ago. These considerations apart, the point remains that the altogether familiar arguments of the administration in response to the recent events in Vietnam are markedly less persuasive than they were in earlier years, and even in the earlier years of American involvement in the war their persuasiveness was limited. The currents of public opinion, and of a substantial portion of elite opinion as well, are running in directions other than those set out by the President and his Secretary of State in defining American security interests both in, and affected by, Indochina.

Nor does it seem plausible that the unease over the impending dénouement in Vietnam is a response to expected recriminations—already surfaced by leading administration figures—over "who lost Vietnam." If anything, these recriminations are likely to still much of the unease that does clearly exist by submerging it in domestic political considerations. There is little the Ford administration can reasonably expect to gain by assigning the loss of Vietnam to the Democratically-controlled Congress accused of having been niggardly in the amount of support it was prepared to give South Vietnam, though there is a good deal the administration could quite possibly lose. This is so if only for the reason that the administration must contend with something approaching the status of a law of politics: re-

CONTINUED PAGE 2

ROBERT W. TUCKER, whose article, "Oil: The Issue of American Intervention," in our January issue has provoked worldwide discussion, is professor of international relations at John Hopkins and the author of several books on world affairs and American foreign policy. He wishes to thank his colleague, Professor Piero Gleijeses, for invaluable help in preparing this article.

JAMES KILLINGBECK, CHIEF, CURRENT NEWS BRANCH, OX 78765 HELEN YOUNG, ASSISTANT CHIEF
FOR SPECIAL RESEARCH SERVICES OR DISTRIBUTION CALL HARRY ZUBKOFF, CHIEF, EXECUTIVE AGENCY SERVICE, OX 52884

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

sponsibility for what happens at a given time falls upon those who currently hold power. To escape the operation of this law, however cruel and unjust it may in practice occasionally prove, the present power holders must make a persuasive demonstration that Vietnam might—even would—have been saved had it not been for a recalcitrant and penurious Congress. Given the difficulties of such demonstration, the prospects that it might succeed cannot be rated very bright. Clearly, it will take a good deal more in the way of "proof" than merely to argue that Vietnam would have been saved had Congress only complied with whatsoever requests for aid were made by the executive.

More generally, the circumstances of 1975 simply do not favor in the case of Vietnam even a mini-repetition of the earlier Republican "loss-of-China" gambit. It is not only that in the present case a Republican administration will have presided over the "loss," but that it will have done so in a period when détente with the Soviet Union (and, in lesser degree, with China) has been the great desideratum of policy. How is one to explain simply and persuasively to the great public that those who have been so instrumental in bringing about the loss by presumably being more generous with their ally than we have been with ours, are nevertheless the states with which we must continue to seek closer and more understanding relationships? The initiated may find little trouble in grasping these subtleties of statecraft, though in the case of the Soviet Union even many of the initiated are evidently beginning to experience some difficulty. It seems doubtful, though, that the public will be able to follow this logic.

Yet the charge against Congress of "losing Vietnam" may still elicit a strong public response simply by virtue of the blood and treasure the American people have sacrificed in Vietnam. To invoke this particular logic, to tell the people that its sacrifice has been in vain because in the end this sacrifice was willfully betrayed by those who refused to comply with the administration's requests, would be reckless and irresponsible in the extreme. It would recall a dark and shameful chapter in our history and, in doing so, it would put an even more miserable end to an involvement that has been marked throughout by little else than misery. Despite the occasional intimation that charges reminiscent of McCarthyism may yet be raised, it is difficult to believe we have in recent recriminations more than misguided, though understandable, efforts to prod a Congress no longer willing passively to accept either the judgments or the requests of the executive branch on Indochina—and, for that matter, on foreign policy generally.

II

THE question persists: Why the unease in watching the dénouement in Vietnam?* Why do I feel uneasy in observing a tragedy the last act of which can come as no surprise? Clearly, it is not because of any regret over a position of opposition taken and held for more than a decade. In retrospect, there is no apparent reason for altering that position today. I remain persuaded that the American involvement in Vietnam represented, more than anything else, the triumph of an expansionist and imperial interest which, by the 1960's, had submerged the narrower and more conventional security interest the policy of containment initially expressed. Without question, the involvement in Vietnam was also a legacy of the classic cold war, of the momentum generated by the cold war, and of the habits of thought and action the years of intense conflict had encouraged. Yet the greatest legacy of the classic cold war was the gradual submission of the narrower interest that containment initially expressed in the larger interest of maintaining under American leadership a stable and congenial global order. Vietnam was perceived as a threat to this larger interest, and it was the preservation of this larger interest—an imperial interest—that must ultimately explain Vietnam. In the purpose of maintaining a particular vision of world order, in the equation of this order with American security, in the hubris of those who led the nation into war, and in the reluctance to withdraw from a conflict that could not be "won" without resort to odious measures, Vietnam affords a classic case of an imperial war.

Thus the United States involvement in Vietnam was not primarily due to intellectual error, as the prevailing liberal orthodoxy on the war would have it. Nor can it be adequately explained either in terms of an ideological obsession pursued for its own sake or, with more plausibility, in terms of the domestic constraints of anti-Communism. These and similar explanations of the policy that led to Vietnam give to this policy a quality of disinterestedness it did not possess and a quality of innocence it did not have. That policy was not the work of incompetent ideologues who were blind to political realities and oblivious to age-old considerations of interest. It was the work of men who, though they obviously made mistakes, wished to preserve America's global preponderance, and who not unreasonably saw in Vietnam a threat to the nation's preeminent position. In the manner of all imperial visions, the vision of a preponderant America was solidly rooted in the will to exercise dominion over others, however benign the intent of those who entertained the vision. That this will was commonly cloaked in such disarming terms as "liberal internationalism" does not alter the reality. The policy of intervention—of liberal intervention—that culminated in Vietnam was the expected response of an imperial power with a vital interest in maintaining an order that, quite apart from the material benefits it conferred, had become synonymous with the nation's vision of its role in history.

Yet even for one who opposed this vision and the results to which it finally led in Vietnam, there is something awesome and disquieting in the swiftness with which so many have apparently abandoned it in the conviction that we have entered a new period of world history. It may of

CONTINUED PAGE 3

* It is perhaps well to emphasize that "unease" is used here in a sense to be distinguished from the unease that arises simply from witnessing death and destruction (and, in this instance, the sense of shame among many South Vietnamese that an ordeal many bore with so much courage and dignity has been mocked by the behavior of an army in defeat). We all feel uneasy in the face of the suffering of others, quite apart from whether or not we have had any role in, or relationship to, that suffering. In the case of Vietnam, however, the particular unease experienced today stems in large part from the role we have played in the war and the nagging doubts almost all must feel about that role. Then, too, unease might in part stem from the self-deceptions that have been entertained almost to the very end.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

course be argued that the vision has not in fact been abandoned, only the methods by which it was formerly sustained. But given the world in which foreign policy must still be conducted, the abandonment of these methods is very likely to leave the vision little more than an empty shell. Indeed, the abandonment of these methods may well result in jeopardizing narrower and more traditional security interests. In any event, it is in the excess of Vietnam that we may find a root cause—perhaps the root cause—of an outlook today that promises to be as indiscriminate in its anti-interventionism as was the interventionism of only yesterday. If some of the now visible consequences of this sudden change are to be deplored, this consideration cannot alter the judgment rendered on our involvement in Vietnam. On the contrary, it can only strengthen the judgment made on the intrinsic folly of that involvement.

III

We come closer to answering the question of why the sense of unease over Vietnam once it is acknowledged that we never honestly faced the issue of how we were to disengage entirely from an enterprise—and this regardless of the consequences—which, even though we should never have undertaken it, we nevertheless did undertake. To have faced up to this issue necessarily meant facing up to its probable consequences—indeed, to its almost certain consequences—and this we could not bring ourselves to do. At least, this is true for almost all of those who, however opposed to American involvement in Vietnam, have not been sympathetic to the cause of the other side in the conflict. A very small minority apart, then, the rest of us have sought, whether consciously or unconsciously, varying ways to escape from confronting the issue we now find we can no longer avoid.

Although few were ever seriously persuaded that Vietnamization would really work, many nevertheless managed to find comfort in the promise that it might do so. Even so, the seductive promise of Vietnamization itself necessarily implied the indefinite continuance of American aid to South Vietnam, both economic and military, or at least so long as the war continued and the North continued to receive help from its allies. To agree to the one—Vietnamization—while denying the other—aid for an indefinite period—was either obtuse or insincere, provided that the South Vietnamese government and army made reasonably effective use of such aid. Moreover, experience had amply demonstrated that "reasonably effective use" in the South Vietnamese context could only be realistically interpreted with some looseness, unless it too was to prove no more than a deceptive—or self-deceptive—formula.

The premise underlying Vietnamization, and thus the implicit obligation to continue aid support, was not the representative character of the South Vietnamese government. On this all-important point, there has been, and remains even today, much confusion. It is true that, during the years Vietnamization was pushed as a way to disengage from direct participation in the conflict, many argued that such assistance as we might later provide would never be effectively used in the absence of a more representative government. Whether subsequent events have confirmed this long-held view must at least remain unclear in one respect, since we have no way of knowing whether a more representative government would in fact have made better use of the aid South Vietnam was given in the period following the American withdrawal. The contrary position is not self-evident, despite the tendency of its proponents to assume that it is. There have been governments before which, while broadly representative, have nevertheless shown themselves incompetent to conduct a war effectively. Moreover, in the case of South Vietnam a government more representative than the Thieu government—though a government that excluded the Vietcong—would still be one that represented disparate political factions which have always been largely devoid of any real popular support. After so many years of discussion and debate, we still do not have a plausible, let alone a persuasive, picture of the kind of government that would have elicited such support in South Vietnam. It is, after all, quite possible that none would have done so.

At any rate, this much at least is clear: if the strategy of disengaging from direct involvement in the war did not mean the abandonment of the South, it implied the commitment in principle to continued economic and military aid after disengagement was completed. It is disingenuous to argue today, though many do, that this strategy implied no commitment of aid, certainly no commitment of military aid, and that if such commitment was undertaken it was done in secret. The argument is disingenuous because the strategy of disengagement was largely based upon just such a commitment, and this was generally understood and accepted at the time. Nor is it relevant, in contending the contrary, to point to the instrument that completed and formalized American disengagement, the January 1973 Vietnam cease-fire agreement.* For that instrument did not have as its purpose the specification of commitments undertaken by the United States toward its ally, and it is captious to pretend otherwise.

It is for these reasons that it is difficult to gainsay the position of the Secretary of State in urging a review of the "public debate during the period that these [1973] agreements were negotiated to see what the imperatives were of the administration in negotiating these settlements" (although it is rather startling to find the Secretary making so ardent an appeal to a process he discouraged at the time). "There was never any proposition," Mr. Kissinger went on to insist at his March 26 news conference, "that the United States would withdraw and cut off aid, and these agreements were negotiated on the assumption that the United States would continue economic and military aid to South Vietnam."

The record broadly supports these assertions. Although in the press conferences and other public statements made at the time by Nixon administration officials in explaining the agreements the military aid question was played down, it was nevertheless answered in a manner that was clear enough given the circumstances. Thus Kissinger himself declared in a news conference immedi-

CONTINUED PAGE 4

* The "Agreement on Ending the War and Restoring Peace in Vietnam" was concluded in Paris on January 23, 1973, the parties to it being the United States, North Vietnam, South Vietnam, and the Provisional Revolutionary Government of South Vietnam (PRG). It was attended by various protocols, thus giving rise to such varying descriptions as the cease-fire agreement(s), the Paris accords, etc., and subsequently transmitted to Congress in the form of an executive agreement.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

ately following the conclusion of the Paris accords that the United States would continue to provide South Vietnam with "that military aid which is permitted by the agreement" (that is, to replace used-up equipment on a one-for-one basis with identical equipment) and went on to state: "The United States is prepared to gear that military aid to the action of other countries and not to treat it as an end in itself. . . ." Similar statements were made in subsequent official explanations of the cease-fire agreement. When Thieu visited President Nixon in early April 1973, the joint communiqué issued at the end of the talks reaffirmed, though in guarded terms, what was by then a well-understood position. And in considering the administration's aid requests for Vietnam in the spring of 1973, Congress not only proved quite uncritical in its examination of the requests but appeared to take for granted a continuing commitment to military aid.

It is necessary to review these events, since memories are often quite short, even over issues that once aroused deep passions. The view that the American government, with the knowledge of Congress and the public, undertook no commitment to the government of South Vietnam in the course of disengaging from active participation in the war, may be true in the narrow legalistic sense, but it is only in this sense that it is true. The commitment the American government did evidently undertake was not unconditional. Few, if any, such commitments between states are. It was conditioned on the performance of the South Vietnamese and, of course, on the behavior of the North. But a commitment there was, and it is not only misleading but somehow demeaning to attempt to deny this today.

IV

In some measure, the argument that has gone on over whether we have had a commitment to aid South Vietnam may be seen as one manifestation of the temptation to believe that we were deceived throughout the course of the war by whichever administration was in power—though above all by the Nixon administration. And where we were not deceived, it is tempting to believe that our will, however inarticulately it might have been expressed, was simply ignored by those who bore official responsibility for conducting Vietnam policy. It is tempting to believe this—indeed, the temptation verges on a compulsion—since it relieves us of a responsibility that, for good reason, we do not wish to bear. In fact, the deception of the public and the ignoring of its will do not contrast so markedly with a number of other chapters in post-World War II foreign policy. Moreover, it is often forgotten how frequently in the course of the war deceptions were exposed and secret undertakings uncovered. This is true even of the Nixon years when secrecy and deception, particularly with respect to Vietnam, were carried to yet new extremes. Prior to Watergate, however, they did not represent a political liability for Mr. Nixon. Quite the contrary: if anything, the Nixon Vietnam policy, despite its manner of execution, ultimately turned out to be a factor contributing to his 1972 victory.

Nor is this all. The public will—one uses that shadowy concept with diffidence, though use it we must—was not subverted in the case of Vietnam, not even by Richard Nixon. It may fairly be charged that Nixon exploited this will for his own purposes. But if he did so successfully, it was because this will remained profoundly ambivalent toward the war. Though clearly desiring to get out of the conflict from 1968 on, the public never accepted the stark prospect of defeat. Nor, for that matter, did a majority of the foreign-policy elites, and this despite their opposition to the war. Nixon instinctively recognized this ambivalence, and it dictated his Vietnamese strategy throughout. By changing the costs of the war to the nation,* while effectively exploiting public unwillingness to accept undisguised defeat, the President was able to marshal broad domestic support in 1972 for measures that carried the war as never before to North Vietnam. The relative absence of opposition to the war in the last six months of direct American involvement indicated that public—and also, in substantial measure, elite—disaffection with the war had been largely a function of costs (and, of course, the absence of definitive results). This may be a depressing conclusion to reach, but it is one that is difficult to avoid.

The 1973 cease-fire agreement preserved virtually intact the belief that if we had not won the war, we also had not lost it, that we had not been defeated. This being achieved, the public could readily endorse, and was only too willing to endorse, Nixon's "peace with honor." The President and his principal national-security assistant, for their part, were almost as eager as the public to achieve American disengagement. In addition to its role as the most troublesome of domestic issues, continued American involvement in the war was seen as a constant threat to further progress in détente with the great Communist powers. The Paris accords, particularly coming in the aftermath of the last and greatest display of American air power, satisfied Nixon's and Kissinger's dual requirement that American withdrawal not be seen by the public as a defeat, thereby not jeopardizing the domestic support needed for "larger policies," and by allies and adversaries as an erosion of the nation's prestige and credibility.

It may be no more than poetic justice that the man who negotiated the Paris cease-fire accords has recently suffered so much criticism for efforts that were almost universally acclaimed at the time. But if Henry Kissinger merits condemnation for what is rapidly becoming in the eyes of growing legions of critics a veritable catalogue of sins, it is difficult to see why the Paris accords should be counted among these sins. Admittedly, the Nobel Peace Prize appeared at the time, and appears even more so today, a rather excessive appraisal of the Kissinger handiwork. But the present condemnation of that handiwork seems only slightly less excessive. For even if it is true, and it is true, that the Paris accords amounted to a delayed and ultimately miserable death sentence for South Vietnam, this condemns the Kissinger efforts only if it is plausible to argue

CONTINUED PAGE 5

* To this nation, and not to the Vietnamese, South or North. The key was the reduction of American casualties and the build-up of American firepower. In 1972, the virtual disappearance of what had once been a strong anti-war movement testified to the effectiveness of the Nixon strategy. Elite groups were almost as vulnerable to the strategy as the general public, though they indignantly denied being so. Yet the record is clear that it was American casualties—and, of course, the draft—which above all supported the anti-war movement.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

VIETNAM: THE FINAL RECKONING...Continued

that the results could have been otherwise and better.

No doubt, the results could have been otherwise and better had more favorable terms for the South been extracted from Hanoi. But more favorable terms could only have meant, in the main, the complete withdrawal from the South of the North's forces (together with some mechanism for enforcing the withdrawal), and on this critical issue Hanoi had remained intractable for years. There is no evidence we have that Hanoi might have been induced to alter its position on this issue, short of an American threat literally to destroy the North. Save for a handful of unreconstructed hawks on the war, nearly everyone else drew back in horror at the very suggestion. Indeed, the terms that Kissinger did finally get, though legitimizing the North's presence in the South, might (no more is claimed) still have given the South an indefinite lease on life had they been accompanied by the meaningful prospect that the American bombers would return should the North again initiate large-scale military action. Kissinger evidently wanted to retain that option—he strongly hinted so publicly at the time—but he was effectively deprived of it only months later by a President in decline and a Congress that forbade American military forces from engaging in hostile acts in or over Indochina. Once it was made clear that the bombers would not return, there remained no effective means of protecting the South, whether from its own misdeeds or from its endemic vulnerability to large-scale attacks by Hanoi's forces, and it is difficult to fault Kissinger's plaintive comment to this effect in his March 26 news conference.

It has been argued that better terms for South Vietnam might have been gained had the United States agreed to Hanoi's longstanding demand for an unconditional American withdrawal and Thieu's removal. But these terms would have been tantamount to American acknowledgment of an undisguised defeat and, for this reason alone, were out of the question. Even so, it obviously does not follow that if these demands had been accepted, Hanoi would then have been willing to withdraw its forces from South Vietnam. At least, this does not follow in the absence of a government in Saigon that at the least included, if it was not dominated by, the Vietcong. With or without Thieu, Hanoi gave every indication that its forces were in the South to stay.

There remains the view that even given the terms of the Paris accords the results for South Vietnam could have been otherwise and better had Saigon and the United States made a sincere attempt to abide by the terms of the cease-fire. Moreover, this argument runs, had the provisions of the cease-fire agreement been carried out by Saigon and this government, there would have been no need to send additional military aid—or, alternatively, even if the need still had arisen, it might well have been kept to very modest proportions.

Clearly, what is implied here is an overall judgment on the nature of the Paris accords, and it is a judgment to the effect that the accords provided a reasonable chance for achieving a tolerable peace between the South and North. Those who take this view do not deny that, in the best of circumstances, difficulties would have remained in implementing the accords, given the suspicion and hatred that persisted and the many imprecisions and deliberate ambiguities that characterized many provisions of the accords. Even so, it is contended that whatever hope there was for a tolerable peace was dashed by our behavior and the behavior of our ally.

The detailing of this behavior has been made on innumerable occasions and requires only the barest summary. Saigon, with our encouragement, hardly waited until the ink of the agreement was dry before initiating what amounted to offensive actions. Thieu almost immediately reneged on his pledge to release political prisoners, as he did with respect to the obligations entailed in setting up a National Council of National Reconciliation and Concord. The mechanism for broadening political activity in the South was thus subverted while the provisions for organizing free elections under international supervision were simply ignored. On the American side, a series of commitments, some public though others secret, presumably went unfulfilled. Among the latter are included the promise to withdraw all American civilians in the South who were engaged in the support of Saigon's armed forces and the undertaking to cease American air reconnaissance over North Vietnam.*

One might counter this indictment with the numerous violations of the Paris accords charged to the North Vietnamese and Vietcong, violations also alleged to have begun in the months immediately following conclusion of the accords. Would any useful purpose be served by doing so, and by entering into a detailed examination of the order and magnitude of the violations undertaken by the two sides in order to assess relative responsibility for the breakdown of the cease-fire agreement? It would not seem so. Even a casual rereading of the Paris accords only serves to reinforce the conclusion, apparent at the time they were negotiated, that their almost incredible ambiguities meant either that their successful implementation required maximum efforts toward mutual understanding and good will, or that their purpose was simply to provide the means for America's military disengagement while leaving the situation otherwise essentially unchanged. Since the former interpretation is either merely tendentious or absurd, or perhaps both, we are left with the latter interpretation. This being so, it is a largely useless exercise to ask who undermined the agreement. The agreement was made to be undermined; its provisions seemed almost designed to invite evasion and subversion.

The American negotiators may still be judged adversely for having concluded the cease-fire agreement. But fairness requires recognition that the alternatives were either roughly the kind of agreement that was concluded or no agreement at all. Whereas the former alternative permitted military disengagement and the return of American war prisoners, the latter alternative promised—at best—military disengagement. There was of course a third alternative that would have obtained military disengagement and the return of the prisoners of war. This was the acknowledgment of defeat and, as a consequence of such admission, the abandonment of an ally. It was not only the Nixon administration that was completely unwilling to contemplate this third alternative.

CONTINUED PAGE 6

* These and other secret commitments are discussed by Tad Szulc, "Beyond the Vietnam Cease-Fire Agreement," Foreign Policy (Summer 1974), pp. 21-69.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

So was the nation, though in lesser degree. In light of what we now know, it is easy and fashionable to say that the third alternative would have represented the course of wisdom. For it is only by the barest of subterfuges that we may now continue to pretend that we were not defeated in Vietnam. Pride often counts for more than wisdom, however, and particularly in the case of powerful nations. And even were it not for pride, there was always the question of what to do with those whose destiny we sought to determine, however misguidedly, and whom, though their destiny is no longer within our reach (if, indeed, it ever really was), we cannot with honor simply cast aside.

V

THERE is an almost instinctively negative reaction to once again raising the matter of honor in relation to Vietnam. The reaction is surely understandable, even if misplaced. Abused and perverted on so many occasions during the past decade in relation to the war, the American involvement in Vietnam has almost succeeded in giving honor a bad name. Are we to conclude from this experience, however, that there is no such thing as honor or that honor can have no relevance to the manner in which as a nation we behave toward others? Apparently not, for it is the most extreme opponents of the war who have themselves been most insistent on seeing Vietnam as raising above all a moral issue and therefore, by implication, a matter of honor. Whether morality, and honor, occupy so exalted a position in the affairs of nations is a question that need not be entered into here. It is sufficient to insist that honor does enter into such affairs and that nations may dishonor, and have dishonored, themselves.

There can be no objection, then, to raising the matter of honor at this late date and to ask what remaining obligations, if any, we have that have grown out of our role in the Vietnamese conflict. It is no criticism of the Secretary of State that he has seen fit to ask this question and to answer it. Mr. Kissinger believes that in the "moment of extremity" of an ally the test of our character as a people is whether we are willing to stand by a commitment earlier made and to continue aid to that ally. This is, to him, "an elementary question of what kind of a people we are . . . a fundamental question of how we are viewed by all other people, and it has nothing to do with the question of whether we should ever have gotten involved there [Indochina] in the first place." To desert one's ally even when the latter's cause has become extreme is to dishonor oneself. And so it is, provided the commitment itself was an honorable one and the recipient has fulfilled the conditions implied by the commitment. To argue that even a dishonorable commitment, once made, can only be abandoned at the cost of honor itself is simply perverse. To insist that the recipient of a commitment deserves one's continued loyalty even if he has failed to fulfill the conditions of the commitment is unreasonable.

Whether the commitment made to South Vietnam is judged more than a mistake is a question that need not be argued here. What is of relevance is whether the South Vietnamese government made reasonably effective use of such aid as was given it. For if it did not do so, the further question whether it was given "adequate" aid need not even be considered. Did our ally fulfill the elementary condition implied by the commitment? There is very little evidence to support the view that it did, and a great deal of evidence to support the view that it did not. By almost any reasonable standard of effectiveness of performance, and even assuming for the sake of argument the existence of certain shortages due to the alleged penury of the aid-giver, the indispensable condition of continued moral obligation simply was not met. What follows from this is not that one may view with indifference the plight of those remnants of an armed force which do remain willing and able to fight. There is, in fact, no generally satisfactory answer that can be given in such extreme and agonizing situations, save to say —and it is concededly not much—that such answer must be determined by practical as well as humanitarian criteria. On the major issue, however, the response seems quite clear: there remains no obligation to be violated.

These considerations have taken administration arguments, particularly those of Mr. Kissinger, at face value. But this surely cannot be the end of the matter. We are entitled to ask, why the extraordinary sensitivity shown, not merely over keeping commitments—this is altogether expected—but over the moral necessity of doing so? While the Secretary may not be altogether insensitive to moral issues in statecraft, as his critics so regularly depict him as being, no one can accuse him of ever having been obsessed with such issues. Clearly, he is obsessed with issues of credibility and prestige, and while the importance of these issues may be granted, they are not synonymous with moral issues. The suspicion accordingly must arise that the Secretary has sought to use the moral on behalf of the strategic, that he has been looking at strategic interests and presenting them in moral terms.

IF THERE is nothing heinous in this, it is also not particularly admirable, above all in the present agony of South Vietnam. Moral sensitivity, one would have thought, might well have been directed in other and rather obvious directions, while strategic interests were being displayed for what they are. One such direction moral sensitivity can take is toward those South Vietnamese whose lives may be placed in jeopardy under a Communist, or Communist-dominated, regime if only because of past associations with the Americans. No one knows how many such persons may fall into this, and still other, categories, but it would be rash to assume the number is small.

Those who have for so long pressed the specter of a "blood bath" cannot in good conscience remain silent today toward the one measure that could remove their fear. The responsibility for granting asylum must be seen as a kind of litmus-paper test of the sense of obligation we feel, if not toward all those who will be placed in danger for whatever reason in a new regime, then at least toward those who have compromised themselves through past association with us. If the question of numbers is raised, it is well to recall that we took in 600,000 refugees from Cuba during the years following Castro's accession to power. Yet in the majority of cases, there was no physical danger posed to the Cuban emigrés and little obligation on our part by virtue of our own actions, as there is in Vietnam.

CONTINUED PAGE 7

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Nor is it only a matter of simple moral obligation that is involved in the case of Vietnam; it is also a test of the racism with which we have been taxed by others, and particularly in our attitudes and actions toward Asians. A refusal to make every effort to take in those Vietnamese who wish to leave and whose position has been compromised by us will confirm, as perhaps nothing else could, the charge we have so indignantly denied throughout the war.

Beyond this, if we are so concerned with our image of ourselves in defeat, as well we should be, we cannot avoid facing the issue of American economic aid to a South Vietnam we no longer influence. It is now known that in March 1973, the United States and North Vietnam came close to an agreement on American aid to the North for reconstruction. The agreement proved abortive because of the Nixon administration's ire over Communist truce violations and public indignation, reflected in Congress, over Hanoi's treatment of American prisoners of war, then being released. If aid for reconstruction was nevertheless justified in principle in the case of the North in 1973, then there is surely as strong a case to be made today for aiding the South, or, for that matter, the whole of Vietnam. To be militarily frustrated, and eventually defeated, by so small a state is humiliating, and nothing we say can deny this. Even so, generosity in defeat is not demeaning and certainly not for a great power. There is no reason why we cannot be as generous in defeat today as we have been in victory in the past.

VI

THESE observations are not intended to convey the impression that the final reckoning in Vietnam must be seen only in moral terms. Although the moral dimension of any accounting we are to make is important, the strategic dimension obviously cannot be neglected. What I have objected to is a view that misreads, if it does not pervert, the nature of the moral obligation that emerged from our commitment to South Vietnam, and that does so out of concern for strategic interests. Moreover, considering the immediate area to which this view has been applied, one must amend the preceding sentence to read that a mistaken strategic interest is equated with a spurious moral obligation. Applied elsewhere, to areas of real interest and to conditions altogether different from those that prevailed in Vietnam, the effects of this argument could prove to be devastating.

It is the tone as much as the substance of administration reactions to what has happened in Vietnam that are disturbing. While many have in retrospect unfairly criticized the 1973 Paris accords, the principal architect of those accords also insists upon finding a meaning in them they did not have. The apparent intent is to relieve himself of any responsibility for recent events in Vietnam. Yet there is the more ominous suggestion in the Kissinger reaction that what might now happen elsewhere (the Middle East?) must be seen as a result of the nation's failure to have appreciated its interests in and to have stood by its commitments to South Vietnam. One can only trust that this is little more than a passing mood, a short-lived reaction to a failure that can no longer be obscured. If it is more than that, if it is indicative of a more persistent attitude that finds increasing expression in American policy, then the prospect beckons of a determination by our policy-makers to create their own dominoes.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CURRENT NEWS

PART I - EARLY BIRD EDITION - 0730

PART II - MAIN EDITION - PUBLISHED AT 1130

THIS PUBLICATION IS PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL NEWS ITEMS OF INTEREST TO THEM IN THEIR OFFICIAL CAPACITIES. IT IS NOT INTENDED TO SUBSTITUTE FOR NEWSPAPERS, PERIODICALS AND BROADCASTS AS A MEANS OF KEEPING INFORMED ABOUT THE NATURE, MEANING AND IMPACT OF NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL NEWS DEVELOPMENTS. USE OF THESE ARTICLES HERE, OF COURSE, DOES NOT REFLECT OFFICIAL ENDORSEMENT. FURTHER REPRODUCTION FOR PRIVATE USE OR GAIN IS SUBJECT TO THE ORIGINAL COPYRIGHT RESTRICTIONS.

MONDAY, MAY 5, 1975

Air Force F-16 Termed Inadequate WASHINGTON POST 3 MAY 1975 (5) Pg. 1

Navy Bucks Hill, Picks F-18 Fighter

By Michael Getler
Washington Post Staff Writer

The Navy, challenging congressional directives, yesterday picked the new F-18 twin-engine jet as its future mainstay lightweight fighter, rather than the single-engine F-16 already chosen by the Air Force.

In announcing the selection of McDonnell Douglas Corp. and Northrop Corp. to develop the Navy's new jet—at an ultimate cost of more than $6 billion for 800 planes—Navy Under Secretary David Potter acknowledged that the choice does not meet congressional committee demands made last fall that the Navy plane be "a derivative of the selected Air Force air combat fighter design."

"It is perfectly clear this does not meet the language of the congressional report," Potter said. He told reporters that in the Navy's judgment, the jet picked by the Air Force "did not meet

(See NAVY, Pg. 2)

BALTIMORE SUN 4 MAY 1975 (5) Pg. 1

Ford dedicates nuclear carrier, says U.S. commitments will be met

By PETER J. KUMPA
Sun Staff Correspondent

Norfolk—President Ford yesterday called the country's second nuclear-powered aircraft carrier, the U.S.S. Nimitz, the newest, largest and most powerful unit of the fleet, "visible evidence of our commitment to friends and allies and our capability to maintain those commitments."

Speaking here at midday commissioning ceremonies, Mr. Ford acknowledged that the gigantic carrier joins the fleet at "an auspicious time" when American determination requires a "clear demonstration."

The President followed James R. Schlesigner, the Secretary of Defense, who said the message should be heard with "unmistakable clarity," and in words that were "unequivocable," that the "United States will maintain a military balance around the world," with the country providing resources to remain in "a position second to none."

Mr. Schlesinger added that the "most powerful military establishment was exemplified" by the Nimitz.

In introducing the President on Pier 12 here to several thousand Navy men and women, friends and relatives, on a bright, hazy day, the defense secretary noted that Britain's World War II prime minister, Winston S. Churchill, used to send messages to President Franklin D. Roosevelt under the code name of "former naval person." Mr. Schlesinger said the title was undeserved for Mr. Churchill had been a Sandhurst graduate and a former Army man.

But, said Mr. Schlesinger, President Ford was a true "former naval person" as well as

(See FORD, Pg. 2)

WASHINGTON STAR 4 MAY 1975 (50 Pg. 10

Hill OK Predicted For Navy Fighter

Associated Press

A key congressional leader says it is likely that Congress will approve the purchase of separate jet fighters for the Air Force and the Navy.

Rep. George H. Mahon, D-Tex., chairman of the House Appropriations Committee and its defense appropriations subcommittee, said Friday the "most likely development" will be that the Navy will be authorized to build twin-engine F18 fighters at the same time that the Air Force is building single-engine F16 fighters. He said, though, that he was not pleased by the Navy's decision.

THE NAVY announced earlier Friday that it had selected the F18 as its new fighter, disregarding congressional urgings that every effort be made by the Air Force and the Navy to select the same plane. If both services had done so, millions of dollars would have been saved by avoiding duplicated efforts.

The Navy is interested in acquiring 800 jet fighters. At $7.8 million each, the F18 orders would total more than $6 billion.

The Navy's decision still must be approved by Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger and Congress.

The Air Force selected the F16 in January, and plans to buy more than 650

(See HILL, Pg. 2)

WASHINGTON POST
5 MAY 1975 Pg. 26

Aspin Details Cost Overruns For B-1 Bomber

United Press International

Rep. Les Aspin (D-Wisc.) said yesterday that congressional auditors turned up a $225 million cost overrun by Rockwell International on research for the Air Force B-1 bomber.

The General Accounting Office, according to Aspin, also found that General Electric, which is providing the B-1's engines, might have a cost overrun of up to $100 million.

"The Air Force has attempted to gloss over cost increases on the B-1 bomber by claiming the increases are caused by inflation and delays in the program," Aspin said.

GENERAL NEWS SUMMARY FROM THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

MAY 5, 1975

World-Wide

THE VIETCONG freed officials of the Vietnamese government that surrendered. A "military management committee" headed by Gen. Tran Van Tra, who led the 1968 Tet offensive against Saigon, was set up to run the city. One of its first moves was to release from custody Duong Van "Big" Minh, last president of the former government, and 18 other officials, Saigon radio said. Soldiers of the defeated army were ordered to surrender with their weapons or be executed.

Former Premier Nguyen Cao Ky, who fled in the final U.S. evacuation, predicted in Guam that the Communists wouldn't carry out a "massive massacre." Ky also declined to blame the U.S. for Saigon's fall, saying: "Unfortunately, we weren't brave enough to overthrow Mr. Thieu."

Hundreds of South Vietnamese ships anchored off the coast and surrendered to the new rulers, Hanoi radio said. In Paris, the French foreign ministry said its Saigon embassy reported that all foreigners in Saigon were being treated well, including 38 newsmen. But it was disclosed that Michel Laur-

(See NEWS SUMMARY, Pg. 3)

JAMES KILLINGBECK, CHIEF, CURRENT NEWS BRANCH, OX 78765 HELEN YOUNG, ASSISTANT CHIEF

FOR SPECIAL RESEARCH SERVICES OR DISTRIBUTION CALL HARRY ZUBKOFF, CHIEF, EXECUTIVE AGENCY SERVICE, OX 52884

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NAVY -- CONTINUED

the basic requirement" for operation from aircraft carriers during takeoff and landing.

The losing contractor is a team headed by LTV Corp. of Dallas, which has considerable experience building Navy jets, and General Dynamics, also of Texas. General Dynamics was the prime contractor on the $4.6 billion Air Force contract.

There is extraordinary interest within the defense industry, the military services and foreign countries in these two jet fighter programs—perhaps more than in any past weapon contract.

The Air Force contract originally was called "the contract of the century" because it was assumed that in addition to 650 F-16s for the Air Force, Congress would force the Navy to buy 800 of the light, maneuverable jets and there were another 1,500 potential sales overseas to NATO countries. In all, a market for some 3,000 airplanes worth about $15 billion over the next decade was foreseen.

Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger last winter speeded up selection of the Air Force F-16 so that a four-nation NATO consortium would know which plane the United States was going to buy. But the NATO countries still have not made their choice and now the U.S. appears headed toward building two different jets.

Congress generally has sought to have one basic plane built for both services. The Pentagon also has stressed that it would be best for NATO to standardize its forces with a single new jet. But Schlesinger has said the Navy should be allowed to decide what is best for the unusual demands of carrier flying.

The announcement yesterday by Potter was peculiar in several respects.

Potter said that while the Navy had chosen the F-18, Schlesinger still had not completed his review of whether to go into full-scale development, which must precede production. Potter said he expected Schlesinger's approval in a few days. Asked why the Navy didn't wait until it had Schlesinger's blessing, Potter suggested that the Navy didn't want word to leak out prematurely about its decision.

On Tuesday, the Navy is expected to go before Senate Appropriations Committee members for a first test of how strongly Congress feels about holding the Navy to its earlier demands.

The senator heading that committee is John L. McClellan (D-Ark.), who headed the investigation into the joint Air Force-Navy TFX fighter project 10 years ago.

Potter said it will cost about $1.4 billion to develop the new fighter, including the cost of jet engines built by General Electric. Each plane will cost about $7.8 million, including development and production costs, he indicated. The figures are based on current prices.

The plane would not be in service with the fleet until 1982.

The idea behind both new fighters is to build a lighter jet that can be bought in large numbers at a lower cost than the sophisticated F-14 and F-15 front-line fighters.

The F-18 formerly was called the F-17. It was designed by Northrop in an unsuccessful bid to win the Air Force contract.

The Navy and Air Force at first moved into the new fighter projects reluctantly, saying they preferred to buy more of the bigger Navy F-14s and Air Force F-15s.

Potter acknowledged under questioning that the Navy's most likely alternative, if the new F-18 is rejected by Schlesinger or Congress, is to buy more F-14s at about $13 million apiece.

Asked if he preferred that solution, Potter said, "No, sir."

The twin-egine plane chosen by the Navy also could have considerable appeal overseas. Some countries with large air forces, such as Iran and West Germany, reportedly prefer twin-engine planes.

The Navy choice, however, could add to confusion in four countries — Norway, Belgium, Denmark and Holland — that are on the brink of deciding to buy either the Air Force F-16 or a French or Swedish jet.

The new jet is designed to fly at about 1½ times the speed of sound and outclass the next generation of Soviet tactical fighter planes.

The idea is to use F-14s to take on the most advanced Soviet planes and buy enough of the less expensive F-18s to replace large numbers of existing F-4 and A-7 fighter-bombers, which would be too costly to replace by the F-14.

Another obvious but unofficial factor in the move to build two separate lightweight fighters reluctance by both services to be forced to accept the design of another service.

HILL -- CONTINUED

of the fighters at a cost of nearly $3 billion. The Air Force at the time said the F16 was cheaper and "showed many advantages in such critical performance factors as agility, acceleration, turn rate and endurance at supersonic speeds."

DIFFERENCES between the two models were cited Friday by Undersecretary of the Navy David Potter, who acknowledged that while "it is perfectly clear this does not meet" the earlier wishes of Congress, the F18 is better designed for aircraft carrier operations than the F16.

The F18 would be built by a combination of the McDonnell-Douglas Corp. of St. Louis and the Northrop Corp. of Hawthorne, Calif. The engines would be built by General Electric Corp. in Lynn and Everett, Mass.

The F16 is being built by General Dynamics Corp. in Fort Worth, Tex., LTV Aerospace Corp. of Dallas and Pratt & Whitney Co. of East Hartford, Conn.

A General Electric worker in Lynn, Mass., said: "The place is going wild. People are jumping for joy" about the news.

If final approval is given the F18, existing employment at the two GE engine plants in Massachusetts would be sustained and several hundred recently laid-off workers would be taken on again, a GE spokesman said.

WASHINGTON STAR
3 MAY 1975(5)
Pg. 7

Air Force Cancels Robot Test Flight

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. (UPI) — A flight test of a new kind of Air Force robot spy plane was canceled yesterday due to instrumentation problems. An Air Force spokesman said the test probably would be rescheduled for Monday.

The aircraft is designed to fly at high altitudes and perform a variety of tasks, including reconnaissance photo missions and weather research. It can also be used as a communications link for troops on the ground.

FORD -- CONTINUED

former carrier officer in the Pacific in World War II. Mr Ford seemed flattered and laughed at the comparison.

He thanked Mr. Schlesinger for the "more than generous comment" and then ad-libbed more support to the secretary's proclamation of American military strength and continued commitment to its allies.

"We will continue to be strong" said Mr. Ford. "We will keep our commitments, and we will remain a great country."

It has been the collapse in South Vietnam, along with charges that the country fell because of a lack of American support, that has caused either some unease, some rethinking or even a shift in policy by some of America's closest friends and allies. Mr. Ford did not go into details on the fall of the former government of South Vietnam.

He did, however, go out of his way to praise the role of carriers in present and future defense planning.

He was applauded when he said that without the carriers operating off South Vietnam, without the Navy, Marine and Air Force crews operating from carrier decks, "we could not have rescued all the remaining American citizens and thousands of endangered Vietnamese from Saigon within 20 hours."

The President was cheered on two other occasions in his 15-minute speech following the simple but traditional commissioning ceremonies of breaking the pennant and setting the first watch.

He was applauded when he paid tribute to "two far-sighted submariners," Fleet Adm. Chester W. Nimitz, after whom the new carrier is named and Adm. Hyman G. Rockover (Ret.), father of the nuclear Navy. It was Admiral Nimitz who recommended the first nuclear submarine when he was chief of naval operations in 1947.

The Navy crowd applauded when the President touched their patriotism. "Wherever the United States Ship Nimitz shows her flag, she will be seen as we see her now, a solid symbol of U.S. strength and resolve —made in America and manned by Americans," Mr. Ford said.

"She is a movable part and parcel of our country; self-contained city at sea, plying the international waters of the world in defense of our national interests," he continued.

"Whether her mission is one of defense, diplomacy or humanity, the Nimitz will command awe and admiration from some, caution and circumspection from others, and respect from all," Mr Ford added.

The Pesident saluted the builders when he declared that "only the United States of America can make a machine like this."

He took special pain to review and praise the career of Admiral Nimitz—as the admiral's daughter sat nearby—and took a lesson from the quiet but forceful admiral to give a final message to the world.

Mr. Ford noted that Admiral Nimitz helped make the Pacific Ocean worthy of its peaceful name. "It is my determination to keep it that way," he continued. "The way all oceans and all continents ought to be."

He asked that everyone, but especially the Navy, rededicate itself to the Nimitz principle that "controlled strength is the sure guarantor of peace."

J. William Middendorf 2d, the Secretary of the Navy, introduced several congressmen present at the ceremony. Adm. James L. Holloway 3d, chief of naval operations, praised Admiral Nimitz as an example to the country and armed services today.

After his speech, the President walked along the ship shaking hands. He helped cut the commissioning cake, an 1,800-pound, white-layered mountain with chocolate frosting. He made the cut with a sword but ate his slice from a paper plate with a plastic fork.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEWS SUMMARY ... CONTINUED

ent, a Pulitzer Prize-winning photographer for the Gamma photo agency, was killed in one of the last battles near Saigon.

The Vietcong, who banned all publications after they took over last week, produced the first issue of a new journal, "Liberated Saigon."

A Danish freighter carrying 4,400 South Vietnamese refugees arrived in Hong Kong as scores of U.S. ships made their way toward Guam and the Philippines with an estimated 70,000 Americans and South Vietnamese. In Thailand, meanwhile, Red Cross workers waited for the last 250 foreigners being trucked out of Cambodia. A convoy of 585 foreigners, including eight newsmen, arrived Saturday.

* * *

SOCIAL SECURITY taxes must be raised to 17% from 11.7%, trustees say.

The Ford administration today will forecast that the $56 billion fund for paying retirement and disability benefits will be exhausted by 1983 without higher payroll levies. It will recommend a long-range increase of 5.3 percentage points, almost double the increase trustees called for a year ago, in the current combined payroll levy of 11.7% on employers and employes.

Social Security officials believe the financing problem is manageable in the short run by an infusion of more money and in the long run by a restructuring of the benefits system.

The Social Security trustees, the Secretaries of Labor, Treasury and HEW, predicted nearly a doubling of the system's long-range deficit. They assumed that revenue will be held down by unemployment and by a declining birth rate, and that rising prices will continue to drive up benefits.

* * *

West Germany's ruling coalition of Social Democrats and Free Democrats ended a string of state-election setbacks by retaining its majority in the big industrial state of North Rhine-Westphalia and pulling even with the Christian Democrats in Saarland. The latter result may break Christian Democratic control of the upper house of the federal parliament.

* * *

A ban on job discrimination by federal contractors isn't being adequately monitored by the Labor Department, the General Accounting Office stated. It said the department has fully evaluated only one of 13 federal-agency compliance offices charged with enforcing the 1965 Executive order barring discrimination by sex, race or creed.

* * *

The Navy's selection of the Northrop-McDonnell Douglas F18 lightweight fighter plane faces a tough struggle for approval by Congress, which wanted the Navy to pick a version of the Air Force's new plane, the F16. But the job-creating potential of the F18 program may convince legislators, as well as the Navy's argument that the F18 is superior for aircraft-carrier operation.

* * *

An environmental group called the Natural Resources Defense Council said it is suing the Consumer Product Safety Commission to force a ban on aerosal sprays using fluorocarbon gases as propellants. Some scientists say fluorocarbons deplete atmospheric ozone and could lead to a greater incidence of skin cancer.

* * *

Increased use of arbitration to settle disputes between consumers and businesses will be investigated by the Federal Trade Commission to make sure consumers aren't being deceived about the costs of arbitration or about their waiver of the right to sue.

* * *

Democratic National Chairman Robert Strauss said there is "a very good chance" that the 1976 party convention will become deadlocked, opening the way for a brokered convention. But Strauss said, on ABC's "Issues and Answers," that he doesn't think Sen. Edward Kennedy could be persuaded to accept the nomination in such a case. Strauss also predicted that neither major party would make Vietnam an issue in 1976.

* * *

Hardline Protestants in Northern Ireland who won a majority in last weekend's election of a constituent assembly said they wouldn't permit the minority Roman Catholics to hold cabinet seats in a proposed provincial government. The Protestant United Ulster Unionist Coalition won 46 of the assembly's 78 seats.

* * *

Sen. George McGovern (D., S.D.) will make a private visit to Cuba today and plans to meet with Premier Fidel Castro. In Washington this week, Organization of American States foreign ministers, including Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, will consider whether to end the widely ignored OAS ban on trade with Cuba.

* * *

British airline pilots scheduled to fly the Concorde indicated they will seek a 100% pay increase to match the salaries of French pilots of the supersonic airliner. Such a pay bid would probably face strong opposition from the British government and could delay its plans to put the Concorde in service early next year.

WALL STREET JOURNAL - 5 MAY 1975 Pg. 7

Navy's Choice of the F18 as New Fighter Is Seen Likely to Stir Much Controversy

By RICHARD J. LEVINE
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON—The Navy's choice of a plane design by McDonnell Douglas Corp. and Northrop Corp. as its new lightweight air combat fighter seems likely to generate considerable controversy in Congress and in Europe.

The aircraft the Navy selected is a modification of Northrop's twin-engine F17, a plane rejected by the Air Force earlier this year in favor of General Dynamics Corp.'s F16 fighter. The general expectation in Congress and foreign capitals had been that the Navy would settle on a carrier-based version of the single-engine Air Force F16, thereby reducing research-and-development and production costs and simplifying logistical support.

But Friday the Navy announced that it had selected the F18, the new designation for the Navy version of the F17, rather than a modified F16 designed by General Dynamics and LTV Corp. Conceivably, the F18 program could involve 800 planes and some $6 billion.

Yet, as the announcement and news conference made clear, the Navy faces a long, hard fight to move the F18 into full development and eventual production. "It's going to be tough," a navy official concedes.

In an unusually tentative announcement, Navy Under Secretary David S. Potter said the decision whether to proceed into full-scale development hasn't yet been made by Defense Secretary James Schlesinger. Though the Navy anticipates a favorable decision, it awarded only small, "short-term sustaining" contracts Friday. McDonnell Douglas and Northrop received a $4.4 million contract, while General Electric Co. got a $2 million award for work on the engines for the F18.

Mr. Potter also conceded that the Navy's selection of the F18 has the "unfortunate property" of seeming to defy the wishes of Congress as disclosed in the conference report on last year's defense appropriation bill.

Anxious to save money, the House-Senate conferees last September told the Pentagon that the Navy air combat fighter should be "an adaptation of the selected Air Force air combat fighter." They added, "Future funding is to be contingent upon the capability of the Navy to produce a derivative of the selected Air Force air combat fighter design."

Asked about the apparent challenge of this congressional directive, Mr. Potter conceded that it is "perfectly clear that (the Navy's action) doesn't meet the language of the congressional report." But he explained that the Navy's decision was based on a technical evaluation that had demonstrated the F18's superiority over the F16 for operation from Navy aircraft carriers. The Navy intends to use the F18 in both a fighter and attack role as a replacement for aging F4s and A7s.

Defense officials believe that the Senate and House Appropriations committees will go along with the Navy's choice of the F18, despite the strict language of a conference report. Chairman George Mahon (D., Texas) of the House Appropriations Committee has indicated privately that he would approve of the F18 selection if the Navy determined that it was the better plane for carrier operations, one Pentagon insider said.

On Friday, Mr. Mahon told the Associated Press that "the most likely development" will be that the Navy will receive congressional approval to build the F18, even though that would be "contrary to our expressed hope" that both the Navy and the Air Force could use the same plane. While Mr. Mahon said that there hadn't been any decision made, he didn't want to quarrel with the Navy's selection.

Pentagon officials also are counting on the job-creating potential of the F18 program in the midst of high unemployment rates to help win congressional approval. "The employment issue is very strong," one House defense expert said. "Some Congressmen will see the F18 as spreading joy and happiness, arguing that it is better than food stamps. And that's an argument that people listen to these days."

Nevertheless, the Navy still is going to encounter problems on Capitol Hill. Some lawmakers are certain to see the Navy action as open defiance of congressional direction. And some Pentagon critics will argue against the F18 decision because of a higher cost involved.

Moreover, the Navy is going to have trouble convincing Congress that the F18 choice isn't simply a political maneuver designed, in the end, to win the service a greater number of Grumman Corp. F14 fighters, a more complex and costly plane than either the F16 or F18. Some Defense Department and industry officials are convinced that the Navy is pushing the F18 even though it knows it faces an uphill battle in Congress. According to this reasoning, the Navy anticipates that congress will block the F18 program, leaving the service in the position to argue for more than the 390 F14s currently planned.

In Europe, where a consortium of four North Atlantic Treaty Organization countries is trying to decide whether to buy the F16 or the French Mirage F1, the Navy's F18 choice is likely to produce confusion. There have been recurring reports that some European countries preferred a two-engine plan like the F18. But the Europeans weren't actively considering the Northrop-designed aircraft because they didn't want a plane that had been rejected by U.S. forces.

With the selection of the F18, however, the possibility has arisen that a twin-engine lightweight fighter may well end up in U.S. inventory. So the European decision could be more complicated than originally believed.

In other defense procurement decisions Friday:

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

MONDAY MORNING, 5 MAY 1975

BALTIMORE SUN - 5 MAY 1975 Pg. 2

Kissinger says Watergate, Congress enabled Hanoi to win

Washington (AP)—If Watergate had not diminished presidential power and Congress had not passed the War Powers Act, Hanoi probably would not have staged its successful military campaign in South Vietnam, the Secretary of State, Henry A. Kissinger, has said.

"In January '73, we did not foresee that Watergate would sap the executive authority of the United States to such a degree that flexibility of executive action inherently would be circumscribed," Mr. Kissinger said in an interview to be telecast today on NBC television's Today show.

"We did not foresee that the Congress would pass a law which prohibited us from enforcing the Paris agreement, and while we probably might have done nothing anyway, it makes a lot of difference for Hanoi whether it thinks the United States probably will not or whether it thinks that we certainly cannot," Mr. Kissinger said.

Mr. Kissinger also said that after it became clear that a gradual erosion of morale was occurring in South Vietnam, "we tried very hard to get negotiations started."

"But once the North Vietnamese realized what the trends were, they blocked all negotiations and went for a military solution," he added.

WASHINGTON STAR (5)
4 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

Ford's Vow ...Military Guarantor

By Vernon A. Guidry Jr.
Washington Star Staff Writer

NORFOLK, Va. — Speaking at the commissioning ceremony of the world's largest aircraft carrier, President Ford said yesterday the United States is determined to strengthen its ties with its allies and demonstrate it is capable of meeting its commitments.

Ford spoke at the commissioning ceremony of the USS Nimitz, the second nuclear carrier in America's fleet.

"The Nimitz joins the fleet at an auspicious moment, when our determination to strengthen our ties with allies across both great oceans and to work for peace and stability around the world requires clear demonstration," the President said at the Norfolk Naval Station.

"To all, this great ship is visible evidence of our commitment to friends and allies and our capability to maintain those commitments," Ford said.

IT WAS Ford's first speech since the surrender of South Vietnamese forces to the North Vietnamese and Viet Cong, but the President made only one direct reference to the issue. It was a congratulatory message to the Marine, Navy and Air Force personnel who carried out the evacuation of Americans and thousands of Vietnamese from Saigon, and a reference to the need for aircraft carriers such as the five that formed the nucleus of the task force off South Vietnam.

The most ringing declaration of the day came from Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger, who introduced Ford as a leader whose unequivocal "clarion call" for U.S. maintenance of a worldwide military balance will be answered by the American public.

Ford responded, before picking up his prepared text, saying, "We are strong, we will continue to be strong, we will keep our commitments and we will remain a great country."

THE CARRIER is named in honor of Fleet Adm. Chester W. Nimitz, World War II commander-in-chief of Pacific areas. Nimitz was named fleet admiral in 1944 the day after Congress created the rank.

"Fleet Adm. Nimitz and this fine ship both tell us that controlled strength is the sure guarantor of peace," Ford said.

The giant ship that loomed behind Ford as he spoke also could be a symbol of some of the problems that have beset the Navy's shipbuilding program.

The commissioning ceremony was 21 months behind schedule. According to Navy figures, the current cost estimate is $683.9 million for the carrier, exclusive of the planes that will give it its military bite. The cost estimate for the ship in fiscal year 1968 was $544.2 million. The Navy attributed 43 percent of the increase to inflation.

The Nimitz leaves Norfolk tomorrow for 12 days at sea.

WASHINGTON POST (5)
4 MAY 1975 Pg. 23

Plane Purchase

BRUSSELS—Belgian Premier Leo Tindemans and Dutch Premier Joop den Uyl met here and announced later that their two governments would decide separately what plane to buy to replace the American-made Starfighter.

They told reporters that a joint choice would be preferable, but did not appear optimistic about reaching an agreement.

NEW YORK TIMES
5 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

KY SAYS THAT U.S. HELPED 'TOO MUCH'

By The Associated Press

AGANA, Guam, Monday, May 5—The United States is not to blame for the fall of South Vietnam, according to Nguyen Cao Ky, former Premier and Vice President of the country.

"Concerning America, and the American people, in the last 10 years you did a lot for us—too much, in my opinion," Marshal Ky said shortly after arriving here this morning.

"But unfortunately," he went on, "we were not brave enough to overthrow Mr. Thieu."

Marshal Ky said that he had actively plotted an overthrow of by force by President Nguyen Van Thieu, to install as President either himself or the head of the Senate.

Thieu Was "Lonely"

"At the time Thieu lost support, he was a lonely man," Marshal Ky said, adding that it would not have taken "too much force" to oust the President, who ultimately resigned.

"What we needed," Marshal Ky continued," was new military leaders—we were not interested in politics, but in military leadership." He declined to name other participants in the plot.

"Thieu and his people were so corrupted and so incapable," he said. "It is not the fault of the United States Congress and the brave Vietnamese soldiers," he said, referring to the final collapse. "Of course, as Vietnamese, we would have liked more help, but we understand the feelings of the American Congress."

On April 25, with the end for Saigon five days away, Marshal Ky made a speech in the capital in which he flayed as cowards those countrymen of his who were fleeing the Communist threat. "Let the cowards who are leaving with the Americans go, and let those who love South Vietnam stay and fight," he said, adding:

"Why run? To do what? To eat left-over American food? Even if the country falls to the Communists, at least they have yellow skins like ours." On the last day Marshal Ky himself fled the country.

"There will be a big problem," he said today on Guam, "not only for refugees but for the United States of America. You have your own problems. I don't want the 100,000 refugees to become a big task for your Government and your country."

Ky Expects Reprisals

He said he expected reprisals against some Vietnamese still in South Vietnam: "There won't be a massive massacre, but they will kill a lot of people and more will go to concentration camps—and, of course, a big brainwash of the people" could be expected, he added.

The rest of his family is at Travis Air Force Base in California, he said. He would be willing to live in the crowded refugee camps, the marshal said, but his arrangments here were not immediately known. He said he hoped eventually to become a private citizen in the United States.

His personal plans, Marshal Ky said, are indefinite. "I think some American friend will find a job for me," he said. "I don't have much money. I never had much money. I am not Mr. Thieu."

Staying on Guma, He Says

Marshal Ky went aboard the American command and communication ship Blue Ridge after leaving South Vietnam by helicopter. The ship took him the Philippines. He arrived here carrying three bags and wearing a light-colored casual suit.

He said he intends to remain here indefinitely to bolster the moral of the other Vietnamese refugees. "I want to tell the Vietnamese we have no right to ask too much," he said. "If we can have a little place in the sun, that is already too much."

Marshal Ky smiled, but shrugged off suggestions that he might try to become the leader of the Vietnamese exiles. He said, however, that he intends to go to Washington on behalf of the refugees.

Manila Had Objections

The Manila Government had demanded that the United States not bring political and military exiles from the old Saigon regime to American bases in the Philippines. In a formal diplomatic note to the United States, the Government said it preferred that only Vietnamese women and children be brought to the Philippines, adding that they had to remain on the military bases and could stay only three days.

Marshal Ky, a former commander of the South Vietnamese Air Force, and a piolt, led his country's first air raids on North Vietnam. This spring, at 44 years of age, he was in political retirement when the Communist advance began. He became active once more, leading efforts to get President Thieu—his long-time political foe—to resign, in hopes that the resignation might persuade the Communists to negotiate

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

MONDAY MORNING, 5 MAY 1975

Philip L. Geyelin

WASHINGTON POST 5 MAY 1975 Pg. 24

What Do We Expect of the Military?

The following is adapted from an address given at a "Symposium on Officer Responsibilities" at the Command and General Staff College, Fort Leavenworth.

I have been asked to answer the question: What is it that those of us in the civilian world, in and out of government and however intimately or remotely involved in the political process, expect of you who have taken military service as your career?

The short answer is, quite a lot—and often, almost certainly, too much. For example, we expect you:

- to defend us from foreign enemies and in fact from any threats to our national security as this may be defined, not by you, but by political leaders;
- to maintain order during disturbances at home—without trampling upon civil liberties;
- to be quite precise about your needs—even though the dangers you are charged with defending us against may change drastically from time to time;
- to design experimental weapons and give us firm estimates of their cost and to deliver them to your units at no higher cost than you originally estimated;
- to advise the President and other civilian leaders about the military implications of this or that foreign policy question, even though you do not participate as an equal partner in the making of that policy; and when an ill-conceived policy gets us into a war that cannot be won under the rules of engagement that have been imposed upon you, we expect you to win it anyway;
- to be scrupulously truthful about your needs, however they may be altered by unpredictable events, and also to be scrupulously honest about your battle reports and never mind how much aid and comfort adverse reporting might give to an enemy.

If some of these expectations seem to you to have particular application to the long and tragic Vietnam struggle now ended, the fact is that there is no better example than Vietnam of a war in which too much was asked of the military by civilians who were unprepared to take the risk of doing nothing and equally unprepared for the risks that would have been involved in moving in a conclusive and decisive way.

An even larger lesson, however, is that the war, and the manner in which it was waged, asked too much, not only of the military but of the process of government of which the military is an essential element and a vital arm. For what was asked of military and civilian leaders alike was that they lend themselves to a kind of continuing, calculated deception—a conspiracy in restraint of candor required by the very nature of this new concept of limited war. The name of the game was "graduated response" to enemy initiatives. The objective was to convey by incremental increases in the application of military force an impression of limitless American will power and staying power. This it was believed, would persuade the North Vietnamese and their supporters that their cause was hopeless. And so, the theory went, they would soon stop doing what they were doing and leave their neighbors alone —in Secretary of State Dean Rusk's familiar litany.

What this meant in practical terms, however, was that military progress reports were very nearly required to report progress. Civilian leaders, for their part, were encouraged to conceal military setbacks—or escalation—from their own people in order not to alarm the public or generate the sort of divisive debate that might undercut the impression of a united resolve that we were trying to project to the enemy.

The writer is editor of the editorial page.

Well, it didn't work—because it was by its nature unworkable. And the reason it was unworkable, in my view, was that we were all expecting too much of each other. Civilian leaders in the executive were asking too much of the military and also too much of the Congress and the public and the press.

They were asking Congress to suspend free debate and blindly vote for resolutions and for appropriations in support of a war that nobody was prepared to declare. They were asking the public to pay the taxes for it and to send their sons, without saying how long it would last or how big it would get or even admitting that it was getting big without anybody knowing it. And they were asking the press not to question their official accounts of their conduct of the war.

You in the military were asking us in the press to accept your body counts and your estimates of enemy forces and your warnings of enemy intentions on faith, even though, to be blunt about it, they were not always reliable.

And we in the press, of course, were asking you to tell us about your plans and future operations and force levels and deployments, because we were not formally at war, and there was no censorship—even though you knew that this information could help the enemy.

I don't want to labor the point or refight the war. But I think it is important for us to recognize that the question we are asking ourselves has no easy answer out of our recent experience. For our recent experience is almost a case history of our system gone wrong, of a sustained distortion and straining of healthy adversary relationships between us all—between the relevant branches of government, between civilian and military, between government and the people, and between government and the press. There is at least the glimmer of an answer, however, growing out of our recent experience, and it is that each of us is going to have to not only ask less of each other, but also try harder to understand each other.

Accordingly, what I would put high on my list of what civilians expect of profesional officers in the armed services is simply that you understand the rights and prerogatives of the public and the press in our society.

Yours is a society which, by necessity, indeed almost by definition, depends on strict discipline, tight security and firm, not to say unquestioning, support for policies and directives issued by higher authority. But the larger American society operates under no such constraints. The right to question, to debate, to dissent, to demonstrae lawfully, is inherent. No government policy is sacrosanct. It is not disloyal or even necessarily destructive to disagree openly and as forcefully as possible with the word of the authorities. On the contrary, that is the way we conduct our government; that is the essence of a free society.

And when we think about the problem of preserving this free society, it is necessary for all of us to remember that there is more than one way to destroy it. It can be destroyed from without by hostile adversaries against which you are charged with defending us. But our fundamental freedoms —our national security, if you will— can also be threatened from within, when in the very name of national security we resort to "pumbers" and "enemies lists" and unconstitutional invasions of privacy in order to suppress public discussion and debate about a war in which the public has a vital stake. In this respect it is perhaps worth recalling the point that Arnold Toynbee makes in his study of civilization: of the 16 great civilizations that have been destroyed over the centuries, every one was destroyed from within—from the corruption of fundamental institutions and the slow erosion of fundamental values. The most that any outside power did was to administer the coup de grace.

I'm sure that you know that. But I also sense that sometimes you find our fundamental freedoms inconvenient, that you often feel that they work contrary to your purposes, and that there are times, and the Vietnam war is a notable example, when you believe it would be in the urgent interest of national security to suspend these processes and liberties.

The origins of your Vietnam dilemma, of course, did not lie with you. The origins began with your civilian superiors who were consistently unwilling to be honest with Congress and with the public about a policy that was ill-founded and failing.

Nevertheless, the fact remains that too much was expected of the American body politic, with all that term implies, by the military establishment during the course of the war. You expected the press and the Congress not to inquire too deeply into the course of a war that was taking a heavy toll in casualties and in material resources without showing any promise of coming to an end. You expected the public to retain its confidence in policies and strategies that depended for their success on a high measure of demonstrable dissembling and deception. And you measured the performance of both the press and the Congress in terms of a "patriotic" willingness to support whatever the government proposed even though it is inherent in our system to question whether what's good for the country at any given time is what a particular politician or cabinet head or President proclaims to be good.

We live, in fact, by a difficult and delicate system of checks and balances, which may in extreme crises oblige a newspaper reporter to report something that others will believe is harmful to the national interest, and may also require an Army officer or a government official to go against the official line. We have, I think, recently undergone two such extreme crises in our affairs: Vietnam and Watergate. To work our way back to that careful balance by which we manage our affairs may well require all of us to re-examine and re-define what it is we can reasonably expect of each other as military officers, private citizens, civilian leaders, politicians, and members of the press.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WASHINGTON STAR
2 MAY 1975(5) Pg. 7

Pentagon Feared A Panic

By Vernon A. Guidry Jr.
Washington Star Staff Writer

Fear of panic and disruption played a role in the decision to evacuate thousands of South Vietnamese in the massive helicopter lift from Saigon Tuesday, according to U.S. officials.

The White House has cited a "moral rationale" for the inclusion of large numbers of Vietnamese in the evacuation. Yesterday, Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger added another, more pragmatic, reason.

Some 4,475 Vietnamese and 395 Americans were lifted from Tan Son Nhut air base. Plans had called for their evacuation by Air Force C130 transport planes. Only a relatively limited number of "high risk" Vietnamese were to be taken out by helicopter, Schlesinger told newsmen.

But shortly before 9 p.m. Monday the airfield was given up as hopeless for use by fixed wing aircraft because of clouds, enemy fire, and a clutter of airplanes on the ground.

"AT TAN SON Nhut where the bulk of Vietnamese were located they had been assembled in mixed groups for flights out on C130s," Schlesinger said.

"It was the judgement of those on the scene to attempt to separate those groups at that stage might have provoked panic (that) might have extended into Saigon itself and might have delayed the withdrawal operation," Schlesinger said.

The evacuation of 1,210 Vietnamese and 978 Americans from the embassy was not without its delays. Tuesday afternoon the embassy was urged in voice communication to hasten the evacuation and at approximately 2:30 p.m., Washington time, Tuesday, a message was sent to Ambassador Graham Martin telling him " in no uncertain terms" as one government official put it, to clear out the embassy by 3:45 p.m. The message was backed by the authority of the President.

As it was, Martin did not leave until 5:15 p.m. when his departure was signaled by the radioed message that "Tiger is in the air." The last helicopter with 11 Marines aboard left the embassy at 7:52 p.m.

THE UNITED STATES formally ended its refugee evacuation efforts yesterday with a 3 p.m. order to U.S. ships still off Vietnam to head for port to discharge refugees picked up from boats that made their way out from the Vietnamese coast.

Schlesinger indicated that there were only one or two vessels left near the coast by the time the order was issued. The most recent figure available by the Department of Defense put the number of refugees picked up at sea at something in excess of 18,000.

NEW YORK TIMES - 3 MAY 1975(5) Pg. 3

Canada Extending Joint Defense Pact

By ROBERT TRUMBULL
Special to The New York Times

OTTAWA, May 2—The Canadian Government will renew the joint air defense agreement with the United States for five years, despite the arguments of nationalists here that the 17-year-old pact infringes on Canada's sovereignty.

A decision by the Cabinet yesterday to extend the agreement for five years rather than for two, as had been fixed in the last renewal, May 10, 1973, was taken as a firm rebuff to those who had advocated that the arrangement be canceled. A parliamentary committee rejected a recommendation by the Minister of National Defense, James A. Richardson, that the pact be extended indefinitely.

Meanwhile, in a separate but related action more palatable to hard-core nationalists, the Government has initiated a program that will bring under Canadian control certain electronic defense functions that utilize Canadian airspace. To date these functions have been carried out under American commanders at bases in the United States.

Signing Due Next Week

The renewed North American Air Defense agreement, or NORAD, is expected to be signed formally in Washington next week. The previous two-year renewal expires May 12.

Reporting to the House of Commons on the decision, the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defense, headed by Maurice Dupras, a Liberal Member of Parliament from Labelle in Quebec, came out strongly in favor of the Canadian commitment to the partnership with the United States in continental air defense.

"In reaching this conclusion," the committee's report said, "your committee was impressed by the argument that a Canadian decision to withdraw from NORAD would be interpreted at home and abroad not as an isolated development but as evidence of a possible major change in the orientation of Canadian foreign policy."

The report said that the committee, on which all political parties are represented, was "unanimous in favoring continuation of close Canadian cooperatin with the United States in the field of surveillance of North American airspace and air defense," the purpose of NORAD.

Scope of the Pact

Under NORAD, dating from 1958, Canada and the United States participate jointly in the operation of various electronic air-defense facilities in both countries and in Greenland, and in assignment of defensive aircraft to intercept any attack from the north. NORAD installations include the chain of DEW—distant early wr warning—radar stations in the Canadian Arctic.

A Canadian officer commands the NORAD station in Canada at North Bay, Ontario, with an American deputy. Canadians serve as deputy commanders of the four regions situatec south of the border. Canada supplies three squadrons of defensive ar aircraft—48 CF-101 Voodoo interceptors—to the joint air defenses.

"These forces are considered necessary for possible defense against the bomber fleet still maintained by the Soviet Union," the Canadian parliamentary report declared. This rebutted arguments here that the pact has been rendered obsolete in view of theprobability that an enemy would choose intercontinental ballistic missiles as better weapons than manned bombers.

The report said that the Soviet air fleet "includes about 140 truly intercontinental bombers, mostly Bears and Bisons, and "over 600 medium-range bombers which could be used for one-way intercontinental missions or, if refueled in flight, for return missions.

"These forces are maintained at a high stage of operational readiness and they fairly regularly fly missions to the North American air defense perimeter, which in practice means the air borders of Canada, to test NORAD's responsiveness."

While acknowledging that the "overwhelming superior" weight of the American partner to the alliance "will inevitably give the impression that Canada's independence is compromised, the committee concluded that "withdrawal from NORAD would add very little to Canada's independence in peace time." The committee said that the joint-defense feature of the partnership "has rightly been seen as protecting, if not enhancing, Canada's sovereignty."

Under a plan announced by Mr. Richardson, the National Defense Secretary, a realignment of the boundaries of the various NORAD regions will give Canada a second control center at Edmonton, Alberta. With this change, which will take some time because new construction is required, Canada will take over the protective electronic surveillance over western Canada, now watched from bases in the United States.

WASHINGTON STAR - 4 MAY 1975(5) Pg. 10

Quit Korea, Hanoi Warns

TOKYO (UPI) — North Vietnam said yesterday the United States must withdraw its troops from Korea or risk a defeat even worse than the loss of Cambodia and South Vietnam to the Communists.

"If the Ford clique does not want to suffer a heavier defeat in Korea and Asia, it must change its policy on Korea and withdraw all its aggression troops and lethal weapons from South Korea at an early date," Hanoi's official Vietnam News Agency said in a broadcast monitored in Tokyo.

"There can be no pretext whatsoever for the U.S. imperialist aggressor forces to remain in South Korea any longer," the broadcast said.

"The U.S. imperialists' plot to retain their aggressor forces in South Korea and intensify aggressive maneuvers against our country is a virulent challenge and an unpardonable criminal act against the entire Korean people."

The broadcast attacked Defense Secretary James Schlesinger for saying at a Pentagon news conference Thursday that South Korea was a forward defense area of the United States and that U.S. forces will remain there even after the completion of a South Korean army modernization program.

The North Vietnamese called Schlesinger a "notorious warlord of U.S. imperialism."

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK TIMES - 5 MAY 1975 Pg. 14

U.S. Reviewing Its World Military Posture After Saigon's Fall

By DREW MIDDLETON

The United States according to senior Defense Department officials, has begun a review of its military position in the world after the defeat of South Vietnam's government forces.

The officials emphasized that the review would deal more with the deployment of military units that support the nation's treaty commitments than with the political commitments themselves. They said that they did not expect any change in the nation's treaty commitments in the western Pacific and Europe but that they did expect lively discussion on questions such as how much strategic air power should be maintained in southern Asia and whether the United States should concentrate more men, ships and aircraft in the troubled Mediterranean.

"This is a time, once again, for America to choose," Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger said in an interview recently. "We will have to decide whether, even with our disappointments of the Vietnam war, we are going to maintain our position in the world and provide the necessary strength for a worldwide military equilibrium."

Beyond the problem of how best to deploy men, ships and aircraft, Mr. Schlesinger indicated, lies the greater problem of national psychological preparedness, of "ideology versus common sense."

"A decade ago," the Defense Secretary noted, "the United States was held in such awe that it did not have to exercise diplomatic pressures and, if it did, it had a high hope that the diplomatic pressures would be successful. It did not have to have recourse to force.

"That has changed because the role in which the United States previously was held has sharply changed. I think that this is what's reflected in the drift that you perceive in the Mediterranean basin and elsewhere," Mr. Schlesinger said.

Discussing the review of America's military posture, the Secretary noted that it is "very hard for a great power to reconsider its commitments" unless such reconsiderations would result in very large financial savings.

41 Commitments

The outlook, then, is for discussion—but little more—of United States military commitments. After the fall of South Vietnam and Cambodia these commitments number 41, ranging in extent from the North Atlantic Treaty to a security-assistance agreement with Tunisia.

Public discussion, Defense Department officials expect, may center on the military commitment to South Korea, where there are 30,000 American troops. Some politicians, it was conceded, may consider a change in that deployment to be urgently needed.

But, officials warned, any such change would have grave psychological impact upon the South Koreans, already shaken by the fall of South Vietnam. And any American military review must consider its effect on allies.

The principal change in deployment, Mr. Schlesinger feels, is likely to occur in the strategic orientation of the services.

Since the end of World War II, the Navy and the Marine Corps have been looking westward at Asia while the Army and the Air Force, except for the Vietnam interval, have focused their planning on northwest Europe and the Mediterranean.

Now, senior Defense Department officials believe, the Navy and the Marine Corps must give more attention to the military problems of the Middle East and Europe, but not to the extent that the remaining United States commitments in Asia are compromised.

Sweeping changes in deployments appear to be ruled out, and Mr. Schlesinger noted that sudden changes could be dangerous.

The review is likely to take into account primarily the changing situation in the Mediterranean area from the Iberian Peninsula eastward.

Portugal, Mr. Schlesinger said, "is a serious problem." Defense Department authorities with access to intelligence reports are not reassured by the gains registered by non-Communist parties in the elections last month. Some analysts believe the gains will spur the Communists to tighten their grip on the centers of power—the armed forces and the police.

Spain and Yugoslavia

In Spain "a succession crisis" is likely after the death of General Franco. In Yugoslavia a similar crisis is likely after the death of Marshal Tito.

The Defense Department's assessment of Soviet attitudes toward Yugoslavia is that Moscow would like to restore its ideological hegemony. While Marshal Tito, the symbol of Yugoslav national independence, lives, a move toward such restoration could entail a major operation that might be offensive to other Communist parties in Europe.

The situation at the eastern end of the Mediterranean has created the gravest apprehension. Some Defense Department officials regard United States actions that have alienated the Turkish Government as the greatest blunder by American diplomacy since Secretary of State John Foster Dulles threw the Egyptians into Moscow's lap by refusing financing of the Aswan High Dam in 1956.

Mr. Schlesinger's more moderate comment was that "we are in a position, which is a very peculiar one, of bearing down very hard on what has been one of our most faithful allies, namely Turkey."

He characterized the general strategic position in the Mediterranean as "poor."

To some Defense Department officers, the American attitude toward Turkey flies in the face of military realities. One said that withholding military aid to Turkey, "the only strong ally in the area," is "sheer military lunacy."

The Middle East, in the view of senior Defense Department officials, is "liable to blow up at any time."

Military, as well as political, opinion within the Defense Department argues that Israel, in Mr. Schlesinger's words, "is stronger in every way than she was in 1973" at the time of the October war.

The tendency is to discount the urgency of Israel's demands for F-15 Eagle fighters. The Americans believe that the Israeli fighter command, with its qualitative and quantitative advantage in pilots, remains superior in its F-4 Phantoms to the Arab air forces even if they fly Soviet MIG-23's.

Beyond the evident concern about the Middle East lies the problem of Iran. The situation there is "satisfactory," Mr. Schlesinger said, but everything depends on the Shah.

The death of Shah Mohammed Riza Pahlevi, Defense Department officials say, would throw the entire Iran-Pakistan area into turmoil and might tempt the Soviet Union to undertake political or military adventures aimed at gaining a port on the Indian Ocean.

Regarding northern Europe, Mr. Schlesinger does not expect any trouble in what is "still the most critical and vulnerable area of the free world" as long as the American deployment in northwest Europe remains at approximately its present strength—300,000 soldiers, sailors and airmen.

He does feel, however, that America's European allies tend to discount the strength of the Soviet forces deployed against NATO.

"Ultimately, the security of the free nations depends upon the existence of military power," Mr. Schlesinger noted.

His major concern is not about the Soviet Union's superiority in conventional forces—in manpower 4 million, compared with 2 million for the United States—or on the prospects for "essential equivalence" in nuclear forces.

Rather it rests on the question of America's willingness to maintain a defense posture sufficient to deter Soviet adventures. At the moment he feels that "events are moving so well for the Soviet Union" that its leaders would be reluctant to test American determination.

The major issue, Mr. Schlesinger believes, is how far the American people will allow the international situation to deteriorate before they rouse themselves for a national effort.

It may take, he said pessimistically, "something like Korea" to alter present attitudes.

WASHINGTON POST
5 MAY 1975 Pg. C5

Senators Blast Navy Over Move

By Helen Dewar
Washington Post Staff Writer

Maryland Sens. Charles McC. Mathias and J. Glenn Beall Jr. have announced the Navy's plans to move its oceanographic operations out of Suitland as economically unjustified, unfair to employees and a threat to the program itself.

The Navy has proposed transferring the Naval Oceanographic Office and its 1,300 employes to Bay St. Louis, Miss. A final decision is pending.

The two Maryland senators issued their statements in advance of a public hearing scheduled tonight at Suitland Senior High School on the Navy's environmental impact statement on the proposed move.

The statement finds no serious environmental impediments to the transfer.

However, Mathias sent an aide, Brent Willcox, to Bay St. Louis late last month for a two-day inspection of the new location and contends the move will prove "disastrous" to the oceanographic program.

"In order to make the economics of this move at all palatable," Mathias said, "the Navy has decided not to spend the kind of money that by any definition would be needed to properly carry out this move."

For instance, he said, the Navy is planning an immediate takeover in Mississippi of less than half the 400,000 square feet of work space its employees now use.

Schools in the area are filled, he said, and housing is short—less than 75 four- to six-bedroom homes on sale in the area as of the time of his aide's visit.

"The net result will be a disastrous dislocation of the Navy's ocean research program, from which it may never recover," said Mathias. "And all of this to achieve some short-term political benefit."

This was an apparent reference to the fact that the move is being pushed by Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John C. Stennis (D-Miss.) and Finance Chairman Russell B. Long (D-La.).

In his statement, Beall charged that the move would be "traumatic" to employees, adversely affect the Washington Metropolitan area's economy and "cost the taxpayers far more than it is worth."

At least 400 oceanographic employees have indicated they will quit rather than move, thus adding to labor market problems in the Washington area.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

A045

NEW YORK (UPI) -- TIME AND NEWSWEEK MAGAZINES REPORT MASSIVE EXECUTIONS OF ARMY AND GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS IN CAMBODIA BY THE VICTORIOUS KHMER ROUGE REBELS. TIME SAYS PRESIDENT FORD REVEALED THE BLOODBATH TO REPUBLICAN CONGRESSMEN LAST WEEK.

TIME, IN THIS WEEK'S EDITIONS, SAID FORD TOLD THE REPUBLICAN CONGRESSMAN SO HIGH-RANKING OFFICERS OF THE DEFEATED CAMBODIAN ARMY HAVE BEEN KILLED.

"THEY KILLED THE WIVES TOO," TIMES QUOTES FORD AS SAYING. "THEY SAID THE WIVES WERE JUST THE SAME AS THEIR HUSBANDS. THIS IS A HORRIBLE THING TO REPORT TO YOU, BUT WE ARE CERTAIN THAT OUR SOURCES ARE ACCURATE.

TIME QUOTED A CONGRESSMAN AT THE MEETING AS SAYING "THERE WAS A GASP AROUND THE TABLE."

THE MAGAZINE ALSO SAID REFUGEES HAVE REPORTED EXECUTIONS OF 100 WEALTHY OR RELIGIOUS FIGURE, AND THAT FOUR MONKS WERE REPORTEDLY SHOT TO DEATH ON THE STEPS OF A PAGODA WHEN THEY REFUSED TO LEAVE.

NEWSWEEK QUOTES A U.S. OFFICIAL AS SAYING "THOUSANDS HAVE ALREADY BEEN EXECUTED," AND THE FIGURE COULD RISE TO "TENS OF THOUSANDS OF CAMBODIANS LOYAL TO THE LON NOL REGIME."

THE MAGAZINE SAID THE INFORMATION COMES FROM RADIO INTERCEPTS OF KHMER ROUGE COMMUNICATIONS BY U.S. INTELLIGENCE.

THE INTERCEPTS REPORTEDLY INCLUDED ORDERS FOR THE BLOODBATH TO BEGIN, AND FIELD RADIO REPORTS SAYING THE INITIAL ROUND OF EXECUTIONS HAD BEEN CARRIED OUT.

"I AM NOT SPECULATING," NEWSWEEK QUOTES ONE OFFICIAL. "I AM NOT DEALING IN THIRD-HAND REPORTS. I AM TELLING YOU WHAT IS BEING SAID BY THE CAMBODIANS THEMSELVES IN THEIR OWN COMMUNICATIONS."

UPI 05-05 04:52 AED

A046

BANGKOK (UPI) -- THE THAI GOVERNMENT SAID TODAY THE UNITED STATES WILL PULL MORE THAN 30 PER CENT ITS TROOPS OUT OF THAILAND IN THE NEXT TWO MONTHS IN AN EFFORT TO PHASE OUT THE AMERICAN MILITARY PRESENCE IN THE COUNTRY.

THE THAI FOREIGN MINISTRY SAID THE UNITED STATES WOULD DECREASE THE NUMBER OF TROOPS IN THAILAND FROM 27,000 TO 19,500 -- A DROP OF 7,500 -- BY JUNE.

A BRIEF MINISTRY STATEMENT SAID THE CUTS, DECIDED ON AFTER TWO WEEKS OF TALKS WITH U.S. OFFICIALS, WERE PART OF A PROGRAM TO HAVE ALL AMERICAN TROOPS WITHDRAWN BY MARCH OF NEXT YEAR.

"FURTHER DISCUSSIONS WILL BE HELD ON THE DETAILS OF WHAT UNITS WILL BE INVOLVED AND WHEN THEY WILL LEAVE THAILAND," THE ANNOUNCEMENT SAID.

THAILAND, WHICH HAS 1,000 MILES OF FRONTIER WITH CAMBODIA AND LAOS, IS TRYING TO IMPROVE RELATIONS WITH NORTH VIETNAM, WHICH HAS TRAINED INSURGENTS OPERATING IN THAI TERRITORY.

NORTH VIETNAM, HOWEVER, HAS SAID AMERICAN TROOPS MUST LEAVE THAILAND BEFORE RELATIONS BETWEEN THE TWO COUNTRIES CAN IMPROVE.

THE THAI GOVERNMENT ANNOUNCED IN MARCH ALL AMERICAN TROOPS WOULD BE WITHDRAWN WITHIN A YEAR.

"THE WITNDRAWAL WILL CONTINUE BECAUSE THE UNITED STATES DOES NOT HAVE ANY MILITARY ROLE IN INDOCHINA," FOREIGN MINISTER CHARTCHAI CHOONHAVAN SAID TODAY.

GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS SAID, HOWEVER, IT MAY NOT BE NECESSARY TO WITHDRAW THE FULL 7,500 SOLDIERS BECAUSE AMERICAN TROOP STRENGTH ACTUALLY STOOD AT ONLY 25,000 -- 2,000 MEN LESS THAN THE PERMITTED CEILING OF 27,000.

THE UNITED STATES HAS ABOUT 350 MILITARY AIRCRAFT, INCLUDING 17 B52 STRATEGIC BOMBERS, STATIONED AT FOUR BASES IN THAILAND.

IT IS BELIEVED LIKELY THE NEXT REDUCTION COULD INVOLVE THE CLOSING OF A BASE OR PLACING AN ACTIVE INTALLATION ON "STANDBY" WITH A SMALL FORCE OF ABOUT 350 MEN SO IT COULD BE REACTIVATED QUICKLY.

MANY GOVERNMENT AND MILITARY OFFICIALS IN BANGKOK WOULD LIKE TO CONTINUE A MILITARY RELATIONSHIP WITH THE UNITED STATES.

IN CALLING FOR WITHDRAWAL OF U.S. FORCES BY NEXT MARCH, THE GOVERNMENT QUALIFIED ITS POLICY STATEMENT BY ADDING A VAGUE PROVISO MAKING THE WITHDRAWALS DEPENDENT ON THE SITUATION IN THE REGION AT THE TIME. UPI 05-05 05:18 AED

APS088

(BANGKOK) -- THE UNITED STATES WILL REMOVE OVER A QUARTER OF ITS TROOPS STATIONED IN THAILAND IN THE NEXT TWO MONTHS. IN A JOINT AMERICAN-THAI ANNOUNCEMENT TODAY, THE TWO GOVERNMENTS SAID THE TROOP WITHDRAWAL IS THE FIRST STEP TOWARD TOTAL WITHDRAWAL OF U-S FORCES. THE AMERICAN PRESENCE IN THAILAND IS THE LAST U-S MILITARY FOOTHOLD IN SOUTHEAST ASIA.

THE FALL OF THE SOUTH VIETNAMESE GOVERNMENT LAST WEEK PROMPTED SOME THAI PARLIAMENTARIANS TO DEMAND THAT THE GOVERNMENT FORCE THE AMERICANS OUT AS SOON AS POSSIBLE. THE U-S HAS NO STATUS OF FORCES AGREEMENT WITH THAILAND, ITS OLDEST ASIAN ALLY. IT HAS BASED ITS PRESENCE IN THAILAND ON OLD AGREEMENTS BETWEEN FORMER ADMINISTRATIONS.
05:14AED 05-05-75

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CURRENT NEWS

PART II - MAIN EDITION - 1130

THIS SUPPLEMENTS PART I-EARLY BIRD EDITION

THIS PUBLICATION IS PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL NEWS ITEMS OF INTEREST TO THEM IN THEIR OFFICIAL CAPACITIES. IT IS NOT INTENDED TO SUBSTITUTE FOR NEWSPAPERS, PERIODICALS AND BROADCASTS AS A MEANS OF KEEPING INFORMED ABOUT THE NATURE, MEANING AND IMPACT OF NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL NEWS DEVELOPMENTS. USE OF THESE ARTICLES HERE, OF COURSE, DOES NOT REFLECT OFFICIAL ENDORSEMENT. FURTHER REPRODUCTION FOR PRIVATE USE OR GAIN IS SUBJECT TO THE ORIGINAL COPYRIGHT RESTRICTIONS.

FRIDAY, MAY 2, 1975

NEW YORK TIMES
2 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

VIETNAM MERGER NOT LIKELY SOON

By Agence France-Presse

HANOI, North Vietnam, May 1 — Authoritative sources here said today that two different political, economic and social systems would probably prevail in Vietnam for some time, leading in steps to the reunification of the North and South.

The sources, who said it was difficult to estimate the length of the period before reunification, explained that two governments—North and South—were likely to go on representing Vietnam at the international level.

The problem of reunification must take into account the political, economic and social differences between the two parts of the country and certain realities in the South, such as the people's mentality and economic problems, the sources said.

Resolution Cited

While many people are wondering what kind of political regime will take over in Saigon, observers cite the 14-point basic resolution drawn up by the Congress of Representatives of the People of South Vietnam, Provisional Revolutionary Government, in June, 1969. Its main points were the following:

¶The political regime of South Vietnam is republican, with the watchwords independence, democracy, peace, neutrality.

¶Internal policy is one of national union without distinction of social and ethnic background, religious conviction, and political belief, and this without regard to a person's past provided that he supports peace, independence and neutrality.

¶Foreign policy is one of peace and neutrality, the establishment of diplomatic, economic and cultural relations with all countries without distinction of political or social regime, according to the five principles of peaceful coexis-

See MERGER, Pg. 2

NEW YORK TIMES
2 MAY 1975 Pg. 16

U. S. WILL REDUCE FORCE IN THAILAND

BANGKOK, Thailand, May 1 (AP) — The United States Government has agreed to a substantial withdrawal of American forces from Thailand, Foreign Minister Chatichai Choonhavan said at a news conference today.

Mr. Chatichai said the withdrawal would be announced simultaneously Monday in Washington and Bangkok. He refused to disclose how many of the 25,000 United States servicemen and approximately 350 aircraft still stationed in Thailand would leave but said it "will be a large number."

Premier Kukrit Pramaj has pledged that all American troops will be withdrawn within a year.

A Gradual Withdrawal

Mr. Chatichai, who met last week with Edward E. Masters, the deputy chief of the American mission in Bangkok, to prepare for the withdrawal, said it must be gradual so that new work can be found for the 25,000 Thais employed by the United States military. He said the United States Government has confirmed that it would stand by its defense commitments to Thailand.

The only wrieten commitment ever made public is the 13-year-old Rusk-Thanat joint statement, which promised United States support through the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization "to help Thailand meet indirect aggression."

The joint statement, which was signed in Washington in March, 1962, by Secretary of State Dean Rusk and Foreign Minister Thanat Khoman, said the United States "regards the preservation of the independence and intergrity of Thailand as vital to the national interest of the United States and to world peace."

Commitment by Nixon

Other commitments to Thailand were given at meetings between President Nixon and Thanom Kittikachorn, who was then Premier. On his visit to Thailand in 1969, Mr. Nixon reaffirmed that the United States would stand by its commitments to help fight Commu-

See THAILAND, Pg. 2

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER - 2 MAY 1975 Pg. 3

No New Asia Challenges Expected by Schlesinger

From Inquirer Wire Services

WASHINGTON — Secretary of Defense James Schlesinger said yesterday that he expected no new Communist military challenges in Asia as a result of North Vietnam's victory and other U. S. reverses in Indochina.

But Schlesinger said "it is particularly inopportune to contemplate major changes" in U. S. military deployments because the confidence of many countries "in American power and American steadfastness" has been shaken.

Appearing at a surprise news conferesce, the secretary also underscored U. S. commitments to Israel, the Philippines, Japan, Australia, New Zealand and Taiwan.

"I would not anticipate that anybody would challenge the U. S. presence" in South Korea, he said.

He said also, "I would not expect a military challenge to the Philippines."

In Southeast Asia, Schlesinger said, the professed neutrality of the new Cambodian government "may be respected" by North Vietnam. And he added that "one may hope" that Hanoi will also respect a neutral Laos.

Schlesinger was unclear about the prospects for Thailand, indicating that he felt any moves against that country might depend on internal forces in the Hanoi leadership which might differ over whether to consolidate their gains in South Vietnam or move on to other areas.

Graham Martin, who was the U. S. ambassador in Saigon until the city fell, said meanwhile that if the United States had kept its commitments to the South Vietnamese government after the Paris agreement, "it would not have been necessary to leave."

The ambassador spoke with newsmen in the hastily organized press center of this U. S. Navy command ship Blue Ridge in the middle of the 7th Fleet armada to which Marine helicopters brought nearly 1,000 Americans and 6,000 Vietnamese from

See SCHLESINGER, Pg. 2

NEW YORK TIMES
2 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

FORD AND SADAT TO MEET IN JUNE IN AUSTRIAN CITY

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 1 — President Ford will meet with President Anwar el-Sadat of Egypt in Salzburg, Austria, in the first days of June, and is considering a later meeting with Premier Yitzhak Rabin of Israel.

Well-informed Administration officials and diplomats said today that a formal announcement of the Ford-Sadat meeting, set for June 1 and 2, would be made here in Cairo tomorrow.

In a May Day speech today, President Sadat apparently hinted at a meeting when he said he would reveal tomorrow a major diplomatic move to end the "no war, no peace" situation in the Middle East.

In the speech, Mr. Sadat also disclosed that the Soviet Union had rejected his request for a rescheduling of Egypt's debt. Details on Page 3.

No Date Set for Rabin

No date has been set for talks between President Ford and Premier Rabin, but a senior American official said they were under consideration. Most likely Mr. Rabin would be invited to Washington. Israeli officials said they knew of no plans for such a meeting.

Mr. Ford already has announced plans to attend a meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in Brussels on May 29 and 30, to be attended by chiefs of state and government from the 15 mem-

See FORD, Pg. 2

JAMES KILLINGBECK, CHIEF, CURRENT NEWS BRANCH, OX 78765 HELEN YOUNG, ASSISTANT CHIEF

FOR SPECIAL RESEARCH SERVICES OR DISTRIBUTION CALL HARRY ZUBKOFF, CHIEF, EXECUTIVE AGENCY SERVICE, OX 52884

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK TIMES
2 MAY 1975 Pg. 16

Moscow Applauds Victors in Vietnam In Restrained Tone

By JAMES F. CLARITY
Special to The New York Times

MOSCOW, May 1—The Soviet leadership congratulated the Vietnamese Communists today on the "liberation of practically all the territory of South Vietnam including Saigon."

The text of the message was issued tonight, more than a full day after news of the fall of Saigon became widely known in Moscow. There was no official indication of why the Soviet Union took so long to hail the victory it had called for with enthusiasm for years.

The Government-controlled press, radio and television have been reporting recent Vietnam events in a low-key manner.

The message, signed by the Communist party leader, Leonid. I. Bhezhnev, Premier Aleksei N. Kosygin and President Nikolai V. Podgorny, did not mention the United States role in Vietnam.

Ford Not Linked to Vietnam

The American evacuation of Vietnamese and the Pentagon's proposals for more military aid to Saigon have been assailed, but President Ford and his Administration have barely been mentioned in connection with Vietnam.

Western diplomats feel that the Soviet reluctance to chide the United States is based on the Kremlin's desire for improved relations with the Ford Administration.

Today, at the May Day parade, American astronauts were prominently shown in attendance at Red Square and there was ample television comment about the cooperation between the United States and the Soviet Union in space.

The Soviet leaders' message, according to Tass, the official press agency, was sent to Nguyen Huu Tho, identified as chairman of the Central Committee of the South Vietnamese National Liberation Front.

LOS ANGELES TIMES
1 MAY 1975 Pg. 2 (2)

48 Officers Face Discharge

Forty-eight Navy and Marine officers, who have fought for a year to remain in the service, will be officially discharged despite their protests that they will lose their pensions. U.S. Supreme Court Justice William J. Brennan Jr. refused to block the discharge of the officers, who filed a $16.8 million suit against the Navy, charging they were being hustled out of the service just before they became eligible for pensions after 20 years of service. The men, 39 Navy lieutenants and nine Marine Corps captains stationed in various parts of the country, were scheduled to complete final processing for discharge.

MERGER ... CONTINUED

tence. It is a policy of good neighborliness, in respect for sovereignty and territorial integrity, with Laos and Cambodia.

¶Vietnam is one country, the Vietnamese people is one people. This statement quoted the late President Ho Chi Minh, who said, "Vietnam is one country, the Vietnamese people is one people. Rivers may dry up, mountains may be eroded, but this truth will not change." Once South Vietnam is liberated, the reunification of the country will take place step by step, by peaceful means, on the basis of agreement between the two zones, without foreign interference. ¶The revolutionary Government is the organ of over-all power embodying the will and aspirations of the whole South Vietnamese population. It will create the conditions permitting the formation of a provisional coalition government aimed at organizing free general elections for a constituent assembly which will draw up a constitutio and choose a definite government for South Vietnam.

Democratic Centralism

The nine remaining points deal with the role of the Revolutionary Government: Its fight for independence, the organization of revolutionary people's people's committees at all levels, and its council of elders.

For example, Point 8 stipulates that revolutionary power in South Vietnam is to be organized according to the principle of democratic centralism, from the central echelon down to the basic units.

The North Vietnamese Communist party newspaper Nhan Dan today greeted Saigon's surrender with banner headlines and a photograph of Ho Chi Minh.

"Long Live the Liberation of Saigon," one headline proclaimed. Another announced complete success in the South.

The front page carried a map showing nine Communist thrusts toward Saigon before the surrender and an editorial jubilantly marked the "total liberation and independence of our Vietnam."

Homage to Army

The editorial paid special homage to the armed forces who, after "two months of courageous fighting since Ban Me Thuot have crushed an enemy army numbering a million men and smashed the enemy's war machine and administration to pieces."

Nhan Dan also published the statement by Lieut. Gen. Duong Van Minh, the last President of the old Saigon regime, ordering South Vietnamese troops to stop all fighting. Yesterday, the North Vietnames newspaper attacked him for not having complied immediately with demands by the Revolutionary Government to command South Vietnamese troops to lay down their arms and to order the Americans to leave.

The newspaper was especially scornful at the flight of South Vietnam's former vice president, Marshal Nguyen Cao Ky. According to Nhan Dan, Marshal Ky had to grab hold of the hem of the skirt of the wife of the American Ambassador, Graham A. Martin, to clamber aboard an evacuation helicopter.

Nhan Dan recalled thatonly a few days ago Marshal Ky had declared taht he would choose a glorious death and had asked what the point was in leaving Vietnam to become a prostitute or a cook in the service of the Americans.

SCHLESINGER ... CONTINUED

Saigon Tuesday and early Wednesday.

"If we had kept the commitments we had made and kept after the first year of the Paris agreement, it would not have been necessary to leave," said the ambassador, one of the staunchest supporters of former President Nguyen Van Thieu.

In another development, retired Adm. Elmo Zumwalt said the Nixon Administration had promised Thieu — without informing Congress — that it would "respond vigorously" to any Communist violation of the peace agreement.

WASHINGTON POST
2 MAY 1975 Pg. 17

Thieu Said To Rule Out U.S. Home

TAIPEI—Former South Vietnamese President Nguyen Van Thieu is never going to seek asylum in the United States because he is "very angry" with the U.S. government, sources close to him reported yesterday.

One source said Thieu and his family were furious because "the U.S. government did not honor its commitment to South Vietnam, resulting in the dire consequences leading to the fall of Saigon."

The sources said if Thieu decides to leave Taiwan, he would prefer to go to Europe.

Thieu resigned on April 21 and arrived here last Saturday.

THAILAND ... CONT'D

nist aggression against Thailand.

Opposition leaders here meanwhile are urging speedy withdrawal of the remaining American forces so as not to provoke retaliation from North Vietnam.

"We've kept the United States forces on our soil for too long," said Mr. Kukrit's brother, Seni Pramoj. "We sent our troops to fight in Vietnam. I'm sure that the Vietcong did not like our actions."

Mr. Seni also urged the Government to recognize the Chinese and North Vietnamese Governments as soon as possible because "time is running short for us." North Vietnam has said she will not open diplomatic relations with Thailand until all United States forces are withdrawn.

FORD ... CONTINUED

ber countries.

The decision to meet with Mr. Sadat was decided in the last few days and will apparently be Mr. Ford's first meeting with a Middle East leader following the end of the current review of American policy, due to conclude in the next two weeks.

As news of the Ford-Sadat meeting began to spread in Washington, some American Jewish groups perceived a symbolic snub to Israel in the announcment of a meeting with Mr. Sadat without a simultaneous scheduling of talks with Mr. Rabin.

American Jewish leaders and the israelis have been concerned about a drift in American policy away from Isarael, following the failure of Secretary of State Kissinger in March to bring about a new Egyptian-Israeli accord.

American officials have said that the main purpose of the current policy reassessment is to determine a future course now that a setback has been recorded in the step-by-step approach.

Mr. Ford will discuss with Mr. Sadat the results of the American policy review and the possibilities for further diplomatic progress. Mr. Ford, in an interview on CBS television recently, indicated that he hoped to combine a return to the Middle East peace conference in Geneva with a separate Egyptian-Israeli accord.

This would require a shift by either Egypt or Israel, or both. The last round of talks broke down over the demands of Egypt for territorial concessions, including strategic passes, and Israel's demand for a nonbeligerency accord. Concessions made by the two sides did not prove acceptable to the other.

Mr. Ford and Mr. Kissinger have indicated since then that they thought Israel was shortsighted in not accepting the package that Mr. Kissinger had worked out, a view disputed by the Israelis.

Mr. Sadat met with President Richard M. Nixon in Egypt in June, 1974, when Mr. Nixon made a swing through several Arab countries and Israel.

Mr. Sadat was to return the visit to the United States in November, 1974, but the date was put off because both sides believed it would be better to await the completion of a new accord.

In the absence of an agreement, it was decided to set up a meeting in a neutral place.

The Egyptian President has announced that the Suez Canal will be opened for traffic on June 5, eight years after it was closed during the June, 1967, war that led to Israeli occupation of Sinai. As a result of the first disengagement accord worked out by Mr. Kissinger in January, 1974, Egypt regained control of the eastern bank of the canal.

Mr. Ford met with a delegation of Egyptian legislators on Tuesday, but apparently did not discuss the Sadat meeting with them. He also met this week with King Hussein of Jordan, who has come to Washington on an unofficial visit.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK TIMES - 2 MAY 1975 Pg. 1

Cambodia Evacuees Overdue at Border

By DAVID A. ANDELMAN
Special to The New York Times

ARANYAPRATHET, Thailand, May 1—Cambodian Communist, French and Thai Government officials met repeatedly today across the bridge here that marks the Thai-Cambodian border, but the discussions failed to produce any firm word on the whereabouts of foreigners who have been isolated in the French Embassy compound in Phnom Penh.

There were reports through the day that all 610 foreigners, whom the Cambodians had promised to deliver by truck convoy to this border town 250 miles from Phnom Penh, were near the bridge. It spans a small stream that is the border here.

The reports reached diplomats, relief workers and newsmen gathered here, but at nightfall there was still no firm evidence that the Phnom Penh evacuees were near.

[In Paris the principal foreign representative of Prince Norodom Sihanouk's government accused France of harboring hundreds of "war criminals" on the grounds of the Phnom Penh embassy. A French Foreign Ministry spokesman denied that any Cambodians remained within the embassy confines.]

The Cambodian and Thai officials agreed, shortly before sundown, to keep the frontier open all night, should the refugee convoy suddenly arrive. The frontier is usually closed from dusk to dawn.

Late today the French Ambassador to Thailand, Jean-Louis Toffin, arrived at the frontier to take charge of the sporadic discussions, which one official termed "endlessly frustrating."

After talking at some length with Cambodian soldiers and at least one senior Cambodian official, the Ambassador said: "Everything that has been said before about this convoy is complete nonsense. We have no idea where it is."

The problem, was apparently that Cambodian officials at the border had little or no authority to make decisions and were not kept posted on the status of the refugees by senior officials in the Cambodian capital.

All two-way communications between Phnom Penh and the outside world have been cut since Saturday. Only through radio broadcasts and news releases issued by the Cambodian Communists did the intentions of the Cambodians to release the foreigners become known.

Officials at the frontier scurried around all day, trying to satisfy every request made by the Cambodian troops at the border crossing. It is the only direct contact still maintained between the new Government of Cambodia and the outside. All of these efforts appeared to be fruitless.

At one point the Cambodian soldiers indicated that the problem was a shortage of gasoline for the trucks. Officials of the International Committee of the Red Cross, who have set up an emergency medical center for the evacuees here, immediately prepared to deliver the fuel. But later a higher Cambodian official said there was no such shortage and no evidence that the convoy was being delayed for lack of gasoline.

At another point Col. Jean Loubert, the French Military attaché, dug into his pocket and came up with three aspirin tablets for a Cambodian soldier who had complained of a toothache. "We will give them anything they want," the colonel said later.

Delay Disturbs Envoy

Ambassador Tofffin said he was becoming increasingly disturbed over the delay in delivering the 610 people—515 French citizens and 95 foreign nationals, including five American journalists. All took refuge in the embassy after Phnom Penh was lost to the Communists on April 17.

The last word the French Government received before two-way communications ceased was that food and medicine were running short in the compound and that medical authorities feared an outbreak of dysentery. Ten beds have been set up in a police post next to the border gate here. The Red Cross has medicines here to treat everything from a simple cut to cholera.

Diplomats of 10 nations—Thailand, the United States, the Soviet Union, France, West Germany, India, Japan, Spain, Belgiub and Italy—have joined the throng waiting at the border point here at Aranyaprathet, in southeastern Thailand 135 miles east of Bangkok. The Cambodians say they will turn over the foreign nationals only to their diplomatic representatives.

DALLAS MORNING NEWS
19 APRIL 1975 Pg. 3
(2 MAY)

Bases Available

TOKYO (UPI)—American military bases in Japan remain available for the defense of South Korea under terms of the U.S.-Japan Security Treaty, Foreign Ministry spokesman Mizuo Kuroda said. "Under the treaty, if there is a danger to the Far East region, the United States can use the bases in Japan under certain conditions," Kuroda said at a briefing for foreign newsmen. "South Korea definitely is included in the term Far East."

NEW YORK NEWS - 2 MAY 1975 Pg. 2

Ships Leave With 40,000: Schlesinger

By STAN CARTER

Washington, May 1 (News Bureau) — After picking up almost 40,000 refugees, the 40 U.S. ships that were standing off South Vietnam have left and are well outside the 12 miles of territorial waters claimed by the Communists, Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger said today.

But both Schlesinger and State Department spokesman Robert Anderson said that U.S. ships would continue to pick up South Vietnamese who flee their Communist-conquered country in sampans and other small boats. The officials shrugged off a demand by North Vietnam that the U.S. Navy immediately cease "the forcible evacuation of the population of South Vietnam" and withdraw from areas near the South Vietnamese coast.

"Our ships are on the high seas, and as long as there are Vietnamese who are in distress and ome out into the high seas, we will pick them up," Anderson said.

A North Vietnamese Foreign Ministry statement broadcast from Hanoi charged that the presence of U.S. ships off South Vietnam in recent weeks constituted interference in South Vietnam's affairs. The statement demanded "that the American government immediately put an end to this criminal plan, withdraw without delay all the U.S. Navy ships operating off the coasts of South Vietnam and cease interfering in the internal affairs of South Vietnam."

Schlesinger, in announcing that the evacuation ships already were headed toward Guam and the Philippines, said that the Communist demands "follow an action rather than precede it" — suggesting that Hanoi was merely making a propaganda pitch after the evacuation flotilla had already left.

Schlesinger said that one or two U.S. ships remained in the general area, but that all of the more than 40 vessels that had been involved in the evacuation effort would be gone within a few hours.

The State Department said that the flotilla of aircraft carriers, transports and other vessels had picked up more than 32,000 South Vietnamese who had fled by sampans, rafts and other small craft, as well as 1,373 Americans and 5,595 South Vietnamese evacuated from Saigon by helicopter.

The total number of South Vietnamese eacuated by the United States is almost 80,000.

Schlesinger, at a Pentagon press conference, said that American reverses in Indochina would inevitably bring about a reassessment of America's worldwide defense posture. But he said that it would be "particularly inopportune" at this time to contemplate any major changes because of the recently shaken confidence of many countries "in American power and American steadfastness."

He underscored the continued U.S. commitments to Israel, the Philippines, Japan, Australia, New Zealand, Taiwan and South Korea, as well as to Western Europe.

WASHINGTON POST
2 MAY 1975 Pg. C7

Hill Confirms Army Chief Of Chaplains

Col. Orris E. Kelly, a United Methodist minister who is executive officer in the office of the Army Chief of Chaplains, has been confirmed by the Senate to succeed Maj. Gen. Gerhardt W. Hyatt, Army chief of chaplains, who will retire July 31.

WASHINGTON POST
2 MAY 1975 Pg. 17

Canadian Offer

OTTAWA—Canada will accept 3,000 South Vietnamese refugees, Immigration Minister Robert Andras told the House of Commons. He said this would be in addition to an earlier commitment to receive relatives of Canadian citizens and persons who had already been given permission to immigrate.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

BALTIMORE SUN 2 May 1975 Pg. 2

Viet debate grows bitterly partisan

By HENRY L. TREWHITT
Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—The debate whether the United States reneged on specific promises to South Vietnam turned yesterday into a bitter partisan dispute over responsibility for a lost war.

Senator Henry M. Jackson (D., Wash.), a declared candidate for President, called for disclosure of all documents bearing "on the nature and extent of the U.S. commitment to South Vietnam." The administration refused to release private exchanges.

Representative John J. Rhodes (R., Ariz.), the House minority leader, declared, "You can't expect the chief executive to release exchanges with another head of government."

"If the Democrats really want to rehash this thing, I'll be glad to rehash the whole thing," he said.

What he called an "inquest" on the war in Vietnam would "help the Republican party," he said, "because the Republicans had nothing to do with the beginning."

With that, the debate following the collapse of South Vietnam Tuesday heated up. It quickly exceeded the pledges on all sides to avoid recriminations and to seek a return to a bipartisan foreign policy.

Meanwhile, the Ford administration continued to insist that private promises made by former President Nixon in 1972 and 1973 to Nguyen Van Thieu, then president of South Vietnam, amounted to nothing more than what had been said publicly at the time.

Until Wednesday, debate had sputtered fitfully over Mr. Jackson's charge that Mr. Nixon had made a "secret agreement" of support with Mr. Thieu to get his signature on the 1973 Paris peace accords.

Refusing to release private exchanges, the administration replied that Mr. Nixon had promised to "respond vigorously" if North Vietnam violated the accords.

But Wednesday, Nguyen Tien Hung, a former member of the South Vietnamese Cabinet, released two letters from Mr. Nixon to Mr. Thieu. In them, Mr. Nixon promised "swift and severe" retaliation with "full force" to North Vietnamese violations. He also threatened to shut off aid to South Vietnam unless Mr. Thieu signed the accords.

The disclosures caused the debate to take on new dimensions. Ronald H. Nessen, the White House spokesman, said there was no substantive difference between the private assurances and what former United States officials had said publicly.

Besides, he pointed out, Congress had forbidden all U.S. military action in Indochina soon after the accords were signed. Henry A. Kissinger, the Secretary of State, reported that Mr. Nixon considered possible retaliation to violations in April, 1973, but never made a decision.

In the State Department, spokesman Robert S. Anderson compared the public and private language of the time and declared: "If there is a difference, I fail to see any."

Mr. Nessen also recalled that Mr. Nixon himself warned publicly May 3, 1973, that North Vietnam "would risk revived confrontation with us" if it violated the accords. He also quoted William H. Sullivan, deputy assistant secretary of state, as having said, "There are no inhibitions upon us," against enforcement of the agreements.

But Mr. Jackson, in his public statements yesterday, found many distinctions. He noted that Mr. Nixon also specifically promised Mr. Thieu continued economic and military aid, which Congress denied during South Vietnam's final collapse.

"The Congress must be informed of the details of significant promises made by any president to foreign governments," he said on the Senate floor, "especially when those promises can involve substantial U.S. military assistance, or even the use of American power. For any administration to give such a commitment in secrecy. . .is to court a foreign policy disaster."

Mr. Jackson urged the Senate Armed Services Committee to insist on "all documentation which has not been formally presented to the Congress."

Senator Mike Mansfield (D., Mont.), the Senate majority leader, pointed out that Mr. Ford had inherited the Vietnam issue, but he said: "Congress didn't know about this and it should have. It looks like the jacks are coming out of the box until we get this thing cleared up."

Elsewhere, other officials and former officials added fuel to the debate. Graham Martin, the last ambassador to Saigon who now is aboard an evacuation ship, was quoted as saying, "It would not have been necessary to leave," if the U.S. had kept its commitments.

And Adm. Elmo R. Zumwalt, Jr. (Ret.), the former chief of Naval Operations, said Congress's failure to honor the commitments resulted from the Nixon administration's failure to keep Congress informed.

In a letter Wednesday night to Senator John J. Sparkman (D., Ala.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. Ford himself said there were no commitments that had not been made public. But he said he must keep secret the "confidential exchanges" on the subject out of diplomatic practice.

For his part, Mr. Rhodes detected a partisan attack by Democrats in the debate. "Aren't we supposed to forget this Vietnam thing and get back together?" he asked at a breakfast with reporters. . . .You could make a good case for this being a Democratic war, though I don't use those words."

NEW YORK TIMES 2 May 1975 Pg. 17

Americans Are Replaced By Vietnamese in Camp

By JON NORDHEIMER
Special to The New York Times

CAMP PENDLETON, Calif., May 1—Processing of refugees at this Marine Corps base picked up tempo today as the number of displaced Vietnamese overtook the initial swell of Americans and their dependents returning from Vietnam.

Americans in print shirts and unpressed slacks still flowed through the processing center that rubber-stamped documents for their families and opened the gates to the world outside. The dusty quarters have doubled in size on each of the four days it has been operating.

But now the Vietnamese families are spilling into the Quonset huts and field tents that are sweltering by day and chilly at night, and their passage outside the base is hampered by inadequate documents and shaky guarantees of economic survival.

Long Phone Lines

The population of refugee quarters was expected to climb to 7,000 soon. There are still wealthy families garbed in tailored suits and silk dresses, but now there are fewer pieces of patent leather luggage unloaded from the buses carrying them here from the airport.

The lines at the three pay telephones set up in the center of the camp grow longer, and the long-distance search for relatives or friends willing to assume responsibility for the callers seem more strained.

"The profile of the camp is changing," said Donald Day, head of the immigration task force at the processing center in an old battalion training hall. "We're getting many more bona-fide refugee types now, people who are appearing here without much in the way of resources."

The Federal agencies screening the incoming refugees were quick to accept almost any scrap of paper that established Vietnamese nationality. But they were more demanding of proof that they had resources in the American community beyond their desire to earn a living. Names of sponsors who could provide for the needs of the refugees were required, and the search for the validity of the nominated sponsors was pursued by the Red Cross all over the nation.

"I think the refugees are catching on and passing the word down the line about what we're asking," said a skeptical immigrations officer. "Everyone is using the same approach now, ready with the same prepared answers."

Many found it emotionally difficult to accept the suden collapse of their world. Land Thanh, a teacher, carried a ring of keys through a belt loop. The keys, he said, were for his Saigon classroom and home. He smiled, as if he knew it was ridiculous to carry the clinking keys halfway around the world, but he could not bring himself to throw them away.

WASHINGTON POST 2 May 1975 Pg. 17

Japanese Concern

TOKYO — The Foreign Ministry spokeman said the fall of Indochina would not directly affect Japan's security but added that South Korea was "a different story."

Mizuo Kuroda told foreign correspondents that Japan did not foresee war breaking out in the Korean peninsula "in the very near future" but indicated that a new uneasiness has arisen in Tokyo about the reliability of the U.S. commitment to South Korea, a country whose security Japan regards as vital to its own.

Asked what might happen if the United States withdrew its 38,000 soldiers in South Korea, Kuroda said that "one of the lessons of the Indochina tragedy is that once the American military presence is terminated, it will be difficult to defend anti-Communist governments."

Asked about recognizing the new government in South Vietnam, he said that Tokyo would recognize whatever government takes effective control.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II--Main Edition--2 May 1975

EDITORIALS

LOS ANGELES TIMES 1 May 1975 (2)

The Newest Americans

In the long night of Tuesday, as television documentaries rehearsed the war in Vietnam, two images froze on the picture tube:

—A wounded American sergeant, teeth clamped on his cigar, grimacing on the battlefield of Vietnam in the agony that would cost him a leg.

—A crew-cut American marine, a smile on his face, ladling out steamed rice and creamed chicken at Camp Pendleton to the first of the Vietnamese refugees to find haven in America.

It was a kind of transfiguration.

Suddenly, the pathetic queues of homeless people were no longer faceless, distant, anonymous refugees, but people who would be the family next door, the new girl in the fourth grade, the new worker on the assembly line. The newest Americans.

For some, the change will be made easier because they are dependents of Americans and have learned much about America from an American husband or an American father.

For many, however, the change will be difficult, for they come with nothing in their pockets, no friend or relative to welcome them, no knowledge of the language, only scant impressions of the American way of life—like so many millions who have come before them. And they come from an unusual diversity of backgrounds, the rich and the poor of Vietnam, skilled and unskilled, educated and uneducated, from all walks of life, even some from the underworld encouraged by the war's traffic.

The first priority is to get them out of the camps and into homes. Progress already has been made. Federal coordinators have made arrangements with a number of volunteer agencies to guide the resettlement. The National Council of Churches, for example, has agreed to help 10,000 through its member churches in every state. This assures a group in each community to welcome, guide and counsel the new neighbors.

It may cost as much as $500 million over the next 12 months. It is an appropriate investment for the federal government, for this is a national obligation. It is the least that can be done for these living victims of the war.

It is not all that must be done. Tens of thousands of Vietnamese, whose security is imperiled by their long association with the American intervention, remain in Vietnam, many of them in camps that were at the end of their final flight from the conquering Communist army. There is an urgent need for food and medicine, emergency supplies that the United States can send through such channels as the United Nations and the International Red Cross.

The TV documentaries have reminded us that nothing can be done for the dead of Vietnam. But much can be done for the living, in America and in Vietnam. Responding to that need is one way America can go about healing the war's wounds.

WASHINGTON POST 2 May 1975

The Newest Americans

THE 50,000 VIETNAMESE evacuated by the United States, and perhaps 30,000 others who made their own way out, have already provoked controversy in the country in which most of them hope to make their homes. Some of this is the result of the haste and confusion of evacuation, some the result of bad planning or nonplanning by the administration, and some the result of misunderstanding and meanness among America citizens. Unless the whole refugee situation is taken promptly into hand, a nasty pall will be cast over a valid and necessary rescue operation, and many individuals—"old" Americans as well as the "new" Americans—may be unnecessarily hurt.

It needs first to be understood that the Vietnamese are here because, in honor, the United States gave them the personal choice. They were not kidnapped; they are legitimate refugees. If some in the "high risk" category are the mandarins of Vietnam, corrupt generals, failed politicians, greedy businessmen with satchels of gold, even they do not thereby automatically lose their claim to American refuge. For like it or not, the United States did invest its political fortunes in those people. Some larger number of the newest Americans, however, can be said to be honest and conscientious Vietnamese who believed in their cause and who associated with Americans out of concern for their own country and for something other than personal gain. They deserve our special respect, however hard it may be to separate them from the others in an official way.

The problems of receiving these immigrants are considerable but hardly unmanageable. Despite a spreading contrary impression, the numbers involved are relatively small, perhaps only 12 or 15 per cent of the total of legal immigrants who would be arriving anyway and a much smaller part of the annual total of illegal immigrants. The federal government has an unarguable responsibility to assume whatever financial load falls upon both the voluntary agencies that are belatedly being called on to handle the relocation, and state and local governments that face additional costs. Given the economic slack in the country, it is altogether reasonable that the burden of care be dispersed geographically as widely and fairly as possible. This is the best way to ensure that anxieties about job competition, welfare payments or cultural assimilation do not undermine the sympathetic welcome that Americans have traditionally offered to immigrants.

It is particularly important that the Vietnamese relatives of American citizens—including all members of the extended families accompanying some of these relatives—be quickly admitted and settled in the United States. If this requires a change in the letter or interpretation of immigration regulations, this should be done at once. It is galling to find that the extended families of certain South Vietnamese VIPs are being processed faster in some cases than extended families related to American citizens.

Already reports have come from Guam indicating that some evacuees may wish to return to Vietnam. If life does not turn out so well in America, and especially if conditions in Vietnam turn out to be less menacing than anticipated, it would not be surprising to see some considerable number of the refugees going home. The important consideration remains, however, that any such decision must be voluntary. Though the principle was often trampled during the American years in Vietnam, that is the American way of doing things.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part ... Main Edition ... May 1975

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER 2 May 1975

Editorialists view the fall of Saigon

Following is editorial comment of the collapse and surrender of South Vietnam:

New York News

The near neighbors of South Vietnam and Cambodia are very seriously reappraising their attachments to the U. S. even in West Europe and Japan, there are growing fears that Americans—tired of their sustained defense of freedom—are ready to crawl into an isolationist shell. We can dispel their concerns but only if Americans demonstrate, by word and deed, that they have not lost their inner confidence and their sense of high national purpose.

Dallas Times Herald

The American involvement is ended and those we sought to save are left behind in pitiable climax to 30 years of fratracidal war . . . Now, God be with the South Vietnamese who reached so desperately for their freedoms. For the United States, the restoration process ahead must assure others that American commitments to free peoples will not again crumble.

Milwaukee Journal

Our influence in Southeast Asia is decidedly lessened. But as a superpower we still have a role to play in the region. We will still be a counterweight to Soviet and Chinese aspirations there. That should not be forgotten . . . After a proper interval the U. S. realistically must make its peace with the new Vietnamese government in Saigon and with Hanoi. It is not a time for recrimination.

Pittsburgh Press

South Vietnam's failure to withstand the Communist offensive without U. S. combat support is painful, disappointing, diplomatically embarrassing and probably will lead to probes against U. S. friends in other places. But it should not be exaggerated nor cause bleak despair. It does not fatally affect our national interests. It is not the end of the world nor of America's role in the world.

St. Louis Post Dispatch

In the end defeat came not because American courage and constancy of purpose were tested and found wanting but because most Americans had decided that their government's interventionist policy was wrong and that American interests in Vietnam did not justify bearing any burden, paying any price asked by their leaders.

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER 2 May 1975

Nixon promises to Thieu can't be kept confidential

"Why are we toying with semantics at this late date," an exasperated Ron Nessen, the White House press secretary, replied to reporters questioning him on the letters from President Nixon to South Vietnam's President Nguyen Van Thieu in late 1972 and early 1973.

The answer is that it is Mr. Nessen who is toying with semantics, making a distinction without a difference between "secret commitments" and "private exchanges." The crucial question, however, deals with substance — the circumstances leading to the debacle of the Saigon regime.

What commitments, "secret" or "private," did Mr. Nixon make to Mr. Thieu? What was Mr. Thieu led to believe the commitments meant? What were the American people and Congress led to believe?

Responding three weeks ago to Sen. Henry Jackson's charge that "secret agreements" existed between the U. S. Government and the South Vietnamese government, Mr. Nessen said that "any suggestion that private communications contained secret agreements should be backed up with evidence. I haven't seen such evidence."

Well, a former aide to President Thieu, Nguyen Tien Hung, has now made public letters from Mr. Nixon which Mr. Nessen concedes "appear to be genuine."

And in a letter dated Nov. 14, 1972, Mr. Nixon urged Mr. Thieu to go along with the peace agreement worked out by Secretary of State Kissinger in Paris, specifically with the continued presence of North Vietnamese troops in South Vietnam. He wrote:

"But far more important than what we say in the agreement on this issue is what we do in the event the enemy renews its aggression. You have my absolute assurance that if Hanoi fails to abide by the terms of this agreement it is my intention to take swift and severe retaliatory action."

It is worth recalling the circumstances of that letter. The peace which Secretary Kissinger had proclaimed to be "at hand" before the presidential election had turned out not to be at hand after the election. Mr. Nixon accused North Vietnam of reneging and unleashed the "carpet bombing" of Hanoi.

In reality, as Mr. Thieu confirmed in his bitter speech of resignation, it was Mr. Thieu who had reneged. The murderous bombing was not aimed at pressuring Hanoi but persuading Mr. Thieu. After Mr. Nixon let up the bombing, he wrote on Jan. 5, 1973, to Mr. Thieu that "you have my assurance . . . that we will respond with full force should the settlement be violated by North Vietnam."

Now if words mean anything, "swift and severe retaliatory action" and "full force" do not mean simply the one-for-one replacement of equipment permitted by the Paris agreement.

Mr. Nessen asserts that nothing was said in private that was not said in public, but the fact remains that when Mr. Nixon, in January, 1973, proclaimed "the right kind of peace," he did not advise Congress and the American people that it would be enforced by the reintroduction of American force. That was specifically banned by the Paris agreements and, in August, 1973, by Congress as well.

In any case, it is difficult to justify the Ford Administration's refusal now to give Congress copies of the Nixon letters, on the ground of diplomatic confidentiality. There is no South Vietnamese government to be confidential with any more, and the principle, like that of "executive privilege," must give way to the superior principle of the people's right to know. The issue is not diplomatic confidentiality but public confidence.

Chicago Sun-Times

Above all else, we must lay to rest the fatalistic notion that triumph or tragedy in Vietnam is inescapably "linked" to our legitimate interests elsewhere in the world. If we persist, in such thinking, greater tragedies await us.

New York Post

For the U. S. the war is over, and the four young men who died in the last hours seem tragically symbolic of the years of wasted sacrifice. For the Vietnamese there remains another in-

CONTINUED PAGE 3-E

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NEW YORK TIMES 2 May 1975

Gains on Greek Bases

The Government of Greece has now indicated clearly that it will not permit resentment over United States behavior during the Cyprus tragedy of 1974 to destroy the links with this country that are vital for Greek security. Negotiations about the American military presence in Greece have not been concluded; but the communiqué issued after the latest round of talks suggests the likelihood of a settlement reasonably satisfactory to both.

At Greece's request, the United States has agreed to terminate the Navy's homeporting arrangement at Elefsis, west of Athens, and to close the Air Force bases at Hellenikon airport, east of Athens. These agreements may cause inconveniences but they will not basically reduce military capability in the area.

Although the separate American air base will close, some American facilities which "contribute to Greek defense needs" will continue to operate from the Greek Air Force base at Hellenikon. The Navy's homeporting arrangement, which stationed 3,000 American servicemen and their families in the already-jammed Athens-Piraeus area, was bitterly resented by Greek democrats who regarded it as ostentatious backing for the despised military dictatorship.

When Greece withdrew from NATO commands to protest the failure of the alliance and of the United States to prevent Turkey's massive invasion of Cyprus last August, it also threatened to close all American bases on Greek territory. The communiqué merely says "agreement is expected on the elimination, reduction and consolidation" of the other American facilities. The installations that remain will be put under Greek command.

Most of these actions might well have been taken had there been no Cyprus crisis. The homeporting agreement of 1973 was an aberration from what should have been Washington's policy, in Greece as it had been in Turkey, to cut back those aspects of the American military presence not related to security. The atmosphere of the Greek-American talks thus far provides hope for a conclusion that will ease relations without damaging the security of either country or of the West as a whole.

NEW YORK TIMES 2 May 1975

America's Opportunity...

Unlike the ordeals in Vietnam that Americans witnessed so helplessly in the years of war, the resettlement of Vietnamese refugees is a problem that ordinary people of the United States have the power to solve.

The unfortunate conditions of unemployment today, fears for the economic future and even some lingering bitterness about the war may help explain the uneasiness expressed in communities from California to Florida as they face a sudden influx of Vietnamese refugees. But the better instincts of human behavior must and surely will prevail.

Government, civic and religious leaders at all levels of society have an urgent obligation to assert their role of leadership, to dampen irrational fears. Already there are touching instances of Hungarian, Cuban and other refugees from earlier crises offering their services as individuals to help the Vietnamese people through the painful reorientation that they themselves had experienced.

It is most essential that the Federal Government provide unequivocal affirmation immediately that resettlement is a national obligation; no local authority can be expected to pay costs that should be borne by the whole society—a cost far less, incidentally, than the nation would have been asked to pay if the war had gone on.

...and Responsibility

Too many extraneous issues were involved in yesterday's defeat of the Vietnam humanitarian aid proposal in the House of Representatives to justify President Ford's denunciation of this vote as an indication of lack of Congressional concern. New legislation targeted directly to the resettlement problem in this country is already in preparation and should be expedited. Congress has an inescapable responsibility to make speedy and adequate financing available.

There is no need for a vast Government bureaucracy. Dozens of voluntary agencies are standing by and ready to help locate families in homes and specialized jobs across the country. They have long and impressive records of experience in this task, in numbers far greater than are anticipated in arrivals from Vietnam, and have shown more human sensitivity and individual interest than could any computerized Government program. A large part of Federal funding should be channeled through these private aid societies.

For their part, the Vietnamese people themselves are not exactly inexperienced in the problems of adjustment to new circumstances, in the flexibility required to adapt under hardship. Many of the refugees are persons of high education and talent from which this country can draw benefit over many years to come.

The Vietnamese immigration is occurring with unprecedented suddenness, without benefit of any preparation, material or psychological, either among the immigrants or their hosts. The problems are enormous, but they are not overwhelming. This is a human challenge to which American society can and will respond.

EDITORIALISTS VIEW FALL OF SAIGON...Cont

terval of torment and uncertainty. Will the victors move toward reconciliation or will they indulge themselves in senseless reprisal, confirming the darkest apprehensions about them?

New York Times

The habits and suspicions of years of insurgency will not quickly disappear. But the new leaders in both Cambodia and South Vietnam have long asked for support from the entire world. If they wish to be recognized and treated as responsible governments, the first step is to act like responsible governments.

Seattle Times

The Domino Theory ... faces an immediate test of validity. Some "dominoes" may waver in Southeast Asia to the extent that nations like Thailand and the Philippines adopt a more neutralistic stance. But there scarcely are grounds to suppose that "dominoes" will topple in other parts of the world.

Los Angeles Times

The Americans are out. South Vietnam has surrendered. Vietnam has been left to the Vietnamese. President Ford signaled the end of the evacuation with an appeal for Americans to "close ranks, to avoid recriminations about the past." That was the right thing to say.

Boston Globe

As of this moment, however, the United States has just found out that democracy is not going to be spread by military power. And we should have learned to beware of false labels marked democracy, covering what's really not the genuine article.

Baltimore Evening Sun

Americans now have behind them the presumably maturing experience not only of losing their first war but also of having to shoot their way out of Saigon against, of all people, the very South Vietnamese allies they went to war to help. We stand hurt and humiliated. But maybe we are a little wiser and, if so, there is more to be won than to be lost.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WALL STREET JOURNAL 2 May 1975

Mr. Kissinger and South America

Postponement of Henry Kissinger's planned recent journey to South America was understandable, even to those nations that Mr. Kissinger was scheduled to visit. For example, Brazilian newspapers that had criticized two earlier cancellations by the Secretary of State were generally sympathetic this time, aware that events in Vietnam deserved priority.

Still, we would hope that Mr. Kissinger will succeed in rescheduling his visit before too long, perhaps to include more countries than Argentina, Brazil and Venezuela. They are probably the most influential Latin nations, but they are by no means the only important ones. And although Latin public opinion is in a forgiving mood about this latest cancellation, it remains a sore spot that the globetrotting American Secretary of State, who has criss-crossed the world on endless diplomatic missions, has not yet touched down south of Panama in this hemisphere.

Any American official who visits Latin America is sure to get an earful about widespread displeasure with the U.S. Foreign Trade Act. Secretary Kissinger is particularly sympathetic to the Latin attitude on this matter, since he also is opposed to that part of the act barring Venezuela and Ecuador from preferential trade treatment because they are members of OPEC. Moreover, other lesser irritants between Washington and its hemispheric neighbors deserve a high level airing.

It has been fashionable over the years, in the U.S. and in Latin capitals, to blame Washington for every real and imagined slight and for every failure to establish a lasting dialogue. Critics complained when Washington helped organize an Organization of American States boycott of Cuba, and they complained a few months ago when Washington abstained from voting on the boycott question in order not to influence anyone else.

The U.S. has undeniably dominated hemispheric economic and political matters, but overall it has been a generous good neighbor whose efforts were—are—frequently misunderstood. Moreover, Washington might want to raise some questions of its own, particularly about the wisdom of some Latin nations trying to establish producer cartels to control volume and prices of commodity exports to the U.S.

The greatest shortcoming of U.S. policy toward Latin America, in our view, is that there has been little serious effort to distinguish among the many nations of vastly different size, potential, culture and outlook. There seems to be a lack of appreciation that there cannot be any such thing as an effective "Latin American" foreign policy for the entire hemisphere; there can only be a foreign policy toward individual nations in Latin America.

In partial recognition of this fundamental but important point, at least one scholar has raised the possibility of Brazilian membership in the Organization of Economic Cooperation and Development. Roger Fontaine, of Georgetown University's Center for Strategic and International Studies, notes that this would allow South America's largest nation to join with the U.S., Europe and Japan in working out the economic and political problems that all four will soon share. Moreover, helping to integrate Brazil into the developed, neo-capitalist Atlantic Community could prevent it from allying itself with some of the more troublesome tendencies of the Third World. In any event, it is wrong to continue thinking of Brazil as just another Latin country, Professor Fontaine said, assuming that what benefits, say, Bolivia, is also good for Brazil.

A somewhat similar argument can be made for each other Latin nation. It is well to encourage regional economic cooperation but it is wrong to treat South America as a bloc. The U.S. needs friends and allies today more than ever before, and the way to cement friendships and alliances is by bilateral contacts. A visit by Secretary Kissinger could prove to be of incalculable value if it goes even part way toward achieving that end.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
2 May 1975

Viet generals stay to themselves

Agana, Guam

High-ranking South Vietnamese Army officers and government officials are keeping to their tents at refugee camps here — well away from hostile evacuees who blame them for their country's defeat. "If the top people show their faces here, there will really be trouble," said one evacuee, Tran Van Thanh, as he joined a food line hundreds of yards long Thursday.

"The people here are very angry. They say it is because the generals were corrupt that we lost the war," said Tran, who was born in North Vietnam and has fled from the Communists six times since 1954.

LOS ANGELES TIMES 1 May 1975 (2)

Elk Hills' Importance to the U.S.

The chances for extensive and, above all, necessary development of the vast Elk Hills Naval Petroleum Reserve in Kern County have been diminished, thanks to President Ford's sudden change of mind and some fancy politicking on the House floor.

Right now, it looks like the Navy and its congressional supporters are in a good position to win the Elk Hills fight, and, if that proves true, the nation's hopes for achieving greater energy self-sufficiency will likely be set back.

Legislation to turn control of Elk Hills over to the Interior Department and make possible production of up to 300,000 barrels of oil a day has been temporarily withdrawn from consideration. Amendments will be made to close various alleged, and in some cases farfetched, loopholes—among them the insinuation by Chairman Melvin Price (D-Ill.) of the House Armed Services Committee that Interior Department control over Elk Hills could open the way to another Teapot Dome scandal.

This and other charges, along with Ford's swing of support behind a bill favored by the Armed Services Committee, have weakened the prospects for greatly augmented production from Elk Hills. The committee's bill would retain Navy control over the oil fields, limit expanded production to no more than 200,000 barrels a day for a maximum of three years, and earmark all the oil for the military.

Given the Navy's reluctance to tap Elk Hills—even during World War II it drew only minimal amounts from the vast pool—that probably means that actual production would be much less than the ceiling authorized.

None of that will do. Elk Hills is a readily available source of much-needed domestic oil. Expanded and continuous production would reduce imports of costly foreign fuels, and could help significantly in creation of a strategic oil reserve that would greatly lessen our vulnerability if overseas supplies were cut.

The President at one time recognized that. The House should still recognize it, and see to it that Elk Hills makes the contribution to energy supply and national security that it is capable of making.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

FEATURES COLUMNISTS

WALL STREET JOURNAL - 2 MAY 1975

Obituary for South Vietnam

By PETER R. KANN

HONG KONG — South Vietnam, or rather the South Vietnam that I have known for seven years, has passed away.

There probably are a great many Americans who breathed a sigh of relief when they heard the end had come. There undoubtedly are some Americans who wished, for whatever reason, that South Vietnam had expired much sooner. But surely there also are some Americans who mourn the passing. I am one of them.

For me the collapse of South Vietnam was like the death of an old acquaintance. Such as I often criticized South Vietnam I don't think it deserved to die.

South Vietnam's faults and failings always were much more visible than its strengths and I, like most reporters, tended to focus at least my professional attention on what South Vietnam was doing wrong. Few societies, and certainly few small and frail ones, ever have been subjected to the degree of sustained critical attention that Vietnam was. I and a thousand other reporters dissected its every aspect, analyzed its every mistake, exposed its every flaw. This is not to say South Vietnam would have fared better or survived longer had the spotlights been turned off, but conceivably there might be a few more sympathizers at the funeral.

In the end, of course, the severest critics and profoundest pessimists proved to be right. South Vietnam may have survived longer than some pessimists expected, but it did collapse—suddenly, chaotically, completely. And, I think, tragically.

South Vietnam was, to my mind, no better but no worse than a great many other societies around the world. In at least some ways it was not so very different from our own. Obviously South Vietnam's social structure, government and army ultimately were too weak to resist the Vietnamese Communists. Less obvious is the thought that South Vietnam did manage to resist for a great many years and not always with a great deal of American help. Few nations or societies that I can think of would have struggled so long.

The Communist 'Crusade'

It is true that South Vietnam lacked a unifying and motivating cause that could compete with the Communist crusade. Anti-communism never was compelling or even comprehensible to most South Vietnamese. Capitalism, as represented by Honda motorbikes and other imported goodies, was not a cause that captured hearts and minds. Nationalism was a contested cause and if only because the American presence had been so great in South Vietnam the Communists seemed to be the true nationalists. So South Vietnam was a country without a cause. But now stop to consider: What cause would motivate you or me to fight for 25 years?

It is true that South Vietnam lacked the kind of creative, dynamic leadership that conceivably might have coaxed more spirit and sacrifice from a war-weary nation. President Nguyen van Thieu was no charismatic statesman. He was an introverted and suspicious military man who proved

See S. VIETNAM, Pg. 2-F

NEW YORK TIMES - 2 MAY 1975

A Time for Reflection

By James Reston

WASHINGTON, May 1—After the fall of Saigon, renamed Ho-City, you might think that Washington needs a little time for quiet reflection, but that's not the way it is. The hunt is on for explanations, lessons and scapegoats, and our gabbiest politicians are popping off before they have anything sensible to say.

Some of them suggest we need a new beginning with a new Secretary of State. Some, including the Senate majority leader, Mike Mansfield, of all people, think that maybe we should begin thinking about withdrawing our troops from South Korea, probably the next target of Communist pressure. Others want fewer refugees, more military arms, and a reappraisal of our whole policy of détente and leadership in the world.

This was probably inevitable after the blunders and disappointments in Southeast Asia, but it is not very helpful. All the major capitals are reappraising their future policies now, and sudden decisions in Washington, or emotional talk about getting out of Korea, can only make things even worse than they actually are.

In Europe, Japan, the Middle East, Moscow and Peking, officials are probably paying more attention to Washington's reaction to the events in Southeast Asia than to the fall of Saigon itself. Particularly, Indonesia, the Philippines, Thailand, Australia and New Zealand will be looking to the future of American policy rather than the past.

Accordingly, it is a delicate moment in world politics, a time for caution and reflection. There is, for example, a struggle now going on in the Cabinet in Ankara over whether Turkey should not cut its ties with the North Atlantic alliance and side with the oil states in the Middle East, which have the fuel and the money. Thus, any sign of doubt, weakness or withdrawal now in Washington could shake the whole system of alliances in the free world.

This point is clearly understood by the Administration here. President Ford and Secretary of State Kissinger have said very little in public, but they have been in touch privately with the allies, trying to calm things down, and with Moscow and Peking to avoid any misinterpretations of Washington's acceptance of the defeat in Southeast Asia.

Mr. Kissinger got very little help from Peking in his efforts to avoid a battle for Saigon, and no help at all from Prince Sihanouk for cooperation

See REFLECTION, Pg. 3-F

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
2 MAY 1975

Vietnam's lesson

By William H. Stringer

A lot has been said about how the United States, though still a military giant, has allowed itself to be defeated in Southeast Asia by a small, third-rate country, North Vietnam. I think we had better revise such a statement if we wish to think accurately.

The fact is, the U.S. could have defeated Hanoi if it was prepared to use its full strength. We have only to think back to the "Christmas bombing" and the mining of North Vietnamese harbors and their effect on Northern morale to see what the results would have been if the U.S. had unleashed its full power against Hanoi. Perhaps this doesn't need to be stated, but again, perhaps it does, if Americans are not to acquire a self-portrait of themselves as abjectly cowering in the face of a small enemy. Or, worse still, as unable to formulate and carry through any kind of successful policy.

Obviously, public opinion in the U.S. did not wish to see North Vietnam "bombed back into the Stone Age," as a few persons had recommended. It could have been done. It is to the credit of the U.S. that it was not done, though some will differ on this.

The U.S. did put forth a tremendous effort, with 50,000 war dead and expenditures of $150 billion. But the country was, in effect, fighting with one hand tied behind its back, insofar as using its full military power was concerned. It did not apply maximum, punishing strength against the foe.

This has its lessons for the future, and for future policy. For instance, one would say the U.S. should never enter a war where there is no popular commitment in favor of the war. The U.S. came to be bitterly divided over Vietnam. It shouldn't have been there, given the condition of American public opinion.

Of course there might conceivably be an occasion where only a handful of forthright individuals saw the clear course lying ahead, for the U.S., and the rest of the people favored some kind of retreat. Let us hope that situation does not arise in the future. Let us hope that we can all perceive what is the sound course for America, if future confrontations arise.

The U.S. is going to have to deal right along with the Soviet Union, and with the People's Republic of China, and even with Vietnam. We shall hear arguments about the value of detente, and of getting along with those whose philosophies of life and conduct differ seriously from ours. But let us always keep in mind how Russia and China behaved in Southeast Asia, how they kept up and even

See LESSON, Pg. 2-F

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

S. VIETNAM -- CONTINUED

surprisingly adept at playing palace politics but who never truly learned to lead. But was Mr. Thieu really any less of a leader than scores of other retired generals who rule semi-developed nations around the world? I think not. He was, by his own lights, a Vietnamese patriot. And, before being too hard on failed South Vietnamese leaders, perhaps one ought to stop to list the names of truly popular and successful statesmen anywhere in the non-Communist world today. My own list could be written on a Bandaid.

It is true that South Vietnam's politicians and people never seemed able to unite, that the society seemed divisive and sounded discordant. Saigon's chaotic traffic frequently was cited as symbolizing the society's lack of order and discipline. But what non-Communist society these days can claim any great degree of political unity or social cohesion? Do we, by our values, venerate order and discipline as social goals or moral virtues? Are the best societies really those in which the trains all run on time and the people all march in step?

It is true that South Vietnam never was really democratic. Its democratic institutions, imported from America along with bombs and bulgar wheat, were more show than substance. And yet, if only because the South Vietnamese government never was very efficient, South Vietnam, unlike North Vietnam, never qualified as a totalitarian state. There were political prisoners and torture chambers and other elements of sometimes harsh authoritarianism. But there also were some limitations on the power of the president, there was fairly widespread—and not always whispered—criticism of government policies, there was a surprising diversity of individual opinion and behavior. Might South Vietnam have fared better had it been more authoritarian, more rigid and ruthless? I doubt it. But I also doubt that it would have fared better had the legislature exercised more power or had press controls been relaxed.

The Corruption Issue

It is true that South Vietnam was corrupt. The corruption was more widespread and more serious than simply a few fat generals salting away millions in Swiss bank accounts. The whole system was in some sense corrupt. At the lowest level it was a simple matter of government clerks supplementing meager incomes with petty bribes. At a higher level it all too often was a case of jobs being sold to men who could pay rather than given to men who could perform. At the highest levels there were some cases of outright venality. But not all, perhaps not even most, South Vietnamese officers or administrators were corrupt. It is not excusing Vietnamese corruption to point out that it exists to roughly the same degree in almost every Southeast Asian country. Nor is it excusing Asian corruption to note that few Western societies are so pure that they can cast many stones.

It is true that South Vietnamese society was inegalitarian and elitist. Its rich were too rich and its poor too poor and the disparities were all too visible. Money and position bought privileges like draft deferments and, at the end, escape. Yet the disparities in Vietnam actually were less glaring than those in a score of other American-allied states from the Philippines to Brazil. The South Vietnamese peasant, when the war was not being fought in his particular paddy, was a prosperous small farmer by Asian standards. I am not minimizing the misery of the millions who passed through refugee camps when I note that there also were some millions of small farmers who owned their own land and made a fair living from their crops. The South Vietnamese peasant, in short, was not a downtrodden serf waiting for liberation from some slave master.

It also should be said, or confessed if you will, that there were many likeable people among the elite who ruled Vietnam. Almost every reporter who spent any time in the country befriended some government official, army officer, businessman, politician—some member of that elite. These people frequently were all too remote from their own countrymen and countryside. Many were too wealthy or too Western-oriented to have much rapport with peasants or soldiers. They were not the best sort of people according to some biblical, or Buddhist, value scale. But some of them were my friends and I will miss them.

It is true that the South Vietnamese army (ARVN) in the end proved to be no match for the North Vietnamese army. The end was an inglorious six weeks of retreats, routs, chaos and collapse. Still, the ARVN was not an army of bumblers and cowards. It was an army that stood and fought with great courage and competence on a few occasions you may remember, like the siege of An Loc. It stood and fought well at a score of places whose names we have forgotten. And it stood and fought well in a thousand little engagements and in a thousand little mudwalled outposts whose names no American ever knew.

It was an army of soldiers who deserved better leadership than they got. It was an army that for years watched the Americans try to combat the Communists with every wonder of modern weaponry and which then, all too suddenly, was left to face the Communists with American-style tactics but without American-style resources. It was a Vietnamese army that perhaps never should have been Americanized and thus never would have required Vietnamization. It was an army that for years was ordered to defend every inch of Vietnamese territory and which tried, with greater or lesser success, to do just that. When suddenly it was told to abandon cities and provinces it effectively abandoned the war.

It was not an army of officers and men who tended to charge impregnable enemy positions, or who would have been willing to live for years in holes in the ground with B-52 bombers pounding the earth around them, or who would have made the long and terrible trek down the Ho Chi Minh Trail, or who went into battle motivated by the thought that their almost certain deaths would serve some noble goal. The North Vietnamese army is that kind of army, but how many others, including our own, are fashioned in that mold? The South Vietnamese army was an army of simple soldiers who, without a cause, fought on for more than two decades. Several hundred thousand of these soldiers died. More than half a million were wounded. And, in the final weeks of the war, when every American in Saigon knew the war was lost, some of these soldiers continued to fight at places like Xuan Loc and thereby bought a bit of time for the Americans and their chosen Vietnamese to escape with their lives. It was a much better army than it appeared to be at the end.

It is true that South Vietnam got a great deal of help from America and became too reliant upon us. Soviet and Chinese troops never fought in Vietnam as American troops did. For much of a decade South Vietnam was, for most practical purposes, an American colony. The U.S. army took over the war and for a time promised to win it. The U.S. taxpayer financed Vietnam. Washington set Saigon's policies and the U.S. Embassy in Saigon largely fashioned Vietnam's politics. South Vietnam was not always a docile puppet and at times it failed to dance to American tunes. But over the years South Vietnam came to assume, indeed was led to assume, that America was its patron and protector. It was not an unreasonable assumption. Nor then was it entirely unreasonable for Vietnamese to sometimes shrug off responsibility for their own failings, to blame the U.S. for their problems, and, toward the end, when America lost heart for the war and lost interest in Vietnam, to be bitter at America and Americans.

The Victors

In the end the stronger side won. The Vietnamese Communists had more strength and more stamina. They had a cause, a combination of communism and nationalism, and they pursued that cause with almost messianic motivation. They persisted against all obstacles and at times against all odds and they finally succeeded.

But the stronger side is not necessarily the better side. "Better" becomes a question of values and much as I may respect Communist strength and stamina I cannot accept that the Spartan Communist society of North Vietnam is better than the very imperfect South Vietnamese society that I knew.

This is an obituary for that South Vietnam. It cannot be an obituary for the country of Vietnam or even the people of Vietnam. Countries don't die. South Vietnam will continue to exist for some months or perhaps a few years with a new government, new policies, a new social system. Then it presumably will merge with North Vietnam and this enlarged Vietnam will dominate Indochina and will become a major force in Asia as a whole. It will be a nation of 40 million hardy and hardened people. It will be rich in natural resources. It will have one of the finest, maybe the finest, army in the world.

Perhaps the energies of 40 million Vietnamese will be devoted to reconstruction and economic progress. Perhaps they will be devoted to further political and military expansion. In either case Vietnam will merit, and probably command, world attention in years ahead. Some South Vietnamese enthusiastically will embrace a new system and new society. Some will have trouble adjusting but eventually will find a place in the new order. Some will be unable to accept the new order, or will be unacceptable to it. They will be discarded in one manner or another, but their children will be brought up to be part of the new society.

The new Vietnam will be powerful and successful and those are the qualities that seem to count among nations, as among men. History books tend to deal with the same themes and history thus is unlikely to look kindly on the South Vietnam that failed to survive. But this is not history. It's just an obituary for the South Vietnam that I knew.

LESSON -- CONTINUED

increased their aid to North Vietnam while we cut in half our assistance to Vietnam and Cambodia. Somehow we haven't objected much to this strange conduct — maybe because somehow we expected them to behave that way.

There will be many times when detente is very worthwhile. There will be times when it will be worth very much to trade and to negotiate and to reduce armaments. We can hope that, with mankind's larger enlightenment, these times will become more and more frequent.

But we can also remember that we are up against some very shrewd adversaries, who will maneuver us, if possible, into the most disadvantageous of positions. And where we may again be faced with the choice of either bombing some small country back into the Stone Age, or seeing some ally panic, toss in the sponge, and go down to total defeat.

We have had a severe lesson in the perils of unwise policy.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

REFLECTION -- CONTINUED

in the surrender of Cambodia, but he did get at least limited assistance from the Russians, and it is interesting that Moscow has not allowed the Communist capture of Saigon to interfere with its policy of détente with the United States.

In the Middle East, which is now the most dangerous area of world politics, neither the Arabs nor the Israelis, who rejected Mr. Kissinger's efforts at mediation, have sided with those who are now calling for his resignation. On the contrary, in these critical days of the collapse of his policy in Indochina, both President Sadat in Cairo and Premier Rabin in Jerusalem have expressed the hope that he will be around for the next phase of the Middle East negotiations.

The White House staff is bombarded with questions but is likewise pleading for patience. Ron Nessen, the President's press secretary, showed up at a news briefing wearing a bullet-proof vest. It would withstand .38-caliber gunfire, he said, but he didn't know whether it would stand up under the fire of reporters' questions. It was a weak cry for mercy, but even humor is no defense in Washington these days.

For the rest of May, the Administration will be trying to reach a new understanding and better consultation with the Congress and the allies on future foreign policy. Next week, the foreign ministers of the Latin American countries will be in Washington, and it is Mr. Kissinger's hope that this will begin a new and major effort to reappraise the economic and political defense of the hemisphere.

Mr. Kissinger concedes now that, in the preoccupation with Southeast Asia and the Middle East in recent years, Washington has not paid as much attention to this hemisphere and to Europe and Japan as it should. After the Organization of American States meeting in Washington, there will be meetings with the NATO allies and later with Japan in an effort to restore balance and improve consultation in the free world.

Congress as a whole, and particularly the members of the Foreign Relations and Foreign Affairs Committees of the Senate and the House, are eager to cooperate with the President and the Secretary of State in this exercise.

While Mr. Mansfield and others are calling for a withdrawal of troops from Europe and Korea, a majority of Congress wants a new emphasis on holding the alliances together, and a strengthening of the trilateral relations among the Americas, Europe and Japan.

There is anxiety in Washington, and a lot of headline-hunters on the side, but in general the seriousness of the situation has produced a mood of responsibility and a willingness to consult and cooperate.

CHRISTIN SCIENCE MONITOR
2 MAY 1975

Cairo's arms debt

President Sadat of Egypt appealed to the Soviet Union for an extension of time to meet arms purchase payments, amounting to $3.6 billion to $6 billion.

WASHINGTON POST 2 MAY 1975

Stephen S. Rosenfeld

American Intervention And Influence

The Vietnam experience gave a powerful stimulus to the feeling in the country that we ought to stop supporting the "wrong side" or the "bad guys" around the world and, instead, get with the democrats, the liberals, and the partisans of political liberty, social justice and human rights. We should give our favor to those who uphold the values to be celebrated in our bicentennial, it is said, rather than invoking arbitrary "national interests" to prop up "corrupt dictators."

It's an appealing idea and it often comes hitched to a lot of heartfelt emotion, but it is at the same time an idea whose time may already have gone. The time to push our values vigorously, if there ever was a proper time, was when we were the No. 1 power and had the margin to use carrot and stick for that end. That margin is now, irretrievably, gone.

As much of a relief as it would be to seek warm relations only with people cast in our own best image, it is an impossible and wrongheaded policy for a nation like ours unless we are prepared to go into a neo-isolationist crouch and accept the consequences of cooling relations with most of the rest of the world.

The internal social and political values of the Soviet Union and China, for instance, are entirely foreign to our own. If anyone doubted whether the pursuit of detente and a conspicuous concern for human rights are compatible, he need only look at the debacle that resulted from the American effort to use trade legislation to alter Soviet emigration policies. Trade fell and emigration fell: the worst of both worlds. Russia and China use detente to fend off both domestic and foreign efforts to broaden the scope of personal liberties. This is disagreeable, but one can not have it both ways.

To make the world safe for diversity --which is one way to define the substance of detente—is to make the world safe for tyrants large and small. It is all very well to declare that coercive governments fall by their own weight, but it is, in most cases, nonsense. Nationalism remains a more powerful force in world affairs than a passion for liberty and justice.

Most Third World governments run their countries on lines that, if noted, would scandalize Americans wedded to their own democratic ways. But especially if they are non-white, they enjoy a certain immunity from general criticism. Commonly their problems are dealt with in some understanding way and they are credited with aspiring to a better life for their people or with being pleasant and hospitable on a per-

CHICAGO TRIBUNE 2 MAY 1975

America's tarnished credibility

By Theo Sommer

THERE IS no denying the fact: America's credibility has taken a knock in European eyes. But, tho Henry Kissinger may find it hard to believe, this loss of confidence has very little to do with the lamentable disaster which the world has witnessed in Indochina. What startled, scared, and saddened most onlookers was rather the depressing failure of the Ford administration to rise to the clichés of yesteryear, its bewildering escape into indecision and bile.

Viet Nam? The Old World was hardly surprised by its collapse. Many Europeans had originally favored American intervention in Indochina.

WELL, WE soon changed our minds. The escalation on the battlefield was paralleled by an escalation of revulsion and fear. The immorality of the war became glaringly apparent when, as time went by, doubts hardened into certainty that in the end there could be different degrees of failure but no such thing as success in any meaningful sense of the term.

Meantime, the United States itself began to crack under the Indochinese burden. Had it continued fighting in the jungle of Viet Nam, it would soon have become incapable of fulfilling its pledges vis-a-vis the rest of the world. So the Europeans breathed a sigh of relief when Henry Kissinger finally extricated the U. S. from the Indochina conflict.

They were too hard-boiled ever to assume that the war could be won without the Americans; they doubted the determination of the South Vietnamese to secure their own future. On the whole, they rather resigned themselves to the expectation that "Vietnamization" would ultimately turn out o mean "North Vietnamization."

It never occurred to them for a single moment that Henry Kissinger might have a different perception, that he looked upon the Paris agreements as a brief for winning the cease-fire rather than just an instrument to provide a "decent interval" between America's withdrawal and the final collapse of South Viet Nam.

In all this, Europeans were in for a set of rude shocks:

Shock No. 1: The total misreading of the dominant European mood by the U. S. administration. What rattled the allies was not American helplessness in the face of the Communist advance and the wild, frenzied flight of Thieu's armies. What shook them was Washington's blind insistence that more mili-

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

BALTIMORE SUN 2 MAY 1975

Communist victors begin task of winning Viet peace

By DEAN MILLS
Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—Suddenly, after three decades of fighting for control of all of Vietnam, the Communists must turn to the more prosaic problem of governing it. The task may in some ways prove more formidable than winning the war.

American specialists in Viet Cong and North Vietnamese affairs say that the military victory is still too fresh to predict precisely how the Communists will convert a bureaucracy designed for war into a government concerned with controlling, feeding, housing and educating its citizens. Indeed the victors themselves may not yet have decided fully.

But there is plenty of material from which to make some reasonable guesses. There is first of all the historical analogy, although it is an imperfect one, of the Communists' behavior when they took over the North in 1954. There is the extensive intelligence collected on the operation of Communist cadres in those areas in the north of South Vietnam that have long been "liberated." And there are some reports, still sketchy, of what they have done in the areas further South that fell into their hands as panicking South Vietnamese troops ran.

The first goal will be to establish order. The total surrender of the Saigon government has given the Communists de jure as well as de facto control. So there should be little challenge to their authority. But experts here still think it possible they will want to execute some policemen, military officers and political officials of the old regime just to underscore the point. Others will be sent to "re-education" centers, so that their ideology can be reshaped to fit the new regime.

The Communists also face the immediate problems of feeding the population and keeping essential services going.

Setting up a food distribution system for a population the size of Saigon's is an enormous administrative job. If they follow their practice in other areas taken over recently, the Communists will establish a system of ration cards to allot the available food—the highest rations for those who have stood with the Communists all along, the lowest for those who chose the wrong side.

In a city of Saigon's size, the humdrum concerns of municipal life—water and electric service, medical care, schools—also demand administrative skills on a mass scale.

Ironically, these difficulties are compounded by the victors' unexpectedly quick success. Intelligence data received by analysts here indicate firmly that the Communists had not expected the final battle for the South to come until 1976.

Consequently, the analysts believe, the Communists have not had the time to prepare the kind of political infrastructure needed to administer so much territory.

For that reason, if no other, the Communists are not expected to treat the general population harshly, certainly not in the first few months; they will need all the co-operation they can get just to keep things functioning.

Indeed, there is some reason to believe the South may never be put through the kind of terrorist program that occurred in the North two years after Communist takeover. Even after 70,000 refugees have fled the South, Saigon remains the biggest reservoir of brainpower and sophisticated workers in the country. The Communists, expected to concentrate now on industrialization in both the South and North, can be expected to try to win over as many as possible.

The most reluctant converts almost certainly will be the rural landholders. When the inevitable land reforms are imposed by the government, the South Vietnamese peasants, who have always held stubbornly to their land, can be expected to put up some fierce resistance.

The Communists might decide to ease the pains of the transition period by setting up a popular front government in Saigon that would include non-Communist members, although it would of course be under Communist control. Mrs. Nguyen Thi Binh, the foreign minister of the Provisional Revolutionary Government, hinted at such a possibility in an interview Tuesday with the Associated Press. She said that the former president of South Vietnam, Duong Van Minh, "might still have some role to play in the future of Vietnam."

The PRG itself is, at least on paper, structure made up of non-Communist as well as Communist elements. But American analysts have always been convinced that it has been little more than a paper creation, devised by the People's Revolutionary party as a rival internationally to the Saigon government. The People's Revolutionary party, which reports ultimately to the Communist party in Hanoi, has been the effective government in most areas controlled by the Communists.

The exceptions are those areas of northern South Vietnam that have been under Communist control the longest. They have been, for all practical purposes, integrated into the governmental structure of North Vietnam.

There is almost universal agreement among Vietnam specialists here that all of the South eventually will be united with the North. They point to the Communists' own often-repeated public statements that Vietnam is one country, to their decreasing mention even of the name South Vietnam as the Communists advanced into the South over the last few weeks, to the fact that Hanoi itself did not establish diplomatic relations with the Provisional Revolutionary Government.

The question, most United States experts say, is not whether the Provisional Revolutionary Government will call for reunification with the North but whether it will happen within a matter of weeks or of years.

INFLUENCE -- CONTINUED

sonal level. Few nations are closer in value and system to the United States than Israel, yet Arab oil, money and power comprise an "interest" not to be denied.

Then there are the likes of Spain, South Korea, the Philippines, the former South Vietnam—countries that were brought into the American orbit essentially for anti-Communist reasons but became known not only for being corrupt or dictatorial but for being that way as a result of American support. This class of country is the bane of liberals' existence.

But there are often complicating circumstances. Philippines President Marcos, for example, seems at the moment to be committing something close to judicial murder of his old (jailed) political rival, Benigno Aquino, but the United States finds it hard even to murmur about his case while it is using Clark Field for Vietnam evacuees. If and when Marcos loosens his ties to the United States, as he and others similarly situated may now do, Washington will have less potential leverage in similar human rights situations.

It is an open question whether our intervention (not just military but political and economic) has tended more to nourish our values in a given country or to crimp them. In the wake of Vietnam, many people accept that our touch is deadly. This is a stock feature of foreign propaganda and homegrown guilt. But it is not invariably the rule.

Washington lawyer Paul Porter once told me a relevant story, drawn from his official service in Europe in 1952. The reciprocal prospect of U.S. aid to Spain, and U.S. bases in Spain, was under discussion. Invited to meet two leaders of the underground Spanish Socialist Party, Porter went to the meeting "expecting to be roundly chastised," as he said. "On the contrary," he recalled, "they urged U.S. economic aid and military bases on the grounds that they would, more than anything else in prospect, open up a closed society to foreign contacts. Also, Spain needed assistance to improve its economy, which they thought would effect some internal political improvement."

The two Spanish Socialists were, of course, right. American involvement can impart a vigor and quickening to another society, and in ways not always foreseen by either party. We ought to develop more respect for this process, since it offers one of the more positive aspects of the internationalism that must be salvaged from Vietnam.

CREDIBILITY -- CONTINUED

tary aid would somehow shore up South Viet Nam's crumbling defenses—as tho dollars could replace determination.

And all that loose talk about "options" like the resumption of air warfare simply made Europe's blood curdle. Was America really about to unlearn all the lessons of its earlier failure?

Shock No. 2: The unabashed resuscitation of many old cliches, dogmas, and theories Europeans had believed dead and buried forever. Europe was nonplussed by the blandness of the second domino theory Kissinger formulated. If the U. S. did not provide further aid to Cambodia and South Viet Nam, according to Kissinger, "then we are likely to find a massive shift in the foreign policies of many countries."

There has never been any convincing evidence that the domino theory was applicable even to Southeast Asia. Kissinger's Infectious Failure Theorem implies that a world power has to act stupidly in order to appear credible. It just does not make sense. In the real world, nations will gauge America's reliability by their own experiences with Washington, by their own interests and options, not by abstract notions.

Shock No. 3: The indecision and inaction of the Ford administration. For four long weeks after the Ides of March there was no political or diplomatic initiative, no call for reassembling the Paris conference, no high-level or—as far as we know—low-level attempt at troubleshooting.

There was just a painful paralysis in the face of events unfolding with tragic speed. The Army chief of staff was sent to reconnoiter. Someone hit upon the questionable idea of the baby lift—which was not a policy but a substitute for policy. Others talked vaguely about large-scale humanitarian help, but by the time a scheme had been hatched, events had usually overtaken it. Meanwhile, the secretary of State kept berating Congress, and the President played golf at Palm Springs.

LET'S MAKE no bones about it. What really undermined America's credibility was the pitiful inadequacy of the Ford administration's intellectual and political response to the situation. There were many abroad who had suspected all along that Gerald Ford was a weak President. Now they know.

Newsweek International Editorial Service

Theo Sommer is the editor-in-chief of the West German newspaper, Die Welt.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

After Vietnam Debacle

HUMAN EVENTS - 3 MAY 1975 (2)

S. Korea Could Be Next Domino in Reds' Path

By PAUL SCOTT

South Korean officials are greatly disturbed by the failure of the U.S. to give military support to South Vietnam and Cambodia in their greatest hour of need.

Their concern is that the Ford Administration has lost its will to oppose communism in Asia and will be reluctant to respond to an attack by North Korea because of the growing restrictions placed on its foreign policy by Congress.

While the U.S. still has 38,000 troops in South Korea, government officials there see the possibility of an indecisive and congressional-tied President acting too slowly to save Seoul, their national capital and a city of more than five million, in the case of a surprise North Korean attack.

The North Koreans now have the capability for a lightning attack against Seoul, which lies less than 50 miles below the demilitarized zone separating North and South Korea.

The warning of the South Koreans is that the fall of South Vietnam and Cambodia to the Communists could clear the way for such an attack late in 1975 or early in 1976 when the U.S. is involved in a presidential election.

The reasoning behind this warning is that a Communist take-over in South Vietnam will permit the transfer of massive stockpiles of weapons from North Vietnam to North Korea.

South Korean officials stress that it was the Korean cease-fire agreement in 1953 that permitted Moscow and Peking to shift the flow of their weapons from North Korea to North Vietnam so Hanoi could go on to the offensive against French forces.

Since the government of President Park Chung Hee sent 50,000 troops to fight in South Vietnam until the Paris peace accord ended its involvement, South Korean officials are convinced the North Vietnamese will now do everything possible to help the North Koreans.

The North Koreans have massed more than 50 FROGs, ground-to-ground missiles near the demilitarized zone within the range of Seoul. There are an estimated 100,000 motorized troops that are within six hours of the South Korean capital.

It has long been the fear of South Korean military and intelligence officials that the North Koreans would use this large force near Seoul to launch a blitz attack across the DMZ to capture the capital and hold its five million residents hostage.

Fifth column Red agents are known to be in Seoul attempting to stir up student unrest against the government of President Park. Since the South Korean students were born after the end of the Korean War they are easy targets for the Communists since they have no first-hand knowledge of North Korean terror.

What doesn't help the South Korean government is the way U.S. Ambassador Richard L. Sneider and his embassy staff continue to play down recent North Korean violations of the 1953 cease-fire agreement.

The violations are considered serious by the South Koreans. They include the digging of tunnels by the North Koreans under the demilitarized zone, probing naval actions in South Korean waters, and flights by North Korean aircraft over South Korean territory.

All of these violations are looked on by South Korean officials as part of a well-planned campaign of testing their country's defenses in preparation for a future all-out offensive against Seoul.

High officials in the Park government are convinced that South Korea is the next target of the Communists, since the Korean peninsula already has been considered by Moscow and Peking as the gateway for the take-over of Japan.

As in the tragic case of South Vietnam, South Korean diplomats here stress that the U.S. has fallen behind in its commitment to modernize their military forces.

Although President Ford when he visited South Korea during his 1974 trip to Russia and Japan promised to seek additional military aid, his Administration has done little to convince Congress that the five-year modernization program should be fully funded.

See S. KOREA, Pg. 6-F

WASHINGTON STAR - 1 MAY 1975 (2)

CROSBY S. NOYES

The Dominoes Are Back

I don't recall exactly how, or by whom, the discredited domino theory was discredited, but we all know that it was, if only because so many of my distinguished colleagues have told us so.

The domino theory has meant different things to different people. But essentially it was the idea, first expressed by Dwight Eisenhower, that the loss of Vietnam would not be the end of it. Once the Communists took over in Saigon, Eisenhower suggested, most or perhaps even all of the shaky nations of Southeast Asia would follow.

The idea was ridiculed by people who opposed the war in Vietnam and who, for the most part, knew nothing and cared less about Southeast Asia. As they explained it, the domino theory was something cooked up by people who wanted to keep us in the war. It was simply a debating point in a domestic American argument. And therefore to deny its validity was an end in itself, quite separated from the realities in Southeast Asia.

Well, the realities eventually will prove or disprove themselves without any help from the pundits. And so it may be timely at this point to take a look at what is happening in the wake of the collapse in Cambodia and Vietnam and what is likely to happen in the future.

There is, for one thing, an odd parallel between what people are saying there and what they have been saying in the United States. Curiously enough, the leaders in Southeast Asia seem to look on the domino theory as a kind of self-fulfilling prophecy. Thus, Singapore's Lee Kwan Yew, who was, at least in private, a strong believer in the domino theory, is now telling visiting newsmen that there was never anything to it — only that Singapore must take note of what has happened in Cambodia, Vietnam and Washington, and shape its policies accordingly.

The same thing is true throughout Asia and everywhere else, including Europe, where American power makes the difference between security and despair. They know that what happened in Cambodia and Vietnam has significance for them and they are adapting their thinking about the future to meet a new reality.

In some ways, things have improved in Southeast Asia since the theory was first expounded in the 1950s. The most conspicuous potential dominoes outside of Indochina — Thailand, Malaysia and Burma — are marginally stronger for the time that Vietnam has provided them. Indonesia, which was on the brink of a Communist takeover in the mid-'50s, is now perhaps the strongest anti-Communist bastion in the whole area.

But in other ways, the situation is far worse than it was then. With Cambodia and Vietnam, the reliability of the United States — and with it the whole concept of resistance to Communism, represented by China and the Soviet Union and now conspicuously by Vietnam — is down the drain.

Ask Lon Nol, or Sirik Matak, or Nguyen Van Thieu, what it means to be an ally of the United States and you have your answer to the validity of the domino theory. For that matter, ask Henry Kissinger, who would never have signed the Paris agreements if he had known that Congress would repudiate the obligations that they implied for this country.

Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos are gone. For Thailand, Burma, Malaysia, Singapore, even Indonesia and India, the future is exceedingly bleak. South Korea, Taiwan, the Philippines, even Japan and Australia, are making agonizing reassessments of their situation, leaving out the assurance of American support in a crunch. Dominoes, anyone?

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Part II -- Main Edition -- 2 May 1975

NEW YORK TIMES - 2 MAY 1975

Asian Communists Cheer Take-Over in Saigon as Others Ponder the Implications

By JOSEPH LELYVELD
Special to The New York Times

HONG KONG, May 1—Peking and other Communist capitals in Asia made the "liberation" of Saigon a dominant theme of their traditional May Day celebration today, while the rest of the region warily pondered its implications.

Whether it was hailed or accepted with resignation, the conclusion of the 30-year war in Vietnam was widely viewed as a milestone marking the end of a long era of Western domination.

"The war in Vietnam has been in every way a war of national emancipation," declared an editorial in Asahi Shimbun, one of Japan's national newspapers. "The age in which any great power can suppress indefinitely the rise of nationalism has come to an end."

Peking More Militant

A similar conclusion in more militant terms was drawn by the newspaper of the Chinese Communist party, Jenmin Jih Pao. The defeat of "the Saigon puppet regime," it asserted in a May Day editorial, was "an impressive song of victory of people's war and a glorious example of a small country resisting and defeating aggression by a big imperialist power."

Firecrackers were set off as Deputy Premier Teng Hsiaoping and Foreign Minister Chiao Kuan-hua paid calls at the embassies of North Vietnam and the Revolutionary Government of South Vietnam to present copies of a message of congratulations from Chairman Mao Tse-tung hailing the start of "a new era, the era of the liberation of Vietnam."

The 81-year-old Chairman, who made his last public appearance on May. ucars ago, once again remained . behind the walls of his residential compound adjacent to the Forbidden City.

Improvisation Needed

In the parks and m horoughfares of the Chinese capital there were streamers and performances of songs to mark the Communist victory in Cambodia. But celebrations of the Communist triumph in South Vietnam had to be improvised, for there had been no time for formal preparations.

Chinese pronouncements stressed the inadequacy of the advanced weaponry and antiinsurgency doctrines that "the United States aggressors and their lackeys" had employed. "No up-to-date weapons can save imperialism and the reactionaries," Jenmin Juh Pao declared.

Privately Chinese officials did not appear to be gloating over the American defeat. A dispatch from Peking to the Times of London reported that CBina still believed the United States could play a positive role in Asia and had no objection to close relations between the United States and Japan.

Hsinhua, the official press agency, reported with apparent approval President Ford's statement that the American evacuation from South Vietnam "closes a chapter." It also highlighted a remark by Secretarte-Kissinger that the United States "must be very careful ithe commitments we make," but "should scrupolously honor those commitments."

Commitment to Pek . The Chinese want the United States to fulfill a cmo commitment, made at the time of President chard M. Nixon's visit three years ago, to extend full diplomatic recognition to Peking. The United States then promised to wih withdraw its forces from Taiwan "as tension in the area diminishes." The Chinese can now be expected to say that the end of the war in Indochina leaves Washington with no further excuse for deferring the fulfillment of that pledge.

In Taipei, the seat of the Nationalist Government on Taiwan, the opposite conclusion was drawn. The general theme was that the Communist triumph in South Vietnam had demonstrated the futility of negotiationsi with Communists. The Central News Dailymn wf the ruling Kuomintang, welcomed the promise of a new American policy for Asia, expressing the hope that it would be based on the principle of "no more retreats."

Park Is Sarcastic

The prospect that the collapse of the American-backed government in Saigon would provoke other Southeast Asian regimes to seek accommodations with Peking and Hanoi was taken, paradoxically, by some Taiwanese as an encouraging sign. The only way for Washington to deflect that trend, they contended, would be to reassert its old commitments in the region.

A Nationalist official said the United States would have to draw a new defense line in Asia from South Korea to Taiwan and the Philippines to reassure Japan.

In Seoul, President Park Chung Hee of South Korea found justification in the fall of Saigon for his suppression of opposition and dissent. At a luncheon with cabinet ministers, he asked sarcastically whether the opposition that had sought to oest President Nguyen Van Thieu of South Vietnam would continue now to campaign for freedom and human rights under Communist rule.

Kim Young Sam, the South Korean opposition leader, attributed the failure of the Saigon regime not to its opponents but to dictatorship and corruption. He called it a "tragedy of tragedies."

Among non-Communist governments in Asia, those of Taiwan and South Korea seemed to be the only ones that were not talking of reassessing their policies and their relations with the United States. In many instances, the reassessments seemed to be based on an expectation that the United States itself would be reviewing its commitments, rather than on any fundamental desire for change.

In Tokyo, a Foreign Ministry official observed that the United States was plainly overextended in its commitments in Asia.

"Japan, too, must rectify her position of having relied excessively on the United States," he said.

Echoing President Ford, Foreign Minister Kiichi Miyazawa said yesterday:

"A chapter in Japan's Asian policy has been closed as a result of the American setback in Indochina."

He said the reassessment would not be hasty, and Government sources indicated that Tokyo would be seeking reassurance on the American security guarantee even as it groped for a more independent posture in Southeast Asia.

The influence in the region of both China and Japan can be expected to increase, the sources predicted, as American influence wanes. Japan was said to be ready to recognize the new authorities in Saigon, but there was no indication when this would happen.

Japan Looks to Trade

Trading companies in Tokyo were already advocating diplomatic recognition for the new government in hopes that this would clear the way for a settlement of South Vietnamese debts to Japan. In business circles generally, hope was expressed that Japanese industry could play a role in the economic reconstruction of South Vietnam.

India and Laos became the first two governments in Asia to extend diplomatic recognition to the new Government in Saigon. In New Delhi, the news of the surrender was greeted with cheers and thumping of desks in both Houses of Parliament.

Subramaniam Swamy, leader of the militantly nationalist Jan Sangh, described the outcome of the war as a victory of nationalism over imperialism. Bhupesh Gupta of the pro-Moscow Communist party of India, said "the Americans are running away like rats from Saigon."

In Kingston, Jamaica, at a conference of Commonwealth leaders, Prime Minister Indira Gandhi of India said the United States had underestimated the force of nationalism. She urged that a message of greetings be sent from the conference to the new government in Saigon.

Malaysia Sees Cooperation

Also in Kingston, Prime Minister Abdul Razak of Malaysia expressed relief that the bloodshed had stopped. He said the triumph of the insurgents might "give some encouragement to the terrorists lurking in our jungles," but he stressed his hope that the Communist regimes in Indochina would cooperate with other governments in the region.

Mr. Razak's government has actively promoted the idea of having the whole of Southeast Asia, including Indochina, proclaimed a "zone of peace, freedom and neutrality." Last year Malaysia became the first of the five member states of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations to establish diplomatic relations with Peking.

This has not deterred the Chinese Communist party from continuing to extend at least rhetorical support to Communist insurgents in Malaysia.

Reports from Kuala Lumpur said Malaysia would declare her formal recognition of the Revolutionary Government in Saigon tomorrow.

Meantime, in Bangkok, Foreign Minister Chatichai Choonhaven of Thailand said he was calling a meeting of the Southeast Asian alliance, which also includes Singapore, Indonesia and the Philippines, in hopes of arranging a joint recognition of the new Saigon government.

S. KOREA -- CONTINUED

In sharp contrast to this delay of U.S. arms for the South Koreans, the Russians in recent months have furnished the North Koreans with hundreds of millions of dollars worth of their most modern aircraft, ground-to-ground missiles, tanks, and long-range artillery pieces.

These are some of the reasons why South Korean officials have their misgivings about the latest assurances from the Ford Administration regarding the U.S. commitment to defend South Korea in event of another war there.

Note: Defense Secretary James Schlesinger plans to go to Seoul this summer to review military needs of the South Koreans.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR 2 MAY 1975

In the aftermath of Vietnam

Spain grows cooler to U.S. military presence

By Richard Mowrer
Special correspondent of
The Christian Science Monitor
Madrid

Sentiment to this effect is growing here following America's withdrawal from Indo-China. Voices are being raised against extending the American military presence in Spain, now in its 22nd year.

A member of the Cortes (parliament) Alberto Jarabo Paya, has tabled a motion asking that "a fixed date be set for the evacuation of the American forces from Spanish bases and Spanish territory."

An executive agreement signed in 1953 and periodically renewed permits United States air and naval forces to use bases on Spanish soil. Some 10,000 American troops are stationed here, mainly at the American-built naval base at Rota and at Torrejon, one of the three big air bases the Americans agreed to build for joint Spanish-American use.

A long-standing Spanish complaint is that the United States has consistently refused to upgrade the military agreement of 1953 to a full-fledged defense treaty which would obligate the United States to come to Spain's aid in the event of war.

But now, in Mr. Jarabos's opinion, "were North America to agree to sign a defense treaty with Spain, what we have seen happen to Cambodia and Vietnam makes any security guaranty worthless."

Extension of the Spanish-American bases deal, due to expire in September, is currently the subject of protracted negotiations in Madrid and Washington. In return for use of the Spanish bases the United States has given Spain economic and military aid totaling to date $3,212 million.

America, says Mr. Jarabo, "is unwilling to compensate at their true value our friendship, our sacrifices, and the risks to which we are exposed" (because of the American connection). He claims that his opposition to an extension of the agreements under any form has the support of many Spaniards.

Last year a nationwide survey conducted by the business weekly Actualidad Economica showed that, of 1,500 persons queried, 16 percent favored the American presence, 48 percent opposed it, and 36 percent either had no opinion or refused to answer.

A former ambassador to the United States, Antonio Garrigues, writes in the newspaper ABC: "The confrontation between President and Congress affects equally executive agreements and treaties of alliance approved by Congress.

"If the United States is to recover the trust it lost in Vietnam . . . it will have to reestablish clearly and unequivocably cohesion and union between the executive and the legislative branches. Otherwise existing accords and threaties, and any that may be signed in the future, will be threatened right at the roots."

The American-based correspondent of the newspaper Arriba, Felix Ortega, writing on the subject of French and American war planes sales to Spain, says:

"As regards the supplying of military equipment, it is to be supposed that Spanish experts have drawn from the events in Indo-China the same conclusions reached by other allies of the United States, namely that it is risky to rely on just one source for ones supplies."

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR 2 MAY 1975

Is Portugal about to go the way of South Vietnam?

By Takashi Oka
Staff correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor
Lisbon

Vietnam, Finland, and Portugal. A litany of three countries comes to thought as a reporter turns to his typewriter in sunny Lisbon, knowing that in the streets below gay crowds are strolling, with carnations in their lapels or clutched in their hands. Even when they shout ferocious hammer-and-sickle slogans such as "Down with huge estates," or "Out with the CIA," there is good humor, as if this handsome riverside city of cream-colored walls and red-tiled roofs were still savoring its second May Day in freedom.

Halfway round the world, the citizens of Saigon — "fallen" or "liberated" depending on one's point of view — await their future under communist rule with a mixture of apprehension and relief. Relief that the long years of fighting are over. Anxiety as the Viet Cong takes over and, no doubt much sooner than once anticipated, North and South Vietnam are reunited under the yellow starred banner of the northern republic.

Is Portugal about to go the way of South Vietnam — not by war, but through the clever manipulations of the Communist Party operating on a politically naive Armed Forces Movement? That is what some Westerners believe — Julian Critchley, for instance, British defense expert and Conservative Member of Parliament who recently wrote, "Portugal appears lost to the West."

The answer depends on one's point of view. If one is a businessman, and finds once-docile employees suddenly forming committees to demand higher wages, or participation in management decisions, or simply to take over a factory, one is understandably worried — perhaps even distraught.

[The Armed Forces Movement gave a boost to the Communist Party on May Day, according to Reuter. It in effect recognized as sole spokesman for organized labor the Intersindical union confederation, which is Communist dominated. This move, however, had been in the cards before the recent election.]

Memory of a promise . . .

But if one recognizes that some form of explosion was inevitable after nearly half a century of authoritarianism, then what has happened so far in Portugal seems mild. Above all, the people of Portugal have the memory of a promise kept: free elections for a Constituent Assembly, in which 92 percent of the registered voted.

That, alas, is a memory denied to the South Vietnamese during the 21 years from the Geneva agreement dividing Vietnam provisionally to the capitulation of Saigon. Both Portugal and South Vietnam have a high proportion of illiterate but not stupid adults. In Portugal the armed forces strictly kept their hands off the April 25 election, though critics will say it was only after they robbed it of much of its meaning by forcing political parties to agree beforehand to the military's continuing dominant political power.

Nevertheless, the voting itself was demonstrably free, and the results a victory for the non-Communist parties, whether Socialist or further to the right. Communists and Socialists — are marching together in May Day parades; but the Socialists — who won 38 percent of the poll — are conscious of their strength, and their leader, Mario Soares, has openly twitted the Communists for centralism without democracy.

Succession of regimes

In Vietnam, first there was the dictatorship of Ngo Dinh Diem, and then that of a rapid succession of military regimes, culminating in the 10-year rule of Nguyen Van Thieu. His

(See PORTUGAL, Pg. 8-F)

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

CHICAGO TRIBUNE
2 MAY 1975

Column 1

Viet war story boxed, stored in Maryland

By James Coates

Chicago Tribune Press Service

WASHINGTON—In the first tan box, a musty accountant's ledger chronicles the day in May, 1970, when a Vietnamese peasant signed with a fingerprint for the $20 burial benefit the Green Berets had promised for her dead husband.

In another box, a yellowing sheet of paper tells in both Vietnamese and English how Kevin L. Schultz of McHenry, Ill., ignored enemy fire on a day in June, 1972, to cram wounded troops aboard his Huey helicopter at Phy My.

An officer's hastily scribbled log, pulled from another carton, relives the September, 1969, day when Capt. John R. Henry reported spying "gooks with a Vespa truck" near his Phuoc Vinh firebase and ordered them "destroyed."

The entire Viet Nam story is here in these boxes, each holding exactly one cubic foot of old Army records. Scrawled on millions of paper scraps, the story fills hundreds of thousands of boxes stacked 18 feet high in a room as big as a football field.

Every record written by the 500 combat units which fought for two decades in the jungles, mountains, and deltas of Viet Nam fills one corner of the nation's attic, an immense warehouse called the National Records Center in suburban Suitland, Md. The warehouse has the floor space of 20 football fields.

THE MINUTIAE in these boxes make Viet Nam the nation's "most exquisitely documented war," said John Hatcher, the army's chief archivist. And now that the soldiers have had their day, it's the historians' turn.

Well-guarded, with air conditioning and humidity controls, the United States Army's Viet Nam records are a "goldmine for research to historians," Hatcher said. To an outsider, browsing thru them compares to rifling a neighbor's desk.

Exposure to the humid Asian skies and soggy combat conditions have slightly rumpled much of the paper. The typing is the product of 35 word-per-minute privates, and the crude, mimeographed forms are often filled out with three or four different pens or pencils.

Only the body counts and orders granting bravery citations appear to have been done on an electric typewriter and crisp sheets of paper.

Archivist Hatcher, middle-aged and mild-mannered in horn-rimmed glasses, displays the serenity of a scholar puttering in some university library stacks as he shuffles casualty reports and kill counts, canceled checks and chaplain reports. Personally, he said, the financial records tell the story best.

"Financial records are the source of most of our knowledge of ancient Babylon," he explained. "All those clay tablets show buying, selling, ownership. The Babylonians wanted a permanent record, and clay, even when broken, can be pieced together. For less important things, like literature, they used perishable materials."

ONE VIET NAM equivalent of a Babylonian tablet is the ledger of Lt. Arnold Goodson, who kept the books for the 5th Special Forces in Chi Lang on the Mekong Delta during May, 1970.

Pulling the ledger from one of the foot-square boxes, Hatcher noted, "This shows that the war was fought sometimes by a soldier with a sackful of piasters." Goodson's unit recruited and trained native Vietnamese and usually operated by assigning three or four Americans to a village.

Pay-offs apparently were more effective than pistols in forming the Mekong irregulars, and the Goodson ledger is filled with such items as "9,200 piasters expenditure for intelligence May, 1970."

To get the Mekong peasants to fight, the Green Berets paid each man 7,600 piasters [about $25] plus bonuses for the capture of enemy weapons. One item in Goodson's books shows the unit spent 18,750 piasters in the village to celebrate the capture of 63 weapons, "numerous documents, 3 POWs, and 38 enemy killed in action by 50 American-trained guerrillas."

There are 14 entries where widows were paid 6,000 piasters burial expenses. To get the money, the women affixed their fingerprints to a receipt. A payroll for the 150 Vietnamese men carries each man's signature.

One guerrilla, Chau Pheng, wasn't paid in May, 1970, the ledger says, "pending outcome of investigation to determine connection with Viet Cong-North Vietnamese." Ominously, his name does not appear on the June ledger.

ANOTHER ACCOUNTING document, the recreational fund record of a 1st Air Cavalry unit in Hue, reminds that American soldiers also were gung-ho kids just getting ready to taste life.

That record for June, 1972, shows that at the height of the last big spurt of American fighting, the enlisted men spent five times as much for sew-on unit crests—the Garry Owen Brigade—than they did for beer.

"You might remember," Hatcher laughed, "that the commanding officer had a big say about how recreational funds were spent."

The declassified records teem with other anecdotes.

An engineering captain writes in his log that a Capt. McCollum "has a new weapon which can destroy 500 feet of tunnel when exploded 10 feet above ground." Under "action taken," he writes, "Tried to find Capt. McCollum."

A staff report states that the Americans have set up a crack fighting unit called the Kit Carson Scouts, composed of former Viet Cong and regular North Vietnamese army men who have defected.

TUCKED AWAY in a box of financial records is a mimeographed letter written by Capt. John P. Costello outlining his favorite "combat lessons."

The first thing to watch out for in Viet Nam, warns the captain, are dog, monkey, and rat bites. "Rabies is quite prevalent in Viet Nam," he cautions newcomers.

He also advises against sitting atop sandbags around a foxhole. "Shrapnel from command-detonated Claymore mines" make this a dangerous position, the captain explains.

And don't throw food wrappers in your foxhole, either, warns the combat veteran. It draws rats. Remember the rabies problem.

Another of his tips for successful soldiering: When the enemy breaks contact "instead of retreating he usually goes out around and ends up behind you."

HATCHER'S RECORDS date to the 1950s when the U. S. first sent advisors. The most recent additions were airlifted from the American embassy in Saigon as North Vietnamese units surrounded the city.

In addition to the cavernous "vault" with the declassified data, there are 10 giant safes replete with TV monitors, combination locks, and armed guards which hold sensitive documents. The records of the My Lai massacre are in these safes.

These safes contain the many contingency plans hatched for controversial steps, such as a direct invasion of North Viet Nam. Also included are papers showing the capabilities of American weapons and still current strategy plans.

But most of the data soon will be declassified under the Freedom of Information Act. Under the law, after six years all but "secret" documents become public record. After 8 years only "top secret" classifications are restricted, and after 10 years even "top secret" is public, Hatcher explained.

PORTUGAL -- CONTINUED

power reposed on the armed forces (which he controlled and manipulated) and on the general belief of the Vietnamese that he enjoyed the wholehearted backing of the United States. He did not fall until these two props were withdrawn, and by then it was too late to save the South.

Several times in Vietnam there was popular enthusiasm for elections, but each time it was demonstrated that the votes had been tampered with. Today as the South Vietnamese go under Communist rule, the only comparison they can make is between two kinds of authoritarian rule, the only difference being that one kind was less efficient and more arbitrary, with more loopholes for individual freedom. That is not sufficient motivation to fight and to win a cruel war.

And where does Finland fit into the equation? This reporter visited Helsinki after lengthy sojourns both in Saigon and in Moscow. Finland is the only part of the old Czarist empire that has managed to remain independent continuously since World War I. But it did so at frightful cost: civil war between reds and whites just after World War I; two wars with the Soviet Union during World War II. The Finns lost a whole generation of men, had to cede one-tenth their territory, and pay $455 million in reparations to the Soviet Union. But they survived.

Like the Vietnamese, the Finns have a reputation for political quarrelsomeness. They have had parties galore, sometimes grouped around a single personality. But when war came, they closed ranks. More important, for all the sympathy they received from the West during the Winter War (1939-1940), "no one came to our aid," as one Finn told me. "We were on our own, and we knew it." Soviet tanks never rolled into Helsinki because the Finns accepted the consequences of their geographic position and made the best terms they could long before they were physically defeated.

A Vietnamese friend, a high-ranking diplomat, was interested in the example of Finland and thought it could be made relevant to that of his own country. But neither he, nor most of his friends, could really face up to the fact that when the crunch came, it was not their capacity to influence the White House, or Congress, or the Pentagon, that would win the war. It was what they could do when they knew they stood absolutely alone, as Finland had from 1939 to 1940 and again in 1944.

Knowing this does not diminish the tragedy of South Vietnam, nor lessen the self-searching going on in American thinking, whether official or private, as to what went wrong. But Finland shows that a democratic nation can survive, even without external military aid and with a communist superpower as a neighbor, if it maintains unity, self-reliance, and the skill to play whatever few cards it may hold. And Portugal confirms democracy's age-old lesson, that there is no substitute for free elections.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

BALTIMORE SUN 27 APRIL 1975 (2 MAY)

Soviet Navy 'graduates' with honors in latest war games

By CHARLES W. CORDDRY
Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—In worldwide exercises now ending, the Soviet Navy had about twice as many ships at sea as it normally does, without putting any strain on its fleets, and rehearsed a wide range of war missions that showed its increasing importance in the Russian military establishment.

The Russians not only sent 220 surface ships and submarines into the war games in the Atlantic, Pacific and Indian oceans, military analysts here said, but they exhibited for the first time in a tactical exercise their supersonic Backfire bombers, making simulated attacks on naval task forces.

They also showed, with Bear and other reconnaissance aircraft, operating from home bases, two African countries and Cuba, an ability to carry out ocean surveillance wherever they choose.

A naval analyst here, viewing the global display seriously but calmly, described it as aimed less at an American audience than at the Soviet political leadership. With this ambitious exercise, bigger and more comprehensive than the latest previous one in 1970, Fleet Adm. S. G. Gorshkov, the Navy chief, showed the Politburo what he had promised more than a dozen years ago to achieve.

It was, in a manner of speaking, a graduation exercise, the naval analyst said, which put at rest any lingering question that the Navy is "no longer a mere extension of the Red Army."

The United States Navy and the navies of allied countries learn more about the Soviet Navy's command controls and tactical operations from exercises like the one now ending than at any other time, analysts said.

One of the more disturbing aspects of this one, it was said, was the concentration on convoys, showing ability to move forces abroad, and on anti-convoy warfare, or ability to disrupt the West's ocean lines of communication.

In the past, the concentration had been more on operations against carrier task forces and on antisubmarine warfare, specially against U.S. ballistic missile submarines. Admiral Gorshkov had spoken in December of expanding uses of the fleets, analysts said, and he has ample naval forces to do so.

In this exercise, 50 to 60 surface combatant ships were deployed and more than 40 submarines were at sea.

Reconnaissance aircraft

(See SOVIET, Pg 10-F)

NEW YORK TIMES 2 MAY 1975

It Might Have Been

IN THE NATION

By Tom Wicker

This is a time of reflection and reminiscence and wondering for everyone whose life and work and attitude were altered by Vietnam. Secretary Kissinger, for example, recalling his negotiation of the Paris accords of 1973, said at his news conference the other day:

"We wanted what was considered peace with honor—that the United States would not end a war by overthrowing a government with which it had been associated. And that still seems like an objective that was correct."

An objective that was correct, yes; but the accords were only a means to that end, and the means specifically included negotiation and "national reconciliation" in Vietnam. Mr. Kissinger does not yet seem to have put to himself the question asked by Richard Holbrooke, a former Foreign Service officer in Vietnam and now the editor of Foreign Policy magazine:

"Why did we never go to Thieu, after Paris and the Congressional arms cutoff, and tell him that this was a new world and he had better negotiate unless he wanted defeat?"

The answer is clearly that against all the evidence of weakness in South Vietnam and determination in North Vietnam, the United States believed it could prop up an anti-Communist regime in the South indefinitely, maybe even make it at some point self-supporting. On the other hand, it was an article of faith that negotiations at best would produce power-sharing with the Communists, and that would inevitably lead to complete Communist domination of Vietnam.

Maybe it would or maybe it wouldn't have, but the unassailable fact is that the "no negotiation" policy insisted upon for twenty years by five Presidents has led to complete Communist domination of Vietnam, as well as the abject humiliation of having to snatch the last Americans out of Saigon by helicopter, just before the deluge.

The opposite is not necessarily true, that a policy of negotiation might have produced something like a neutralist regime. But undertaken soon enough, even a negotiation that led to Communist domination might have prevented the long and bloody post-1965 phase of the war, the incalculable political, economic and social consequences in the United States(and the ultimate American rout.

The recent accession of Duong Van Minh to "power" ostensibly to negotiate a settlement with the victorious Communists recalls, for example, that in November, 1963, General Minh—having led the coup that overthrew and murdered Ngo Dinh Diem on Nov.

(See WICKER, Pg 10-F)

BALTIMORE SUN 2 MAY 1975
Peter A. Jay

Hurt by U.S. Policy, Refugees Deserve Aid

Now that the whole sorry mess is just about over, it is hard to find words for Vietnam.

It was from the start a war filled with tragic ironies, and they were there aplenty in the final hours. Remember how fashionable it was to sneer at the frightened South Vietnamese soldiers who in 1971 clung to the skids of American helicopters in panicky retreat from the disastrous invasion of Laos? In the end it was our own embassy people who went out, if not actually on the skids, at least equally ignominiously, leaping from the rooftops to the last helicopters and clattering away over the frightened, angry and now abandoned people whom we dominated for so long.

We did all we could to force the South Vietnamese to take sides—to align themselves with us against the dread tide of Asian communism. And, tragically for them, we convinced millions that we were right, if they weren't persuaded by our speeches and ideology, then they were by our jeeps and radios and aircraft, our physical size, our sheer money and muscle.

Those whom we convinced are the ones who now are going to have to pay for believing us, and we may be sure a price will be exacted. Whether they are Army officers or civil servants or small farmers with plots they received under the American-imposed land reform program, they have little reason to expect benevolence from their new government.

All that is out of our control entirely now, though it ought not to be off our consciences. Those who have escaped are another matter.

Of all the politicians of various viewpoints who have done this country discredit over the long years of the war, perhaps the most sickening are those who are now resisting the admission of and aid to the tens of thousands of refugees our bankrupt policies in Southeast Asia have created. And there have been plenty of these. Congressional hospitality toward refugees always has been virtually nonexistent, disguised though this has been in fine words about freedom-loving peoples and the melting pot of America.

When 170,000 Hungarians fled their country after the 1956 revolt was crushed, President Eisenhower asked for authority to admit up to 67,000 annually to the United States and asked urgently for amendments to the restrictive McCarran-Walter Act of 1952. But Congress wasn't interested, and only about 38,000 Hungarians were admitted.

The Cuban situation was different only because Cuban immigrants were not subject to quotas, and 100,000 were admitted by mid-1962. A year later, President Kennedy sought abolition of the offensive national-origins quota system, but got nowhere. Congress tends not to like foreigners, especially non-Europeans.

The refugees from Vietnam are where we ought to be concentrating our attention now—and that means all of us, offering whatever small help we can. As for assessing blame for what has happened, it is pointless; the roots are too deep.

As for credit, all sorts of people are trying to claim it now, pointing to what they said or wrote in 1970, or 1968, or even earlier. But this too is pointless and self-serving.

There was a time when there was as much pressure on journalists from their peers to write about how badly the war was going as there was on majors and colonels from their superiors to report new successes. The journalists happened to be right in the long run, but the process by which many of them reached their conclusions hardly qualifies them for canonization.

So now is the time to make the best of it, which we can do only by getting the refugees, 70,000 or however many, resettled as well as we can. It will take money and effort, but when set against the waste of $150 billion and more than 50,000 American lives, that seems neither extravagant nor inappropriate.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WICKER -- CONTINUED

1—probably had a much earlier and more hopeful opportunity to negotiate a settlement with what was then known as the National Liberation Front.

On Oct. 2, 1963, Secretary of Defense McNamara had announced the United States' intention to withdraw most of its 25,000 troops from Vietnam by the end of 1965, and to pull out a thousand by the end of 1963. President Kennedy had said on Sept. 2 that however much help the Americans gave, "in the final analysis, it is their war. [The people of South Vietnam] are the ones who have to win it or lose it."

The military junta then ruling South Vietnam contained much "neutralist" sentiment (which was a major reason why it was overthrown a few months later by Nguyen Khan). "Big" Minh, though not a neutralist, was a South Vietnamese Buddhist of peasant stock who had led the overthrow of the Northern Catholic mandarin, Diem. With the Americans talking of withdrawal, the double-barrelled N.L.F. propaganda line against "a mandarin regime backed by white colonialists" had been set back. The repressions of the Diem Government, moreover, could be assumed to have been ended, at least reduced.

On Nov. 8, 1963, according to Jean Lacouture, the French journalist, the N.L.F. broadcast a statement that called for "negotiations between interested groups in South Vietnam, in order to arrive at a cease-fire and a solution to the great problems of the country." There is no official American record of this, but Washington did record a Nov. 13 broadcast in which the N.L.F. said the Minh junta could have "a future which will be brilliant, which will have no more nightmares," if it separated itself from the United States, worked for national independence and brought "freedom and democracy to the people."

Since President Kennedy had proved his machismo in the Cuban missile crisis the year before, and since he had just discovered in a September tour of the country that his limited nuclear test-ban treaty was highly popular, just the thing to underpin a 1964 peace campaign against Barry Goldwater, those November days might have been the right moment to urge Saigon into negotiations. After all, Mr. Kennedy already had agreed to a coalition with the Communists in Laos.

But on Nov. 22, 1963, John Kennedy was murdered and a different man in very different circumstances had taken his place. By Nov. 24, Lyndon B. Johnson already had told his ambassador in Saigon to assure Big Minh that he "can count on us"—even as Mr. Nixon a decade later gave Nguyen Van Thieu his "solid pledge" of support. With such assurances, why should Minh or Thieu have risked the negotiation no American President ever counseled?

SOVIET -- CONTINUED

flew out of Berbera on the Gulf of Aden in Somalia, in support of surface units operating in the Indian Ocean, apparently rehearsing anti-convoy operations along major oil routes. Other surveillance planes flew into the same area over Iran from Soviet bases.

Still others covered the Atlantic from Cuba, Conakry in Guinea on the West African coast, and home bases.

The Backfire bombers were flown from their Black Sea base to the Kola peninsula and then out over the North Atlantic in the simulated strikes against task forces.

The Backfire, of which the Russians now have about 36 in operation in naval and air forces, can fly at twice the speed of sound, like the American B-1, which is in the research and development stage and faces an uncertain future in Congress. Backfires have shorter range than B-1's and may not be intended for intercontinental missions, though presumably they could be refueled in flight.

Besides the new concentration on convoy and anti-convoy operations, the Soviet fleets engaged in antisubmarine and anti-carrier exercises in the Western Pacific as well as the Atlantic.

The exercise began about April 14, as far as aerial photography shows, after a two-week buildup of forces.

With its display of effective worldwide operating ability, it was a remarkable advance over the early 1960's when, analysts said, exercises were mainly devoted to practicing defense of home waters and one American intelligence expert usually could write an analysis almost before the operation began.

Analysis of the 1975 war games will take weeks, the experts say.

DEFENSE SPACE BUSINESS DAILY 23 APRIL 1975 (2 MAY)

BENDIX CHAIRMAN CALLS FOR REDUCED ARMS SHIPMENTS TO MIDEAST

Proposes Cutback in Defense Budget

The chairman of Bendix Corporation called yesterday for a reduction in arms shipments from all sources to the nations of the Middle East and advocated a U. S. -first defense policy that would result in a reduced defense budget.

W. M. Blumenthal, chief executive officer of Bendix, told the International Committee of the AIA that the interest of the people of the Middle East would best be served by a reduction "and eventually perhaps a halt" to the influx of arms.

While shipments to the Middle East accounted for a sizeable part of the U. S. aerospace industry's $6.8 billion in exports last year, "all of us I am sure would be happy to pass up these sales, and the balance of payments advantages they procure for our economy, if this would bring about a reduction of tensions and improve the chances for peace."

Calls For New National Security Policy

Implying that U. S. national defense policy is based on the world "as it was in the 1950's," Blumenthal called for a new national security policy which:

1) Is designed to deter aggression against our country. Since only the Soviet Union is capable of such aggression "we should be able to reduce the cost and the danger of these forces by reaching agreement with the Soviet Union on effective arms control."

2) Provides that the U. S. is ready, along with other nations, to build and maintain a world system of peace, but recognizing that "we do not aspire to a special or privileged role . . ."

3) Determines which countries of the world are essential to our national interest and provides for cooperating with them "economically and if necessary militarily to help them assure their continued security and development."

The Bendix chairman expressed the belief that U. S. national security "depends just as much on the economy, social cohesion and moral and political leadership as it does on the military establishment."

[Bendix ranked 35th among DOD contractors in FY '74 with DOD contracts totaling $155 million; 31st in FY '73 with contracts valued at $150 million. Its overall sales totaled $2.48 billion in 1974 and $2.23 billion in 1973.]

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

BALTIMORE NEWS AMERICAN 1 MAY 1975(2)

Arms Talks Hinge On U.S.-Soviet Tie

By KINGSBURY SMITH
Hearst Headline Service

ROME — A new international effort will soon be made to cope with one of the most vitally important problems confronting mankind — how to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons.

Representatives of some 25 nations are scheduled to meet in Geneva on May 5 to prepare the agenda for a larger conference later this year to review the operations of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT).

Italy recently became the 85th nation to ratify the treaty, which will entitle it to paricipate in the review conference.

In drafting the agenda, the preparatory committee will spotlight issues that are expected to dominate the main conference. These are:

• Dissatisfaction of the smaller powers with the failure of the United States and the Soviet Union to make greater progress in curbing their own nuclear arms race.

• General concern that some of the smaller powers will use their nuclear reactors to develop plutonium for the production of atomic bombs.

• Demands by the smaller nations for easier access to atomic explosives for peaceful purposes.

Under the terms of the treaty that was concluded between the United States, the Soviet Union and Great Britain in 1968, it was provided that a review conference would be held five years after its effective date, which was in 1970 following its ratification by 43 governments.

The treaty prohibited its adherents from helping non-nuclear nations acquire atomic weapons. It also pledged the latter to refrain from developing or acquiring such weapons.

Many of the non-nuclear nations that signed the treaty served notice at the time they would reserve the right to withdraw if the two superpowers failed to curb drastically their own nuclear arms race. In fact, the two nuclear superpowers pledged in the treaty to "achieve at the earliest possible date the cessation of the nuclear arms race."

That was five years ago. While the two super-powers have agreed to some limitation on their nuclear weapons, the race to strengthen their nuclear arsenal with more powerfully destructive strategic missiles goes on.

American officials hope that by the time the main NPT conference meets this year, the United States and the Soviet Union will have reached an agreement in the Geneva SALT negotiations for a further limitation on their nuclear armaments. If not, they are going to be subjected to severe criticism from the smaller nations, although it is unlikely any will withdraw from the treaty this year.

Some of them, however, may resist plans which the American and Soviet governments have been considering to make more effective the international control of reactors acquired by the non-nuclear weapons countries for purportedly peaceful purposes.

Skyrocketing oil prices have made the poorer countries particularly eager to obtain reactors for the development of nuclear energy. Those who adhered to the NPT committed themselves to accept International Atomic Energy Administration (IAEA) safeguards for any reactors they acquired. The nuclear power members of the treaty pledged they would not make reactors available to any nation that did not accept the IAEA safeguards.

However, the United States and Canada both made reactors available to India, which has never adhered to the NPT and accepted IAEA safeguards on only two of its six nuclear reactors. It used the Canadian reactor for its explosion of a nuclear device last year. Thereafter Canada angrily suspended its long-given assistance to India's atomic energy program.

IAEA officials estimate that at least 26 non-nuclear weapons nations that have nuclear reactors could develop atomic weapons within the next ten days. Their nuclear power plants are capable of producing enough plutonium to build tens of thousands of atomic bombs.

AIR FORCE TIMES 16 APRIL 1975(2 MAY)

VIEWPOINT

Ira C. Eaker

IT IS NOW one year since the right-wing dictatorship which had ruled Portugal for 15 years, was overthrown by a military coup. There have been four cabinet reshuffles of the new "revolutionary" ruling junta, each more communist dominated than its predecessor. The last cabinet of 21 members, installed on March 25, is clearly Moscow oriented.

Portugal's swing to the left presents many grave problems to the West. NATO, with its southern flank already in jeopardy, because of the Greek-Turkish dispute over Cyprus, now may lose one of its founder members, a keystone in Western Europe's defensive arch. The U.S. also loses its most constant ally in Europe. Remember, Portugal was the only NATO member which provided air bases to facilitate the resupply of Israel in the last Arab-Israeli conflict.

If Portugal elects and is permitted to remain in NATO the Kremlin will have a seat in the most secret councils of the West. On the other hand, if Portugal withdraws or is thrown out of NATO, the Kremlin has achieved its primary goal since 1950, the rupture of the NATO alliance. The Soviets also gain naval bases in the Atlantic, not only in Portugal, but in her Atlantic Islands, Madeira and the Azores. Conversely, the U.S. bases in the Azores, vital to the airlift which saved Israel in October 1973, will not be available in the future.

Moscow, never slow to demand repayment for support, is reported to be asking Portugal already for Atlantic naval bases.

PORTUGAL'S SWING to the left vitally concerns Spain, which although constantly and unwisely spurned as a NATO member, has been a steadfast Western ally, granting the U.S. naval and air base rights. The deposed faction in Portugal has fled to Spain. This raises the possibility of conflict between Spain and Portugal, further jeopardizing peace in Europe.

In the meantime, what has the left-leaning revolutionary junta done to Portugal? It has begun the normal red pattern of "nationalization", seizing the banks, communications, and dominating agriculture. As a result, tourism, Portugal's most lucrative business, has dried up; all foreign owned industries are in rapid decline; unemployment is rising; the crime rate is the highest ever; and inflation is raging at unprecedented rates.

How did all this come about, this loss of Portugal, this successful westward march of communism?

There are, upon sober analysis and objective assessment, many contributing factors. The economic disarray in the whole free world, occasioned by the Arab oil embargo, was a major factor. Moscow planned it that way.

THE POLITICAL DISARRAY in the U.S. was also a factor. Our preoccupation with Southeast Asia, our abandonment of Cambodia and South Vietnam, were definite signals that the U.S. no longer had the will to oppose the adventures and aggressions of Moscow.

Our watchdog on Red plans and conspiracies abroad, the CIA, was under heavy attack at home and rendered powerless to exercise its normal functions abroad.

The divisiveness and bitter animosities in the U.S. created by the Vietnam War, and the economic depression following the Arab oil embargo, deprived the U.S. of the will and power to oppose red aggression.

The result: the European-NATO dominoes are beginning to fall as the Asiatic dominoes are tumbling. The Kremlin is following, shrewdly and tenaciously, a successful strategy, double envelopment of the West.

The author, an air power pioneer, is a retired three-star AF general.

Copyright 1975 The Los Angeles Times

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

WALL STREET JOURNAL 2 MAY 1975

Washington Wire

A Special Weekly Report From The Wall Street Journal's Capital Bureau

HANOI'S PLANS for Southeast Asia worry Peking as well as Washington.

Analysts expect the two Vietnams will soon unite. The country will boast a large, modern, mobile army bristling with captured U.S. weapons—at least a psychological threat to its neighbors. It may try exporting revolution. Fresh evidence indicates vigorous Hanoi plans to train and arm Thai insurgents; the U.S. is about to announce a big troop pullout from Thailand.

China fears the growth of a political rival in Southeast Asia and worries that the Vietnamese will get too cozy with the Russians. Hanoi actually distrusts both big Communist powers, though it owes much to each. Moscow and Peking will have trouble cashing in their claims on Vietnam.

Even the new Cambodian Communist regime fears Hanoi. Its order for closing of all foreign bases can only refer to North Vietnam.

BAD NEWS on the U.S. economy will mingle with good for months to come.

Ford's economists warn disappointing indicators will persist into summer but insist the data will refer to "past events." The unemployment rate is expected to climb for several more months—to somewhere over 9%. Inflation is due to accelerate a bit, with higher farm and food prices. Industrial output may be down again this quarter. The seers expect orders for factory goods to fall further.

On the plus side, economists predict inventories will continue to shrink. They figure personal income will show heftier increases, consumer confidence will improve, retail sales may pick up. Housing starts may begin to turn upward as the supply of unsold homes dwindles. Total construction spending could head higher.

If Congress finds the recovery still lagging this summer, it may vote more public works and more public-service jobs than those already planned.

FAVORITE SONS may complicate the rush for the Democrats' 1976 nomination.

Govs. Carey of New York and Shapp of Pennsylvania seem sure to try to lock up their big delegations if they can persuade the active candidates to stay out. Freshman Sen. Glenn yearns to run in Ohio. Backers of Florida Gov. Askew urge him on. Sen. Bumpers may try in Arkansas. Gov. Lucey in Wisconsin. As convention brokers, state leaders could try to deal themselves onto the national ticket.

Changes in primary dates confuse the Democratic picture. New York, till now one of the last to choose delegates, will hold its primary in April, coinciding with Wisconsin. Ohio switches to June, joining California and New Jersey. Florida Democrats ponder setting the state primary in April or May instead of early March. They hope a moderate alternative to Wallace might be gaining ground then.

A regional primary of sorts takes shape in New England. Massachusetts liberals expect to match whatever date early-bird New Hampshire sets, and Rhode Island might go along.

BAYH GETS SET to enter the Democratic presidential field. Party politicians expect the Indiana Senator to pass the word this month, though a formal announcement may come later. Bayh hopes to score with liberals looking desperately for someone to take on Wallace. Some politicians see Bayh's entry knocking Rep. Udall of Arizona out of the race.

DISCORD FLARES between Kissinger and Schlesinger. The Pentagon boss feels the Secretary of State ducked as Vietnam began to unravel, leaving him to shoulder responsibility and make public statements. Differences about evacuation were sharp. Schlesinger wanted everyone out fast; Kissinger won a slower pullout in an effort to prolong Saigon's stability.

AID TO ISRAEL stands a better chance in Congress following Vietnam's fall. "We can't abandon another country to whom we've given solemn assurances," says a House Democrat who was a dove on Vietnam. One forecast: Ford will ask Congress for $1.6 billion, roughly $1 billion less than Israel wants, and Congress will raise the amount to $2 billion.

NUCLEAR RISK? Congress' General Accounting Office finds truck shipments of nuclear weapons by the Army and Navy have been "more vulnerable to potential terrorist activity and more susceptible to damage" than shipments by civilian agencies. The military services pledge new safeguards.

TENSIONS GROW between many House freshmen and their elders.

Ways and Means Chairman Ullman fears new Democrats will rewrite his energy-tax bill when it reaches the floor. Senior Commerce Committee members worry that strong-minded freshmen, such as Moffett of Connecticut, will push the panel toward railroad nationalization. Even liberal Aspin of Wisconsin found it hard to work with emotional freshmen on Vietnam evacuation issues.

John Burton of California irked older House colleagues by offering irrelevant amendments to the Vietnam evacuation bill at 1 a.m. Other newcomers talked past their allotted time. Some critics feel the leaders should clamp down. But the freshmen aren't all on the wild side. Chairman Dingell of the House Energy subcommittee counts on help from new moderates.

Senate Armed Services Chairman Stennis fumed when "new boy" Leahy of Vermont beat him to the TV mikes after a committee session.

MINOR MEMOS: A little late, the South Vietnamese embassy this week distributed a pamphlet titled, "Vietnam: Where do we stand?". . . . A dinner for the press given by the Federal National Mortgage Association began with a cocktail gathering called an "attitude adjustment hour."

May 1, 1975 (2) Aerospace Daily

INDIANS DESCRIBE SOVIET RESTRICTIONS IN SATELLITE LAUNCH

The Soviet Union barred Indian technical personnel from the blockhouse at Kapustin Yar from which the April 19 launch of India's first satellite was controlled, and it prohibited Indian photography of the event, Prof. U. Rao, director of the satellite project, reported in New Delhi. The Soviets are expected to provide photos and possibly a film of the launch soon, he added.

Rao said that all conversations between Indian and Soviet tracking stations used a "Sanskritized" code in which the launch vehicle was designated "Dhrona" and the spacecraft "Nethra." India's name for the satellite is Aryabhata.

The spacecraft has passed its "crucial phase" and is now certain to exceed its six-month estimated lifetime, he said. Control has been shifted fully to the Indian ground station at Srihari-kota, and India's second satellite, expected within two years, may be commanded from there from the start of its mission. Citing Indian work on solar cells and tape recorders, Rao said that from the next satellite onward, more and more components will be built in India.

* * *

THE PENTAGON has formally notified Congress that it is offering the consortium of four NATO countries 348 General Dynamics F-16 aircraft at a price, including support equipment and services, estimated at $2.119 billion. Chairman John J. Sparkman (D-Ala.) of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Tuesday placed in the Congressional Record a notification sent to him by Lt. Gen. H.M. Fish (USAF), director of the Defense Security Assistance Agency, as required by the Foreign Military Sales Act.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

RADIO - TV DEFENSE DIALOG

RADIO TV REPORTS INC. WASH.,D.C., SUMMARIES NOT TO BE QUOTED.

MONDAY, MAY 5, 1975 (BROADCASTS OF MAY 3, 4, 1975) PART I

SUMMARY OF NETWORK NEWS IN THIS ISSUE

The truck convoy carrying foreigners from Phnom Penh to Thailand finally crossed the Thai-Cambodian border Saturday, four days after beginning the two hundred mile journey. Among the five hundred and twenty men, women and children were a number of correspondents, including Sydney SCHANBERG of the New York Times, but, by mutual agreement, all have agreed to withhold public comment until the evacuation of all foreign nationals from Phnom Penh has been completed. A report on the arrival in Thailand of the convoy is filed by Jack PERKINS, the NBC Saturday Night News.

The first of the many thousands of Americans and South Vietnamese evacuated from Saigon last Tuesday began arriving at Subic Naval Base, the Philippines. David COHLER, NBC, reports that because of restrictions imposed on the refugees by the Philippines government, they are almost immediately being placed aboard flights to Guam, fifteen hundred miles to the west. And on the CBS Evening News for Saturday, Bruce DUNNING reports on the processing of the refugees on Guam. DUNNING notes that among those being processed first are former high-ranking officials of the THIEU regime, including the chief of the Special Police Branch that investigated Viet Cong political activity, the chief of the National Secret Police Branch responsible for surveillance of opposition politicians in South Vietnam and the chief of the Saigon Police.

The evacuation of more than a hundred thousand South Vietnamese refugees has provoked some criticism from U. S. political leaders. Edwin NEWMAN, NBC, and Dan RATHER, CBS, report that Senator George McGOVERN has termed the evacuation America's "final blunder in Vietnam," adding that the mass of refugees would be better off in their native country. Plans for the re-settlement of the Vietnamese refugees, on the other hand, is the subject of a report by Lesley STAHL, CBS. Included in the CBS report are film clips of remarks by Frank WISNER of the State Department; Wells KLEIN, representing the private agencies collaborating in the endeavor; and Julia TAFT of HEW.

President FORD journeyed to Norfolk, Virginia Saturday for the commissioning of a new carrier for the Navy, the U.S.S. Nimitz. The Nimitz, which cost six hundred and ninety-two million dollars to build, is the world's largest warship and the second nuclear carrier in the U. S. fleet. John COCHRAN, NBC, and Robert PIERPOINT, CBS, report that the President used the occasion of the ship's commissioning to reaffirm this nation's commitments to its allies.

U. S. naval power was also the subject of remarks by Admiral Elmo ZUMWALT. Speaking in New York, the former Chief of Naval Operations noted that U. S. naval strength has been diminishing in recent years because of insufficient funding by the Congress, and that, as a consequence, the Russians are pursuing a policy of "differential detente" -- behaving where they must and misbehaving where they can. An excerpt from Admiral ZUMWALT's address appears on the NBC Saturday Night News.

And finally, Kenley JONES, NBC, files an updated report on the case of former Green Beret officer Jeffrey McDONALD, who has been indicted for the murder of his wife and two daughters at Fort Bragg, North Carolina five years ago, and Morton DEAN, CBS, interviews Vietnam veteran Wayne FORBES, who reflects on the American involvement in the Vietnam war.

PREPARED BY THE AIR FORCE (SAFAA) AS EXECUTIVE AGENT FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE TO BRING TO THE ATTENTION OF KEY DOD PERSONNEL MATTERS WITHIN THEIR OFFICIAL RESPONSIBILITIES.

FOR INFORMATION REGARDING THIS PUBLICATION CALL MR. HARRY ZUBKOFF, OX 52884

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

NBC SATURDAY NIGHT NEWS NBC TV 6:30 PM MAY 3

Convoy Reaches Thai Border

EDWIN NEWMAN: The truck convoy of foreigners that left Phnom Penh, Cambodia four days ago made it across the border into Thailand this morning. These were men, women and children who had taken refuge in the French Embassy in Phnom Penh when Cambodia fell.

The French had wanted to fly them out and had said that the health of some was too frail to permit them to go any other way. But the Khmer Rouge, which now controls Cambodia, said no, trucks only.

NBC News correspondent Jack PERKINS was at the border crossing when the convoy arrived.

JACK PERKINS: The border between Cambodia and Thailand. The refugees came in buses and in trucks, five hundred and twenty of them; some sick; people of many nations displaced and caught when the Khmer Rouge took over Cambodia two and a half weeks ago. For these five hundred and twenty men, women and children it had been a most incomparable, bizarre, frightening, exhausting two and a half weeks. And the way they finally got out was as bizarre as all.

The journey to the border here from Phnom Penh is only some two hundred miles, but it had taken them four grueling days and nights. Why that was, what had happened on the journey, what had happened before that in the French Embassy in Phnom Penh they had agreed, all of them coming out here, not to reveal; not yet, because a couple of hundred more refugees from Phnom Penh are not out yet; presumably are coming, but who can say when. And until they get out, these people, including businessmen, Embassy people and about twenty reporters, have agreed to say nothing more publicly than this, a brief statement by reporter Sydney SCHANBERG of the New York Times.

SYDNEY SCHANBERG: Journalists who stayed in Phnom Penh and who were in the French Embassy compound agree to impose on themselves a news embargo. That is, we have decided not to write anything about the situation in Phnom Penh or about the trip from Phnom Penh to Thailand until the last person in the compound in Phnom Penh has left and returned and reached Thailand.

And the purpose of this is to insure the safety of the people in the compound.

PERKINS: Again, of these five hundred or so refugees, most were in good health. But there was some fever, dysentery, especially among the old and the children. But again, most were well and, for their deliverance from Cambodia, were enthusiastically expressive.

MAN: Thailand never tasted so good.

PERKINS: They would not talk about the conditions in Phnom Penh or the ride to the border that took three and a half days. They would not talk about any of that as long as any of their colleagues remained inside Cambodia.

But for them, from the appearances, it had been a very difficult ordeal and the joy of being out was overwhelming.

Jack PERKINS, NBC News, along the border between Thailand and Cambodia.

Philippines Restricts Refugees' Stay

NEWMAN: The government of the Philippines is being somewhat less than hospitable to refugees from South Vietnam, evidently to avoid offending the new government in Saigon. Most ships carrying Americans and South Vietnamese are being allowed to put into the American base at Subic Bay only for supplies and fuel. Where South Vietnamese are allowed to disembark, they are at once put aboard flights to Guam, fifteen hundred miles to the west.

Six ships from Vietnam arrived at Subic Bay today, among them the Carrier Hancock. David COHLER reports.

DAVID COHLER: After four days and nights at sea, the first of the many thousands of Americans and South Vietnamese evacuated out of Saigon last Tuesday arrived here at Subic Bay Naval Base. There were a total of two thousand evacuees aboard the attack carrier Hancock, and, although their quarters were comfortable, though cramped, they were happy to set foot on dry land.

Most on this ship were Vietnamese nationals. To avoid difficulties with Filipino immigration authorities, they were taken just offshore to Grandie (?) Island for processing, the term used here for checking their papers and documents.

The two hundred Americans from the Hancock were taken to a separate area at Subic. Many of them were under contract to the Defense Attache Office and declined to be filmed.

Authorities here either could or would not say what arrangements have been made for U. S. Ambassador Graham MARTIN and former South Vietnamese Premier Nguyen Cao KY. Both were reported aboard the Command Ship Blue Ridge still at sea.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

David COHLER, NBC News, at Subic Bay in the Philippines.

NEWMAN: In this country, more than ninety-six hundred South Vietnamese have now been released to settle where they will. The State Department gave out that figure today.

There are twenty-seven thousand Vietnamese on Guam, including forty-five technicians from what had been South Vietnam's Air Force. The technicians say they were taken out against their will and they want to go back to their families, and they've asked President FORD to help.

McGovern, Byrd Comment on Refugees

NEWMAN: Senator George McGOVERN said today that most of the South Vietnamese who came out were not in danger and that they left out of panic. McGOVERN said that ninety percent of those who left would be better off going back and that the United States should help them to do so.

Senator BYRD of West Virginia, the Assistant Democratic Leader, said that other countries should take the refugee load off the backs of American taxpayers. BYRD mentioned Brazil, Venezuela, Iran, Indonesia, the Philippines, Japan and France.

Ford Commissions the Nimitz

NEWMAN: President FORD went to Norfolk, Virginia today for the commissioning of a new carrier for the Navy, the Nimitz.

John COCHRAN reports.

JOHN COCHRAN: Named for the fleet admiral of World War II fame, the Aircraft Carrier Nimitz is the biggest warship afloat. Her official cost, six hundred ninety-two million dollars. Privately, Navy officials say that's a conservative estimate.

There was nothing conservative about her commissioning. The Navy provided full honors for the ship and the President.

Former naval officer Gerald FORD told the crowd that aircraft carriers made possible the final evacuation of Americans and Vietnamese from Saigon. The President said the new carrier, the Nimitz, can show the world the United States still has vast power.

PRESIDENT GERALD FORD: To all this great ship is visible evidence of our commitment to friends and allies and our capability to maintain those commitments.

We are strong. We will continue to be strong. We will keep our commitments, and we will remain a great country.

Zumwalt Sees Loss of Naval Superiority

NEWMAN: Admiral Elmo ZUMWALT, the former Chief of Naval Operations, said today in New York that American naval strength has been dwindling for years because Congress won't put up the money that is needed. The result, ZUMWALT said, was that the Russians follow a policy of differential detente. They behave where they must and misbehave where they can.

ADMIRAL ELMO ZUMWALT: The Soviet Union, with one-half of our gross national product, is spending over twelve percent for military capability while we, with twice their gross national product, are spending only a little over five percent. And therefore, as Secretary SCHLESINGER has recently revealed, they have outspent us in total numbers of dollars ever since 1971.

And how can any American expect that we can keep them within reach as they outspend us? They are considered good and reliable allies, even if they have to invade you from time to time to demonstrate it. We are considered very poor allies, and we're seeing accommodations tilting away from us and tilting toward Moscow all around the world today as a result.

Update on the McDonald Case

NEWMAN: Five years ago, the wife and children of Army Captain Jeffrey McDONALD (?) were murdered at Fort Bragg, North Carolina. The case got a lot of publicity because McDONALD was a Green Beret officer, opposition to the Vietnam war was growing, and McDONALD said a group of hippies killed his family after clubbing him unconscious.

In January of this year, McDONALD himself was indicted for the murder, and pre-trial hearings begin on Monday.

Kenley JONES reports.

KENLEY JONES: This is where the murders took place, a small officers' quarters apartment at Fort Bragg, North Carolina. The apartment has been sealed during the five years the case has been under investigation. It was occupied by Captain Jeffrey McDONALD, a Green Beret medical officer, and his family.

His wife, Colette, his five year old daughter Kimberly and his two year old daughter Kristine (?) were the murder victims. McDONALD claimed the apartment was broken into by a group of hippies, three men who looked something like this, and a young girl who kept chanting "kill the pigs; acid is groovy." He said he was beaten and stabbed repeatedly in the livingroom of the apartment. When he regained consciousness, he said he found his wife dead or dying in the master bedroom and the two children dead in their beds; all three had been brutally beaten.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

After the funerals, the Army conducted a preliminary hearing to determine whether there was enough evidence to court-martial McDONALD for the murders. After the hearing here was concluded and no charges were brought against McDONALD, he applied for and was given a discharge from the Army which allowed him to pursue his private medical practice.

McDONALD today is on the emergency room staff of a hospital in Long Beach, California. Federal prosecutors say new scientific analysis of evidence, not available five years ago, is the basis for McDonald's indictment. McDONALD will not talk about the case, except to say there is nothing new to be said.

The parents of McDONALD's murdered wife, Colette, disagree. The case was re-opened after Mr. and Mrs. Alfred KASABE (?) swore out a criminal complaint charging McDONALD with the murders. KASABE says he made the decision after studying transcripts of the preliminary hearing.

ALFRED KASABE: I read this transcript through, oh, innumerable times; maybe twenty, thirty times. And the more I read it through, the more I realized that the story as he told it had to be a fabrication. It could not have happened the way he said it happened.

JONES: McDONALD's attorneys will ask the judge Monday to move the trial from North Carolina to California where there is an ample supply of character witnesses who can be expected to testify that the man accused of takinglives is now in the business of saving them.

Kenley JONES, NBC News, Fort Bragg, North Carolina.

CBS EVENING NEWS CBS TV 6:30 PM
MAY 3

Refugees Enroute to Guam, Philippines

DAN RATHER: Amid the Pacific islands that became household names in World War II, American Navy ships and other vessels are sailing tonight for the Philippines and for Guam carrying victims of a newer war -- seventy thousand refugees who fled South Vietnam in the final hours of that conflict that ended last Tuesday. Thousands more will arrive in the United States this weekend.

At Subic Bay, the Philippines, the U.S.S. Hancock and other ships arrived with ten thousand people. An armada of American and Vietnamese ships carried others to Guam.

The Philippine government, determined to avoid any trouble with the new communist regime in Vietnam, says the refugees can stay at Subic Bay only three days at most. American planes began shuttling them immediately to Guam. And the Philippine government promised to arrest Marshal Nguyen Cao KY if the former South Vietnamese leader arrives at Subic Bay aboard the U.S.S. Blue Ridge. U. S. officials said KY will be off the ship before it docks.

On Guam, Bruce DUNNING found some other high-ranking Vietnamese officers.

BRUCE DUNNING: The men going through the gate into the immigration processing area were once some of the most powerful and most feared men in Saigon; three of them brigadier generals who headed police operations in Vietnam. They were escorted past the lines of other Vietnamese evacuees who wait long hours to be cleared to go to the U. S.

The men were grim-faced and refused to talk to newsmen as they went through the processing. This man is being processed under the name of Tung Bai (?). But other Vietnamese identified him as General Nguyen Tai Dai (?), chief of the special police branch that investigated Viet Cong political activity.

With him was a man who claimed to be an infantry colonel. He was identified as General Tran Van Chau (?), chief of the National Secret Police Branch that handled surveillance of opposition politicians in Vietnam.

Another man ran into some snags as he processed, accused -- wrongly, as it turned out -- of juggling figures on his application form. He was Saigon's police chief, General Trang Si Thanh (?).

As the generals completed their processing for a trip to the United States, a group of noncommissioned officers was pleading for a trip in the other direction. The group consists of forty-five aircraft mechanics, a small number out of the nearly two thousand Air Force men who escaped from Vietnam with their planes to Thailand. These men, however, said they didn't realize the planes were going out of Vietnam when they boarded in Saigon. They were then in the midsts of a shelling attack, they said, and they thought the planes were just being taken to a safer airfield.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Master Sergeant Tien Thanh Thong left behind his wife and two children in Saigon.

M/SGT TIEN THANH THONG: If we go back to South Vietnam, the communists will kill -- will kill on us [sic]. But we are ready to be killed.

DUNNING: The forty-five men have written a letter to President FORD asking him to arrange their return to Saigon.

"Most of us still have our families in Vietnam and we would not for any price be able to live by ourselves in a foreign country. We therefore do hope that with your humanitarian plan in mind you would find a way to send us back to South Vietnam as soon as possible, no matter what the communist government is reserving for us."

It's signed "Yours faithfully, forty-five unwilling evacuees."

Bruce DUNNING, CBS News, Orote Point, Guam.

McGovern: Evacuation "Final Blunder"

RATHER: Senator George McGOVERN said today that the mass evacuation of the Vietnamese refugees may be America's "final blunder in Vietnam." He said most of them would be better off in their native country now that the initial panic has subsided. His words.

McGOVERN said he will introduce a bill making U. S. ships and planes available to any refugees who voluntarily decide to go home.

Report on Refugee Resettlement Plans

RATHER: The government's estimate today of the number of Vietnamese refugees coming into this country is up to one hundred twenty-seven thousand, three times the administration's original prediction.

Lesley STAHL reports from Washington on the current plans for their resettlement.

LESLEY STAHL: Decisions about the refugees are made here in the Operations Room of the Inter-Agency Task Force. It's headed by State Department Vietnam hands who've worked non-stop on the evacuation, but have paid little attention to the question of domestic resettlement. They have now turned that problem over to a number of private relief organizations.

FRANK WISNER: We have been in contact, as I said, with the voluntary agencies who have the longest record, longest experience in the resettlement of evacuees in this country. These are people who go back and have resettled tens and tens of thousands of foreigners from all sorts of lands -- Hungarians, Cubans, Ugandan Asians. And their record's been very good. And I'm very pleased with what they have to say.

STAHL: But the agencies complain that they've not been getting the kind of full support from the administration that they need.

WELLS KLEIN: I think the administration, the State Department and its Task Force pulled one major error, which is that they were totally preoccupied with the evacuation and the logistics of Guam, and that [sort of thing]. And what they did not do was to say to half a dozen people "don't worry about the evacuation; go over in this corner and start thinking about what should be done when the refugees get to this country. Get in touch with the voluntary agencies; start making plans. We need lead time." This was not done and we're paying for it now.

STAHL: The Department of Health, Education and Welfare plans to assist the agencies and also to take care of unemployed refugees by reimbursing state and local governments for their expenses.

JULIA TAFT: This will be money for welfare and Medicaid, and social services, language training, certain kind of skills training, although many of the people who are coming over do have skills already. But just the basic social services and income maintenance and health that might be required for these people to become self-sufficient.

STAHL: Congress defeated the Refugee Aid Bill last week because it mentioned military support for the evacuation. The administration told Congress at that time that the refugee program would cost roughly three hundred million dollars over the next six months. When the administration comes back to Congress next week, it will be asking for twice that amount.

Lesley STAHL, CBS News, on Capitol Hill.

Nimitz Commissioned

RATHER: This country's latest super carrier, the USS Nimitz, cost six hundred ninety-two million dollars.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

That was two hundred and fifty million more than planned.

President FORD today officially put the monster ship into service. Robert PIERPOINT was there.

ROBERT PIERPOINT: The U.S.S. Nimitz is the world's largest warship. Shown here in sea trials, the Nimitz is over three football fields long, displaces ninety-five thousand tons, takes more than six thousand men to operate. The Nimitz is powered by two nuclear reactors making her the second nuclear carrier in the Navy. The Enterprise was the first in the fleet; two others, the Eisenhower and the Vinson are under construction.

The Nimitz took seven years to build, cost close to seven hundred million dollars, without the one hundred aircraft she carries.

Today in Norfolk, Virginia, President FORD participated in the commissioning ceremonies that officially makes the Nimitz a fighting ship.

PRESIDENT GERALD FORD: The Nimitz joins the fleet at an auspicious moment when our determination to strengthen our ties with allies across both great oceans and to work for peace and stability around the world requires clear demonstration.

PIERPOINT: President FORD's visit to this ship emphasizes two points: a continued commitment to a strong U. S. Navy, even when its ships, like this carrier, cost well over a half a billion dollars each, and a continued commitment to America's military alliances around the world, despite what has happened recently in Indochina.

Robert PIERPOINT, CBS News, Norfolk, Virginia.

Report from Danang, South Vietnam

RATHER: North Vietnam said today it is reopening its border to the South Vietnamese and said it is launching a massive reconstruction program that will give jobs to people in the South. Other reports say factories in the South are reopening.

Peter KALISCHER has been travelling through the North and South to see the aftermath of the war for himself. Here is his exclusive report on Danang, South Vietnam.

PETER KALISCHER: The Danang marketplace the afternoon the first American newsmen and one woman go on a guided tour of areas now under the control of the Provisional Revolutionary Government, what was once known as the Viet Cong. There must be ten thousand people here, more motor bikes and scooters than we saw in all of Hanoi. The Esso gas pump is smashed, but it's business as usual in jerry cans.

Dr. Thomas HOSKINS of Morristown, New Jersey, of the American Friends Service Committee, who came to work in the German hospital two days before the takeover and stayed on.

When the revolutionary army came in and took over everything, including this hospital, what did they ask of you? What was their attitude toward you?

DR. THOMAS HOSKINS: On the first day, the Friday night, I was quite involved in work here. And that turned out to be the day of the takeover.

The way I learned about it was I noticed that the shooting in the streets stopped at about noon, that patients began to return, staff members began to return. I didn't realize that the city had been liberated, frankly, until I got out in the streets that evening. I saw jeeps with citizens in them flying the liberation flag. I saw tanks coming down the streets, this time driven by students decked out in Buddhist flags; a very different scene than before.

And my first meeting with the cadres of the Liberation Front here at the hospital was when they came on Monday, I believe, and introduced themselves and asked me what I thought of the situation. And I told them.

KALISCHER: Was there anything you could possibly describe as a bloodbath after the revolutionary army took over?

DR. HOSKINS: Nothing whatsoever. Nothing whatsoever.

KALISCHER: Right now Danang has the best of two worlds -- peace and sacks of American supplies abandoned by the Saigon marines and either looted on the spot or distributed by the revolutionary army -- no profiteering allowed.

The dominant note is one of relaxation. The final battle has been fought. For better or worse, the war is over, and how could it be for worse?

Peter KALISCHER, CBS News, Danang.

Anniversary of Kent State

RATHER: Memorial observances are being held this weekend on the campus of Kent State University where five years ago tomorrow National Guard gunfire killed four students protesting the Indochina war.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

Veteran Reflects on Vietnam

RATHER: This historic week has been a time of reflection too for the millions who served in that war. Morton DEAN reports on one veteran whose story begins in Quangtri, South Vietnam four years ago.

MORTON DEAN: He wrote and sang a different kind of protest song. In February, 1971, Wayne FORBES was angry that the U. S. was not going all-out to win in Vietnam.

WAYNE FORBES (Singing): I've heard veterans/soldiers say/we could end this war tomorrow/we could end it today.

DEAN: It had been a bad day for FORBES; his unit hit hard; one of his closest friends killed. FORBES was a helicopter pilot, daring, heroic; Distinguished Flying Cross, Silver Star, Bronze Star, four Purple Hearts; a hawk.

FORBES: I believed that what my small unit was doing there in the northern part of Vietnam on the DMZ was correct. We were keeping the communists from coming south into a -- into a -- a democratic republic. And we were right. We were keeping the bad guys from coming south.

DEAN: And now?

FORBES: And now? I think you have to be realistic about it and say there wasn't really anything we could do about it.

DEAN: The night after Saigon surrendered, we caught up with FORBES in Abbeville, Louisiana. His views about why we fought and who was right had changed.

Wayne FORBES, hawk that I remember from 1971, dramatic change in you....

FORBES: Very.

DEAN: ...in your words.

FORBES: Very. I -- when we talked I was so committed to that situation; so committed to the battle; so egotistical that I thought that I could probably whip anybody that stepped up in front of me that I was fiercely (?) hawk. But I've changed my opinion a little bit, and I think maybe the North Vietnamese won because they were right.

DEAN: That's a big change for you.

FORBES: Quite a big change. Quite a big change.

DEAN: FORBES, who had volunteered for additional duty in Vietnam, is still seeking adventure; still flies for a living; ferries helicopters to Peru where he carries oil rigs into the jungle. He says he thinks about the war frequently; it just won't go away, about what the war cost. And on this week the war ended, he thought about it some more.

FORBES: What was it worth? All of these things -- it's wasted. All of my -- all of my friends over there who didn't make it back were wasted.

DEAN: There were a lot of them.

FORBES: Quite -- quite a few. Many, many.

DEAN: Morton DEAN, CBS News, Abbeville, Louisiana.

NBC SUNDAY NIGHT NEWS NBC TV 6:30 PM
MAY 4

Pre-empted by NHL Playoffs

DECLASSIFIED