LAOTIAN LEFTISTS freed some Americans; U.S. aid is being reduced.

Students in the south-central city of Savannakhet released Agency for International Development officials and their dependents after nine days of house arrest, and U.S. Air Force planes flew the 18 Americans to Thailand. The Communist-dominated Laotian government accepted a student demand that it ask the U.S. to phase out all AID operations in Laos. The U.S. agreed to close AID offices in the provinces, the Laotians said.

Three Americans, including two Marines, remained trapped in an aid compound in Vientiane taken over by leftists Wednesday.

Hundreds of Americans in Laos will be withdrawn within the next month under an accelerated reduction in the U.S. presence of about 1,000 persons. Secretary of State Kissinger, in Turkey, said the withdrawal can't be considered a complete evacuation "at this time."

Turkish officials warned Kissinger that U.S.-Turkish relations and the security of the eastern Mediterranean will be seriously imperiled unless U.S. military aid to Turkey is restored. In Brussels, meantime, Defense Secretary Schlesinger warned NATO allies about cutting defense spending while, he said, Russia is raising its military budget 8% to 5% a year in real terms.

Commissary Presence Hit In Big Cities

By Steve Gerstel
United Press International

The General Accounting Office said yesterday that military commissary stores, considered a major fringe benefit by active and retired servicemen, cannot be justified in major metropolitan areas.

GAO, Congress' auditing agency, said in a report the commissary stores—where groceries and other goods can be purchased at reduced prices—should not be allowed in metropolitan areas because enough commercial food stores are in reasonable proximity.

Locating commissaries in these areas, the GAO said, violates the congressional intent that these stores should be located only in remote stations.

Overall, during fiscal 1974 the armed services operated 279 commissaries in the United States with sales totaling $2.2 billion.

Food and goods are sold at cost plus a surcharge of 3 to 5 per cent. The GAO said at least $226 million in appropriated funds were used in fiscal 1974 to support the stores, mostly to pay employees.

The report said that "since commercial food stores in metropolitan areas are very competitive and operate on a low profit margin, their prices are reasonable."

As an example, the GAO noted the services maintain 27 commissaries in San Diego San Francisco, San Antonio, Norfolk, Honolulu and Washiotngn, D.C.

The GAO said it found at least eight large commercial food stores within a five-mile radius of 25 of the commissaries and at least four commercial stores with the same radius of the other two commissaries.

The report said the services consider commissaries warranted because they have

NATO Ministers Concentrate On Joint Arms Purchasing

By PAUL KEMEZIS
Special to The New York Times

BRUSSELS, May 22—The defense ministers of the Atlantic Alliance countries agreed here today that there was a need to increase the joint development and purchasing of arms.

But Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger was said to have been wary of making specific commitments to increase United States weapons buying in Europe, which has been small up to now.

Also at the meeting, which was the first among North Atlantic Treaty Organization Ministers since the fall of South Vietnam and Cambodia, Mr. Schlesinger said that the United States put a high priority on NATO, but that the Europeans would have to bear more of the burden of the alliance in the future.

The United States also pressed for acknowledgment by NATO of the strategic importance of Spain to the alliance, particularly in light of the situation in the Mediterranean area. The American effort was to get a passage making this point into the communiqué that is being drafted for publication tomorrow. Several European countries were resisting any mention of Spain in the communiqué.

For a number of years, the United States has been trying to have Spain admitted to the alliance, but some European nations refuse to consider that so long as Generalissimo Francisco Franco remains in power in Madrid.

European officials also said that during the meeting a suggestion was raised for a NATO radar base in South Africa to help guard the Cape of Good Hope tanker route against Soviet naval power. But the Netherlands in particular strongly opposed any link to South Africa. "They would gain a base but lose a ally," the Netherlands Defense Minister, Henk Verdeling, told newsmen afterwards.

The meeting of defense ministers, which continues tomorrow, is a routine semiannual event usually held just before talks by the foreign ministers

U.S. resists Europeans on arms

By GENE OISHI
Sun Staff Correspondent

Brussels—The attempt within the Western military alliance to increase efficiency through arms standardization remained snagged yesterday as the United States continued to resist European pressures for a firm commitment to buy more weapons in Europe.

After the first-day session of the spring meeting of the defense ministers of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, U.S. officials said only that "there was a widely shared general agreement that purchases both ways across the Atlantic would and should be substantially increased above present levels."

While the U.S. accepts in principle that weapons procurement should be a "two-way street," James R. Schlesinger, the American Secretary of Defense, was not prepared to make the sort of specific commitments that the Europeans sought.

Europeans expressed some disappointment in not getting a more positive American response, particularly in view of the tentative NATO desision to buy the Boeing E-3A, a converted 707 equipped with radar and other electronics gear to be used as an airborne early warning system.

The E-3A would supplement the NATO ground early warning system against advancing hostile aircraft. It would be able to detect aircraft attempt-

SIHANOUK CRITICAL OF U.S. IN INCIDENT

HONK KONG, May 22 (Reuters)—Prince Norodom Sihanouk said that his Royal Cambodian Government of National Union was not informed of any deplimatic steps by the United States Government to obtain the release of the American freighter Mayaguez last week, the North Korean press agency reported today.

The agency, monitored here, said that Prince Sihanouk made this statement at a banquet given for him and his wife by President Kim Il Sung in Pyongyang.

In his speech, the agency said, the Cambodian also alleged that United States forces attacked his country for three days starting on May 13, the day after the Mayaguez was seized by Cambodian gunboats in the Gulf of Siam.

"This was a combat between elephant—the United States—and ant — Cambodia — which shows the extreme dastardliness of the American superpower," the agency quoted the Prince as having said.

He charged the United States with "savagely bombing our city, port, oil refinery and railway of Sihanoukville and the airport and a small naval base in the Gulf of Siam three hours after we let the American ship Mayaguez and her crew safely go back."

'Paper Tiger' Label Revived by Chinese

Reuter

PEKING, May 22—China States today, claiming that the sharply attacked the United American image has been thoroughly blackened by the smoke from its own gunboats.

A report from the official New China News Agency, which referred for the first time in months to the United States as "a paper tiger," scorned what it described as an attempt to depict the Mayaguez incident as an American victory.

"This is a typical farce in self-consolation, written and staged single-handed by the very superpower which the small Indochina countries completely defeated," the agency said.

of the alliance countries. This spring, however, the second conference is to be held at the heads-of-government level, with President Ford meeting the other NATO leaders in Brussels next week.

Regarding joint arms purchases, a key topic in NATO discussions because of the economic slump in most alliance countries, the Europeans complain that they buy a much greater amount of arms from the United States than the United States does from them.

After today's discussion a high American official said that there was general agreement that there should be a "substantial increase" in arms purchases in both directions across the Atlantic. Reportedly, however, the United States wants a strong system of checks set up before entering into large-scale purchases in Europe to make sure that such joint projects are actually cost effective and properly managed.

The United States suggested that a new agency on joint arms purchases be set up inside NATO. The alliance's Secretary General, Joseph M. A. H. Luis of the Netherlands, was assigned to draw up an official proposal on such an agency before the next defense ministers' meeting in December.

The British Secretary of State for Defense, Roy Mason, who was the spokesman for the European ministers, said that he found Mr. Schlesinger's response favorable.

But European officials said privately that they had hoped for a more concrete indication at this time of how much the United States was prepared to buy. The European defense ministers plan a special meeting in the fall to prepare further proposals on the subject.

become ingrained as an economic benefit" and play an important role in recruiting and retaining servicemen.

The services also consider they have a moral commitment to retired military personnel, which the GAO estimated accounted for about 25 per cent of the patrons.

The GAO said Congress may want to consider whether it wishes to allow DOD (Defense Department) to continue to operate commissary stores in competition with commercial grocery stores at added expense to the taxpayer."

ing to penetrate ground defenses by flying at low altitudes.

The plans call for the purchase of 30 such aircraft for a total price tag of $1.7 billion, which would be a sizable boost to the U.S. aircraft and defense industry. It was said to be the largest joint procurement program that NATO ever has undertaken.

The defense ministers are expected to authorize today a study on how the cost of the project would be divided among the participating countries.

There also were strong indications that the Dutch Cabinet, when it meets in The Hague tonight, will choose the General Dynamics F-16 as the new lightweigat fighter for its Air Force.

Denmark and Norway also have chosen the F-16 over the French Mirage, with only Belgium among the four-country consortium still undecided and leaning toward the French aircraft.

European countries also are intent on maintaining and developing their own defense industries. They therefore are attempting to work out an agreement with the U.S. to share weapons development and production on some rational basis that would avoid costly duplication and waste.

According to a U.S. State Department study, the Western allies waste between $10 billion and $20 billion a year through duplicating weapons programs.

Some progress appeared to have been made toward a common procurement system in that, according to NATO sources, a new NATO agency will be formed to try to coordinate future weapons purchases by individual countries.

Another area of discussion among the defense ministers was the deteriorating political situation in NATO's southern region. In this connection, the U.S. was said to be trying to get some NATO recognition for Spain's importance to the Western alliance, but most European countries appeared reluctant to associate themselves with the fascist regime of Gen. Francisco Franco.

The U.S., on the other hand, would like to get more recognition for Spain in view of current negotiations to renew American base leases in the country, though it generally is acknowledged that NATO membership for Spain is not possible as long as the current regime is in power.

U.S. facing test at NATO summit

By HENRY L. TREWHITT
Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—A crescendo of American efforts to rebuild political status abroad is approaching a crash of rhetorical symbols in Brussels. Above all else the United States hopes to generate in the summit meeting of the Atlantic Alliance a deeper sense of Western unity

Even after the fact it may be hard to judge the results. No dramatic announcements are expected from the two-day conference of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or President Ford's following four days in Madrid, Salzburg and Rome.

But the NATO meeting will be the first critical political test of a United States campaign to restore credibility after the fall of South Vietnam and Cambodia to communism The outcome will have a bearing on a broad range of later meetings, most notably the prospective European Security Conference and the often-delayed meeting between Mr Ford and Leonid I. Brezhnev the Soviet leader.

Seldom has the preparatory campaign been conducted with greater care and vigor It began even before the Communist victories in Indochina, most obviously in Mr. Ford's so-called State of the World address to Congress April 10.

Painstakingly the President began then to define areas of primary national interest in the post-Indochina period: South Korea, Japan, NATO, continued detente with the Soviet Union and China.

With several variations of language he assured the world that the U.S. would live up to its commitments. By May 6, at a press conference after the fall of Saigon, his definitions became even more explicit. .

After Europe, he said, "It is my aim to tie more closely together South Korea with the United States, to reaffirm our commitments to Taiwan, to work more closely with Indonesia, with the Philippines and with other Pacific nations."

At that point a number of Mr. Ford's advisers said, "Oops." It had not been planned that the President would risk irritating China with a gratuitous reference to Taiwan. None the less, the general point was valid.

All the while Henry A. Kissinger, the Secretary of State, and James R. Schlesinger, the Secretary of Defense, were emphasizing the same theme. Mr. Schlesinger underscored the need for strong defenses as the U.S. role in the world changed. Mr Kissinger spoke more in terms of an orderly political transition into that new role.

There was more than a touch of irony in this process. For in some respects Mr. Kissinger is believed to be more inclined to the use of force than the secretary of defense. But the main themes remained consistent.

Cambodia's seizure of the SS Mayaguez added the substance of action to the rhetorical framework. Inside the government the consensus to use force to retrieve the Mayaguez and rescue its crew was reached quickly and overwhelmingly.

In the end the Mayaguez operation must be judged in purely political terms. By statistical standards, the rescue surely cost more men—at least 38 dead in connection with the rescue, plus 3 missing—than the 39 Mayaguez crewmen in jeopardy.

As a test of will, it demonstrated at least that the U.S. was not immobilized in the face of a flagrant provocation by a small country Whether it convinced anyone in broader geopolitical terms doubtless will be debated. The final conclusion may be a paradoxical one: That the U.S had much to lose by not responding savagely, not so much to gain by doing it.

In any event the incident was very much a background reinforcement for Mr Kissinger this week as he pursued final preparations for the NATO meeting. In Vienna he cautioned Andrei A. Gromyko, his Soviet counterpart, against thoughts of exploiting U.S. weakness.

At the same time he appeared to have made some progress with Mr. Gromyko on Mideast considerations. In Berlin he vigorously restated the U.S. commitment there and in the rest of Europe. In Ankara he restated the message to what remains of the Central Treaty Organization.

Back in Brussels, Mr. Schlesinger both promised to strengthen the U.S. commitment to NATO and briskly criticized its allies for not doing more.

There was some specific, visible progress even early in the undertaking. Valery Giscard d'Estaing, the president of France, made a gentle gesture of reconciliation with NATO by agreeing to go to Brussels next week for a meeting with Mr. Ford, though he would stay away from the NATO meeting.

At best the summit can only move the process of U.S. reaffirmation another step forward. But it is an important step In that sense the forthcoming summitry may be much like the Mayaguez affair: Though the potential concrete benefits may be modest, the cost of not trying could be enormous.

Cairo Paper Says Libya Gives Soviet Military Facilities

CAIRO, Friday, May 23 (Reuters)—The semiofficial newspaper Al Ahram said today that Libya and the Soviet Union had signed an agreement under which the Soviet Union would set up land, air and naval bases in Libya.

In return, the Soviet Union reportedly agreed to provide Libya with $4.4-billion in arms.

The Al Ahram report, datelined Beirut but quoting no source for the information, said the agreement had been signed by the Libyan leader, Col. Muammar el-Qaddafi, and Premier Aleksei N. Kosygin, who visited Libya last week.

Al Ahram said the Soviet Union would provide Libya with thousands of tanks and rockets and advanced arms, including modern weaponry withheld by the Russians from Egypt and Syria.

The Soviet Union, the Cairo paper said, told the Libyan leaders that the stationing in Libya of Soviet military experts was a condition for signing the pact.

Libyans to Be Trained

Mr. Kosygin told Colonel Gaddafi that the Soviet experts would form new divisions in the Libyan Army and train its personnel to use Soviet weapons, Al Ahram said.

The pact stipulated, according to Al Ahram, that the Soviet Union would supply Libya with large quantities of weapons to serve the political and strategic aims of the Soviet-Libyan alliance in the southern Mediterranean.

U.S. Criticizes Allied Arms Cuts In Light of Soviet Defense Increase

From Inquirer Wire Services

BRUSSELS—Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger assailed America's North Atlantic allies yesterday for reducing their military spending while the Soviet Union is increasing its defense budget, officials said.

Officials attending a two-day conference of NATO defense ministers said Schlesinger had contended that the Western allies had underestimated the ability of the Soviets to expand their military spending, which, he said, they are doing at the rate of 3 to 5 percent a year.

In an article for the "NATO Review," released in advance as the meeting opened yesterday, Schlesinger said the United States already had begun deploying two more combat brigades, plus additional ground and air strength for the 300,000 American troops in Europe.

The semi-annual meeting is being held at a time when the allied position has been weakened in southern Europe.

For the second time, Greece was boycotting the session and Portugal's leftist government was represented not by its defense minister but by a member of its "Revolutionary Council," Adm. Jose Baptists Pinheiro de Azevedo.

The NATO ministers, agreed yesterday to set up a new agency to help standardize arms production and increase weapons sales both ways across the Atlantic Ocean.

The ministers agreed also that the political situation in NATO's southern flank had deteriorated in recent months as the result of the Greek-Turkish conflict over Cyprus, the Greek withdrawal from NATO's military structure and the cutoff by the U. S. Congress of arms aid and sales to Turkey.

Debate on the most difficult problem — the crisis in Portugal — was put off until today.

Canal Zone: A Test of Leadership

I went up to the Senate to see Strom Thurmond, leader of the forces opposing an eventual negotiated return of the Panama Canal to Panama, wondering whether, in this stick-figure symbol of American jingoism, there is any redeeming streak of sensitivity to enlightened national self-interest.

I detected none. There is a case to be made that the restoration of Panamanian sovereignty in that part of Panama burglarized by Teddy Roosevelt must be done in a careful way, protecting the great American interest in the transit, security and modernization of the Canal.

But that is not the case made by Strom Thurmond. He believes that the Canal and Canal Zone are American property ("we bought it"), that the Panamanians are too unstable and too vulnerable to communism to be given back sovereignty, and that the Panamanians as well as ourselves will be better off if the United States hangs on.

If such views strike you as combining all of the narrow commercialism and patronizing moralism of the golden age of American empire-building, then you understand just how inappropriate and downright dangerous those views are at a time when the United States ought to be adjusting its Canal position to the realities of contemporary Latin nationalism.

Thurmond, though, is something else. Gracious in personal manner, he struck me as more than simply a throwback to another, simpler time. He struck me as, well, (apologies, Senator) a mean-minded man, someone who enjoys squeezing a little country such as Panama, who feels an indifference bordering on contempt for people who get in the way of American power.

His reserve general's stars adorn his desk nameplate. Military plaques cover his four office walls. With Thurmond when he received me were no fewer than five aides. All of them laughed on cue at his jokes: Might there not be sabotage? "You can't afford to surrender your house when someone breaks in." Two of the aides, well versed in Canal and treaty affairs, filled in the gaps on the several occasions when Thurmond's recollection of fact or argument faltered.

Like other children of the right who resent that the United States cannot just have its way in the world, Thurmond regards American diplomats essentially as agents planted by hostile governments within our own. That President Ford should even consider negotiating a new Canal treaty with Panama he attributes, darkly, to "the influence of the State Department."

From the ranks of the Americans who live and work in the Canal Zone and from some parts of the military and other special interests that enjoy the status quo, Thurmond apparently runs a formidable intelligence network, which seems to feed him all manner of tips and information on what the enemy—that is to say, the State Department—is about.

In April he came upon something worthy enough to produce a phone call from Henry Kissinger. Thurmond repeated to Kissinger his long-standing warning against sending up a new treaty to the Senate. Kissinger replied, by Thurmond's chortling account, that he might have to send it up just to get the government off the spot with the Panamanians.

In fact, the new treaty is still under negotiation with Panama and no decision seems yet to have been taken on the final terms or on when to submit it to the Senate. Because the return of American property would also be involved, legislation will have to be submitted to the House as well as the Senate at the same time under Article IV, Section III, Clause 2 of the Constitution. That clause gives Congress "power to dispose of . . . the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

Thurmond has mustered 37 senators, enough to block ratification of a new treaty, behind a resolution enshrining his own principles in the matter. To the suggestion that some signatories may not be so devoted to it in the clutch as he, he responds that other non-signatories, such as Foreign Relations Committee Chairman John Sparkman, have told him they will go along.

So what is the President of the United States to do when he is confronted on a key regional foreign-policy issue by a powerful legislator who not only promises a very tough fight on the particular issue but who disposes of considerable influence in a narrow but politically sensitive part of Mr. Ford's election-year constituency?

It was easy by comparison to send the Marines after the Mayaguez. Gerald Ford's decision on the Panama Canal will be a much sterner and more revealing test of his capacity for leadership in the White House.

NATO Sets Anti-Waste Practices

By David Fouquet
Special to The Washington Post

BRUSSELS, May 22—NATO today moved to eliminate wasteful and duplicate defense purchasing practices that experts for years had said were sapping the alliance's resources and military capability.

Against a background of major weapons negotiations, the United States and its allies agreed to try to implement the high-sounding promises they have long been making to one another.

The United States said it would increase its purchases of European and Canadian hardware and the European members of NATO made plans to work out a shopping list for the United States by the end of the year when defense ministers meet again. The NATO staff was instructed to study creation of an organization within the alliance to plan, develop and purchase equipment jointly.

While these economic issues dominated the first day of the semiannual two-day meeting of NATO defense chiefs here today, the gathering also considered NATO's deteriorating southern flank and prepared for next week's meeting here between President Ford and most of his NATO colleagues.

The discussion of the Mediterranean flank touched on such sensitive issues as the feud between Greece and Turkey, the American cutoff of defense equipment to Turkey and Spain's connection with the alliance.

With the cost of weapons spiraling, and pressure to trim outlays increasing, most delegations here acknowledged that changes had to be made in procurement procedures. A study for the U.S. government estimated that the 15 countries wasted $10 billion to $20 billion annually. A source said that an expert told the ministers today that "The military has its teeth into this issue and won't let go."

American Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger met with British Defense Minister Roy Mason, who told Schlesinger that the European members—four of whom are considering a billion-dollar purchase of American aircraft—insist that the United States increase its purchases abroad. Sources here said Europe suffers a 10-to-1 trade deficit in its military commerce with the United States.

Sources said that Mason "got what he came for" in his discussions with Schlesinger. American officials added "There was a widely shared general agreement that purchases both ways across the Atlantic could and should be substantially increased."

In other matters today, the ministers noted that some progress has been made in reconciling Greece and Turkey, that Italy is modernizing its navy and that France, which does not participate in NATO military operations, has nevertheless moved part of its fleet from the Atlantic to beef up the Mediterranean defense.

According to sources in the meeting, there was a debate over the American proposal that Spain's contribution to the Western defense be acknowledged. Spain, which is not a member of NATO, is negotiating with Washington on continued presence of American bases and has pressed the United States to seek some connection for it with the alliance.

Arms Ban Threatens U.S. Ties, Turkey Says

By Murrey Marder
Washington Post Staff Writer

ANKARA, May 22 — Turkish Foreign Minister Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil warned today that failure to lift the U.S. arms embargo on Turkey quickly will "seriously imperil our relations," but he stopped short of setting a deadline on closing any American bases here.

His blunt warning was delivered this morning at the opening session of the Central Treaty Organization's annual meeting, which Kissinger attended for the first time to try to reassure U.S. allies of American steadfastness after the defeats in Indochina.

Turkey is the most aggrieved U.S. ally here because Congress cut off its military supplies on Feb. 5 as a result of the Greek-Turkish clash over Cyprus.

There was no public sign that Turkey was significantly mollified by Monday's 41-to-40 Senate vote to resume arms sales and aid. The narrowness of the vote followed by assertions that House backers of the arms cutoff have enough votes to kill the Senate bill registered strongly here.

Kissinger had counted on getting new diplomatic leverage out of the Senate action to help resolve the Greek-Turkish snarl over Cyprus. He told Caglayangil in private that without some move toward compromise with Greece the Senate bill is headed for defeat in the House.

Kissinger hopes to make some headway here in setting the stage for compromise between the prime ministers of Turkey and Greece when they meet with President Ford at the North Atlantic Treaty Organization summit conference next week in Brussels.

The Cyprus conflict led Greece to pull out of NATO's military organization on the ground that NATO had failed to prevent Turkish troops from landing on Cyprus last July, and Congress cut off military supplies to Turkey because it used American weapons against a NATO ally.

The continuing Cyprus dilemma, American officials fear, could lead to the dismantling of the 25 U.S. bases in Turkey, including some considered important to the defense of the United States. These bases include a new link in the American early warning system for detecting the launching of Soviet missiles at the American continent.

Diplomatic sources indicated that Turkey is not eager to close any American bases, but has been hinting of this possibility in private discussions.

U.S. officials are concerned that out of exasperation Turkey might start cutting off U.S. base facilities directly affecting the United States but of less importance to Turkey and other NATO members.

The Turkish base network, the most extensive in the NATO defense network for gathering intelligence about the Soviet Union, has numerous electronic eavesdropping centers. It also includes a major air base system that is vital for traffic to the Middle East.

While the Cyprus dispute is not technically at issue at this CENTO meeting, in reality it dominates the scene. Turkey is a member of CENTO; Greece is not. The United States, while not a member, is attending the meeting as an observer-participant.

As Kissinger listened from a seat near by, Turkey's Caglayangil told the CENTO foreign ministers that "The attitude of the U.S. Congress to link the Cyprus problem with the military aid and military equipment supply to Turkey created a very regrettable situation that would entail inevitable negative effects on the close cooperation and friendship between Tukey and the U.S.A. While the U.S. is furnishing and selling arms to more than 90 countries, it is extremely difficult to explain the reasons of this attitude to Turkish public opinion."

"I regret to say," Caglayangil went on, "that if the U.S. position on this matter does not change within the approximate future, this situation will gain proportions that would seriously imperil our relations."

His prepared text said that serious U.S.-Turkish problems would develop "within the immediate future." The slight softening to "the approximate future" appeared to be gesture to Kissinger's presence. Caglayangil said, "We are appreciative of both President Ford's and Dr. Kissinger's efforts to correct this situation, which would have negative repercussions not only on Turkish-U.S.A. relations but also on our defense preparations and consequently on the security of the region."

Kissinger, in his formal statement to the council, reiterated that "The United States regards Turkey as a valued friend and ally," and said Washington will "make every effort for further progress in restoring our normal defense relationship with Turkey."

"The United States strongly supports efforts aimed at ending the disputes between Turkey and Greece," he said, "for we consider their relationship important to the security of both countries, to the security of the Mediterranean, and to the security of Europe."

Kissinger said the United States will "continue to do our utmost in the Cyprus dispute to encourage a just and durable solution that promotes the welfare of the people on the island and maintains the sovereignty, territorial integrity, and independence of Cyprus."

Turkey landed about 35,000 troops on Cyprus in the name of preserving the rights of the Turkish minority there from the Greek majority, and still occupies about 40 per cent of the island. At the height of Turkish military activity on the island there were about 40,000 troops there, but now, according to both Turkish and American sources, the Turkish troop level has been reduced to about 25,000.

Turkey is insisting on creating a two-zone federal state on Cyprus. Greece protests that this would virtually man two separate nations, with Turkey getting through force a disproportionate amount of territory.

Kissinger's main theme before the CENTO member nations—Turkey, Iran, Pakistan and Britain—was that the United States" is determined to reaffirm its ties to its allies," especially after "some months of trials" for America a clear allusion to setbacks for U.S. policy in Indochina and the Middle East.

Schlesinger sees Warsaw Pact buildup

Brussels

Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger said Thursday that the United States plans to strengthen its forces in Central Europe, where the Soviet-led countries of the Warsaw Pact have been building up their military strength "despite detente."

Mr. Schlesinger also cited "significant reductions in overall U.S. force levels since 1969."

Here to attend a two-day conference of North Atlantic Treaty Organization defense ministers, Mr. Schlesinger made his comments in an article written for NATO's monthly magazine made available here in advance of publication.

The NATO alliance, he said, must overcome pressures to reduce its forces if it is to keep a strong negotiating position with the Warsaw Pact countries on East-West forces reductions.

Weapons Debate

The Senate began debate on a $30.3 billion weapons bill with Sen. John Stennis (D-Miss.) arguing against "a military letdown" in the aftermath of South Vietnam's loss to the Communists.

Stennis, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said, "The Communists are not going to rest on their laurels."

He spoke after Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.) said that "excessive military spending is heading us tward financial bankruptcy or a nuclear war — whichever comes first."

Cranston said that at least 20 amendments will be offered to cut the funds authorized by the Armed Services Committee for the purchase of weapons and for Pentagon research and development.

However, no votes are to be taken until after the recess, when what has been billed as "a great debate" on foreign and defense policies is scheduled.

Stennis said he welcomed the forthcoming debate, but said many of the proposed amendments "already have run the gauntlet in the House and been defeated."

The House-passed bill authorizes a total of about $32 billion.

Opposing any "drastic drawdowns" in the nation's military forces, Stennis said, "We should have the strength and power to do what is best for our interests."

Cranston said the United States "should be a peaceful world neighbor instead of a militant world meddler. . . . One of these days our tendency to resort to military forces to resolve our national frustrations will lead to total disaster, for us and all mankind."

IRAN SAYS KILLERS WILL NOT ESCAPE

Leads in Assassination of U.S. Officers Reported

By ERIC PACE
Special to The New York Times

TEHERAN, Iran, May 22—Well-placed Iranian and foreign sources said today that Iranian security forces were following up several leads in their hunt for the terrorists who shot to death two United States Air Force colonels here yesterdaBy.

The newspaper of the Shah's political party asserted, without elaborating, that the killers would doubtlessly be captured soon.

The Teheran press seemed to be trying to rebut and allay any lingering anti-Americanism here. It cited the killings in countering charges by foreign critics that the Shah's regime was overly harsh.

No arrests or further acts of political violence were reported today. The reportedly intensive search for the assassins did not disrupt the staccato pace of life here.

It was in the wealthy northern sector of the city that Col. Paul R. Shaffer Jr. of Bryan, Ohio, and Lieut. Col. John H. Turner of Christopher, Ill., both 45 years old, were killed. They were ambushed at 6:30 A.M. yesterday as they were being driven to their offices at the Iranian ArmBed Forces headquarters here. They were members of the 200-man Military Assistance Advisory Group.

Embarrassment the Goal

At least three terrorists were said to have been involved. Anonymous telephone callers told Iranian journalists yesterday that the ambush was the work of a clandestine group, the Iranian People's Fighters Organization, and that it was an act of retaliation for atrocities by the Iranian Government against political prisoners.

"There is no doubt that in the near future the terrorists will be arrested and brought to justice," the newspaper Rastakhiz said in an editorial today. The paper represents Iran's sole legal political grouping, the Rastakhiz, or National Resurgence, party.

Iranian officials have indicated that undermining and embarrassing the Shah's Government was the terrorists' aim in killing the two officers, who are said to have worked on Iranian armed forces planning and personnel matters.

Well-placed informants, including Iranians, Americans and other foreign officials, said the leads being followed up by the Iranian authorities included the following:

¶An unidentified witness took down the license number of the car that the terrorists used to get away, after trapping the officers' car between two others, and killing the men. But whom the getaway car belonged to, whether it was found, and if so, where, and whether it yielded fingerprints or other clues—none of this was disclosed.

¶Another witness, a gardener named Yadollah Jalali, who had worked for one of the officers, saw the whole ambush and has been cooperating with the security authorities as, presumably, the officers' Iranian chauffeur has. Iranian officials say that those who plotted the killing have been identified with virtual certainty.

Mansfield Forcing Fight Over Indian Ocean Base

By JOHN W. FINNEY
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 22—The Administration is facing an open challenge from Senator Mike Mansfield over whether the United States, in the period after the Vietnam war, should establish a military presence in the Indian Ocean by constructing a naval and air base on the island of Diego Garcia.

To the Administration, the issue is whether the United States' ability to support military operations in the Indian Ocean should be enhanced by what it describes as a "modest naval facility" on the small British island 1,000 miles south of India.

To Senator Mansfield, who has been pressing for a reassessment of American foreign policy, the proposed base presents a symbolic test of whether in the post-Vietnam period the United States is going to extend or contract its global commitments.

Through various maneuvers, Senator Mansfield, as chairman of the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Military Construction, has posed a challenge that the Administration had hoped to avoid by slipping construction funds for the Diego Garcia base through Congress.

Last fall, Senator Mansfield attached an amendment to the military construction bill providing that no construction funds could be spent on the base until the President certified that it was "essential to the national interest of the United States." The Mansfield amendment also provided that the project could then be blocked by a resolution of disapproval adopted by either the House or Senate.

The Certification Came

With no publicity, President Ford on May 12 sent a one-paragraph letter to Congress certifying that construction of the Diego Garcia base was essential. The Presidential certification, according to Congressional aides, had been delayed as the State Department argued that it was not a propitious time to debate the American role in the Indian Ocean.

On Monday, Senator Mansfield introduced a resolution of disapproval that was referred to the Senate Armed Services Committee. The committee must report back to the Senate within 20 legislative days, setting the stage for a floor fight this summer or early fall.

The Defense Department wants to deepen the harbor and construct, repair and supply facilities on the island—at an eventual cost of at least $175-million—so that it could support a carrier task force in the Indian Ocean. Plans also call for extending the runway to 12,000 feet so that it could handle reconnaissance aircraft and aerial tanker planes, thus making it possible for B-52 bombers to operate in the area.

A Communication Station

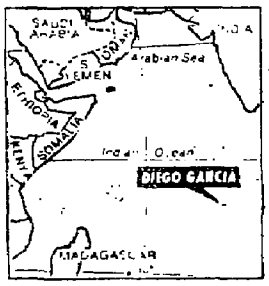
The Defense Department now operates a small communications station on the island. In proposing over the last five years that the island be expanded into a Navy support facility, the department has offered the following combination of political and military explanations:

¶The base is needed to ease the logistic burden of supporting naval operations in the Indian Ocean. The Defense Department has been conducting such operations since the 1973 Arab-Israeli war.

¶The United States must offset a growing Soviet naval presence in the Indian Ocean—a presence that is expected to increase with the reopening of the Suez Canal, scheduled for early next month.

¶That a projection of United States military power into the Indian Ocean would promote stability in the region and protect the sea lanes leading to Middle Eastern oil supplies.

In a statement accompanying his resolution of disapproval, Mr. Mansfield, the Senate majority leader, suggested that the Administration position represented "an extension of a policy of the United States trying to be policeman for the world in the face of our bitter experience in Vietnam."



The New York Times/May 23, 1975

Senator Mansfield questioned whether the United States had "vital interests" in the Indian Ocean. He noted, for example, that having a naval task force in the Indian Ocean "had no effect" in preventing the Arab nations from cutting off the flow of oil in 1973.

The Senator argued that the Diego Garcia base could be the stepping stone to "a three-ocean navy," with an Indian Ocean fleet used by the Navy to justify the maintenance of 15 aircraft carriers instead of the currently planned force of 12.

On the political side, he asked why the United States should "show the flag in an area of the world where the nations have requested that we not have our Navy there in force." He noted that last November, nations bordering on the Indian Ocean issued a policy statement opposing the construction of the United States naval base on Diego Garcia.

Senator Mansfield concedes that in the wake of Vietnam there is a greater Congressional reluctance to reduce the defense budget or foreign military commitments. But Senate aides believe that Mr. Mansfield may still be able to prevail on the Senate floor with the argument that this is no time to make a major new commitment in the Indian Ocean when the Administration and Congress are engaged in a reappraisal of American foreign policy.

The White House press secretary, Ron Nessen, was asked yesterday for Mr Ford's reaction to a House vote Tuesday to admit women to the military, naval and Air Force academies.

"He wants to think about it a little bit," Mr Nessen said

Legislation clearing the way for women cadets was passed by the House and sent to the Senate.

Pentagon Aide, Thurmond Tangle

By Jack Anderson and Les Whitten

Inside the Pentagon, it doesn't pay to mess with one of Strom Thurmond's boys.

Lt. Col. Wilfred Ebel found this out. He conducted a study, which rapped one of Thurmond's cronies as a lazy incompetent. There was a snort of annoyance from Old Strom. All of a sudden, Ebel's military career began collapsing around his ears.

Strom Thurmond, of course, is the strait-laced senator from South Carolina, a very model of a reserve major general, the Army's senior retread on Capitol Hill.

He helped to win World War II, and he has five battle stars and 18 decorations to prove it, including the Belgian Order of the Crown and the French Croix de Guerre.

At age 72, he marches through the Senate corridors, ramrod straight, as if to a military cadence. He is a power on the Senate Armed Services Committee where he fights for the Army with the same star-spangled fervor that he demonstrated on the battlefield.

Certainly, Thurmond is not one for a mere lieutenant colonel to tangle with. The unfortunate Ebel made the mistake of criticizing Maj. Gen. Milnor Roberts, the Army reserves chief, who happens to be one of Thurmond's World War II buddies.

Ebel was ordered to make a confidential study of Roberts' operation. His orders, Ebel has sworn, were to write a "no-holds-barred report."

This is precisely what the foolhardy lieutenant colonel did. He charged that Roberts, in his capacity as head of 730,000 reservists, was given to "intrigue," "indifference" and "lethargy." Roberts also lacked courage on tough decisions, wrote Ebel.

Subsequently, Ebel received a commendation for his "tremendous service" and "personal integrity." But this was before Old Strom spoke to Army Secretary Howard (Bo) Callaway about Ebel.

Callaway has assured us that Thurmond's approach was "low key." The senator passed on some allegations against Ebel. "He just said, 'Look into it,'" recalled Callaway. "There never was a case with less political influence."

Thurmond won't say who cooked up the charges against Ebel and slipped them to him. A classified Army document suggests that Roberts, the subject of Ebel's unflattering report, "may have been the source in this matter."

The Army reserves chief, although conceding he had spoken with both Thurmond and one of his aides about Ebel, denied he was the original purveyor of the rumors.

But from the moment Old Strom gave Ebel the evil eye, the world of the 44-year-old lieutenant colonel began to crumble. Here is the swift sequence of events:

• Callaway turned Thurmond's allegations against Ebel over to the Army inspector general to investigate.

• Astonishingly, the inspector general issued a report condemning Ebel for writing a "derogatory" report about Roberts. Yet Ebel's Pentagon superiors had ordered him to prepare a frank report. The inspector general also made some nitpicking charges about Ebel's putting in voluntary time and misleading the Army on a minor matter.

• Citing the inspector general's report as an excuse, Callaway dropped Ebel's name from the promotion list. He conceded that he had been "tougher" on Ebel than the inspector general had recommended but insisted this had nothing to do with Thurmond's intervention.

• Ebel had given up a top civil service job to return to the pentagon. But after he landed on Thurmond's blacklist, he found the Defense Department didn't want him.

When the Army began investigating Ebel because he put in free time at the Pentagon, this was the last straw. He retained an attorney, Frank Bartimo, the Defense Department's former assistant general counsel, to file charges.

At a closed-dooor meeting with Pentagon investigators, Bartimo charged that "this horrendous case . . . affects the very core and heart of the reserve forces."

Now the tables are turned, and the Justice Department is being asked to look at Thurmond, Callaway and company.

Footnote: Both Callaway and Roberts denied any impropriety. Roberts also insisted that Ebel's criticism of his operation was unfair and inaccurate. Thurmond couldn't be reached. But the strong-willed old soldier has said in the past that he has the duty to present any allegations that are brought to his attention. The inspector general said he had received no pressure from Callaway but had called the shots as he saw them.

Ford to Name Science Adviser

By Victor Cohn
Washington Post Staff Writer

President Ford said yesterday that he will name a White House science adviser, a job abolished by former President Nixon in January, 1973.

Among issues Mr. Ford is seriously concerned with, one aide said, are whether aerosol sprays are depleting the ozone layer that protects the earth from the sun's harshest rays and whether catalytic converters on cars cause more dangerous air pollution than they eliminate.

Dr. H. Guyford Stever, head of the government's National Science Foundation, said the President also wants scientific advice on "the many issues in the confrontation between energy, the environment, and the economy."

Stever is considered a leading candidate for the new job. Whoever is named, said James Cannon, director of the Domestic Council, the new adviser's main role will be to sum up advice of civilian and government scientists.

Yesterday Mr. Ford told eight members of Congress who have pressed for some new White House science apparatus that he will soon send them a draft bill to create both a science adviser and a 15-member staff.

He acted on advice of Vice President Rockefeller, whom he asked last fall to examine the issue.

A White House science adviser, the Office of Science and Technology, and the President's Science Advisory Committee were first created by President Eisenhower. He did so after the 1957 Soviet Sputnik, the first space satellite, showed Americans that other nations were catching up technologically.

When President Nixon abolished the office his aides called it a move to reduce bureaucracy. But scientific groups said the decision was unwise.

Scientists noted that Nixon, like President Johnson, was unhappy with science advisers who argued against projects like the anti-ballistic missile and supersonic transport plane—and whose advice surfaced in public debates.

In 1973, after abolishing the science office, Nixon gave Stever the additional duty of being a science adviser as well as NSF director. But being both a presidential counselor and an agency head asked too much of one person, it was decided in recent weeks.

Some scientists have also argued that a presidential science adviser should again start providing independent assessment of new weaponry, a role Nixon reassigned to the National Security Council. Whether a new adviser will advise on military matters has not yet been decided, a source said yesterday.

Several bills have been introduced to re-establish a White House science office. Yesterday two of Mr. Ford's visitors—Sen. Frank Moss (D-Utah), Senate Aeronautical and Space Sciences Committee chairman, and Rep. Olin Teague (D-Tex.), House Science and Technology Committee chairman—said they plan hearings on the issue. The House hearings are to start June 10.

"We welcome very much" the President's recommendations, Moss said, indicating there could soon be an agreement.

Apollo-Soyuz flight is okayed

Moscow Bureau of The Sun

Moscow—Senior American and Soviet space officials decided here yesterday that the joint Apollo-Soyuz space flight is all ready to go July 15.

Glynn S. Lunney, the American technical director for the project, said after an exhaustive review that "no issues or problems remain to be resolved" before the flight.

Konstantin Bushuyev, the Soviet technical director, said that the final checking of the spaceships and rockets is now beginning and that a final simulation flight would be held in late June to improve coordination of the control centers' work.

American officials said they were satisfied with the Soviet explanation of the April failure of the last Soviet manned space flight and were confident that similar problems would not interfere with the joint mission in July.

CAMBODIANS 5-23
DAY LD
BY WARREN TALBOT
NEWPORT, R.I. (UPI) -- THE STATE DEPARTMENT HAS GRANTED POLITICAL ASYLUM TO 20 YOUNG CAMBODIAN NAVY OFFICERS WHO CAME TO THE UNITED STATES BEFORE THE COMMUNIST TAKEOVER OF THEIR COUNTRY.
THE STUDENTS, ALL LIEUTENANTS JUNIOR GRADE, RECEIVED PERMISSION THURSDAY TO STAY IN THE UNITED STATES FOR AN INDEFINITE PERIOD OF TIME, ACCORDING TO FRANK CASTELNOVO, DISTRICT DIRECTOR OF THE U.S. DEPARTMENT OF IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION.
"IT WAS FINALIZED TODAY. THEY CAN REMAIN HERE FOR AN INDEFINITE PERIOD," HE SAID THURSDAY IN PROVIDENCE.
THE SAILORS HAVE COMPLETED AN 18-WEEK COURSE AT INTERNATIONAL OFFICER CANDIDATE TRAINING SCHOOL WHICH IS BASED AT THE U.S. NAVY EDUCATION AND TRAINING CENTER. THEY RECEIVED CERTIFICATES OF GRADUATION TUESDAY IN PRIVATE CEREMONIES.
THEY HAVE BEEN LIVING IN BARRACKS AT THE SPRAWLING NAVY BASE BY THE SEA. THEIR GRADUATION CEREMONY WAS HELD THREE DAYS AHEAD OF TIME TO AVOID PUBLICITY. THEY HAVE REFUSED ALL REQUESTS FOR INTERVIEWS, FEARING REPRISALS ON THEIR FAMILIES AT HOME.
"IT'S UP TO THE NAVY NOW TO TURN THEM LOOSE. WE'VE GIVEN THE NAVY THE GREEN LIGHT TO LET THEM GO. THE NAVY DIDN'T WANT TO HOLD THEM FOR A LONG PERIOD OF TIME," CASTELNOVO SAID.
HE SAID HE "PRESUMES" ALL OF THEM HAVE SPONSORS TO HELP THEM RELOCATE IN NEW HOMES AND JOBS.
"THE NAVY WAS TAKING CARE OF THAT END. THE DECISION TO ALLOW THEM TO STAY HAS A LOT TO DO WITH WHETHER THEY HAVE SPONSORS. AS FAR AS I KNOW SOME WILL BE STAYING IN THE RHODE ISLAND AREA, AND OTHERS WILL BE MOVING AWAY TO DIFFERENT PARTS OF THE COUNTRY," HE SAID.
"THE ONLY THING WE ASK IS THAT THEY KEEP IN TOUCH WITH US SO WE WILL KNOW WHERE THEY ARE IF WE HAVE TO GET A HOLD OF THEM," CASTELNOVO SAID.
CASTELNOVO SAID HIS DEPARTMENT HAS RECEIVED DIRECTIVES NOT TO "PROCEED WITH THE FORCEABLE RETURN OF CAMBODIANS AND SOUTH VIETNAMESE."
HE SAID INFORMAL DISCUSSIONS WITH THE CAMBODIANS BEGAN LAST MONTH, BUT THAT IT WAS NOT UNTIL LAST WEEK THAT THEY FORMALLY SOUGHT ASYLUM.

HE DEFENDED THE DECISION TO BAR THE TROOPS FROM THE COMPOUND, SAYING ENTRANCE OF THE LAOTIANS WOULD HAVE BEEN A BREACH OF DIPLOMATIC IMMUNITY.
"THIS IS A COMPOUND THAT HAS DIPLOMATIC STATUS," HE SAID. "IT IS UNACCEPTABLE TO HAVE PEOPLE GO ON OUR COMPOUND WITHOUT OUR AUTHORIZATION."
LAOTIAN FORCES LED BY THE COMMUNIST PATHET LAO HAVE BEEN RINGING THE COMPOUND FOR THREE DAYS, KEEPING HUNDREDS OF AMERICANS VIRTUAL PRISONERS INSIDE.
"THIS IS A PERIOD OF TURMOIL AND INEVITABLY THE LINES OF AUTHORITY AREN'T VERY CLEAR, BUT I HAVE NO EVIDENCE THERE WILL BE VIOLENCE AGAINST AMERICANS," CHAPMAN SAID.
HE SAID THE UNITED STATES WOULD CLOSE DOWN ALL AGENCY FOR INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT OPERATIONS IN LAOS AND MOST OF THE 850 AMERICANS IN THE COUNTRY WOULD BE EVACUATED.
U.S. OFFICIALS SAID THE AMERICANS AT THE 140-HOME KILOMETER 6 COMPOUND -- MAINLY AID EMPLOYES -- HAD PLENTY OF FOOD AND WATER.

Kissinger, in Berlin, Affirms U.S. Defense of Allies

By LESLIE H. GELB
Special to The New York Times

BERLIN, May 21—Secretary of State Kissinger stood at the rostrum of West Berlin's House of Representatives today to confirm the past and to repledge the United States to this city's future.

"As Berlin was the greatest symbol of the heroism of the immediate postwar period, it is also the acid test of the period we now hope to enter," Mr. Kissinger said.

In 1963, outside the building in which Mr. Kissinger spoke, the Schöneberger Rathaus, or City Hall, President John F. Kennedy identified himself with the people of West Berlin and symbolically linked the security of Berlin with the security of the United States.

Mr. Kissinger did the same today, saying, "the security of West Berlin remains a vital interest of the United States."

The Secretary of State spoke inside the gray and lumbering 1914 romanesque building and told his listeners: "This city is enjoying greater security than at any time in the last 30 years." He then talked about the 1971 agreement on Berlin, which validated the Western position in Berlin and the city's links with West Germany.

In the more troubled time of Mr. Kennedy's visit, the President spoke outside the building to crowds who were seeking American reassurance.

Mr. Kissinger on arriving and leaving Tegel Airport in West Berlin, spoke in German and in English.

At lunch, his German hosts paid a compliment to the Secretary's German origin and his policies of diplomacy serving him Prince Metternich Champagne.

While Mr. Kissinger's visit to West Berlin was planned months ago, he saw this moment—in the wake of the collapse of the American position in Indochina—as the right time to make another symbolic gesture of assurance. He said that Washington "will never seek peace by abandoning principles or sacrificing friends."

Earlier in the morning, at the United States headquarters in West Berlin, the publicity stol-

U.S. Decides to Speed Up Laos Pullout

From News Dispatches

The United States has decided to speed up its pullout of Americans from Laos following recent attacks on U.S. personnel in Vientiane and Savannakhet, the State Department said yesterday.

Spokesman Robert Funseth said, however, that the State Department had no report from the embassy in Vientiane about whether the stepped-up evacuation had begun or how many of the estimated 1,000 Americans still in Laos would be removed.

The U.S. Charge d'Affaires in Laos, Christian A. Chapman, met with two Communist Pathet Lao Cabinet ministers last night in an attempt to resolve the most recent confrontation—the student occupation of the U.S. Agency for International Development compound in Vientiane with two Marines and a civilian inside it.

In the southern city of Savannakhet, a dozen Americans and six other persons began a second week under loose house arrest but reportedly were in no immediate danger.

Chapman, who met at the U.S. embassy with Culture Minister Maha Khou and Planning Minister Soth Pothrasy after an earlier meeting with Premier Souvanna Phouma, said many American families in Vientiane were "virtual prisoners," since they were stopped by policemen from going in and out of an American housing area.

Arrangements were being made in Vientiane for a chartered DC-6 to fly out some U.S. AID officials, their dependents and the dependents of other U.S. officials expected to leave soon, Jacques Leslie of the Los Angeles Times reported from Vientiane. He said it was probable that the charter would be the first of several in coming weeks to take out U.S. officials and their personal belongings.

Funseth indicated that the State Department's decision to speed up the evacuation was at least partly spurred by "the continuing situation in Savannakhet and this most recent incident in Vientiane."

He said the U.S. government would "thin out" its presence in Laos "in the next several weeks." He said the State Department did not know whether the U.S. embassy in Vientiane had advised nonofficial Americans to leave the country.

The students demonstrating against the Americans have demanded the immediate dissolution of AID in Laos and the departure of all of its U.S. employees. They also demand that the agency turn its facilities over to the Laotian government, including personal goods that have been imported tax free, and that taxes be paid on personal property of Americans before they leave the country.

The U.S. embassy said in a statement Monday that it was ready to "modify, reduce or eliminate" AID operations to meet the demands.

The political situation in Laos has changed rapidly in recent days, as the precarious three-way coalition government has lost most of its rightist representation through resignation and exile, leaving the Communist-led Pathet Lao in virtual control.

In the latest demonstration, about 200 students and some employees of AID climbed over the fence of the Aid compound in Vientiane and took it over early yesterday morning. The demonstrators also seized an AID warehouse five miles outside Vientiane and pre-

Senators Support Israel

By Stephen Isaacs
Washington Post Staff Writer

Seventy-five members of the Senate have signed a letter to President Ford that in effect demands that the United States continue its strong support of Israel, The Washington Post learned last night.

The letter was delivered to the White House yesterday evening and will be released publicly at a press conference in the Senate this morning.

The 75 signers constitute the largest number of senators ever to sign a pro-Israel letter or resolution. The previous high was 73, the number of members who signed a letter to then-Secretary of State William P. Rogers urging the administration to sell Phantom jets to Israel in 1970.

Senators involved in the signature-gathering said that the letter is particularly significant, coming just before the President's trip to meet with Egyptian President Anwar Sadat and, later, Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Mr. Ford is due to leave early Wednesday for Brussels and will meet Sadat in Salzburg, Austria, on June 1 and 2. He will see Rabin in Washington later in June.

The senators also said it was significant that so many of

KENNEDY ASKS HALT TO A-ARMS TESTING

Special to The New York Times

Geneva, May 21—Senator Edward M. Kennedy called on the United States and the Soviet Union today to halt all nuclear weapons testing to give other nations a "real incentive" for renouncing the development of nuclear arms.

The Massachusetts Democrat also urged the two powers to begin "real reductions" in their own nuclear arsenals, addressed delegates to a 65-nation conference reviewing the effectiveness of the treaty banning the spread of nuclear weapons.

Many of the nonnuclear nations represented at the conference have also urged such action on Washington and Moscow as the most effective step to get more countries to accept the treaty.

The review conference is being held under the provisions of the five-year-old pact by which nonnuclear nations renounce the acquisition of nuclear arms and the nuclear powers pledge not to assist other countries to obtain such weapons.

al Secretary of State showed brief emotion. Faced with an honor guard dressed in blue, with American flags flying and with a band playing "The Star Spangled Banner," Mr. Kissinger's face reddened.

Minutes later when he informally addressed Americans assembled in the courtyard, he came close to echoing the old Kennedy words.

"All of those who doubt what American has stood for should visit Berlin," Mr. Kissinger said. They should come to this city, he continued, "where basic issues do not require explanation."

Berlin 'a Great Principle'

His listeners were moved, as seemingly were those who heard his last line at the House of Representatives: "We are confident that history will record Berlin as not merely as a great city but as a great principle in the story of man's struggle for freedom."

After his visit here, Mr. Kissinger left for Turkey to attend a meeting of the Central Treaty Organization.

For Mr. Kissinger, since his days as a professor, Western Europe has meant primarily West Germany and West Berlin.

"To Henry, Washington and Bonn are the two key players," a Kissinger aide said. Bonn is the capital of the mightiest conventional military power in Central Europe and the deutschmark is the centerpiece of the European economy.

There is particularly high regard for Chancellor Helmut Schmidt among State Department officials dealing with European affairs.

These officials and Mr. Kissinger himself, it is said, view Mr. Schmidt as a transitional leader of West Germany — as the last in an old line and the first in a new. Konrad Adenauer rooted West Germany in the West and Ludwig Erhard consolidated this process. Willy Brandt opened the door to the East to legitimize Bonn's borders.

Mr. Schmidt is considered in the words of one official, "a new breed of cat." He is seen as more expressive of the new strong Germany, and as a man who will not follow the established pattern that whatever burdens are to be borne by the Western allies, West Germany must pay.

High State Department officials judge him to be an independent force to be reckoned with and regard his brand of nationalism as a healthy sign.

Support Appreciated

They particularly liked Mr. Schmidt's quiet but clear backing of the American position at the recent consumer-producer conference on energy in Paris. Mr. Kissinger is taking special care that the Soviet position calling for a reduction of West German forces in the early stages of any mutual force reduction agreement in Europe does not lead to Bonn's isolation.

For when Mr. Kissinger and his aides privately express concern about Germany's future it is no longer couched in terms of renascent German militarism. Their expressed concern is of "a free-floating West Germany."

Such a West Germany, in their eyes, would result in an anti-American, French-style policy at best and at worst, an unhinging of a Western Europe oriented toward the United States.

vented traffic from entering or leaving a residential area where many AID officials live. The demonstrators carried away goods from the AID compound and warehouse.

AID now has stationed in Laos slightly fewer than the 162 officials tabulated during the last count, at the end of April.

Students who seized the compound hung signs from the chain-link fence around it saying, "Americans Leave," and "CIA Go Home."

No Americans were allowed to enter the compound, although three stayed from the beginning of the seizure.

By mid-afternoon yesterday, students had broken into many of the dozen buildings inside the compound, but they had not entered the two main office buildings where the two Marine Guards were. The Marines were in radio contact with officials at the nearby U.S. embassy.

Tension throughout the rest of Vientiane's American community appeared to increase substantially.

The embassy issued a press release stating that Chapman met with Laotian Prime Minister Souvanna Phouma and Foreign Minister Phoumi Vongvichit "to protest these illegal actions."

them signed, indicating, they said, that there has not been an erosion of support for Israel in Congress, as some reports have indicated.

The letter states that the Senate wants to have a voice in the reassessment of American policy toward the Middle East, which Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger announced late in March when his latest peace-making effort in the Middle East failed.

The letter also threatens Mr. Ford's foreign aid bill, saying:

"Within the next several weeks, the Congress expects to receive your foreign aid requests for fiscal year 1976. We trust that your recommendations will be responsive to Israel's urgent military and economic needs. We urge you to make it clear, as we do, that the United States acting in its own national interests stands firmly with Israel in the search for peace in future negotiations, and that this premise is the basis of the current reassessment of U.S. policy in the Middle East."

Notable among those 24 senators who did not agree to sign the letter is Sen. Charles H. Percy (R-Ill.), who until five months ago had been a staunch supporter of Israeli policies.

He spent from Jan. 3 to Jan. 28 in the Middle East and declared that Israel ought to be more flexible, and ought to deal with the Palestinians and, in specific, with Yasser Arafat, leader of the Palestine Liberation Organization.

One Senate source who had a hand in drafting the letter said it has two main points, one explicit and one implicit.

"Explicitly," he said, "it says, 'Mr. President, we've heard of your reassessment. It is not a unilateral activity to be undertaken in the State Department.

"'Here's our view on reassessment — i.e., all the main outlines of American policy stand. We wanted to make it very clear, Mr. President, where the Congress stands. Whatever you're doing, we want you to take this into account.'

"Secondly, implicitly, the fact that 75/99th of the Senate are taking this stand at this time refutes the whole idea that there's erosion. In fact, there's more support than before.

"The so-called erosion is a myth created by the media, and some elements of the administration have been quietly suggesting it was so in various quarters."

A key word in the Senate letter is "defensible" in connection with Israel's borders.

"Since 1967," the letter says, "it has been American policy that the Arab-Israeli be settled on the basis of secure and recognized boundaries that are defensible, and direct negotiations between the nations involved. We believe that this approach continues to offer the best hope for a just and lasting peace."

"... We believe," the senators said, "that a strong Israel constitutes a most reliable barrier to domination of the area by outside parties. Given the recent heavy flow of Soviet weaponry to Arab states, it is imperative that we not permit the military balance to shift against Israel.

"We believe that preserving the peace requires that Israel obtain a level of military and economic support adequate to deter a renewal of war by Israel's neighbors. Withholding military equipment from Israel would be dangerous, discouraging accommodation by Israel's neighbors and encouraging a resort to force ..."

Fifty Democrats and 25 Republicans did sign.

Nineteen senators solicited their fellow members for signatures, with the staffs of Sens. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) and Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) taking the lead.

Pro-Israel lobbyists were particularly pleased by the fact that all 10 freshmen senators signed.

In a related development yesterday, six senators and 45 congressmen sent a telegram to the director general of the World Health Organization in Geneva, threatening a cutoff of American financing of WHO if the organization constricts Israel's participation. Some reports have indicated WHO is considering such a move.

"In light of the recent experience with UNESCO, we would not want to see any action which would inevitably lead to a diminution of U.S. support for your organization in Congress," the telegram said.

Congress backs up Ford's defense stance

By Richard L. Strout
Staff correspondent of
The Christian Science Monitor

Washington

Nations of the world take note: Congress is supporting President Ford's defense posture.

Assassination of two U.S. Air Force officers in Tehran will only strengthen congressional support, it is believed.

The Vietnam episode, paradoxically, has increased, not diminished, legislative backing for President Ford in certain critical international areas, all signs indicate.

"This is no time to diminish U.S. troop strength abroad," Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D) of Montana, a long-time supporter of reducing overseas American military strength, told Congress, in effect, this week.

The Senate, which cut off weapons shipments to Turkey Feb. 5 because they were used in the Cyprus dispute with Greece, relaxed the ban May 19 by a narrow vote, 41-40.

Congress is sending a signal abroad: It is telling the world not to overdiscount America's will to act resolutely.

It is, in a way, a negative signal: there is no policy deadlock in Washington.

Congress often plays a slow-moving but profound part in American foreign policy. It tilted its support from Turkey to Greece in the Cyprus question. It angered the White House by restricting trade agreements with the Soviet Union in the absence of Russian concessions on Jewish emigration.

Less capriciously, after 10 years of almost undeviating support of the executive in Vietnam, in August, 1973, it limited the President's discretion to send troops, shell or bomb and, in the final agony of collapse, rejected President Ford's appeal to appropriate $720 million in additional military aid.

Congress moves deliberately but knows when it has had enough, it is noted here. But now the signal is different.

With Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger talking to Russian Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko in Vienna and then traveling to Ankara, and with President Ford just about to attend the NATO meeting in Brussels May 29-30, Congress feels, judging from repeated assertions on and off the floor, that this is a time to support the executive. It must not foster a mistaken notion abroad that the United States is a paper tiger.

Senator Mansfield, in an impassioned speech on Turkish aid, told the Senate that the vote was expressly scheduled to allay Turkish resentment, and that it was designed to strengthen America's good offices on the Cyprus question and thereby to strengthen the North Atlantic Treaty Alliance. He asked for support "at this moment of history." He got a hairline victory.

The House took its turn, May 20. By an overwhelming vote, 311-95, it rejected an amendment to cut the 416,500 U.S. troops abroad by 70,000. The meaning of the one-sided vote was plain to many here — Congress does not want the Vietnam episode to be misinterpreted. Instead of weakening the executive's hand, Vietnam has strengthened it, in this particular situation.

Last year a proposal to cut U.S. troops overseas by 100,000 lost by 240-163 — a considerably less-lopsided vote than now. Some had thought that the 75 freshmen Democrats might tip the balance the other way. House Majority Leader Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. of Massachusetts, however, summed it up. This is the "wrong time" for such action, he said.

What Role for America?

In thinking about America's post-Indochina relations with the rest of the world it may be better to look at problems in categories rather than by making a country by country survey. With this in mind we might well consider armaments, economic resources and home-front perceptions of how to conduct foreign policy.

Since basic policy is to prevent major wars the first priority is to avoid nuclear conflict. Here the continuing strategic arms limitation talks (SALT) are critical. At the moment this Soviet-American negotiation is hung up on intricate technical problems. Secretary Kissinger will meet again with Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko to try to resolve these issues. The Ford-Brezhnev meeting, postponed at American request, depends on bringing the SALT II talks to the point of an agreement.

Even as SALT inches forward, a second level of the nuclear problem has assumed increasing, even alarming, proportions. This is the growing number of states possessing nuclear weapons, beginning with India (however much she says she is engaged only in peaceful pursuits) and quite possibly to be followed by several more nations. The weapons grade material that is the by-product of nuclear power plants is getting close to being uncontrolled or uncontrollable. The one hope here is that the Non-Proliferation Treaty review conference in Geneva may find some new devices to rein in this charging nuclear horse.

If nuclear war seems unthinkable (although we should not accept that as a premise), then conventional war is growing more and more frightening in its potential. As the International Institute for Strategic Studies recently noted, a new family of "precision guided" or so-called "smart" bombs has "dramatically" increased the potential damage and may also impinge on the nuclear control problem. One need only imagine another round in the Middle East with such new weapons involved to hope that diplomacy can head it off. Yet in Europe the mutual force reduction talks between NATO and Warsaw Pact nations has yet to achieve a breakthrough to reduction of rival forces.

The United States, more or less against its will, has been drawn toward a summit conference finale of the European Security Conference without any substantive concessions from the Communist side. It would seem to make sense to avoid that finale until or unless there is some meaningful progress on the arms talks. If there ever were a case for linkage, this is it. Furthermore, the United States has no option but to keep its forces in Western Europe (and in South Korea as well) until both sides agree to mutual scaling down. Given these and other uncertainties, the United States must continue a high level of armaments, something Congress seems willing to do with minimal cuts. Kissinger is certainly right when he says that "as a basic relationship detente has never meant the absence of competition."

The economic problems are more diffuse and more difficult to grasp than even the military problems; witness the struggle over both a domestic and an international energy program. Most Americans, like Kissinger, probably have been repelled by the demands put forward by Algeria and many other so-called developing and underdeveloped nations for a larger share of the existing pie of world resources; that is, by producers of raw materials (which we are more and more running out of ourselves) for higher prices and for some price level tie, called indexing, to the costs they pay for our farm and manufactured goods. For the last couple of decades this has been a growing problem, now brought front and center by the effectiveness of the OPEC oil cartel. While it is true, as Kissinger says, that global expansion of the prosperity pie is essential if all are to have more, the time has come when we can no longer blithely escape these demands.

Economic problems, of course, have domestic causes, as witness those in Britain. When Federal Reserve Board Chairman Arthur Burns made that remark about Britain going down the drain (he later apologized to the British ambassador—for saying it out loud), he was thinking of our own internal imbalances. Our legislative-executive gulf remains wide but at least there are efforts to bridge it.

If there are efforts to resolve, or at least move forward, in the arms control and economic fields, both nationally and internationally, the same

Viet War Weapons Were a Mixed 'Bag'

By CHUCK BELL

Indeed, there was no end of the contrivances to which they resorted against each other.—Thucydides

Every war in history has produced a flood of new weapons and clever devices and the Indochina war was no exception.

One new weapon that was forged on the battlefields of Southeast Asia was the attack helicopter.

The U.S. Army already was experimenting with the attack helicopter concept when the United States became involved in the war but there was no attack helicopter in existence, although the Lockheed Co. was at work on the design for the AH-56A Cheyenne.

The lack of a helicopter designed primarily for the attack role was keenly felt, especially after experience with makeshift armed helicopters showed how effective they could be in suppressing ground fire during helicopter-borne assaults and casualty evacuation operations.

The Bell Helicopter Co. filled the void by developing, on its own initiative, an armed version of its highly successful UH-1 utility helicopter. Called the AH-1 Huey-Cobra, Bell's creation was little more than a flying gun platform and, in that respect, was reminiscent of Bell's World War II P-39 Airacobra.

About two thousand Huey-Cobras, in several different configurations, were built during the war. They were armed with a variety of weapons, including 7.62mm Miniguns, rapid-fire cannon, grenade launchers and air-to-ground rockets.

The UH-1 wasn't the only non-combat aircraft that was turned into a combat aircraft for service in Indochina. Some of the most unlikely airplanes were transformed from peaceful critters into ferocious beasts of prey by the simple expedient of attaching guns to the wings or fuselage and adding an "A" to the designation.

Thus the T-37 jet trainer equipped with guns and bombs became the A-37. The aging C-47 cargo plane of pre-World War II vintage had three Miniguns installed and became the AC-47—better known as "Puff the Magic Dragon." The versatile Lockheed C-130 Hercules got a similar treatment and became the AC-130.

Even some combat aircraft were pressed into roles they were not designed for. The B-52 heavy strategic bomber, designed originally for carrying nuclear bombs into the Soviet Union, was adapted to carry conventional "iron bombs" to targets in Indochina. One B-52 could carry 60,000 pounds of high explosive (HE) bombs—as much as 30 World War II B-17s could carry.

Not all the weapons and techniques used in Indochina were new, however. The Navy's role in Vietnam, for example, consisted largely of launching air strikes from aircraft carriers in the Gulf of Tonkin against targets in North and South Vietnam. Except for the fact that the planes carrying the bombs were modern, jet-propelled F-4s and A-7s instead of the old propeller-driven SBD Dauntlesses, these operations were quite similar to the kind of thing the Navy did in World War II.

At one point, the Navy reached even further back into its bag of tricks and recommissioned the battleship New Jersey. The presumably obsolete vessel lurked several miles off the coast and used her nine 16-inch guns to hurl tons of HE shells at targets on the shore, with pinpoint accuracy and devastating effect.

The Navy introduced one new wrinkle to the war in the form of high-speed river patrol craft that saw extensive service on the Mekong River. The enemy quickly learned to respect these fast and impressively armed boats.

On the ground, the foot soldier found himself being equipped with a variety of devices designed to increase his range and striking power. The Indochina War was the first conflict in which the infantryman's primary weapon was an assault rifle. Developed by the Germans in the closing days of World War II, the assault rifle came to fruition in Southeast Asia with American troops and their allies armed with the much-maligned but quite effective M-16 and the Communist troops toting the equally effective AK-47.

Some American troops used the new M-79 40 mm grenade launcher, in effect a shoulder-fired light artillery piece.

For positional defense, the Americans and South Vietnamese used the Claymore mine, one of the most fiendish weapons of mass slaughter ever developed. The Claymore consisted primarily of a convex-shaped charge with thousands of ball bearings lining the convex face. It could be triggered either by a trip wire or by a remote control switch and proved highly effective in halting human wave attacks.

cannot be said for our home front perception of how to conduct foreign policy or what the scope and reach of that policy should be. In many ways this is our most pressing categorical problem, and one-shot show-we're-tough exercises like the Mayaguez affair provide no answer.

More than 40 years ago President Roosevelt said to Francis Perkins: "Remember how Wilson lost the League of Nations, lost the opportunity for the United States to take part in the most important international undertaking ever conceived. He lost it by not getting Congress to participate. They have a sense of their responsibility, and they can't have sincere convictions unless they are given a chance to examine the situation at close range."

We are back at square one on that. Kissinger now perceives a contest in America between "a more radical" and "a more conservative trend" and he complains that the administration "is more naked to day-to-day pressures of public opinion than has been the case throughout the entire post-war period." On the other hand, a leading senator sees "the country's mind" open to a debate on America's role if only the administration is ready. The time is ripe to begin, perhaps with a "foreign policy summit" discussion before TV cameras as Columbia Professor Brezinski has suggested.

Conservative political challenges to both President Ford and the liberal Democrats by such as Ronald Reagan and George Wallace may seem to be essentially domestic in nature; both have strong foreign policy overtones. A presidential campaign can be a very useful way to sort out national attitudes, but the country first of all needs some less heated discussion of basics before we get to that climactic round.

Americans may be exhausted by war and all the rest, but there is no escaping a role in the world. We had better decide what it should be, and reasonably soon.

Seizure at sea

President Ford took a nicely calculated risk over the Mayaguez, and pulled it off. On Monday this American merchant ship, carrying a mixed cargo from Hongkong to a port in Thailand, was stopped by a Cambodian naval vessel, boarded and forced to anchor. Mr Ford ordered an aircraft carrier and other warships to enter the Gulf of Thailand and had some Marines flown to an air base in Thailand, in the face of protests from Bangkok. But he also sought to make diplomatic contact with the new regime in Phnom Penh and to induce China to help get the ship and its American crew released.

He was clearly not spoiling for a fight with Cambodia's new rulers—or with Congress. The Cooper-Church amendment could be seen as barring him from using American forces in Cambodia without congressional approval, and many congressional figures had painful memories of the way the Administration had misled them about the facts of the Tonkin Gulf incident in 1964. The Mayaguez had been seized when it was well away from the Cambodian mainland but close to some islets claimed by Cambodia and thus arguably within its territorial waters. But Mr Ford was also not minded to bow to "an act of piracy".

Diplomacy having yielded no quick results, he authorised air attacks on Cambodian gunboats when they looked like trying to move the captive crew to the mainland, and then landed Marines on the island nearest to the ship. By Thursday the Mayaguez and its crew were in American hands; the Thais might still be indignant, but Mr Ford was riding high after his brief venture into brinkmanship.

This was a fresh reminder that brinkmanship is sometimes necessary and sometimes works—even when it is hard on the nerves.

Mayaguez Post-Mortems

In the two hours before the rescue of the Mayaguez and its crew began, the White House notified 22 congressional leaders that the President had ordered a limited military operation to achieve that end. Not one of the leaders posed a serious question about the nature or scope or necessity of the impending action.

I cite that information, which was originally disclosed by Saul Friedman of the Knight newspapers, as a caution against the spate of post-mortems on the Mayaguez affair. Whether critical or favorable, the inquests have ignored a central feature of the whole operation. As the unwonted silence of the congressmen indicates, it was a fast-moving, highly operational affair intrinsically resistant to second guessing or kibitzing.

Consider first what seems to be the most plausible of the criticisms. That is the argument that President Ford should have waited before taking military action.

Perhaps so. But a special characteristic of the Mayaguez affair was that the Cambodians did not immediately move the captured ship and its crew to a mainland port. Since the ship was anchored at Koh Tang island and the crew was presumed to be with it, the opportunity for rescue presented itself.

But there was no reason to think the opportunity would last long. On the contrary, the normal supposition had to be that the ship and crew would soon be taken beyond the reach of American amphibious forces.

So there was intense pressure on President Ford to move with dispatch. The case of the Mayaguez, in other words, fit that rare category governed by the famous words of Macbeth: "If it were done when 'tis done, then 'twere well it were done quickly."

The idiosyncratic character of the action is even more cogently illustrated by the charge that the United States has somehow set a new and fearful precedent. According to this charge, President Ford is now wantonly asserting the right to attack any nation which, whether legitimately or not, apprehends an American vessel. It is suggested that, on the basis of the Mayaguez affair, the United States should be attacking Ecuador for the seizure of American fishing boats off its Pacific coast.

But the seizures off the coast of Ecuador have a long and involved history. American boats have been fishing, and perhaps overfishing, those waters for years. The government of Ecuador has repeatedly protested, and repeatedly threatened action, against the fishing boats. Only against that background did the seizures take place.

There was no such history in the Mayaguez affair. The capture came as a bolt from the blue without any warning. No discussion between the two governments was under way. Neither was there any advance claim of a Cambodia right violated by American shipping. Indeed, cheese resembles chalk more than the Cambodian seizure resembled those of Ecuador, and to make one a precedent for the other smacks to me of deliberate scaremongering.

Far worse than the criticisms, however, are the exaggerated claims made out for the Mayaguez rescue. Particularly suspect is the claim that the United States proved something which ought to make us proud to be Americans. In reality, the Mayaguez is far too special an incident, and Cambodia far too tiny a country, for one to believe that anything was proved.

It is suggested that the most egregious claims are advanced by Vice President Nelson Rockfeller and Secretary of State Kissinger. They are the ones who wanted to use B-52 bombers against Cambodia as a punishment. That proposal was no mere "option."

In fact, the bombers were ready, with the bombs in place, when the rescue got under way.

If post-mortems have to be made, the truly outrageous proposal to use strategic bombers against Cambodia strikes me as the measuring rod. Perhaps President Ford did act too hastily. Perhaps there was an element of punitive action in his decision, as well as a determination to get back the ship and crew. Still the very nature of the episode should induce caution about second-guessing. The more so since, except for the moderation of the President, the Secretary of Defense and the military chiefs, the outcome could have been far worse.

WASHINGTON STAR 21 MAY 1975 (22)

WILLIAM F. BUCKLEY JR.

Ford Acted Admirably In Ship Piracy Incident

The morning the marines were dispatched to Cambodia to free the pirated vessel and rescue its American crew, it happened that I was testifying, at the invitation of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, on the impact of detente on United States policy in the United Nations. Suddenly the charming chairman of this body, Sen. Sparkman of Alabama, zigged off the subject and asked: "What would you do, if you were in command, about the imprisoned ship in Cambodia?" To which I replied, with characteristic self-effacement, that if I were in command, there wouldn't be an imprisoned American ship in Cambodia. Having said this, I thought, really, that my reply sounded like unadulterated rodomontade and attempted elaboration.

Listen now to some hard facts about the Mayaguez affair.

The general feeling of exultation, outside the columns of those writers whose day is ruined by any successful American show of force, is endemic. It was a most cheerful antidote, after months of bad news. Peter Drucker wrote in a recent book that the only thing a government can do successfully is inflate the currency and make war. We had begun to doubt that it could even do the latter. But President Ford gambled — and he won.

But he was very very lucky. The marines might easily have landed on that little island only to find the American crew departed, destination unknown. If the FBI cannot find Patricia Hearst in our own country, it is unlikely that we could have found the 39 crewmen in Cambodia, a hostile totalitarian country whose leaders have been acting not only as Communists, but like the tribe that lost its head.

What, then, would we have done? What can one do to Cambodia? You could, without too much trouble, close down the port of Sihanoukville: we did that once. But this would have been at once a major international provocation with a long, long fuse, and a minor inconvenience for a country that could easily have been provisioned by its friendly nieghbor, North Vietnam, together with its satellite, South Vietnam.

Would we then have started mass bombing? Of what? There are a few airfields we could have dumped on, but there isn't, in Cambodia, that concentration of military fortifications that is specially vulnerable to our B-52s; besides which, action on such a scale would have required consultation with Congress, and before long, ambiguity would have set in — such ambiguity as surrounded the Pueblo incident and paralyzed Lyndon Johnson. And that was back before we repealed the Imperial Presidency.

The only way, then, to keep our ships from being pirated is to create an atmosphere in which it simply does not occur to any major power, let alone mini power, that these are games which nations can safely play. Henry Kissinger once told a friend that when the North Koreans shot down our spy plane over the neutral waters of the Sea of Japan, the Cabinet was summoned for a discussion of what to do. Nixon had been in office only a few weeks, and decided to temporize with North Korea rather than face the country with a split cabinet. On reflection, Kissinger said, it was clear that the North Koreans were testing the waters. It is not fantasy to say that what happened off Cambodia — and everything in between — might have been affected by our failure to react sharply — conclusively — against North Korea in January 1969.

The fact of the matter is that little countries like North Korea and Cambodia don't go about stopping Russian ships in the middle of the ocean and dragging them in. Well, you say, that is because they are natural allies. But little countries like Chile, and even bigger ones like Brazil, don't go out dredging the waters for Russian ships. It is not diplomatically cool to specify what happens to countries that try such imprudent things. It is better left to them to wonder what would happen, to know only that something quite dreadful would happen, so that the course of prudence is to respect the sovereignty of other countries. As I say, Cambodia wouldn't have tried it if, over the years, our foreign policy had made such escapades unthinkable.

Still, even in an adverse context, President Ford behaved admirably.

HOUSE DEFENSE DEBATE DRAWS ATTENTION TO MAYAGUEZ RESCUE

In House debate on the defense authorization bill last week, floor managers for the measure pointed to the rescue of the freighter Mayaguez off the Cambodian coast as evidence of U.S. strength and will that must be maintained.

Rep. Bob Wilson (R-Calif.), ranking minority member on the Armed Services Committee, declared that the Mayaguez episode should be "a signal to our friends and potential enemies." He added that it would be a "very reassuring" further signal if the House votes down any cuts in the authorization request beyond the $3.7 billion already pared off by the committee.

Armed Services Chairman Melvin Price (D-Ill.) said in his statement opening general debate that he would oppose further reductions because they would cut into the "muscle and bone" of the nation's defense. The Constitution requires Congress to provide for both defense and the general welfare, he noted, and "we can't pump continually from defense into welfare."

Wilson said he was "concerned over the attitude of some on the committee" that the panel had not cut enough from the request. He said he believed that, in fact, the committee might have cut too far, and the full House "perhaps" should add funds rather than subtract further.

Rep. Charles Bennett (D-Fla.), chairman of the committee's seapower subcommittee, praised President Ford's "positive and effective" action in the Mayaguez operation, and said it underlined the importance of maintaining the freedom of sea lines of transportation and communication, the "more important" assurance that international law will be upheld, and the necessity for strong nuclear-powered naval strike forces.

U.S. Naval Power Was Key

Bennett agreed with Rep. Samuel Stratton (D-N.Y.), a senior member of the committee, that the rescue off Cambodia was possible only because of the power and availability of U.S. naval force. He also concurred in Stratton's statement that the Mayaguez incident, together with the U.S. withdrawal of forces from Thailand at the request of the Thai government, argued for the Navy and Air Force to proceed with their plans to expand the U.S. installation on the British-owned island of Diego Garcia.

"Yes, I think that the modest extension of Diego Garcia is essential," Bennett said. (President Ford earlier last week formally notified both houses of Congress that he had determined that "construction of such facilities is essential to the national interest." The certification was required under a provision of the fiscal year 1975 military construction bill passed last year, before DOD could proceed with the work.)

The House was to wind up general debate on the authorization last week. Today, it will turn to consideration of amendments, including a substitute bill in the form of an amendment to be offered by six junior Democratic members of Armed Services, the "some on the committee" Wilson referred to, who voted against committee passage of the bill last week. The substitute would trim the request by $4.8 billion.

Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.) said in remarks prepared for delivery on the Senate floor that more than $800 million in outlays could be eliminated from the FY '76 defense budget by cutting or delaying the following from the DOD request: Airborne Warning and Control System (AWACS)--$285.6 million; Site Defense--$132.4 million; SAM-D missile system--$118.1 million; XM-1 tank program--$53.2 million; civil defense (non-personnel)--$72 million; and selective service--$47.9 million.

Cranston included these weapons programs in discussing a list of "debatable assumptions" during an appearance Wednesday before the Senate Appropriations defense subcommittee chaired by Sen. John L. McClellan (D-Ark.). He said these and other programs are included as necessities in the budget presented by the Defense Department, but should be studied further by Congress because "our national needs are too great, and our national resources too limited, to accept this huge Schlesinger turn-around budget uncritically."

Sen. Lawton Chiles (D-Fla.), who had also asked to appear before the McClellan subcommittee, said he agreed with those who want to cut the defense budget "to eliminate the still enormous waste and duplication. But I think we have to mature beyond 'knee-jerk' reactions that make the defense budget an annual whipping boy in some people's minds."

Sen. Henry Bellmon (R-Okla.) told McClellan that he believed that the Administration's request of $94 billion for FY '76 defense spending is "close to the absolute minimum the Congress should appropriate to help assure peace and stability in the world." At the same time, he said "the time has come for America to reassess our peace-keeping methods in an attempt to develop alliances and methods which will ultimately reduce the back-breaking costs for these economically unproductive military expenditures."

Ex-Officers Sue Over Early Discharges

39 Navy Men, 9 Marines Narrowly Miss Retirement Benefits

BY KAY COOPERMAN
Times Staff Writer

After 19 years, 8 months and 29 days of active duty in the Navy, Lt. Robert Ballard involuntarily became a civilian late last week.

He was passed over twice for promotion, and according to a federal statute, that is cause for discharge.

Thirty-eight other Navy lieutenants and nine Marine Corps officers have found themselves in similar positions, some having been discharged May 1, others awaiting their discharge some time before June 30.

All were just short of the length of duty required to receive retirement benefits.

But on April 7, the 48 officers filed suits charging that many of the promotion procedures employed by the Navy and Marine Corps are archaic and unconstitutional. Age discrimination also was charged.

Ballard, 37, an Alpine resident, thinks it is unfair that he should come so close to the 20-year mark and be discharged with no retirement compensation.

He first received his notice of discharge in 1972. At that time, he filed suit against the Navy on a sex discrimination charge.

A U.S. District Court issued a temporary restraining order allowing him to continue in active duty during litigation.

There are provisions in the U.S. Code guaranteeing women a minimum of 13 years in the service once they achieve officer status, Ballard said.

If this were applied to men, he argued, it would have enabled him to serve the 20 years required for receiving retirement benefits. He was victorious in the lower court, but lost when the Navy appealed to the Supreme Court.

Ballard said he became an officer in 1962 after seven years of enlisted duty because of the retirement program he understood commissioned service included.

"Having studied the normal promotion flow charts, based on the federal government's time and grade requirements," Ballard said, "I could anticipate 13 years in commissioned service before being eligible for lieutenant commander," the level of promotion for which he was just passed over. The 13 years added to his previous seven enlisted years would have given him his 20.

When Vietnam broke loose in 1964, the promotion schedules were accelerated and instead of the 13 years he thought he had coming to him before having to apply for promotion, he ended up with nine.

When he came before the selection board for promotion, it was peacetime and the Navy was cutting back on its officer corps.

Ballard said the selection board selected the most qualified men to be promoted. He added, "I'm not surprised I failed the selection" because of his age and relative lack of education.

He said he requested a transfer back to enlisted or reserve status so he could meet the retirement quota, but for unknown reasons his request was denied.

When Ballard received his discharge papers dated Thursday, the effective date was listed as June, 1972. This means the two years, 10½ months he served under the temporary restraining order had not been counted by the Navy for retirement purposes.

"It implies that I was retained on active duty pending some disciplinary action," Ballard said. Such a notation on his discharge papers, he expects, will hurt him in his future job hunting.

It was this point that caught the interest of U.S. Sen. John Tunney's aide in San Diego.

Jim Skelly is investigating the reasons behind the promotion failures and also the basis for including the information about serving time under a court injunction on the discharges.

Of the 48 involved, Skelly said, "They're all guys with outstanding military service." He thinks the reasons the officers failed to obtain promotions could center on their age.

The Navy and Marine Corps, he said, "are orienting the services now toward a younger, more stable officer corps."

"The situation is really awful. They're really patriots, these guys. They were working-class people who thought they were getting a good deal" when they enlisted, he said.

Peter Bowie, the attorney from the San Diego district U.S. attorney's office handling the Navy's defense, said he does not see any constitutional question or example of unfair play.

Bowie said the Navy followed statutes set down by Congress permitting little room for question. If anything, Bowie suggested, the officers should question the Congress on its statutes, not the Navy.

Congress, he continued, specifies the numbers of officers the different branches of service should have at each level.

As the level of officer gets higher, the number of men needed decreases, he said.

Once an officer reaches a certain level, he is guaranteed his 20-year quota and the corresponding retirement benefits. None of the 48 officers, he said, has reached this level and therefore, had no guarantee.

Bowie also pointed out that the Pension Reform Act of 1974, which decreased the minimum working years for private industry pension plans to 15, specifically states it does not apply to the armed services.

A lawyer for the officers, Lawrence Baldauf, said his case involves constitutional guarantees of equal protection under the law, as well as an age discrimination question.

Baldauf said he believes the Pension Reform Act should apply to servicemen as well as private workers based on the constitutional guarantee of equal protection under the law.

Other causes of action he lists include the fact that officers are not given the opportunity to plead their cases before the selection board and that their failure to obtain promotion was based on "dollars and cents" (referring to the peacetime cutback) and not on the officers' fitness.

Concerning the age discrimination charge, the Navy said the percentage of officers in line for promotion with "birthdates of 1940 or earlier" is similar to the percentage of those in that age group who received promotions.

"The selection percentages are essentially the same, indicating no discrimination by the selection board because of age," said naval headquarters in Washington.

The $16.8 million suit ($350,000 per officer) is filed in federal court in San Diego where the already delayed initial hearing is scheduled today. All parties involved expect the suit to take several years.

NEWPORT, R.I.—A U.S. Immigration officer yesterday said some of the 20 Cambodian naval officers who seek political asylum apparently have been offered jobs and places to live in the United States.

The Cambodians, all lieutenants junior grade, have completed an 13-week course at the International Officer Candidate School at the U.S. Naval Education and Training Center. They were stranded here after Cambodia toppled to Khmer Rouge insurgents last month.

AF chief says air power stall U.S. mistake

By JESSE HENRY JR.

Frequent restrained use of air power translated to the enemy a lack of decisiveness in the Vietnam War and was thus a mistake on the U.S. military's part.

That observation was put forth Saturday by U.S. Air Force Gen. George S. Brown, chairman of the joint chiefs of staff.

The general apoke at the annual awards dinner for the Order of Daedalians, a national fraternity of military pilots. About 400 members and wives attended the banquet at Villita Assembly Hall.

"Our repeated bombing pauses, which were politically designed to give the leadership in Hanoi an opportunity to alter its course, were instead taken by the enemy as evidence our leaders were not sure of their strategy," Gen. Brown said.

He noted that such "restrained use" of air power was not only politically ineffective but also in violation of basic militatry principles.

"But once the rules that restricted its employment were relaxed . . . air power contributed decisively to the negotiations which led to the return of our prisoners and ended our direct participation in that tragic war," Brown commented.

He said although it is our country's national objective to "deter any and all wars," "we must maintain a strong and effective defense structure.

Brown explained, "The principal burden of maintaining a worldwide military balance, which is the basis for the security and survival of the free world, rests squarely on the United States."

The U.S. currently has formal commitments for mutual defense with 41 nations either by multi-lateral or bi-lateral agreements, the joint chiefs head said.

Concerning U.S. trustworthiness abroad as an ally in the wake of the Southeast Asia tragedy, Brown offered:

"In my opinion, we have got to face this issue head on and re-establish our national credibility with our allies, with our adversaries and especially ourselves."

We must begin to do this, he urged, by building up our economic and military strength with allocation of the "necessary share of our gross national product to national security."

Hill Bides Time As Martin Rests

By Henry S. Bradsher
Washington Star Staff Writer

The last American ambassador in Vietnam, Graham A. Martin, is going on vacation in Europe and has not yet decided when to come back to the United States.

Some members of Congress have expressed interest in questioning Martin on the way instructions from Washington were carried out in the final days before Saigon fell. Handling of the evacuation has been particularly controversial.

But staff members on both the House International Relations Committee and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee say that no formal request has been made from Martin to appear on Capitol Hill.

As U.S. officials who worked under Martin in Vietnam trickled back to Washington, harsh comments are being heard about the ambassador's direction of American affairs, especially in the final weeks from the Communist capture of northern South Vietnam until the American evacuation April 29.

ONE OFFICAL said yesterday he was bitter about the failure to make arrangements for the evacuation of Vietnamese who worked for the U.S. government. Only about one-third of those under his supervision who had wanted and expected to be evacuated were taken out.

Other stories which have come out involve delays in making evacuation arrangements until it was too late to set up a workable plan. As a result, many Americans, including U.S. government officials, were left to their own devices.

Martin had already been controversial for the way he ran the embassy after becoming ambassador to Vietnam in June 1973. Some independent-minded American diplomats were replaced with sycophants, for instance, and Martin distorted evidence to protect the image of former President Nguyen Van Thieu's regime.

The Ford administration had thought to put all that behind it now to avoid a rehashing of what went wrong in Vietnam. The lessons have been learned, Ford said two weeks ago without specifying what the lessons were.

THAT DID NOT satisfy some members of Congress. But Congress has been absorbed lately in business which has been delayed by the long argument over extra military aid first for Cambodia and then Vietnam.

One congressional expert on foreign affairs said yesterday the Vietnam question might not be dead yet. When Congress returns from recess June 2, some members could raise again the question of Martin's conduct.

Martin is believed to have up to three months of accrued vacation time which he might now take. A spokesman at the State Department said the attitude is that Martin has earned a chance to relax.

"No one feels there is any pressure to have him come back — no one wants to push him," a spokesman said.

After he was flown by a Marine helicopter to a U.S. Navy ship in the South China Sea just before Saigon fell to the Communists, Martin went to the Philippines. He was reported recovering there from pneumonia and general exhaustion.

NOW HE HAS recovered enough to have gone to Bangkok.

As ambassador to Thailand from 1963 to 1967, Martin was responsible for making the agreements with Thailand that enabled the United States to use Thai air bases to bomb Vietnam, Laos, and later Cambodia.

Martin's old embassy in Bangkok is now having an awkward time over American use of those bases in the Mayaguez affair and is under pressure to close them.

Word reaching Capitol Hill was that embassy officials felt unhappy about Martin's presence at this time. He is unwanted there, according to this report.

The State Department said Martin is going to Europe soon. He owns a home in Italy, where he was ambassador from 1969 to 1973.

Some sources report that Martin hopes to be appointed to a new ambassadorship, although at the age of 62 and with 42 years of government service, he could retire.

HIS NOMINATION to another post would require Senate approval. That probably would reopen the argument which raged last month over his handling of affairs in Saigon. Senate members in particular were angered by his slowness in reducing the U.S. presence in South Vietnam when evacuation became a likelihood.

Because of the controversy, it was considered possible on Capitol Hill that Ford would decide not to nominate him to a new post.

The other American ambasssador who lost a country last month, John Gunther Dean, came home from Cambodia after the U.S. Marine evacuation from Phnom Penh. Dean had the normal State Department consultations after leaving an ambassadorial post and is to take vacation pending a new assignment.

Keeping U.S. troops overseas

The massive House vote against withdrawing 70,000 American troops from overseas was the right decision at the right time. It does not preclude reassessment or future reductions.

But the suitable moment for any reduction is somewhere down the road, beyond the world's shaky mood after the events in Indo-China. For Congress to support the administration in this reading of the situation is to signal all nations that the U.S. Government is united in the will not to abdicate its military role in the aftermath of Vietnam.

Certainly there must be understanding of the position of the congressional sponsor of the proposed cuts, Ronald Dellums. He argued that, in view of the nation's limited resources, the Congress ought to begin reducing American commitments abroad "to address mounting human problems at home." The President and Congress need to convey to the country that they are just as much concerned to meet these problems of their own people as they are to pursue national objectives overseas.

But the solutions to problems at home require security for the freedom to seek them democratically. To ensure this security, the House has ratified the administration view that now is not the time to cut 70,000 troops from the Far East, where it had been suggested that most of the cuts could be made. Nor would it be the time to cut American troops in Europe, as is perennially proposed.

In Europe withdrawals would need to be part of East-West "mutual balanced force reductions." Eventually America's allies should be able to take over more of the burden. But many are more hard-pressed economically than the U.S. at the moment.

They can become more effective by improving the quality of their effort, not simply adding troops (which West Germany could not do anyway without violating treaties). Standardization of military equipment in NATO could also enhance effectiveness and economy without adding men. The U.S. is increasing combat strength by converting some 18,000 noncombat slots to combat roles.

Meanwhile, through European buying of U.S. planes and other offsetting measures, the U.S. balance-of-payments problem in keeping forces in Europe is largely met.

Also part of the new context for American military decisions is the judicious rather than rubber-stamping manner in which Congress is responding to administration requests. It is not like the 1950s when there was a feeling of running scared and going along with all sorts of expenditures that are now seen to have lacked cost-effectiveness. The legislators support the B-1 bomber, for example, but they keep a rein on expenditures.

With the government united on defense objectives — but implementing them with a tough eye on any recklessness or waste—the U.S. could make this postwar period a model of peacetime military realism.

Terrorism in Iran

CHICAGO TRIBUNE
22 May 1975

Two United States Air Force officers were murdered in the streets of Tehran Wednesday, apparently by Iranian revolutionaries who want to drive a wedge between the United States and the government of Shah Reza Pahlavi.

This, at least, is the government's explanation, and there is every reason to believe it. The assassination was carried out by three carloads of gunmen as the officers were being driven to work at the American military aid mission, and was followed by an anonymous telephone call telling the Associated Press that the murder was "in retaliation for the execution of nine Iranian revolutionaries in prison last month."

The caller said that the murders were committed by the "Iranian People's Warriors Association" and that the shah is "a stooge of the Americans; therefore we murder Americans."

The Tehran murders came as Americans were being harassed in many parts of the world. Three American members of a zoological team have just been reported kidnaped in Tanzania, and in Laos two Marines and a civilian are being held captive by anti-American students. The only apparent link between the three incidents is that in all of them, the perpetrators seem to think that they can accomplish their goals, whatever they are, by using terrorist methods against the U. S.

The important thing for the U. S., therefore, is to do nothing to encourage this belief and everything within reason to prove that terrorism won't succeed.

We are cooperating with the shah because it is clearly in our national interest (and very likely the interest of most Iranians as well) to do so. This doesn't mean that he is our ideal as a ruler. He is widely accused of tyranny and cruelty; and while we don't believe all of the charges against him, neither do we wholly accept his reply that nobody is in jail except proven terrorists. We must add, tho, that the latest incident makes the shah's position more credible than it was before.

And so we must not allow this act of terrorism to deter us from the course we have chosen. Our relations with the shah should continue unchanged.

But neither should we allow the terrorists the satisfaction of seeing us defend whatever methods the shah may use to bring about justice as he would like to see it. He should certainly do all he can to track down and prosecute the assassins, as his government has promised to do. But to cooperate with the shah does not mean endorsing all of his procedures.

So if the culprits are found—and considering the reported efficiency of the shah's police this shouldn't be beyond their capacity—it will be in both the shah's interest and ours to see that the trial is held openly and honestly, so that the critics will have no occasion to charge a frameup.

Welcome to the Vietnamese

"To be honest is to realize that the ultimate measure of a man is not where he stands in moments of convenience and moments of comfort, but where he stands in moments of challenge, in moments of controversy."

It is now eight years since the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. spoke those words in behalf of putting an end to the Vietnamese war and to the suffering of the Vietnamese people. Now such a moment has arisen. The war has ended, at long last, and more than 125,000 of those people have fled to the U. S.

Fortunately, the better instincts of the American people seem to have triumphed over the initial hostility, with its ugly undertones of racial prejudice, to the Vietnamese. That could be seen in the 79-2 vote by the U. S. Senate for $405 million to aid resettlement of the refugees, the two dissenters being conservative Republicans Jesse A. Helms of North Carolina and William L. Scott of Virginia. Earlier, the House by a similarly overwhelming vote of 381-31 approved an authorization measure.

Now, with the announcement that as many as 15,000 refugees will be processed at the Indiantown Gap Military Reservation near Harrisburg, Pennsylvanians will have a challenge of their own.

The processing will be handled by Federal personnel, but the Shapp Administration is gearing up to help coordinate private aid in uniting refugees with American sponsors. Most of the refugees will be dispersed around the northeastern states, but it may not be amiss to note, as did Lt. Gov. Ernest P. Kline in making the announcement, that quite a few jobs will be created in renovating the federal military post and in taking care of the refugees. "I can only see from an economic standpoint positive things happening," he said.

We trust we all will see positive things happening also from a moral standpoint. This commonwealth was founded by refugees, and immigrants —English, Irish, Germans, Italians, Poles, Swedes, people of all races and religions — have contributed to it. These refugees, however, are a special charge on us, for most of them would not have fled their country had it not been for our intervention there. We owe them a welcome, as we owe it to our conscience.

Easing Up on Turkey

Monday's 41-to-40 Senate vote to lift the ill-advised embargo on military aid to Turkey is legislatively insignificant without House concurrence, which is ruled out in present circumstances. But half a congressional loaf is better than none as Turkey teeters between shortsightedness and wisdom in its policies toward the United States and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and toward a settlement with Greece and the Greek Cypriots on Cyprus.

The Senate action at least creates a somewhat more pleasant climate for Secretary of State Kissinger's visit to Ankara tomorrow, for a foreign ministers' review of the Central Treaty Organization. Ideally, the congressional gesture toward ending the three-and-a-half-month-old arms-aid ban could be followed by some Turkish movement toward a Cyprus agreement, justifying a House reversal on Turkish aid and greatly increasing this country's leverage for encouraging Cyprus concessions by the Turks.

This sounds too pat, and it is, especially since Prime Minister Demirel and his associates hold power by the slimmest of margins in Parliament and are in no position to take initiatives that might tread on the nationalistic, anti-Greek feelings of their constituents. But it should be evident, as Kissinger hears out the once staunchly allied Turks, that the playing of Greek ethnic politics by some congressmen not only hurts this country's effort to play a helpful role in Cyprus negotiations, but places the eastern Mediterranean flank of NATO in additional jeopardy.

The arms ban, besides, represents a disturbing commentary on the stability of the United States' relations with its allies in general. This is the worst possible time for the reinforcement of such doubts, following the debacle in Southeast Asia and the widespread questioning of the reliability of American commitments. It is too bad that Kissinger, on his current trip, is not rid completely of the handicap that Congress unnecessarily placed the nation's policy under last February.

BALTIMORE SUN 22 May 1975

The Senate's Reversal on Cyprus

The Senate made a timely diplomatic gesture by giving its tentative approval to a resumption of arms aid to Turkey. Many strings were rightly tied to this reversal of position. Not only did the decision pass by only a one-vote margin, but the Senate acted in the certain knowledge that the House of Representatives will in no way go along until the Turkish government makes tangible concessions toward a settlement of the Cyprus problem.

Whether the Senate gesture will help break the impasse that has caused so much damage in the eastern Mediterranean remains to be seen. But it will not hurt. During the next three weeks all parties to the dispute will at last be talking, and talking in a way that could bring progress. Secretary of State Kissinger is in Ankara this week for a meeting of CENTO. President Ford is expected to confer at the NATO meeting in Brussels next week with Greek Prime Minister Constantine Caramanlis and Turkish Premier Suleman Demirel who, in turn, have agreed to meet face to face. Representatives of the Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot communities are to resume negotiations June 5 under the aegis of U.N Secretary General Kurt Waldheim.

The Senate vote should be a signal to all parties that the executive and legislative branches of the United States government are not themselves hopelessly deadlocked on matters of Turkish-Greek-Cypriot policy. Profound disagreements exist, to be sure. The majority in Congress is highly critical of Mr. Kissinger's whole performance—his coddling of the Greek colonels, his acquiescence in their abortive coup on Cyprus that led to their own downfall, and his failure to prevent Turkey from using U.S.-supplied arms on Cyprus itself. The Secretary, in turn, believes the Congress needlessly complicated a difficult situation by imposing its arms embargo in the November-February period. At the time the embargo was enacted, some Kissinger critics strongly suggested it would make Ankara more compliant. Instead, Ankara became more adamant in Cyprus negotiations and more insistent it would review its NATO commitments, including the status of U.S. bases on its territory.

If the Ankara government can find a way to relinquish its hold over a disproportionate sector of Cyprus and bring about the resettlement of tens of thousands of refugees made homeless by its military action, we believe the House might reciprocate by voting to endorse the Senate's gesture of goodwill. The United States and Turkey have a powerful common interest in maintaining the southeastern flank of NATO. This is vital to the U.S. position in the eastern Mediterranean and to Turkey's security from attack or undue political pressure from the Soviet Union. These considerations, and the humanitarian needs of both the Greek and Turkish communities in Cyprus, cry out for a solution.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR 22 May 1975

The closing of the newspaper Republica — the only Lisbon paper that has held out against Communist worker-group pressures — is an ominous indication of the ordeal that could lie ahead for free political expression and civilian democratic rule in Portugal. It is the kind of act that feeds concern in the West about intentions of Portugal's new leaders.

Republica editorially was the organ of the Socialists, the party which won the largest share of votes in last month's election. A dispute between the Communist-controlled printers union and Socialist editors on the paper was used as an excuse by the Information Ministry to "temporarily" sidestep the confrontation by closing Republica's doors.

The Socialists saw the move as another tactical loss to the Communists, who registered only half as many votes in last month's tally but have more influence within the ruling Armed Forces Movement. The Socialists' threat to pull their two ministers out of the government, because of the Republica seizure, shows just how serious the incident is.

A Socialist pullout would not have so much effect on the running of the government, which is effectively in the hands of the military men, as it would on the pact for public order among the parties during the current "revolutionary" phase. The Maoist faction in Portugal already is inciting demonstrations to challenge the military men's authority.

Within the movement itself a struggle is going on between leftists and moderates. Given this thick layering of political conflict in Portugal, a noncontrolled forum for discussion and information is essential. Communist usurpation of the media can only raise the temperature of civil frustration nearer the flash point.

The 'Z' List Gets Longer

The Export Administration Act of 1969 provides the United States with a powerful economic weapon—the authority to deny all trade to another nation.

As a kind of ultimate weapon short of war, this law, you just might think, would be reserved for significant threats to American security and sovereignty. But not at all. For the moment, at least, it is applied only to the relatively puny. Cuba, North Vietnam and North Korea are long-standing members of the "Z" list. Cambodia and South Vietnam were added Friday.

We wondered why.

There was a possible explanation for Cambodia. The secretary of state may have felt it justified by the Mayaguez affair.

But South Vietnam? And just after the rulers in Saigon had made a conditional proposal for opening diplomatic relations with the United States.

We called the State Department. Well, came an admittedly hesitant answer, didn't we understand that South Vietnam was a hostile regime?

An acquaintance who studies things like this had a more sophisticated explanation. Perhaps the State Department ordered the trade embargoes so that there would be something to negotiate away once Washington and Saigon get down to the brass tacks of whatever new relationship they are going to develop. The old bargaining-chips theory.

But we were not impressed.

In fact, we were left with a dull suspicion that Henry Kissinger was still having trouble with his priorities, the same trouble that led him to prolong too long the American commitment to Indochina.

The secretary of state and the President, too, have been concerned lest the American withdrawal from Saigon be misunderstood. They have suggested that they welcome the rescue of the Mayaguez as a fortuitous opportunity to demonstrate that "there are limits beyond which the United States cannot be pushed," as Kissinger put it.

We have thought the anxiety of the President and the secretary of state misplaced. It was not the American withdrawal from Indochina but the American commitment to Indochina that seemed most likely to telegraph to friend and foe alike a failure in the American evaluation of foreign policy priorities. That same failure seems reinforced by this arbitrary and unnecessary decision to prohibit trade with these battered, bleeding nations of Southeast Asia.

Furthermore, the sanctions against Saigon risk delaying the offshore oil development already started by Americans, a project of world consequence in the face of the global energy crisis.

If the United States wants to communicate its own self-confidence, its reliability as an ally, it should get on with the normalization of relations with all nations, including the small and desperate. To pour truck factories and computers into the Soviet Union while denying all trade with Vietnam is only to invite doubts about American leadership.

As President Ford himself told Congress April 10: "Our use of trade and economic sanctions as weapons to alter the internal conduct of other nations must also be seriously reexamined. However well-intentioned the goals, the fact is that some of our recent actions in the economic field have been self-defeating."

He was speaking of congressional limitations on Soviet trade. But he could just as well have been anticipating the additions to the "Z" list.

Beleaguered Bomber

Out once again come the axes that foes of the B1 bomber program are continually whetting. A liberal-consumerist coalition says it is mounting a nationwide campaign to do in the bomber once and for all. Common Cause, Americans for Democratic Action, Environmental Action and the National Taxpayers Union argue that the B1 is a waste of money, not to say a potential danger to the environment. Let us go on building B52's.

The cost of the B1, which is presently undergoing extensive flight testing, is for a fact monumental: About $65 million per plane in 1975 dollars and sure to get costlier with inflation.

Yet the money will buy a potent aircraft—smaller than the B52, more adaptable to short runways, able to deliver more than twice the payload. Moreover, it will be new; B52 technology dates back to the late 1940s and early '50s.

Congress, if it keeps its wits about it, will let the B1 program roar full speed ahead. No militarily consequential nation freezes weapons development, the less so in times of national danger.

Bad enough is that the United States, in the aftermath of Vietnam, must reestablish its military credibility, in order that the Soviet Union and Communist China may understand we are no more than ever to be trifled with. Worse would be for us, at such a time, to scrap the best, most powerful bomber Americans have ever designed.

The B1 has got to be built; and the sooner, the better.

A SIGN OF THE TIMES

The House has approved a $26.5 billion authorization for military arms procurement, handily beating back efforts by a die-hard anti-defense faction to make significant trims.

This is the chamber, filled with a "freshman class" of go-go liberals, which was boasting only last January about how it was going to tear huge chunks out of the Pentagon budget.

That feisty mood has pretty much evaporated in the wake of the Vietnam disaster and the worldwide nervousness about U.S. foreign policy that resulted from it.

In its place, we have a sober awareness of the international situation best expressed during the House debate by Rep. Robert Daniel (R-Va.), who said:

> "If nothing else, events of recent months should remind us that diplomacy, detente, peace and national security are all based on reality, and the ultimate reality is military power."

That it is, Congressman, that it is.

U.S. Role Still Strong

President Ferdinand E. Marcos is saying that the "national interest" of the Philippines may dictate that his country discard its mutual defense treaty with the United States of America and take over U.S. bases at Clark Field and Subic Bay. This is startling word from one of America's closest allies in the Pacific.

Or is it really surprising? The Philippines lie close to the hot breath of the Communist advance through Southeast Asia. After watching the performance of the United States as chief backer of the effort to stem aggression against Laos, Cambodia and South Vietnam, the Filipinos can hardly be blamed for wondering whether their "national interest" is really being served by relying on the Americans as defense partners.

This is typical of the quandary facing U.S. allies around the world. If they are thinking in the same direction as President Marcos, they are in trouble, and so are we.

Scores of countries around the world have entered into security arrangements with the United States which rest on the principle that our national interest runs parallel with theirs. Now they have seen the United States identify its national interest in the survival of South Vietnam, and then abruptly change its mind. If this leads many of our allies to consider going it alone—or even warming up to Communist powers seeking influence in their regions—it could be disastrous for them and disastrous for U.S. security as well.

Secretary of State Henry Kissinger is insisting that the "Basic cornerstones" of our foreign policy have not changed because of the Indochina debacle. "Our nation is uniquely endowed to play a creative and decisive role in the new order which is taking form around us," he says. He is right, in terms of the leadership which a country as strong as the United States is capable of exercising. However, the divergence that developed between the White House and Congress on aid to Vietnam, and other symptoms of weakness in our bi-partisan foreign policy, suggests we are faltering in our resolve to play the creative and decisive role in world affairs that history has assigned to us.

As an historian, Mr. Kissinger can see a "new order" emerging from the diplomacy of detente, from the new economic power of Western Europe and Japan, and from the aspirations of the Third World to accelerate their development by striking a better bargain for the resources they supply to the industrial nations. That view may be accurate, but it is by no means certain who will be in the role of architect for that new order.

One blueprint is that supported by American policy—nations working out their destiny within secure borders, striving to give their people the freedom, justice and the opportunity for self-determination. The other is the blueprint of totalitarianism sponsored by Moscow and Peking which locks people into systems not of their own choosing.

What Kissinger seems to be telling us is that we are at a watershed of our history and now, more than ever before, we must avoid any sign of weakness or vacillation in U.S. foreign policy when those ideologies are bidding to design the future.

Detente Is A Delusion

As we raise our eyes from the embers of Vietnam and look in other directions we must concur with the wag who said, "The whole world is a rat race and the rats are ahead."

A case in point is NATO, the grand alliance that has held Soviet imperialism at bay for 25 years. Now, NATO is in trouble, partly because of the dynamism of Soviet diplomacy and the size of the Soviet's military buildup, and partly because of misplaced American priorities as to the relative importance of the thing we call "detente."

The Soviet power has grown with almost dramatic speed. The Russians are spending more on military defense by far than the United States, and their progress is almost terrifying. They have developed a massive and modern fleet, and are procuring the bases necessary to make it a worldwide strategic force.

The NATO European command is now faced with a formidable force of 26,000 Warsaw Pact tanks, an array of tactical nuclear weapons and armies at least twice the size of the NATO forces.

NATO, itself, is in tragic disarray. Great Britian is impoverished, suffering brutally at the hands of a leftist government that is disinterested in defense. Portugal is turning slowly leftward, as is Italy. Greece and Turkey, former stalwart anchors of the NATO flank on the Mediterranean, are totally disenchanted. Turkey can no longer be regarded as a United States base in that area and Greece, suffering brutal internal political and economic problems, is about to leave NATO completely.

It is against this backdrop that the United States should hasten to re-examine its attitude on detente.

If our interest in mollifying the Soviet Union through detente suggests a corresponding disinterest in our relations with NATO, the alliance could very well collapse, with the NATO nations trying, one way or another, to accommodate with the Soviet Union.

It is time for the leadership of our country to see detente as an abstraction, simply a theatrical camouflage on the Soviet Union's part, for pursuing its political war.

Stripping off the camouflage, we see that detente did not keep the Soviets from arming the North Vietnamese in violation of the Paris Peace accord. It did not cause the Soviets to work for peace during the October, 1973, Middle East war. It has resulted in the two Strategic Arms Limitation meetings, SALT I and SALT II, which actually limited nothing and, since the Soviet Union is ready and willing to spend far more on arms than is needed for defense, it has moved her clearly into the position of No. 1 in the nuclear world. In that world, it might be observed, being No. 2 is no better than being No. 20.

Detente, it is plain, has helped our enemies and has done us no good whatever. Furthermore, it has shaken the confidence of our allies. Now, in the wake of Vietnam, we would be well advised to ask ourselves if it is not, in the long run, better to have a meaningful detente with our friends than a worthless detente with our enemies.

Soviets, U.S. Study Nuclear Options

By ROBERT BETTS
Copley News Service

World holocaust, with cities lying in smoking ruins, populations wiped out, perhaps a whole civilization ended—that is what nuclear war means to most people.

But what about a limited nuclear exchange?

"Unlikely, but possible," say Pentagon strategists.

"The likelihood of a nuclear exchange starting with a selective strike, however low, is still higher than the likelihood of such an exchange starting with a strike at the urban industrial centers of the United States," Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger has told the Senate subcommittee on Arms Control, International Law and Organization.

The hearing took place several months ago, but a report entitled "Briefing on Counterforce Attacks" only recently has been made public.

A limited attack might result in "relatively few civilian casualties," said Schlesinger — meaning perhaps a million or less, compared with the estimated 95 million to 100 million "prompt plus fallout fatalities" that would result from a massive strike.

Schlesinger told the committee: "The ability of the United States to respond to such an attack contributes to the deterrence of such an attack.

"If our only option were to be able to launch massive strikes against the Soviet urban industrial base, the Soviets in these hypothetical circumstances . . . might believe that the United States might be self-deterred and that, therefore, they could with relatively low risk selectively attack the interior of the United States.

"If the United States possesses the ability to respond in kind, then the Soviet planner is faced with the prospect that the United States would respond and leave him in a no-gain situation and, therefore, he would continue to be deterred. Deterrence remains the name of the game."

Schlesinger reported that the Soviet Union had proceeded with a set of development initiatives "that are surprising in their depth and strength. Their new land-based missiles possess throw-weights which on the average are three times that of the previous array of missiles.

"They appear to be acquiring on the order of 7,000 or 8,000 MIRVs (multiple independently targetable reentry vehicle) just in their ICBM (intercontinental ballistic missile) force, let alone their SLBM (submarine launched ballistic missile) force."

The Department to Defense also has information that "the Soviets have achieved or will soon achieve, accuracies of 500 to 700 meters with their ICBMs . . . that would repre-

Pacific Fleet Readiness Impaired, Admiral Says

By DAVE POLIS
Military Writer
The San Diego Union

HONOLULU — Pacific Fleet readiness remains impaired as a result of years of Vietnam operations based on expediency, the commander of the Pacific Fleet said, and the Navy is still attempting to return to good maintenance and overhaul habits.

Adm. Maurice Weisner said in an interview "We drove our ships at a tempo that they hadn't been designed to be driven from the standpoint of repair and spare parts, and it meant we didn't have the normal time in shipyards and for other repair activities."

HABIT FADES

Weisner, who commanded the 7th Fleet and was Yankee Station commander in 1969, recalled the Navy was forced to defer a great deal of maintenance and overhaul, and "we sort of got out of the habit of good operating procedures that we have used over the years.

"Now we have to get back to good procedures of maintenance and operations — and we are doing that

"Readiness is being improved, but it is something you do not turn around overnight. It takes a lengthy period to correct things once you have a trend going that you do not want, and you have to reverse it," he said.

However, not all of the changes are within the fleet's budget. The Navy had to defer 10 ship overhauls during the current fiscal year because Congress eliminated money for them, a spokesman said.

Weisner said it takes six to 10 years to build a fighting ship, "and if something isn't appropriated by Congress to take care of inflation, then you have to eat that out of your hide."

Readiness of the Pacific Fleet also is being impaired by the lack of skilled petty officers, Weisner said.

"Certain ratings are perfectly satisfactory, but in other ratings like engineer and electronics operation specialists, we are in considerable trouble. The number of people in middle management rates in these areas is as low as 50 per cent of the need," he said.

Recent testimony by the chief of naval personnel, Vice Adm. David Bagley, indicated 42 per cent of fleet units were marginally ready or unready for combat in terms of personnel at the end of 1974.

The solution for the present, Weisner said, is to train men "faster than we would like to and try to get them up to a reasonable level of efficiency in doing their job."

A Navy spokesman said it takes six to 10 years to train a 1st class petty officer.

With less than desired manning, Weisner said, "you have to consider what you can do with your operational tempo. You might figure with no constraints, with optimum manning, you could operate "X" number of days, 24 hours a day, with no deferment.

"With a lesser number of people in certain skills you can't go that far, you have to reduce your operational tempo," he said.

The Navy has retired about half of its Vietnam-era fleet, prefering to use money saved on maintenance and overhaul of older ships to build a new fleet.

However, despite the new ships, aircraft and weapons systems being added as part of this modernization program, Weisner questions whether the Pacific Fleet will be able to carry out its mission in another five or six years.

"Even with the newer types of aircraft and ships," he said, "the Soviets are bringing in new types of equipment too.

"We can't assume that a small number of ships can achieve superiority and control. The problem is that while we are building new and good ships, the Soviets are building new, good ships at a much faster rate than we are.

"If this continues over a period of maybe five or six years, we are going to be in critical condition in so far as being able to defend ourselves in the areas of the world we feel we must."

Weisner said some of the new weapons will give the Navy new capabilities, while others will be " covering, to a certain extent, deficiencies."

Some of these new systems include the F-14 Tomcat, a twinengine, swingwing fighter-interceptor with a long-range missile system capable of intercepting enemy cruise or antiship missiles.

The Navy's new S-3 Viking carrier-based subhunter is described by Weisner as a "quantum jump" over the Navy's existing submarine patrol aircraft, the S-2 Tracker.

"Because of its radar, its speed and its ability to search out a given area in a shorter time, it has a volume of time to area capability five or six to one over other means," he said.

The F-14 is being introduced to the fleet at Miramar Naval Air Station, making its first deployment aboard the carrier Enterprise. The S-3 is being introduced at North Island, and is scheduled to make its first deployment in the Mediterranean aboard the carrier John F. Kennedy.

HARPOON TESTING

The Navy's long-awaited Harpoon antiship missile, to be put aboard virtually all surface combatants and many aircraft and submarines, is about to begin operational testing, the final step before McDonnell-Douglas Astronautics Co. of St. Louis begins producing operational missiles.

Weisner said the new missile will give surface ships their own offensive capability, and give operational commanders more freedom in using ships without the support of air cover from an aircraft carrier.

The Harpoon missile, in an encapsulated form, is being developed for use aboard submarines. Shot from a standard torpedo tube, it will give a submarine commander an antiship weapon with three times the range of the Navy's newest torpedo, the Mark 48, according to a spokesman.

Files Show Martin Waited Too Long

By Jack Anderson and Les Whitten

President Ford's own files dispute his statements and confirm our charges about Ambassador Graham Martin's handling of the Vietnam evacuation.

After we reported that Martin had badly 'botched' evacuation effort, the President defended him. Martin did a "good job" and directed a "successful evacuation," said Mr. Ford.

This is not what the confidential White House records show. We have had access to some of these documents. We have also interviewed key people who were involved in the evacuation, including some of the refugees themselves.

The President outlined his objectives at a secret strategy session April 9 in the conference room next to the Oval Office. His first concern, he said, was to save "about 6,000 Americans now in South Vietnam."

But he also declared firmly: "A large number of South Vietnamese have worked for the U.S. at great personal peril. Roughly 175,000 to 200,000 will be the first to suffer . . . I think here's a moral responsibility for us to help those people who helped us."

Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger, according to the confidential minutes, stressed that the "removal must be handled so as to avoid panic." He reflected the views of his man in Saigon, the implacable Graham Martin, who kept dragging his heels.

A few senators, privy to the developments in Saigon, became alarmed over the slow pace of the evacuation. In response to their inquiries, the President invited the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to the White House on April 14 for a briefing, which he stressed 'must be an executive secret] session."

"Mr. President," pleaded Sen. Charles H. Percy (R-Ill.), "could you order that every seat be filled on every outgoing plane?"

Mr. Ford said Kissinger had already given Martin orders that "should achieve that."

"We felt the President should be sure through some agent other than Martin that your orders are being urgently carried out," interjected Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y). "Our first priority must be to bring every American out and such Vietnamese . . . as can be brought out."

"The orders that we have given will be carried out," the President promised. Then, referring to the Vietnamese, he pledged: "As far as I can, within the law, I'm going to do all I can to help those people . . ."

But it was too late; Martin had waited too long. He was unable to process all the Vietnamese who clamored to escape. The State Department, for example, wanted to cable Saigon a list of intellectuals who were vulnerable to Communist retaliation and should be rescued.

But Martin, incredibly, refused even to accept the list. He informed the State Department icily that the embassy was making the decisions and had matters in hand.

Meanwhile, on April 21, the Vietnamese who thronged outside the embassy to save their families were greeted with this poignant notice: "PETITIONS FOR RELATIVES. Due to the press of business, we have temporarily suspended acceptance of petitions for parents, brothers and sisters. DO NOT WAIT IN LINE IF YOU ARE HERE FOR THIS PURPOSE. We hope to be able to accept petitions for parents, brothers and sisters in the near future."

The next day, according to White House minutes, Kissinger reported that it was "not realistic to count on the release of large numbers of South Vietnamese."

There was little more President Ford could do except joke about the crisis. The confidential minutes quote him as telling about one man who "showed up with four wives."

"Which one do you want out?" he was asked. His quick response, said the President, was: "I want the youngest one."

There was nothing funny, however, about the scramble by desperate Vietnamese to get their loved ones on the exit petitions. The petitions provided spaces for the names of relatives. Refugees have sworn to us that U.S. embassy employees sold the spaces like carnival barkers.

This profiteering in human distress was done by the Vietnamese employees, seldom by the American staff members, according to the refugees.

One refugee's story is typical of the several we have heard. He asked us not to use his name, because he is afraid of the consequences. But he alleges that he had to pay $3,000, two-thirds of it in gold, just to be introduced to someone who could place him and his family on an exit petition. Then it cost him another $3,000 to be listed.

He was told to wait for a call. It came at 3 a.m. on April 27. He was instructed to have his family at the airport by 5 a.m. Yet the curfew didn't end until 7 a.m. Anyone appearing on the streets earlier could be shot on sight.

He bundled his family aboard a 7 a.m. bus for the airport, where he was told he had missed his flight and would have to return to the end of the line. It took some frantic arguing and appealing for him to get his family aboard a later flight. Since the $6,000 bribe money had wiped out their entire life's savings, they arrived in the United States penniless.

At a secret White House meeting on April 29, Kissinger reported that of the 175,000 Vietnamese whom the President had hoped to rescue, the paperwork had been completed for 130,000 but that only 45,000 made it.

It is clear from the available documents that the man who is chiefly to blame, as we have reported in previous columns, is Graham Martin.

sent about a fourth to a third of a nautical mile."

At the present time the Soviets have a couple of thousand warheads, Schlesinger said. He added: "As you look out beyond 1975 they probably will start a process of deployment of MIRVed missiles which we would expect to number about 200 ICBMs a year if they conform to previous trends. So, roughly seven or eight years from now they could have on the order of 7,000 MIRVed reentry bodies deployed."

Schlesinger admitted that the choice of U.S. targets the Soviets might choose to strike, should they wish to initiate nuclear warfare on a limited scale, is highly speculative.

"It does not seem unreasonable, however," he said, "to assume one of their major objectives would be to reduce the nuclear retaliatory capability of the United States . . .

"It is precisely because we cannot confidently predict the targets the Soviets might choose to strike that we emphasize the need for flexibility in our planning and our retargeting capability, plus the need for good command control and communications capability to permit ad hoc adjustments to the situation at hand."

The subcommittee also heard a discussion on the "bargaining chip" concept. Schlesinger explained:

"What I am saying is that there must be a functional relationship between the forces the Soviet Union deploys and the forces that the United States deploys; that they must recognize that if they take certain steps we will match them; and that, therefore, we have research and development projects in development which will give us the capability to respond to certain actions of the Soviet Union which we hope they will not take. If they do take these actions, then these projects will not be bargaining chips.

"We think we must be prepared to deploy these additional capabilities in order to maintain an appropriate balance, but we are prepared to renounce them if the other side reciprocates.

"We would hope they turned out to be bargaining chips and that both sides are willing to renounce their new programs."

The Defense Department wants it clearly understood, however, that it is not advocating a strategy which makes the initiation of limited nuclear war an attractive proposition.

"The point Defense Secretary Schlesinger's briefing is intended to bring home," it was stated, "is that the United States would be much worse off if it responded to a Soviet limited nuclear strike by retaliating against Soviet cities, bringing upon itself a Soviet counterstrike on U.S. cities . . ." (with resultant damage in the order of 100 million fatalities).

The Marine Corps Faces East

New Transatlantic Orientation for Corps

By JAMES D. HESSMAN
Editor-in-Chief

AFTER more than half a century of a conscious orientation toward conflict in the Pacific—the theater in which it has fought its last three wars—the Marine Corps has done a conceptual and organizational about-face and is now gearing its personnel and hardware for possible deployment in Europe, the Mediterranean, Middle East, Persian Gulf, and Africa.

The Corps' new eastward orientation, being conducted with little fuss and fanfare, results from a number of interrelated strategic, geopolitical, and economic considerations:

(1) During the peak of the Vietnam War over three fourths of the Marine Corps was committed to Southeast Asia. A more balanced worldwide USMC posture following withdrawal of U.S. forces from Vietnam was inevitable in any case.

(2) Even though the Marines are, as always, prepared for combat anywhere in the world, including Asia (again), the unhappy U.S. experience in Vietnam and Cambodia makes it almost impossible that any U.S. President could commit U.S. troops to a new Asian land war for another generation or longer. Recent headlines detailing the renewed traumas in those unhappy countries greatly exacerbate the already bitter divisiveness in U.S. political circles concerning American policy, past and present, toward Southeast Asia, and make it an even less likely future theater of operations for U.S. forces.

(3) Contrary to the thesis that generals are always preparing to fight "the last war," the Marines traditionally have tried to keep ahead of the game by using their between-wars planning and strategy to determine the most likely locale of, and prepare for, "the next war." As far back as the early 1920s, in fact, the Corps began laying the technical and doctrinal bases for the amphibious operations that might be needed in a war against Japan. The most likely sites of future conflict today, according to USMC position papers, "are in the NATO, Mediterranean, and/or African theaters." The Corps' outlook coincides quite happily, incidentally, with the views of Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger, who in his FY 1976 "posture" testimony before Congress candidly admitted that "With the end of our involvement in Vietnam the emphasis of our planning has shifted toward Europe. ... Most of our forces are or soon will be oriented toward a war in Europe."

(4) During the October 1973 Yom Kippur War the United States found its NATO allies not only unwilling to join with the United States in coming to the aid of Israel, but even, in several cases, so afraid of Arab oil retaliation that they would not permit the overflight rights necessary for the United States to transfer its own European-based equipment to Israel. Whether the U.S. or general European view was "right" is not important. What is significant for U.S. planning purposes is that the United States has been put on notice that U.S. forces may, despite existing treaties and fervent allied declarations of interdependence, have to go it alone in future crises. And if U.S. Army and Air Force units in Europe were again to be held in checkmate, the Navy and Marine Corps forces afloat, unhindered by geographical or treaty constraints, would once more have to serve as the leading edge of American naval and military power.

(5) The Vietnam experience has not only made it less likely that U.S. ground forces will be thrown into future

The Marines Deserve Better

The Marines were in trouble before their rescue of the Mayaguez. They still are. Despite their performance and their reputation, they continue to be budgetary stepchildren among the armed forces. They deserve better.

What they did last week in the Gulf of Thailand was a classic, romantic Marine operation. It was in fact a near duplicate of their role in the first naval battle in our history as a nation, the raid on New Providence in the Bahamas in March 1776.

As they stormed ashore at Tang Island last week, so they landed near Nassau then, capturing 88 cannons and a variety of other war booty from the British base. Through the Barbary wars, to the Mexican War, through the banana wars of the early 1900s, they were always there. And the reputation they built in those years has turned out to be a disadvantage in modern times.

The assumption became that the Marines were useful primarily to fight ill-equipped primitives in little sideshow operations to the main events conducted by the Army. The grain of truth in that persists even to this day.

Between the great wars, in the 1930s, the Marines perfected the techniques of amphibious warfare essential to winning World War II. In that war, their strength more than half a million, they were the spearhead of the advance toward Japan. Theirs was the most admirable record in Korea.

They developed the techniques of helicopter warfare while the Army was still scattering troops all over the landscape with parachutes. In Vietnam they held the northernmost end of the country through the years of toughest fighting.

Yet regardless of their battle streamers, despite the fact that they traditionally have loaded more men into their rifle companies and fewer into their administrative overhead than any other service branch, the Marines remain an afterthought when the Pentagon splits up its money.

In 1942, when Army infantrymen were using the new Garand rifle, the Marines still had the 1903-model Springfield. In Vietnam, when Army divisions were equipped with the new M-16 rifle, the Marines still had the heavier M-14.

Today, the Marines are still getting along with pre-Vietnam tanks, anti-tank and anti-aircraft missiles, while the latest versions of those weapons have been shipped to the nations of the Middle East.

That is one cause of faltering morale among many career Marines. Another factor is even more depressing and harder to solve.

The all-volunteer Marine Corps, now 196,000 strong, has been plagued by violence and crime in its ranks. Desertion is up. Serious racial problems rent units that survived in earlier tight places because of their close-knit spirit. These problems have created others, driving some career Marines to resign.

That was where the Marines stood before the fall of Vietnam. Under these discouraging circumstances the Marines have demonstrated again — in the Vietnam evacuation and in the Mayaguez affair — that they can fill the assignment they were given in 1947, to be the nation's first-line force in readiness.

They deserve better.

Asian conflicts: it also, it is hoped, served to thoroughly discredit the "gradual escalation" strategy of the Johnson-McNamara years. For both political and economic reasons it now seems extremely unlikely that the United States would at any time in the foreseeable future become involved in a protracted conflict anywhere in the world. Once again, the call to arms, if and when it should come, would go first to the "quick deployment" forces--Navy, Marine Corps, and Air Force (U.S.-based wings, particularly)--with most Army units held in reserve for commitment, if still needed, in the later stages of conflict.

(6) Soviet sea strength has increased in recent years to such an extent that in many potential combat theaters the best and perhaps only effective U.S. strategy might be, as in the 1958 Lebanon crisis, a sudden strike, force insertion, mission accomplishment, and, if possible, immediate withdrawal of all forces initially committed before any Soviet counter-reaction would be possible. Of interest here is not only Henry Kissinger's celebrated Business Week interview--"I am not saying that there's no circumstance where we would not use force ... in the Middle East"--but also a startlingly plausible combat "scenario" by "Miles Ignotus" ("Unknown Soldier") which appeared in the March 1975 issue of Harper's Magazine under the unusually straightforward title "Seizing Arab Oil": "There would be no friendly bases within easy reach. ... The first wave should include the combat echelons of one Marine division: 14,000 men, with one or two battalions amphibious-landed and the rest simply to be unloaded from aboard ship. ... On D+3 or D+4, the expedition [against Saudi Arabia, in the scenario outlined] would be reinforced with more Marines, the combat echelons of a second division. ... The two Marine divisions would come with their organic air 'wings,' no mean force: eight Phantom-fighter-squadrons, two reconnaissance squadrons, and another eight 'attack' squadrons, with light and not-so-light-bombers."

(7) Finally, a small but important political and psychological point: deployment of Marines, available, according to Defense Department "roles and missions" guidelines, for such assignments "as the President may direct," has historically been considered, whatever the legal ramifications, as an act somewhat short of war--perhaps because the Corps has so often been used for such peaceful purposes as evacuation of civilians and short-term protection of U.S. nationals and property, rather than as full-scale invasion or occupation forces. In today's tinderbox world it seems even more probable, therefore, that a commander-in-chief would prefer to use the Marines as his first, lower-key, option in a potential conflict situation.

The Cushman-Anderson Team

As a necessary first step to configure current and future Marine posture to the new realities of the post-Vietnam era, General Robert E. Cushman, Jr., USMC Commandant, last year assigned to his Assistant Commandant, General Earl E. Anderson, the important and extremely complex task of determining "the proper balance and structure of Marine forces for possible action in European, Middle Eastern, and African theaters, with a report to be rendered in early 1975."

The Commandant would have had a difficult time of it, incidentally, to find anyone better qualified than Anderson to carry out what is perhaps the most important restructuring and reorganization of the Corps since the end of World War II. A three-war combat veteran with experience in both the Atlantic and Pacific theatres; Anderson also had a background of assignments providing experience vital to the reassessment directed by Cushman. He had previously headed the Marine Corps Research and Development program as well as its personnel department. Further, as former Commanding General, Fleet Marine Force Atlantic/II Marine Amphibious Force (II MAF, consisting of the 2nd Marine Division and the 2d Marine Aircraft Wing), he was the field commander who actually triggered the current review and reorientation by initiating a series of messages in late 1971 pointing out what he considered to be the "lack of readiness [of II MAF] commensurate with deployment and war contingency commitments and the Mideast political situation."

(The last of the messages--described by "Head Shed" officers as "the first realistic report we ever received on a command's actual readiness status"--was sent to Headquarters USMC in early March 1972 shortly before Anderson became Assistant Commandant.)

The first order of priority in the still ongoing reorientation review had to be, of course, an upgrading of (aries Kissinger and Schlesinger) "the same priorities for men and equipment for II MAF" as for III MAF in the Western Pacific, then the forward edge of Marine Corps strategy and priorities. The result, and early payoff: By the time the October 1973 Yom Kippur War had started, II MAF was more ready than it had been at any time since the 1972 Cuban Missile Crisis, when it had mounted out prepared, if necessary, for an invasion of Cuba.

Some problems remained, however. Although II MAF readiness had improved steadily, the 2d Division and Wing were still only mirror images of the two Marine divisions and wings in the Pacific, "organized to fight well anywhere but not optimized or specialized for any one geographic area or type of warfare." And an analysis of the Yom Kippur War has made two points "crystal clear": (1) "The worldwide proliferation of more sophisticated armor, especially in the Middle East, indicates that the Marine Corps itself must place more emphasis on procuring new armor and anti-armor capabilities"; and (2) There is today, more than ever before, "an absolute need for fully integrated tank-infantry-air forces combined with maximum electronic countermeasures capabilities."

Shift to Armored Divisions

The Marine Corps has, of course, always prided itself on the close integration and working effectiveness of its air-ground teams, now supplemented by what Anderson describes as "perhaps the world's best airborne electronic countermeasures in the [Grumman-built] EA-6B [Prowler]." But each MarDiv is supported by only one tank battalion, and USMC studies of the type of war which might be expected in the European or Mideast theaters indicate that three or more tank battalions per division are needed--"making them, in effect, armored divisions."

In keeping with the Yom Kippur lessons, the 2d Marine Division has been given top priority for the new M60 tanks, now starting to flow into the inventory. The diesel-powered M60s, equipped with powerful 105mm guns, will replace the aging M48s, which are powered with highly inflammable gasoline engines and armed with less capable 90mm guns.

The 2d also has been given top priority for the much needed new anti-tank weapons which the Corps will soon be getting: the heavy long-range TOW, scheduled for initial delivery in the spring of 1976, and the lighter Dragon, which starts into the inventory in the summer of 1976. An increase in the number of M60 tanks for the 2d, beyond the division's currently approved one battalion of 70 tanks, is also being studied, as are increases in the division's planned TOW and Dragon allocations. Also under consideration are: (1) an increase in the number of Marine Corps Reserve tank units--which, as Anderson points out, "will be [in event of conflict] the initial and primary augmentation for the active forces"; and (2) equipping MCR tank units, in any case, with the new M60s or with modernized M48s, retrofitted with diesel engines and 105mm guns. (Unlike the Navy, which has given short shrift to the Naval Reserve, the Marine Corps has been praised for consistently buying new weapons and other equipment items in quantities sufficient for Reserve as well as active duty forces.)

To support its highly mobile tank forces, two six-gun medium self-propelled 155mm artillery batteries also have been added to the 2d Division. Current plans call for the 155s to fire the new CLGP (cannon-launched guided projectile), which will be directed against tank or bunker targets by the even newer MULE (modular universal laser equipment). The CLGP and MULE are not yet operational, but the Corps is supporting accelerated development and procurement of both systems.

Eight Minute Response

Aviation anti-tank capability also is being upgraded. The AV-8A Harrier V/STOL (vertical/short takeoff and landing) attack fighter is already proving to be an effective anti-tank platform with its varied assortment of guns, rockets, and both free-fall and guided bombs.

A long-time AV-8A supporter, Anderson is particularly appreciative of the "quick response time" made possible by the Harrier's vertical takeoff and landing capabilities, which enable it to be based far forward in any combat zone.

"This is extremely valuable against fleeting targets such as rapidly moving tanks," Anderson pointed out. He revealed that "response times of as little as eight minutes [vs. over 20 minutes in Vietnam] from mission request through aircraft launch and target attack have been attained" by the Harrier, noting at the same time that, from the combat Marine's point of view (and in answer to the charge sometimes made that the Harrier has "a limited load"), "It is more effective to get 3,000 pounds of ordnance on a fleeting target in ten minutes than 10,000 pounds over the target area 20 to 30 minutes later when the target has dispersed or disappeared."

The first USMC Harriers were assigned, incidentally, to the Corps' Mediterranean (Sixth Fleet) MAU (Marine Amphibious Unit) "to determine their feasibility and supportability in the NATO/Middle Eastern environment."

Aiding, abetting, and augmenting the Harrier's own unique capabilities are a number of other new aviation-oriented support hardware systems, such as Marine-invented lightweight airfield matting, a portable aircraft refueling system -both in demand by other services -and other portable airfield equipment items. Also coming along is the AH-1J Huey Cobra attack helicopter which will be armed with TOW anti tank missiles. (The versatile and highly effective TOW, which the Marines need in large numbers, is also being considered for use on the LVTP-7 amphibian tractor.)

ANGLICO, MACCS, and MTDS

As they have for over a generation, the post-Vietnam Marines are also laying heavy emphasis on reliable, secure, "real-time" communications. The overall command and control system, MACCS, a still-evolving system which now integrates the top Marine air command, air defense fighters, and anti-aircraft missile defense, will in its later stages of development also bring under the same C&C umbrella a variety of close air support, helicopter operations, radar-controlled blind bombing, and air traffic control systems. In addition, MACCS provides C&C links for the Marine ANGLICO (air-naval gunfire) liaison company, which permits integration of naval gunfire and II MAF to bring that East Coast-based division/wing team (with some elements always in the Mediterranean) to the same level of readiness as I MAF (based in Southern California) and III MAF (Western Pacific). That part of the program now has been largely completed -although much still remains to be done, particularly in the hardware area, to complete upgrading of all USMC ground divisions and air wings, both active duty and Reserves. In an interview with SEA POWER, Anderson elaborated on the specifics of what already has been accomplished, and what remains to be done, in a number of hardware and personnel areas. What follows is the gist of that interview, supplemented by input from various USMC "think pieces," "position papers," and other documents.

During the Vietnam War, as Anderson reported in his EMELANT messages, "Personnel and material readiness of II MAF units had been sacrificed to a goal of higher readiness for Pacific forces." On 18 April 1972, Cushman approved (in consonance with and, in some respects, in anticipation of, the policies later enunciated by Secretary Schlesinger) the transfer of the Marine Corps' primary mission from amphibious assault to close air support with Army and allied forces.

The heart of MACCS is the MTDS, or Marine Tactical Data System, which the ubiquitous Anderson ten years ago -as a colonel assigned as the first Marine weapons system project manager -godfathered to outstanding success. An MTDS unit installed on Monkey Mountain near Danang proved its worth during the 1972 North Vietnam Easter offensive by coordinating the complex and multi-faceted operations of South Vietnam's air and ground forces, U.S. Navy gunfire support ships and air support aircraft, USAF aircraft, and USMC helicopter and attack aircraft units. The MTDS was then, and still is, the only C&C system which could coordinate air, ground, and naval operations of all U.S. and allied forces.

Togetherness in Training

At the same time the Corps has been adjusting its equipment requirements, it has also been reorienting its training, with the heaviest emphasis on tank and desert exercises to familiarize units with the type of conflict situations most likely to be encountered in Europe or the Mideast.

Cold-weather training, for a Northern Europe scenario, also has been stressed -at Camp Drum, N.Y., for example, on the coast of Maine, and in the 1972 multi-nation NATO "Strong Express" exercise in Norway and offshore waters. The use of combined arms—tank, aircraft, and infantry units working as a team—is the invariable rule. "Tanks and infantry together," the Marines say. "The October 1973 War showed us tanks by themselves aren't enough; you also need the infantry, working with the tanks."

In keeping with the Schlesinger-directed emphasis on service "interdependence," Marine personnel and equipment are now often flown, under the interservice Joint Airborne and Air Transportability Training program, to assigned training areas by Air Force C-5 and C-141 heavy transport aircraft (augmented by USMC C-130s).

The increased Marine use of airlift, which again illustrates the current emphasis on rapid response capability, serves also to relieve the current U.S. sealift shortage -of which all Marines are keenly aware, but don't like to talk about (not for the record, anyway).

Schlesinger on Sealift

Schlesinger is not so reticent, however. In his FY 1976 "posture" testimony he spells out the current unsatisfactory situation: "The present amphibious force of 65 ships has sufficient capacity ... to transport simultaneously the assault elements of slightly more than one Marine Amphibious Force (MAF), i.e., one Marine division/wing team and supporting elements. Our amphibious shipping, however, is about equally divided between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. Thus, to conduct a single MAF-size lift ... it would be necessary to shift half of our amphibious shipping from one ocean to the other. Moreover, about 15 percent of the Navy's ships are in overhaul status at any given time and thus are not immediately available."

The unstated implication: The Navy could not, at present, conduct even a half-MAF lift on short notice in either the Atlantic or Pacific theaters. If the previously cited "Miles Ignotus" Saudi Arabia two-MAF contingency plan (written long before the Faisal assassination and its still unknown but potentially explosive aftermath) has any validity, it is obvious the Navy has less than one-fourth the amphibious lift capability which it might need in a Mideast or Persian Gulf emergency.

There is help on the way, if still over the horizon, in

The POWs

When future historians set out to trace the course of the Vietnam war they may find that a definitive turning point was reached during a few months in mid-1966. From that point on the men of Hanoi must have realized that they could not lose. It is worth rehearsing the events of those months for they explain a great deal about the agreement that was reached in 1973.

In mid-April 1966 the Strategic Air Command was given a chance it had been seeking for the past several months—the B-52s would now be making regular bombing runs over North Vietnam. The air force would have a chance to demonstrate that it, too, had a role to play in "limited war." The awesome power of the "Flying Fortresses" was soon demonstrated; in late June the bombers struck oil installations in Hanoi and Haiphong. Damage was heavy and by no means confined to the primary targets. There were civilian casualties; there were losses of planes and crews. Two weeks later Hanoi announced that captured American airmen were to be tried as "war criminals." A massive campaign was promptly launched from Washington to apply pressure on the North Vietnamese to call off the trial. A mixed but impressive bag of international leaders administration officials, American pacifists, a score of "doves" in the Senate, the Pope and U Thant appealed to and/or warned Hanoi. By the end of July Ho Chi Minh announced that there would be no trial.

The Americans had won the battle of the war crimes. But in the process the North Vietnamese had gained a critical piece of intelligence: American prisoners were an extremely important weapon. And as the war went on and the bombing of North Vietnam intensified, more airmen were taken captive.

The North Vietnamese exploited their growing arsenal with great skill. By ignoring the terms of the Geneva Convention, even to the point of refusing to release a list of the prisoners they held, they fueled American anxiety. By exhibiting a handful of POWs to selected foreign visitors, they fed a growing popular determination to extricate the captured men.

During the summer of 1968 the POWs were playing an important, if unwitting, role in American politics. And the issue of a prisoner exchange became a principal point on the negotiating agenda of the American delegation to the peace talks that were just starting in Paris. By 1970 freeing American prisoners became, paradoxically, a reason for continuing the war.

This was Henry Kissinger's legacy as he began his secret meetings with his counterpart from Hanoi. By the autumn of 1972, with a presidential election at hand and another wartime Christmas looming, the 500 American POWs must have provided considerable negotiating leverage for the North Vietnamese. The meetings in October came to naught, but when they were resumed after the first of the year, progress was swift and a cease-fire agreement emerged late in January. The last contingent of American troops and the POWs were soon on their way home. But remaining behind in Vietnam—were 150,000 North Vietnamese soldiers—almost 100 times the number there when the United States first became militarily involved, eight years before. The cease-fire arrangement was, at best, a fragile one; only the hopelessly naive would have expected either Hanoi or Saigon to observe it, or the puny International Commission to enforce it.

Americans have a right to be saddened, but not surprised by what has happened. Saigon's chronic inability to attract the support of the Vietnamese people made the Communists a long-term favorite in the ultimate outcome. And the outpouring of American concern for the POWs gave Hanoi a tremendous negotiating advantage in the contrived "peace."

There is a somber lesson for Americans in all this: we must recognize that American military assistance cannot compensate for fatal political weaknesses. And before we once again commit our troops to battle, we must reckon the total cost of war: the maimed, the dead—and the prisoners

Chester Cooper, a former State Department official, was involved in the Vietnam peace negotiations

the form of the LHA (multi-purpose amphibious assault ship), SES (surface effect ship), and AALC (amphibious assault landing craft) programs. With Cushman leading the cheers, the Corps strongly supports, and would be happy to accelerate, all three programs. The first LHA is expected to be delivered to the fleet in September 1975. The fifth, and last—the originally planned nine-ship buy was cut to five "for budgetary considerations"—won't come into the inventory, according to Schlesinger, until FY 1978, "about 44 months beyond the original delivery date." When all five LHAs finally are operational, the Marine forces afloat will have the best amphibs in the world supporting them. But they'll still be grievously short of the total sealift they really need.

'Terrific Boats'

The SES and AALC programs, further down the road, show even greater promise. "Using surface effect ships," Cushman pointed out in the May 1974 Naval Review (published annually by the U.S. Naval Institute), Marine and other U.S. forces "could respond to crises four or fives times faster than they can now—arriving at some of their destinations within hours, instead of days or weeks." In today's onrushing world such accelerated response time, of course, might well mean the difference between mission failure or success.

The Marines are just as strong on the AALC: "When we get those machines [test-craft AALCs now being developed by Aerojet General and Textron's Bell Aerospace Division] —and they're both terrific boats—we'll be able to project a ship-to-shore movement at 50 to 60 knots instead of eight," Anderson points out. "In addition, using air cushion landing vehicles would open up 70 percent or 80 percent or more of the beaches otherwise unusable by standard landing ships and amphibian tractors—which makes them almost impossible to defend against. Also, they can move across most beaches and inland to unloading points, which means no more of that logistics congestion along the beach line which has fouled us up so many times in the past."

Whether, and how soon, the Marines will get the additional lift needed will be up to the Navy Department, Defense Department, OMB (Office of Management and Budget), White House, and, eventually, Congress. But in the meantime the Corps is moving along on its own at flank speed in preparation for the next crisis, the next contingency, the next emergency, and, if need be, the next war.

And now it is also looking East as well as West, toward, among other places, the Shores of Tripoli, where in 1804, barely six years after their post-Revolutionary War reconstitution, the fledgling Corps fought and won against the Barbary Pirates who had been plundering American and European merchant ships during the Napoleonic wars. ■

Sweeping Change in U.N. Is Urged by World Panel

By KATHLEEN TELTSCH
Special to The New York Times

UNITED NATIONS, N. Y., May 20—A 25-member international panel has recommended sweeping changes in the structure of the United Nations to improve its handling of economic issues and increase cooperation between rich and poor countries.

Its recommendations marked the first such major attempt at fundamental change since the world organization was formed 30 years ago.

Its recommendations marked the first such major attempt to revise the United Nations since the world organization was formed 30 years ago.

The panel's report, entitled "A New United Nations Structure for Global Economic Cooperation," was presented today to Secretary General Waldheim. He said that this was "a historic moment in the life of the United Nations."

A major innovation suggested by the panel, consisting of one expert from each of 25 countries, including the United States and the Soviet Union, was a revamping of the present decision-making process, which has led in the last year to confrontation and deadlocks between the rich and poor members in the General Assembly.

Instead of voting showdowns in the Assembly, where the developing third-world countries easily outnumber the industrial powers, the group recommended an intricate but still imprecise process of negotiating disputes to get agreements by consensus within the Economic and Social Council.

However they ruled out any proposal that would require a revision of the United Nations Charter, clearly because they saw no prospects for agreement at this time, especially from the big powers.

The panel's report is expected to be taken up at the special General Assembly session beginning Sept. 1. But it appears to face an uncertain fate because its recommendations are not likely to satisfy either the minority of industrialized countries or the majority of developing nations that have demonstrated here that they can rush through resolutions supporting their demands for a larger share of the world's resources.

However, the high caliber of the experts, each nominated by the government of the country represented, suggests that the recommendations will get serious study from the 138 members of the United Nations. An American official said that the United States intended to give the report its closest attention. But he declined to comment on the recommendations beyond saying, "They pose some problems."

One of the recommendations that are expected to stir controversy calls for revising the present voting system in the World Bank and International Monetary Fund to provide greater decision-making power for the developing countries. The existing weighted voting arrangement now gives the United States a veto over some decisions and heavy influence on lending policies.

The panel calls for the creation of a new post of Director General for Development and International Economic Cooperation that would be second in importance only to that of the Secretary General. It would go to a citizen of one of the developing countries when the Secretary General was elected from a developed country.

The panel implied that the new Director General would outrank the heads of the 15 specialize agencies in the United Nations system, such as the Food and Agricultural Organization and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization.

Criticizing the fragmentation of aid programs currently funneled through 23 separate funds, the report advocated that they be merged into a single United Nations Development Authority—dubbed by some panelists as the "tunnel of funnels."

The amalgamation contributions now going for population control, food assistance, environmental protection and other activities would give the proposed new authority a half-billion yearly to disperse to needy nations. The United Nations Children's Fund would remain separate.

The authority would be headed by an administrator who also would serve as one of two deputies to the new Director General and would be selected from an industrialized country.

It was expected that there would be a vigorous lobbying against the proposal for a new Director General and the Development Fund—this coming from the heads of United Nations agencies who would see their authority threatened.

Role of Existing Agencies

Under the recommended changes, each agency would keep its autonomy but become less involved in running projects in the field and act rather as a standard-setter.

Some of the recommendations, such as the appointment of a new Director General, were proposed for action at the Assembly this year; others were not expected to be taken up for two to five years. Among these was a recommendation that an International Trade Organization be established.

Although the 25 panel members signed their report as individuals—meaning they did not signify their governments' approval — their conclusions would be expected to carry some weight since 19 hold government positions, two at cabinet level.

The panel chairman was Al-Noor Kassum, a Tanzanian lawyer-economist. The Soviet member was Aleksond A. Molchanov, head of the Soviet Foreign Ministry's Department of International Economic Organization.

The American member, Richard N. Gardner, Professor of Law and International Organization at Columbia University, served as rapporteur of the document, drafter over an eight-week period.

Copies have not reached delegations, but one panelist predicted it could run into strong opposition from the United States on several counts, but particularly because of the idea of having a third-world representative serving in the second highest post in the United Nations hierarchy — he would be selected by the Secretary General with the approval of the Assembly.

Other saw prospects that the third-world countries would negotiating procedures, seeing a threat to curb their numerical voting strength, although the report stipulates that the Assembbly could go on voting resolutions as long as it "takes account" of the private conciliation efforts being tried elsewhere.

The panel's work was authorized by a General Assembly resolution of January, 1975, requesting that it propose structural changes to make the United Nations system "fully capable of dealing with the problems of international cooperation."

The resolution called for a broad geographical representation on the panel, which was appointed by Secretary General Waldheim on the basis of nominations by governments. China was offered a seat on the panel but declined.

The panel sought through its recommendations to enhance the standing of the Economic and Social Council, which is listed in the Charter as one of the major organs of the world organization. However, it has not enjoyed high prestige. The most recent session was marked by high rates of absenteeism among the 54 members.

In its efforts to steer away from the voting contests that split the Assembly membership into seemingly that the Council establish small negotiating groups to deal in private with deadlocked key issues. None such might be the continuing dispute over compansation for nationalized foreign properties —an issue that brought on a major dispute at the late Assembly.

The small groups would include representatives of the countries most deeply involved and would be headed by a prominent individual who would devote full time to trying to bring about agreements, traveling as necessary between capitals and serving, as one official suggested, as "a Kissinger for economic, instead of political, disputes."

Each such negotiating effort would be limited to one or two years, but several could be tackled simultaneously.

The panel also advocated a major overhaul of the Economic and Social Council to abolish at least eight of its subsidiary commissions.

The commission on the status of women would be eliminated along with the commissions on population, social development and natural resources. The Human Rights Commission would remain.

The business formerly handled by the others would be dealt with directly by the Council, thereby avoiding duplicating debates.

In support of such streamlining the panel report said that the Council, as it currently operates, "lacks the necessary degree of authority" and has become bogged down by unmanageable documentation.

As part of the proposed structural change, the panel recommended that the Council be given a new role in organizing the economic matters dealt with by the Assembly.

They proposed that the Assembly's Economic Committee be renamed the Committee on Development and International Economic Cooperation, and that it take on all items currently discussed by the Social Commitee that concern development. The Social Committee would be left mainly with human rights matters and humanitarian questions. Each has a membership of 138 countries.

In the field of trade, the experts proposed a gradual phasing out of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, which was organized in 1964 by the poorer

And the Dominoes Fall

Senior Political Analyst

The full impact of the humiliating defeat of the United States is being felt quickly in all of Southeast Asia.

Perhaps never in its history has the prestige of this country—and the trust of other nations in it—been so devastated.

Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger's statement that the United States had obligations of a "moral nature" to defend Thailand was met with scorn in Bangkok.

At the same time, the government of the Philippines was showing equal contempt for the confidence that could be given the United States in future dealings. In Bangkok, Schlesinger's statement drew this comment from Foreign Minister Chartchai Choonhavan:

"Moral? The United States does not have any morals at this point. They have already pulled out from Cambodia and South Vietnam, so we are going to have to depend on ourselves. . . ."

THAILAND IS now under the gun of the Communists. This is a country that has been a faithful ally of the United States in its conduct of the war in Vietnam, supplying airbases and other facilities for our operations in that area.

But now it is a different situation. Thailand wants the 27,000 U.S. military personnel removed. The Bangkok government also is prepared to return military airplanes flown out of Vietnam to the new Communist government of South Vietnam.

In short, Thailand is preparing to come to terms with the Communists. It is abandoning its ties with the United States.

Shortly, we may face a similar situation with the Philippines and other nations in the area.

President Ferdinand Marcos of the Philippines has indicated that he feels that his country can no longer place trust in the United States, and in Manila the demands that U.S. installations including such important facilities as Clark Air Force Base and the Subic Bay naval base, be given up are gaining force.

Marcos, Chinese Ties

Meanwhile, Marcos is building up ties with the Chinese Communist government. His wife in the last week has been visiting there.

We may see in a very short time that our 50 years of rule over the Philippines, in which we endeavored to instruct them in the ways of democracy, were all for naught. Marcos is now a dictator.

Ironically, he assumed such a position, through imposition of martial law, in an effort to beat down Communist insurgents on Luzon and Moslem fanatics in the southern islands.

But the strength of the Communist movement in Indochina is bound to have profound effect upon him.

This was reflected Friday when the Philippines government announced that it will arrest military and government officials of the former South Vietnamese regime who come into American bases in those islands.

The announcement was more of an insult to the United States than an exercise in reality. The Filipinos do not have the capacity to move into an American base and make these arrests. And by the time they might act the South Vietnamese may well have been hurried on to Guam or some other destination.

Marcos, despite his earlier protestations of friendship for the United States, has always been an uncertain ally.

In 1965, we covered his campaign for the presidency against the incumbent President Diosdado Macapagal, in which Marcos won handily. At that time the United States was much interested in obtaining military support from other nations in the area. We queried Marcos during a visit to a small village in Luzon about the possibility of Filipino troops being sent to Vietnam.

He was evasive. But a few days later, after he had been elected, he reluctantly stated that some Filipino forces would be dispatched to Vietnam. It was months later that they arrived—and they were a small group of engineer troops who repaired roads.

AT THE 1966 Manila conference Marcos gave a superficial appearance of support for the American position in Southeast Asia, but at that time we were making headway against the Communist onslaught and our troop commitment was nearing its peak.

At this juncture, it would seem to be appropriate to rule out Thailand and the Philippines as friends and allies. The disaster of Vietnam is bound, we are afraid, to spread far beyond those two nations.

countries because of dissatisfaction with Western domination of the existing machinery for dealing with trade issues.

The work on trade and commodity agreements would go to the proposed international trade organization under the panel's recommendations the organization also might take over the work of GATT, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, which has been the major forum in which negotiations to lower tariff barriers have been conducted, particularly among the developed countries. The trade organization also might assume responsibility for commodity arrangements.

In proposing the new post of director general for development, the panel recommended that the duties include direct charge of the existing Department of Economic and Social Affairs—the largest in the United Nations— and that the present post of under-secretary general be abolished.

Proposed on Development Unit

The proposed United Nations development authority, it was recommended, should be managed by a small operations board of 18 to 27 members who would be "equitably balanced" between countries which are net donors to United Nations aid programs, including oil-exporter, and the net recipients of help.

Although the contributions would be collected in a single fund, the identities of some units would be preserved, mainly because it would assist them in fund-raising—as in the case of the environment and population funds. The staff of the environment agency would remain at the agency's headquarters in Nairobi.

No additional increases in personnel would be required to carry out the panel's decisions, the report said. However, its members advocated a major effort to improve staff personnel policies.

They urged competitive examinations for United Nations job candidates and the possible creation of a staff college for training officials from different agencies in the system. They also said that a unified system should be accepted for all employes in regard to recruitment and salaries.

They also favored employing more women in nonclerical positions and hiring younger applicants from all regions.

In an attempt to insure that action would be taken on at least some proposals without delay, the panel asked Mr. Waldheim to appoint a committee that would report regularly on the progress made in restructuring.

MORE STARS FOR LEONID BREZHNEV

Leonid Brezhnev's comrades have given him a new hat—that of a full general of the Soviet Army. At the Moscow V-E Day celebrations, Soviet President Nikolai Podgorny officially elevated the party leader to that rank. (He had once worn a maior general's stars as a political officer during World War II.) Washington experts read a nuance in the promotion: it confirms Brezhnev's status in relation to the armed forces—he now ranks among the most senior officers—and also within the ruling Politburo. Actually, as chairman of the Soviet Defense Committee, Brezhnev has been Russia's commander in chief since 1965.

John CHANCELLOR and Don OLIVER, NBC News, report on events in Laos. CHANCELLOR reports on the evacuation of 18 USAID employees out of Savannakhet. OLIVER reports that Laotian students still hold the USAID compound in Vientiane where two Marines and a communications specialist are holed up and that Americans in a housing complex are in effect prisoners. CHANCELLOR reports that Secretary KISSINGER told Turks that renewal of U.S. military aid hinges upon progress in Cyprus talks. CHANCELLOR and Catherine MACKIN report that 76 Senators signed a letter of support for continued military and economic aid to Israel. MACKIN reports on comments by proponents and opponents of the letter. CHANCELLOR reports that according to a Cairo newspaper the Soviets are in the process of obtaining bases in Libya and will grant them extensive military aid.

Walter CRONKITE and Maria McLAUGHLIN, both of CBS News, report on the letter of support sent by Senators to the President concerning military and economic aid for Israel. Ike PAPPAS, CBS, reports on a Pentagon assessment of the military capabilities of the Syrians, Egyptians and Israelis, comparing numbers of hardware and ground forces. He notes that the Pentagon weighs out in favor of the Israelis but are worried about an Israeli pre-emptive strike. CRONKITE reports that although KISSINGER is trying to reassure the Turks about U.S. trustworthiness, the Turks may be planning to close some U.S. bases.

Harry REASONER and Lou CIOFFI, both of ABC News, report on the situation in Laos. CIOFFI reports that the Laotian government seems unwilling to protect American citizens and their possessions and that USAID employees will be evacuated soon. Tom JARRIEL reports that according to Secretary KISSINGER the U.S. will drastically cut military and economic aid to Laos and will bring home most American citizens from Laos.

Lesley STAHL, CBS Morning News, reports on a survey of Vietnamese refugees on Guam taken by the Catholic Conference which states that half of the refugees there are illiterate and unskilled. Task force chief Dean BROWN did not confirm nor deny this. Hughes RUDD reports that the Iranian government knows who killed the two American officers in Tehran and are presently searching for the terrorists. Marvin KALB reports that Secretary KISSINGER has been reassuring the members of CENTO and that he is pleased that Syria renewed the U.N. peace force.

Lou WOODS, the "Today" show NBC TV, reports that NATO defense ministers are concerned about the southern flank of NATO, but that Secretary KISSINGER is trying to smooth things out with the Turks.

USAID Situation In Laos

JOHN CHANCELLOR: The rising tide of anti-Americanism feeling in Laos led the United States today to fly 18 Americans and a number of foreigners out of Savannakhet in Laos to the Udorn Airbase in Thailand. The group had been under house arrest in Savannakhet for nine days. Air Force 3-47s landed in Savannakhet to get them. Neither pro-Communist Pathet Lao troops in that town nor anti-American students interfered with their departure. In Vientiane the student protests kept up their campaign today to get the American Agency for International Development out of Laos and Don Oliver has that story.

DON OLIVER: The anti-American demonstrators still held the USAID compound in Vientiane despite the protests of U.S. Embassy officials to government of Laos officials. It was obvious the Laotian government will even want to do much about the situation. Pathet Lao soldiers have joined the protestors inside the compound. Two American Marines and one U.S. civilian communications worker were also in the building, but they were where the demonstrators couldn't get at them. From time-to-time one of the Marines could be seen on top of the building checking the ground below and radioing reports back to the U.S. Embassy. The demonstrators still were demanding that the property here be turned over to the Laotian government and that Americans in the AID mission be ordered out of the country. The students may not care much for Americans but they had obviously acquired a taste for American beer, looted from the commissary. The Laotian employees had done nothing. Finally a government spokesman held a news conference expressing regret for what had happened. But he said in effect that the U.S.AID mission in Laos is through. The Laotian government wants U.S. money but it wants it in direct payments. He said equipment and buildings should be turned over to the Laotians. About three miles outside of Vientiane is the American housing village where most of the USAID families live. The Laotian police force was not allowing any cars to leave. The 500 or so who live here were virtually prisoners for a time. Then the rules were changed, cars were allowed out after they were searched. Word came from the Embassy for all families here to get their health certificates up to date so they could leave the country. The families came through the gates in small groups and got their smallpox vaccinations and their typhoid shots. The American kids didn't seem to concerned about the situation, but inside the houses their parents were packing up as fast as they could. The U.S. Embassy hopes to bring a fleet of chartered planes in here tomorrow to begin evacuating the American families. A spokesman for the Embassy emphasized that only the USAID personnel and their families are going to be taken out, the U.S. Embassy staff will stay and they hope to keep the Embassy open. Don Oliver, NBC News, Vientiane, Laos.

CHANCELLOR: In Washington the White House said today that the uncertain situation in Laos has led it to cut back on aid to that country. But the White House added that despite American departures from Laos no full scale evacuation has been ordered.

Kissinger On Turkey

CHANCELLOR: Secretary of State KISSINGER is in Turkey today and he told the Turks that a resumption of American arms aid is dependent on progress on a settlement of the Cyprus question. After Turkish troops invaded Cyprus last year the American Congress cut off arms aid to Turkey. The Senate voted this week to restore the aid, but KISSINGER told Turkish leaders today that the House probably won't go along until it sees some movement toward a Cyprus settlement.

Senate Urges Israel Support

CHANCELLOR: Seventy-six members of the Senate sent word to President FORD today that they will not accept any reduction in American military and economic aid to Israel. The President responded, cautiously, that he welcomed all suggestions. Catherine Mackin has more on the letter and Congressional reaction to it.

CATHERINE MACKIN: The 76 Senators cut across the entire political spectrum from the most liberal to the most conservative. Senate leader Mike MANSFIELD sharply rebuked the signers. He said the letter sets up a possible confrontation between the FORD administration and the Senate. He called the letter an unwise move at this time and said it would have been better muted until the President completes his meetings next month with the leaders of Israel and Egypt. But the Senators clearly wanted to move ahead of FORD's meetings.

SENATOR BIRCH BAYH: There have been voices of concern raised about the validity of United States committments because of the events of SE Asia. And many of us on the Hill felt that it is important to let everybody know, friend and foe and those who have no position, that the United States committment to the continued existence and security of the state of Israel is undiminished.

SENATOR LOWELL WEICKER: The committment was made to the state of Israel in 1948 and has not been changed by the facts that have intervened. Because indeed when the committment was made it had nothing to do with the cold war, it had nothing to do with oil. It had everything to do with a people who had been hounded and persecuted, tortured and killed, for 2,000 years.

MACKIN: Senator Charles PERCY was another critic of the letter. He said it looked like a tilt in favor of Israel, which will not help either side.

SENATOR CHARLES PERCY: We have credibility with both sides. But we must keep that credibility and it's in Israel's interests to not have us so one sided or so aligned with one side that we cannot assume the role that both sides have asked us to play in this conflict.

MACKIN: Apparently the reason for the letter is that the American-Jewish community is jittery about United States support for Israel and wanted this reaffirmation now. Catherine Mackin, NBC News, Washington.

Soviets Get Bases in Libya

CHANCELLOR: In world news today the Russians are reported to have established a new beachhead in the Middle East of great potential importance. According to the semi-official Cairo newspaper, Al Ahram, the Russians will set up military bases, air bases and naval bases in Libya. And the paper said the Russians have agreed to a $4.5 billion arms deal with the Libyans.

Congressional Letter To President

WALTER CRONKITE: Seventy-six Senators have sent a letter to President FORD urging him to make clear that the United States "stands firmly with Israel in the search for Middle East peace." The White House said the President will consider the letter and welcomes all suggestions from all sources as Middle East policy is reassessed. More from Maria McLaughlin.

MARIA McLAUGHLIN: The letter urged the President to continue a strong policy of support for Israel and asked Mr. FORD to guarantee Israel all the help it needs "to detour a renewal of war by Israel's neighbors." Predictably the Israelis liked the letter the Arabs didn't.

ARAB SPOKESMAN: There will be in the back of the Arabs minds a large measure of questioning of whether policies enunciated by the United States administration can be delivered on in the life of this congressional withholding of its support or pre-empting the outcome of the reassessment policy.

McLAUGHLIN: What do you think the significance of that letter is?

ISRAELI SPOKESMAN: Well I think it has great significance because I humbly believe it echoes the opinion of the great majority of American people that a strong and viable Israel is an important element in bringing about peace in the Middle East, which is after all what we all want. So I think it's a constructive and a very helpful move that the Senate of the United States has taken.

McLAUGHLIN: The Arabs were particularly disappointed that Senators like Charles MATHIAS and George McGOVERN, who have recently travelled through Arab countries, had signed. McGOVERN was quick to send a clarifying letter and an Arab spokesman said maybe that indicated the signers' hurried judgment would be replaced by a more studied one.

Maria McLaughlin, CBS News, Washington.

CRONKITE: New York's Republican Senator JAVITS was the moving force behind the letter. Its purpose was to make clear the American position in light of developments in SE Asia and in advance of President FORD's meeting with Egyptian President SADAT. With the breakdown of recent peace efforts in the Middle East there's a growing concern of yet another Arab-Israeli war. Ike Pappas gives us the Pentagon's assessmen on how the two sides now stack up militarily.

IKE PAPPAS: Both sides quickly restocked with weapons following the October war, the Israelis with American arms, the Arabs with Russian. Today with the possibility of a new war increasing the Arabs outgun and outman the Israelis more than two-to-one. Together Egypt and Syria, the major threats to Israel, have over 4,000 Russian built tanks. The Israelis have about 2,500 tanks, most of them American M-60s and Pattons. In artillery Egypt and Syria have 1,800 pieces and over 12,000 missiles including the latest Russian anti-aircraft rockets. Israel has some 900 pieces of artillery, over 600 Hawk surface-to-air missiles and what is reported to be an unknown number of the newest American hand-held heat seeking rockets the Red Eye. In air power Egypt and Syria have over 1,000 fighter-bombers, French Mirages and Russian built MIGS. The Israelis have about 400 warplanes, most of them American Phantoms and Skyhawks. In manpower Egypt and Syria combined can throw at Israel a ground force made up of 450,000 soldiers. The Israelis have only 125,000 men and women in uniform, but have another 250,000 reserves who could be mobilized in a matter of hours, total 375,000. So in military hardware the balance of power in the Middle East clearly favors the Arabs. But the consensus among Pentagon analysts and the intelligence community is that the Israelis would still win. They point out the Israelis are equipped with more sophisticated weapons this time, that they use their equipment far more efficiently than the Arabs and they have better military leadership. In fact, some analysts say, there is a growing concern the Israelis may be the first to attack, aiming to knock out the Arabs warmaking potential for years to come. Pentagon sources admit the threat of a new war in the Middle East is very serious. Ike Pappas, CBS News, the Pentagon.

Kissinger In Turkey

Kalb says Turkey is now expected to begin closing American bases there in the near future.

USAID and Laos

HARRY REASONER: Eighteen Americans and other foreigners were evacuated today from Savannakhet, Laos and flown on U.S. planes to Thailand. The Americans, earlier thought to number only 12, had been under house arrest by Pathet Lao demonstrators for more than a week. It's now certain that most U.S. citizens will be pulled out of Laos as quickly as possible because similar incidents of harrassment against Americans are increasing. Demonstrating students still occupy the American AID compound in Vientiane and two Marine guards and a civilian communications specialist who locked themselves inside an AID building remain the only Americans inside. More on the story from Lou Cioffi.

LOU CIOFFI: Despite official American protests the Laotian government so far has been unable or unwiling to force the students to leave the USAID compound. The government here suggests that negotiations with the students might be a way out for the Americans, the U.S. Embassy is willing, but also argues that it's the responsibility of the Laotian government to protect foreign diplomats, their families and their possessions. The situation is forcing the United States to drastically speed up the evacuation of USAID personnel and their families, it's also causing some thought about a complete withdrawal of all 1,100 Americans here in Laos, including the Embassy staff if they cannot be protected. At the housing area where many Americans live government and Pathet Lao soldiers appeared at the same time as the USAID compound was occupied. They started by checking every car that left, saying that they are looking for weapons. But they're also preventing anyone from taking out personal possessions. One man was forced to unload two porcelain elephants he had crated, obviously to be shipped home. The students and the Pathet Lao say that everything inside the housing area now belongs to the people of Laos and it could very well be that the Americans who are evacuating may be forced to leave most of their possessions behind. There's another problem, many of them have their passports locked up inside the USAID compound with no way to get them out. Even as the evacuation is being organized the Laotian civilians who used to work for the American families inside have already packed their bags and are leaving. There's no panic among the Americans here but there is an increasing sense of urgency. The schedule now is for 50 or 60 people, starting with dependents, to be evacuated each day. But that figure might very well be increased as the situation worsens. The thing that has American officials here really concerned right now is will they be allowed to leave. The answer will come in the next day or so. This is Lou Cioffi, ABC News, Vientiane.

TOM JARRIEL: This is Tom Jarriel. The United States is all but pulling down the flag in Laos. The White House recognized the realities of the political situation today by saying the Pathet Lao control is increasing, so U.S. aid and personnel are being reduced. Secretary of State KISSINGER in Ankara, Turkey today told ABC diplomatic correspondent Ted Koppel the reduction will be very substantial. KISSINGER said it makes no sense to continue U.S. military aid, which has been running up to $30 million a year. The $33 million U.S. economic assistance program will be substantially cut. Most of the 400 civilians who administer it will be brought home. The 800 American government employees in Laos will be reduced to little more than a token force of diplomats and intelligence personnel. The official U.S. view is that the Communists have not yet completely taken over the government, so the U.S. evacuation will not be a total one. But the substantial reduction appears to be a face saving way to prepare for the rapidly moving trend toward Communist domination of Laos. Tom Jarriel, ABC News, at the White House.

Vietnamese Refugees

BRUCE MORTON: Lesley Stahl says the Vietnamese refugees already in this country maybe the easiest ones to resettle, that the problem is the people still on Guam.

LESLEY STAHL: A preliminary rough survey of the 46,000 refugees on Guam indicates that about 21,000 of them are illiterate peasant farmers and fishermen. The survey was conducted by agents of the U.S. Catholic Conference which also estimates that about 21,000 of those on Guam are Catholics. The voluntary agencies say they will have a much more serious problem settling this group than the refugees at Camp Pendleton, where, according to a task force study, 58 percent are professionals, skilled workers or clerks and only .9 percent are agricultural. Executive Director of the Catholic Conference John McCARTHY said, these people on Guam will be more difficult to resettle. But, he said, we must remain optimistic. Task force chief L. Dean BROWN said he knows of no such survey. His task force has no recent data on the occupational status or literacy of the refugees on Guam. BROWN says he will await the computer print out of biographical sheets which are now being filled out. Lesley Stahl, CBS News, Washington.

Report On CENTO

RUDD: Secretary of State KISSINGER was in Turkey when he got the news about the Golan extension, involved in still another diplomatic job. We have a radio report from Marvin Kalb in Ankara.

MARVIN KALB: KISSINGER brought his words of reassurance to the Central Treaty Organization, CENTO, an anti-Soviet alliance created in the mid 1950's and consisting now of Pakistan, Turkey, Iran, Great Britain and of course the United States as principal observer. The Secretary said the U.S. is determined to reaffirm its ties to its allies and he went on, the U.S. is deeply conscious of the inescapable responsibility it bears. During the break between the opening sessions and the closed door deliberations the Secretary told reporters he was pleased by the Syrian decision to extend the U.N. mandate on the Golan Heights for another six months. Adding that it's a constructive development that offers an opportunity for progress in a calmer atmosphere. On another subject KISSINGER said the U.S. has not ordered a total evacuation of Americans from Laos, but he did admit there has been a rather substantial reduction. Marvin Kalb, CBS News, Ankara.

LAOTIAN LEFTISTS freed some Americans; U.S. aid is being reduced.

Students in the south-central city of Savannakhet released Agency for International Development officials and their dependents after nine days of house arrest, and U.S. Air Force planes flew the 18 Americans to Thailand. The Communist-dominated Laotian government accepted a student demand that it ask the U.S. to phase out all AID operations in Laos. The U.S. agreed to close AID offices in the provinces, the Laotians said.

Three Americans, including two Marines, remained trapped in an aid compound in Vientiane taken over by leftists Wednesday.

Hundreds of Americans in Laos will be withdrawn within the next month under an accelerated reduction in the U.S. presence of about 1,000 persons, Secretary of State Kissinger, in Turkey, said the withdrawal can't be considered a complete evacuation "at this time."

Commissary Presence Hit In Big Cities

By Steve Geistel
United Press International

The General Accounting Office said yesterday that military commissary stores, considered a major fringe benefit by active and retired service men, cannot be justified in major metropolitan areas.

GAO, Congress' auditing agency, said in a report the commissary stores—where groceries and other goods can be purchased at reduced prices—should not be allowed in metropolitan areas because enough commercial food stores are in reasonable proximity.

Locating commissaries in these areas, the GAO said, violates the congressional intent that these stores should be located only in remote stations.

Overall, during fiscal 1974 the armed services operated 279 commissaries in the United States with sales totaling $2.2 billion.

Food and goods are sold at cost plus a surcharge of 3 to 5 per cent. The GAO said at least $226 million in appropriated funds were used in fiscal 1974 to support the stores, mostly to pay employees.

The report said that "since commercial food stores in metropolitan areas are very competitive and operate on a low profit margin, their prices are reasonable."

As an example, the GAO noted the services maintain 27 commissaries in San Diego, San Francisco, San Antonio, Norfolk, Honolulu and Washington, D.C.

The GAO said it found at least eight large commercial food stores within a five-mile radius of 25 of the commissaries and at least four commercial stores with the same radius of the other two commissaries.

The report said the services consider commissaries warranted because they have

NATO Ministers Concentrate On Joint Arms Purchasing

By PAUL KEMEZIS
Special to The New York Times

BRUSSELS, May 22—The defense ministers of the Atlantic Alliance countries agreed here today that there was a need to increase the joint development and purchasing of arms.

But Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger was said to have been wary of making specific commitments to increase United States weapons-buying in Europe, which has been small up to now.

Also at the meeting, which was the first among North Atlantic Treaty Organization Ministers since the fall of South Vietnam and Cambodia, Mr. Schlesinger said that the United States put a high priority on NATO, but that the Europeans would have to bear more of the burden of the alliance in the future.

The United States also pressed for acknowledgment by NATO of the strategic importance of Spain to the alliance, particularly in light of the situation in the Mediterranean area. The American effort was to get a passage making this point into the communiqué that is being drafted for publication tomorrow. Several European countries were resisting any mention of Spain in the communiqué.

For a number of years, the United States has been trying to have Spain admitted to the alliance, but some European nations refuse to consider that so long as Generalissimo Francisco Franco remains in power in Madrid.

European officials also said that during the meeting a suggestion was raised for a NATO radar base in South Africa to help guard the Cape of Good Hope tanker route against Soviet naval power. But the Netherlands in particular strongly opposed any link to South Africa. "They would gain a base but lose a ally," the Netherlands Defense Minister, Henk Verdeling, told newsmen afterwards.

The meeting of defense ministers, which continues tomorrow, is a routine semiannual event usually held just before talks by the foreign ministers

U.S. resists Europeans on arms

By GENE OISHI
Sun Staff Correspondent

Brussels—The attempt within the Western military alliance to increase efficiency through arms standardization remained snagged yesterday as the United States continued to resist European pressures for a firm commitment to buy more weapons in Europe.

After the first-day session of the spring meeting of the defense ministers of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, U.S. officials said only that "there was a widely shared general agreement that purchases both ways across the Atlantic would and should be substantially increased above present levels."

While the U.S. accepts in principle that weapons procurement should be a "two-way street," James R. Schlesinger, the American Secretary of Defense, was not prepared to make the sort of specific commitments that the Europeans sought.

Europeans expressed some disappointment in not getting a more positive American response, particularly in view of the tentative NATO desision to buy the Boeing E-3A, a converted 707 equipped with radar and other electronics gear to be used as an airborne early warning system.

The E-3A would supplement the NATO ground early warning system against advancing hostile aircraft. It would be able to detect aircraft attempt-

SIHANOUK CRITICAL OF U.S. IN INCIDENT

HONK KONG, May 22 (Reuters)—Prince Norodom Sihanouk said that his Royal Cambodian Government of National Union was not informed of any deplimatic steps by the United States Government to obtain the release of the American freighter Mayaguez last week, the North Korean press agency reported today.

The agency, monitored here, said that Prince Sihanouk made this statement at a banquet given for him and his wife by President Kim Il Sung in Pyongyang.

In his speech, the agency said, the Cambodian also alleged that United States forces attacked his country for three days starting on May 13, the day after the Mayagüez was seized by Cambodian gunboats in the Gulf of Siam.

"This was a combat between elephant—the United States—and ant — Cambodia — which shows the extreme dastardliness of the American superpower," the agency quoted the Prince as having said.

He charged the United States with "savagely bombing our city, port, oil refinery and railway of Sihanoukville and the airport and a small naval base in the Gulf of Siam three hours after we let the American ship Mayagüez and her crew safely go back."

A report from the official New China News Agency, which referred for the first time in months to the United States as "a paper tiger," scorned what it described as an attempt to depict the Mayaguez incident as an American victory.

of the alliance countries. This spring, however, the second conference is to be held at the heads-of-government level, with President Ford meeting the other NATO leaders in Brussels next week.

Regarding joint arms purchases, a key topic in NATO discussions because of the economic slump in most alliance countries, the Europeans complain that they buy a much greater amount of arms from the United States than the United States does from them.

After today's discussion a high American official said that there was general agreement that there should be a "substantial increase" in arms purchases in both directions across the Atlantic. Reportedly, however, the United States wants a strong system of checks set up before entering into large-scale purchases in Europe to make sure that such joint projects are actually cost effective and properly managed.

The United States suggested that a new agency on joint arms purchases be set up inside NATO. The alliance's Secretary General, Joseph M. A. H. Luis of the Netherlands, was assigned to draw up an official proposal on such an agency before the next defense ministers' meeting in December.

The British Secretary of State for Defense, Roy Mason, who was the spokesman for the European ministers, said that he found Mr. Schlesinger's response favorable.

But European officials said privately that they had hoped for a more concrete indication at this time of how much the United States was prepared to buy. The European defense ministers plan a special meeting in the fall to prepare further proposals on the subject.

ing to penetrate ground defenses by flying at low altitudes.

The plans call for the purchase of 30 such aircraft for a total price tag of $1.7 billion, which would be a sizable boost to the U.S. aircraft and defense industry. It was said to be the largest joint procurement program that NATO ever has undertaken.

The defense ministers are expected to authorize today a study on how the cost of the project would be divided among the participating countries.

There also were strong indications that the Dutch Cabinet, when it meets in The Hague tonight, will choose the General Dynamics F-16 as the new lightweight fighter for its Air Force.

Denmark and Norway also have chosen the F-16 over the French Mirage, with only Belgium among the four-country consortium still undecided and leaning toward the French aircraft.

European countries also are intent on maintaining and developing their own defense industries. They therefore are attempting to work out an agreement with the U.S. to share weapons development and production on some rational basis that would avoid costly duplication and waste.

According to a U.S. State Department study, the Western allies waste between $10 billion and $20 billion a year through duplicating weapons programs.

Some progress appeared to have been made toward a common procurement system in that, according to NATO sources, a new NATO agency will be formed to try to coordinate future weapons purchases by individual countries.

Another area of discussion among the defense ministers was the deteriorating political situation in NATO's southern region. In this connection, the U.S. was said to be trying to get some NATO recognition for Spain's importance to the Western alliance, but most European countries appeared reluctant to associate themselves with the fascist regime of Gen. Francisco Franco.

The U.S., on the other hand, would like to get more recognition for Spain in view of current negotiations to renew American base leases in the country, though it generally is acknowledged that NATO membership for Spain is not possible as long as the current regime is in power.

U.S. facing test at NATO summit

By HENRY L. TREWHITT
Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—A crescendo of American efforts to rebuild political status abroad is approaching a crash of rhetorical symbols in Brussels. Above all else the United States hopes to generate in the summit meeting of the Atlantic Alliance a deeper sense of Western unity.

Even after the fact it may be hard to judge the results. No dramatic announcements are expected from the two-day conference of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or President Ford's following four days in Madrid, Salzburg and Rome.

But the NATO meeting will be the first critical political test of a United States campaign to restore credibility after the fall of South Vietnam and Cambodia to communism. The outcome will have a bearing on a broad range of later meetings, most notably the prospective European Security Conference and the often-delayed meeting between Mr Ford and Leonid I. Brezhnev the Soviet leader.

Seldom has the preparatory campaign been conducted with greater care and vigor. It began even before the Communist victories in Indochina, most obviously in Mr. Ford's so-called State of the World address to Congress April 10.

Painstakingly the President began then to define areas of primary national interest in the post-Indochina period: South Korea, Japan, NATO, continued detente with the Soviet Union and China.

With several variations of language he assured the world that the U.S. would live up to its commitments. By May 6, at a press conference after the fall of Saigon, his definitions became even more explicit.

After Europe, he said, "It is my aim to tie more closely together South Korea with the United States, to reaffirm our commitments to Taiwan, to work more closely with Indonesia, with the Philippines and with other Pacific nations."

At that point a number of Mr. Ford's advisers said, "Oops." It had not been planned that the President would risk irritating China with a gratuitous reference to Taiwan. None the less, the general point was valid.

All the while Henry A. Kissinger, the Secretary of State, and James R. Schlesinger, the Secretary of Defense, were emphasizing the same theme. Mr. Schlesinger underscored the need for strong defenses as the U.S. role in the world changed. Mr. Kissinger spoke more in terms of an orderly political transition into that new role.

There was more than a touch of irony in this process. For in some respects Mr Kissinger is believed to be more inclined to the use of force than the secretary of defense. But the main themes remained consistent.

Cambodia's seizure of the SS Mayaguez added the substance of action to the rhetorical framework. Inside the government the consensus to use force to retrieve the Mayaguez and rescue its crew was reached quickly and overwhelmingly.

In the end the Mayaguez operation must be judged in purely political terms. By statistical standards, the rescue surely cost more men—at least 38 dead in connection with the rescue, plus 3 missing—than the 39 Mayaguez crewmen in jeopardy.

As a test of will, it demonstrated at least that the U.S. was not immobilized in the face of a flagrant provocation by a small country. Whether it convinced anyone in broader geopolitical terms doubtless will be debated. The final conclusion may be a paradoxical one: That the U.S had much to lose by not responding savagely, not so much to gain by doing it.

In any event the incident was very much a background reinforcement for Mr Kissinger this week as he pursued final preparations for the NATO meeting. In Vienna he cautioned Andrei A. Gromyko, his Soviet counterpart, against thoughts of exploiting U.S. weakness.

At the same time he appeared to have made some progress with Mr. Gromyko on Mideast considerations. In Berlin he vigorously restated the U.S. commitment there and in the rest of Europe. In Ankara he restated the message to what remains of the Central Treaty Organization.

Back in Brussels, Mr Schlesinger both promised to strengthen the U.S. commitment to NATO and briskly criticized its allies for not doing more.

There was some specific, visible progress even early in the undertaking. Valery Giscard d'Estaing, the president of France, made a gentle gesture of reconciliation with NATO by agreeing to go to Brussels next week for a meeting with Mr. Ford, though he would stay away from the NATO meeting.

At best the summit can only move the process of U.S. reaffirmation another step forward. But it is an important step. In that sense the forthcoming summitry may be much like the Mayaguez affair: Though the potential concrete benefits may be modest, the cost of not trying could be enormous.

Cairo Paper Says Libya Gives Soviet Military Facilities

CAIRO, Friday, May 23 (Reuters)—The semiofficial newspaper Al Ahram said today that Libya and the Soviet Union had signed an agreement under which the Soviet Union would set up land, air and naval bases in Libya.

In return, the Soviet Union reportedly agreed to provide Libya with $4.4-billion in arms.

The Al Ahram report, datelined Beirut but quoting no source for the information, said the agreement had been signed by the Libyan leader, Col. Muammar el-Qaddafi, and Premier Aleksei N. Kosygin, who visited Libya last week.

Al Ahram said the Soviet Union would provide Libya with thousands of tanks and rockets and advanced arms, including modern weaponry withheld by the Russians from Egypt and Syria.

The Soviet Union, the Cairo paper said, told the Libyan leaders that the stationing in Libya of Soviet military experts was a condition for signing the pact.

Libyans to Be Trained

Mr. Kosygin told Colonel Gaddafi that the Soviet experts would form new divisions in the Libyan Army and train its personnel to use Soviet weapons, Al Ahram said.

The pact stipulated, according to Al Ahram, that the Soviet Union would supply Libya with large quantities of weapons to serve the political and strategic aims of the Soviet-Libyan alliance in the southern Mediterranean.

U.S. Criticizes Allied Arms Cuts In Light of Soviet Defense Increase

From Inquirer Wire Services

BRUSSELS—Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger assailed America's North Atlantic allies yesterday for reducing their military spending while the Soviet Union is increasing its defense budget, officials said.

Officials attending a two-day conference of NATO defense ministers said Schlesinger had contended that the Western allies had underestimated the ability of the Soviets to expand their military spending, which, he said, they are doing at the rate of 3 to 5 percent a year.

In an article for the "NATO Review," released in advance as the meeting opened yesterday, Schlesinger said the United States already had begun deploying two more combat brigades, plus additional ground and air strength for the 300,000 American troops in Europe.

The semi-annual meeting is being held at a time when the allied position has been weakened in southern Europe.

For the second time, Greece was boycotting the session and Portugal's leftist government was represented not by its defense minister but by a member of its "Revolutionary Council," Adm. Jose Baptists Pinheiro de Azevedo.

The NATO ministers, agreed yesterday to set up a new agency to help standardize arms production and increase weapons sales both ways across the Atlantic Ocean.

The ministers agreed also that the political situation in NATO's southern flank had deteriorated in recent months as the result of the Greek-Turkish conflict over Cyprus, the Greek withdrawal from NATO's military structure and the cutoff by the U. S. Congress of arms aid and sales to Turkey.

Debate on the most difficult problem — the crisis in Portugal — was put off until today.

Canal Zone: A Test of Leadership

I went up to the Senate to see Strom Thurmond, leader of the forces opposing an eventual negotiated return of the Panama Canal to Panama, wondering whether, in this stick-figure symbol of American jingoism, there is any redeeming streak of sensitivity to enlightened national self-interest.

I detected none. There is a case to be made that the restoration of Panamanian sovereignty in that part of Panama burglarized by Teddy Roosevelt must be done in a careful way, protecting the great American interest in the transit, security and modernization of the Canal.

But that is not the case made by Strom Thurmond. He believes that the Canal and Canal Zone are American property ("we bought it"), that the Panamanians are too unstable and too vulnerable to communism to be given back sovereignty, and that the Panamanians as well as ourselves will be better off if the United States hangs on.

If such views strike you as combining all of the narrow commercialism and patronizing moralism of the golden age of American empire-building, then you understand just how inappropriate and downright dangerous those views are at a time when the United States ought to be adjusting its Canal position to the realities of contemporary Latin nationalism.

Thurmond, though, is something else. Gracious in personal manner, he struck me as more than simply a throwback to another, simpler time. He struck me as, well, rapacious. Senator, a mean-minded man, someone who enjoys squeezing a little country such as Panama, who feels an indifference bordering on contempt for people who get in the way of American power.

His reserve general's stars adorn his desk nameplate. Military plaques cover his four office walls. With Thurmond when he received me were no fewer than five aides. All of them laughed on cue at his jokes: Might there not be sabotage? "You can't afford to surrender your house when someone breaks in." Two of the aides, well versed in Canal and treaty affairs, filled in the gaps on the several occasions when Thurmond's recollection of fact or argument faltered.

Like other children of the right who resent that the United States cannot just have its way in the world, Thurmond regards American diplomats essentially as agents planted by hostile governments within our own. That President Ford should even consider negotiating a new Canal treaty with Panama he attributes, darkly, to "the influence of the State Department."

From the ranks of the Americans who live and work in the Canal Zone and from some parts of the military and other special interests that enjoy the status quo, Thurmond apparently runs a formidable intelligence network, which seems to feed him all manner of tips and information on what the enemy—that is to say, the State Department—is about.

In April he came upon something worthy enough to produce a phone call from Henry Kissinger. Thurmond repeated to Kissinger his long-standing warning against sending up a new treaty to the Senate. Kissinger replied, by Thurmond's chortling account, that he might have to send it up just to get the government off the spot with the Panamanians.

In fact, the new treaty is still under negotiation with Panama and no decision seems yet to have been taken on the final terms or on when to submit it to the Senate. Because the return of American property would also be involved, legislation will have to be submitted to the House as well as the Senate at the same time under Article IV, Section III, Clause 2 of the Constitution. That clause gives Congress "power to dispose of . . . the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

Thurmond has mustered 37 senators, enough to block ratification of a new treaty, behind a resolution enshrining his own principles in the matter. To the suggestion that some signatories may not be so devoted to it in the clutch as he, he responds that other non-signatories, such as Foreign Relations Committee Chairman John Sparkman, have told him they will go along.

So what is the President of the United States to do when he is confronted on a key regional foreign-policy issue by a powerful legislator who not only promises a very tough fight on the particular issue but who disposes of considerable influence in a narrow but politically sensitive part of Mr. Ford's election-year constituency?

It was easy by comparison to send the Marines after the Mayaguez. Gerald Ford's decision on the Panama Canal will be a much sterner and more revealing test of his capacity for leadership in the White House.

NATO Sets Anti-Waste Practices

By David Fouquet
Special to The Washington Post

BRUSSELS, May 22—NATO today moved to eliminate wasteful and duplicate defense purchasing practices that experts for years had said were sapping the alliance's resources and military capability.

Against a background of major weapons negotiations, the United States and its allies agreed to try to implement the high-sounding promises they have long been making to one another.

The United States said it would increase its purchases of European and Canadian hardware and the European members of NATO made plans to work out a shopping list for the United States by the end of the year when defense ministers meet again. The NATO staff was instructed to study creation of an organization within the alliance to plan develop and purchase equipment jointly.

While these economic issues dominated the first day of the semiannual two-day meeting of NATO defense chiefs here today, the gathering also considered NATO's deteriorating southern flank and prepared for next week's meeting here between President Ford and most of his NATO colleagues.

The discussion of the Mediterranean flank touched on such sensitive issues as the feud between Greece and Turkey, the American cutoff of defense equipment to Turkey and Spain's connection with the alliance.

With the cost of weapons spiraling, and pressure to trim outlays increasing, most delegations here acknowledged that changes had to be made in procurement procedures. A study for the U.S. government estimated that the 15 countries wasted $10 billion to $20 billion annually. A source said that an expert told the ministers today that "The military has its teeth into this issue and won't let go."

American Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger met with British Defense Minister Roy Mason, who told Schlesinger that the European members—four of whom are considering a billion-dollar purchase of American aircraft—insist that the United States increase its purchases abroad. Sources here said Europe suffers a 10-to-1 trade deficit in its military commerce with the United States.

Sources said that Mason "got what he came for" in his discussions with Schlesinger. American officials added "There was a widely shared general agreement that purchases both ways across the Atlantic could and should be substantially increased."

In other matters today, the ministers noted that some progress has been made in reconciling Greece and Turkey, that Italy is modernizing its navy and that France, which does not participate in NATO military operations, has nevertheless moved part of its fleet from the Atlantic to beef up the Mediterranean defense.

According to sources in the meeting, there was a debate over the American proposal that Spain's contribution to the Western defense be acknowledged. Spain, which is not a member of NATO, is negotiating with Washington for continued presence of American bases and has pressed the United States to seek some connection for it with the alliance.

Arms Ban Threatens U.S. Ties, Turkey Says

By Murrey Marder
Washington Post Staff Writer

ANKARA, May 22 — Turkish Foreign Minister Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil warned today that failure to lift the U.S. arms embargo on Turkey quickly will "seriously imperil our relations," but he stopped short of setting a deadline on closing any American bases here.

His blunt warning was delivered this morning at the opening session of the Central Treaty Organization's annual meeting, which Kissinger attended for the first time to try to reassure U.S. allies of American steadfastness after the defeats in Indochina.

Turkey is the most aggrieved U.S. ally here because Congress cut off its military supplies on Feb. 5 as a result of the Greek-Turkish clash over Cyprus.

There was no public sign that Turkey was significantly mollified by Monday's 41-to-40 Senate vote to resume arms sales and aid. The narrowness of the vote followed by assertions that House backers of the arms cutoff have enough votes to kill the Senate bill registered strongly here.

Kissinger had counted on getting new diplomatic leverage out of the Senate action to help resolve the Greek-Turkish snarl over Cyprus. He told Caglayangil in private that without some move toward compromise with Greece the Senate bill is headed for defeat in the House.

Kissinger hopes to make some headway here in setting the stage for compromise between the prime ministers of Turkey and Greece when they meet with President Ford at the North Atlantic Treaty Organization summit conference next week in Brussels.

The Cyprus conflict led Greece to pull out of NATO's military organization on the ground that NATO had failed to prevent Turkish troops from landing on Cyprus last July, and Congress cut off military supplies to Turkey because it used American weapons against a NATO ally.

The continuing Cyprus dilemma, American officials fear, could lead to the dismantling of the 25 U.S. bases in Turkey, including some considered important to the defense of the United States. These bases include a key link in the American early warning system for detecting the launching of Soviet missiles at the American continent.

Diplomatic sources indicated that Turkey is not eager to close any American bases, but has been hinting of this possibility in private discussions.

U.S. officials are concerned that out of exasperation Turkey might start cutting off U.S. base facilities directly affecting the United States but of less importance to Turkey and other NATO members.

The Turkish base network, the most extensive in the NATO defense network for gathering intelligence about the Soviet Union, has numerous electronic eavesdropping centers. It also includes a major air base system that is vital for traffic to the Middle East.

While the Cyprus dispute is not technically at issue at this CENTO meeting, in reality it dominates the scene. Turkey is a member of CENTO; Greece is not. The United States, while not a member, is attending the meeting as an observer-participant.

As Kissinger listened from a seat near by, Turkey's Caglayangil told the CENTO foreign ministers that "The attitude of the U.S. Congress to link the Cyprus problem with the military aid and military equipment supply to Turkey created a very regrettable situation that would entail inevitable negative effects on the close cooperation and friendship between Tukey and the U.S.A. While the U.S. is furnishing and selling arms to more than 90 countries, it is extremely difficult to explain the reasons of this attitude to Turkish public opinion."

"I regret to say," Caglayangil went on, "that if the U.S. position on this matter does not change within the approximate future, this situation will gain proportions that would seriously imperil our relations."

His prepared text said that serious U.S.-Turkish problems would develop "within the immediate future." The slight softening to "the approximate future" appeared to be gesture to Kissinger's presence. Caglayangil said, "We are appreciative of both President Ford's and Dr. Kissinger's efforts to correct this situation, which would have negative repercussions not only on Turkish-U.S.A. relations but also on our defense preparations and consequently on the security of the region."

Kissinger, in his formal statement to the council, reiterated that "The United States regards Turkey as a valued friend and ally," and said Washington will "make every effort for further progress in restoring our normal defense relationship with Turkey."

"The United States strongly supports efforts aimed at ending the disputes between Turkey and Greece," he said, "for we consider their relationship important to the security of both countries, to the security of the Mediterranean, and to the security of Europe."

Kissinger said the United States will "continue to do our utmost in the Cyprus dispute to encourage a just and durable solution that promotes the welfare of the people on the island and maintains the sovereignty, territorial integrity, and independence of Cyprus."

Turkey landed about 35,000 troops on Cyprus in the name of preserving the rights of the Turkish minority there from the Greek majority, and still occupies about 40 per cent of the island. At the height of Turkish military activity on the island there were about 40,000 troops there, but now, according to both Turkish and American sources, the Turkish troop level has been reduced to about 25,000.

Turkey is insisting on creating a two-zone federal state on Cyprus. Greece protests that this would virtually man two separate nations, with Turkey getting through force a disproportionate amount of territory.

Kissinger's main theme before the CENTO member nations—Turkey, Iran, Pakistan and Britain—was that the United States" is determined to reaffirm its ties to its allies," especially after "some months of trials" for America, a clear allusion to setbacks for U.S. policy in Indochina and the Middle East.

Schlesinger sees Warsaw Pact buildup

Brussels

Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger said Thursday that the United States plans to strengthen its forces in Central Europe, where the Soviet-led countries of the Warsaw Pact have been building up their military strength "despite detente."

Mr. Schlesinger also cited "significant reductions in overall U.S. force levels since 1969."

Here to attend a two-day conference of North Atlantic Treaty Organization defense ministers, Mr Schlesinger made his comments in an article written for NATO's monthly magazine made available here in advance of publication.

The NATO alliance, he said, must overcome pressures to reduce its forces if it is to keep a strong negotiating position with the Warsaw Pact countries on East-West forces reductions.

Weapons Debate

The Senate began debate on a $30.3 billion weapons bill with Sen. John Stennis (D-Miss.) arguing against "a military letdown" in the aftermath of South Vietnam's loss to the Communists.

Stennis, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said, "The Communists are not going to rest on their laurels."

He spoke after Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.) said that "excessive military spending is heading us toward financial bankruptcy or a nuclear war — whichever comes first."

Cranston said that at least 20 amendments will be offered to cut the funds authorized by the Armed Services Committee for the purchase of weapons and for Pentagon research and development.

However, no votes are to be taken until after the recess, when what has been billed as "a great debate" on foreign and defense policies is scheduled.

Stennis said he welcomed the forthcoming debate, but said many of the proposed amendments "already have run the gauntlet in the House and been defeated."

The House-passed bill authorizes a total of about $32 billion.

Opposing any "drastic drawdowns" in the nation's military forces, Stennis said, "We should have the strength and power to do what is best for our interests."

Cranston said the United States "should be a peaceful world neighbor instead of a militant world meddler. . . . One of these days our tendency to resort to military forces to resolve our national frustrations will lead to total disaster, for us and all mankind."

IRAN SAYS KILLERS WILL NOT ESCAPE

Leads in Assassination of U.S. Officers Reported

By ERIC PACE
Special to The New York Times

TEHERAN, Iran, May 22—Well-placed Iranian and foreign sources said today that Iranian security forces were following up several leads in their hunt for the terrorists who shot to death two United States Air Force colonels here yesterdaBy.

The newspaper of the Shah's political party asserted, without elaborating, that the killers would doubtlessly be captured soon.

The Teheran press seemed to be trying to rebut and allay any lingering anti-americanism here. It cited the killings in countering charges by foreign critics that the Shah's regime was overly harsh.

No arrests or further acts of political violence were reported today. The reportedly intensive search for the assassins did not disrupt the staccato pace of life here.

It was in the wealthy northern sector of the city that Col. Paul R. Shaffer Jr. of Bryan, Ohio, and Lieut. Col. John H. Turner of Christopher, Ill., both 45 years old, were killed. They were ambushed at 6:30 A.M. yesterday as they were being driven to their offices at the Iranian ArmBed Forces headquarters here. They were members of the 200-man Military Assistance Advisory Group.

Embarrassment the Goal

At least three terrorists were said to have been involved. Anonymous telephone callers told Iranian journalists yesterday that the ambush was the work of a clandestine group, the Iranian People's Fighters Organization, and that it was an act of retaliation for atrocities by the Iranian Government against political prisoners.

"There is no doubt that in the near future the terrorists will be arrested and brought to justice," the newspaper Rastakhiz said in an editorial today. The paper represents Iran's sole legal political grouping, the Rastakhiz, or National Resurgence, party.

Iranian officials have indicated that undermining and embarrassing the Shah's Government was the terrorists' aim in killing the two officers, who are said to have worked on Iranian armed forces planning and personnel matters.

Well-placed informants, including Iranians, Americans and other foreign officials, said the leads being followed up by the Iranian authorities included the following:

¶An unidentified witness took down the license number of the car that the terrorists used to get away, after trapping the officers' car between two others, and killing the men. But whom the getaway car belonged to, whether it was found, and if so, where, and whether it yielded fingerprints or other clues—none of this was disclosed.

¶Another witness, a gardener named Yadollah Jalali, who had worked for one of the officers, saw the whole ambush and has been cooperating with the security authorities as, presumably, the officers' Iranian chauffeur has. Iranian officials say that those who plotted the killing have been identified with virtual certainty.

Mansfield Forcing Fight Over Indian Ocean Base

By JOHN W. FINNEY
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 22—The Administration is facing an open challenge from Senator Mike Mansfield over whether the United States, in the period after the Vietnam war, should establish a military presence in the Indian Ocean by constructing a naval and air base on the island of Diego Garcia.

To the Administration, the issue is whether the United States' ability to support military operations in the Indian Ocean should be enhanced by what it describes as a "modest naval facility" on the small British island 1,000 miles south of India.

To Senator Mansfield, who has been pressing for a reassessment of American foreign policy, the proposed base presents a symbolic test of whether in the post-Vietnam period the United States is going to extend or contract its global commitments.

Through various maneuvers, Senator Mansfield, as chairman of the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Military Construction, has posed a challenge that the Administration had hoped to avoid by slipping construction funds for the Diego Garcia base through Congress.

Last fall, Senator Mansfield attached an amendment to the military construction bill providing that no construction funds could be spent on the base until the President certified that it was "essential to the national interest of the United States." The Mansfield amendment also provided that the project could then be blocked by a resolution of disapproval adopted by either the House or Senate.

The Certification Came

With no publicity, President Ford on May 12 sent a one-paragraph letter to Congress certifying that construction of the Diego Garcia base was essential. The Presidential certification, according to Congressional aides, had been delayed as the State Department argued that it was not a propitious time to debate the American role in the Indian Ocean.

On Monday, Senator Mansfield introduced a resolution of disapproval that was referred to the Senate Armed Services Committee. The committee must report back to the Senate within 20 legislative days, setting the stage for a floor fight this summer or early fall.

The Defense Department wants to deepen the harbor and construct repair and supply facilities on the island—at an eventual cost of at least $175-million—so that it could support a carrier task force in the Indian Ocean. Plans also call for extending the runway to 12,000 feet so that it could handle reconnaissance aircraft and aerial tanker planes, thus making it possible for B-52 bombers to operate in the area.

A Communication Station

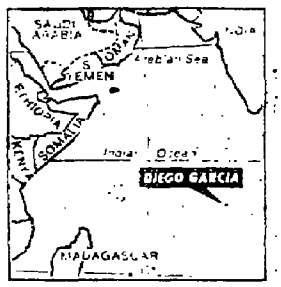
The Defense Department now operates a small communications station on the island. In proposing over the last five years that the island be expanded into a Navy support facility, the department has offered the following combination of political and military explanations:

¶The base is needed to ease the logistic burden of supporting naval operations in the Indian Ocean. The Defense Department has been conducting such operations since the 1973 Arab-Israeli war.

¶The United States must offset a growing Soviet naval presence in the Indian Ocean—a presence that is expected to increase with the reopening of the Suez Canal, scheduled for early next month.

¶That a projection of United States military power into the Indian Ocean would promote stability in the region and protect the sea lanes leading to Middle Eastern oil supplies.

In a statement accompanying his resolution of disapproval, Mr. Mansfield, the Senate majority leader, suggested that the Administration position represented "an extension of a policy of the United States trying to be policeman for the world in the face of our bitter experience in Vietnam."



The New York Times/May 23, 1975

Senator Mansfield questioned whether the United States had "vital interests" in the Indian Ocean. He noted, for example, that having a naval task force in the Indian Ocean "had no effect" in preventing the Arab nations from cutting off the flow of oil in 1973.

The Senator argued that the Diego Garcia base could be the stepping stone to "a three-ocean navy," with an Indian Ocean fleet used by the Navy to justify the maintenance of 15 aircraft carriers instead of the currently planned force of 12.

On the political side, he asked why the United States should "show the flag in an area of the world where the nations have requested that we not have our Navy there in force." He noted that last November, nations bordering on the Indian Ocean issued a policy statement opposing the construction of the United States naval base on Diego Garcia.

Senator Mansfield concedes that in the wake of Vietnam there is a greater Congressional reluctance to reduce the defense budget or foreign military commitments. But Senate aides believe that Mr. Mansfield may still be able to prevail on the Senate floor with the argument that this is no time to make a major new commitment in the Indian Ocean when the Administration and Congress are engaged in a reappraisal of American foreign policy.

Pentagon Aide, Thurmond Tangle

By Jack Anderson and Les Whitten

Inside the Pentagon, it doesn't pay to mess with one of Strom Thurmond's boys.

Lt. Col. Wilfred Ebel found this out. He conducted a study, which rapped one of Thurmond's cronies as a lazy incompetent. There was a snort of annoyance from Old Strom. All of a sudden, Ebel's military career began collapsing around his ears.

Strom Thurmond, of course, is the strait-laced senator from South Carolina, a very model of a reserve major general, the Army's senior retread on Capitol Hill.

He helped to win World War II, and he has five battle stars and 18 decorations to prove it, including the Belgian Order of the Crown and the French Croix de Guerre.

At age 72, he marches through the Senate corridors, ramrod straight, as if to a military cadence. He is a power on the Senate Armed Services Committee where he fights for the Army with the same star-spangled fervor that he demonstrated on the battlefield.

Certainly, Thurmond is not one for a mere lieutenant colonel to tangle with. The unfortunate Ebel made the mistake of criticizing Maj. Gen. Milnor Roberts, the Army reserves chief, who happens to be one of Thurmond's World War II buddies.

Ebel was ordered to make a confidential study of Roberts' operation. His orders, Ebel has sworn, were to write a "no-holds-barred report."

This is precisely what the foolhardy lieutenant colonel did. He charged that Roberts, in his capacity as head of 730,000 reservists, was given to "intrigue," "indifference" and "lethargy." Roberts also lacked courage on tough decisions, wrote Ebel.

Subsequently, Ebel received a commendation for his "tremendous service" and "personal integrity." But this was before Old Strom spoke to Army Secretary Howard (Bo) Callaway about Ebel.

Callaway has assured us that Thurmond's approach was "low key." The senator passed on some allegations against Ebel. "He just said, 'Look into it,'" recalled Callaway. "There never was a case with less political influence."

Thurmond won't say who cooked up the charges against Ebel and slipped them to him. A classified Army document suggests that Roberts, the subject of Ebel's unflattering report, "may have been the source in this matter."

The Army reserves chief, although conceding he had spoken with both Thurmond and one of his aides about Ebel, denied he was the original purveyor of the rumors.

But from the moment Old Strom gave Ebel the evil eye, the world of the 44-year-old lieutenant colonel began to crumble. Here is the swift sequence of events:

• Callaway turned Thurmond's allegations against Ebel over to the Army inspector general to investigate.

• Astonishingly, the inspector general issued a report condemning Ebel for writing a "derogatory" report about Roberts. Yet Ebel's Pentagon superiors had ordered him to prepare a frank report. The inspector general also made some nitpicking charges about Ebel's putting in voluntary time and misleading the Army on a minor matter.

• Citing the inspector general's report as an excuse, Callaway dropped Ebel's name from the promotion list. He conceded that he had been "tougher" on Ebel than the inspector general had recommended but insisted this had nothing to do with Thurmond's intervention.

• Ebel had given up a top civil service job to return to the pentagon. But after he landed on Thurmond's blacklist, he found the Defense Department didn't want him.

When the Army began investigating Ebel because he put in free time at the Pentagon, this was the last straw. He retained an attorney, Frank Bartimo, the Defense Department's former assistant general counsel, to file charges.

At a closed-dooor meeting with Pentagon investigators, Bartimo charged that "this horrendous case ... affects the very core and heart of the reserve forces."

Now the tables are turned, and the Justice Department is being asked to look at Thurmond, Callaway and company.

Footnote: Both Callaway and Roberts denied any impropriety. Roberts also insisted that Ebel's criticism of his operation was unfair and inaccurate. Thurmond couldn't be reached. But the strong-willed old soldier has said in the past that he has the duty to present any allegations that are brought to his attention. The inspector general said he had received no pressure from Callaway but had called the shots as he saw them.

Ford to Name Science Adviser

By Victor Cohn
Washington Post Staff Writer

President Ford said yesterday that he will name a White House science adviser, a job abolished by former President Nixon in January, 1973.

Among issues Mr. Ford is seriously concerned with, one aide said, are whether aerosol sprays are depleting the ozone layer that protects the earth from the sun's harshest rays and whether catalytic converters on cars cause more dangerous air pollution than they eliminate.

Dr. H. Guyford Stever, head of the government's National Science Foundation, said the President also wants scientific advice on "the many issues in the confrontation between energy, the environment, and the economy."

Stever is considered a leading candidate for the new job. Whoever is named, said James Cannon, director of the Domestic Council, the new adviser's main role will be to sum up advice of civilian and government scientists.

Yesterday Mr. Ford told eight members of Congress who have pressed for some new White House science apparatus that he will soon send them a draft bill to create both a science adviser and a 15-member staff.

He acted on advice of Vice President Rockefeller, whom he asked last fall to examine the issue.

A White House science adviser, the Office of Science and Technology, and the President's Science Advisory Committee were first created by President Eisenhower. He did so after the 1957 Soviet Sputnik, the first space satellite, showed Americans that other nations were catching up technologically.

When President Nixon abolished the office his aides called it a move to reduce bureaucracy. But scientific groups said the decision was unwise.

Scientists noted that Nixon, like President Johnson, was unhappy with science advisers who argued against projects like the anti-ballistic missile and supersonic transport plane—and whose advice surfaced in public debates.

In 1973, after abolishing the science office, Nixon gave Stever the additional duty of being a science adviser as well as NSF director. But being both a presidential counselor and an agency head asked too much of one person, it was decided in recent weeks.

Some scientists have also argued that a presidential science adviser should again start providing independent assessment of new weaponry, a role Nixon reassigned to the National Security Council. Whether a new adviser will advise on military matters has not yet been decided, a source said yesterday.

Several bills have been introduced to re-establish a White House science office. Yesterday two of Mr. Ford's visitors—Sen. Frank Moss (D-Utah), Senate Aeronautical and Space Sciences Committee chairman, and Rep. Olin Teague (D-Tex.), House Science and Technology Committee chairman—said they plan hearings on the issue. The House hearings are to start June 10.

"We welcome very much" the President's recommendations, Moss said, indicating there could soon be an agreement.

Apollo-Soyuz flight is okayed

Moscow Bureau of The Sun

Moscow—Senior American and Soviet space officials decided here yesterday that the joint Apollo-Soyuz space flight is all ready to go July 15.

Glynn S. Lunney, the American technical director for the project, said after an exhaustive review that "no issues or problems remain to be resolved" before the flight.

Konstantin Bushuyev, the Soviet technical director, said that the final checking of the spaceships and rockets is now beginning and that a final simulation flight would be held in late June to improve coordination of the control centers' work.

American officials said they were satisfied with the Soviet explanation of the April failure of the last Soviet manned space flight and were confident that similar problems would not interfere with the joint mission in July.

CAMBODIANS 5-23
DAY LD
BY WARREN TALBOT
NEWPORT, R.I. (UPI) -- THE STATE DEPARTMENT HAS GRANTED POLITICAL ASYLUM TO 20 YOUNG CAMBODIAN NAVY OFFICERS WHO CAME TO THE UNITED STATES BEFORE THE COMMUNIST TAKEOVER OF THEIR COUNTRY.
THE STUDENTS, ALL LIEUTENANTS JUNIOR GRADE, RECEIVED PERMISSION THURSDAY TO STAY IN THE UNITED STATES FOR AN INDEFINITE PERIOD OF TIME, ACCORDING TO FRANK CASTELNOVO, DISTRICT DIRECTOR OF THE U.S. DEPARTMENT OF IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION.
"IT WAS FINALIZED TODAY. THEY CAN REMAIN HERE FOR AN INDEFINITE PERIOD," HE SAID THURSDAY IN PROVIDENCE.
THE SAILORS HAVE COMPLETED AN 18-WEEK COURSE AT INTERNATIONAL OFFICER CANDIDATE TRAINING SCHOOL WHICH IS BASED AT THE U.S. NAVY EDUCATION AND TRAINING CENTER. THEY RECEIVED CERTIFICATES OF GRADUATION TUESDAY IN PRIVATE CEREMONIES.
THEY HAVE BEEN LIVING IN BARRACKS AT THE SPRAWLING NAVY BASE BY THE SEA. THEIR GRADUATION CEREMONY WAS HELD THREE DAYS AHEAD OF TIME TO AVOID PUBLICITY. THEY HAVE REFUSED ALL REQUESTS FOR INTERVIEWS, FEARING REPRISALS ON THEIR FAMILIES AT HOME.
"IT'S UP TO THE NAVY NOW TO TURN THEM LOOSE. WE'VE GIVEN THE NAVY THE GREEN LIGHT TO LET THEM GO. THE NAVY DIDN'T WANT TO HOLD THEM FOR A LONG PERIOD OF TIME," CASTELNOVO SAID.
HE SAID HE "PRESUMES" ALL OF THEM HAVE SPONSORS TO HELP THEM RELOCATE IN NEW HOMES AND JOBS.
"THE NAVY WAS TAKING CARE OF THAT END. THE DECISION TO ALLOW THEM TO STAY HAS A LOT TO DO WITH WHETHER THEY HAVE SPONSORS. AS FAR AS I KNOW SOME WILL BE STAYING IN THE RHODE ISLAND AREA, AND OTHERS WILL BE MOVING AWAY TO DIFFERENT PARTS OF THE COUNTRY," HE SAID.
"THE ONLY THING WE ASK IS THAT THEY KEEP IN TOUCH WITH US SO WE WILL KNOW WHERE THEY ARE IF WE HAVE TO GET A HOLD OF THEM," CASTELNOVO SAID.
CASTELNOVO SAID HIS DEPARTMENT HAS RECEIVED DIRECTIVES NOT TO "PROCEED WITH THE FORCEABLE RETURN OF CAMBODIANS AND SOUTH VIETNAMESE."
HE SAID INFORMAL DISCUSSIONS WITH THE CAMBODIANS BEGAN LAST MONTH, BUT THAT IT WAS NOT UNTIL LAST WEEK THAT THEY FORMALLY SOUGHT ASYLUM.

VIENTIANE (UPI) -- COMMUNIST-LED LAOTIAN TROOPS TRIED TO ENTER A U.S. HOUSING COMPOUND OUTSIDE VIENTIANE TODAY, DELAYING THE START OF A MASS EVACUATION OF AMERICANS FROM LAOS.
TWO DOZEN LAOTIAN SOLDIERS BOARDED EVACUATION TRUCKS GOING INTO THE KILOMETER 6 AMERICAN COMPOUND, BUT WERE TURNED BACK BY U.S. GUARDS AT THE GATE.
THE TRUCKS WERE TO TAKE THE AMERICANS TO VIENTIANE AIRPORT FOR THE START OF AN AIRLIFT OF HUNDREDS OF U.S. OFFICIALS FROM LAOS. THE FLIGHT WAS DELAYED WHILE NEGOTIATORS TRIED TO BREAK THE IMPASSE.
THE SENIOR U.S. DIPLOMAT IN LAOS, CHARGE D'AFFAIRES CHRISTIAN CHAPMAN, SAID THE COMMUNIST-DOMINATED GOVERNMENT HAD GRANTED PERMISSION FOR ABOUT 80 AMERICANS TO LEAVE TODAY ABOARD A CHARTERED AIR LAO JETLINER.
"WE HAVE ASSURANCES FROM THE GOVERNMENT THAT A PLANELOAD CAN LEAVE BUT THE SOLDIERS ARE NOT OBEYING THOSE ORDERS," CHAPMAN TOLD NEWSMEN.
HE DEFENDED THE DECISION TO BAR THE TROOPS FROM THE COMPOUND, SAYING ENTRANCE OF THE LAOTIANS WOULD HAVE BEEN A BREACH OF DIPLOMATIC IMMUNITY.
"THIS IS A COMPOUND THAT HAS DIPLOMATIC STATUS," HE SAID. "IT IS UNACCEPTABLE TO HAVE PEOPLE GO ON OUR COMPOUND WITHOUT OUR AUTHORIZATION."
LAOTIAN FORCES LED BY THE COMMUNIST PATHET LAO HAVE BEEN RINGING THE COMPOUND FOR THREE DAYS, KEEPING HUNDREDS OF AMERICANS VIRTUAL PRISONERS INSIDE.
"THIS IS A PERIOD OF TURMOIL AND INEVITABLY THE LINES OF AUTHORITY AREN'T VERY CLEAR, BUT I HAVE NO EVIDENCE THERE WILL BE VIOLENCE AGAINST AMERICANS," CHAPMAN SAID.
HE SAID THE UNITED STATES WOULD CLOSE DOWN ALL AGENCY FOR INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT OPERATIONS IN LAOS AND MOST OF THE 850 AMERICANS IN THE COUNTRY WOULD BE EVACUATED.
U.S. OFFICIALS SAID THE AMERICANS AT THE 140-HOME KILOMETER 6 COMPOUND -- MAINLY AID EMPLOYES -- HAD PLENTY OF FOOD AND WATER.
LAOTIAN MAIDS WERE ALLOWED TO LEAVE THE COMPOUND TO BUY SUPPLIES. THEY PASSED THE FOOD BACK ACROSS THE WIRE FENCE TO THE AMERICANS INSIDE.

Kissinger, in Berlin, Affirms U.S. Defense of Allies

By LESLIE H. GELB
Special to The New York Times

BERLIN, May 21—Secretary of State Kissinger stood at the rostrum of West Berlin's House of Representatives today to confirm the past and to repledge the United States to this city's future.

"As Berlin was the greatest symbol of the heroism of the immediate postwar period, it is also the acid test of the period we now hope to enter," Mr. Kissinger said.

In 1963, outside the building in which Mr. Kissinger spoke, the Schöneberger Rathaus, or City Hall, President John F. Kennedy identified himself with the people of West Berlin and symbolically linked the security of Berlin with the security of the United States.

Mr. Kissinger did the same today, saying, "the security of West Berlin remains a vital interest of the United States."

The Secretary of State spoke inside the gray and lumbering 1914 romanesque building and told his listeners: "This city is enjoying greater security than at any time in the last 30 years." He then talked about the 1971 agreement on Berlin, which validated the Western position in Berlin and the city's links with West Germany.

In the more troubled time of Mr. Kennedy's visit, the President spoke outside the building to crowds who were seeking American reassurance.

Mr. Kissinger on arriving and leaving Tegel Airport in West Berlin, spoke in German and in English.

At lunch, his German hosts paid a compliment to the Secretary's German origin and his policies of diplomacy serving him Prince Metternich Champagne.

While Mr. Kissinger's visit to West Berlin was planned months ago, he saw this moment—in the wake of the collapse of the American position in Indochina—as the right time to make another symbolic gesture of assurance. He said that Washington "will never seek peace by abandoning principles or sacrificing friends."

Earlier in the morning, at the United States headquarters in West Berlin, the publicity stol-

U.S. Decides to Speed Up Laos Pullout

From News Dispatches

The United States has decided to speed up its pullout of Americans from Laos following recent attacks on U.S. personnel in Vientiane and Savannakhet, the State Department said yesterday.

Spokesman Robert Funseth said, however, that the State Department had no report from the embassy in Vientiane about whether the stepped-up evacuation had begun or how many of the estimated 1,000 Americans still in Laos would be removed.

The U.S. Charge d'Affaires in Laos, Christian A. Chapman, met with two Communist Pathet Lao Cabinet ministers last night in an attempt to resolve the most recent confrontation—the student occupation of the U.S. Agency for International Development compound in Vientiane with two Marines and a civilian inside it.

In the southern city of Savannakhet, a dozen Americans and six other persons began a second week under loose house arrest but reportedly were in no immediate danger.

Chapman, who met at the U.S. embassy with Culture Minister Maha Khou and Planning Minister Soth Pothrasy after an earlier meeting with Premier Souvanna Phouma, said many American families in Vientiane were "virtual prisoners," since they were stopped by policemen from going in and out of an American housing area.

Arrangements were being made in Vientiane for a chartered DC-6 to fly out some U.S. AID officials, their dependents and the dependents of other U.S. officials expected to leave soon, Jacques Leslie of the Los Angeles Times reported from Vientiane. He said it was probable that the charter would be the first of several in coming weeks to take out U.S. officials and their personal belongings.

Funseth indicated that the State Department's decision to speed up the evacuation was at least partly spurred by "the continuing situation in Savannakhet and this most recent incident in Vientiane."

He said the U.S. government would "thin out" its presence in Laos "in the next several weeks." He said the State Department did not know whether the U.S. embassy in Vientiane had advised nonofficial Americans to leave the country.

The students demonstrating against the Americans have demanded the immediate dissolution of AID in Laos and the departure of all of its U.S. employees. They also demand that the agency turn its facilities over to the Laotian government, including personal goods that have been imported tax free, and that taxes be paid on personal property of Americans before they leave the country.

The U.S. embassy said in a statement Monday that it was ready to "modify, reduce or eliminate" AID operations to meet the demands.

The political situation in Laos has changed rapidly in recent days, as the precarious three-way coalition government has lost most of its rightist representation through resignation and exile, leaving the Communist-led Pathet Lao in virtual control.

In the latest demonstration, about 200 students and some employees of AID climbed over the fence of the Aid compound in Vientiane and took it over early yesterday morning. The demonstrators also seized an AID warehouse five miles outside Vientiane and pre-

Senators Support Israel

By Stephen Isaacs
Washington Post Staff Writer

Seventy-five members of the Senate have signed a letter to President Ford that in effect demands that the United States continue its strong support of Israel. The Washington Post learned last night.

The letter was delivered to the White House yesterday evening and will be released publicly at a press conference in the Senate this morning.

The 75 signers constitute the largest number of senators ever to sign a pro-Israel letter or resolution. The previous high was 73, the number of members who signed a letter to then-Secretary of State William P. Rogers urging the administration to sell Phantom jets to Israel in 1970.

Senators involved in the signature-gathering said that the letter is particularly significant, coming just before the President's trip to meet with Egyptian President Anwar Sadat and, later, Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Mr. Ford is due to leave early Wednesday for Brussels and will meet Sadat in Salzburg, Austria, on June 1 and 2. He will see Rabin in Washington later in June.

The senators also said it was significant that so many of

KENNEDY ASKS HALT TO A-ARMS TESTING

Geneva, May 21—Senator Edward M. Kennedy called on the United States and the Soviet Union today to halt all nuclear weapons testing to give other nations a "real incentive" for renouncing the development of nuclear arms.

The Massachusetts Democrat also urged the two powers to begin "real reductions" in their own nuclear arsenals, addressed delegates to a 65-nation conference reviewing the effectiveness of the treaty banning the spread of nuclear weapons.

Many of the nonnuclear nations represented at the conference have also urged such action on Washington and Moscow as the most effective step to get more countries to accept the treaty.

The review conference is being held under the provisions of the five-year-old pact by which nonnuclear nations renounce the acquisition of nuclear arms and the nuclear powers pledge not to assist other countries to obtain such weapons.

al Secretary of State showed brief emotion. Faced with an honor guard dressed in blue, with American flags flying and with a band playing "The Star Spangled Banner," Mr. Kissinger's face reddened.

Minutes later when he informally addressed Americans assembled in the courtyard, he came close to echoing the old Kennedy words.

"All of these who doubt what American has stood for should visit Berlin," Mr. Kissinger said. They should come to this city, he continued, "where basic issues do not require explanation."

Berlin 'a Great Principle'

His listeners were moved, as seemingly were those who heard his last line at the House of Representatives: "We are confident that history will record Berlin not merely as a great city but as a great principle in the story of man's struggle for freedom."

After his visit here, Mr. Kissinger left for Turkey to attend a meeting of the Central Treaty Organization.

For Mr. Kissinger, since his days as a professor, Western Europe has meant primarily West Germany and West Berlin.

"To Henry, Washington and Bonn are the two key players," a Kissinger aide said. Bonn is the capital of the mightiest conventional military power in Central Europe and the deutschmark is the centerpiece of the European economy.

There is particularly high regard for Chancellor Helmut Schmidt among State Department officials dealing with European affairs.

These officials and Mr. Kissinger himself, it is said, view Mr. Schmidt as a transitional leader of West Germany — as the last in an old line and the first in a new. Konrad Adenauer rooted West Germany in the West and Ludwig Erhard consolidated this process. Willy Brandt opened the door to the East to legitimize Bonn's borders.

Mr. Schmidt is considered in the words of one official, "a new breed of cat." He is seen as more expressive of the new strong Germany, and as a man who will not follow the established pattern that whatever burdens are to be borne by the Western allies, West Germany must pay.

High State Department officials judge him to be an independent force to be reckoned with and regard his brand of nationalism as a healthy sign.

Support Appreciated

They particularly liked Mr. Schmidt's quiet but clear backing of the American position at the recent consumer-producer conference on energy in Paris. Mr. Kissinger is taking special care that the Soviet position calling for a reduction of West German forces in the early stages of any mutual force reduction agreement in Europe does not lead to Bonn's isolation.

For when Mr. Kissinger and his aides privately express concern about Germany's future it is no longer couched in terms of renascent German militarism. Their expressed concern is of "a free-floating West Germany."

Such a West Germany, in their eyes, would result in an anti-American, French-style policy at best and at worst, an unhinging of a Western Europe oriented toward the United States.

LAOS ... CONTINUED

vented traffic from entering or leaving a residential area where many AID officials live. The demonstrators carried away goods from the AID compound and warehouse.

AID now has stationed in Laos slightly fewer than the 162 officials tabulated during the last count, at the end of April.

Students who seized the compound hung signs from the chain-link fence around it saying, "Americans Leave," and "CIA Go Home."

No Americans were allowed to enter the compound, although three stayed from the beginning of the seizure.

By mid-afternoon yesterday, students had broken into many of the dozen buildings inside the compound, but they had not entered the two main office buildings where the two Marine Guards were. The Marines were in radio contact with officials at the nearby U.S. embassy.

Tension throughout the rest of Vientiane's American community appeared to increase substantially.

The embassy issued a press release stating that Chapman met with Laotian Prime Minister Souvanna Phouma and Foreign Minister Phoumi Vongvichit "to protest these illegal actions."

them signed, indicating, they said, that there has not been an erosion of support for Israel in Congress, as some reports have indicated.

The letter states that the Senate wants to have a voice in the reassessment of American policy toward the Middle East, which Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger announced late in March when his latest peace-making effort in the Middle East failed.

The letter also threatens Mr. Ford's foreign aid bill, saying:

"Within the next several weeks, the Congress expects to receive your foreign aid requests for fiscal year 1976. We trust that your recommendations will be responsive to Israel's urgent military and economic needs. We urge you to make it clear, as we do, that the United States acting in its own national interests stands firmly with Israel in the search for peace in future negotiations, and that this premise is the basis of the current reassessment of U.S. policy in the Middle East."

Notable among those 24 senators who did not agree to sign the letter is Sen. Charles H. Percy (R-Ill.), who until five months ago had been a staunch supporter of Israeli policies.

He spent from Jan. 3 to Jan. 28 in the Middle East and declared that Israel ought to be more flexible, and ought to deal with the Palestinians and, in specific, with Yasser Arafat, leader of the Palestine Liberation Organization.

One Senate source who had a hand in drafting the letter said it has two main points, one explicit and one implicit.

"Explicitly," he said, "it says, 'Mr. President, we've heard of your reassessment. It is not a unilateral activity to be undertaken in the State Department.

"'Here's our view on reassessment — i.e., all the main outlines of American policy stand. We wanted to make it very clear, Mr. President, where the Congress stands. Whatever you're doing, we want you to take this into account.'

"Secondly, implicitly, the fact that 75/99th of the Senate are taking this stand at this time refutes the whole idea that there's erosion. In fact, there's more support than before:

"The so-called erosion is a myth created by the media, and some elements of the administration have been quietly suggesting it was so in various quarters."

A key word in the Senate letter is "defensible" in connection with Israel's borders.

"Since 1967," the letter says, "it has been American policy that the Arab-Israeli be settled on the basis of secure and recognized boundaries that are defensible, and direct negotiations between the nations involved. We believe that this approach continues to offer the best hope for a just and lasting peace."

". . . We believe," the senators said, "that a strong Israel constitutes a most reliable barrier to domination of the area by outside parties. Given the recent heavy flow of Soviet weaponry to Arab states, it is imperative that we not permit the military balance to shift against Israel.

"We believe that preserving the peace requires that Israel obtain a level of military and economic support adequate to deter a renewal of war by Israel's neighbors. Withholding military equipment from Israel would be dangerous, discouraging accommodation by Israel's neighbors and encouraging a resort to force . . ."

Fifty Democrats and 25 Republicans did sign.

Nineteen senators solicited their fellow members for signatures, with the staffs of Sens. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) and Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) taking the lead.

Pro-Israel lobbyists were particularly pleased by the fact that all 10 freshmen senators signed.

In a related development yesterday, six senators and 45 congressmen sent a telegram to the director general of the World Health Organization in Geneva, threatening a cutoff of American financing of WHO if the organization constricts Israel's participation. Some reports have indicated WHO is considering such a move.

"In light of the recent experience with UNESCO, we would not want to see any action which would inevitably lead to a diminution of U.S. support for your organization in Congress," the telegram said.

Ex-Officers Sue Over Early Discharges

39 Navy Men, 9 Marines Narrowly Miss Retirement Benefits

BY KAY COOPERMAN
Times Staff Writer

After 19 years, 8 months and 29 days of active duty in the Navy, Lt. Robert Ballard involuntarily became a civilian late last week.

He was passed over twice for promotion, and according to a federal statute, that is cause for discharge.

Thirty-eight other Navy lieutenants and nine Marine Corps officers have found themselves in similar positions, some having been discharged May 1, others awaiting their discharge some time before June 30.

All were just short of the length of duty required to receive retirement benefits.

But on April 7, the 48 officers filed suits charging that many of the promotion procedures employed by the Navy and Marine Corps are archaic and unconstitutional. Age discrimination also was charged.

Ballard, 37, an Alpine resident, thinks it is unfair that he should come so close to the 20-year mark and be discharged with no retirement compensation.

He first received his notice of discharge in 1972. At that time, he filed suit against the Navy on a sex discrimination charge.

A U.S. District Court issued a temporary restraining order allowing him to continue in active duty during litigation.

There are provisions in the U.S. Code guaranteeing women a minimum of 13 years in the service once they achieve officer status, Ballard said.

If this were applied to men, he argued, it would have enabled him to serve the 20 years required for receiving retirement benefits. He was victorious in the lower court, but lost when the Navy appealed to the Supreme Court.

Ballard said he became an officer in 1962 after seven years of enlisted duty because of the retirement program he understood commissioned service included.

"Having studied the normal promotion flow charts, based on the federal government's time and grade requirements," Ballard said, "I could anticipate 13 years in commissioned service before being eligible for lieutenant commander," the level of promotion for which he was just passed over. The 13 years added to his previous seven enlisted years would have given him his 20.

When Vietnam broke loose in 1964, the promotion schedules were accelerated and instead of the 13 years he thought he had coming to him before having to apply for promotion, he ended up with nine.

When he came before the selection board for promotion, it was peacetime and the Navy was cutting back on its officer corps.

Ballard said the selection board selected the most qualified men to be promoted. He added, "I'm not surprised I failed the selection" because of his age and relative lack of education.

He said he requested a transfer back to enlisted or reserve status so he could meet the retirement quota, but for unknown reasons his request was denied.

When Ballard received his discharge papers dated Thursday, the effective date was listed as June, 1972. This means the two years, 10½ months he served under the temporary restraining order had not been counted by the Navy for retirement purposes.

"It implies that I was retained on active duty pending some disciplinary action," Ballard said. Such a notation on his discharge papers, he expects, will hurt him in his future job hunting.

It was this point that caught the interest of U.S. Sen. John Tunney's aide in San Diego.

Jim Skelly is investigating the reasons behind the promotion failures and also the basis for including the information about serving time under a court injunction on the discharges.

Of the 48 involved, Skelly said, "They're all guys with outstanding military service." He thinks the reasons the officers failed to obtain promotions could center on their age.

The Navy and Marine Corps, he said, "are orienting the services now toward a younger, more stable officer corps."

"The situation is really awful. They're really patriots, these guys. They were working-class people who thought they were getting a good deal" when they enlisted, he said.

Peter Bowie, the attorney from the San Diego district U.S. attorney's office handling the Navy's defense, said he does not see any constitutional question or example of unfair play.

Bowie said the Navy followed statutes set down by Congress permitting little room for question. If anything, Bowie suggested, the officers should question the Congress on its statutes, not the Navy.

Congress, he continued, specifies the numbers of officers the different branches of service should have at each level.

As the level of officer gets higher, the number of men needed decreases, he said.

Once an officer reaches a certain level, he is guaranteed his 20-year quota and the corresponding retirement benefits. None of the 48 officers, he said, has reached this level and therefore, had no guarantee.

Bowie also pointed out that the Pension Reform Act of 1974, which decreased the minimum working years for private industry pension plans to 15, specifically states it does not apply to the armed services.

A lawyer for the officers, Lawrence Baldauf, said his case involves constitutional guarantees of equal protection under the law, as well as an age discrimination question.

Baldauf said he believes the Pension Reform Act should apply to servicemen as well as private workers based on the constitutional guarantee of equal protection under the law.

Other causes of action he lists include the fact that officers are not given the opportunity to plead their cases before the selection board and that their failure to obtain promotion was based on "dollars and cents" (referring to the peacetime cutback) and not on the officers' fitness.

Concerning the age discrimination charge, the Navy said the percentage of officers in line for promotion with "birthdates of 1940 or earlier" is similar to the percentage of those in that age group who received promotions.

"The selection percentages are essentially the same, indicating no discrimination by the selection board because of age," said naval headquarters in Washington.

The $16.8 million suit ($350,000 per officer) is filed in federal court in San Diego where the already delayed initial hearing is scheduled today. All parties involved expect the suit to take several years.

AF chief says air power stall U.S. mistake

By JESSE HENRY JR.

Frequent restrained use of air power translated to the enemy a lack of decisiveness in the Vietnam War and was thus a mistake on the U.S. military's part.

That observation was put forth Saturday by U.S. Air Force Gen. George S. Brown, chairman of the joint chiefs of staff.

The general apoke at the annual awards dinner for the Order of Daedalians, a national fraternity of military pilots. About 400 members and wives attended the banquet at Villita Assembly Hall.

"Our repeated bombing pauses, which were politically designed to give the leadership in Hanoi an opportunity to alter its course, were instead taken by the enemy as evidence our leaders were not sure of their strategy," Gen. Brown said.

He noted that such "restrained use" of air power was not only politically ineffective but also in violation of basic military principles.

"But once the rules that restricted its employment were relaxed . . . air power contributed decisively to the negotiations which led to the return of our prisoners and ended our direct participation in that tragic war," Brown commented.

He said although it is our country's national objective to "deter any and all wars," we must maintain a strong and effective defense structure.

Brown explained, "The principal burden of maintaining a worldwide military balance, which is the basis for the security and survival of the free world, rests squarely on the United States."

The U.S. currently has formal commitments for mutual defense with 41 nations either by multi-lateral or bi-lateral agreements, the joint chiefs head said.

Concerning U.S. trustworthiness abroad as an ally in the wake of the Southeast Asia tragedy, Brown offered:

"In my opinion, we have got to face this issue head on and re-establish our national credibility with our allies, with our adversaries and especially ourselves."

We must begin to do this, he urged, by building up our economic and military strength with allocation of the "necessary share of our gross national product to national security."

Hill Bides Time As Martin Rests

By Henry S. Bradsher
Washington Star Staff Writer

The last American ambassador in Vietnam, Graham A. Martin, is going on vacation in Europe and has not yet decided when to come back to the United States.

Some members of Congress have expressed interest in questioning Martin on the way instructions from Washington were carried out in the final days before Saigon fell. Handling of the evacuation has been particularly controversial.

But staff members on both the House International Relations Committee and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee say that no formal request has been made from Martin to appear on Capitol Hill.

As U.S. officials who worked under Martin in Vietnam trickled back to Washington, harsh comments are being heard about the ambassador's direction of American affairs, especially in the final weeks from the Communist capture of northern South Vietnam until the American evacuation April 29.

ONE OFFICAL said yesterday he was bitter about the failure to make arrangements for the evacuation of Vietnamese who worked for the U.S. government. Only about one-third of those under his supervision who had wanted and expected to be evacuated were taken out.

Other stories which have come out involve delays in making evacuation arrangements until it was too late to set up a workable plan. As a result, many Americans, including U.S. government officials, were left to their own devices.

Martin had already been controversial for the way he ran the embassy after becoming ambassador to Vietnam in June 1973. Some independent-minded American diplomats were replaced with sycophants, for instance, and Martin distorted evidence to protect the image of former President Nguyen Van Thieu's regime.

The Ford administration had thought to put all that behind it now to avoid a rehashing of what went wrong in Vietnam. The lessons have been learned, Ford said two weeks ago without specifying what the lessons were.

THAT DID NOT satisfy some members of Congress. But Congress has been absorbed lately in business which has been delayed by the long argument over extra military aid first for Cambodia and then Vietnam.

One congressional expert on foreign affairs said yesterday the Vietnam question might not be dead yet. When Congress returns from recess June 2, some members could raise again the question of Martin's conduct.

Martin is believed to have up to three months of accrued vacation time which he might now take. A spokesman at the State Department said the attitude is that Martin has earned a chance to relax.

"No one feels there is any pressure to have him come back — no one wants to push him," a spokesman said.

After he was flown by a Marine helicopter to a U.S. Navy ship in the South China Sea just before Saigon fell to the Communists, Martin went to the Philippines. He was reported recovering there from pneumonia and general exhaustion.

NOW HE HAS recovered enough to have gone to Bangkok.

As ambassador to Thailand from 1963 to 1967, Martin was responsible for making the agreements with Thailand that enabled the United States to use Thai air bases to bomb Vietnam, Laos, and later Cambodia.

Martin's old embassy in Bangkok is now having an awkward time over American use of those bases in the Mayaguez affair and is under pressure to close them.

Word reaching Capitol Hill was that embassy officials felt unhappy about Martin's presence at this time. He is unwanted there, according to this report.

The State Department said Martin is going to Europe soon. He owns a home in Italy, where he was ambassador from 1969 to 1973.

Some sources report that Martin hopes to be appointed to a new ambassadorship, although at the age of 62 and with 42 years of government service, he could retire.

HIS NOMINATION to another post would require Senate approval. That probably would reopen the argument which raged last month over his handling of affairs in Saigon. Senate members in particular were angered by his slowness in reducing the U.S. presence in South Vietnam when evacuation became a likelihood.

Because of the controversy, it was considered possible on Capitol Hill that Ford would decide not to nominate him to a new post.

The other American ambasssador who lost a country last month, John Gunther Dean, came home from Cambodia after the U.S. Marine evacuation from Phnom Penh. Dean had the normal State Department consultations after leaving an ambassadorial post and is to take vacation pending a new assignment.

Keeping U.S. troops overseas

The massive House vote against withdrawing 70,000 American troops from overseas was the right decision at the right time. It does not preclude reassessment or future reductions.

But the suitable moment for any reduction is somewhere down the road, beyond the world's shaky mood after the events in Indo-China. For Congress to support the administration in this reading of the situation is to signal all nations that the U.S. Government is united in the will not to abdicate its military role in the aftermath of Vietnam.

Certainly there must be understanding of the position of the congressional sponsor of the proposed cuts, Ronald Dellums. He argued that, in view of the nation's limited resources, the Congress ought to begin reducing American commitments abroad "to address mounting human problems at home." The President and Congress need to convey to the country that they are just as much concerned to meet these problems of their own people as they are to pursue national objectives overseas.

But the solutions to problems at home require security for the freedom to seek them democratically. To ensure this security, the House has ratified the administration view that now is not the time to cut 70,000 troops from the Far East, where it had been suggested that most of the cuts could be made. Nor would it be the time to cut American troops in Europe, as is perennially proposed.

In Europe withdrawals would need to be part of East-West "mutual balanced force reductions." Eventually America's allies should be able to take over more of the burden. But many are more hard-pressed economically than the U.S. at the moment.

They can become more effective by improving the quality of their effort, not simply adding troops (which West Germany could not do anyway without violating treaties). Standardization of military equipment in NATO could also enhance effectiveness and economy without adding men. The U.S. is increasing combat strength by converting some 18,000 noncombat slots to combat roles.

Meanwhile, through European buying of U.S. planes and other offsetting measures, the U.S. balance-of-payments problem in keeping forces in Europe is largely met.

Also part of the new context for American military decisions is the judicious rather than rubber-stamping manner in which Congress is responding to administration requests. It is not like the 1950s when there was a feeling of running scared and going along with all sorts of expenditures that are now seen to have lacked cost-effectiveness. The legislators support the B-1 bomber, for example, but they keep a rein on expenditures.

With the government united on defense objectives — but implementing them with a tough eye on any recklessness or waste—the U.S. could make this postwar period a model of peacetime military realism.

Terrorism in Iran

CHICAGO TRIBUNE
22 May 1975

Two United States Air Force officers were murdered in the streets of Tehran Wednesday, apparently by Iranian revolutionaries who want to drive a wedge between the United States and the government of Shah Reza Pahlavi.

This, at least, is the government's explanation, and there is every reason to believe it. The assassination was carried out by three carloads of gunmen as the officers were being driven to work at the American military aid mission, and was followed by an anonymous telephone call telling the Associated Press that the murder was "in retaliation for the execution of nine Iranian revolutionaries in prison last month."

The caller said that the murders were committed by the "Iranian People's Warriors Association" and that the shah is "a stooge of the Americans; therefore we murder Americans."

The Tehran murders came as Americans were being harassed in many parts of the world. Three American members of a zoological team have just been reported kidnaped in Tanzania, and in Laos two Marines and a civilian are being held captive by anti-American students. The only apparent link between the three incidents is that in all of them, the perpetrators seem to think that they can accomplish their goals, whatever they are, by using terrorist methods against the U. S.

The important thing for the U. S., therefore, is to do nothing to encourage this belief and everything within reason to prove that terrorism won't succeed.

We are cooperating with the shah because it is clearly in our national interest [and very likely the interest of most Iranians as well] to do so. This doesn't mean that he is our ideal as a ruler. He is widely accused of tyranny and cruelty; and while we don't believe all of the charges against him, neither do we wholly accept his reply that nobody is in jail except proven terrorists. We must add, tho, that the latest incident makes the shah's position more credible than it was before.

And so we must not allow this act of terrorism to deter us from the course we have chosen. Our relations with the shah should continue unchanged.

But neither should we allow the terrorists the satisfaction of seeing us defend whatever methods the shah may use to bring about justice as he would like to see it. He should certainly do all he can to track down and prosecute the assassins, as his government has promised to do. But to cooperate with the shah does not mean endorsing all of his procedures.

So if the culprits are found—and considering the reported efficiency of the shah's police this shouldn't be beyond their capacity—it will be in both the shah's interest and ours to see that the trial is held openly and honestly, so that the critics will have no occasion to charge a frameup.

Welcome to the Vietnamese

"To be honest is to realize that the ultimate measure of a man is not where he stands in moments of convenience and moments of comfort, but where he stands in moments of challenge, in moments of controversy."

It is now eight years since the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. spoke those words in behalf of putting an end to the Vietnamese war and to the suffering of the Vietnamese people. Now such a moment has arisen. The war has ended, at long last, and more than 125,000 of those people have fled to the U. S.

Fortunately, the better instincts of the American people seem to have triumphed over the initial hostility, with its ugly undertones of racial prejudice, to the Vietnamese. That could be seen in the 79-2 vote by the U. S. Senate for $405 million to aid resettlement of the refugees, the two dissenters being conservative Republicans Jesse A. Helms of North Carolina and William L. Scott of Virginia. Earlier, the House by a similarly overwhelming vote of 381-31 approved an authorization measure.

Now, with the announcement that as many as 15,000 refugees will be processed at the Indiantown Gap Military Reservation near Harrisburg, Pennsylvanians will have a challenge of their own.

The processing will be handled by federal personnel, but the Ford Administration is gearing up to help coordinate private aid in uniting refugees with American sponsors. Most of the refugees will be dispersed around the northeastern states, but it may not be amiss to note, as did Lt. Gov. Ernest P. Kline in making the announcement, that quite a few jobs will be created in renovating the federal military post and in taking care of the refugees. "I can only see from an economic standpoint positive things happening," he said.

We trust we all will see positive things happening also from a moral standpoint. This commonwealth was founded by refugees, and immigrants —English, Irish, Germans, Italians, Poles, Swedes, people of all races and religions — have contributed to it. These refugees, however, are a special charge on us, for most of them would not have fled their country had it not been for our intervention there. We owe them a welcome, as we owe it to our conscience.

Easing Up on Turkey

Monday's 41-to-40 Senate vote to lift the ill-advised embargo on military aid to Turkey is legislatively insignificant without House concurrence, which is ruled out in present circumstances. But half a congressional loaf is better than none as Turkey teeters between shortsightedness and wisdom in its policies toward the United States and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and toward a settlement with Greece and the Greek Cypriots on Cyprus.

The Senate action at least creates a somewhat more pleasant climate for Secretary of State Kissinger's visit to Ankara tomorrow, for a foreign ministers' review of the Central Treaty Organization. Ideally, the congressional gesture toward ending the three-and-a-half-month-old arms-aid ban could be followed by some Turkish movement toward a Cyprus agreement, justifying a House reversal on Turkish aid and greatly increasing this country's leverage for encouraging Cyprus concessions by the Turks.

This sounds too pat, and it is, especially since Prime Minister Demirel and his associates hold power by the slimmest of margins in Parliament and are in no position to take initiatives that might tread on the nationalistic, anti-Greek feelings of their constituents. But it should be evident, as Kissinger hears out the once staunchly allied Turks, that the playing of Greek ethnic politics by some congressmen not only hurts this country's effort to play a helpful role in Cyprus negotiations, but places the eastern Mediterranean flank of NATO in additional jeopardy.

The arms ban, besides, represents a disturbing commentary on the stability of the United States' relations with its allies in general. This is the worst possible time for the reinforcement of such doubts, following the debacle in Southeast Asia and the widespread questioning of the reliability of American commitments. It is too bad that Kissinger, on his current trip, is not rid completely of the handicap that Congress unnecessarily placed the nation's policy under last February.

The Senate's Reversal on Cyprus

The Senate made a timely diplomatic gesture by giving its tentative approval to a resumption of arms aid to Turkey Many strings were rightly tied to this reversal of position. Not only did the decision pass by only a one-vote margin, but the Senate acted in the certain knowledge that the House of Representatives will in no way go along until the Turkish government makes tangible concessions toward a settlement of the Cyprus problem.

Whether the Senate gesture will help break the impasse that has caused so much damage in the eastern Mediterranean remains to be seen. But it will not hurt. During the next three weeks all parties to the dispute will at last be talking, and talking in a way that could bring progress. Secretary of State Kissinger is in Ankara this week for a meeting of CENTO. President Ford is expected to confer at the NATO meeting in Brussels next week with Greek Prime Minister Constantine Caramanlis and Turkish Premier Suleman Demirel who, in turn, have agreed to meet face to face. Representatives of the Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot communities are to resume negotiations June 5 under the aegis of U.N Secretary General Kurt Waldheim.

The Senate vote should be a signal to all parties that the executive and legislative branches of the United States government are not themselves hopelessly deadlocked on matters of Turkish-Greek-Cypriot policy Profound disagreements exist, to be sure. The majority in Congress is highly critical of Mr. Kissinger's whole performance—his coddling of the Greek colonels, his acquiescence in their abortive coup on Cyprus that led to their own downfall, and his failure to prevent Turkey from using U.S.-supplied arms on Cyprus itself. The Secretary, in turn, believes the Congress needlessly complicated a difficult situation by imposing its arms embargo in the November-February period. At the time the embargo was enacted, some Kissinger critics strongly suggested it would make Ankara more compliant. Instead, Ankara became more adamant in Cyprus negotiations and more insistent it would review its NATO commitments, including the status of U.S. bases on its territory.

If the Ankara government can find a way to relinquish its hold over a disproportionate sector of Cyprus and bring about the resettlement of tens of thousands of refugees made homeless by its military action, we believe the House might reciprocate by voting to endorse the Senate's gesture of goodwill. The United States and Turkey have a powerful common interest in maintaining the southeastern flank of NATO. This is vital to the U.S. position in the eastern Mediterranean and to Turkey's security from attack or undue political pressure from the Soviet Union. These considerations, and the humanitarian needs of both the Greek and Turkish communities in Cyprus, cry out for a solution.

The closing of the newspaper Republica — the only Lisbon paper that has held out against Communist worker-group pressures — is an ominous indication of the ordeal that could lie ahead for free political expression and civilian democratic rule in Portugal. It is the kind of act that feeds concern in the West about intentions of Portugal's new leaders.

Republica editorially was the organ of the Socialists, the party which won the largest share of votes in last month's election. A dispute between the Communist-controlled printers union and Socialist editors on the paper was used as an excuse by the Information Ministry to "temporarily" sidestep the confrontation by closing Republica's doors.

The Socialists saw the move as another tactical loss to the Communists, who registered only half as many votes in last month's tally but have more influence within the ruling Armed Forces Movement The Socialists' threat to pull their two ministers out of the government, because of the Republica seizure, shows just how serious the incident is.

A Socialist pullout would not have so much effect on the running of the government, which is effectively in the hands of the military men, as it would on the pact for public order among the parties during the current "revolutionary" phase. The Maoist faction in Portugal already is inciting demonstrations to challenge the military men's authority.

Within the movement itself a struggle is going on between leftists and moderates. Given this thick layering of political conflict in Portugal, a noncontrolled forum for discussion and information is essential. Communist usurpation of the media can only raise the temperature of civil frustration nearer the flash point.

The 'Z' List Gets Longer

The Export Administration Act of 1969 provides the United States with a powerful economic weapon—the authority to deny all trade to another nation.

As a kind of ultimate weapon short of war, this law, you just might think, would be reserved for significant threats to American security and sovereignty. But not at all. For the moment, at least, it is applied only to the relatively puny. Cuba, North Vietnam and North Korea are long-standing members of the "Z" list. Cambodia and South Vietnam were added Friday.

We wondered why.

There was a possible explanation for Cambodia. The secretary of state may have felt it justified by the Mayaguez affair.

But South Vietnam? And just after the rulers in Saigon had made a conditional proposal for opening diplomatic relations with the United States.

We called the State Department. Well, came an admittedly hesitant answer, didn't we understand that South Vietnam was a hostile regime?

An acquaintance who studies things like this had a more sophisticated explanation. Perhaps the State Department ordered the trade embargoes so that there would be something to negotiate away once Washington and Saigon get down to the brass tacks of whatever new relationship they are going to develop. The old bargaining-chips theory.

But we were not impressed.

In fact, we were left with a dull suspicion that Henry Kissinger was still having trouble with his priorities, the same trouble that led him to prolong too long the American commitment to Indochina.

The secretary of state and the President, too, have been concerned lest the American withdrawal from Saigon be misunderstood. They have suggested that they welcome the rescue of the Mayaguez as a fortuitous opportunity to demonstrate that "there are limits beyond which the United States cannot be pushed," as Kissinger put it.

We have thought the anxiety of the President and the secretary of state misplaced. It was not the American withdrawal from Indochina but the American commitment to Indochina that seemed most likely to telegraph to friend and foe alike a failure in the American evaluation of foreign policy priorities. That same failure seems reinforced by this arbitrary and unnecessary decision to prohibit trade with these battered, bleeding nations of Southeast Asia.

Furthermore, the sanctions against Saigon risk delaying the offshore oil development already started by Americans, a project of world consequence in the face of the global energy crisis.

If the United States wants to communicate its own self-confidence, its reliability as an ally, it should get on with the normalization of relations with all nations, including the small and desperate. To pour truck factories and computers into the Soviet Union while denying all trade with Vietnam is only to invite doubts about American leadership.

As President Ford himself told Congress April 10: "Our use of trade and economic sanctions as weapons to alter the internal conduct of other nations must also be seriously reexamined. However well-intentioned the goals, the fact is that some of our recent actions in the economic field have been self-defeating."

He was speaking of congressional limitations on Soviet trade. But he could just as well have been anticipating the additions to the "Z" list.

Beleaguered Bomber

Out once again come the axes that foes of the B1 bomber program are continually whetting. A liberal-consumerist coalition says it is mounting a nationwide campaign to do in the bomber once and for all. Common Cause, Americans for Democratic Action, Environmental Action and the National Taxpayers Union argue that the B1 is a waste of money, not to say a potential danger to the environment. Let us go on building B52's.

The cost of the B1, which is presently undergoing extensive flight testing, is for a fact monumental: About $65 million per plane in 1975 dollars and sure to get costlier with inflation.

Yet the money will buy a potent aircraft—smaller than the B52, more adaptable to short runways, able to deliver more than twice the payload. Moreover, it will be new; B52 technology dates back to the late 1940s and early '50s.

Congress, if it keeps its wits about it, will let the B1 program roar full speed ahead. No militarily consequential nation freezes weapons development, the less so in times of national danger.

Bad enough is that the United States, in the aftermath of Vietnam, must reestablish its military credibility, in order that the Soviet Union and Communist China may understand we are no more than ever to be trifled with. Worse would be for us, at such a time, to scrap the best, most powerful bomber Americans have ever designed.

The B1 has got to be built; and the sooner, the better.

A SIGN OF THE TIMES

The House has approved a $26.5 billion authorization for military arms procurement, handily beating back efforts by a die-hard anti-defense faction to make significant trims.

This is the chamber, filled with a "freshman class" of go-go liberals, which was boasting only last January about how it was going to tear huge chunks out of the Pentagon budget.

That feisty mood has pretty much evaporated in the wake of the Vietnam disaster and the worldwide nervousness about U.S. foreign policy that resulted from it.

In its place, we have a sober awareness of the international situation best expressed during the House debate by Rep. Robert Daniel (R-Va.), who said:

> "If nothing else, events of recent months should remind us that diplomacy, detente, peace and national security are all based on reality, and the ultimate reality is military power."

U.S. Role Still Strong

President Ferdinand E. Marcos is saying that the "national interest" of the Philippines may dictate that his country discard its mutual defense treaty with the United States of America and take over U.S. bases at Clark Field and Subic Bay. This is startling word from one of America's closest allies in the Pacific.

Or is it really surprising? The Philippines lie close to the hot breath of the Communist advance through Southeast Asia. After watching the performance of the United States as chief backer of the effort to stem aggression against Laos, Cambodia and South Vietnam, the Filipinos can hardly be blamed for wondering whether their "national interest" is really being served by relying on the Americans as defense partners.

This is typical of the quandary facing U.S. allies around the world. If they are thinking in the same direction as President Marcos, they are in trouble, and so are we.

Scores of countries around the world have entered into security arrangements with the United States which rest on the principle that our national interest runs parallel with theirs. Now they have seen the United States identify its national interest in the survival of South Vietnam, and then abruptly change its mind. If this leads many of our allies to consider going it alone—or even warming up to Communist powers seeking influence in their regions—it could be disastrous for them and disastrous for U.S. security as well.

Secretary of State Henry Kissinger is insisting that the "Basic cornerstones" of our foreign policy have not changed because of the Indochina debacle. "Our nation is uniquely endowed to play a creative and decisive role in the new order which is taking form around us," he says. He is right, in terms of the leadership which a country as strong as the United States is capable of exercising. However, the divergence that developed between the White House and Congress on aid to Vietnam, and other symptoms of weakness in our bi-partisan foreign policy, suggests we are faltering in our resolve to play the creative and decisive role in world affairs that history has assigned to us.

As an historian, Mr. Kissinger can see a "new order" emerging from the diplomacy of detente, from the new economic power of Western Europe and Japan, and from the aspirations of the Third World to accelerate their development by striking a better bargain for the resources they supply to the industrial nations. That view may be accurate, but it is by no means certain who will be in the role of architect for that new order.

One blueprint is that supported by American policy—nations working out their destiny within secure borders, striving to give their people the freedom, justice and the opportunity for self-determination. The other is the blueprint of totalitarianism sponsored by Moscow and Peking which locks people into systems not of their own choosing.

What Kissinger seems to be telling us is that we are at a watershed of our history and now, more than ever before, we must avoid any sign of weakness or vacillation in U.S. foreign policy when those ideologies are bidding to design the future.

SAN DIEGO UNION 3 May 1975 (22)

Detente Is A Delusion

As we raise our eyes from the embers of Vietnam and look in other directions we must concur with the wag who said, "The whole world is a rat race and the rats are ahead."

A case in point is NATO, the grand alliance that has held Soviet imperialism at bay for 25 years. Now, NATO is in trouble, partly because of the dynamism of Soviet diplomacy and the size of the Soviet's military buildup, and partly because of misplaced American priorities as to the relative importance of the thing we call "detente."

The Soviet power has grown with almost dramatic speed. The Russians are spending more on military defense by far than the United States, and their progress is almost terrifying. They have developed a massive and modern fleet, and are procuring the bases necessary to make it a worldwide strategic force.

The NATO European command is now faced with a formidable force of 26,000 Warsaw Pact tanks, an array of tactical nuclear weapons and armies at least twice the size of the NATO forces.

NATO, itself, is in tragic disarray. Great Britian is impoverished, suffering brutally at the hands of a leftist government that is disinterested in defense. Portugal is turning slowly leftward, as is Italy. Greece and Turkey, former stalwart anchors of the NATO flank on the Mediterranean, are totally disenchanted. Turkey can no longer be regarded as a United States base in that area and Greece, suffering brutal internal political and economic problems, is about to leave NATO completely.

It is against this backdrop that the United States should hasten to reexamine its attitude on detente.

If our interest in mollifying the Soviet Union through detente suggests a corresponding disinterest in our relations with NATO, the alliance could very well collapse, with the NATO nations trying, one way or another, to accommodate with the Soviet Union.

It is time for the leadership of our country to see detente as an abstraction, simply a theatrical camouflage on the Soviet Union's part, for pursuing its political war.

Stripping off the camouflage, we see that detente did not keep the Soviets from arming the North Vietnamese in violation of the Paris Peace accord. It did not cause the Soviets to work for peace during the October, 1973, Middle East war. It has resulted in the two Strategic Arms Limitation meetings, SALT I and SALT II, which actually limited nothing and, since the Soviet Union is ready and willing to spend far more on arms than is needed for defense, it has moved her clearly into the position of No. 1 in the nuclear world. In that world, it might be observed, being No. 2 is no better than being No. 20.

Detente, it is plain, has helped our enemies and has done us no good whatever. Furthermore, it has shaken the confidence of our allies. Now, in the wake of Vietnam, we would be well advised to ask ourselves if it is not, in the long run, better to have a meaningful detente with our friends than a worthless detente with our enemies.

Congress backs up Ford's defense stance

By Richard L. Strout
Staff correspondent of
The Christian Science Monitor

Washington

Nations of the world take note: Congress is supporting President Ford's defense posture.

Assassination of two U.S. Air Force officers in Tehran will only strengthen congressional support, it is believed.

The Vietnam episode, paradoxically, has increased, not diminished, legislative backing for President Ford in certain critical international areas, all signs indicate.

"This is no time to diminish U.S. troop strength abroad," Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D) of Montana, a long-time supporter of reducing overseas American military strength, told Congress, in effect, this week.

The Senate, which cut off weapons shipments to Turkey Feb. 5 because they were used in the Cyprus dispute with Greece, relaxed the ban May 19 by a narrow vote, 41-40.

Congress is sending a signal abroad: It is telling the world not to overdiscount America's will to act resolutely.

It is, in a way, a negative signal: there is no policy deadlock in Washington.

Congress often plays a slow-moving but profound part in American foreign policy. It tilted its support from Turkey to Greece in the Cyprus question. It angered the White House by restricting trade agreements with the Soviet Union in the absence of Russian concessions on Jewish emigration.

Less capriciously, after 10 years of almost undeviating support of the executive in Vietnam, in August, 1973, it limited the President's discretion to send troops, shell or bomb and, in the final agony of collapse, rejected President Ford's appeal to appropriate $720 million in additional military aid.

Congress moves deliberately but knows when it has had enough, it is noted here. But now the signal is different.

With Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger talking to Russian Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko in Vienna and then traveling to Ankara, and with President Ford just about to attend the NATO meeting in Brussels May 29-30, Congress feels, judging from repeated assertions on and off the floor, that this is a time to support the executive. It must not foster a mistaken notion abroad that the United States is a paper tiger.

Senator Mansfield, in an impassioned speech on Turkish aid, told the Senate that the vote was expressly scheduled to allay Turkish resentment, and that it was designed to strengthen America's good offices on the Cyprus question and thereby to strengthen the North Atlantic Treaty Alliance. He asked for support "at this moment of history." He got a hairline victory.

The House took its turn, May 20. By an overwhelming vote, 311-95, it rejected an amendment to cut the 416,500 U.S. troops abroad by 70,000. The meaning of the one-sided vote was plain to many here — Congress does not want the Vietnam episode to be misinterpreted. Instead of weakening the executive's hand, Vietnam has strengthened it, in this particular situation.

Last year a proposal to cut U.S. troops overseas by 100,000 lost by 240-163 — a considerably less-lopsided vote than now. Some had thought that the 75 freshmen Democrats might tip the balance the other way. House Majority Leader Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. of Massachusetts, however, summed it up. This is the "wrong time" for such action, he said.

What Role for America?

In thinking about America's post-Indochina relations with the rest of the world it may be better to look at problems in categories rather than by making a country by country survey. With this in mind we might well consider armaments, economic resources and home-front perceptions of how to conduct foreign policy.

Since basic policy is to prevent major wars, the first priority is to avoid nuclear conflict. Here the continuing strategic arms limitation talks (SALT) are critical. At the moment this Soviet-American negotiation is hung up on intricate technical problems. Secretary Kissinger will meet again with Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko to try to resolve these issues. The Ford-Brezhnev meeting, postponed at American request, depends on bringing the SALT II talks to the point of an agreement.

Even as SALT inches forward, a second level of the nuclear problem has assumed increasing, even alarming proportions. This is the growing number of states possessing nuclear weapons, beginning with India (however much she says she is engaged only in peaceful pursuits) and quite possibly to be followed by several more nations. The weapons grade material that is the by-product of nuclear power plants is getting close to being uncontrolled or uncontrollable. The one hope here is that the Non-Proliferation Treaty review conference in Geneva may find some new devices to rein in this charging nuclear horse.

If nuclear war seems unthinkable (although we should not accept that as a premise), then conventional war is growing more and more frightening in its potential. As the International Institute for Strategic Studies recently noted, a new family of "precision guided" or so-called "smart" bombs has "dramatically" increased the potential damage and may also impinge on the nuclear control problem. One need only imagine another round in the Middle East with such new weapons involved to hope that diplomacy can head it off. Yet in Europe the mutual force reduction talks between NATO and Warsaw Pact nations has yet to achieve a breakthrough to reduction of rival forces.

The United States, more or less against its will, has been drawn toward a summit conference finale of the European Security Conference without any substantive concessions from the Communist side. It would seem to make sense to avoid that finale until or unless there is some meaningful progress on the arms talks. If there ever were a case for linkage, this is it. Furthermore, the United States has no option but to keep its forces in Western Europe (and in South Korea as well) until both sides agree to mutual scaling down. Given these and other uncertainties, the United States must continue a high level of armaments, something Congress seems willing to do with minimal cuts. Kissinger is certainly right when he says that "as a basic relationship detente has never meant the absence of competition."

The economic problems are more diffuse and more difficult to grasp than even the military problems; witness the struggle over both a domestic and an international energy program. Most Americans, like Kissinger, probably have been repelled by the demands put forward by Algeria and many other so-called developing and underdeveloped nations for a larger share of the existing pie of world resources; that is, by producers of raw materials (which we are more and more running out of ourselves) for higher prices and for some price level tie, called indexing, to the costs they pay for our farm and manufactured goods. For the last couple of decades this has been a growing problem, now brought front and center by the effectiveness of the OPEC oil cartel. While it is true, as Kissinger says, that global expansion of the prosperity pie is essential if all are to have more, the time has come when we can no longer blithely escape these demands.

Economic problems, of course, have domestic causes, as witness those in Britain. When Federal Reserve Board Chairman Arthur Burns made that remark about Britain going down the drain (he later apologized to the British ambassador—for saying it out loud), he was thinking of our own internal imbalances. Our legislative-executive gulf remains wide but at least there are efforts to bridge it.

If there are efforts to resolve, or at least move forward, in the arms control and economic fields, both nationally and internationally, the same

Viet War Weapons Were a Mixed 'Bag'

By CHUCK BELL

Indeed, there was no end of the contrivances to which they resorted against each other.—Thucydides

Every war in history has produced a flood of new weapons and clever devices and the Indochina war was no exception.

One new weapon that was forged on the battlefields of Southeast Asia was the attack helicopter.

The U.S. Army already was experimenting with the attack helicopter concept when the United States became involved in the war but there was no attack helicopter in existence, although the Lockheed Co. was at work on the design for the AH-56A Cheyenne.

The lack of a helicopter designed primarily for the attack role was keenly felt, especially after experience with makeshift armed helicopters showed how effective they could be in suppressing ground fire during helicopter-borne assaults and casualty evacuation operations.

The Bell Helicopter Co. filled the void by developing, on its own initiative, an armed version of its highly successful UH-1 utility helicopter. Called the AH-1 Huey-Cobra, Bell's creation was little more than a flying gun platform and, in that respect, was reminiscent of Bell's World War II P-39 Airacobra.

About two thousand Huey-Cobras, in several different configurations, were built during the war. They were armed with a variety of weapons, including 7.62mm Miniguns, rapid-fire cannon, grenade launchers and air-to-ground rockets.

The UH-1 wasn't the only non-combat aircraft that was turned into a combat aircraft for service in Indochina. Some of the most unlikely airplanes were transformed from peaceful critters into ferocious beasts of prey by the simple expedient of attaching guns to the wings or fuselage and adding an "A" to the designation.

Thus the T-37 jet trainer equipped with guns and bombs became the A-37. The aging C-47 cargo plane of pre-World War II vintage had three Miniguns installed and became the AC-47—better known as "Puff the Magic Dragon." The versatile Lockheed C-130 Hercules got a similar treatment and became the AC-130.

Even some combat aircraft were pressed into roles they were not designed for. The B-52 heavy strategic bomber, designed originally for carrying nuclear bombs into the Soviet Union, was adapted to carry conventional "iron bombs" to targets in Indochina. One B-52 could carry 60,000 pounds of high explosive (HE) bombs—as much as 30 World War II B-17s could carry.

Not all the weapons and techniques used in Indochina were new, however. The Navy's role in Vietnam, for example, consisted largely of launching air strikes from aircraft carriers in the Gulf of Tonkin against targets in North and South Vietnam. Except for the fact that the planes carrying the bombs were modern, jet-propelled F-4s and A-7s instead of the old propeller-driven SBD Dauntlesses, these operations were quite similar to the kind of thing the Navy did in World War II.

At one point, the Navy reached even further back into its bag of tricks and recommissioned the battleship New Jersey. The presumably obsolete vessel lurked several miles off the coast and used her nine 16-inch guns to hurl tons of HE shells at targets on the shore, with pinpoint accuracy and devastating effect.

The Navy introduced one new wrinkle to the war in the form of high-speed river patrol craft that saw extensive service on the Mekong River. The enemy quickly learned to respect these fast and impressively armed boats.

On the ground, the foot soldier found himself being equipped with a variety of devices designed to increase his range and striking power. The Indochina War was the first conflict in which the infantryman's primary weapon was an assault rifle. Developed by the Germans in the closing days of World War II, the assault rifle came to fruition in Southeast Asia with American troops and their allies armed with the much-maligned but quite effective M-16 and the Communist troops toting the equally effective AK-47.

Some American troops used the new M-79 40 mm grenade launcher, in effect a shoulder-fired light artillery piece.

For positional defense, the Americans and South Vietnamese used the Claymore mine, one of the most fiendish weapons of mass slaughter ever developed. The Claymore consisted primarily of a convex-shaped charge with thousands of ball bearings lining the convex face. It could be triggered either by a trip wire or by a remote control switch and proved highly effective in halting human wave attacks.

cannot be said for our home front perception of how to conduct foreign policy or what the scope and reach of that policy should be. In many ways this is our most pressing categorical problem, and one-shot show-we're-tough exercises like the Mayaguez affair provide no answer.

More than 40 years ago President Roosevelt said to Francis Perkins: "Remember how Wilson lost the League of Nations, lost the opportunity for the United States to take part in the most important international undertaking ever conceived. He lost it by not getting Congress to participate. They have a sense of their responsibility, and they can't have sincere convictions unless they are given a chance to examine the situation at close range."

We are back at square one on that. Kissinger now perceives a contest in America between "a more radical" and "a more conservative trend" and he complains that the administration "is more naked to day-to-day pressures of public opinion than has been the case throughout the entire post-war period." On the other hand, a leading senator sees "the country's mind" open to a debate on America's role if only the administration is ready. The time is ripe to begin, perhaps with a "foreign policy summit" discussion before TV cameras as Columbia Professor Brezinski has suggested.

Conservative political challenges to both President Ford and the liberal Democrats by such as Ronald Reagan and George Wallace may seem to be essentially domestic in nature; both have strong foreign policy overtones. A presidential campaign can be a very useful way to sort out national attitudes, but the country first of all needs some less heated discussion of basics before we get to that climactic round.

Americans may be exhausted by war and all the rest, but there is no escaping a role in the world. We had better decide what it should be, and reasonably soon.

Seizure at sea

President Ford took a nicely calculated risk over the Mayaguez, and pulled it off. On Monday this American merchant ship, carrying a mixed cargo from Hongkong to a port in Thailand, was stopped by a Cambodian naval vessel, boarded and forced to anchor. Mr Ford ordered an aircraft carrier and other warships to enter the Gulf of Thailand and had some Marines flown to an air base in Thailand, in the face of protests from Bangkok. But he also sought to make diplomatic contact with the new regime in Phnom Penh and to induce China to help get the ship and its American crew released.

He was clearly not spoiling for a fight with Cambodia's new rulers—or with Congress. The Cooper-Church amendment could be seen as barring him from using American forces in Cambodia without congressional approval, and many congressional figures had painful memories of the way the Administration had misled them about the facts of the Tonkin Gulf incident in 1964. The Mayaguez had been seized when it was well away from the Cambodian mainland but close to some islets claimed by Cambodia and thus arguably within its territorial waters. But Mr Ford was also not minded to bow to "an act of piracy".

Diplomacy having yielded no quick results, he authorised air attacks on Cambodian gunboats when they looked like trying to move the captive crew to the mainland, and then landed Marines on the island nearest to the ship. By Thursday the Mayaguez and its crew were in American hands; the Thais might still be indignant, but Mr Ford was riding high after his brief venture into brinkmanship.

This was a fresh reminder that brinkmanship is sometimes necessary and sometimes works—even when it is hard on the nerves.

Mayaguez Post-Mortems

In the two hours before the rescue of the Mayaguez and its crew began, the White House notified 22 congressional leaders that the President had ordered a limited military operation to achieve that end. Not one of the leaders posed a serious question about the nature or scope or necessity of the impending action.

I cite that information, which was originally disclosed by Saul Friedman of the Knight newspapers, as a caution against the spate of post-mortems on the Mayaguez affair. Whether critical or favorable, the inquests have ignored a central feature of the whole operation. As the unwonted silence of the congressmen indicates, it was a fast-moving, highly operational affair intrinsically resistant to second guessing or kibitzing.

Consider first what seems to be the most plausible of the criticisms. That is the argument that President Ford should have waited before taking military action.

Perhaps so. But a special characteristic of the Mayaguez affair was that the Cambodians did not immediately move the captured ship and its crew to a mainland port. Since the ship was anchored at Koh Tang island and the crew was presumed to be with it, the opportunity for rescue presented itself.

But there was no reason to think the opportunity would last long. On the contrary, the normal supposition had to be that the ship and crew would soon be taken beyond the reach of American amphibious forces.

So there was intense pressure on President Ford to move with dispatch. The case of the Mayaguez, in other words, fit that rare category governed by the famous words of Macbeth: "If it were done when 'tis done, then 'twere well it were done quickly."

The idiosyncratic character of the action is even more cogently illustrated by the charge that the United States has somehow set a new and fearful precedent. According to this charge, President Ford is now wantonly asserting the right to attack any nation which, whether legitimately or not, apprehends an American vessel. It is suggested that, on the basis of the Mayaguez affair, the United States should be attacking Ecuador for the seizure of American fishing boats off its Pacific coast.

But the seizures off the coast of Ecuador have a long and involved history. American boats have been fishing, and perhaps overfishing, those waters for years. The government of Ecuador has repeatedly protested, and repeatedly threatened action, against the fishing boats. Only against that background did the seizures take place.

There was no such history in the Mayaguez affair. The capture came as a bolt from the blue without any warning. No discussion between the two governments was under way. Neither was there any advance claim of a Cambodia right violated by American shipping. Indeed, these resembles chalk more than the Cambodian seizure resembled those of Ecuador, and to make one a precedent for the other smacks to me of deliberate scaremongering.

Far worse than the criticisms, however, are the exaggerated claims made out for the Mayaguez rescue. Particularly suspect is the claim that the United States proved something which ought to make us proud to be Americans. In reality, the Mayaguez is far too special an incident, and Cambodia far too tiny a country, for one to believe that anything was proved.

It is suggested that the most egregious claims are advanced by Vice President Nelson Rockfeller and Secretary of State Kissinger. They are the ones who wanted to use B-52 bombers against Cambodia as a punishment. That proposal was no mere "option." In fact, the bombers were ready, with the bombs in place, when the rescue got under way.

If post-mortems have to be made, the truly outrageous proposal to use strategic bombers against Cambodia strikes me as the measuring rod. Perhaps President Ford did act too hastily. Perhaps there was an element of punitive action in his decision, as well as a determination to get back the ship and crew. Still the very nature of the episode should induce caution about second-guessing. The more so since, except for the moderation of the President, the Secretary of Defense and the military chiefs, the outcome could have been far worse.

Ford Acted Admirably In Ship Piracy Incident

The morning the marines were dispatched to Cambodia to free the pirated vessel and rescue its American crew, it happened that I was testifying, at the invitation of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, on the impact of detente on United States policy in the United Nations. Suddenly the charming chairman of this body, Sen. Sparkman of Alabama, zigged off the subject and asked: "What would you do, if you were in command, about the imprisoned ship in Cambodia?" To which I replied, with characteristic self-effacement, that if I were in command, there wouldn't be an imprisoned American ship in Cambodia. Having said this, I thought, really, that my reply sounded like unadulterated rodomontade and attempted elaboration.

Listen now to some hard facts about the Mayaguez affair.

The general feeling of exultation, outside the columns of those writers whose day is ruined by any successful American show of force, is endemic. It was a most cheerful antidote, after months of bad news. Peter Drucker wrote in a recent book that the only thing a government can do successfully is inflate the currency and make war. We had begun to doubt that it could even do the latter. But President Ford gambled — and he won.

But he was very very lucky. The marines might easily have landed on that little island only to find the American crew departed, destination unknown. If the FBI cannot find Patricia Hearst in our own country, it is unlikely that we could have found the 39 crewmen in Cambodia, a hostile totalitarian country whose leaders have been acting not only as Communists, but like the tribe that lost its head.

What, then, would we have done? What can one do to Cambodia? You could, without too much trouble, close down the port of Sihanoukville: we did that once. But this would have been at once a major international provocation with a long, long fuse, and a minor inconvenience for a country that could easily have been provisioned by its friendly neighbor, North Vietnam, together with its satellite, South Vietnam.

Would we then have started mass bombing? Of what? There are a few airfields we could have dumped on, but there isn't, in Cambodia, that concentration of military fortifications that is specially vulnerable to our B-52s; besides which, action on such a scale would have required consultation with Congress, and before long, ambiguity would have set in — such ambiguity as surrounded the Pueblo incident and paralyzed Lyndon Johnson. And that was back before we repealed the Imperial Presidency.

The only way, then, to keep our ships from being pirated is to create an atmosphere in which it simply does not occur to any major power, let alone mini power, that these are games which nations can safely play. Henry Kissinger once told a friend that when the North Koreans shot down our spy plane over the neutral waters of the Sea of Japan, the Cabinet was summoned for a discussion of what to do. Nixon had been in office only a few weeks, and decided to temporize with North Korea rather than face the country with a split cabinet. On reflection, Kissinger said, it was clear that the North Koreans were testing the waters. It is not fantasy to say that what happened off Cambodia — and everything in between — might have been affected by our failure to react sharply — conclusively — against North Korea in January 1969.

The fact of the matter is that little countries like North Korea and Cambodia don't go about stopping Russian ships in the middle of the ocean and dragging them in. Well, you say, that is because they are natural allies. But little countries like Chile, and even bigger ones like Brazil, don't go out dredging the waters for Russian ships. It is not diplomatically cool to specify what happens to countries that try such imprudent things. It is better left to them to wonder what would happen, to know only that something quite dreadful would happen, so that the course of prudence is to respect the sovereignty of other countries. As I say, Cambodia wouldn't have tried it if, over the years, our foreign policy had made such escapades unthinkable.

Still, even in an adverse context, President Ford behaved admirably.

HOUSE DEFENSE DEBATE DRAWS ATTENTION TO MAYAGUEZ RESCUE

In House debate on the defense authorization bill last week, floor managers for the measure pointed to the rescue of the freighter Mayaguez off the Cambodian coast as evidence of U.S. strength and will that must be maintained.

Rep. Bob Wilson (R-Calif.), ranking minority member on the Armed Services Committee, declared that the Mayaguez episode should be "a signal to our friends and potential enemies." He added that it would be a "very reassuring" further signal if the House votes down any cuts in the authorization request beyond the $3.7 billion already pared off by the committee.

Armed Services Chairman Melvin Price (D-Ill.) said in his statement opening general debate that he would oppose further reductions because they would cut into the "muscle and bone" of the nation's defense. The Constitution requires Congress to provide for both defense and the general welfare, he noted, and "we can't pump continually from defense into welfare."

Wilson said he was "concerned over the attitude of some on the committee" that the panel had not cut enough from the request. He said he believed that, in fact, the committee might have cut too far, and the full House "perhaps" should add funds rather than subtract further.

Rep. Charles Bennett (D-Fla.), chairman of the committee's seapower subcommittee, praised President Ford's "positive and effective" action in the Mayaguez operation, and said it underlined the importance of maintaining the freedom of sea lines of transportation and communication, the "more important" assurance that international law will be upheld, and the necessity for strong nuclear-powered naval strike forces.

U.S. Naval Power Was Key

Bennett agreed with Rep. Samuel Stratton (D-N.Y.), a senior member of the committee, that the rescue off Cambodia was possible only because of the power and availability of U.S. naval force. He also concurred in Stratton's statement that the Mayaguez incident, together with the U.S. withdrawal of forces from Thailand at the request of the Thai government, argued for the Navy and Air Force to proceed with their plans to expand the U.S. installation on the British-owned island of Diego Garcia.

"Yes, I think that the modest extension of Diego Garcia is essential," Bennett said. (President Ford earlier last week formally notified both houses of Congress that he had determined that "construction of such facilities is essential to the national interest." The certification was required under a provision of the fiscal year 1975 military construction bill passed last year, before DOD could proceed with the work.)

The House was to wind up general debate on the authorization last week. Today, it will turn to consideration of amendments, including a substitute bill in the form of an amendment to be offered by six junior Democratic members of Armed Services, the "some on the committee" Wilson referred to, who voted against committee passage of the bill last week. The substitute would trim the request by $4.8 billion.

Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.) said in remarks prepared for delivery on the Senate floor that more than $800 million in outlays could be eliminated from the FY '76 defense budget by cutting or delaying the following from the DOD request: Airborne Warning and Control System (AWACS)--$285.6 million; Site Defense--$132.4 million; SAM-D missile system--$118.1 million; XM-1 tank program--$53.2 million; civil defense (non-personnel)--$72 million; and selective service--$47.9 million.

Cranston included these weapons programs in discussing a list of "debatable assumptions" during an appearance Wednesday before the Senate Appropriations defense subcommittee chaired by Sen. John L. McClellan (D-Ark.). He said these and other programs are included as necessities in the budget presented by the Defense Department, but should be studied further by Congress because "our national needs are too great, and our national resources too limited, to accept this huge Schlesinger turn-around budget uncritically."

Sen. Lawton Chiles (D-Fla.), who had also asked to appear before the McClellan subcommittee, said he agreed with those who want to cut the defense budget "to eliminate the still enormous waste and duplication. But I think we have to mature beyond 'knee-jerk' reactions that make the defense budget an annual whipping boy in some people's minds."

Sen. Henry Bellmon (R-Okla.) told McClellan that he believed that the Administration's request of $94 billion for FY '76 defense spending is "close to the absolute minimum the Congress should appropriate to help assure peace and stability in the world." At the same time, he said "the time has come for America to reassess our peace-keeping methods in an attempt to develop alliances and methods which will ultimately reduce the back-breaking costs for these economically unproductive military expenditures."

Soviets, U.S. Study Nuclear Options

By ROBERT BETTS
Copley News Service

World holocaust, with cities lying in smoking ruins, populations wiped out, perhaps a whole civilization ended—that is what nuclear war means to most people.

But what about a limited nuclear exchange?

"Unlikely, but possible," say Pentagon strategists.

"The likelihood of a nuclear exchange starting with a selective strike, however low, is still higher than the likelihood of such an exchange starting with a strike at the urban industrial centers of the United States," Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger has told the Senate subcommittee on Arms Control, International Law and Organization.

The hearing took place several months ago, but a report entitled "Briefing on Counterforce Attacks" only recently has been made public.

A limited attack might result in "relatively few civilian casualties," said Schlesinger — meaning perhaps a million or less, compared with the estimated 95 million to 100 million "prompt plus fallout fatalities" that would result from a massive strike.

Schlesinger told the committee: "The ability of the United States to respond to such an attack contributes to the deterrence of such an attack.

"If our only option were to be able to launch massive strikes against the Soviet urban industrial base, the Soviets in these hypothetical circumstances . . . might believe that the United States might be self-deterred and that, therefore, they could with relatively low risk selectively attack the interior of the United States.

"If the United States possesses the ability to respond in kind, then the Soviet planner is faced with the prospect that the United States would respond and leave him in a no-gain situation and, therefore, he would continue to be deterred. Deterrence remains the name of the game."

Schlesinger reported that the Soviet Union had proceeded with a set of development initiatives "that are surprising in their depth and strength. Their new land-based missiles possess throw-weights which on the average are three times that of the previous array of missiles.

"They appear to be acquiring on the order of 7,000 or 8,000 MIRVs (multiple independently targetable reentry vehicle) just in their ICBM (intercontinental ballistic missile) force, let alone their SLBM (submarine launched ballistic missile) force."

The Department to Defense also has information that "the Soviets have achieved or will soon achieve, accuracies of 500 to 700 meters with their ICBMs . . . that would repre-

Pacific Fleet Readiness Impaired, Admiral Says

By DAVE POLIS
Military Writer
The San Diego Union

HONOLULU — Pacific Fleet readiness remains impaired as a result of years of Vietnam operations based on expediency, the commander of the Pacific Fleet said, and the Navy is still attempting to return to good maintenance and overhaul habits.

Adm. Maurice Weisner said in an interview "We drove our ships at a tempo that they hadn't been designed to be driven from the standpoint of repair and spare parts, and it meant we didn't have the normal time in shipyards and for other repair activities."

HABIT FADES

Weisner, who commanded the 7th Fleet and was Yankee Station commander in 1969, recalled the Navy was forced to defer a great deal of maintenance and overhaul, and "we sort of got out of the habit of good operating procedures that we have used over the years.

"Now we have to get back to good procedures of maintenance and operations — and we are doing that.

"Readiness is being improved, but it is something you do not turn around overnight. It takes a lengthy period to correct things once you have a trend going that you do not want, and you have to reverse it," he said.

However, not all of the changes are within the fleet's budget. The Navy had to defer 10 ship overhauls during the current fiscal year because Congress eliminated money for them, a spokesman said.

Weisner said it takes six to 10 years to build a fighting ship, "and if something isn't appropriated by Congress to take care of inflation, then you have to eat that out of your hide."

Readiness of the Pacific Fleet also is being impaired by the lack of skilled petty officers, Weisner said.

"Certain ratings are perfectly satisfactory, but in other ratings like engineer and electronics operation specialists, we are in considerable trouble. The number of people in middle management rates in these areas is as low as 50 per cent of the need," he said.

Recent testimony by the chief of naval personnel, Vice Adm. David Bagley, indicated 42 per cent of fleet units were marginally ready or unready for combat in terms of personnel at the end of 1974.

The solution for the present, Weisner said, is to train men "faster than we would like to and try to get them up to a reasonable level of efficiency in doing their job."

A Navy spokesman said it takes six to 10 years to train a 1st class petty officer.

With less than desired manning, Weisner said, "you have to consider what you can do with your operational tempo. You might figure with no constraints, with optimum manning, you could operate "X" number of days, 24 hours a day, with no deferment.

"With a lesser number of people in certain skills you can't go that far, you have to reduce your operational tempo," he said.

The Navy has retired about half of its Vietnam-era fleet, prefering to use money saved on maintenance and overhaul of older ships to build a new fleet.

However, despite the new ships, aircraft and weapons systems being added as part of this modernization program, Weisner questions whether the Pacific Fleet will be able to carry out its mission in another five or six years.

"Even with the newer types of aircraft and ships," he said, "the Soviets are bringing in new types of equipment too.

"We can't assume that a small number of ships can achieve superiority and control. The problem is that while we are building new and good ships, the Soviets are building new, good ships at a much faster rate than we are.

"If this continues over a period of maybe five or six years, we are going to be in critical condition in so far as being able to defend ourselves in the areas of the world we feel we must."

Weisner said some of the new weapons will give the Navy new capabilities, while others will be " covering, to a certain extent, deficiencies."

Some of these new systems include the F-14 Tomcat, a twinengine, swingwing fighter-interceptor with a long-range missile system capable of intercepting enemy cruise or antiship missiles.

The Navy's new S-3 Viking carrier-based subhunter is described by Weisner as a "quantum jump" over the Navy's existing submarine patrol aircraft, the S-2 Tracker.

"Because of its radar, its speed and its ability to search out a given area in a shorter time, it has a volume of time to area capability five or six to one over other means," he said.

The F-14 is being introduced to the fleet at Miramar Naval Air Station, making its first deployment aboard the carrier Enterprise. The S-3 is being introduced at North Island, and is scheduled to make its first deployment in the Mediterranean aboard the carrier John F. Kennedy.

HARPOON TESTING

The Navy's long-awaited Harpoon antiship missile, to be put aboard virtually all surface combatants and many aircraft and submarines, is about to begin operational testing, the final step before McDonnell-Douglas Astronautics Co. of St. Louis begins producing operational missiles.

Weisner said the new missile will give surface ships their own offensive capability, and give operational commanders more freedom in using ships without the support of air cover from an aircraft carrier.

The Harpoon missile, in an encapsulated form, is being developed for use aboard submarines. Shot from a standard torpedo tube, it will give a submarine commander an antiship weapon with three times the range of the Navy's newest torpedo, the Mark 48, according to a spokesman.

Files Show Martin Waited Too Long

By Jack Anderson and Les Whitten

President Ford's own files dispute his statements and confirm our charges about Ambassador Graham Martin's handling of the Vietnam evacuation.

After we reported that Martin had badly 'botched' evacuation effort, the President defended him. Martin did a "good job" and directed a "successful evacuation," said Mr Ford.

This is not what the confidential White House records show. We have had access to some of these documents. We have also interviewed key people who were involved in the evacuation, including some of the refugees themselves.

The President outlined his objectives at a secret strategy session April 9 in the conference room next to the Oval Office. His first concern, he said, was to save "about 6,000 Americans now in South Vietnam."

But he also declared firmly: "A large number of South Vietnamese have worked for the U.S. at great personal peril. Roughly 175,000 to 200,000 will be the first to suffer . . . I think here's a moral responsibility for us to help those people who helped us."

Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger, according to the confidential minutes, stressed that the "removal must be handled so as to avoid panic." He reflected the views of his man in Saigon, the implacable Graham Martin, who kept dragging his heels.

A few senators, privy to the developments in Saigon, became alarmed over the slow pace of the evacuation. In response to their inquiries, the President invited the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to the White House on April 14 for a briefing, which he stressed "must be an executive secret] session."

"Mr. President," pleaded Sen. Charles H. Percy (R-Ill.), "could you order that every seat be filled on every outgoing plane?"

Mr. Ford said Kissinger had already given Martin orders that "should achieve that."

"We felt the President should be sure through some agent other than Martin that your orders are being urgently carried out," interjected Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y). "Our first priority must be to bring every American out and such Vietnamese . . . as can be brought out."

"The orders that we have given will be carried out," the President promised. Then, referring to the Vietnamese, he pledged: "As far as I can, within the law, I'm going to do all I can to help those people . . ."

But it was too late; Martin had waited too long. He was unable to process all the Vietnamese who clamored to escape. The State Department, for example, wanted to cable Saigon a list of intellectuals who were vulnerable to Communist retaliation and should be rescued.

But Martin, incredibly, refused even to accept the list. He informed the State Department icily that the embassy was making the decisions and had matters in hand.

Meanwhile, on April 21, the Vietnamese who thronged outside the embassy to save their families were greeted with this poignant notice: "PETITIONS FOR RELATIVES. Due to the press of business, we have temporarily suspended acceptance of petitions for parents, brothers and sisters. DO NOT WAIT IN LINE IF YOU ARE HERE FOR THIS PURPOSE. We hope to be able to accept petitions for parents, brothers and sisters in the near future."

The next day, according to White House minutes, Kissinger reported that it was "not realistic to count on the release of large numbers of South Vietnamese."

There was little more President Ford could do except joke about the crisis. The confidential minutes quote him as telling about one man who "showed up with four wives."

"Which one do you want out?" he was asked. His quick response, said the President, was: "I want the youngest one."

There was nothing funny, however, about the scramble by desperate Vietnamese to get their loved ones on the exit petitions. The petitions provided spaces for the names of relatives. Refugees have sworn to us that U.S. embassy employees sold the spaces like carnival barkers.

This 'profiteering 'in human distress was done by the Vietnamese employees, seldom by the American staff members, according to the refugees.

One refugee's story is typical of the several we have heard. He asked us not to use his name, because he is afraid of the consequences. But he alleges that he had to pay $3,000, two-thirds of it in gold, just to be introduced to someone who could place him and his family on an exit petition. Then it cost him another $3,000 to be listed.

He was told to wait for a call. It came at 3 a.m. on April 27. He was instructed to have his family at the airport by 5 a.m. Yet the curfew didn't end until 7 a.m. Anyone appearing on the streets earlier could be shot on sight.

He bundled his family aboard a 7 a.m. bus for the airport, where he was told he had missed his flight and would have to return to the end of the line. It took some frantic arguing and appealing for him to get his family aboard a later flight. Since the $6,000 bribe money had wiped out their entire life's savings, they arrived in the United States penniless.

At a secret White House meeting on April 29, Kissinger reported that of the 175,000 Vietnamese whom the President had hoped to rescue, the paperwork had been completed for 130,000 but that only 45,000 made it.

It is clear from the available documents that the man who is chiefly to blame, as we have reported in previous columns, is Graham Martin.

cent about a fourth to a third of a nautical mile."

At the present time the Soviets have a couple of thousand warheads, Schlesinger said. He added: "As you look out beyond 1975 they probably will start a process of deployment of MIRVed missiles which we would expect to number about 200 ICBMs a year if they conform to previous trends. So, roughly seven or eight years from now they could have on the order of 7,000 MIRVed reentry bodies deployed."

Schlesinger admitted that the choice of U.S. targets the Soviets might choose to strike, should they wish to initiate nuclear warfare on a limited scale, is highly speculative.

"It does not seem unreasonable, however," he said, "to assume one of their major objectives would be to reduce the nuclear retaliatory capability of the United States . . .

"It is precisely because we cannot confidently predict the targets the Soviets might choose to strike that we emphasize the need for flexibility in our planning and our retargeting capability, plus the need for good command control and communications capability to permit ad hoc adjustments to the situation at hand."

The subcommittee also heard a discussion on the "bargaining chip" concept. Schlesinger explained:

"What I am saying is that there must be a functional relationship between the forces the Soviet Union deploys and the forces that the United States deploys; that they must recognize that if they take certain steps we will match them; and that, therefore, we have research and development projects in development which will give us the capability to respond to certain actions of the Soviet Union which we hope they will not take. If they do take these actions, then these projects will not be bargaining chips.

"We think we must be prepared to deploy these additional capabilities in order to maintain an appropriate balance, but we are prepared to renounce them if the other side reciprocates.

"We would hope they turned out to be bargaining chips and that both sides are willing to renounce their new programs."

The Defense Department wants it clearly understood, however, that it is not advocating a strategy which makes the initiation of limited nuclear war an attractive proposition.

"The point Defense Secretary Schlesinger's briefing is intended to bring home," it was stated, "is that the United States would be much worse off if it responded to a Soviet limited nuclear strike by retaliating against Soviet cities, bringing upon itself a Soviet counterstrike on U.S. cities . . ." (with resultant damage in the order of 100 million fatalities).

The Marine Corps Faces East

New Transatlantic Orientation for Corps

By JAMES D. HESSMAN
Editor-in-Chief

AFTER more than half a century of a conscious orientation toward conflict in the Pacific—the theater in which it has fought its last three wars—the Marine Corps has done a conceptual and organizational about-face and is now gearing its personnel and hardware for possible deployment in Europe, the Mediterranean, Middle East, Persian Gulf, and Africa.

The Corps' new eastward orientation, being conducted with little fuss and fanfare, results from a number of interrelated strategic, geopolitical, and economic considerations:

(1) During the peak of the Vietnam War over three fourths of the Marine Corps was committed to Southeast Asia. A more balanced worldwide USMC posture following withdrawal of U.S. forces from Vietnam was inevitable in any case.

(2) Even though the Marines are, as always, prepared for combat anywhere in the world, including Asia (again), the unhappy U.S. experience in Vietnam and Cambodia makes it almost impossible that any U.S. President could commit U.S. troops to a new Asian land war for another generation or longer. Recent headlines detailing the renewed traumas in those unhappy countries greatly exacerbate the already bitter divisiveness in U.S. political circles concerning American policy, past and present, toward Southeast Asia, and make it an even less likely future theater of operations for U.S. forces.

(3) Contrary to the thesis that generals are always preparing to fight "the last war," the Marines traditionally have tried to keep ahead of the game by using their between-wars planning and strategy to determine the most likely locale of, and prepare for, "the next war." As far back as the early 1920s, in fact, the Corps began laying the technical and doctrinal bases for the amphibious operations that might be needed in a war against Japan. The most likely sites of future conflict today, according to USMC position papers, "are in the NATO, Mediterranean, and/or African theaters." The Corps' outlook coincides quite happily, incidentally, with the views of Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger, who in his FY 1976 "posture" testimony before Congress candidly admitted that "With the end of our involvement in Vietnam the emphasis of our planning has shifted toward Europe. ... Most of our forces are or soon will be oriented toward a war in Europe."

(4) During the October 1973 Yom Kippur War the United States found its NATO allies not only unwilling to join with the United States in coming to the aid of Israel, but even, in several cases, so afraid of Arab oil retaliation that they would not permit the overflight rights necessary for the United States to transfer its own European-based equipment to Israel. Whether the U.S. or general European view was "right" is not important. What is significant for U.S. planning purposes is that the United States has been put on notice that U.S. forces may, despite existing treaties and fervent allied declarations of interdependence, have to go it alone in future crises. And if U.S. Army and Air Force units in Europe were again to be held in checkmate, the Navy and Marine Corps forces afloat, unhindered by geographical or treaty constraints, would once more have to serve as the leading edge of American naval and military power.

(5) The Vietnam experience has not only made it less likely that U.S. ground forces will be thrown into future

The Marines Deserve Better

The Marines were in trouble before their rescue of the Mayaguez. They still are. Despite their performance and their reputation, they continue to be budgetary stepchildren among the armed forces. They deserve better.

What they did last week in the Gulf of Thailand was a classic, romantic Marine operation. It was in fact a near duplicate of their role in the first naval battle in our history as a nation, the raid on New Providence in the Bahamas in March 1776.

As they stormed ashore at Tang Island last week, so they landed near Nassau then, capturing 88 cannons and a variety of other war booty from the British base. Through the Barbary wars, to the Mexican War, through the banana wars of the early 1900s, they were always there. And the reputation they built in those years has turned out to be a disadvantage in modern times.

The assumption became that the Marines were useful primarily to fight ill-equipped primitives in little sideshow operations to the main events conducted by the Army. The grain of truth in that persists even to this day.

Between the great wars, in the 1930s, the Marines perfected the techniques of amphibious warfare essential to winning World War II. In that war, their strength more than half a million, they were the spearhead of the advance toward Japan. Theirs was the most admirable record in Korea.

They developed the techniques of helicopter warfare while the Army was still scattering troops all over the landscape with parachutes. In Vietnam they held the northernmost end of the country through the years of toughest fighting.

Yet regardless of their battle streamers, despite the fact that they traditionally have loaded more men into their rifle companies and fewer into their administrative overhead than any other service branch, the Marines remain an afterthought when the Pentagon splits up its money.

In 1942, when Army infantrymen were using the new Garand rifle, the Marines still had the 1903-model Springfield. In Vietnam, when Army divisions were equipped with the new M-16 rifle, the Marines still had the heavier M-14.

Today, the Marines are still getting along with pre-Vietnam tanks, anti-tank and anti-aircraft missiles, while the latest versions of those weapons have been shipped to the nations of the Middle East.

That is one cause of faltering morale among many career Marines. Another factor is even more depressing and harder to solve.

The all-volunteer Marine Corps, now 196,000 strong, has been plagued by violence and crime in its ranks. Desertion is up. Serious racial problems rent units that survived in earlier tight places because of their close-knit spirit. These problems have created others, driving some career Marines to resign.

That was where the Marines stood before the fall of Vietnam. Under these discouraging circumstances the Marines have demonstrated again — in the Vietnam evacuation and in the Mayaguez affair — that they can fill the assignment they were given in 1947, to be the nation's first-line force in readiness.

They deserve better.

Asian conflicts; it also, it is hoped, served to thoroughly discredit the "gradual escalation" strategy of the Johnson-McNamara years. For both political and economic reasons it now seems extremely unlikely that the United States would at any time in the foreseeable future become involved in a protracted conflict anywhere in the world. Once again, the call to arms, if and when it should come, would go first to the "quick deployment" forces—Navy, Marine Corps, and Air Force (U.S.-based wings, particularly)—with most Army units held in reserve for commitment, if still needed, in the later stages of conflict.

(6) Soviet sea strength has increased in recent years to such an extent that in many potential combat theaters the best and perhaps only effective U.S. strategy might be, as in the 1958 Lebanon crisis, a sudden strike, force insertion, mission accomplishment, and, if possible, immediate withdrawal of all forces initially committed before any Soviet counter-reaction would be possible. Of interest here is not only Henry Kissinger's celebrated Business Week interview—"I am not saying that there's no circumstance where we would not use force ... in the Middle East"—but also a startlingly plausible combat "scenario" by "Miles Ignotus" ("Unknown Soldier") which appeared in the March 1975 issue of Harper's Magazine under the unusually straightforward title "Seizing Arab Oil": "There would be no friendly bases within easy reach. ... The first wave should include the combat echelons of one Marine division: 14,000 men, with one or two battalions amphibious-landed and the rest simply to be unloaded from aboard ship. ... On D+3 or D+4, the expedition [against Saudi Arabia, in the scenario outlined] would be reinforced with more Marines, the combat echelons of a second division. ... The two Marine divisions would come with their organic air 'wings,' no mean force: eight Phantom fighter squadrons, two reconnaissance squadrons, and another eight 'attack' squadrons, with light and not-so-light bombers."

(7) Finally, a small but important political and psychological point: deployment of Marines, available, according to Defense Department "roles and missions" guidelines, for such assignments "as the President may direct," has historically been considered, whatever the legal ramifications, as an act somewhat short of war—perhaps because the Corps has so often been used for such peaceful purposes as evacuation of civilians and short-term protection of U.S. nationals and property, rather than as full-scale invasion or occupation forces. In today's tinderbox world it seems even more probable, therefore, that a commander-in-chief would prefer to use the Marines as his first, lower-key, option in a potential conflict situation.

The Cushman-Anderson Team

As a necessary first step to configure current and future Marine posture to the new realities of the post-Vietnam era, General Robert E. Cushman, Jr., USMC Commandant, last year assigned to his Assistant Commandant, General Earl E. Anderson, the important and extremely complex task of determining "the proper balance and structure of Marine forces for possible action in European, Middle Eastern, and African theaters, with a report to be rendered in early 1975."

The Commandant would have had a difficult time of it, incidentally, to find anyone better qualified than Anderson to carry out what is perhaps the most important restructuring and reorganization of the Corps since the end of World War II. A three-war combat veteran with experience in both the Atlantic and Pacific theatres, Anderson also had a background of assignments providing experience vital to the reassessment directed by Cushman. He had previously headed the Marine Corps Research and Development program as well as its personnel department. Further, as former Commanding General, Fleet Marine Force Atlantic/II Marine Amphibious Force (II MAF, consisting of the 2nd Marine Division and the 2d Marine Aircraft Wing), he was the field commander who actually triggered the Corps' review and reorientation by initiating a series of messages in late 1971 pointing out what he considered to be the "lack of readiness [of II MAF] commensurate with deployment and war contingency commitments and the Mideast political situation."

(The last of the messages—described by "Head Shed" officers as "the first realistic report we ever received of a command's actual readiness status"—was sent to Headquarters USMC in early March 1972 shortly before Anderson became Assistant Commandant.)

The first order of priority in the still ongoing reorientation review had to be, of course, an upgrading of (aries Kissinger and Schlesinger) "the same priorities for men and equipment for II MAF" as for III MAF in the Western Pacific, then the forward edge of Marine Corps strategy and priorities. The result, and early payoff: By the time the October 1973 Yom Kippur War had started, II MAF was more ready than it had been at any time since the 1972 Cuban Missile Crisis, when it had mounted out prepared, if necessary, for an invasion of Cuba.

Some problems remained, however. Although II MAF readiness had improved steadily, the 2d Division and Wing were still only mirror images of the two Marine divisions and wings in the Pacific, "organized to fight well anywhere but not optimized or specialized for any one geographic area or type of warfare." And an analysis of the Yom Kippur War has made two points "crystal clear": (1) "The worldwide proliferation of more sophisticated armor, especially in the Middle East, indicates that the Marine Corps itself must place more emphasis on procuring new armor and anti-armor capabilities"; and (2) There is today, more than ever before, "an absolute need for fully integrated tank-infantry-air forces combined with maximum electronic countermeasures capabilities."

Shift to Armored Divisions

The Marine Corps has, of course, always prided itself on the close integration and working effectiveness of its air-ground teams, now supplemented by what Anderson describes as "perhaps the world's best airborne electronic countermeasures in the [Grumman-built] EA-6B [Prowler]." But each MarDiv is supported by only one tank battalion, and USMC studies of the type of war which might be expected in the European or Mideast theaters indicate that three or more tank battalions per division are needed—"making them, in effect, armored divisions."

In keeping with the Yom Kippur lessons, the 2d Marine Division has been given top priority for the new M60 tanks, now starting to flow into the inventory. The diesel-powered M60s, equipped with powerful 105mm guns, will replace the aging M48s, which are powered with highly inflammable gasoline engines and armed with less capable 90mm guns.

The 2d also has been given top priority for the much needed new anti-tank weapons which the Corps will soon be getting: the heavy long-range TOW, scheduled for initial delivery in the spring of 1976, and the lighter Dragon, which starts into the inventory in the summer of 1976. An increase in the number of M60 tanks for the 2d, beyond the division's currently approved one battalion of 70 tanks, is also being studied, as are increases in the division's planned TOW and Dragon allocations. Also under consideration are: (1) an increase in the number of Marine Corps Reserve tank units—which, as Anderson points out, "will be [in event of conflict] the initial and primary augmentation for the active forces"; and (2) equipping MCR tank units, in any case, with the new M60s or with modernized M48s, retrofitted with diesel engines and 105mm guns. (Unlike the Navy, which has given short shrift to the Naval Reserve, the Marine Corps has been praised for consistently buying new weapons and other equipment items in quantities

To support its highly mobile tank forces, two six-gun medium self-propelled 155mm artillery batteries also have been added to the 2d Division. Current plans call for the 155s to fire the new CLGP (cannon-launched guided projectile), which will be directed against tank or bunker targets by the even newer MULE (modular universal laser equipment). The CLGP and MULE are not yet operational, but the Corps is supporting accelerated development and procurement of both systems.

Eight Minute Response

Aviation anti-tank capability also is being upgraded. The AV-8A Harrier V/STOL (vertical/short takeoff and landing) attack fighter is already proving to be an effective anti-tank platform with its varied assortment of guns, rockets, and both free-fall and guided bombs.

A long-time AV-8A supporter, Anderson is particularly appreciative of the "quick response time" made possible by the Harrier's vertical takeoff and landing capabilities, which enable it to be based far forward in any combat zone.

"This is extremely valuable against fleeting targets such as rapidly moving tanks," Anderson pointed out. He revealed that "response times of as little as eight minutes [vs. over 20 minutes in Vietnam] from mission request through aircraft launch and target attack have been attained" by the Harrier, noting at the same time that, from the combat Marine's point of view (and in answer to the charge sometimes made that the Harrier has "a limited load"), "It is more effective to get 3,000 pounds of ordnance on a fleeting target in ten minutes than 10,000 pounds over the target area 20 to 30 minutes later when the target has dispersed or disappeared."

The first USMC Harriers were assigned, incidentally, to the Corps' Mediterranean (Sixth Fleet) MAU (Marine Amphibious Unit) "to determine their feasibility and supportability in the NATO/Middle Eastern environment."

Aiding, abetting, and augmenting the Harrier's own unique capabilities are a number of other new aviation-oriented support hardware systems, such as Marine-invented lightweight airfield matting, a portable aircraft refueling system -both in demand by other services -and other portable airfield equipment items. Also coming along is the AH-1J Huey Cobra attack helicopter which will be armed with TOW anti-tank missiles. (The versatile and highly effective TOW, which the Marines need in large numbers, is also being considered for use on the LVTP-7 amphibian tractor.)

As they have for over a generation, the post-Vietnam Marines are also laying heavy emphasis on reliable, secure, "real-time" communications. The overall command and control system, MACCS, a still-evolving system which now integrates the top Marine air command, air defense fighters, and anti-aircraft missile defense, will in its later stages of development also bring under the same C&C umbrella a variety of close air support, helicopter operations, radar-controlled blind bombing, and air traffic control systems. In addition, MACCS provides C&C links for the Marine ANGLICO (air-naval gunfire) liaison company, which permits integration of naval gunfire and II MAF to bring that East Coast-based division/wing team (with some elements always in the Mediterranean) to the same level of readiness as I MAF (based in Southern California) and III MAF (Western Pacific). That part of the program now has been largely completed -although much still remains to be done, particularly in the hardware area, to complete upgrading of all USMC ground divisions and air wings, both active duty and Reserves. In an interview with SEA POWER, Anderson elaborated on the specifics of what already has been accomplished, and what remains to be done, in a number of hardware and personnel areas. What follows is the gist of that interview, supplemented by input from various USMC "think pieces," "position papers," and other documents.

During the Vietnam War, as Anderson reported in his EMPLANE messages, "Personnel and material readiness of II MAF units had been sacrificed to a goal of higher readiness for Pacific forces." On 18 April 1972, Cushman approved (in consonance with and, in some respects, in anticipation of, the policies later enunciated by Secretary Schlesinger) a plan to reorganize II MAF to provide close air support with Army and allied forces.

The heart of MACCS is the MTDS, or Marine Tactical Data System, which the ubiquitous Anderson ten years ago -as a colonel assigned as the first Marine weapons system project manager -godfathered to outstanding success. An MTDS unit installed on Monkey Mountain near Danang proved its worth during the 1972 North Vietnam Easter offensive by coordinating the complex and multi-faceted operations of South Vietnam's air and ground forces, U.S. Navy gunfire support ships and air support aircraft, USAF aircraft, and USMC helicopter and attack aircraft units. The MTDS was then, and still is, the only C&C system which could coordinate air, ground, and naval operations of all U.S. and allied forces.

At the same time the Corps has been adjusting its equipment requirements, it has also been reorienting its training, with the heaviest emphasis on tank and desert exercises to familiarize units with the type of conflict situations most likely to be encountered in Europe or the Mideast.

Cold-weather training, for a Northern Europe scenario, also has been stressed -at Camp Drum, N.Y., for example, on the coast of Maine, and in the 1972 multi-nation NATO "Strong Express" exercise in Norway and offshore waters. The use of combined arms—tank, aircraft, and infantry units working as a team -is the invariable rule. "Tanks and infantry together," the Marines say. "The October 1973 War showed us tanks by themselves aren't enough; you also need the infantry, working with the tanks."

In keeping with the Schlesinger-directed emphasis on service "interdependence," Marine personnel and equipment are now often flown, under the interservice Joint Airborne and Air Transportability Training program, to assigned training areas by Air Force C-5 and C-141 heavy transport aircraft (augmented by USMC C-130s).

The increased Marine use of airlift, which again illustrates the current emphasis on rapid response capability, serves also to relieve the current U.S. sealift shortage -of which all Marines are keenly aware, but don't like to talk about (not for the record, anyway).

Schlesinger is not so reticent, however. In his FY 1976 "posture" testimony he spells out the current unsatisfactory situation: "The present amphibious force of 65 ships has sufficient capacity ... to transport simultaneously the assault elements of slightly more than one Marine Amphibious Force (MAF), i.e., one Marine division/wing team and supporting elements. Our amphibious shipping, however, is about equally divided between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. Thus, to conduct a single MAF-size lift ... it would be necessary to shift half of our amphibious shipping from one ocean to the other. Moreover, about 15 percent of the Navy's ships are in overhaul status at any given time and thus are not immediately available."

The unstated implication: The Navy could not, at present, conduct even a half-MAF lift on short notice in either the Atlantic or Pacific theaters. If the previously cited "Miles Ignotus" Saudi Arabia two-MAF contingency plan (written long before the Faisal assassination and its still unknown but potentially explosive aftermath) has any validity, it is obvious the Navy has less than one-fourth the amphibious lift capability which it might need in a Mideast or Persian Gulf emergency.

There is help on the way, if still over the horizon, in

The POWs

by Chester L. Cooper

When future historians set out to trace the course of the Vietnam war they may find that a definitive turning point was reached during a few months in mid-1966. From that point on the men of Hanoi must have realized that they could not lose. It is worth rehearsing the events of those months for they explain a great deal about the agreement that was reached in 1973.

In mid-April 1966 the Strategic Air Command was given a chance it had been seeking for the past several months—the B-52s would now be making regular bombing runs over North Vietnam. The air force would have a chance to demonstrate that it, too, had a role to play in "limited war." The awesome power of the "Flying Fortresses" was soon demonstrated; in late June the bombers struck oil installations in Hanoi and Haiphong. Damage was heavy and by no means confined to the primary targets. There were civilian casualties, there were losses of planes and crews. Two weeks later Hanoi announced that captured American airmen were to be tried as "war criminals." A massive campaign was promptly launched from Washington to apply pressure on the North Vietnamese to call off the trial. A mixed but impressive bag of international leaders, administration officials, American pacifists, a score of "doves" in the Senate, the Pope and U Thant appealed to and/or warned Hanoi. By the end of July Ho Chi Minh announced that there would be no trial.

The Americans had won the battle of the war crimes. But in the process the North Vietnamese had gained a critical piece of intelligence: American prisoners were an extremely important weapon. And as the war went on and the bombing of North Vietnam intensified, more airmen were taken captive.

The North Vietnamese exploited their growing arsenal with great skill. By ignoring the terms of the Geneva Convention, even to the point of refusing to release a list of the prisoners they held, they fueled American anxiety. By exhibiting a handful of POWs to selected foreign visitors, they fed a growing popular determination to extricate the captured men.

During the summer of 1968 the POWs were playing an important, if unwitting, role in American politics. And the issue of a prisoner exchange became a principal point on the negotiating agenda of the American delegation to the peace talks that were just starting in Paris. By 1970 freeing American prisoners became, paradoxically, a reason for continuing the war.

This was Henry Kissinger's legacy as he began his secret meetings with his counterpart from Hanoi. By the autumn of 1972, with a presidential election at hand and another wartime Christmas looming, the 500 American POWs must have provided considerable negotiating leverage for the North Vietnamese. The meetings in October came to naught, but when they were resumed after the first of the year, progress was swift and a cease-fire agreement emerged late in January. The last contingent of American troops and the POWs were soon on their way home. But remaining behind in Vietnam were 150,000 North Vietnamese soldiers—almost 100 times the number there when the United States first became militarily involved, eight years before. The cease-fire arrangement was, at best, a fragile one; only the hopelessly naive would have expected either Hanoi or Saigon to observe it, or the puny International Commission to enforce it.

Americans have a right to be saddened, but not surprised, by what has happened. Saigon's chronic inability to attract the support of the Vietnamese people made the Communists a long-term favorite in the ultimate outcome. And the outpouring of American concern for the POWs gave Hanoi a tremendous negotiating advantage in the contrived "peace."

There is a somber lesson for Americans in all this: we must recognize that American military assistance cannot compensate for fatal political weaknesses. And before we once again commit our troops to battle, we must reckon the total cost of war: the maimed, the dead—and the prisoners.

Chester Cooper, a former State Department official, was involved in the Vietnam peace negotiations.

the form of the LHA (multi-purpose amphibious assault ship), SES (surface effect ship), and AALC (amphibious assault landing craft) programs. With Cushman leading the cheers, the Corps strongly supports, and would be happy to accelerate, all three programs. The first LHA is expected to be delivered to the fleet in September 1975. The fifth, and last—the originally planned nine-ship buy was cut to five "for budgetary considerations"—won't come into the inventory, according to Schlesinger, until FY 1978, "about 44 months beyond the original delivery date." When all five LHAs finally are operational, the Marine forces afloat will have the best amphibs in the world supporting them. But they'll still be grievously short of the total sealift they really need.

'Terrific Boats'

The SES and AALC programs, further down the road, show even greater promise. "Using surface effect ships," Cushman pointed out in the May 1974 Naval Review (published annually by the U.S. Naval Institute), Marine and other U.S. forces "could respond to crises four or five times faster than they can now—arriving at some of their destinations within hours, instead of days or weeks." In today's onrushing world such accelerated response time, of course, might well mean the difference between mission failure or success.

The Marines are just as strong on the AALC: "When we get those machines [test-craft AALCs now being developed by Aerojet General and Textron's Bell Aerospace Division]—and they're both terrific boats—we'll be able to project a ship-to-shore movement at 50 to 60 knots instead of eight," Anderson points out. "In addition, using air cushion landing vehicles would open up 70 percent or 80 percent or more of the beaches otherwise unusable by standard landing ships and amphibian tractors—which makes them almost impossible to defend against. Also, they can move across most beaches and inland to unloading points, which means no more of that logistics congestion along the beach line which has fouled us up so many times in the past."

Whether, and how soon, the Marines will get the additional lift needed will be up to the Navy Department, Defense Department, OMB (Office of Management and Budget), White House, and, eventually, Congress. But in the meantime the Corps is moving along on its own at flank speed in preparation for the next crisis, the next contingency, the next emergency, and, if need be, the next war.

And now it is also looking East as well as West, toward, among other places, the Shores of Tripoli, where in 1804, barely six years after their post-Revolutionary War reconstitution, the fledgling Corps fought and won against the Barbary Pirates who had been plundering American and European merchant ships during the Napoleonic wars. ■

By KATHLEEN TELTSCH
Special to The New York Times

UNITED NATIONS, N. Y., May 20—A 25-member international panel has recommended sweeping changes in the structure of the United Nations to improve its handling of economic issues and increase cooperation between rich and poor countries.

Its recommendations marked the first such major attempt at fundamental change since the world organization was formed 30 years ago.

Its recommendations marked the first such major attempt to revise the United Nations since the world organization was formed 30 years ago.

The panel's report, entitled "A New United Nations Structure for Global Economic Cooperation," was presented today to Secretary General Waldheim. He said that this was "a historic moment in the life of the United Nations."

A major innovation suggested by the panel, consisting of one expert from each of 25 countries, including the United States and the Soviet Union, was a revamping of the present decision-making process, which has led in the last year to confrontation and deadlocks between the rich and poor members in the General Assembly.

Instead of voting showdowns in the Assembly, where the developing third-world countries easily outnumber the industrial powers, the group recommended an intricate but still imprecise process of negotiating disputes to get agreements by consensus within the Economic and Social Council.

However they ruled out any proposal that would require a revision of the United Nations Charter, clearly because they saw no prospects for agreement at this time, especially from the big powers.

The panel's report is expected to be taken up at the special General Assembly session beginning Sept. 1. But it appears to face an uncertain fate because its recommendations are not likely to satisfy either the minority of industrialized countries or the majority of developing nations that have demonstrated here that they can rush through resolutions supporting their demands for a larger share of the world's resources.

However, the high caliber of the experts, each nominated by the government of the country represented, suggests that the recommendations will get serious study from the 138 members of the United Nations. An American official said that the United States intended to give the report its closest attention. But he declined to comment on the recommendations beyond saying, "They pose some problems."

One of the recommendations that are expected to stir controversy calls for revising the present voting system in the World Bank and International Monetary Fund to provide greater decision-making power for the developing countries. The existing weighted voting arrangement now gives the United States a vet over some decisions and heavy influence on lending policies.

The panel calls for the creation of a new post of Director General for Development and International Economic Cooperation that would be second in importance only to that of the Secretary General. It would go to a citizen of one of the developing countries when the Secretary General was elected from a developed country.

The panel implied that the new Director General would outrank the heads of the 15 specialize agencies in the United Nations system, such as the Food and Agricultural Organization and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization.

Criticizing the fragmentation of aid programs currently funneled through 23 separate funds, the report advocated that they be merged into a single United Nations Development Authority —dubbed by some panelists as the "tunnel of funnels."

The amalgamation contributions now going for population control, food assistance, environmental protection and other activities would give the proposed new authority a half-billion yearly to disperse to needy nations. The United Nations Children's Fund would remain separate.

The authority would be headed by an administrator who also would serve as one of two deputies to the new Director General and would be selected from an industrialized country.

It was expected that there would be a vigorous lobbying against the proposal for a new Director General and the Development Fund—this coming from the heads of United Nations agencies who would see their authority threatened.

Role of Existing Agencies

Under the recommended changes, each agency would keep its autonomy but become less involved in running projects in the field and act rather as a standard-setter.

Some of the recommendations, such as the appointment of a new Director General, were proposed for action at the Assembly this year; others were not expected to be taken up for two to five years. Among these was a recommendation that an International Trade Organization be established.

Although the 25 panel members signed their report as individuals—meaning they did not signify their governments' approval — their conclusions would be expected to carry some weight since 19 hold government positions, two at cabinet level.

The panel chairman was Al-Noor Kassum, a Tanzanian lawyer-economist. The Soviet member was Aleksond A. Molchanov, head of the Soviet Foreign Ministry's Department of International Economic Organization.

The American member, Richard N. Gardner, Professor of Law and International Organization at Columbia University, served as rapporteur of the document, drafter over an eight-week period.

Copies have not reached delegations, but one panelist predicted it could run into strong opposition from the United States on several counts, but particularly because of the idea of having a third-world representative serving in the second highest post in the United Nations hierarchy — he would be selected by the Secretary General with the approval of the Assembly.

Other saw prospects that the third-world countries would negotiating procedures, seeing a threat to curb their numerical voting strength, although the report stipulates that the Assembbly could go on voting resolutions as long as it "takes account" of the private conciliation efforts being tried elsewhere.

The panel's' work was authorized by a General Assembly resolution of January, 1975, requesting that it propose structural changes to make the United Nations system "fully capable of dealing with the problems of international cooperation."

The resolution called for a broad geographical representation on the panel, which was appointed by Secretary General Waldheim on the basis of nominations by governments. China was offered a seat on the panel but declined.

The panel sought through its recommendations to enhance the standing of the Economic and Social Council, which is listed in the Charter as one of the major organs of the world organization. However, it has not enjoyed high prestige. The most recent session was marked by high rates of absenteeism among the 54 members.

In its efforts to steer away from the voting contests that split the Assembly membership into seemingly that the Council establish small negotiating groups to deal in private with deadlocked key issues. None such might be the continuing dispute over compansation for nationalized foreign properties —an issue that brought on a major dispute at the late Assembly.

The small groups would include representatives of the countries most deeply involved and would be headed by a prominent individual who would devote full time to trying to bring about agreements, traveling as necessary between capitals and serving, as one official suggested, as "a Kissinger for economic, instead of political, disputes."

Each such negotiating effort would be limited to one or two years, but several could be tackled simultaneously.

The panel also advocated a major overhaul of the Economic and Social Council to abolish at least eight of its subsidiary commissions.

The commission on the status of women would be eliminated along with the commissions on population, social development and natural resources. The Human Rights Commission would remain.

The business formerly handled by the others would be dealt with directly by the Council, thereby avoiding duplicating debates.

In support of such streamlining, the panel report said that the Council, as it currently operates, "lacks the necessary degree of authority," and has become bogged down by unmanageable documentation.

As part of the proposed structural change, the panel recommended that the Council be given a new role in organizing the economic matters dealt with by the Assembly.

They proposed that the Assembly's Economic Committee be renamed the Committee on Development and International Economic Cooperation, and that it take on all items currently discussed by the Social Commitee that concern development. The Social Committee would be left mainly with human rights matters and humanitarian questions. Each has a membership of 138 countries.

In the field of trade, the experts proposed a gradual phasing out of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, which was organized in 1964 by the poorer

And the Dominoes Fall

Senior Political Analyst

The full impact of the humiliating defeat of the United States is being felt quickly in all of Southeast Asia.

Perhaps never in its history has the prestige of this country—and the trust of other nations in it—been so devastated.

Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger's statement that the United States had obligations of a "moral nature" to defend Thailand was met with scorn in Bangkok.

At the same time, the government of the Philippines was showing equal contempt for the confidence that could be given the United States in future dealings. In Bangkok, Schlesinger's statement drew this comment from Foreign Minister Chartchai Choonhavan:

"Moral? The United States does not have any morals at this point. They have already pulled out from Cambodia and South Vietnam, so we are going to have to depend on ourselves. . . "

THAILAND IS now under the gun of the Communists. This is a country that has been a faithful ally of the United States in its conduct of the war in Vietnam, supplying airbases and other facilities for our operations in that area.

But now it is a different situation. Thailand wants the 27,000 U.S. military personnel removed. The Bangkok government also is prepared to return military airplanes flown out of Vietnam to the new Communist government of South Vietnam.

In short, Thailand is preparing to come to terms with the Communists. It is abandoning its ties with the United States.

Shortly, we may face a similar situation with the Philippines and other nations in the area.

President Ferdinand Marcos of the Philippines has indicated that he feels that his country can no longer place trust in the United States, and in Manila the demands that U.S. installations including such important facilities as Clark Air Force Base and the Subic Bay naval base, be given up are gaining force.

Marcos, Chinese Ties

Meanwhile, Marcos is building up ties with the Chinese Communist government. His wife in the last week has been visiting there.

We may see in a very short time that our 50 years of rule over the Philippines, in which we endeavored to instruct them in the ways of democracy, were all for naught. Marcos is now a dictator.

Ironically, he assumed such a position, through imposition of martial law, in an effort to beat down Communist insurgents on Luzon and Moslem fanatics in the southern islands.

But the strength of the Communist movement in Indochina is bound to have profound effect upon him.

This was reflected Friday when the Philippines government announced that it will arrest military and government officials of the former South Vietnamese regime who come into American bases in those islands.

The announcement was more of an insult to the United States than an exercise in reality. The Filipinos do not have the capacity to move into an American base and make these arrests. And by the time they might act the South Vietnamese may well have been hurried on to Guam or some other destination.

Marcos, despite his earlier protestations of friendship for the United States, has always been an uncertain ally.

In 1965, we covered his campaign for the presidency against the incumbent President Diosdado Macapagal, in which Marcos won handily. At that time the United States was much interested in obtaining military support from other nations in the area. We queried Marcos during a visit to a small village in Luzon about the possibility of Filipino troops being sent to Vietnam.

He was evasive. But a few days later, after he had been elected, he reluctantly stated that some Filipino forces would be dispatched to Vietnam. It was months later that they arrived—and they were a small group of engineer troops who repaired roads.

AT THE 1966 Manila conference Marcos gave a superficial appearance of support for the American position in Southeast Asia, but at that time we were making headway against the Communist onslaught and our troop commitment was nearing its peak.

At this juncture, it would seem to be appropriate to rule out Thailand and the Philippines as friends and allies. The disaster of Vietnam is bound, we are afraid, to spread far beyond those two nations.

countries because of dissatisfaction with Western domination of the existing machinery for dealing with trade issues.

The work on trade and commodity agreements would go to the proposed international trade organization under the panel's recommendations, the organization also might take over the work of GATT, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, which has been the major forum in which negotiations to lower tariff barriers have been conducted, particularly among the developed countries. The trade organization also might assume responsibility for commodity arrangements.

In proposing the new post of director general for development, the panel recommended that the duties include direct charge of the existing Department of Economic and Social Affairs—the largest in the United Nations—and that the present post of under-secretary general be abolished.

Proposed on Development Unit

The proposed United Nations development authority, it was recommended, should be managed by a small operations board of 18 to 27 members who would be "equitably balanced" between countries which are net donors to United Nations aid programs, including oil-exporters, and the net recipients of help.

Although the contributions would be collected in a single fund, the identities of some units would be preserved, mainly because it would assist them in fund-raising—as in the case of the environment and population funds. The staff of the environment agency would remain at the agency's headquarters in Nairobi.

No additional increases in personnel would be required to carry out the panel's decisions, the report said. However, its members advocated a major effort to improve staff personnel policies.

They urged competitive examinations for United Nations job candidates and the possible creation of a staff college for training officials from different agencies in the system. They also said that a unified system should be accepted for all employes in regard to recruitment and salaries.

They also favored employing more women in nonclerical positions and hiring younger applicants from all regions.

In an attempt to insure that action would be taken on at least some proposals without delay, the panel asked Mr. Waldheim to appoint a committee that would report regularly on the progress made in restructuring.

MORE STARS FOR LEONID BREZHNEV

Leonid Brezhnev's comrades have given him a new hat—that of a full general of the Soviet Army. At the Moscow V-E Day celebrations, Soviet President Nikolai Podgorny officially elevated the party leader to that rank. (He had once worn a maior general's stars as a political officer during World War II.) Washington experts read a nuance in the promotion: it confirms Brezhnev's status in relation to the armed forces—he now ranks among the most senior officers—and also within the ruling Politburo. Actually, as chairman of the Soviet Defense Committee, Brezhnev has been Russia's commander in chief since 1965.

SUMMARY OF NETWORK NEWS IN THIS ISSUE

John CHANCELLOR and Don OLIVER, NBC News, report on events in Laos. CHANCELLOR reports on the evacuation of 18 USAID employees out of Savannakhet. OLIVER reports that Laotian students still hold the USAID compound in Vientiane where two Marines and a communications specialist are holed up and that Americans in a housing complex are in effect prisoners. CHANCELLOR reports that Secretary KISSINGER told Turks that renewal of U.S. military aid hinges upon progress in Cyprus talks. CHANCELLOR and Catherine MACKIN report that 76 Senators signed a letter of support for continued military and economic aid to Israel. MACKIN reports on comments by proponents and opponents of the letter. CHANCELLOR reports that according to a Cairo newspaper the Soviets are in the process of obtaining bases in Libya and will grant them extensive military aid.

Walter CRONKITE and Maria McLAUGHLIN, both of CBS News, report on the letter of support sent by Senators to the President concerning military and economic aid for Israel. Ike PAPPAS, CBS, reports on a Pentagon assessment of the military capabilities of the Syrians, Egyptians and Israelis, comparing numbers of hardware and ground forces. He notes that the Pentagon weighs out in favor of the Israelis but are worried about an Israeli pre-emptive strike. CRONKITE reports that although KISSINGER is trying to reassure the Turks about U.S. trustworthiness, the Turks may be planning to close some U.S. bases.

Harry REASONER and Lou CIOFFI, both of ABC News, report on the situation in Laos. CIOFFI reports that the Laotian government seems unwilling to protect American citizens and their possessions and that USAID employees will be evacuated soon. Tom JARRIEL reports that according to Secretary KISSINGER the U.S. will drastically cut military and economic aid to Laos and will bring home most American citizens from Laos.

Lesley STAHL, CBS Morning News, reports on a survey of Vietnamese refugees on Guam taken by the Catholic Conference which states that half of the refugees there are illiterate and unskilled. Task force chief Dean BROWN did not confirm nor deny this. Hughes RUDD reports that the Iranian government knows who killed the two American officers in Tehran and are presently searching for the terrorists. Marvin KALB reports that Secretary KISSINGER has been reassuring the members of CENTO and that he is pleased that Syria renewed the U.N. peace force.

Lou WOODS, the "Today" show NBC TV, reports that NATO defense ministers are concerned about the southern flank of NATO, but that Secretary KISSINGER is trying to smooth things out with the Turks.

USAID Situation In Laos

JOHN CHANCELLOR: The rising tide of anti-Americanism feeling in Laos led the United States today to fly 18 Americans and a number of foreigners out of Savannakhet in Laos to the Udorn Airbase in Thailand. The group had been under house arrest in Savannakhet for nine days. Air Force 3-47s landed in Savannakhet to get them. Neither pro-Communist Pathet Lao troops in that town nor anti-American students interfered with their departure. In Vientiane the student protests kept up their campaign today to get the American Agency for International Development out of Laos and Don Oliver has that story.

DON OLIVER: The anti-American demonstrators still held the USAID compound in Vientiane despite the protests of U.S. Embassy officials to government of Laos officials. It was obvious the Laotian government will even want to do much about the situation. Pathet Lao soldiers have joined the protestors inside the compound. Two American Marines and one U.S. civilian communications worker were also in the building, but they were where the demonstrators couldn't get at them. From time-to-time one of the Marines could be seen on top of the building checking the ground below and radioing reports back to the U.S. Embassy. The demonstrators still were demanding that the property here be turned over to the Laotian government and that Americans in the AID mission be ordered out of the country. The students may not care much for Americans but they had obviously acquired a taste for American beer, looted from the commissary. The Laotian employees had done nothing. Finally a government spokesman held a news conference expressing regret for what had happened. But he said in effect that the U.S.AID mission in Laos is through. The Laotian government wants U.S. money but it wants it in direct payments. He said equipment and buildings should be turned over to the Laotians. About three miles outside of Vientiane is the American housing village where most of the USAID families live. The Laotian police force was not allowing any cars to leave. The 500 or so who live here were virtually prisoners for a time. Then the rules were changed, cars were allowed out after they were searched. Word came from the Embassy for all families here to get their health certificates up to date so they could leave the country. The families came through the gates in small groups and got their smallpox vaccinations and their typhoid shots. The American kids didn't seem to concerned about the situation, but inside the houses their parents were packing up as fast as they could. The U.S. Embassy hopes to bring a fleet of chartered planes in here tomorrow to begin evacuating the American families. A spokesman for the Embassy emphasized that only the USAID personnel and their families are going to be taken out, the U.S. Embassy staff will stay and they hope to keep the Embassy open. Don Oliver, NBC News, Vientiane, Laos.

CHANCELLOR: In Washington the White House said today that the uncertain situation in Laos has led it to cut back on aid to that country. But the White House added that despite American departures from Laos no full scale evacuation has been ordered.

Kissinger On Turkey

CHANCELLOR: Secretary of State KISSINGER is in Turkey today and he told the Turks that a resumption of American arms aid is dependent on progress on a settlement of the Cyprus question. After Turkish troops invaded Cyprus last year the American Congress cut off arms aid to Turkey. The Senate voted this week to restore the aid, but KISSINGER told Turkish leaders today that the House probably won't go along until it sees some movement toward a Cyprus settlement.

Senate Urges Israel Support

CHANCELLOR: Seventy-six members of the Senate sent word to President FORD today that they will not accept any reduction in American military and economic aid to Israel. The President responded, cautiously, that he welcomed all suggestions. Catherine Mackin has more on the letter and Congressional reaction to it.

CATHERINE MACKIN: The 76 Senators cut across the entire political spectrum from the most liberal to the most conservative. Senate leader Mike MANSFIELD sharply rebuked the signers. He said the letter sets up a possible confrontation between the FORD administration and the Senate. He called the letter an unwise move at this time and said it would have been better muted until the President completes his meetings next month with the leaders of Israel and Egypt. But the Senators clearly wanted to move ahead of FORD's meetings.

SENATOR BIRCH BAYH: There have been voices of concern raised about the validity of United States committments because of the events of SE Asia. And many of us on the Hill felt that it is important to let everybody know, friend and foe and those who have no position, that the United States committment to the continued existence and security of the state of Israel is undiminished.

SENATOR LOWELL WEICKER: The committment was made to the state of Israel in 1948 and has not been changed by the facts that have intervened. Because indeed when the committment was made it had nothing to do with the cold war, it had nothing to do with oil. It had everything to do with a people who had been hounded and persecuted, tortured and killed, for 2,000 years.

MACKIN: Senator Charles PERCY was another critic of the letter. He said it looked like a tilt in favor of Israel, which will not help either side.

SENATOR CHARLES PERCY: We have credibility with both sides. But we must keep that credibility and it's in Israel's interests to not have us so one sided or so aligned with one side that we cannot assume the role that both sides have asked us to play in this conflict.

MACKIN: Apparently the reason for the letter is that the American-Jewish community is jittery about United States support for Israel and wanted this reaffirmation now. Catherine Mackin, NBC News, Washington.

Soviets Get Bases in Libya

CHANCELLOR: In world news today the Russians are reported to have established a new beachhead in the Middle East of great potential importance. According to the semi-official Cairo newspaper, Al Ahram, the Russians will set up military bases, air bases and naval bases in Libya. And the paper said the Russians have agreed to a $4.5 billion arms deal with the Libyans.

In Portugal there were huge street demonstrations tonight by the Socialists after the leader of the socialist party threatened to quit the government unless it stops drifting toward Communism.

Congressional Letter To President

WALTER CRONKITE: Seventy-six Senators have sent a letter to President FORD urging him to make clear that the United States "stands firmly with Israel in the search for Middle East peace." The White House said the President will consider the letter and welcomes all suggestions from all sources as Middle East policy is reassessed. More from Maria McLaughlin.

MARIA McLAUGHLIN: The letter urged the President to continue a strong policy of support for Israel and asked Mr. FORD to guarantee Israel all the help it needs "to detour a renewal of war by Israel's neighbors." Predictably the Israelis liked the letter the Arabs didn't.

ARAB SPOKESMAN: There will be in the back of the Arabs minds a large measure of questioning of whether policies enunciated by the United States administration can be delivered on in the life of this congressional withholding of its support or pre-empting the outcome of the reassessment policy.

McLAUGHLIN: What do you think the significance of that letter is?

ISRAELI SPOKESMAN: Well I think it has great significance because I humbly believe it echoes the opinion of the great majority of American people that a strong and viable Israel is an important element in bringing about peace in the Middle East, which is after all what we all want. So I think it's a constructive and a very helpful move that the Senate of the United States has taken.

McLAUGHLIN: The Arabs were particularly disappointed that Senators like Charles MATHIAS and George McGOVERN, who have recently travelled through Arab countries, had signed. McGOVERN was quick to send a clarifying letter and an Arab spokesman said maybe that indicated the signers' hurried judgment would be replaced by a more studied one.

Maria McLaughlin, CBS News, Washington.

CRONKITE: New York's Republican Senator JAVITS was the moving force behind the letter. Its purpose was to make clear the American position in light of developments in SE Asia and in advance of President FORD's meeting with Egyptian President SADAT. With the breakdown of recent peace efforts in the Middle East there's a growing concern of yet another Arab-Israeli war. Ike Pappas gives us the Pentagon's assessmen on how the two sides now stack up militarily.

IKE PAPPAS: Both sides quickly restocked with weapons following the October war, the Israelis with American arms, the Arabs with Russian. Today with the possibility of a new war increasing the Arabs outgun and outman the Israelis more than two-to-one. Together Egypt and Syria, the major threats to Israel, have over 4,000 Russian built tanks. The Israelis have about 2,500 tanks, most of them American M-60s and Pattons. In artillery Egypt and Syria have 1,800 pieces and over 12,000 missiles including the latest Russian anti-aircraft rockets. Israel has some 900 pieces of artillery, over 600 Hawk surface-to-air missiles and what is reported to be an unknown number of the newest American hand-held heat seeking rockets the Red Eye. In air power Egypt and Syria have over 1,000 fighter-bombers, French Mirages and Russian built MIGS. The Israelis have about 400 warplanes, most of them American Phantoms and Skyhawks. In manpower Egypt and Syria combined can throw at Israel a ground force made up of 450,000 soldiers. The Israelis have only 125,000 men and women in uniform, but have another 250,000 reserves who could be mobilized in a matter of hours, total 375,000. So in military hardware the balance of power in the Middle East clearly favors the Arabs. But the consensus among Pentagon analysts and the intelligence community is that the Israelis would still win. They point out the Israelis are equipped with more sophisticated weapons this time, that they use their equipment far more efficiently than the Arabs and they have better military leadership. In fact, some analysts say, there is a growing concern the Israelis may be the first to attack, aiming to knock out the Arabs warmaking potential for years to come. Pentagon sources admit the threat of a new war in the Middle East is very serious. Ike Pappas, CBS News, the Pentagon.

Kissinger In Turkey

CRONKITE: Secretary of State KISSINGER was in Ankara today trying to reassure Turkey that the United States is a trustworthy ally. But Turkey questioned these reassurances. Marvin Kalb reports from Ankara that Turkey was not encouraged by the one vote margin the United States Senate gave earlier this week to end the ban on arms sales to Turkey. Kalb says Turkey is now expected to begin closing American bases there in the near future.

ABC EVENING NEWS ABC TV

HARRY REASONER: Eighteen Americans and other foreigners were evacuated today from Savannakhet, Laos and flown on U.S. planes to Thailand. The Americans, earlier thought to number only 12, had been under house arrest by Pathet Lao demonstrators for more than a week. It's now certain that most U.S. citizens will be pulled out of Laos as quickly as possible because similar incidents of harrassment against Americans are increasing. Demonstrating students still occupy the American AID compound in Vientiane and two Marine guards and a civilian communications specialist who locked themselves inside an AID building remain the only Americans inside. More on the story from Lou Cioffi.

LOU CIOFFI: Despite official American protests the Laotian government so far has been unable or unwiling to force the students to leave the USAID compound. The government here suggests that negotiations with the students might be a way out for the Americans, the U.S. Embassy is willing but also argues that it's the responsibility of the Laotian government to protect foreign diplomats, their families and their possessions. The situation is forcing the United States to drastically speed up the evacuation of USAID personnel and their families, it's also causing some thought about a complete withdrawal of all 1,100 Americans here in Laos, including the Embassy staff if they cannot be protected. At the housing area where many Americans live government and Pathet Lao soldiers appeared at the same time as the USAID compound was occupied. They started by checking every car that left, saying that they are looking for weapons. But they're also preventing anyone from taking out personal possessions. One man was forced to unload two porcelain elephants he had crated, obviously to be shipped home. The students and the Pathet Lao say that everything inside the housing area now belongs to the people of Laos and it could very well be that the Americans who are evacuating may be forced to leave most of their possessions behind. There's another problem, many of them have their passports locked up inside the USAID compound with no way to get them out. Even as the evacuation is being organized the Laotian civilians who used to work for the American families inside have already packed their bags and are leaving. There's no panic among the Americans here but there is an increasing sense of urgency. The schedule now is for 50 or 60 people, starting with dependents, to be evacuated each day. But that figure might very well be increased as the situation worsens. The thing that has American officials here really concerned right now is will they be allowed to leave. The answer will come in the next day or so. This is Lou Cioffi, ABC News, Vientiane.

TOM JARRIEL: This is Tom Jarriel. The United States is all but pulling down the flag in Laos. The White House recognized the realities of the political situation today by saying the Pathet Lao control is increasing, so U.S. aid and personnel are being reduced. Secretary of State KISSINGER in Ankara, Turkey today told ABC diplomatic correspondent Ted Koppel the reduction will be very substantial. KISSINGER said it makes no sense to continue U.S. military aid, which has been running up to $30 million a year. The $33 million U.S. economic assistance program will be substantially cut. Most of the 400 civilians who administer it will be brought home. The 800 American government employees in Laos will be reduced to little more than a token force of diplomats and intelligence personnel. The official U.S. view is that the Communists have not yet completely taken over the government, so the U.S. evacuation will not be a total one. But the substantial reduction appears to be a face saving way to prepare for the rapidly moving trend toward Communist domination of Laos. Tom Jarriel, ABC News, at the White House.

Vietnamese Refugees

BRUCE MORTON: Lesley Stahl says the Vietnamese refugees already in this country maybe the easiest ones to resettle, that the problem is the people still on Guam.

LESLEY STAHL: A preliminary rough survey of the 46,000 refugees on Guam indicates that about 21,000 of them are illiterate peasant farmers and fishermen. The survey was conducted by agents of the U.S. Catholic Conference which also estimates that about 21,000 of those on Guam are Catholics. The voluntary agencies say they will have a much more serious problem settling this group than the refugees at Camp Pendleton, where, according to a task force study, 58 percent are professionals, skilled workers or clerks and only .9 percent are agricultural. Executive Director of the Catholic Conference John McCARTHY said, these people on Guam will be more difficult to resettle. But, he said, we must remain optimistic. Task force chief L. Dean BROWN said he knows of no such survey. His task force has no recent data on the occupational status or literacy of the refugees on Guam. BROWN says he will await the computer print out of biographical sheets which are now being filled out. Lesley Stahl, CBS News, Washington.

Statement On Iranian Terrorists

RUDD: In Iran the government says it knows who killed two United States Air Force officers in Tehran yesterday and is looking for the killers. The officers were shot to death on their way to work as advisers at an Iranian air base.

Report On CENTO

RUDD: Secretary of State KISSINGER was in Turkey when he got the news about the Golan extension, involved in still another diplomatic job. We have a radio report from Marvin Kalb in Ankara.

MARVIN KALB: KISSINGER brought his words of reassurance to the Central Treaty Organization, CENTO, an anti-Soviet alliance created in the mid 1950's and consisting now of Pakistan, Turkey, Iran, Great Britain and of course the United States as principal observer. The Secretary said the U.S. is determined to reaffirm its ties to its allies and he went on, the U.S. is deeply conscious of the inescapable responsibility it bears. During the break between the opening sessions and the closed door deliberations the Secretary told reporters he was pleased by the Syrian decision to extend the U.N. mandate on the Golan Heights for another six months. Adding that it's a constructive development that offers an opportunity for progress in a calmer atmosphere. On another subject KISSINGER said the U.S. has not ordered a total evacuation of Americans from Laos, but he did admit there has been a rather substantial reduction. Marvin Kalb, CBS News, Ankara.

LOU WOODS: NATO defense ministers are meeting in Brussells today. The formal reason is to discuss weapons production but much of the talking really concerns worry about NATO's Mediterranean flank. Secretary of State Henry KISSINGER is working on that aspect in Turkey today. He hopes the Turks will soften their stand on Cyprus. That might convince Congress to ease its arms embargo against Turkey and help the NATO defense ministers breath a bit easier.

FIFTEEN AMERICANS DIED in the Mayaguez rescue, the Pentagon said.

In a report termed "as close to final as possible," the Defense Department said that, in addition to 11 Marines, two airmen and two Navy medics known dead, three Marines who landed on Tang island off Cambodia are missing and probably dead. Of the 15 killed, 13 were lost when a helicopter crashed 100 feet off the island, one died in a helicopter crash farther out and one was a Marine shot on the island. Fifty-men were wounded, two seriously.

With recent events in Indochina in mind, members of the House overwhelmingly rejected efforts to cut a $32 billion weapons procurement bill and to reduce overseas troop strength. The arms bill passed, 333-63.

House votes against overseas troops cut

By CHARLES W CORDDRY
Washington Bureau of the Sun

Washington—The House of Representatives in a major foreign policy victory for President Ford, overwhelmingly rejected yesterday any cuts in American troops overseas and turned aside all amendments that would have reduced the $32 billion weapons authorization bill.

The House then sent the measure to the Senate by a 333-to-63 vote.

While it defeated all efforts to cut the bill, the House gave a resounding endorsement to the admission of women to the military academies on an equal basis with men. It ignored contentions that this was a step on the way toward sending women officers into combat, and voted, 303 to 96, to give women the same chance as men to pursue full careers in the officer corps.

A proposal to bring home 70,000 of the 416,500 troops stationed around the world was defeated, 311 to 95, after the house heard extended arguments that such cuts would signal a pullback from U.S. commitments and damage negotiations with Russia for mutual reductions in Europe.

The victors were led by Representative Thomas P O'Neill, Jr., (D., Mass), the House majority leader, who had changed his position from last year when he favored troop cuts, but now argued this was the "wrong time" for reductions, in the wake of Indochina and with new threats looming in Korea and elsewhere.

In the last crucial vote before sending the bill to the Senate, the House rejected, 216 to 183, a proposal of Representative Les Aspin (D., Wis.) that it make an across-the-board slash of $1.9 billion in the bill. The Pentagon would decide how to distribute the cut.

Supporters contended the bill would add $1.5 billion to the congressionally approved federal budget deficit of $68.8 bil-

Gains Cited By Kissinger In Vienna

By Murrey Marder
Washington Post Staff Writer

VIENNA, May 20—Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger and Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko made marginal progress on a complex of difficult problems in two days of talks here and agreed to meet again soon, probably in mid-July.

The unexpected plan to hold a second round of Kissinger-Gromyko talks so soon was made primarily to permit decisions to develop on new attempts to deal with the continuing Middle East crisis. President Ford is scheduled to meet with Egyptian President Anwar Sadat in Salzburg on June 1-2, followed by talks in Washington between Mr. Ford and Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

These meetings will determine for the United States whether, and how, to shift the aborted Arab-Israeli peace negotiations to Geneva, as the Soviet Union and Egypt urged after the collapse of Kissinger's shuttle diplomacy last March.

American sources said today that Gromyko gave them the impression that the Soviet Union is prepared to explore "a cooperative approach" with the United States in resolving the Middle East dilemma at Geneva.

American officials said it remains to be seen exactly what that means but it was said that Kissinger and Gromyko did discuss who might participate in a Geneva conference and possible procedures for such a meeting.

U.S.-SOVIET EFFORT ON MIDEAST IS SET

By LESLIE H. GELB

BONN, May 20—Secretary of State Kissinger and Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko have agreed to try to cooperate on a framework for reconvening the Geneva conference on the Middle East, reporters aboard Mr. Kissinger's plane were told today.

The newsmen were also told that the agreement remained to be tested and that details had not been discussed in the two days of talks in Vienna.

The two foreign ministers entered this morning and through a working lunch began at the Soviet embassy before Mr. Kissinger flew on to Bonn.

Israeli suspicions automatically are bound to be raised by talk of U.S.-Soviet cooperation at Geneva, for fear that this means the United States may be shifting position to give the Palestine Liberation Organization a seat at the conference, over the violent opposition of Israel.

American officials strongly denied that there is any such intention. They said the United States remains opposed to seating the PLO, headed by Yasser Arafat, especially as long as the PLO remains committed to the destruction of Israel. Even so, Israel is likely to remain apprehensive, as U.S. officials well know, because the United States is still formally engaged in "reassessing" its Middle East policy.

The projected new Kissinger-Gromyko meeting also will provide opportunity to grapple again with still unresolved political decisions for speeding up the U.S.-Soviet Strategic Arms Limitation Talks (SALT). On the American side, progress was reported in the Gromyko-Kissinger talks on two or three of the lesser of a half dozen or more obstacles for reaching a SALT accord this year. A final agreement is supposed to be concluded this fall at a Washington summit conference between President Ford and Soviet leader Leonid I. Brezhnev.

A guardedly phrased statement was issued today by Kissinger and Gromyko after six hours of discussions, following five hours of talks on Monday. It said, "The conversations which proceeded in a constructive spirit were, in the opinion of both sides, useful."

In diplomatic jargon, that is very noncommittal language Kissinger, however, was more positive orally, telling newsmen "progress was made on issues that were discussed."

In this first high-level U.S.-Soviet meeting after the collapse of American policy in Indochina, and the breakdown of Kissinger's Arab-Israeli negotiations which excluded the Soviet Union, these talks were a test for future U.S.-Soviet diplomacy.

Today's meeting was in the Soviet embassy where President John F. Kennedy and Soviet Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev met 14 years ago.

After an overnight stop in Bonn, where he was met by West German Foreign Minister Hans Dietrich Geuscher, Kissinger will visit West Berlin on Wednesday to reassert U.S. commitments to that city's survival.

There was a relaxed atmosphere today as Kissinger and Gromyko emerged from the embassy to chat with newsmen.

be discussed at a later meeting Newsmen were advised that the new meeting would probably be in July somewhere in Europe.

The foreign ministers were also said to have made progress on the nuclear arms talks due to reconvene in Geneva in June. But the only specific information was that virtual agreement had been reached on language about reductions in missile forces after both sides first agree on a new strategic arms treaty setting a ceiling on such forces.

The main topic to be discussed at the next meeting in July is the Geneva conference, but nuclear arms will also be a topic.

With regard to the Middle East conference, newsmen were informed that Mr. Gromyko had reiterated that the Palestine Liberation Organization must participate, but he was said to be flexible on the timing of that participation.

The conference is to get under way in late August or early autumn, newsmen were told. A date is yet to be agreed on.

Officials in Washington said earlier that Mr. Kissinger sought to avoid setting a date in Vienna.

"The question is how little we can get away with in talks with Gromyko," said one of these officials, before President Ford meets with President Anwar el-Sadat of Egypt and with Premier Yitzak Rabin of Israel in the coming weeks.

American diplomats have said that the Arabs themselves are not eager for the Russians to play a major role in Middle East negotiations. They are said to be generally afraid of Moscow, and feel that only Washington can bring about Israeli compromises.

The diplomats related that third parties had been telling Washington that the Russians, too, were now beginning to wonder whether Geneva would solve the problems. Mr. Kissinger fears getting into any situation where the radical Arab states force moderate Arab leaders into radical positions that decrease the chances of subsequent negotiations and increase the odds on war.

Mr. Kissinger's spokesman, Robert Anderson, said at a news conference last night that most of yesterday's session had been devoted to the European securiy conference, and discussions would continue today on nuclear arms. He also stated that Mr. Kissinger had used the opportunity to tell Mr. Gromyko that détente would be jeopardized by Soviet attempts to gain tactical advantages in peripheral areas such as Indochina.

Arab Ministers to Meet

CAIRO, May 20 (Reuters)—The foreign ministers of Egypt, Syria and Jordan and a representative of the Palestine Liberation Organization will meet next month to coordinate their positions on Middle East peace efforts, Foreign Minister Ismail Fahmy said today.

He did not give the site or the exact date of the meeting, but said agreement to convene the gathering was reached in Damascus last week during President Anwar el-Sadat's visit.

The Egyptian leader, whose visit to Damascus was part of a tour of Arab capitals, which also took him to Kuwait, Amman and Baghdad, met the Palestinian leader Yasir Arafat, in Damascus.

Mr. Fahmy made his announcement after a meeting here, with Farouk Kaddoumi, head of the Palestinian organization's Political Department.

Earlier in the day the House turned down by voice vote an amendment that would have deleted $560 million for a fourth Trident missile submarine It defeated, 276 to 124 an amendment that would have barred the testing of new nuclear warheads for missiles known as maneuvering re-entry vehicles. Such vehicles, called MARV's, would be able to change course as they approach targets, and thus vastly improve the accuracy of intercontinential rockets.

The annual weapons bill authorizes appropriation of funds for research, development and production, and fixes military manpower ceilings. Administration proposals were left virtually intact in the bill passed yesterday.

The vote to admit women to Annapolis, West Point and Colorado Springs, making a success of a crusade of Representative Samuel S Stratton(D., N.Y.), provided the major drama of the second day of debate on the annual arms measure.

Maryland's two women representatives, Marjorie S. Holt (R., 4th) and Gladys Noon Spellman (D., 5th), voted for the measure, which would put women on an equal footing with men in applying for entrance to the academies.

Describing the measure as his "women-in-the-academies amendment," Mr Stratton said the military services have been promoting the enlistment of women and it was time to "remove sex discrimination" at the schools that turn out officers.

He contended that the move would not make it necessary for women academy graduates to be assigned to combat roles, as some opponents maintained.

cussions in a cordial atmosphere," Kissinger said. He told reporters, "We agreed to meet again in the near future for a further detailed review of the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks, prospects of peace in the Middle East and other matters of mutual interest."

"I agree with the secretary," said Gromyko. "We discussed several problems. All of them are important. I think—I am convinced—the discussion is useful and it is necessary. We agreed, of course, to have further discussions with each other. . . ."

Asked if any compromise had been reached on the difficult SALT problem of verifying how nuclear strategic weapons are distinguished and counted in the ceilings set for 2,400 missiles and bombers on each side, of which 1,320 could have multiple warheads, Gromyko drily replied, "It is a small detail."

Actually, this is the most difficult problem in the nuclear negotiations.

U.S. sources refused to be specific about just what did happen in the SALT discussions here, except to say that some proposals were exchanged and that they continue to believe that the barriers can be overcome. On Saturday, the day after Kissinger returns to Washington, he is scheduled to meet with the National Security Council's nuclear verification panel on this subject.

In the two days of talks here, an American source said, no new obstacles arose while the old obstacles were diminished, but not removed.

The Soviet Union did not gain the satisfaction it seeks for a date to convene the 35-nation European security conference on post-World War II relations between Eastern and Western Europe. The consensus among the Allied powers, it was said, is that this conference may be held in late July, but bargaining over it continues.

The Kissinger-Gromyko joint statement also reiterated the determination of both sides to continue the development of U.S.-Soviet relations.

It was said to have been Kissinger's suggestion to schedule the subsequent meeting with Gromyko, for which no date or place was specified. A meeting in the first half of July is likely. Members of Kissinger's party said they were satisfied with the meetings here and that they had achieved about what might have been expected. However there was no air of high accomplishment evident in the American delegation on any issue.

Seoul Asks Aid to Show U.S. Resolve

By Don Oberdorfer
Washington Post Foreign Service

SEOUL, May 20 — South Korea called on the United States today to demonstrate by deeds, including additional military aid, that it will not let this Asian ally suffer the same fate as that of South Vietnam.

In a unanimous five-point declaration prepared at the behest of the government, the National Assembly declared a national resolve "to resolutely crush any provocation or invasion by North Korea." The statement said events in Indochina have had a heavy effect on the balance of power in Asia and, together with North Korean statements and maneuvering, created "new tension" on the Korean peninsula.

"We hope the United States . . . will demonstrate by deeds its firm determination not to commit the same failure on the Korean peninsula as it did on the Indochinese peninsula," the resolution said. "Without such a demonstration, the United States will lose all credibility in its foreign commitments and this will lead to a debacle in world peace and order."

The assembly's resolution was passed on the final day of a special four-day session convened for this purpose. Parliamentary sources said the measure was designed to demonstrate broad anti-Communist unity despite recurrent internal political dissension, and to serve special notice to the United States that its deeds as well as words are being watched.

The resolution also suggested that the United States display its undaunted attitude by expediting the lagging military aid plan for Korean forces and by deploying U.S. military forces near the Korean peninsula — a reference to elements of the 7th Fleet and U.S. strategic air power, assembly sources said.

The U.S. aid plan for Korean forces, adopted in 1970 as a price for the removal of one American combat division from this country, called for $1.5 billion in military assistance during the five years ending June 30. About $1 billion has been approved, and some $140 million more in grant aid and military sales is expected to be approved this year. The Koreans have been pushing for quicker completion of the program but Congresional cuts in U.S. military aid appropriations have resuted in a stretch-out of allotments to Korean military modernization.

Some 38,000 American troops, including one infantry division and three jet fighter squadrons, remain on duty here, armed with large numbers of tactical nuclear weapons.

In a related development, the government announced reactivation of the "Student Defense Corps" which functioned during the Korean war almost a quarter of a century ago. An Education Ministry spokesman said mobilization of all high school and college level youth, including women, was designed to increase the "war potential" of students and make them more conscious of national security.

Many high school and college students participate in close-order drill and other military activities under existing laws and policies. Reestablishment of the defense corps — with each school comprising a "regiment" — will mean a broadening of the numbers involved and an increase in the hours of training and special encampment.

While Phnom Penh was falling and Saigon tottering a month ago, Korean army commanders announced after a special meeting that the situation in this divided peninsula is "a virtual state of war" and resolved not to yield an inch in case of attack.

With the passage of time and almost daily public statements of resolve about Korea from the top echelon of the U.S. government, Seoul's officials and the populace here have calmed considerably about immediate danger.

As today's assembly declaration suggests, however, there is still much apprehension about the future. Government statements during the closed-door special assembly session suggested that the period around Oct. 10, the 30th anniversary of the founding of the North Korean Workers' Party, may be a time for special vigilance.

While publicly expressing faith in the reliability of the U.S. commitment, government officials are reported to be privately warning civic leaders that the United States cannot be relied upon in the long run. Both in public and private, high officials are appealing for unity and seeking to drive home the message that dissent within was a major cause of the collapse in South Vietnam.

A week ago today, President Park Chung Hee used emergency powers to issue a decree banning virtually all internal opposition on threat of 15 years' imprisonment.

Tighter controls have been clamped on the press and the determined opposition of anti-government politicians, churchmen and students has been silenced, at least temporarily. The new mobilization plan for high school and college students — along with sections of last week's decree authorizing school closures and ouster of offending students, faculty members or administrators — is said to be an attempt to silence the feisty campus activists once and for all.

The assembly resolution spoke of national determination and unity in the anti-Communist cause and mentioned fealty to a "free democratic system," a point demanded by the opposition party as a price of support. As in recent statements by Park, the resolution warned North Korea that renewed hostilities would result in "self-destruction," with no indication of the basis for that statement.

The Broken Telephone Line

By James Reston

UNITED NATIONS, N. Y., May 20 — The mini-war in Cambodia, with its sudden attacks in the dark and bizarre misunderstandings, illustrates the need for a more efficient worldwide communication system, and suggests a new and practical peace-keeping role for the United Nations.

There were serious breakdowns in the transmission of messages from Washington to Phnom Penh in Cambodia after the seizure of the Mayagüez, during which President Ford landed the Marines in Thailand, without permission, and ordered the attack on Cambodia.

It is not clear, even now, whether the new Khmer Rouge regime ordered the seizure of the Mayagüez, or if it did, wanted to hand over the ship and its American crew before the Marines landed, but in any event, the orders from the Pentagon to attack moved much faster than the appeals from the State Department to Peking and Phnom Penh to make peace.

There were comparable problems at the height of the Greek-Turkish crisis over Cyprus, though not so serious, but the problem is the same: The military network of communications in the world is swift but diplomatic communications in many of the most inflammable areas are slow.

Without raking over the past in Cambodia or Cyprus, the point here is fairly obvious: We need, not only a hot line between Washington and Moscow to avoid atomic wars, but a worldwide fire-alarm or early-warning system that can communicate the facts to every capital of every nation.

The technology is available. There are now communications satellites in the heavens over every continent. Even the smallest capital of the newest nation in Africa, Asia, or Latin America can hook into this fantastic system by telephone, teletype or even television, if it has a ground satellite station.

These earth stations are not prohibitively expensive. They cost about $4 million. As modern technology improves, they are getting smaller and cheaper all the time. They are already portable, and can be folded up and transported in a Boeing 707.

Henry Kissinger took one along with him on his original mission to China. He could set one up in the desert in the Middle East, if his shuttle failed, and call securely through the scrambler system to the White House within an hour.

This is no secret superpower mystery. The International Telecommunications Satellite Organization (Intelsat) runs the communications satellites and sells its service. You have to put more than a dime in the slot, but if you have an earth satellite in Phnom Penh and a mob at the door, you can call up Secretary General Waldheim here at the U.N., or even Henry Kissinger in Georgetown, and discuss your problem.

With this kind of open communications technology available to every nation in the world, it is odd and even ridiculous that wars have to start or go on for lack of facts. We have communications but we don't communicate. "Natural folly is bad enough," Thomas Fuller observed back in 1732, "but learned folly is intolerable."

Maybe, then, there is a practical role here that can be played by the United Nations, as communicator or postmaster, if not as peace-maker. At San Francisco, a generation ago, the U.N. was conceived as a world organization with its own military organization that could impose peace on the world, but that dream has long since vanished.

Then it was seen as a research organization, gathering the facts of impending disasters in a hungry world, and as a debating society for conflicting views on the coming age, and occasionally as a weak but symbolic police force between contending armies in Cyprus and the Middle East.

But even in these limited roles, it has been hobbled by the most inadequate communications, and has been reduced to begging Intelsat for free access to the world satellite system, which Intelsat refused.

The experience of the Cambodian incident and the Cyprus war suggests at least a modest remedy. Namely, that an earth communications satellite should be available to every nation in the world, financed through the United Nations budget, so that potential military crises can be reported and dealt with in time.

This would be no assurance that inexperienced and turbulent revolutionary regimes like the Khmer Rouge in Cambodia would pick up the phone when the bell rings in the Intelsat system; but at least there would be a line of communication that might save lives and might even avoid wars.

The major powers have recognized the need for emergency "hot lines" to avoid misunderstanding and even atomic wars, but the outlook is for conflict in places where there are no

House Rejects 70,000 Cut In Troops Abroad, 311-95

By JOHN W. FINNEY
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 20—The House of Representatives, in the first post-Vietnam war test of its attitude on military policy, voted overwhelmingly today against reducing American troops overseas.

By a 311-to-95 vote, the House rejected an amendment by Representative Ronald V. Dellums, Democrat of California, that would have required a 70,000-man reduction in the 416,500 troops stationed abroad.

The one-sided vote was interpreted by members as reflecting a more cautious attitude in the House toward reducing military commitments or the defense budget following the forced American exodus from South Vietnam and Cambodia.

Particularly after the infusion of 75 freshman Democrats, the House had seemed headed toward a more critical attitude toward the defense budget. But this critical attitude, according to members, changed perceptibly after the collapse of the American policy in Indochina.

A new majority attitude began to emerge, reflected in a number of votes on the annual military authorization bill, that Congress should not contribute to uncertainties about American policy in the post-Vietnam war period by reducing troops committed abroad to the defense of various allies.

In the opinion of some Congressional leaders, such as the Senate majority leader, Mike Mansfield of Montana, the military action taken to rescue the seized American freighter Mayagüez in the Gulf of Siam, also contributed to the stature of President Ford and made it more difficult for Congress to cut the defense budget or foreign troop commitments.

'The Wrong Time'

Representative Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. of Massachusetts, the majority leader, told the House that he had come to the conclusion that this would be "the wrong time," in "a troubled world" for Congress to direct a reduction in overseas troops.

Last year, in cooperation with Mr. Dellums, Mr. O'Neill sponsored an amendment that would have required a 100,000-man reduction in troops abroad. The amendment lost by a 240-163 vote, considerably closer than the margin in today's vote.

As in last year's debate, Mr. Dellums continued to argue that with the nation's "limited resources," Congress must begin to reduce overseas commitments to free funds "to address mounting human problems at home."

His amendment did not specify where the troop reductions should be made, but as a "theoretical" plan he suggested all the 70,000 men could be withdrawn from the Western Pacific through reduction in American forces in such countries as South Korea, Japan, the Philippines and Thailand.

Leading the opposition, Representative G. William Whitehurst, Republican of Virginia, said the Dellums amendment, if adopted, would "contribute to instability" among Asian nations and "send out a message" that the United States was "abdicating its responsibility in the world."

After three days of debate, the House was moving toward passage of legislation that would authorize the $26.5-billion in weapons procurement and development in the coming fiscal year. In addition, the bill would authorize $5.5-billion in weapons programs during the the three-month transitional period as the Federal Government shifts next year from a fiscal year beginning on July 1 to one beginning on Oct. 1.

During the debate, the House, usually by decisive margins, rejected proposals to reduce the funding for individual weapons programs, such as the B-1 strategic bomber being developed by the Air Force at a potential cost of at least $20-billion.

In a brief strategic debate, the House defeated, 276-124, an amendment by Representative Robert L. Leggett, Democrat of California, that would have prohibited the testing of New maneuverable missile warheads being developed, known as MARV's for manueverable re-entry vehicles.

With charts seeking to demonstrate that the United States has already a greater "kill capability" with its missiles than the Soviet Union, Mr. Leggett argued that the new warheads, with their ability to manuever with precision against an enemy missile silo, would have a destabilizing effect on the nuclear arms race.

Opponents of the amendment contended development of the new warheads was necessary to maintain a technological lead in missile accuracy over the Soviet Union.

The House spent far longer time debatting and adopting, by a 303-96 vote, an amendment by Representative Samuel S. Stratton, Democrat of upstate New York, that would permit women to be students in the three military academies

From the Finland Airport

By C. L. Sulzberger

PARIS—Next week's Bonn meeting of the Western European Union Assembly will coincide, one or another way, with a crisis over air defense between the United States and its trans-Atlantic NATO partners.

The decision by Belgium, the Netherlands, Denmark and Norway on whether to accept the recommendation of their defense ministers en bloc and replace their obsolescent American F-104 Starfighters with another U.S. plane, the F-16, has been deferred to coincide with the Bonn gathering, even if the timing of such a postponement was merely coincidental.

The defense ministers recommended that the F-16 be purchased in preference to the rival American F-17 or the French Mirage F-1E. Other (Swedish and British) competitors were apparently disregarded.

Although the French Government was initially downcast by this recommendation, it has fought back hard at the political level to recapture at least a share of the "market of the century" for supersonic aircraft. It now seems likely that Belgium, at least, will be induced to disregard its defense minister and opt for the Mirage.

Just as the moment for final decision arrives, the Western European Union (W.E.U.) will face a report by its own experts stressing that the issue posed underscores "Western Europe's extraordinary inability to take political action."

This applies above all to the European Community (threatened by Britain's possible resignation) which is being urged by China to make itself stronger and more independent vis-à-vis the two superpowers (particularly Russia). Peking now plans to send the Community its own ambassador.

The W.E.U. report complains: "It is incredible to witness Europeans proposing to commit themselves to a mass production program for an

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

The French have fought hard to recapture a share of the supersonic aircraft market.

American fighter aircraft larger than that to which the Americans have committed themselves to date. . . . What is really incredible is that Europe should have allowed itself to get into a position where there should be any doubt whatsoever about its ability to supply 350 aircraft from its own resources."

It denounces "our continued inability in Western Europe to see our aerospace industry as a European entity and not as a series of separate national aircraft industries." This, of course, is the heart of the matter. Although distinguished experts have proclaimed the two American planes, F-16 and F-17, superior to the Mirage, an amalgamated European industry could certainly provide an advanced, more economically competitive model to that of any individual Community member, in this case France.

Britain has hitherto contributed substantially to Europe's defense. Unfortunately, however, the present London Government believes it must cut its contribution. Therefore: "Europe's misfortune," the report comments, "is that it now should take into account a reduction in the strength of the British defense industries and therefore in its capability to supply its defense from its own resources."

In the directly related field of civilian aircraft, the report complains the governments linked in the W.E.U. have ignored proposals that they act "immediately to establish Western Europe as a single unified air transport market." The United States holds ascendancy in this field and bitter remarks are appended to U.S. objections to trans-Atlantic links via the supersonic Anglo-French Concorde.

"This year," W.E.U. is told, "Europe looks forward to the introduction of Concorde into passenger service. Objections from the other side of the Atlantic now seem to be based more on nationalistic than realistic grounds. It is worth reflecting that the total cost of getting this magnificent aircraft into service will be equivalent to that which the Americans spent on producing a wooden mock-up of their proposed SST [supersonic transport] before it was cancelled."

In all these observations there is an air of bitterness. But the answer is obvious. If Europe is to produce truly modern and competitive weapons that can match—or excel—those offered by the United States for sale to its NATO allies, Europe will have to unite more effectively.

Only a Europe capable of taking the complex political decisions to manufacture the expensive weapons required and of allotting responsibility for individual components to each member state is a Europe that can endure as an independent entity for long.

Sadly, however, the biggest question facing Europe today is whether a key member, Britain, will break its pledged word and tell the club to go to hell. With that kind of mood prevailing, no Continental statesman can plan for any serious alternative other than reliance on the United States—or Finlandization.

Secretary General Waldheim here at the United Nations is eager to assist in the development of an early-warning system, but he has neither the power nor the money to set it up. He needs the support, or at least the understanding of the members of the world organization, and particularly the acquiescence of the major powers. All that is at issue here is merely that modern communications should be used to get the facts of potential wars to the world in time, and that is not asking very much.

Cambodian Sailors, With No Navy Now, End O.C.S. Training

NEWPORT, R. I., May 20—Twenty Cambodian sailors who no longer have a navy graduated quietly today from the Officers Candidate School here.

They had been scheduled to graduate on Friday, along with the current class of United States officer candidates and 32 Iranian naval officers, but the ceremony was moved up to early this morning to avoid press coverage, United States Navy officials here said.

The Cambodian students requested the private ceremony and also asked that they not be interviewed by reporters or have their pictures taken for fear of jeopardizing the safety of relatives in Cambodia, according to Capt. Howard N. Kay, commander of the Naval Education and Training Center.

"It's a very difficult situation and we wanted to respect their wishes," Captain Kay said.

The Cambodian officers are to remain in the student dormitories here for the present. The Navy said they would deal directly with the Immigration and Naturalization Service, with international volunteer agencies and with "officers in third countries" to determine their future.

The Pentagon said that as of May 9, there were 300 Cambodians and 230 South Vietnamese being trained at 50 United States military bases. After they complete their courses, they will also be held in a similar refugee status.

Thai Premier Says He Hopes to Avoid Hasty Exit by U.S.

BANGKOK, Thailand, May 20 (Reuters)—Premier Kukrit Pramoj said today that a hasty withdrawal of United States forces could create problems for the Thai Government.

He told reporters that it might be difficult for Thailand to take over the four United States air bases and other facilities without preparation.

Protest groups have demanded the withdrawal of the 27,000 United States servicemen from Thailand after an uproar over the Mayagüez incident.

Only yesterday, with demonstrators besieging its gates, the United States embassy was forced to express regret for American use of the U Taphao air base to airlift marines to help rescue the container ship Mayagüez from Cambodia.

The Thai Government said it would review its military and economic ties with Washington as a result of the incident.

As matters stand, the United States has agreed to remove its forces from Thailand by next March at the latest. But student protest groups are demanding a pullout by July 4.

"It is possible that the withdrawal could be sooner than March, but it would be difficult for us because we would have to take over all their facilities in a hurry," Mr. Kukrit said. "However, we will listen to the public and political parties' intentions."

U.S. Now Reports 15 Dead In Recapture of Mayaguez

By PHILIP SHABECOFF
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 20—The Defense Department, in a casualty report that a spokesman called "as complete as we can make it," said today that 15 Americans had been killed in last week's operation to rescue the Mayagüez and its crew from the Cambodians.

The count also listed three marines as missing in action and a total of 50 as wounded. Yesterday, the Pentagon reported five dead, 16 missing and 49 wounded.

The spokesman said that it was possible that further information could lead to the addition of the missing marines to the list of those killed in action and that a few more names could raise the total of wounded. But he indicated that today's report was likely to stand for the immediate future.

Of those listed as killed in action, 11 were from the Marine Corps, two from the Navy and two from the Air Force. The wounded included 41 marines, seven from the Air Force and two from the Navy.

The military assault was undertaken last Wednesday to recover the Mayagüez and its crew of 39.

Another Question Raised

The defection of a Cambodian warship to Thailand last week, added still another to a number of unanswered questions about the Mayagüez incident.

A Pentagon spokesman, Joseph Laitin, confirmed today that a 170-foot submarine chaser with 40 Cambodians aboard had been turned over to Thai authorities in the port of Sattahip.

But in answering questions at a news briefing, Mr. Laitin said he did not know if the ship had taken part in the Cambodian seizure of the Mayagüez on May 12.

Members of the Cambodian vessel's crew apparently told the Thais, at least initially, that their vessel had taken part in the seizure of the Mayagüez and that the crew had then thrown a Cambodian Communist soldier overboard and sailed for Thailand.

Mr. Laitin said that the Pentagon did not have "any facts" on whether the submarine chaser, originally commissioned by the United States Navy, had played any role in the Mayagüez incident.

No Mention of Craft

All previous accounts from the crew of the Mayagüez and from Administration officials on the incident indicated that only small Cambodian gunboats and fishing craft had participated in the seizure. There was never any mention of a vessel the size of the submarine chaser in reports of the seizure and the subsequent American surveillance and recapture of the Mayagüez.

These questions were raised concerning the submarine chaser:

If the bigger vessel, which has been in Cambodian hands since the nineteen-fifties, was involved in the Mayagüez incident, why was the involvement not reported? And why did its crew defect afterward?

If it was not involved, why did its crew members say so when they reached Thailand? Why did the Pentagon have no firm information today about the Cambodian submarine chaser, which reached Sattahip last week?

The Pentagon was able to trace the background of the submarine chaser, explaining that it had passed from the United States to the French Navy and then to the Cambodian Navy in the early nineteen-fifties.

Pentagon spokesmen were unable to give an explanation of how a United States-made patrol boat known to have been used in the attack on the Mayagüez had been obtained by the Cambodians.

A photograph published in today's issue of the New York Times and other newspapers, taken by a Mayagüez crew member at the time of the capture, showed a patrol boat of the Swift class alongside. The Mayagüez.

Swifts Given to Saigon

Jane's Fighting Ships for 1973-1974 does not list any ships of this class in the Cambodian Navy. Jane's indicates that a number of the Swift craft were given to the South Vietnamese but gives no indication that any were turned over to Cambodia before the communist victory in that country.

A Pentagon spokesman, asked when and how the Cambodians had obtained this patrol boat, could not give an answer. He said he would try to check it out, but several hours later he still was not able to provide any information.

Meanwhile, interviews today with members of the Mayagüez crew members raised anew a question whether the Cambodians might have released the ship and crew without a military attack by the United States.

Wilbert Bock, radio operator on the Mayagüez, said today that Charles T. Miller, captain of the ship, had rejected an offer that he return with some of his crew to his vessel the night before the marine assault.

Mr. Bock, interviewed in San Francisco while on his way home to New Jersey, said that the Cambodians had offered to let Captain Miller send a radio message to American forces to call off the air attacks. Mr. Bock seemed to believe that the offer had been part of a plan to free the crew.

Another crew member, Emil Funtillo of Kienosha, Wis. told an interviewer in Hong Kong of a Cambodian offer to send the captain and seven crew members back to the ship last Tuesday night. Captain Miller had told of the offer and said he had turned it down because he did not want to split the crew and because the boat to return them to the Mayagüez might have been sunk by United States planes.

But the Cambodian offer would seem to suggest that, at a minimum, the Cambodians were willing to negotiate. And as Captain Miller suggested, they might have let the Mayagüez and its crew go when they were satisfied it was not a spy ship.

Captain Miller has expressed an opinion that the crew would not have been rscued without the marine assault. But his account and those of his crewmen would seem at least to raise a question of whether a delay in the attack and further attempts to negotiate with the Cambodian captors might have led to the release of the crew and ship without bloodshed.

Senate Refuses Reinstatement Of Butterfield's Military Status

WASHINGTON, May 20—The Senate defeated today, 16 to 42, a bill that would have reinstated Alexander P. Butterfield, the former head of the Federal Aviation Administration who first disclosed the existence of the White House tapes, as a retired Air Force colonel.

The vote, several Senators said, was not aimed personally at Mr. Butterfield but reflected a growing Senate concern about what they called a blurring in recent years of civilian and military authority in the Government.

It was Mr. Butterfield who told the Senate Watergate committee in 1973 about the existence of the extensive taping system in the White House, which played a major role in the resignation of President Nixon.

But that incident was not mentioned in the debate today, which focused instead on what normally would have been a routine bill to restore to Mr. Butterfield his retired military status.

Mr. Butterfield, who had 20 years service in the Air Force, resigned his commission as a retired colonel before being confirmed for the F.A.A. post in 1973 to comply with a 1958 law requiring the agency's head to be a civilian.

He resigned from the aviation agency last March, and two of the more senior members of the Senate Armed Services Committee, John C. Stennis of Mississippi, and Howard W. Cannon of Nevada, both Democrats, sought the bill reinstating his military benefits on the ground that he was entitled to receive his accrued retirement benefits.

But Senator John C. Culver, a freshman Democrat from Iowa who is on the Armed Services Committee, fought the bill on the floor, arguing that it would be an exception to the constitutional principle of "the scrupulous separation of civilian and military functions."

This separation, he argued, "has been blurred and systematically abused on too many occasions." Too often, he said, military officers have advanced in rank "on their political connections."

Mr. Culver and Senator Gary Hart, a freshman Democrat from Colorado, had argued in committee that there was growing concern about high military officers switching to key appointive civilian Government posts and then resuming their military careers.

"In the wake of events of the past few years wherein we have seen the weakening of our constitutional system by the development of massive conflicts of interest, we have in my judgment the duty to preserve the laws that guard against such a situation," Senator Culver said.

Mr. Cannon contended that it was "only fair" to restore the retired rank to Mr Butterfield because congress had passed special bills in the past to permit two other former F.A.A. heads—Elwood R. Quesada and William F. McKee, both Air Force generals—to retain their military status.

But Senator Culver argued that this was "governing by exception" and made what he called "a mockery" of the law requiring a civilian to head the agency.

He said that defeat of the bill would not impose a financial hardship on Mr. Butterfield and would deprive him only of post exchange and commissary privileges and military health care.

FORD PLEDGES U.S. TO STAND BY SEOUL

By The Associated Press

President Ford has committed his Administration to standing its ground in South Korea in the event of attack from the North.

"We have a treaty with South Korea," he said in an interview published in The New York Daily News today. "The South Koreans have done an outstanding job in building up their own military capability, defending their economy, and they are a loyal ally.

"I think it's important that we let them as well as others know that at least this Administration intends to live up to our signed obligations."

In an interview with the paper's chief Washington correspondent, James Wieghart, the columnist Jerry Greene and the White House correspondent, Paul Healy, Mr. Ford also defended his handling of the Mayagüez incident and the retaking of the American freighter and ther crew from the Cambodians.

4-Star Admiral Brothers in Shift

The first brothers to hold simultaneously the rank of four-star admiral in the Navy are both involved in a current shift in high-level commands. In a ceremony at the American Embassy in London yesterday, command of American naval forces in Europe passed to Adm. David H. Bagley, who is 54 years old. Newly appointed to the rank, he has been in Washington as Chief of Naval Personnel.

The European command was held in 1973 and 1974, by Adm. Worthvbcm avb cm his brother, Adm. Worth H. Bagley, 50, who will retire June 30 as Vice Chief of Naval Operations in Washington. He will be succeeded by Adm. Harold E. Shear, whom Adm. David Bagley is succeeding in the European command.

Rear Adm. Samuel L. Grave Jr., who in 1971 became the Navy's first black admiral, has been named commandant of the 11th Naval District in San Diego. Admiral Gravely, 52, has been commander of a cruiser-destroyer group.

James R. Schlesinger, the Secretary of Defense, said yesterday that he had accepted with regret the resignation of William Beecher as deputy assistant secretary for public affairs, effective May 30. Mr. Beecher, who went to the Pentagon two years ago from The New York York Times bureau in Washington, will join The Boston Globe as diplomatic correspondent.

House Votes for Women In Service Academies

By Richard L. Lyons
Washington Post Staff Writer

The House voted last night to admit women to the U.S. military, naval and Air Force academies as it worked toward passage of the $32 billion military hardware authorization bill.

By a vote of 303 to 96 the House cracked one of the final barriers of discrimination in government after voting 284 to 113 to reject a proposal by opponents that the matter of creating a women's service academy be studied for a year by the Defense Department.

Opponents argued that admitting women to the service academies would be a first step toward putting them in combat, which is now forbidden by law. The principal publicly stated reason for opposing letting women learn soldiering at elite academies is that this training is intended to prepare officers for combat; thus admission would be a first step toward repealing that law or would be a waste of tax money, it is argued.

But Rep. Sam Stratton (D-N.Y.), who led the fight to admit women, said a study showed that more than 10 per cent of the present academy graduates never have seen combat. He called it discrimination to permit more than 100,000 women to serve in the armed forces, including ROTC and officer candidate schools but to forbid them to attend the top-rank academies and thus compete equally with men for promotion.

The House had never before voted to admit women to the service academies, but the Senate did in the last Congress.

The authorization bill sets ceilings for purchase of planes, ships and missiles for a 15-month period beginning July 1. Funds must be provided later in an appropriation bill. The Senate Armed Services Committee voted to authorize $30.3 billion for the same period.

The tallies against defense cuts during two days of voting were surprisingly lopsided. The big new crop of new members had seemed likely to push the House in the direction of defense cuts.

The freshmen voted more strongly for reductions than the House as a whole. For instance, they voted by a margin ment funds for the B-1 bomber of 2 to 1 to cut out procurewhile the House as a whole rejected the amendment, 227 to 164. One reason for the big votes against the money cut probably was to send a message that after defeat in Indochina the United States was not preparing to withdraw from the world in isolation.

An attempt by Rep. Ronald V. Dellums (D-Calif.) to order a return to this country of 70,000 U.S. troops abroad was defeated, 311 to 95. Dellums argued that maintenance of the present 416,500 U.S. troops abroad is costly and not needed and that the 70,000 could be withdrawn without reducing the number stationed in Europe. Opponents said it would be viewed as a return to isolationism.

Rejected 276 to 124 was a proposal to forbid testing of MARV, a device to permit changing the course of missiles in flight and more accurate targeting. Rep. Robert Leggett (D-Calif.) said testing the device would only push the Soviet Union into a race for a first-strike capability. But Rep. Joe D. Waggonner (D-La.) said: "There is no assurance if we stand still, the U.S.S.R. will."

Leggett also lost by a voice vote an attempt to cut out $559.9 million for contruction of a fourth Trident nuclear-missile submarine. His purpose was not to kill the program but only to defer funds which he said would not be spent next year.

U.S. Rocket Fails, Losing 2 Satellites In the Defense Net

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla., May 20 (UPI)—A United States rocket carrying two satellites was lost in space today, dooming a $57-million mission aimed at establishing the final link of a worldwide military communications network.

Air Force officials said the "transtage," or third stage, of the Titan 3-C rocket athe two, 1,200-pound satellites connected to it began rolling and tumbling out of control far above the earth after being launched from Cape Canaveral.

Officials said the space package would soon plunge into the earth's atmosphere and be consumed by the searing heat of re-entry.

Scientists said they believed a power problem aboard the transtage was respoible for the failure. The third stage was to have made two short rocket burns after launching to place the satellites in their proper orbits, but officials said they had received no indication that the burns took place.

This was the first failure of a transtage in 10 years. In 1965, two satellite missions failed as a result of problems in the third stage. The last failure of a satellite mission at Cape Canaveral occurred on Feb. 20, when an Atlas-Centaur rocket malfunctioned during the launching of an Intelsat 42 commercial communications satellite.

The two satellites were Ko have been positioned in stationary orbits 6½ ½ hours after the liftoff—one over the Pacific Ocean and the other over the Indian Ocean.

The satellites, designed to handle 1,300 phone calls or relHy televised or printed messages without danger of evesdropping or jammingby enemy forces, were to have completed a worldwide military communications network begun in 1973 when two similar satellites were launched over the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

2 ENVOYS SOUGHT ASIA NEWS CURBS

Asked Voice of America to Play Down April Events

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 20—The United States ambassadors to South Vietnam and Cambodia asked the Voice of America to play down news of the deteriorating situation in Indochina in early April.

Representative Bella Abzug today produced texts of a message to this effect from John Gunther Dean, the last American envoy in Cambodia, and another cablegram from Graham A. Martin, the last American envoy in Saigon.

In testimony before the Government Operations subcommittee on Government information and individual rights, neither Eugene P. Kopp, deputy director of the United States Information Agency, nor Bernard Kamenske, news director of the Voice of America, questioned the authenticity of the messages.

Mr. Martin's cablegram, dated April 6 and classified as "confidential," said "speculative and unofficial comments" would "contribute to apprehensions amongst Vietnamese and Americans."

"Staying with minimum official announcements most helpful," the cablegram went on.

The cablegram from Mr. Dean, dated April 14, said he "strongly" advised the Voice of America against carrying an account of student demonstrations in Phnom Penh at which the resignation of President Lon Nol and the termination of American military aid were demanded. Voice of America coverage could be "misconstrued as representing [United States) mission support for student demands," he explained.

Bases in Thailand

BANGKOK—Prime Minister Kukrit Pramoji said an overhasty withdrawal of U.S. forces from Thailand could crate problems for the Thai government, which might find it difficult to take over four U.S. air bases and other facilities without careful preparation.

In Thailand's northeastern province of Nong Khai, a spokesman announced formation of an anti-Vietnamese movement to boycott goods being sold by the large Vietnamese business community in the province.

ABOUT 210 MARINES ENGAGED IN COMBAT ON THE ISLAND IN THE OPERATION TO RECOVER THE MERCHANT SHIP MAYAGUEZ AND ITS CREW FROM THE CAMBODIANS. A FEW DOZEN AIRMEN CAME UNDER FIRE AHILE FLYING THE HELICOPTERS THAT CARRIED THE MARINES.

PENTAGON SPOKESMAN JOSEPH LAITIN SAID "EYEWITNESS ACCOUNTS" INDICATE LITTLE LIKLIHOOD THE THREE MISSING MEN, ALL MARINES, ARE ALIVE. HE DID NOT ELABORATE.

PRESIDENT FORD WAS SENDING PERSONAL CONDOLENCES TO THE FAMILIES OF THE MEN KILLED. FIFTEEN OF THE WOUNDED MARINES RECEIVED PURPLE HEARTS AT SUBIC BAY, PHILLIPINES, TUESDAY.

THIRTEEN OF THE DEAD WERE KILLED IN AN AIR FORCE HELICOPTER THAT CRASHED 100 FEET OFF KOH TANG AS THE INVASION FORCE MOVED IN UNDER ENEMY FIRE. ONE WAS AN AIR FORCE CREWMAN ON ANOTHER HELICOPTER, WHICH WAS HIT AS IT TRIED TO LEAVE THE ISLAND AND WENT DOWN MORE THAN TWO MILES OUT AT SEA. THE 15TH WAS A MARINE KILLED ON THE ISLAND.

THE BATTLE ENDED THURSDAY MORNING WASHINGTON TIME, BUT IT TOOK 4 1/2 DAYS FOR THE PENTAGON TO DETERMINE THE TOLL. THE WHITE HOUSE INDICATED DISSATISFACTION WITH THE TIME IT TOOK TO MAKE THE COUNT. A MARINE SOURCE SAID OF THE TIME INVOLVED IN THE COUNT, "SOME HEADS ARE ABOUT TO ROLL OVER THIS."

ON MONDAY, THE PENTAGON ESTIMATED THE KILLED AND MISSING AT 21. LAITIN SAID THAT INCLUDED SOME DOUBLE COUNTING. PENTAGON OFFICIALS SAID THE COUNT WAS CONFUSING BECAUSE THE MARINES WERE SCATTERED AFTER THE BATTLE TO AT LEAST THREE DIFFERENT SHIPS AND THREE DIFFERENT COUNTRIES.

LAITIN SAID NONE OF THE BODIES WAS RECOVERED.

THE BREAKDOWN SHOWED 11 MARINES, TWO AIRMEN AND TWO NAVY HOSPITALMEN KILLED; THREE MARINES MISSING, AND 41 MARINES, SEVEN AIRMEN AND TWO SAILORS WOUNDED.

ONE MARINE AND ONE AIRMAN WERE LISTED IN SERIOUS CONDITION, BUT LAITIN SAID "BOTH ARE STABLE AND EXPECTED TO RECOVER."

WASHINGTON (UPI) -- THE HOUSE, REJECTING ATTEMPTS TO CUT BACK MAJOR WEAPONS PROGRAMS AND THE NUMBER OF U.S. TROOPS STATIONED ABROAD, HAS PASSED A $32 BILLION WEAPONS PROCUREMENT BILL INTACT.

SUPPORTERS OF THE BILL SAID IT IS THE WRONG TIME TO REDUCE THE NUMBER OF FOREIGN BASED TROOPS NOW THAT U.S. MILITARY RESOLVE MIGHT BE IN DOUBT BECAUSE OF SETBACKS IN INDOCHINA.

THE BILL INCLUDED AN AMENDMENT ORDERING THE SERVICE ACADEMIES TO ADMIT WOMEN AND TRAIN THEM FOR COMBAT. THAT MEASURE PASSED 303-96 BEFORE THE ENTIRE BILL WAS APPROVED ON A 333-63 ROLL CALL TUESDAY.

THE BILL NOW GOES TO THE SENATE, WHICH BEGINS DEBATE THIS WEEK ON A $30.3 BILLION VERSION. A FINAL SENATE VOTE WILL PROBABLY COME THE FIRST WEEK IN JUNE.

IN TWO DAYS OF VOTING, THE HOUSE TURNED BACK EFFORTS TO TRIM THE B1 BOMBER PROGRAM AND THE TRIDENT SUBMARINE PROGRAM AND TO ELIMINATE THE A10 FIGHTER PLANE PROJECT ALTOGETHER. AMONG OTHER AMENDMENTS REJECTED BY THE HOUSE WAS ONE TO CUT BACK U.S. TROOPS STATIONED ABROAD BY 70,000 PERSONS. IT WAS DEFEATED 311-95.

A FINAL EFFORT TO SLICE $1.9 BILLION FROM THE MEASURE, A PROPOSAL THAT WOULD HAVE LEFT IT TO THE DEFENSE DEPARTMENT TO DESIGNATE PROGRAMS TO BE CUT BACK, WAS BEATEN 216-183.

"THIS IS THE WRONG MONTH OF THE WRONG YEAR OF THE WRONG CENTURY TO OFFER SUCH AN AMENDMENT," SAID REP. WAYNE HAYS, D-OHIO, A SENIOR MEMBER OF THE HOUSE INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS COMMITTEE IN ARGUING AGAINST A TROOP CUT. "IN THE WAKE OF VIETNAM, EUROPE IS JITTERY ABOUT WHAT THE PURPOSES OF THE UNITED STATES MAY BE."

HIS VIEWPOINT WAS ECHOED BY A REPORT FROM THE SENATE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE, WARNING SPECIFICALLY AGAINST TROOP REDUCTIONS IN THE PACIFIC.

BUT REP. RONALD V. DELLUMS, D-CALIF., SAID A REDUCTION IN FORCES FROM THE ESTIMATED 416,000 TROOPS ABROAD WOULD HAVE LITTLE IF ANY EFFECT ON THE NATION'S DEFENSES, AND THAT CONGRESS, NOT THE PENTAGON, SHOULD DICTATE U.S. MILITARY POSTURE IN FOREIGN NATIONS.

DELLUMS SAID THE PENTAGON COULD DECIDE WHERE TO MAKE THE CUTS, BUT HE SUGGESTED THEY COULD COME IN THAILAND, JAPAN, SOUTH KOREA, THE PHILIPPINES, TAIWAN, BERMUDA, CUBA AND MOROCCO. HE SAID NONE SHOULD COME IN EUROPE.

THE BILL, ALREADY CUT $3.7 BILLION BY THE HOUSE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE FROM THE $35.7 BILLION THE PENTAGON REQUESTED, WOULD AUTHORIZE WEAPONS PROCUREMENT, RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT OVER A 15-MONTH PERIOD.

THE MEASURE IS A MAJOR SEGMENT OF THE OVERALL $129.3 BILLION DEFENSE DEPARTMENT BUDGET FOR THE 1976 FISCAL YEAR THAT STARTS JULY 1 AND EXTENDS TO SEPT. 30. 1976.

The Projection of Power by Air

By Colonel A. P. Sights, Jr., U. S. Air Force (Retired)

I believe that the mobility of our forces is extremely important. From the first day I walked into the Pentagon, I have been focusing on that subject. . . .

Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger
Congressional Testimony 1974

Being able to fly infantry divisions across oceans is a possibility Admiral Mahan either did not foresee or considered too speculative for useful comment. If he were around today, one supposes he might praise it as a technical achievement that reflected the continuing inventive genius of the American people. But how would he, as a strategist, advise us to use this new military capability? Indeed, after acquainting himself with the many problems involved, would he recommend that we use it at all?

Not until the advent of large, long-range transport aircraft in the late 1960s and early 1970s did overseas deployment by air become a practical possibility. Long before this, however, the conception began to take shape of giving wings to large ground force units in order that they might go quickly on short notice to distant trouble spots where U.S. interests were threatened.

Events as well as people helped form this conception. One such event was the Berlin airlift of 1948–49. For 14 months the planes shuttled back and forth, day and night, in fair weather and foul, to carry a total of two and one-half million tons of supplies into that beleaguered city while Red Army troops idly watched the weeds grow around their useless roadblocks. This undertaking, with its drama, suspense, and final happy ending, served to impress two thoughts on the public mind: first, that with suitable planes and enough of them, there was virtually no limit to what could be transported by air; and second, that under certain circumstances, a large military airlift fleet could be enormously useful.

Another contributing event was the long-drawn-out buildup of U.S. forces in the Far East after North Korea's surprise attack across the 38th parallel in June 1950. More than 55 days passed before the first division arrived from the United States. Meanwhile theater forces, thrown into the breach, were slowly compressed into the Pusan perimeter and seemed on the point of being driven into the sea when the bold amphibious assault at Inchon brought them an eleventh-hour reprieve. Yet it was a close call. Monday morning quarterbacks agreed that our lack of readiness had cost us dearly but disagreed on what should be done about it.

Korea, the first major conflict in the nuclear age, had been fought with the supposedly obsolete weapons and tactics of World War II. The Air Force, firmly wedded to the concept of massive retaliation, viewed it as an unaccountable throwback not likely to recur. On the other hand, the Army, having little capability and still less enthusiasm for using nuclear weapons, took it as the probable pattern of future conflicts. Accordingly Army planners, under the leadership of World War II paratrooper generals (most notably Matthew B. Ridgway and Maxwell D. Taylor, who both served as chief of staff, and James M. Gavin, chief of research and development), began to develop the doctrine and seek the means to deal with future crises cast in the Korean mold.

The new doctrine of "flexible response," to use the name General Taylor gave it in his 1959 book, The Uncertain Trumpet, called for rapid and discriminating (meaning nonnuclear) responses to limited conflagrations. Combat forces tailored to the particular task would move in quickly while the aggression was still in its incipient stages, and seize the initiative before the enemy had time to build up his strength. Hopefully the early arrival of such forces on the scene would have a stabilizing influence and prevent the outbreak of hostilities altogether.

The overriding emphasis was on speed, which meant—in most cases—deployment by air. Army planners soon discovered, however, that the available transport planes could neither lift the total tonnages required nor accommodate all the oversize pieces of equipment such as tanks, artillery, and helicopters, that would have to accompany the troops.

A modernization of the airlift force, begun soon after the Berlin airlift, had been carried through to completion after the Korean Armistice. But there was no move thereafter by the Department of Defense to further improve or enlarge it despite the Army's expressed dissatisfaction. The Navy and Marine Corps, were naturally oriented toward sealift. Moreover, unlike the Army, they had some transport aircraft of their own. Hence, they needed comparatively little Defense airlift support and, generally, were satisfied with the amount available. So too was the Air Force which, during the 1950s, measured the adequacy of airlift by its ability to support the deployment of Strategic Air Command bombers in case of general war. This view prevailed within the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the Army made little headway in its campaign for more and larger planes until, early in the 1960s, it gained two important and influential allies.

One was the newly-elected President, John F. Kennedy. He read General Taylor's book, liked the ideas it expressed, and made the ability to respond "flexibly" one of the goals of his administration.

The other was Congressman L. Mendel Rivers, chairman of the special subcommittee on national military airlift established by the House in January 1960. In a legislative tour de force, Rivers provided the main impetus and leadership in working out a program, acceptable to the executive branch as well as to Congress, for another modernization of military airlift. This program laid the foundation for the present Military Airlift Command (MAC) fleet of long-range C-141 and C-5A jet transports that, with few exceptions, can lift every item of equipment an Army division has.

In a typical service briefing we would learn that "our global airlift capabilities now permit rapid deployment of ready U.S. forces to any area of real or threatened conflict." While this is quite true in a general sense, various qualifications and addenda are needed for an appreciation of what can be done in specific circumstances. Let us look first at what has to be lifted, and then at how the airlift is carried out.

The phrase, "U.S. forces," may be taken to mean ground forces—divisions or smaller units of the Army and Marine Corps—with supporting tactical air. Ground forces are divided into companies, battalions, regiments, and so on, but one usually thinks of deploying them in terms of divisions. This is because normally the division is the smallest unit that is self-sufficient and capable of operating independently. When a smaller unit, say a battalion, is all that is needed, it can be augmented for independent operation. However the division is a convenient unit of measure and, if the airlift forces can move it, they can always move something smaller. How big then is a division? Like the question, "How big is a dog?" it depends on the type and whether you include the tail in the measurement.

The Army has five types of divisions—infantry, armored, mechanized, airborne, and airmobile—and the Marine division, not precisely like any of these, would make six. The Army divisions all have around 17,000 men (except airborne which is slightly smaller) but they vary widely in weight of equipment from about 11,000 tons for airborne and airmobile to over 50,000 for armored. Depending on the type of division, there are between about 100 and 400 aircraft and between about 3,000 and 5,000 vehicles in each. But this is only the basic unit. Also to be considered is its logistic "tail."

If the division went into action it would quickly need its "initial support increment"—another 18,000 men and 40,000 tons of equipment, and not long after that, if combat continued, its "sustaining support increment" which presumably would come by sea. On top of all this are the consumable supplies such as food, fuel, and ammunition, that would have to flow in a continuous stream to the deployed unit. Altogether a formidable array of personnel and materiel.

Movement of the troops themselves by air should present no problem. The commercial airlines have more than enough passenger capacity to support any foreseeable deployment. However the equipment is another matter. The air cargo industry is still small and, in any event, its planes are not designed for efficient handling of military equipment, especially vehicles. In fact, a large percentage of the Army's items could not be carried by those airplanes at all. Hence the task of deploying division equipment would fall mainly on the MAC fleet.

The Military Airlift Command has 275 C-141s and 77 C-5As manufactured by Lockheed and delivered in 1965–69 and 1969–73 respectively, these jet cargo planes are relatively new. They were designed, in response to Army requirements, specifically for the rapid deployment mission. On a flight from the United States to Europe the C-141 could carry about 34 tons and the much larger C-5A over three times that amount. More significantly, the C-5A has a capacious cabin with almost seven and one-half times more cubic feet of storage space. This permits it to accommodate all but the very largest pieces of division equipment. The exceptions include such things as landing craft, paving machines, heavy cranes, and fixed-wing aircraft (which last can fly themselves overseas).

When the division is alerted for air deployment, its equipment must be broken down into planeload lots. The ideal load would be one filling the cargo compartment from floor to ceiling and, at the same time, weighing the maximum that the plane could lift. Such a balance is rarely achieved in practice. A capacity load by weight of heavy dense items like mortar shells would leave unused cabin space whereas a cabin full of pylon fuel tanks would be far under the allowable weight. The C-141 presents a particular problem in this respect because it tends to be space-limited on most Army deployment missions. Studies have indicated, according to testimony by the Air Force Director of Transportation, "that the average C-141 payloads, which would be achieved in a deployment to Europe, range from 22 tons for an armored division to 13 tons for an airmobile division." In other words the average plane, even though fully loaded, would be carrying only 63 per cent, or 38 per cent, of what it could actually lift.

As a further complication, the maximum allowable cargo weight will vary a great deal according to the length of the flight. This is because the weight of fuel, a factor of little or no importance on cargo ships, is of major importance on cargo planes. For example, in the 1973 airlift to the Middle East, if the C-5s had had to fly nonstop from the United States to Israel, they could have carried no more than about 33.5 tons of payload per trip. As it was however, by refueling in the Azores, they were able to carry an average of 74.2 tons—more than twice as much. Thus the weight of fuel consumed may well exceed the weight of cargo carried. And the longer the flight, the greater the fuel requirement and the less the allowable cargo weight.

Considering the various types of divisions, their differing support requirements, the complications of weight and cube in loading aircraft, and the inevitable last-minute decisions on where the force is going and how it will get there, the logisticians have an unenviable task. However they have worked out tables, graphs, computer programs, and so on, to handle the mass of detail. And they, along with Army troops and Air Force air and ground personnel, have rehearsed procedures in many tests, exercises, and actual deployments over the last few years. So there is good reason to believe that, even under conditions of extreme urgency, the combat force can be loaded out and speeded on its way with order and efficiency.

When one hears that such and such infantry division is being rushed overseas by air to cope with some real or simulated emergency, the image may come to mind of an airfield jammed with huge transport planes parked wingtip to wingtip. Long columns of men, tanks, and guns are queued up behind the planes and move slowly up the ramps into the cavernous interiors. Once all are aboard, the hatches are secured and engines started. The planes taxi out in column to the end of the runway, take off in quick succession, and assemble in loose formation as they head out over the ocean.

That indeed was the general pattern of the great airborne assaults of World War II in which tactical transport planes lifted airborne divisions en masse, flew them behind enemy lines, and delivered them via parachute or glider onto the battlefield. And it is still the pattern of many military air operations, including bombing raids and fighter sweeps as well as airborne assaults.

Strategic airlift, however, operates in a different fashion. Instead of sending aircraft off in groups, maximum efficiency is achieved by dispatching them singly at regular intervals. Frederick C. Thayer, author of Air Transport Policy and National Security,[1] has likened the process to a conveyor belt extending from point of departure to final destination with the transports spaced at more or less equal intervals along it. The rate of flow is regulated according to the capabilities of departure, enroute, and arrival airfields for parking and handling aircraft, loading and discharging cargo, refueling, and suchlike. If one conveyor belt, or "channel" to use the technical term, cannot produce the desired flow, others are established using different airfields along alternate routes.

Thus an airlift comprises more than just cargoes and the airplanes and flight crews to haul them. There must be a route structure made up of bases, ground personnel, maintenance and servicing facilities, and cargo handling equipment. Also navigation and landing aids, rescue facilities, and weather reporting and communications nets must exist. Fighter escorts might be necessary to prevent enemy interference with the airlift. If there is no existing route structure to support an emergency deployment, one must be quickly established. To be able to do this requires detailed planning ahead of time, extensive stocks of supplies and equipment, and—above all—an effective system of management.

The Military Airlift Command, with headquarters at Scott Air Force Base, Illinois, not far from St. Louis, is responsible for organizing and operating a worldwide airlift system and for providing airlift service to all agencies of the Department of Defense. Befitting its global mission, MAC divided the world into two parts, giving half to each of its two major subordinate commands. The 21st Air Force at McGuire AFB in New Jersey got everything east of a north-south line near Kansas City, Missouri; and the 22nd at Travis AFB, California, everything west of that line. On the far side of the globe, the dividing line is in the vicinity of Karachi, Pakistan. Within their respective hemispheres these two commands manage the existing routes, used primarily for air logistic support of Defense activities in various parts of the world, and stand prepared to establish and operate new routes as and when the situation requires. The airplanes and flight crews that move passengers and cargo along these far-flung routes can come from a variety of sources.

First there is MAC's own fleet, previously mentioned, comprising four squadrons of C-5As and 13 of C-141s—352 aircraft altogether, including spares. Then there is the Civil Reserve Air Fleet (CRAF), MAC's principal source of augmentation in peace and war. Established in 1952, it provides specifically designated aircraft from the civil airlines as backup airlift in emergencies and national crises.

Planes committed to the CRAF program are, for the most part, the latest types in commercial use. Numbers vary somewhat from month to month but, as a general indication of size and composition, there were on 1 September 1974 a total of 247 long-range aircraft. These included 90 passenger, 72 cargo, and 85 convertible types, the latter being a passenger plane designed for quick removal of seats and conversion (say in 36 hours or less) into a cargo carrier. The purely passenger types are mostly wide-bodied jets whereas the majority of cargo and convertible types are much smaller machines. However, below the main passenger deck of the big jets is a low-ceilinged but otherwise cavernous compartment that can handle the palletized load of an average air freighter. Yet despite its substantial cargo lift capacity, the CRAF fleet is ill-suited, as we shall see, for hauling ground force equipment.

Another possible source of augmentation is the Airlift Command's fleet of C-130 aircraft with over 230 in regular squadrons and some 200 more in Reserve and Air National Guard units. The C-130, also built by Lockheed, bears a family resemblance to the C-141 and C-5 though it is smaller and slower, being equipped with turboprop instead of jet engines. This very successful plane, used by air forces around the world and still in production after 19 years, was designed as a tactical transport. However it can lift up to 20 tons and the later models have enough range for use on international routes. Consequently, long-range flights were commonly made by C-130s in the early 1960s before the jet transports came along. Despite all this, MAC planners probably could not count on getting many of these aircraft in time of emergency because, presumably, they would be otherwise occupied, either in theater airlift tasks or in helping with the overseas deployment of tactical air units. Indeed, until December 1974 most of them were in the Tactical Air Command. Now all are in MAC.

As for strategic airlift reserves, there are 17 Air Force Reserve Associate Squadrons, so-called because they have no aircraft of their own but share the same location as MAC's regular C-5 and C-141 squadrons and use the same equipment. This arrangement enables reservists to operate first-line aircraft and give immediate support in emergencies that require increased flying hour rates. The Air National Guard, which elected to retain its own transport aircraft, is now mostly converted to C-130s. Until recently it operated a few C-124s. These prop-driven strategic transports, dating back to the early 1950s, were once the workhorses of the MAC fleet. Now all have been retired to desert storage, to be used only if needed. Even though slow and weary, they can still lug some heavy loads across the seas.

Just to complete our look at long-range airlift resources, let us note that there are a few others around which could be used in emergencies. For example, the aerial tankers—Strategic Air Command KC-135s and Marine Corps KC-130s, and the Navy's C-9B jet transports recently acquired for fleet logistic support. The late Will Rogers was asked many years ago what he thought of a proposal to make Oklahoma's Red River navigable. He replied that it would be cheaper to pave it. In similar vein, one suspects MAC could build new planes sooner than it could borrow these. Be that as it may, there is still a lot of available airlift. But is it enough? What determines the amount needed?

Compared with estimating requirements for bombers to interdict a supply line or for fighters to gain air superiority, it is a simple matter to figure the number of transports needed to move passengers and cargo at a given rate from point A to point B. A junior logistician could make a rough estimate on the way to his coffee break. But the rub is, of course, that troop movements involve questions of strategy as well as logistics. What, precisely, has to be lifted? To where? And in what length of time? While subordinates may assemble facts, prepare analyses, and conduct war games, the answers ultimately rest on the assumptions and judgments of political and military leaders at the highest levels of government.

The Department of Defense's approach, outlined by Secretary Schlesinger in his annual report for Fiscal Year 1975, was to base airlift requirements on the most demanding contingency likely to arise—namely, an attack on NATO by nations of the Warsaw pact, led by the USSR. These requirements, he said, were then checked against lesser contingencies "to see whether what can lick the cat can also lick the kitten."

While current NATO strategy does not rule out the early use of tactical nuclear weapons, it does retain the option of offering a conventional defense, at least initially, against a conventional attack by the Warsaw Pact. The forces deployed on the crucial central front comprise 29[1] NATO divisions facing 58 Warsaw Pact divisions. In terms of manpower the disparity is not as great as these figures would indicate, with NATO having [illegible],000 men in its forces compared to the Warsaw Pact's 925,000. An assessment of the comparative advantages in such things as the quality and quantity of tactical aircraft, tanks, and other weapons, and the cohesion and political reliability of the constituent national forces, suggests an approximate military balance in deployed forces. Hence, a key factor in all calculations is the question of how rapidly each side can bring up reinforcements.

The United States has four and one-third divisions in Europe along with enough prepositioned equipment for at least two and two-thirds more divisions. In the continental United States are three and two-thirds active divisions that could be committed to Europe and four more regular divisions, plus several reserve brigades, that could be sent later. Proportionate numbers of tactical fighter squadrons would have to accompany these divisions as the buildup progressed. The weight of men, equipment, and supplies in the part of the force to be airlifted comes to about half a million tons. Planes on the Berlin Airlift carried five times that tonnage but it took them 13 months to do so over a very much shorter distance. How soon do our reinforcements for NATO have to be delivered?

"Almost everyone in Europe," reported Senator Sam Nunn of Georgia after his February 1974 visit, "writes off the usefulness of forces that . . . would take more than 10–20 days to arrive."[2] While American military authorities generally take a more optimistic view of NATO prospects than do their European counterparts, they agree that the United States must be able to reinforce NATO quickly by air. Questions on such matters hardly admit to precise answers, though they tend to get them anyway in Pentagon planning—and keep them.

One objective, dating back at least to the mid-1960s, and recently reaffirmed, is to be able to fly an army division to Europe in seven days, an average figure since, as we have seen, divisions differ widely in size and weight. With present airlift resources, that task is said to take about 19 days. In case the reader gets a different answer, using data previously given, it should be pointed out that there are additional factors involved. For example, other urgent tasks would have to be carried out concurrently; the possible one-half war of the one and one-half war strategy would require consideration; and the percentage of outsize equipment rather than total tonnage would be the pacing factor in deployment times.

During the FY 1975 budget hearings, the Secretary of Defense recommended three steps to cut the average division deployment time from 19 to 7 days. None involved the purchase of new planes. Whether or not one agrees on the need for more airlift, these proposals are of interest for the additional light they shed on the nature of airlift systems.

The first proposal was to get more airlift out of the existing MAC fleet by increasing the wartime utilization rate. "Aircraft utilization" may be defined as the average number of hours flown daily by a single airplane. It is a basic management tool, widely employed in all air operations but especially useful for measuring the productivity of airlift operating on the conveyor belt principle. The higher the utilization rate, the less time the airplanes will spend on the ground and the more cargo it will deliver on the conveyor belt. Ground time is required for such purposes as taking on and discharging cargo, refueling, and making any necessary repairs; also for crew rest when another flight crew is unavailable to take the plane on to the next stop.

It follows that some of the ways to reduce ground time are to acquire more flight crews and mechanics, build up stocks of spare parts, expand maintenance facilities, introduce more efficient cargo-handling methods, and establish alternate routes to avoid base saturation with attendant pile-ups of aircraft. Also, for limited periods during emergencies, it is possible to increase flying hours between crew rests, defer aircraft maintenance not directly related to safety, and go to a six- or seven-day work week. Such actions, if prepared for in advance, enable a military airlift system to operate at a low utilization rate in peacetime but to "surge" to a much higher rate immediately upon the outbreak of war.

With a low peacetime utilization rate of its own airplanes of around four or five hours a day, MAC can give the commercial airlines a reasonable share of defense airlift business and, at the same time, conserve valuable military equipment, especially the C-5A whose wing fatigue problems still curtail its expected service life. (In emergencies this aircraft, according to Air Force officials, can and will be flown without restrictions.) For some years past, MAC's planned wartime rates have been ten hours on initial surge (for up to 45 days) and eight hours for sustained operations thereafter. It was proposed to increase these rates to twelve and one-half and ten hours respectively, thus providing—at least in theory—a 25 per cent increase in airlift capability. The estimated price of the additional personnel and supplies, while not cheap, was obviously less than that of additional transports. But how far can we push such a concept? In a hostile environment, when planes are being shot down, extra planes might be a lot handier than extra surge.

The second proposal was to lengthen the C-141 fuselage by some 23 feet in order to provide 30 per cent more cabin space. This would allow more efficient use of the airplane which is, as previously noted, space-limited on army deployment missions. The remedy involves major surgery—i.e., cutting the fuselage fore and aft of the wing and grafting in two new tubular sections. Pilots may cringe at the thought, but other aircraft have survived like operations and been the better for it.

The third proposal was aimed at building up the CRAF cargo capability. About 116 wide-bodied commercial aircraft (Boeing 747s or the somewhat smaller McDonnell-Douglas DC-10 and Lockheed 1011s) would be transformed at government expense from passenger to convertible types. The changes would include strengthening the floor of the passenger compartment, installing a nose door or a large side door aft of the wing, and providing cargo-handling kits. Thus modified, the planes could be shifted quickly from passenger to cargo service and, on army deployment missions, they could accommodate about a third of the outsize equipment which now will fit only in the C-5A.

It remains to be seen whether all or any of these actions will be taken to provide more airlift. But even with the existing capability, which is substantial, the question arises of what to do with it while it is not engaged in deploying ground units. Of course airlift can be used in the logistic support of U.S. forces overseas—perhaps even on the seas if some means of delivery is devised. But to view air logistics in the proper context, one must first recognize the essential role of sealift in deploying as well as in supporting military power.

Historically, the great bulk of military tonnages have gone overseas in ships—an estimated 98 per cent in World War II and, despite the intervening growth of airlift, about 95 per cent in the Vietnam War. And in future wars there seems little reason to expect any major change in these percentages. Cargo airlift may continue to grow, but surface shipping itself is on the increase with the recent development of fast containerships and intermodal transport systems.

Many people continue to look upon air and sealift as competitive and to extol the advantages of one over the other. However both are needed and they are so markedly different in the services they provide that most of the usual comparisons seem irrelevant. Like cost, for example. The question is not whether air transport costs more (which generally it does, though not always), but whether it is worth its cost. The answer will depend on matters such as the sort of items being shipped, where they are going, and how soon they must get there.

A transport plane has two unique characteristics. One is speed. The other, an ability to pass unhindered over surface obstacles. Hence airlift is used when it is important to save time or, regardless of time, when no other means of transport is feasible. People fly to save time. So do orchids and electronic parts. On the other hand, in the Second World War, drums of fuel flew "over the hump" of the Himalayas into China simply because they had no other way to get there. And in 1948–49, sacks of coal flew into Berlin for the same reason.

Supplies in the military logistic system are normally airlifted to save time and, despite the higher cost for shipping by air, the saving of time can often result in the saving of money. There is the familiar case of the idle machine or weapon system awaiting a part from the factory. Less obvious is the opportunity to eliminate thousands of items for which there is infrequent demand from the shelves of military warehouses and storerooms around the world. If the air transportation service is fast, frequent, and reliable, these local stocks—sometimes entire depots—can be dispensed with. Items can be ordered only when they are needed, for they will arrive within a few days from a central source in the United States. And longer range aircraft flying polar routes now make it possible for any U.S. aerial port to serve any overseas destination without the necessity of transshipment.

Another aspect of air logistics is the "backhaul"—which is to say, the return trip to the United States. In wartime, the sick and wounded routinely are evacuated, and so are prisoners of war. Captured enemy equipment may be rushed back for study and analysis by technical experts. And in peace and war, the return of reparables offers potential savings not yet fully realized. Some years ago a joint logistics task group estimated that repair, as a source of resupply for reparable items, would produce from 30 to 75 per cent of all resupply requirements, depending on the particular commodity. Aerial evacuation of reparables permits a reduction of maintenance facilities in forward areas with resultant savings in skilled technicians, precision machinery, and stocks of spare parts—all usually in short supply, especially in wartime.

The MAC fleet, geared for the massive lift requirements of the rapid deployment mission, probably could satisfy the needs of all the Services for peacetime logistic support. Why not use this fleet then to the fullest extent—which is to say, at or near the wartime utilization rate? The Defense Department could thus capitalize on its investment in aircraft and perhaps achieve even further economies by using any excess lift capacity to bring still more items into the air logistic system. This beguiling thought raises two interrelated questions.

First, what would happen to air logistic support when military transports are pulled off to carry out an emergency deployment? Should it slacken or stop, organizations might find their flow of supplies disrupted at the very moment of greatest need, assuming they too had to increase readiness in the emergency. Moreover, the problem would be especially acute for those organizations that had reduced their inventories, and closed their maintenance facilities in order to derive maximum benefit from the air resupply system. The planned course of action, and the one taken with apparent success when MAC planes have previously been diverted from channel traffic to other purposes, is to call on CRAF to take up the slack.

This leads to the second question. Will CRAF always respond to the call? Participating airlines will doubtless honor their contractual obligations. But until CRAF is "activated" by an official declaration of emergency, member contributions are voluntary. There never has been any such activation so far, despite several crises including a major war, so there may be none in future crises. Naturally the airlines will volunteer equipment when they have idle capacity as they did, for example, at the time of the airlift to Israel in the fall of 1973. But what of a crisis that comes inconsiderately when tank farms are bulging with jet fuel at reduced prices, tourist travel is at a peak, and the long-heralded boom in air freight is finally upon us? Would, indeed, should, CRAF members switch their patrons to nonparticipating airlines, including foreign carriers, and thereby lose a competitive advantage?

The problem resembles that faced by the Military Sealift Command (MSC) when there is insufficient idle shipping to meet the requirements of some lesser emergency. But MSC, having few ships of its own, must contract for most peacetime sealift requirements. The Military Airlift Command, on the other hand, with its large air transport fleet, faces a serious conflict of interest in deciding how much Defense airlift business to give the civil airlines and how much to keep for itself.

As we have seen, the commercial operators in the CRAF program have substantial capacity not only to carry passengers but also containerized and palletized cargo. Such cargo, according to industry spokesmen, represents about 90 per cent of the military logistic support requirement.[3] Since the civil airlines constitute a valuable wartime asset, it is in the interest of the Defense Department to foster their growth and development by giving them as much business as possible. Moreover, the prospect of receiving such business is one of the main inducements for airlines to participate in the CRAF program. Yet the practical effect of awarding contracts to the airlines is to idle the MAC fleet which must itself be exercised to stay in readiness for emergencies. Therein lies the dilemma.

The course now taken is to operate the C-5As and C-141s at a low utilization rate (rather than park them as some airline spokesmen have urged) and contract for some 90 per cent of passenger lift but use military transports for most air cargo traffic. If neither party is happy with the arrangement, perhaps that is how it should be.

Actually the airlines are helped indirectly in other ways. U.S. world leadership in commercial aircraft production is due in no small measure to Defense support of the airplane manufacturing industry. The new family of wide-bodied jets--Boeing's 747, McDonnell-Douglas's DC-10, and Lockheed's L-1011—could not have come along when they did without the mass of design data these companies developed largely at Defense Department expense during competition for the C-5 contract. True, the surge of passenger traffic, which made them so attractive in the mid-1960s, has since abated, leaving some airlines with excess capacity and dampened enthusiasm for the wide-bodies. Nevertheless these aircraft, along with the C-5A, represent a major advance in aviation technology that will inevitably pay off in one way or another.

During the procurement of the C-5A some of its critics charged that the 747 was cheaper, faster and could carry a heavier payload. Why, they asked, wasn't it being bought instead? For one thing, the cargo versions then offered could accommodate only 34 percent of the equipment (by weight) of an armored division. But, in a broader sense, the two aircraft simply illustrate the differing needs of military and commercial interests.

To the airline industry, whose air cargo business is so much smaller than its passenger business, the simplest and cheapest approach is to adapt the same basic airplane to both purposes. Thus all commercial long-range jet cargo planes now in use are modifications of aircraft originally designed for passenger service. Such planes, if not ideal, are at least acceptable for transporting the pallets and containers that make up most of the air cargo business.

On the other hand, for deploying a military unit with its large number of heavy, bulky vehicles, the converted passenger plane has two conspicuously bad features. One is the side door entry which means that everything has to turn a corner on its way in and out. The other is the location of the cabin on top of the wing which puts the main cargo deck high above the ground—about 16 feet in the case of the 747, DC-10, and L-1011. For scheduled air cargo service, special high-lift ground handling equipment can be stationed at regular stops to load and unload pallets and containers. However for an emergency force deployment such equipment might have to be brought in before the airlift could start. And, in any event, to muscle a 50-ton M-60 tank out through a side hatch and lower it some 16 feet to the ground would be a challenge with even the best of equipment.

To obviate such problems, military planners wanted the main cargo deck close to the ground—at truck-bed height—and the access door at the end of the compartment instead of at the side. Cargo could then be unloaded directly onto ordinary commercial trucks, and vehicles could be driven straight out down the airplane's own built-in ramps. This is the configuration of current military transports. The C-141 has rear access doors and the C-5 has front access as well to permit loading and unloading at both ends.

In airplane design, almost every advantage has a corresponding disadvantage. The convenience of rear access carried the penalty of a steeply swept-up tail with a less efficient aerodynamic shape that increased drag and reduced speed. The truck-bed-height floor required a high-wing design that added structural weight and decreased payload. (The extra weight comes largely from having to beef up the fuselage which carries the landing gear and must therefore support the weight of the plane. On the usual low-wing passenger plane, the landing gear is secured directly to the massive wing structure and the fuselage, resting on top of the wing, needs only to support its own weight.)

The military transports found no buyers among the airlines who felt the added convenience in cargo handling was not worth the sacrifice in speed and payload. Moreover the planes had other features that added much to their cost and little to their commercial utility. The average airline operator, for example, rarely has occasion to refuel planes in the air, deliver passengers and freight by parachute, or go into short rough fields that lack navigation and landing aids. So the search continues for a large-capacity "uncompromised" cargo plane that can serve military purposes, yet be profitable in commercial use. With fleets of such aircraft, the air carriers might some day take over most of the present peacetime airlift functions of MAC. But the comparatively slow growth of the air cargo industry and the unknown implications of the energy crisis make the outlook uncertain.

We have discussed the size and general nature of airlift systems and of the ground forces they must deploy. Beyond these known factors in the equation are various unknowns—questions that can have no answers until a real-life crisis supplies them. For example, will friendly nations permit our aircraft to overfly their territories and perhaps use their bases for enroute stops? Will overseas fuel supplies be adequate for sustained operations? And will hostile nations try to stop the airlift by the use of force?

A denial of overflight privileges might necessitate wide detours, as in the 1958 Lebanon crisis when troops dispatched to that country from West Germany had to be flown around west of the Alps instead of directly over them. Without overflight rights, no aid could be flown to a landlocked state like Laos unless perhaps, in a very grave situation, the government should consider it necessary to send the transports in anyway. However, states that border on the sea, as most do, could receive aid from planes approaching over international waters.

A shortage of enroute bases might require long nonstop flights with resultant payload reductions, as in the 1973 airlift to Israel. Aerial refueling now offers a promising means not only of extending range but also of increasing payload, since a plane can carry more weight in level flight than it can lift off the ground on takeoff. The C-5 can be refueled in flight and, at present writing, its flight crews are being qualified in this technique.

At the outset of a crisis there might be no fuel at the destination. Or the threat of enemy action might require a quick turnaround without servicing, as at forward airfields in South Vietnam in the spring of 1972. In such cases the planes would have to land with enough fuel to return to the nearest recovery base in the area. Here, too, the problem is largely a matter of extending range.

But what would happen, one must ask, if all overflight was denied, no enroute or recovery bases were available, every destination airfield was knocked out by enemy bombers, and none of our resupply tankers could run the submarine gauntlet?

Even in these dire circumstances, troops and supplies might still be delivered overseas by air though, of course, on a greatly reduced scale. However, not everything will go against us. Experience tells us to expect a mixed bag. Some friends will cooperate. Others won't. Some enemy attacks, if they come at all, will succeed, while others will fail. A strategic airlift is the same in this respect as any other military venture, on land, or sea, or in the air. Historically, airlift, aided by all the services, has managed to solve its own peculiar problems and deliver its cargoes. On this basis, we have reason to believe, paraphrasing a remark by Stanley Baldwin, a British prime minister of the 1930s, that, "the transport plane (like the bomber) will always get through."[4]

Strategic airlift has another application closely related to the rapid deployment of combat forces and possibly rivaling it in importance. This is what might be called logistic quick reaction—the ability, as the phrase suggests, to rush military supplies and equipment to any part of the world in support of U.S. interests. It offers new opportunities to mitigate the consequences of tactical defeats, to retrieve some of the blunders and oversights that inevitably occur in any military operation, and to adjust to technological surprises such as the enemy's introduction of a lethal new weapon. On the other side of the coin, the opportunity to exploit unexpected success should not be lost while awaiting supplies. Logistic quick reaction can help friends and allies as well as our own forces. The Middle East crisis in the fall of 1973 provides a recent illustration of how a sudden emergency may arise and what can be done in response to it.

In this instance the United States was seeking to preserve an approximate military balance between Israel and the Arab states while endeavoring, on the diplomatic front, to find some basis for a peaceful settlement of this bitter and long-standing conflict. Early in the afternoon of 6 October, Israel was attacked on two fronts—by Syria in the Golan Heights area, and by Egypt across the Suez Canal. The attackers, using new Soviet antiaircraft and anti-tank weapons with deadly effect, took Israel by surprise. Her armed forces fell back initially with heavy casualties and much loss of equipment. However, they rallied and succeeded in stopping the Arab advance. Then, on 10 October, they counter-attacked. Still the military balance seemed tipped against Israel, the more so as the USSR that day began a massive air and sealift operation to resupply the Syrian and Egyptian forces.

Also on the 10th, as a precautionary measure, the U. S. Joint Chiefs of Staff directed the Military Traffic Management and Terminal Service (MTMTS)—later redesignated the Military Traffic Management Command (MTMC)—to begin moving items quickly to airfields and ocean terminals in the United States. As a result, when the President authorized an emergency U. S. air and sealift three days later, on the 13th, operations could begin at once. Within nine hours, the first MAC plane, a C-5 loaded with 96.5 tons of cargo, was airborne and headed east toward Tel Aviv.

C-141s and C-5s followed at regular intervals and, within the first three days, the airlift built up to almost 1,000 tons a day. Because of political sensitivities over the Arab oil embargo, the only available refueling stop was in the Azores. Lajes Field, a key air base used by American forces since World War II, had been bypassed in recent years by most of the longer range jets. Now came a sudden surge in air traffic—not only a procession of big transports but also of F-4 fighters and A-4 attack planes being ferried to Israel. The smaller aircraft either landed for service or were refueled in flight by KC-135 tankers based on the field.

All the unaccustomed activity at Lajes began to draw down its fuel reserves which brought a hurry-up call to CINCLANT for replenishment. In due course a tanker arrived and operations continued without interruption. The Commander Sixth Fleet also assisted the air movement by stationing two carriers along the flight path of the planes as they threaded their way the length of the Mediterranean, remaining at all times well offshore from the countries bordering it. The carriers could have provided search and rescue service, aids to navigation and communication, and—more importantly—fighter escort had such been necessary.

On November 2nd, about a week after the cease-fire, a truce was agreed upon. Also, on that date, the first ship arrived with military supplies from the United States. The airlift continued for a few days more at a reduced rate. Then, on the 14th, a C-5 discharged the last plane load at Lod Airport, near Tel Aviv, and the airlift was over. Meanwhile, sealift was beginning to bring in its massive cargoes which ultimately exceeded airlift tonnages by more than three to one.

Yet airlift had been first, if not with the most, with what was urgently needed during the battle—items ranging from 50-ton M-60 tanks and CH-53 "Super Jolly Green Giant" helicopters to tents, blankets, and helmets. And beyond any material aid, the airlift and follow-on sealift had important psychological effects, lifting the spirits of the hard-pressed Israelis and giving Arab leaders, perhaps, some sober second thoughts after their initial successes. Thus, by taking this means to correct an apparent imbalance, the United States may have helped both sides toward a clearer recognition of the futility of their long-continued struggle.

The flight paths of the U. S. and USSR airlifts crossed in the eastern Mediterranean and some MAC crews occasionally heard radio transmissions by their Soviet counterparts. However there was no reported interference by either side with the operations of the other. The Soviets flew into Damascus and Cairo from bases averaging about 1,700 miles away. Their planes were of two types: the An-12, a four-engine turboprop roughly comparable to the C-130 tactical air transport; and the An-22, also a turboprop, at one time the world's largest plane, but somewhat smaller than the C-5A. The An-22 is capable of hauling outsize military cargo. In comparing the two airlifts, the Secretary of the Air Force said, with obvious satisfaction: "The C-141s and C-5s moved half-again as much cargo, over three and one-half times the distance, on little more than half the missions, in a week's less time."

Even so the Soviet airlift, and accompanying sealift, represented a substantial effort. Why was the task undertaken? Because of a perceived opportunity, perhaps, to exploit an unexpected success, a breakthrough. Knowing the United States could ultimately "outlogistic" them, they tried for the quick grab, the fait accompli, before superior American resources could be brought to bear. If this was the objective, their failure to attain it must be attributed primarily to Israel's ability to recover from an initial setback. But undoubtedly the speed and weight of the U. S. response was also a factor. In any event, whatever the real or assumed shortcomings of the Soviet air and sealift operation, it is not to be dismissed lightly. As the first major projection of military power beyond their contiguous land borders, one must ask what it portends for the future.

Drew Middleton, New York Times military correspondent, writing on "The Next War" in the November 1973 Atlantic, said: "Containment is dead. The expansion of the Soviet fleet and, equally important, of Soviet air transport has relegated it to the history books."

But does he not overstate the case? While an expanded Soviet fleet has indeed ventured far afield, it has done so unopposed. What it might do against the active opposition of U. S. and allied naval forces is another matter. And air transport is not, of itself, military power. If it was, Liberia with its large registry of merchant vessels would, by the same reasoning, be the world's foremost naval power. Transport planes are helpless if attacked. They can operate only by sufferance or behind the protective shield of superior air and naval power. Therefore, in war the USSR cannot use transport aircraft, or cargo ships, to project power overseas unless it has the means to protect them.

All this sounds fine, at least in terms of traditional strategy. But now, being 30 years into the nuclear age, we are not so sure.

Many things have changed since 1945. True, we have continued to have wars—a good many in fact. But they have been peculiar wars. Hostilities have begun without declarations of war and ended without peace treaties. Cease-fires have brought continued firing. Uneasy truces have satisfied no one. American warplanes have flown thousands of bombing sorties from land bases and carriers that rarely, if ever, have been bombed themselves. Nor have cargo ships and transport planes been attacked as they brought in equipment and supplies to help sustain the war effort on both sides. Though possessed of overwhelming air and naval superiority throughout most of the period, the United States has seldom used it in any decisive way. Lucrative targets have been avoided, opposing forces granted sanctuaries, and war goods allowed into enemy ports. Will wars ever again be fought in the classic style?

Vice-Admiral Sir Peter Gretton, in his book, Maritime Strategy, lists as one of six wartime principles "The need to strike at enemy sea communications in order both to damage his economy and to prevent him using the sea for military purposes." The principle seems eminently sound and surely most naval strategists would agree with it. And yet, in light of recent events, we must ask ourselves. Who will fire the first shot?

When and under what circumstances will Washington order the first Soviet cargo ship sunk or air transport shot down in international waters; and when will Moscow order our ships and planes attacked?

Upon the outbreak of general nuclear war?—Undoubtedly.

Following a large-scale conventional attack on NATO?—Very probably.

In other contingencies?—As one goes down the scale, a wait-and-see attitude becomes increasingly likely.

This is not meant to suggest that we can reduce the readiness of our naval forces. Their readiness may well be the reason we have had no major fleet engagements in the nuclear age. What it does suggest, though, is that limited war planners should make a clear distinction between two very different types of war: (1) one in which the use of the high seas is contested, and (2) one in which it is not.

In the first type of war, the USSR would have little ability to project military power overseas without first establishing naval supremacy, however in the second type, which now seems more probable, she could use her substantial air and sealift forces to cause all sorts of trouble in the most distant quarters of the globe. Imagine the already familiar scenario, for example, in which hostilities are confined to the land, territorial waters, and superadjacent airspace of the opposing states. Each adversary is sustained by a flow of supplies across the seas. The war becomes something of a contest in logistic prowess between the United States and the Soviet Union to see who can send in the most military assistance in the shortest time. The winner of that contest may decide the issue. Or perhaps war may be averted altogether if one side's arsenal grows conspicuously bigger than the other's before the shooting begins.

In view of the constraints imposed on warfare by the world's nuclear stockpiles, British military historian Michael Howard suggests the possibility that land warfare between the nuclear powers may become more a matter of posturing and maneuvering than of actual fighting, as in the days of pre-Napoleonic strategy. Napoleon's 18th century predecessors were, as Professor Howard describes them, "men who had much to lose and little to gain from war, who fearfully committed their forces to battle and maneuvered them cautiously; men with limited resources and often a divided public opinion within their domains."[5] Their similarities to leaders in the nuclear age, if not exact, are close—though for entirely different reasons.

Should posturing become a substitute for fighting, so much the better. The U.S. Marines are masters of both. Their fighting prowess has been amply demonstrated in every war the country has engaged in. Their deterrent effect on the wars that might have been is less easily proven. But in Lebanon in 1958, the Cuban missile crisis of 1962, the recurrent eruptions in the eastern Mediterranean, the continuing strife in Southeast Asia—embarked in amphibious ships and keeping close to the scene of action—they have provided an effective military presence that could not be ignored. Now garrison troops at Fort Campbell, Kentucky, though thousands of miles away, can also become a stabilizing influence in situations like these. So too, in its way, can a line of parked M-48 tanks at a depot in Anniston, Alabama, for airlift has changed the accustomed relationship between distance and time.

Going from 20 knots to 400 is no mere "advance" in mobility but a telescoping of time, a discontinuity with the past that offers commanders much wider flexibility in making decisions and seems to cry out for new approaches to military planning. While jet transports are fast, they do not, in themselves, assure that a movement by air will be either rapid or productive. If troops or equipment fail to load and unload quickly, they might as well go by ship. The longer they take, at any rate, the less their advantage in going by air. To capitalize fully on an air transport fleet, a suitable military stance is required. Designated troops on alert, of course, and supplies packed for shipment—but a great deal more, besides, for wars rarely go according to plan and the unexpected emergency does not announce its specific needs in advance.

The administrative and logistic machinery of the Department of Defense, including all the Services, should be geared to the speed of jets in identifying the people and things actually required, locating them, and moving them to aerial and water ports of embarkation; meanwhile marshaling the air transports and arranging secure flight paths to the point of delivery; and, with no less urgency, assembling the follow-on sealift and making plans to expedite and protect its passage.

Such a stance is difficult to assume and costly to maintain. But if we do adopt it, our strategists and tacticians, and those of our adversaries as well, will have a new range of possibilities to ponder over.

SUMMARY OF NETWORK NEWS IN THIS ISSUE

John CHANCELLOR and Tom BROKAW, NBC News, report on Mayaguez news. BROKAW reports that President FORD was in North Carolina for a bicentennial celebration and the role of the Mayaguez incident in his reception there. CHANCELLOR reports on the final casualty count of the Mayaguez operation; 15 dead, 50 wounded and three missing-in-action.

CHANCELLOR and Richard VALERIANI, NBC News, report on the Vienna talks. VALERIANI reports that KISSINGER and GROMYKO agreed to cooperate in some way on the Mid-East peace problem and that KISSINGER believes a new SALT agreement will be ready by this fall's summit.

CHANCELLOR and Kenley JONES, NBC, report on refugee news. JONES reports that the President's advisery committee went to Fort Chaffee, Arkansas to view first hand the situation of the refugees and on delays in resettling the refugees.

CHANCELLOR and Erik ERICKSON, NBC News, report on Indochina news. CHANCELLOR reports that the Pathet Lao took control of Savannakhet where 12 Americans are under house arrest. He also reports that South Korea is organizing high school and college students into defense corps. ERICKSON has a report on a celebration in Saigon and on the situation there.

Roger MUDD and Ike PAPPAS, CBS News, report on Mayaguez news. PAPPAS reports on the final Pentagon casualty list and gives the breakdown by service. He reports that the Pentagon is stopping the search for men lost at sea.

MUDD, CBS, reports that a Senate committee will investigate CIA activities in Vietnam, including the Phoenix Pacification Program.

MUDD and Marvin KALB, CBS, report on the Vienna talks. KALB reports on efforts to cooperate on the Middle East situation by the two powers; that the major issue of verification remains to be solved in the SALT talks and that the U.S. still refuses to deal with the PLO.

MUDD reports that a Titan rocket went out of control in space and is lost.

Howard K. SMITH and Frank TOMLINSON, ABC, report on Mayaguez news. TOMLINSON reports on the Pentagon's final casualty list. Harry REASONER reports on the arrival in Thailand of a Cambodian boat which claims to have seized the Mayaguez. Ed LESLEY reports on the arrival of several crew members of the Mayaguez in San Francisco.

Ted KOPPEL, ABC, reports on the Vienna talks and on SALT negotiations and the Middle East.

Bruce MORTON, CBS Morning News, reports on the action of the Armed Services Committee (House) on the Defense Appropriation Bill in which $1.4 billion has already been cut. MORTON also reports that Mr. FORD went to see a movie about Theodore ROOSEVELT sending U.S. forces to rescue American citizens in Morocco.

Ford and Pentagon On Mayaguez

JOHN CHANCELLOR: President FORD was out pressing the flesh today in North Carolina, riding the crest of a new wave of popularity based on the rescue of the ship Mayaguez and its crew. After he returned to Washington the Defense Department put out new figures on the cost of that rescue, 15 killed in action, 50 wounded. But in Charlotte, N.C., the crowds that turned out for Mr. FORD were big and enthusiastic. Tom Brokaw reports.

BROKAW: Officially President FORD was in Charlotte for a bicentennial observation, but his advisers have polls which show this is Ronald REAGAN and George WALLACE country. So Mr. FORD came here in an effort to improve his political standing before next year's presidential primary in North Carolina. And last week's Mayaguez rescue apparently helped. It inspired a long standing ovation and praise from the state's two Senators, including conservative Jesse HELMS who has been critical of some of Mr. FORD's decisions. For his part the PResident didn't mention the Mayaguez, following White House strategy not to overplay it. He stressed national unity and the part that the South can play in achieving that goal.

PRESIDENT FORD: We must once again become one people, strong and unified in our national purpose. The new strength, new dynamism of the South coupled with the cherished traditions can help America achieve this essential unity.

CHANCELLOR: The casualty figures put out by the Pentagon today on the Mayaguez operation were described by the Defense Department spokesmen as as close to final as possible, 15 killed, 50 wounded and three missing-in-action. Of the three missing men all the eyewitness reports so far indicate that no Americans were left alive on the beach. And the Pentagon spokesman, Joseph LAITIN, said there are no facts at present to support the story of a Cambodian navy boat which surrendered itself in Thailand as its crew claimed that they had been involved in the seizure of the Mayaguez.

Kissinger-Gromyko Talks

CHANCELLOR: Secretary of State KISSINGER and Soviet Foreign Minister GROMYKO ended two days of talks today in Vienna. A senior official aboard KISSINGER's plane said later that the two men agreed to try to work together on reconvening the Middle East peace conference in Geneva. Richard Valeriani is travelling with KISSINGER and here is his report.

RICHARD VALERIANI: Today was GROMYKO's turn to be the host so KISSINGER went to the Soviet Embassy for another meeting and a working lunch. During their six hours of talks KISSINGER reportedly found the Russians willing to be more cooperative on the Middle East if the Geneva Peace Conference is reconvened. But it was not clear how they would cooperate. The two men also discussed strategic arms and KISSINGER came away more confident than before that an agreement on limiting offensive nuclear weapons will be ready in time for a Washington summit meeting this fall. Afterwards both men were upbeat and GROMYKO even made light of one of the major sticking points in the arms talks, how to count missiles with more than one warhead once they're deployed. As he was leaving Vienna KISSINGER summed up his meeting with GROMYKO this way:

SECRETARY OF STATE KISSINGER: On the whole I'm satisfied with the visit here and I leave with the conviction that relations between the United States and the Soviet Union are essential for the preservation of peace and for the progress of mankind and that we will do our utmost to keep them on course.

VALERIANI: KISSINGER then came to Germany to fulfill a promise to visit West Berlin. He'll also brief German officials on his meetings with GROMYKO which turned out to be essentially a holding action. No decisions are possible on the arms talks until after each government reviews the latest ideas of the other. And the United States wanted to put off a decision on the Middle East until after President FORD has met with Egyptian and Israeli leaders next month. So KISSINGER and GROMYKO will get together again in early July to try to make some measurable progress on these issues. Richard Valeriani, NBC News, in Bonn.

Refugee News

CHANCELLOR: Members of President FORD's advisory committee on Indochinese refugees, which was established yesterday, visited a refugee camp today. Kenley Jones reports from Fort Chaffee, Arkansas.

KENLEY JONES: There are 23,000 refugees at Fort Chaffee, more than twice the number at the California and Florida camps combined. That's one reason members of the President's Advisory Committee on Refugees came here there first day on the job. They came to get a first-hand look at the refugees and the facilities being used to care for them. But mostly they came to start getting acquainted with the problems of resettling the refugees. The committee's job is to advise federal agencies how to make resettlement go smoothly for both the refugees and Americans in communities where the refugees finally settle down. The committee chairman is John EISENHOWER, the son of the late President Dwight EISENHOWER.

JOHN EISENHOWER: We hope to get -- as soon as humanly possible -- to get all of the refugees distributed around the country, not concentrated in any one area, in acceptable places for them so they can begin a new life.

JONES: One of the bottlenecks in moving refugees out of the camps has been the delay in getting them security clearances from Washington. EISENHOWER says he does not expect his committee can speed up that process. He said it will take longer to get some refugees sponsors than it will take to get them security clearances. Kenley JONES, NBC News, Fort Chaffee, Arkansas.

Indochina News

CHANCELLOR: In Laos today soldiers of the Communist Pathet Lao took over the city of Savannakhet where 12 Americans are under house arrest. The Americans say they're in good shape and have not been threatened. The takeover of Savannakhet was peaceful, thousands of students and right wing troops cheered the Pathet Lao.

NBC News still has a correspondent in Saigon and from time to time he gets word out by telex. The latest word we have from Jim Lorry, our man in the South Vietnamese capital, is that while the city appears normal the new military government there is having some organizational difficulties. Lorry says military police are patrolling the streets, that a lack of paychecks has forced some Saigonese to sell personal belongings on street corners, and that some opium sellers and thieves have been executed after guilty verdicts from courts held in the streets.

And we have some film to show you this evening of the big victory celebration the North Vietnamese and the Vietcong held recently in Saigon. Our reporter is Erik Erickson of Swedish television.

ERIK ERICKSON: Thousands of soldiers participated, many from the North and some from the South, guerrillas fighters who had been preparing the military takeover in Saigon for a long time. On the reviewing stand were some leaders from Hanoi. The old North Vietnamese president Tanh Duc THANH (?) was there, the Politburo member Le Duc THO. The PRG Prime Minister Nien Ho THO (?) was there too and the PRG President Tanh PATZ (?). Madame Nguyen Ti BINH the PRG foreign minister was also there. This military show might give some impression of the situation in Saigon today. In other cities like Da Nang controlled by the new administration there are very few soldiers, in Saigon there are soldiers everywhere and the military rule might be kept for another four or five months. Many people told that they were afraid when the troops came, they had been told that the Communists were going to kill everybody and destroy the city. This didn't happen, instead the new soldiers appeared to be rather shy young boys who even paid the prices they were asked to pay which never happened in Saigon before. But life in Saigon is rather normal today, the soldiers are not the same as before and the flags sold in the streets are new flags. But shops and markets are open as before and the atmosphere is relaxed. This is Erik Erickson, Swedish television, reporting for NBC News.

CHANCELLOR: South Korea announced today that all high school and college students will be organized into a defense corp and will have to take four hours of military training each week. There hasn't been a student defense corp in South Korea since the Korean War in the 1950's.

ROGER MUDD: The Pentagon today issued its fifth set of figures on American casualties from last Wednesday's invasion of Tang island. A spokesman said these figures are as close to final as possible except perhaps for some minor adjustments. Ike Pappas has the story in Washington.

IKE PAPPAS: Fifteen Americans have been confirmed killed-in-action, another 50 wounded -- two of them seriously -- and three are still officially listed as missing. Of the dead 11 were Marines, two were Navy men and two Air Force. The bulk of the deaths came when a helicopter carrying 26 men, most of them Marines, attempted to land on Tang island and was shot down 100 feet offshore. Thirteen of those aboard were rescued the other 13 died. The Pentagon holds out little hope for those still listed as missing.

PENTAGON SPOKESMAN: The three Marines who are still counted as missing-in-action were among the Marines fighting on the island and were not accounted for when the muster in various places was completed. But all the eyewitness reports so far indicate that no American fighting men were left alive on the beach.

PAPPAS: None of the bodies of the dead Americans was brought home. Diplomatic efforts are continuing to recover the bodies of those who may have been killed on Tang island, the Pentagon has no plans to resume the search effort for those lost at sea. Ike Pappas, CBS News, the Pentagon.

CIA Activities in Vietnam

MUDD: The Senate committee investigating the CIA plans to look into CIA activities in Vietnam. Daniel Schorr reports this includes the so-called Phoenix Pacification Program which allegedly involved killing Vietcong leaders. SCHORR says that Vietnamese refugees in the U.S. will be checked to see if they worked with the CIA and if so some are expected to be called as witnesses.

Kissinger-Gromyko Meeting

MUDD: Secretary of State KISSINGER took his diplomatic entourage to Bonn today after two days of talks in Vienna with Soviet Foreign Minister GROMYKO. Marvin Kalb reports.

MARVIN KALB: GROMYKO hosted this concluding session devoted, among other things, to the explosive issue of the Middle East. KISSINGER gave the impression that GROMYKO wanted to cooperate on arranging the conditions for a Geneva Conference. Not many substantive details were discussed, mostly procedural; but KISSINGER stressed that the U.S. would not deal with the PLO until it recognized Israel's existence. The other major topic was the strategic arms negotiations. There were about a half dozen unresolved issues including verification, meaning a way of checking on how many missiles each side claims to have. Three minor issues were resolved, but not verification. By the time they emerged more than six hours later KISSINGER was ready to announce that they would meet again, he and GROMYKO, probably in July.

REPORTER: Has any compromise been reached, sir, on the issue of verification, can you tell us?

FOREIGN MINISTER GROMYKO: It is detail, a small detail.

REPORTER: Verification is a small detail, it's been taken care of?

SECRETARY KISSINGER: We can't go into the details of the various issues that were discussed, but as I said the talks were useful and constructive.

KALB: His stop here tonight in Bonn for talks with West German leaders is really a way station on the road to West Berlin which KISSINGER will visit tomorrow, much to GROMYKO's unhappiness. On the Middle East the following has been learned. First, that the Geneva Conference has been delayed until late August, perhaps early September. And second, when it begins the PLO will probably not be present. We're told that GROMYKO eased up considerably on his earlier insistence on PLO representation, thus giving KISSINGER a chance for another Israeli-Egyptian accomodation before that conference. What is not known at this point is what price the U.S. paid to win this degree of Soviet cooperation. Marvin Kalb, CBS News, Bonn.

HOWARD K. SMITH: The U.S. Marines who took part in that operation to free the merchant ship Mayaguez arrived in Subic Bay in the Philippines today. Fifteen of them who were wounded received their Purple Heart decorations as their ship docked. Then here in Washington the Pentagon released its newest casualty lists for the operation. The cost, it is now clear beyond doubt, was very heavy. ABC Pentagon correspondent Frank Tomlinson reports.

FRANK TOMLINSON: It's been six days since the Pentagon announced the first casualty in the rescue of the Mayaguez. Since then the figures have bounced about considerably. Officials here say the fluctuations were due to the fact that Marines taken off Koh-Tang island were sent to several ships, some went back to Okinawa and the Philippines. Hopefully now the confusion has been cleared.

PENTAGON SPOKESMAN: The casualty figures that I am about to give you have now been substantiated by the three services as of this midafternoon today, and are considered accurate bar none. Killed-in-action 15. Missing-in-action three. Wounded-in-action 50.

TOMLINSON: The crewmen missing-in-action are all Marines who were fighting on Koh-Tang island, it is considered highly unlikely that any of the three are still alive. Frank Tomlinson, ABC News, the Pentagon.

HARRY REASONER: Pentagon spokesmen also say they do not have any facts on whether a Cambodian navy boat, which surrendered to Thai authorities, was involved in the seizure of the Mayaguez. The crew of the boat claim they seized the Mayaguez on their own, without government approval and they are now seeking asylum in Thailand. About half the crew members of the Mayaguez have accepted an offer from their company to come home early and some of them arrived today in San Francisco. Ed Lesley of station KGL TV reports.

ED LESLEY: After three days in the captivity of Cambodians, five days in the Philippines and 13 hours in the air, the first nine Mayaguez crewmen touched American asphalt exhausted but jubilant. That upraised hand means number one, a victory sign in the orient. And that's how these crewmen felt about being rescued by force by their government. Ship's cook, Bill BALLINGER, a Washington D.C. bachelor wanted the world to know how deeply he appreciated being rescued and he said his captors were more like pirates than soldiers.

COOK BILL BALLINGER: They shared their food with us. We were not mistreated in any way, nobody got roughed, nobody give us any hassle.

REPORTER: How about when you were in the boat and the American planes were overhead?

BALLINGER: Scared the hell out of us.

REPORTER: After capture were you ever worried that the Americans wouldn't come out to save you?

BALLINGER: I have a letter that I was writing to a friend and I made statements to that effect in that letter and I'm ashamed of them now.

REPORTER: How did you feel once the jets came in and started laying things down?

BALLINGER: Fine because I've been through close air-ground support before and I know those guys know what they're doing and it didn't threaten me.

LESLEY: BALLINGER left immediately for San Francisco and "the nearest bar." And that's exactly where fellow crewman Al MINICELLO went too.

SMITH: Opinion polls show that President FORD's handling of the Mayaguez incident has sharply increased his popularity rating. Today there was more direct evidence of that as the President went to Charlotte, N.C. for a bicentennial celebration. ABC White House correspondent Tom Jarriel reports.

Kissinger-Gromyko Meeting

SMITH: Secretary of State KISSINGER and Soviet Foreign Minister GROMYKO wound up their Vienna talks today and the first signs are the results were positive. Details from ABC diplomatic correspondent Ted Koppel.

TED KOPPEL: Soviet Foreign Minister GROMYKO rarely gives anything away in public, this morning he outdid himself. He was saved from giving anything more away by the arrival of Secretary KISSINGER. Some of the cordiality appears to have spilled over into the meeting itself. For five and a half hours the Soviet and American negotiating teams edged their way toward a new strategic arms agreement, the tentative target date now for completion is October. And equally important a decision to try and solve the Middle East problems through Soviet-American cooperation.

SECRETARY KISSINGER: I can say now that we agreed to meet again in the near future for a further detailed review of the SALT talks, the prospect of peace in the Middle East and other matters of mutual interest.

GROMYKO: I agree with the Secretary.

KOPPEL: For the past year and a half KISSINGER has tried to exclude the Soviets from the Middle East negotiations. He may not have totally given up yet on separate American peace initiatives, but the session in the near future with GROMYKO doesn't give KISSINGER much time for individual diplomacy. Senior American officials are still insisting that no final decisions on America's Middle East reassessment will be reached until after President FORD meets with Egyptian and Israeli leaders in the next few weeks. But these same officials indicate that a new spirit of Soviet-American cooperation is now shaping up on Geneva, even though they insist that compromise on the Palestinian issue will have to come from the Soviet side. Defense Authorization Bill

BRUCE MORTON: The House continues work on the Defense Authorization Bill today. The Armed Services Committee cut the President's request some, leaving out aid for South Vietnam, postponing some other spending and cutting $1.4 billion from other projects. So far the House has rejected all attempts to cut more than that. They'll be voting on other proposed cuts and on a proposal to admit women to the service academies today.

Movie Parallels Mayaguez

MORTON: Hughes, one of journalism's classic old cliches which you don't see very often anymore is the one involving the theater marquis. A child, you'll remember, watching her parents get run over by a bus outside the theater where "Orphans of the Storm" was playing, that sort of thing. In an effort not to let the traditions die entirely, we should report that President FORD went to the theater last night. The movie was "The Wind and the Lion" which is about how President Theodore ROOSEVELT sent the U.S. Marines into Morocco to rescue an American woman and her two children who had been kidnapped by a Berber chieftan. (Unintelligible)...it was a natural. The movie President says: The kidnapping is an insult to America. What I want is respect, the movie president says, I'm going to send the fleet. The movie secretary of state says: That's illegal. And the movie Theodore ROOSEVELT answers: Why spoil a thing of beauty with legality. The real President, the AP reports, got a big laugh out of that one. At another point someone says to the movie president: What he wants is something to hang his campaign on, something to arouse the public. The AP says the real President liked that part a lot too. Also the line in which the movie president said: The world will never love us, they may fear us, respect us but will never love us. The movie producer says the story is based on a true incident, but obviously of course it was shot months before anyone ever heard of a ship called Mayaguez. The President, the real president that is, smiled a lot during the movie. At the end a reporter asked if he liked it and the President didn't answer, he may have not heard the question. At any rate it seemed an appropriate movie for this time and place.

Hiring wrongs, coverup alleged

Washington (AP)—After finding numerous violations of federal personnel rules at six government agencies during 1973 and 1974, the Civil Service Commission kept its investigation reports secret from the public, according to Representative John E. Moss (D., Calif.).

Mr. Moss eventually obtained the critical documents and released them. He said: "The commission, which oversees the working lives of more than 2½ million federal workers who expend the entire federal budget, should be intensively probed to see whether or not it is safeguarding the public interests."

He questioned whether the commission is vigorously pursuing agency compliance with personnel rules.

The six agencies criticized by commission investigators were the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, Smithsonian Institution, National Science Foundation, Defense Mapping Agency, National Technical Information Service and the United States Merchant Marine Academy

At the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the commission found problems of equal employment opportunity for the agency's own staff.

"Internal equal employment opportunity program direction and leadership is virtually nonexistent We were disappointed to find that an agency whose mission is to eradicate discrimination has done so little to assure full equality of opportunity

U.S. AND U.N. SAID TO HINDER WOMEN

They Are Called Hypocrites by Members of Congress

WASHINGTON, May 14 (AP) —The United Nations, the United States Government, and Congress were called hypocritical today for espousing women's rights but not clearing blockages that present those rights from being enjoyed.

Senator Charles H. Percy, Republican of Illionis, and Representative Elizabeth Holtzman, Democrat of Brooklyn, among the prime sponsors of a Congressional symposium on International Women's Years, also said that the United Nations risked making a mockery of Women's Year by inadequate funding and by perpetuating lopsided male-female job ratios.

The United Nations allocated $258,000 for six I.W. Y. regional meetings and an international conference but $3.5-million for the World Population Conference the year before, Mr. Percy said.

Only 16 of the 138 United Nations member nations have contributed, he said, with only $1.2-million of the pledge of $1.35-million received.

In the United States, Mr. Percy said, only $100,000 was contributed to the fund for International Women's Year and only $350,000 is budgeted for the national commission to promote the year's observance here.

He noted that although one third of all Federal workers were women but only 4.5 per cent of the top level employees were women.

Job Favoritism Is Found In Study of U.S. Agencies

Rep. Moss Makes Public Data Kept Secret by Civil Service Unit

By ERNEST HOLSENDOLPH
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 6—Cronyism, political favoritism and other irregular practices are being used by a number of Federal agencies to fill their employment needs, according to reports by the United States Civil Service Commission.

The studies, which showed repeated violations of regulations in 1973 and 1974, were kept secret by the commission until seven of them were made public today by Representative John E. Moss, Democrat of California. Civil Commission officials declined to say how many reports had been prepared in all.

The agencies, including the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the National Science Foundation and the Smithsonian Institution, often hire and promote with little regard to Civil Service and Equal Employment rules that protect minorities and women, the reports said.

Other agencies covered by reports were the Small Business Administration, the Merchant Marine Academy, the Ford Chooses Former Athlete For EEOC Job

By Fred Barnes
Washington Star Staff Writer

President Ford today nominated ex-football player Lowell Perry to be chairman of the troubled Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Perry, once confirmed, will take over the EEOC seat that was vacated last month by John Powell, whose tenure as chairman was an exceptionally stormy one.

Powell, who became chairman in January 1974, often feuded with other members of the commission and was accused of acting in a high-handed manner. His resignation was demanded by the White House.

LIKE FORD, Perry was a football star at the University of Michigan, where he graduated in 1954. He also played professionally with the Pittsburgh Steelers of the National Football League.

Perry, 43, has been plant manager of the Eldon Avenue Axle branch of the Chrysler Corp. in Detroit since last year. He joined Chrysler in 1963.

At the EEOC, Perry, who is black and lives in Detroit, will be faced with several tough problems. For one thing, the commission has a backlog of 120,000 cases.

The EEOC also must decide whether there should be exceptions

Bell Found Lagging On Hiring

New York Times News Service

Most Bell System telephone companies have failed to comply fully with the agreement to end employment discrimination that they signed in 1973, according to government agencies monitoring the systems's hiring practices.

As a result, these companies and the parent American Telephone & Telegraph Company will be held to new and stricter hiring and promotion goals for women and minorities until they make up the deficiencies in their 1973 and 1974 performance.

The Bell System's hiring practices were being monitored to assure that it was taking so-called affirmative action, required by law, to create job opportunities for minorities.

Under an order filed in U.S. District Court in Philadelphia, AT&T and its offending operating companies also agreed to pay an estimated $2.5 million in compensation and penalties for their failure to comply with the 1973 agreement.

These payments will be made partly to those whom the companies have illegally failed to hire or promote during the last two years and partly to a fund that will be used to improve the company's ability to meet the nondiscrimination objectives.

The payments to be made to persons whom the companies illegally failed to hire or promote will range from $125 to $1,500, depending on the job involved and on the date of the discriminatory act.

While the companies and four different government agencies that have been monitoring their performance agreed to the new antidiscrimination standards and procedures, the actual court order putting them into effect has not been issued yet.

That is because the Communications Wlorkers of America has challenged the agreement as one that violates its contracts with the companies.

Other unions are expected to make similar challenges.

made for blacks and other minority workers from the rule that the employes last hired are the first to be laid off during periods of economic trouble.

ETHEL BENT WALSH, who succeeded Powell as chairman, is not expected to be renominated when her term expires next month.

Perry's term on the commission would expire July 1, 1978. He cannot be designated as EEOC chairman until after his confirmation by the Senate.

In another announcement today, the White House said that Paul MacAvoy, a professor at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology energy laboratory, will be nominated to the Council of Economic Advisers.

Meanwhile, the President has agreed to meet tomorrow with New York Gov. Hugh Carey and Mayor Abraham Beame of New York City. They are seeking $1.5 billion in special federal assistance for the city.

Treasury Secretary William Simon announced over the weekend that it would not be appropriate for the federal government to provide the money.

STUDY -- CONTINUED

National Technical Information Service and the Defense Mapping Agency.

The Civil Service Commission is responsible for the job rights of 2.7 million Federal employes. Mr. Moss said that the reluctance of the commission to publicize its findings raised questions about its commitment.

The reports, prepared by teams of investigators who visited various areas of the nation, made the following criticisms:

The Civil Service Commission found that most personnel management problems uncovered in a 1969 study still persisted in March, 1973.

"Internal Equal Employment Opportunity program direction and leadership is virtually nonexistent," the report said.

The report team found complaint files in "chaotic" condition, with "no one in the agency knowing precisely how many discrimination complaints were pending."

But a count by the investigators showed 63 open complaints, 36 of them more than 180 days old, in an agency that at that time had 2,000 employes.

"E.E.O.C.'s failure to process discrimination complaints of its own employes on a timely basis is unconscionable," the commission said.

NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION

The commission praised the foundation for good work, but added that most high positions in the agency were filled through "colleague referral," a technique that depends almost exclusively on personal contacts of program directors at universities and research centers.

"The recruitment base is quite narrow and competition very limited," the investigators wrote, pointing out that the system drew few minorities ro women into professional positions.

They found frustration among minority employes because of "the lack of opportunities for advancement and the insensitivity of many managers and supervisors."

SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION

The investigators found that "partisan political sponsorship, affiliation and clearance have been significant factors in appointments to a number of district director positions in the Small Business Administration," which is a violationof Civil Service rules.

In one case, the Civil Service Commission found that Norris Cotton, a former New Hampshire Senator and a Republican, caused a local director in Concord to be removed so the executive director of the State Republican party could take his place.

The investigators cited a letter dated Feb. 26, 1973, and signed by the Senator informing the S.B.A.'s regional administrator in Boston that "Bert Teague . . . is the person agreed upon by the two Congressmen from New Hampshire and myself . . . for the position as director forr the S.B.A. in Concord."

On March 12, 1973, Josaphat Benoit, S.B.A. director in Concord, received a letter from Senator Cotton, the commission said, in which he was told that the Senator and two Representatives had "recommended a Republican to fill your position." The Senator said that he assumed that he continued to have Mr. Benoit's persona friendship, but added, "Politics is politics."

Mr. Benoit was offered a job as a bank relations specialist, the report said, but he retired instead. On July 2, 1973, Mr. Teague, who previously was executive director of the New Hampshire State Republican party, was announced in a press release as the new S.B.A. director in Concord, at two pay grades higher than the grade of his predecessor.

MERCHANT MARINE ACADEMY

The Kings Point, L. I., institution was criticized for poor personnel records and failure to provide leadership in the Equal Employment Opportunity program. In 1970, the school had one black faculty member out of 81. A follow-up by the commission in 1973 found the black teacher gone, with no others hired.

THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION

Despite some steps by top management to establish an equal employment program, the Smithsonian was said not to hold managers and supervisors sufficiently accountable for following through.

HINDER -- CONTINUED

Representative Holtzman said that there were no women at all on the diplomatic staffs of 60 per cent of the permanent United Nations missions. There were 180 women to the General Assembly in 1973, compared with 2,369 men, she said.

Helvi Sipila, United Nations secretary general for International Women's Year, said that the United Nations could only urge and recommend action but that it was up to the member nations to carry out the recommendations.

She said that the international conference in Mexico City in June would be the best chance yet for women to push their governments to make changes that would improve the status of women.

for all of its own employees."

The investigators cited unconscionable delays in handling some employee complaints, which were unresolved more than six months after filing.

Problems in equal employment opportunity also were cited at the Smithsonian, Defense Mapping Agency and Merchant Marine Academy.

At the mapping agency, one report said, "there was a very prevalent attitude expressed that EEOC required only that an individual not actively discriminate against minorities and women."

Problems in following hiring or promotion rules were found at the National Science Foundation, National Technical Information Service and Merchant Marine Academy

At the technical service, for example, investigators reported that "staffing and merit promotion actions have been handled in such a way as to give almost all employees interviewed the impression that preselection has been involved in virtually every promotion made through ostensibly competitive procedures."

The reports did not mention former President Nixon's White House political referrals, a subject of recent controversy at other government agencies.

SecDef Sets Opportunity Study

WASHINGTON — Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger has launched an intensive review of procedures set up by the services to carry out the Equal Opportunity policies.

Acting on the Schlesinger instructions an interdepartmental study group has started meeting daily in the Pentagon to investigate the services' "full compliance with the letter and spirit of laws and regulations governing equal opportunity."

Both internal procedures and those that relate to doing business with contractors, other countries and private individuals are being examined, Defense spokesmen said.

Recent publicity about the banning of Jewish service members from assignments in Arab countries was reported to have spurred the Secretary's action.

The study group's report and recommendations are to be submitted to Assistant Defense Secretary William K. Brehm by May 15, officials reported.

Authorities explained that the study group is chartered to review applicable regulations, directives and actual practices in the EPO programs.

It will examine EO guidance procedures to see whether they are sufficient where they concern assignment of military and civilian personnel and the solicitation, award and administration of government contracts for foreign military assistance.

The group is chaired by William J. Perez, Defense's director of civilian equal opportunity.

An interim report and recommendations will be prepared before the final report in May, officials said.

ARMYWIDE REVIEW ARMY TIMES 23 APRIL 1975

Equal Opportunity Report on Way

By DON HIRST
Times Staff Writer

WASHINGTON — An intensive review of all Army equal opportunity policies ordered by Army Secretary Howard H. Callaway is moving forward at a gallop, officials say.

The comprehensive review involves an ad hoc steering committee of 21 general officers and equivalent grade civilians. A final report of their findings is to be presented to Army Chief of Staff Gen. Fred C. Weyand by April 18.

The committee, chaired by Lt. Gen. Harold G. Moore, the Deputy Chief of Staff for Personnel, is divided into four groups, according to Col. Loma Allen, the Army's Director of Equal Opportunity Programs, who is the committee secretary. The subcommittees are: military personnel matters, civilian personnel matters, contract operations and assorted personnel hiring and assignment. The fourth subcommittee is examining "miscellaneous" areas, Allen says.

Recent reports of discriminatory practices in connection with contractor firms dealing with Arab countries "was the trigger" for the Armywide review of all equal opportunity and equal employment policies, according to Allen.

A review of DoD equal opportunity procedures also has been ordered by Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger. An interdepartmental study group is meeting daily and a final report of their findings and recommendations is to be submitted to Assistant Defense Secretary William K. Brehm by May 15.

The Army review affects "just about every staff agency in the Army ... either as backup, members of the committee or subcommittees," Allen says. He calls it "one of the most concerted efforts that's taken place at DA in recent years."

The review forcuses on operations, personnel managers, contracting and procurement officers, Allen says. He terms the effort "a first-class gutting."

The matter of alleged discrimination, particularly in connection with U.S.-Arab contracts, is being examined by the House Subcommittee on Government Information and Individual Rights. But part of the Army action "was in being a long time before" this, officials say.

Callaway's orders to the committee are to "dig it out, call it like it is, and if it isn't right, make it right," according to one official. That philosophy is shared by Moore, who reportedly told the committee they would open up every (expletive deleted) closet.

As the review continues, Allen says "a lot of areas" may surface which can't be fully examined before the April 18 deadline for the final report. But they will get a lot of attention in the weeks to come, he said.

The committee is "looking at policy, regulations and, more importantly, actual procedures," Allen says. "We're making every effort to bring it down to grass roots levels."

Defense Guidelines Set

By a Times Staff Writer

WASHINGTON — Defense observance of International Women's Year 1975 will be guided by three general objectives, Secretary James R. Schlesinger has announced. They are:

"1. To continue striving to provide to men and women alike an equal opportunity for patriotic service in the all-volunteer military forces of the U.S., and in the civilian rolls of the Department of Defense.

"2. To encourage recognition of the concept that the common defense is a common and equal responsibility of all citizens, and through innovative and aggressive initiatives, encourage the active role of women in the mission of the Department of Defense.

"3. To acknowledge and emphasize the sacrifices of women in building the American nation, and in particular, recognize the accomplishments of women in the Department of Defense, both military and civilian."

This year was proclaimed International Women's Year by the United Nations General Assembly in 1972. An IWY 1975 National Commission was created by President Ford on January 9.

Schlesinger also has named a committee of 14 members representing the Defense agencies and the military departments to help stimulate publicity and participation in IWY observances. The group is co-chaired by Georgiana Sheldon, deputy director of the Defense Civil Preparedness Agency, and by Maj. Gen. Winant Sidle, Deputy Assistant Defense Secretary for public affairs.

Equal Opportunity Job Laws for Disabled Have Little Effect

By JANE E. BRODY

The Federal Government and nearly half the states have passed laws granting equal job opportunities to millions of working-age Americans with physical, medical and mental disabilities. But in many cases the laws are not having the desired effect because of inadequate enforcement and difficulties in interpreting them.

In addition, in many states neither the workers covered, the voluntary agencies that represent them, nor potential employers are even aware these laws exist.

As a result, in some states fewer than a dozen complaints have been brought in the first year of a new law (in North Carolina, for example, no complaints were brought). In other cases, attempts to resolve complaints have raised more questions than they answered.

Twenty-two states, the District of Columbia and the Federal Government have outlawed job discrimination against handicapped workers, although in some states the legislation excludes certain categories of disability, such as mental illness. Four years ago, only five states had such laws.

Validated complaints that have been brought before responsible authorities in various states illustrate the wide-ranging role such laws can play. While the laws also cover promotions, nearly all cases thus far have involved hirings. They include the following:

¶A practical nurse was denied a job in a New York hospital because she had high blood pressure.

¶A woman who had been treated for breast cancer was refused a civil service job in Milwaukee.

¶A California man was denied a job as a bread truck driver because he stuttered.

¶A New Jersey computer operator was dismissed from his job at a refining company after his employers learned that he was an epileptic.

¶A young woman was suddenly told there was no job opening when her prospective employer, a Massachusetts shoe company, realized that her address was a "halfway house" for persons recovering from mental illnesses.

Except for the nurse, whose case has not yet gone through a hearing, the complainants in these cases eventually got satisfaction through the intervention of responsible state agencies.

Not a Hindrance

In the case of the stuttering truck driver, for example, an officer with the California Fair Employment Practices Commission went around the driver's delivery route, talked to customers and reported back to the employer that stuttering would not be a hindrance in the work. The man then got the job.

In many of the cases that have been successfully handled, merely informing the employer that he may be acting in violation of the law has led to the hiring of the complainant.

But the lack of teeth in some state laws—including the failure to establish penalties or specify funds and an agency to enforce the law—prevents a satisfactory outcome for the employe, even when he wins a case.

Donald Hays, a 34-year-old married man who uses a wheelchair and has a hearing problem, had worked in a federally funded manpower program helping the handicapped find jobs. After three years, he was suddenly dismissed because his employer said he lacked the mobility to do the job.

The New Mexico Human Rights Commission ruled that his discharge was unlawful discrimination based on a physical handicap. He was awarded the maximum damages, $1,000, and the commission suggested that he be rehired or given a comparable job.

However, Mr. Hays still has no job because the commission has no way to enforce its ruling.

"Maybe some day I'll get my job back or one like it," Mr. Hays said. "But all I have now is words and you can't live on that."

In other states, vagueness about the wording, meaning or intent of the law has led to varying interpretations. A test case was brought in Natick, Mass., District Court involving a 30-year-old woman who had multiple sclerosis.

Although her disease was in remission at the time, a company refused to hire her and was charged by the state Division of Industrial Safety with violating the law.

However, the case was appealed and the judge upheld the company because he said that the woman had not been rehabilitated by training but rather by taking medication, and that this was not "rehabilitation" as stated in the law.

In most states, including New York, what the law means by "physical handicap" is being broadly interpreted to include such conditions as diabetes, prior treatment for cancer, an overweight condition that has a medical cause, as well as conditions more commonly thought of as handicaps, such as blindness, deafness and missing or crippled limbs.

To Perform Duties

The prospective employe is required only to be able to perform the duties of the job at the time he applies for it. The employer cannot refuse to hire him because of what may happen in the future, such as a recurrence or progression of his disease (although employment theoretically may be terminated if the person loses the capacity to do his job).

But since these facts have not been widely publicized in about half the states with such legislation, many victims of discrimination do not know they are protected by the law.

"Most persons with illnesses don't consider themselves to be handicapped," observed Mrs. Nike Bradley, executive director of the Chicago chapter of the American Diabetes Association. In the state of Washington, for example, of 98 complaints filed so far, none have involved diseases.

Even in Wisconsin, where a broadly interpreted law has been on the books since 1961, inquires disclosed that many affected persons and the health agencies that represented them were unaware of the protection.

Executives of local chapters of the American Cancer Society, for example, said they did not know that cancer patients were covered. Among numerous complaints was one from a 27-year-old college graduate who was successfully treated for a testicular tumor five years ago and has been able to get only temporary jobs since.

Cancer Society Study

The American Cancer Society Is currently conducting a nationwide study to assess the extent of job discrimination against cancer patients and determine how best to counter it. Many companies have policies of not hiring a person until five or 10 years after treatment for cancer.

As with job discrimination against women and minority groups, the handicapped often do not know why they are turned down and thus may not believe they have a legitimate complaint.

"The insidious part of job discrimination is that frequently the employers don't tell you you are being passed over because of a physical disability," said Luther B. Francis, president of the Diabetes Association in Pine Tree, Me.

Employers, too, have their problems with laws protecting handicapped workers. Traditionally, explained Emmett Snow, who helps to enforce the Federal regulations for the United States Department of Labor, companies have been reluctant to hire such persons because "they fear they won't get longterm service from the employe or that his illness may suddenly worsen or that the company's insurance rates would go up."

Diabetic Dismissed

In North Carolina, for example, a woman was dismissed from a job as a supermarket clerk because she had diabetes and the insurance company handling the store's group policy said it would raise the rates for all in the group if the woman was kept on.

According to an interpretation of the New York State law prepared for employers by National Health Services, Inc., an employe may not be rejected even though his condition may involve a future payroll risk or if he would draw excessively on fringe benefits or if coworkers or customers would prefer he not be employed. Nor can an employer exclude an applicant on the ground that the job may turn out to be injurious to the employe's health.

The laws in several states and that of the Federal Government—whose requirements apply to Federal agencies and to companies receiving Federal grants or contracts exceeding $2,500—state that employers must make architectural accommodations to the needs of workers or applicants with physical handicaps.

In addition to widened doorways and ramps for wheelchairs, these might include using light instead of sound signals for the deaf or belts for the blind. Under the Federal law, an employer might also have to rearrange work schedules to meet the needs of the handicapped or hire two handicapped persons part-time instead of one full-time when the handicapped persons need several days off for medical treatment.

"One of the most important aspects of the law," remarked Jack Sable, Commissioner of the New York State Division of Human Rights, "is that it gives hope to people where there was no hope before. Thousands of handicapped persons have said to us that the law shows people still care about them."

"Obviously, our interpretations of the law will be challenged," he said. "But I have directed my staff to fight vigorously, into the courts if necessary, to protect a handicapped person's right to work."

Alaska, California, Connecticut, Florida, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, New Mexico, ew York, orth Carolina, Oregon, Rhode Island, Washington, Wisconsin and Vermont.

When a man goes to a hospital for an elective operation, he often is compensated for lost work-time by disability benefits. Just as often, a working woman is not compensated for work loss due to pregnancy.

Many pension plans, citing actuarial data that women on the average live longer than men, pay out benefits at a lower rate to retired women than to retired men.

Federal old age and survivor benefit programs assume that a married man's wife is his legal dependent, but when a woman claims her husband as a dependent she must prove that she provides a certain percentage of his support.

Women who get jobs through affirmative action hiring programs, along with black newcomers to the work force, often are the first to be fired or laid off when times are bad.

The Army requires much higher test scores for women trying to enlist than for men. The service academies are among many military career opportunities closed to women.

The nation's prisons, deficient as they are in job training for men, are even more so for women.

These are some of the disadvantages still faced by women—and often tolerated under federal and state law—despite a decade of progress in their battle against sex discrimination.

"We've had a fair amount of success," said Lois Schiffer of the Women's Law Project, "but we have a very long way to go."

The long way takes the form of case-by-case litigation, law-by-law lobbying and community-by-community public education to achieve sex equality, especially in the economic realm. Women's rights activists say the path is still longer by virtue of the failure so far to win ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment in the necessary 38 states.

Adoption of the amendment would clinch court victories more quickly and, perhaps more important, would encourage Congress and state legislatures to use a two-year grace period between ratification and the effective date to clean up laws that are biased against women.

Conspicuous victories have been won in the all-male Supreme Court in recent months, lifting the hopes of some women lawyers, but not so high that they're ready to lay down their arms.

Ruth Bader Ginsburg, a leading courtroom advocate, said the victories mean "that they can't use that slogan about 'woman's place is in the home' anymore — but they'll try anyway."

In an April 15 decision, the court, with only Justice William Rehnquist withholding approval, said it was discarding "old notions" about women's roles in light of obvious facts about increasing female participation in America's economic life. The court struck down a Utah law under which females became adults at age 18 but males were not adults until age 21.

Since December the court has ruled that women can't be systematically excluded from juries, can't be ignored as income producers when the government computes survivor benefits and, in the Utah case, can't be denied child support based on the concept that they reach adulthood sooner than males.

Potentially more significant than the results in each case is the reasoning and language used by the court in reaching its decisions. The court has taken note of evidence that women in fact are a major factor in the nation's work force, adding that it is "untenable to suggest these days" that all women must be treated as though each woman's destiny was to be "the center of home and family life."

The implication is that other sex barriers will fall as the justices apply a more skeptical view in case after case.

That is not enough for Mrs. Ginsburg or others in the sex equality drive. "We still don't have any clearly developed body of law to aid in developing a national strategy," said Judy Lichtman of the Women's Legal Defense Fund.

"It's no substitute for the Equal Rights Amendment," said Margaret Gates of the Center for Women's Policy Studies. "Anything the Supreme Court can say today it can unsay tomorrow."

The amendment would provide that "equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of sex," putting sex discrimination in the same outlawed category as race discrimination.

Does success in courtroom battles undercut the argument that the constitutional amendment is needed? "I had that thrown at me by conservatives in Florida," said Jan Liebman, legislative vice president of the National Organization for Women. Lois Schiffer said, "I don't buy that argument and I don't think it has anything to do with why people oppose ERA."

So far the court has refused to declare that sex and race discrimination are equally offensive under the 14th Amendment's guarantee of equal protection of the laws. In last month's case the justices again declined to specify the strict standard the women had hoped for, saying that the Utah law providing a different age of adulthood for men and women flunked any test—strict, relaxed "or something in between."

But the court, in an opinion delivered by Justice Harry A. Blackmun, made statements that seemed to indicate a new attitude. One example:

"No longer is the female destined solely for the home and the rearing of the family, and only the male for the marketplace and the world of ideas. Women's activities and responsibilities are increasing and expanding . . . The presence of women in business, in the professions, in government and, indeed, in all walks of life . . . is apparent and a proper subject of judicial notice."

Some of the work ahead is mopping up. The jury service ruling will be cited in challenges to the widespread practice of granting mothers of small children, but not fathers, an automatic exemption from jury duty on request without inquiring about individual need.

The March 19 ruling that women's earnings cannot be ignored in computing survivor benefits—so that widowers as well as widows qualify for them — affects $20 million in federal Social Security outlays, but $325 million a year is spent on programs that are open to similar attack.

Women's groups suffered a setback on pregnancy disability last year when the Supreme Court ruled that state insurance programs could exclude normal childbirth cases from an otherwise comprehensive health care plan without violating the Constitution.

The groups have had more success in the employment sphere recently as lower federal courts have based their rulings favoring women on Title VII, the employment discrimination section of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. The reasoning has been that Congress intended to eliminate more sex bias than the Constitution prohibited.

Possibly the hardest fight will come over the "last-hired, first-fired" problem, in which women and blacks are testing the validity of industry and labor's contractual seniority systems. Important cases are on the verge of Supreme Court review, and a major ruling could come by 1976.

Last Hired, First Fired

Washington.

I grew up around a man who has now spent 51 years and five months working in the same printing shop, and still gets up before dawn to be there five days a week. He was a union man back before there were other unions in that part of the country. He remains proud of his craft in a time when professional pride is out of date, made obsolete by technology.

Even he could agree with the conscientious commentator who said the other day that "anybody who thinks this is an easy issue probably doesn't understand it." But having acknowledged that, he would have no doubt about the answer to it.

The issue is who gets fired when recession forces payroll cutbacks in American industry. The answer, almost unanimously among employers in this worst recession since the Great Depression, has been last hired, first fired.

That suits veteran employees, union officials and the old cliches about the virtue of hard work and reliability. But it does not suit the blacks and women who have been hired most recently as employers try to make up for years of discrimination against their kind. What it does to them is put them out of work.

There have been other economic slumps since the Depression, but this is the first serious one since the Civil Rights Act was passed eleven years ago. That is why the last-hired, first-fired principle is under harder challenge than ever before.

Under the civil rights law the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission maintains that women and minority workers should be protected from layoffs to make up for discrimination against them in the past. This collides head-on with union contracts that require layoffs to follow strict seniority lines.

Although the EEOC has taken the issue to court and it is expected eventually to reach the Supreme Court, employers nevertheless are holding to the traditional policy. That applies not only to union employers, who for once see eye-to-eye with union members, but to non-union shops as well. They clearly see last-hired, first-fired as a rational approach to a difficult problem, and anything else as the opening of a can of worms that would involve bitter controversy.

The result is that in many companies where the percentage of women and minority workers multiplied in recent years now it is back down toward the level where it started out after passage of the Civil Rights Act.

The plaintiffs in one or more cases argue that in fairness, their seniority should be figured from the date when they first applied for jobs at the plant in question, rather than when they were hired. That would help make up for the years of discrimination, whether it was conscious company policy or passive stringing along with community tradition.

The trouble is, this kind of restitution has victims as well as beneficiaries. Not to lay off Fred, who is black and a year on the job, means to lay off Joe, who is white and five years on the job, perhaps without missing a day. Further, the victims in such a case had nothing directly to do with any earlier policy of discrimination, they just worked there.

Among the toughest adherents to union practice are those blacks who got in first, and have been accumulating seniority for ten or twenty years. Like the whites working beside them, they took their chances with last-hired, first-fired through earlier business slumps, and like those whites they may have been laid off and rehired several times over the years before becoming senior enough to ride out this recession.

The point is, they earned their standing by being stubborn and steady. Nobody gave it to them, and they would resent it mightily if their jobs were handed now to workers who have not yet paid the same price. Which proves that, as the man said, "anybody who thinks this is an easy issue probably doesn't understand it."

WASHINGTON POST - 15 MAY 1975

Equal Employment Opportunity

PRESIDENT FORD has chosen a new chairman of the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission at a time when the entire enforcement effort needs leadership and guidance. The President's choice, Lowell W. Perry, has corporate experience that should be helpful. EEOC is far behind in its caseload, the result of many administrative problems that require serious attention. It will be up to the Senate to decide if Mr. Perry is up to the task.

If he is confirmed, Mr. Perry will have to address a number of questions that are the subject of some controversy, among them whether to ask Congress for a different kind of charter for the agency. As matters now stand, the agency lacks authority to issue cease and desist orders on its own. This has meant that the individual members of the commission must rely on the chairman to share the power vested in him. Proponents of a change have argued that the commission should be allowed to make its own findings and issue its own orders, so that each commissioner could hear cases and make recommendations to the whole body, as members of the National Labor Relations Board do.

That is but one subject the new chairman will have to address. He must also face the reasons for the backlog. One of these is that the commission now attempts to review too many cases on its own. A large number of the cases in its backlog involve persons who allege that they were discharged from their jobs for reasons of racial or sexual discrimination. It might well be that the commission should devise a mechanism by which those persons could go on to court and have their cases heard without going through the burdensome process of having the EEOC first make a finding that will in all probability be appealed by one side or the other.

If the EEOC took this step, it would then be in the position to address those cases in which groups of employees in large industries charge patterns of discriminatory practice in hiring and promotion, and the very serious problems of layoffs and seniority. In a recession, the question of whether the last hired should automatically be the first fired has caused a great deal of friction in workplaces all over the country. This is because, in recent response to charges of discrimination, an abnormally large proportion of the newly hired are members of minority groups or women. The guidance of an EEOC led by thoughtful commissioners and a diligent staff could be extremely helpful.

Not all of the problems of equal employment opportunity rest with the EEOC. The Office of Federal Contract Compliance also bears a major burden in this field. The General Accounting Office has just completed a study of the performance of that agency with respect to $50 billion in federal contracts with firms employing 25 million workers. These contractors for nonconstruction services to the federal government are under an executive order to upgrade their utilization of members of minority groups and women. The GAO's conclusion is that the enforcement effort is generally undermanned and underfunded and that the effort by most federal agencies is lukewarm at best.

That problem is one that EEOC can assist in solving, but the real leadership must come from the Department of Labor, which is responsible for the contract compliance effort, and from President Ford himself. If there is an answer to the bureaucratic lethargy the GAO found, it lies in executive leadership.

Q and A

FCC's Hooks On Blacks And TV

In 1972, Benjamin L. Hooks became the first black member of the Federal Communications Commission. A lawyer, a judge and an ordained Baptist minister, he has also been host and producer of his own television program in Memphis, Tenn., "Conversations in Black and White." Commissioner Hooks was interviewed by Washington Star Staff Writer Judy Flander.

Question: You had a pretty successful career going outside the federal government, how did you happen to take the FCC job?

Hooks: Well, many black activists and people generally across the country felt that it was quite a shameful thing that there was no black FCC commissioner because without a black commissioner the distortion of the black viewpoint, black life and minority life would continue unabated. The Kerner Commission report pointed out that the average white person in this country had no concept of what blacks are all about and that's a shameful condition after almost 200 years. So there was a huge cry for a black commissioner. I happened to be the one selected, and I felt from my own exposure to the civil rights movement and as a lawyer and a judge that it was an important position and that I could make a contribution.

Q: What specific contributions have you made in the time you have been here?

A: There are many of us who believe that in important agencies and in important positions like state legislatures, or the national Congress, the Supreme Court or state courts that the very presence of a black has a good effect because it forces the white power structure, for the first time, to confront that reality daily.

Q: But have you any tangible signs of success?

A: Yes, well, I think that is the whole problem. Everyone wants a tangible sign. Well, the signs are in changes of attitudes. There are very few issues that arise that don't affect minority issues. But for the 38 years this commission existed nobody raised that point. Another intangible result is the type of role models you create for young black people when they see there is an opportunity to do things that previously they have not been able to do.

Q: You mean you yourself are a role model?

A: That's right. When I became a judge in Memphis there were hundreds and thousands of blacks in that part of the country who never thought they'd live to see a black man sitting with the full power of a judge. It adds an air of pride and accomplishment that can't be measured in terms of anything else.

Q: Well, being a role model and nother intangible benefits of having a black FCC commissioner are certainly admirable. But has there been any improvement in programming or hiring since your arrival?

A: Well, when I came to this commission there were two black lawyers and now we have 17 Well, I'm not saying I'm taking credit for all of them. But if they only had two black lawyers in 38 years and now they have 17 it seems that I have had some impact. I must hasten to add that without the concurrence of the other commissioners this could not have happened. I think that when black people come on board they raise the consciousness level. We have black people in other positions in the agency itself and we have a full-time equal opportunities officer. When I came here it was a part-time job handled by a man who had much too much to do otherwise. We only have one black in the supergrade at the FCC but we do have one.

Q: There has been some criticism that the FCC's Equal Opportunities program has been dragging its feet in presenting an affirmative action program to the networks. Why is the program taking so long to get off the ground?

A: That's a good question and I don't have the answer. I don't think it should take so long but it has. Sometimes it is simply that we are overwhelmed with work, but that is not to say that we should not have moved faster on the equal opportunities employment guidelines. I think we should have. We expect to get them out hopefully shortly after the meeting in May We have started certain things like an annual employment fund. We have a place where we deal with minority employment. We have about 10 people now employed full-time with the commission whose job it is to monitor the reports, and do the practical, pragmatic everyday things necessary to get employment moving forward. But we have not as yet published our equal opportunities guidelines and that is set for discussion on the commission's agenda I think on May 20 or 22.

Q: Is there any other progress at all you can point to?

A: Until about nine years ago, there was about 3.4 percent employment of minorities in radio and television. Today, it's about 12.4 percent so there is no question great progress has been made. Now from the viewpoint of black people I must hasten to add that this progress has been very slow.

Q: What accounts for these gains?

A: I'd have to think that much of that progress is due to the fact that the FCC does have certain authority over licensing. The print media had about the same percentage of minority employes in 1967 and today it has not changed over one percent for the better.

Q: Do you think black and other minority news is covered adequately by networks and local stations?

A: When we start talking about news judgment, all these great journalists insist they don't want any governmental agency to tell them what to program on the news. I certainly agree with this on a surface level. But the fact remains that if a white person is making decision on which of 600 news stories to put on and he has no conception of what a black news story is all about, then he won't fool with it. That will be the first story to get killed. Some of the largest groups of blacks can meet right here in Washington and have enormous impact on balck life. But those groups won't get covered because the people who decide about such things don't have the slightest idea of what they are all about.

Q: What do you think of the new black comedy shows such as "The Jeffersons" where all sorts of black stereotypes are still prevalent?

A: I was born in this great country in the golden age of radio, which was a complete washout for blacks. There was simply

The disgrace that is 'Women's Year'

By Germaine Greer

LONDON—Despite the fact that all the nations represented at the United Nations oppress women in all degrees and in all manners, many to the point of slavery and mutilation, and are trueuently uninterested in forfeiting the privilege, some goodguy at the Secretariat decided that 1975 should be International Women's Year.

It is typical of the special brand of United Nations Pollyannaism that they did so regardless of the fact that Secretariat hiring policies are grossly discriminatory.

The decision to have a women's year was simply a belated recognition of the fashionableness of feminism in the West, whose lifestyles dominate the U.N. self-image despite their manifest irrelevance to most of the people living on the planet.

THUS WOMEN from countries where the majority of the female population is pregnant and performing unpaid hard labor in the fields are quite happy to discuss marriage or a career" in terms culled from McCall's. International Women's Year is a simple extension of Madison Avenue feminism: The agricultural laborers of Asia and Africa might as well lay down their hoes and light up a Virginia Slim.

This year, like 1974, will be a time when tens of thousands of girl babies will die because of discriminatory feeding practices, when thousands of women will have their external genitalia mutilated by custom and hundreds of thousands will be manipulated and medicated and castrated in the service of population control.

Wars will take their customary toll of women by slaughter, rapine, and prostitution. In 1975, the United States will manage not to pass the Equal Rights Amendment. Women's chances of controlling their own fertility will retreat instead of advancing. Unperturbed, the U.N. will arrange hours of chatter about "Women: Equality, Development, Peace."

This year of disgrace began willynilly; half the United Nations members had failed to give women's year even the lip-service of ratification. Only 18 of the 138 governments promised cash to the voluntary fund set up for women's year, and of these only 13 have actually parted with the money, in derisory sums—$100,000 from the United States, only 10 times as much as Finland gave. The total pledged is $1,350,000; the amount received is $1,208,633.

Next year's Human Settlement Conference in Vancouver already has millions in hand; the minibudget of women's year is expected to fund six regional conferences and the international conference in Mexico, from June 19 to July 2. The failure of the voluntary fund would have been less of a disaster if the United Nations had not "forgotten" women's year in drawing up its own budget; $258,000 was scraped up out of petty cash.

Women control neither the United Nations nor its member governments, nor the multinational corporations, nor the purse-strings of nations; nevertheless, they will be blamed for the debacle of women's year. The foolery and botching of the United Nations Secretariat will be taken as evidence that there is no public concern for the plight of women.

The U.N. has no power to force governments to cease oppressing the helpless, and no amount of shop-window funding will disguise that fact. The U.N. is too fearful of the power of its various blocs to risk offending individual governments by so much as motions of censure.

Representatives of nations that deny women the vote, shackle their legs, and veil their faces, where husbands have the right to kill their wives, are not even requested to explain these practices, especially if they produce fas they always can) tame women delegates skilled in the showy profeminist verbiage of U.N. debate.

Maddeningly, women have not even the option of ignoring the U.N. muddle because there is a real possibility that antifeminist formulations will creep into the U.N. declarations of pious intent and these ossify into immovable definitions.

If women's year had been properly planned, adequately funded, and research materials prepared in good time, women might have had cause to bless the day that Helvi Sipila became Assistant Secretary General for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs. We might then have had accurate and comprehensive information about the half of the world's population that is speechless—about its health, its morale, its work load, its contribution to national economies, its work evaluation, the effects of social and economic change upon its lifestyle and social status—all the prerequisites for realistic discussion that we do not have.

Follow-thru studies of women in population-planning programs, of women as war casualties, of women as pressure groups might have been undertaken in time to give those conferring in the various parts of the world some inkling of what the women of the world need.

Perhaps some of the 500 million illiterate women in the world could have been given a voice. Some of the hundreds of millions of unpaid family workers might have readjusted our naive materialistic views about the importance of being integrated in the process of production.

NOTWITHSTANDING that none of the necessary conditions for a successful International Women's Year exist, women are struggling to prevent the worst consequences of unlimited discussion of women's lives by the predominantly antifeminist United Nations.

The question is not now "What do you women expect women's year to do for you?" but "What do you fear that it will do against you?"

Our only way of controlling the situation is by the way of United Nations ...eg gladness itself, to work for women's year, and to swallow our gall in appearing to support it.

New York Times Special ...ssn.

no black show at all. You had one or two kind of sidekick actors on radio, but there was nothing to which a black kid could aspire. So I'm not going to be the one to kick whatever type of black shows we have now. I know what I like myself; my official role at the FCC is not to make any comments about any individual shows. I simply am happy that we do at least have an opportunity to show kids that black actors can get the exposure, that they can make the money, that there probably is an opportunity for black writers and directors and producers.

Q: So you don't mind the stereotypes continuing?

A: I didn't use the term stereotype. You did. You are presupposing answers that I am not prepared to give. All I am saying is that comedy and drama can't be real; obviously people don't live like "I Love Lucy" or "All In the Family." I think the whole idea of drama is to intensify real life. While I do not want to express complete satisfaction with all of the shows and the types of things they do at the same time I certainly am not going at this point to badmouth them. What I am pleased about is that we do have black programming now. I think that this is the first breakthrough. When you come from nothing and achieve something, I think you have to look at that first. I hope we will see dramas where we have black heroes and heroines. I hope we will have black Marcus Welbys and black people playing the part of public defenders.

Q: If black and other minority network programming is in its infancy would you say that it has yet to be born on public television? It seems that public television appeals to an elite minority of its own.

A: Well it does. It appeals to the elite white intellectual but I think it has a right to do that. I think that's a part of its function. I think that the history of public television shows it was designed to meet certain needs that could not be met by commercial television. It is true that a lot of cultural programming simply could not make it on commercial television because, — looking at the bottom line — it didn't produce enough audience, it didn't produce enough revenue. So that's the way the ball bounces. And even if you could get a sponsor, stations were reluctant to have a low-drawing show because they thought it had an adverse effect on the rest of their offerings. So public television has to be complimented for its catering to the elite minority to a point.

Q: But the elite minority isn't exclusively white. What about cultured ethnic groups who might like to see some public television directed to them?

A: I have been very critical of public television not because of what they do but because of what they don't do. I think they've gotten lost in a dream world. They've gone off on a kick that satisfies themselves, that satisfies the great television critics and a certain number of monied people in this country. Public television should also cater to elite ethnic minorities. They have a certain number of hours in the broadcast day, time enough for programs for the Spanish community, the Orientals, the feminist movement and others. But they absolutely refuse to program like that. And I also believe fervently that up until this year they have had a far worse record of minority hiring than commercial television.

Bella Belts DoD on O'Seas Job Bias

By PHIL STEVENS
Times Staff Writer

WASHINGTON — Rep. Bella Abzug (D., N.Y.), chairwoman of the House Government Operations Subcommittee on Individual Rights, has termed the testimony of a Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense "a bold-faced discrimination against women, blacks and other minorities."

In a hearing to determine the extent of Defense Department discrimination in overseas assignments, John Ahearn, newly appointed Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Manpower, acknowledged that the military departments have various policies which result in keeping some service people from assignments in countries which might object to their sex, race or religion.

Committee interest in the subject apparently was sparked by reports an Army contract with the Vinnell Corp. of California for training of Saudi Arabian National Guardsmen contained a clause which prohibited Vinnell from hiring personnel not suitable to the Saudi government. After protests, the clause was removed from the contract on March 24.

Interest also was developed by an Air Force Times story which divulged the existence of a classified document called a "Foreign Clearance Guide."

Under pressure from Abzug and Rep. Bob Kasten (R., Wis.) Air Force Col. Edward Schmitt confirmed that the document exists and that it contains information from various foreign embassies describing the qualifications for U.S. military personnel "acceptable" to their host countries. The Air Force guide also is used by other services.

After reminding Ahearn that she and the other members of the subcommittee and its staff are all cleared for access to top secret information and have a safe to secure it, Abzug renewed her demand for a copy of the guide. Schmitt noted her request and promised to pass it to his superiors.

The thrust of repetitive attacks by Abzug and Kasten was that the department has made strong declarations against discriminatory practices and yet it permits de facto discrimination by giving in to the desires of foreign governments.

Ahearn admitted that although DoD had the assurance of the Department of State that it would attempt to overturn any denial of a visa for an assignment in a foreign country the Defense Department had never asked for assistance.

Rep. Andrew Maguire (D., N.J.), a member of the subcommittee, concluded that as far as he could tell the DoD Human Goals Charter is of no more value than a high school diploma hung on the wall.

Ahearn disclosed that the department has uncovered a number of discriminatory regulations such as one requiring attaches to arrive at their stations "with wife." This, he said, was an obvious discrimination against female officers and unmarried male officers.

Ahearn acknowledged that the Navy and Marine Corps have policies against the assignment of black personnel to certain countries unless they are volunteers. This limitation, the Navy contends, is not discriminatory but is based on its perception of the racial atmosphere in the country concerned. Its purpose is to avoid putting black personnel in situations they would find intolerable.

Abzug was surprised by a statement from Schmitt that he knew of no agreement between the Air Force and the government of Iceland which prohibits the assignment of blacks to that country. According to Schmitt there are blacks there now and he knows of no limit on the number that can be sent.

Throughout the hearing Rep. Sam Steiger (R., Ariz.) repeatedly called the subcommittee's attention to the fact that the primary mission of the Department of Defense is to maintain national security. "I would hope," said Steiger, "that the Secretary of Defense would moderate his application of anti discriminatory measures when the interest of national defense is paramount."

Youth Advantage In Hikes Eased

By GENE FAMIGLIETTI

WASHINGTON — The importance of youth is being played down in formal guidance given to officer promotion boards this year, Army Times has learned.

The change results from efforts by Pentagon lawyers, authoritative Army sources say, to prevent future legal battles and controversy over charges of age discrimination.

A group of Army captains, passed over by an AUS major board last year, has charged they were discriminated against because of age. A class action suit on their behalf is expected to be filed in Baltimore, Md. soon. A number of Wacs also protested the Army's alleged promotion preference for younger officers.

In the general secondary zone guidance okayed for the 1975 round of officer promotion boards, (primarily O-5 and O-6), the Army says one of the aims of "accelerated, below-the-zone promotions is to provide the Army with exceptionally talented officers who can meet the taxing physical demands necessary for combat and combat related requirements as well as the strenuous demands of managerial positions.

"Though chronological age cannot be ignored, age in itself cannot be the sole basis for selection. Some officers maintain mental and physical energies which belie their chronological age while other more youthful officers display relatively less stamina, vigor and commitment."

The guidance, okayed by Army Secretary Howard H. Callaway, also noted that the board should recognize that those selected from the secondary zone replace officers who would have otherwise been picked from the primary zone. Callaway gives board presidents the authority to contact him if the board feels that fewer (or more) secondary zone candidates should (or should not be) selected than the secretary specifies.

In guidance to 1974 selection boards Callaway said that one purpose of below-the-zone hikes it is to supply "a pool of exceptionally talented and relatively young officers in the field grades. In this regard youth is, in itself, a major asset and a primary consideration for promotion from the secondary zone. The clear intent is that the board select the maximum number of officers from the secondary zone permitted by this letter of instructions . . ."

And, in a separate section applicable to the selection of chaplains for lieutenant colonel AUS, the board was told that age may be misleading because of the requirements of specific denominations for schooling and parish service. "Consequently chaplains with the same date of rank and similar military experience have significant variations in age. Age should not be a significant determinant of promotion," boards are being told.

The changes, high-level sources said, do not necessarily constitute a change in the Army Secretary's views. "Mr. Callaway continues to believe," an official said, "that he made the right decision on age last year."

Other changes from last year included in the LOI, which will be used by temporary lieutenant colonels and major boards in the next few weeks, involve Wacs, and derogatory information.

In evaluating the records of WAC officers, the board was told, it must recognize that they have been denied the full career opportunities available to men. Command assignments above the rank of captain generally were nonexistent for women until 1973, and restrictive policies have limited Wac schooling opportunities.

Under a derogatory information heading, the guidance says "little, if any weight should be placed on one bad efficiency report which has been preceded and followed by a high performance of duty."

Recruit Dons New Lifestyle

There are a lot of things to recommend the United States Air Force Nurse Program. Just ask Jan Warner who has been sworn in as a second lieutenant. A graduate of the Los Angeles County School of Nursing, Lt. Warner tried it on the outside and came to the conclusion that a more exciting life lay with the military.

"The continuing education opportunities attracted me first," she said. "There is specialization too and I love to travel. I'm looking forward to overseas service. Also, you get automatic promotions so there is greater chance for advancement."

Her decision didn't come overnight. After the initial inquiry, she continued to nurse nine months more at Canyon General Hospital, Anaheim. The recruiting office called periodically to check on her progress and keep her up to date on military matters.

"There was absolutely no pressure and I liked that," said Lt. Warner simply.

The daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Glenn L. Warner of Brea, she is a graduate of Brea-Olinda High School and never wanted to be anything but a nurse since she was very small. She is a surgical staff nurse and expects she will miss primary nursing methods since the Air Force is committed to team nursing. Her salary status will not change at first. But, in four years time, it will exceed what she could earn in civilian life.

Reflecting perhaps, her generation's disenchantment with things military, she confessed that her friends are not happy with her decision. And they also like to have her around.

Bass Warns City On Minority Hiring

By GEORGE E. CURRY
Of the Post-Dispatch Staff

The City of St. Louis could lose millions of dollars in federal funds if it ignores the problem of discrimination in its employment and promotion of minority-group members, says City Comptroller John F. Bass.

In an interview, Bass said that although no specific warnings had been given to St. Louis, other cities throughout the country had encountered difficulty. He said St. Louis should learn from their experiences.

Bass said that $19,000,000 in federal revenue-sharing funds had been withheld from Chicago last December because a federal judge found that the Police Department descriminated against minorities and women.

The Chicago ruling stemmed from a lawsuit. Similar suits have been filed in Philadelphia, Buffalo, N.Y., and Tallahassee, Fla.

"My most frustrating experience in this office has been the inability of the policymakers of city government to make the necessary adjustments to correct unequal recruiting, selection, and promotion of minorities in municipal government," Bass said. "We should use quotas, affirmative action, preferential treatment or whatever it takes to be in line with other governments throughout the country.

"When faced with a crisis, we can always come up with temporary solutions. What I'm saying is that we should stay ahead of the game. The wisdom is there, but the will isn't. It's an unpopular agenda item, it causes black-white and north-south divisions, but we should not wait for the courts to solve the problem."

Bass said he did not believe that blacks were receiving a fair share, especially in providing contracted services to the city.

"If we continue to let the present pattern run its course with no intervention, we will have a lot of alienation and mistrust and the situation will stifle growth and development of our community," Bass said. "We're talking about people problems—we can't put them on a ledger.

"It's nice to talk about the Arch, the Stadium, Convention Plaza and the fact that 'St. Louis has it from A to Z,' but we have other needs that we have to address ourselves to."

Bass has been speaking out recently about what he believes are problems city government has not tried hard enough to solve — for example, the distribution of revenue-sharing funds and the operation of social services programs.

At a recent budget meeting of the Board of Estimate and Apportionment, Bass questioned Streets Director William J. Wilson about the promotion of blacks in his department. When Wilson contended that his department was fully integrated, Bass said he had noticed that all six assistants attending the meeting with Wilson were white.

Bass said in the interview, "I understand that it is not an overnight thing, but I'd like to see evidence that we're getting ahead of the pack. These are not decisions you like to make with a gun at your temple. Planning now could avert a crisis situation. I'm not talking about north or south St. Louis, but a total St. Louis. Leadership is a shared responsibility."

The comptroller said he hoped a coalition of civic, political and business leaders would band together against discrimination in city government and the city itself. After all, he said, everyone will gain from preventing chaos.

Although more than half of the city's 8484 civil service employes are black, most are concentrated in the low-paying job categories. St. Louis County's government has the same pattern. In both places, women share the lower positions with blacks and other minority-group members.

Black Admissions Aides Advise On Competition for Ivy League

One hundred and twenty-five ninth- and tenth-graders, most of them black, were exhorted yesterday to "maximize their potential" if they were to compete successfully for placement in Ivy League colleges.

The students, who were chosen by their guidance counselors on the basis of their potential as Ivy League candidates, attended a conference organized by the Association of Black Admissions and Financial Aid Officers of the Ivy League and Seven Sisters Schools, Inc.

They received literature about career opportunities, were advised to read as much as they could, and listened to black professionals in medicine, law and the academic field, who told them in workshops how they had achieved success after graduation from Ivy League schools.

William Adams, assistant to the provost at the University of Pennsylvania, told the students: "You should have exhausted all of the mathematical courses in your school. Learn to study effectively and to retain the material. And you must experiment with writing by keeping a journal, rewriting your notes and using a thesaurus."

Early Start Is Aim

"Specialization, unfortunately, has gone all the way back to ninth grade in this country," said David L. Evans, associate director of admissions at Harvard University.

The black admissions officers hope that such career conferences will be able to reach a pool of talented minority-group students at a point in their studies when they still have time to prepare for the considerable requirements of what the admissions officers referred to as highly competitive schools.

In the last three years the percentage of blacks enrolled in predominantly white universities and colleges has been declining.

It was 5.7% in 1968. It reached a peak in 1972, when black enrollment was 8.7 per cent of the total, but has been going down ever since. It is currently 7.4 per cent.

East Asia: An Uncertain Future

TOKYO—A senior Philippine planner now "reassessing" his country's security wonders when and whether the Soviet fleet will base itself for Asian voyages at the former U.S. base at Camranh Bay. A Singapore businessman asks for a report on the size and competency of Thailand's army. A Soviet Embassador, over tennis, tells a ranking Japanese politician that the time is right for a Moscow-Tokyo nonaggression pact. An international banker with responsibility for energy matters inquires about the safety of South Korean investments in view of a possible new invasion from the North.

Throughout the vast and varied region of East Asia, the recent collapse in Indochina has set off tremors of speculation, reassessment and concern. Not for three decades has the region been so much in flux. All indications are that this is only the early stage of fundamental shifts in thought and action — quite possibly the most important changes in the area since the upheavals of World War II.

The view from Washington centers on American commitments and assurances, as if the region were waiting to be acted upon by the United States. The view from Asia is quite different. In five weeks of travel in Southeast and Northeast Asia since my departure from Saigon on April 10, I found alliances and allegiances to be shifting and new ideas in motion. The pieces on the chessboard have been suddenly shaken out of position, and even the rules seem to be changing. Nobody can quite foresee the outcome, much less the intermediate moves, or final outcome. Even so, some initial impressions come through clearly.

The United States, which has been the central power in East Asia since World War II, has become one of several central powers. U.S. decision and action are still important, but they are no longer nearly all-important.

Indonesian Foreign Minister Adam Malik said recent events have brought about "a new geopolitical configuration in Southeast Asia to which all nations have to adapt themselves." Asians are masters at adapting to nature, to fate, to outside and internal forces beyond their control, and they are well into the process of adjustment now. Asian leaders could see what was coming well in advance of the final debacle in Indochina. For many months they had been cautiously forging or reinforcing their ties to China, the Soviet Union and the now-formidable regional power centered in Hanoi. This process has accelerated and taken on new meaning since the fall of Phnom Penh on April 17 and of Saigon on April 30.

The recent whirlwind U.S. action to to recapture the freighter Mayaguez and its crew has demonstrated the fact that the United States remains an important military power in the area. But new limitations, arising from the new configuration in East Asia, were also evident. The Thai government's strong objections to the use of Thai bases for the operation against Cambodia make these installations of doubtful value in any future Indochina incidents, even if Thailand should reconsider its earlier decision to close the bases within a year. In this, the Thais are motivated not by anti-Americanism so much as by the need to accommodate the suddenly important interests of the new and nearby regimes in Cambodia and Vietnam.

Use of the existing U.S. bases in Japan and the Philippines to mount future combat operations in Southeast Asia is likely to be sharply limited in view of newly-forged diplomatic relations of Tokyo and Manila with the Communist governments in the area. The Philippines' seemingly puzzling restrictions on the use of Clark Air Base and Subic Bay Naval Base by U.S.-sponsored Saigon refugees is a hint of what is to come. Manila's edginess had roots in a staff protest from the Hanoi government, delivered secretly in Paris, against Philippine participation in the earlier evacuation of Danang.

Though diminished militarily, the United States remains the single most important power in the region economically. The only serious rival for trade and investment is Japan, which in turn is dependent in large measure on the United States for its markets and prosperity. If Washington's influence is reduced, the same cannot be said for that of New York, Chicago, Akron and Detroit. It is on these markets for raw materials and manufactured goods that Asian hopes for better living standards—a prerequisite for internal stability—largely depend.

In highly sophisticated fashion many Asians are turning to Communist diversity—rather than U.S. military strength—as a source of potential security. National leaders and diplomats are calculating and taking comfort from the deep antagonisms between China and the Soviet Union and, on a smaller but vitally important scale, between North Vietnamese and South Vietnamese, and between them both and Cambodians and Laotians.

Mr. Oberdorfer, an Asian correspondent of The Washington Post, has traveled in Vietnam, the Philippines, Singapore, Malaysia and Japan in recent weeks.

In a number of Asian capitals the difference between optimists and pessimists is that the former believe it will take several years at least for the victors of Indochina to stabilize their relationships with one another before turning their new found power toward their neighbors. The pessimists are not sure that it will take so long.

One grave concern throughout the region centers on the billions of dollars in usable American weapons—particularly small arms, grenades, land mines, mortars, battlefield rockets and naval craft—recently inherited by a Vietnamese Communist army that does not need them. Almost every Southeast Asian country is afflicted by insurgent groups—often from ethnic minorities—in sparsely populated or disadvantaged areas. China and the Soviet Union have kept most of these fraternal insurgencies on short rations and outmoded weapons. This could change dramatically if the Vietnamese succumb to the temptation to become arms merchants or fraternal benefactors. The glut of modern weapons is considered a more serious threat than any spreading ideological infection among potential "dominoes."

In Northeast Asia, which is far more important to the United States than Southeast Asia, recent events seem to have enhanced the U.S.-Japan alliance in curious and unexpected fashion. Here the most significant thing is what hasn't happened in Japan.

Longstanding apprehension has been felt in many quarters—most recently expressed in blunt terms by Philippine Foreign Minister Carlos P. Romulo—that a worried Japan could turn away from the U.S. security umbrella toward its own remilitarization, conventional and nuclear. There is no sign of this, and every sign to the contrary. The initial reaction of Japan's government and power structure is to hug the U.S. "security blanket" a bit tighter in realization of its importance to stability in and around Japan.

The main concern of Tokyo at the moment is not Indochina, which is nearly 2,000 miles away and of peripheral interest, but South Korea, which is 115 miles away across a narrow strait. Given Japan's geography and resources, it is doubtful that a unified Korea under Communist rule would pose a realistic threat. But a Communist takeover of Korea by force under present circumstances would demolish the remaining credibility of the United States security treaty, the pillar of foreign policy for the world's first unarmed industrial power. This could indeed turn Japan toward revolution, whether from the right or left, and swift rearmament. As a major power, Japan is one of the few "swing countries" whose turn to new policies and alliances would profoundly affect events throughout the world. Japan's GNP is third in the world and about five times as large as the combined GNP of the rest of East Asia, excluding China. Japan's GNP is about twice that of China.

In East Asia today the greatest constant is uncertainty, and the greatest need is time to take account of events and changes and to sort things out. Despite the widespread expectation that South Vietnam would not survive in the long run, the collapse came so quickly that nearly every nation—Communist, U.S.-Allied and neutral—was caught unprepared. Because of the current American economic slump and political uncertainty, the sudden collapse probably made the United States seem more impotent than it really is.

Having failed in Indochina largely through ignorance of Asian ways, the United States needs to be more attentive—rather than less—to trends of thought and action in the region. The United States is still an important power, probably the most important single power. But it must find new ways to listen to and work with Asians, giving greater emphasis to political and economic relationships as military options are diminished.

Culver Criticizes Military-Civilian Switches

By Richard L. Lyons
Washington Post Staff Writer

Sen. John C. Culver (D-Iowa) is trying to stop the practice of converting retired military men into civilians while they hold a government job and then restoring military retirement benefits when they quit.

Culver said the practice erodes the essential separation between military and civilian authority by making the official somewhat dependent on military goodwill during his civil tenure.

The target of Culver's criticism is a bill the Senate is scheduled to take up today that would restore to Alexander P. Butterfield the rank of retired Air Force colonel, which he resigned more than two years ago to become federal aviation administrator. Butterfield, who first told the world about the Nixon White House tapes, has left the FAA post.

The 1958 law creating the FAA required that its administrator be a civilian "in the strictest sense of the word," according to the report accompanying the bill. The reason for this, said Culver in a dissenting report, was that the FAA would often rule on conflicting airspace needs between military and civilian users. Congress intended that its administrator not be subject to any military pressures or controls.

By a vote of 8 to 4, the Senate Armed Services Committee decided that the letter of the law had been met by Butterfield's resignation with no assurance that his commission would be restored after he left office. The majority noted that Congress had taken similar action in the case of retired Lt. Gen. Elwood R. Quesada, the first administrator, and had permitted Gen. William F. McKee to take the position in 1965 without resigning his commission.

Culver said Quesada was a special case because he had put together the FAA legislation, and noted that in approving the McKee bill the Senate Commerce Committee had said it did not approve of such action as a general rule.

Culver said Butterfield was encouraged at his confirmation hearings to hope that his commission might be restored by act of Congress after his service ended. The committee majority felt the fact that he would owe his restored rank to Congress, not to the Air Force, was enough protection against fear of military pressures on Butterfield.

Culver said there would be little difference in Butterfield's pension whether he took it as a 20-year Air Force officer or as a six-year civil servant plus 20 years of military service. But as a retired officer, Butterfield would have medical, commissary and some other benefits not available to civilians.

Culver, joined by fellow freshman Gary Hart (D-Colo.), said separation of military and civilian authority, "which is grounded in the Constitution, is deliberately designed to promote the highest professionalism in the military while at the same time keeping the military under civilian control and removed from the formulation of public policy."

The other Armed Services members opposing the bill were Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) and Sam Nunn (D-Ga.).

Mr. Ford's dilemma—President Ford ordered the rescue of the merchant ship Mayaguez against the advice of his legal experts.

They cautioned him that, contrary to his public statement, the ship's capture was not piracy. Under international law they said, Cambodia had a legal right to seize the ship after it steamed within the 12-mile limit which Cambodia claims as its territorial waters.

The Mayaguez was only eight miles from the Cambodian islet of Poulo Wai when it was stopped.

Meanwhile, the Joint Chiefs of Staff gave President Ford their opinion that the ship could be rescued because of its isolated location off an islet some 35 miles from the Cambodian coast.

In the end, the President listened to his generals rather than his lawyers.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR - 20 MAY 1975

Joseph C. Harsch

Korea's future

A lot of people in South Korea are worried about what the future holds for them. Obviously, they have reason for their anxiety. As Saigon was collapsing Kim Il-sung, President of North Korea, was in Peking. We are entitled to assume that he saw fresh opportunities for himself in the present pattern of events in Asia. It is a reasonable guess that he wanted Peking's approval for another try at toppling the present system in South Korea.

It does not follow that the Chinese have given Kim Il-sung permission to hit the adventure trail. It is more likely that they have told him to take it easy and do nothing foolish. But the fact that Mr. Kim went to Peking underlines the most important single fact about the future of Korea. That fact is that other countries have a considerable interest in the future of Korea. And it suggests that the time is approaching when the United States might well consult those others.

For 25 years the U.S. has been the sole protector and defender of the noncommunist government and system which survives in the southern half of the Korean peninsula. The expense of keeping up an American military force of 38,000 men is being questioned in Congress. So too is the fact that the U.S. Second Infantry Division is posted on the road from the frontier to the capital city of Seoul and hence is in the direct line of any renewed North Korean attack on South Korea. Congress has suggested that the Second Division could be moved south of Seoul to a less exposed position.

The American presence has been based on an old assumption left over from the Korean war that without an American presence South Korea would be gobbled up by North Korea. But is that assumption still valid?

So long as there is no general agreement about Korea by other countries having an interest the theory does and will remain valid that South Korea's independence depends largely on the U.S. But this condition surely need not continue indefinitely.

Kim Il-sung undoubtedly would like to be the ruler of all of Korea. But who else wants him to achieve that role?

The other country most concerned is Japan. The U.S. is in Korea because it defeated Japan in World War II. To the victor falls the responsibility of defending the interests of the vanquished. South Korea is vital to the defense of Japan. In hostile hands South Korea is (as always) a springboard for a possible attack on Japan. The U.S. has been defending a Japanese interest, not a primary American interest, in protecting the independence of South Korea. Japan could and should begin to take up its own burden in Korea.

China and the Soviet Union have mixed interests in the future of Korea. Neither trusts Kim Il-sung entirely. The Chinese called him a "flat revisionist" during their "Cultural Revolution." That probably meant that they considered him to be too much under Soviet influence. But the Soviets could not feel comfortable if North Korea became a satellite of Peking. To survive at all North Korea has to manage to be more or less neutral between Peking and Moscow.

For either Moscow or Peking to encourage Kim Il-sung now would be an act hostile to the interests of Japan. Both are trying to improve their relations with Japan. And both would undoubtedly prefer a neutral and small North Korea to one as powerful as North Vietnam is becoming with uncertain loyalties between Peking and Moscow. The present divided condition in Korea, with the South associated with the U.S. and Japan and the North suspended carefully between Moscow and Peking, is the safest condition for all concerned.

It is so obviously in the common interest of all that it ought to become the subject of a diplomatic effort aimed at a guarantee of the status quo in Korea. Such a guarantee could be signed to advantage by the United States, Japan, China, and the Soviet Union. That is the road by which Washington could safely get out from under the cost and the risk of being the sole protector of the independence of South Korea. It is time to start down that road.

Packing the military home

America is coming under increasing pressure to scale down its military bases both in south east Asia and Europe. The collapse of Indochina has now made it necessary for America's allies in the area to win recognition, and even approval, from the new communist regimes. Thailand has already asked for the complete evacuation by next March of the 27,000 American troops, mostly airmen, now in the country; 7,500 will go by July and it is intended that the air bases that had been used for many of the bombing raids on Vietnam will be progressively shut down. The expulsion of the American troops may win immediate political popularity for the 14-party coalition government of the prime minister, Mr Kukrit Pramoj, but it will cause unemployment and a sharp drop in the country's foreign earnings and is unlikely to have the approval of the Thai generals. The growing nervousness in Thailand was made clear by the government's demand that 120 odd American-supplied aircraft flown in by refugees from Vietnam should remain there while it "studies" the claim to them by the Provisional Revolutionary government in Saigon. The Americans, however, have already stripped out many of the planes. The end of the 13 year agreement that established an American military presence in Thailand seems to be coming.

The call by President Marcos of the Philippines for a complete renegotiation of America's two important bases on the islands has come as a greater surprise. The Clark air force base and the Subic Bay naval base, used as a forward supply and repair base by the Seventh fleet, have been major staging posts for Vietnamese refugees in the last few weeks. President Marcos, in an unprecedented intervention in the running of the bases, demanded that no high-ranking political refugees should be landed (with the exception of Air Marshal Ky) and that no refugee should be allowed to remain for more than three days. Few believe that this hard line by the president indicates the move towards the left that is clearly apparent in Thailand; most probably he is just trying to negotiate a better rent for the bases from the Americans.

The American troops in Thailand and the Philippines are not committed by treaties to defend those countries against attack. The far greater worry to the state department is South Korea, which the United States is bound to defend under a security treaty and which is also anxious to retain as many military bases as possible as hostage against attack from the north. The Senate is already trying to scale down the foreign aid given to South Korea from $234m to $145m this year and is putting pressure on the department of defence to cut back the 38,000 American troops (including one combat division) stationed in the country.

Nor is America's military unpopularity confined to south-east Asia. It was agreed in Greece this week that the home port of six destroyers of the Sixth fleet at Elefsis near Athens would be closed down soon and that six other American bases in Greece with 11,000 servicemen would be phased out. The agreement for home porting at Elefsis was signed only two years ago, but the new Greek government, angered by what it interprets as America's siding with Turkey in the Cyprus dispute, is determined to reduce the American military presence in Greece. Turkey, suffering from the American arms embargo, which it reads as an overt pro-Greek stand by the United States, is also contemplating closing some of its American bases. The mood against harbouring American troops is also being strongly felt in Portugal where the left-wing military government is determined to limit the air base at Lajes, in the Azores, to Nato operations. Lajes was particularly important as a fuelling point for planes flying to Israel during the 1973 Middle East war. But Portugal is unwilling to press its point too hard; the base is popular in the Azores and pressure to close it is likely only to increase the growing demands in the islands for independence from mainland Portugal. Spain is also renegotiating the terms of three major American military bases in the hope of squeezing a higher rent and more military aid from the United States.

the Cyprus or the Aegean disputes, no matter what Congress or the Greeks think about it. The Vienna talks between Greek and Turkish Cypriot leaders brought a dubious breakthrough. It was to reopen Nicosia airport to UN traffic—but the Turks are insisting on joint operation of the airport before civilian traffic can be resumed, something that Archbishop Makarios is hardly likely to agree to.

The impasse has given way to a pause this month to see if high-level diplomacy can do anything to break the deadlock. The Turks will be going to Brussels for the NATO summit later this month, and Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger is due here immediately thereafter for a meeting of the Central Treaty Organization (CENTO).

Demirel heads a shaky right-wing coalition, held together mainly by a common desire of all partners to avoid an early election, which would restore Social Democrat Ecevit, the hero of last summer's Cyprus invasion, to power. But there is a wide measure of agreement among all parties on foreign policy, particularly Cyprus, and the tough stance is unlikely to change, whatever happens on the domestic political scene.

The controversies with the Greeks and the Americans have tended to cloak a serious economic situation here, which has put the country on the brink of runaway inflation and perhaps bankruptcy. Thanks to the increased cost of imports, particularly oil, Turkey's foreign exchange reserves have been running down at a rate of $150 million per month, and now stand at $1.2 billion. At this rate, the government will run out of money to pay for imports by the year's end.

Fertilizer imports and the cost of subsidizing cotton, the main export, run to $550 million a year, and the trade deficit rose from $750 million in 1973 to an estimated $2 billion last year. Inflation is running at 25-30%, and the government is planning to slash prices of state-run iron, steel, and cement works to make them more competitive with foreign imports. This will add massively to the deficit in the $8.5 billion budget, and give further impetus to the inflationary spiral.

The perennial problem of unemployment, which is officially put at 12%, has worsened because European labor markets are frozen. No longer can an estimated 100,000 Turkish workers find employment abroad each year. The birth rate is staggering, adding 1.5 million per year to the current population of 40 million.

Despite all this, attention remains focused on the U.S. arms embargo and Cyprus. There is a strong suspicion here, frequently voiced, that the Greeks will deliberately stall on Cyprus just to make sure that Congress gets no reason to lift the arms embargo.

It has all added to the mounting urge among Turks to get their eggs out of the American basket. But no one has yet come up with an answer as to how to do it.

A Roland for our Rapier

A billion-dollar contract to equip the American army with surface-to-air missiles has gone to a Franco-German consortium which builds the Roland II rocket. The two main competitors for the order were the French Crotale rocket and the Rapier from Britain. According to defence experts, Britain's Rapier should have won the contract hands down.

An American newsletter, Defense and Foreign Affairs Daily, claims the Rapier was the best buy possible, even on the basis of tests carried out by the Americans. But Roland was accepted after strong political pressure from West Germany's Chancellor Helmut Schmidt. The British could bring no such pressure—allegedly due to a lack of love between the American defence secretary, Mr James Schlesinger, and Mr Harold Wilson. From a number of leaked documents it appears that Mr Schlesinger's personal views were strong enough to offset a number of deficiencies in the Roland system.

The most obvious drawback is that the Roland is not likely, in practice, to see service with the American army until 1980 at the earliest. The Rapier is already in service with the British army, and the day-or-night version will be available to foreign governments from 1977 onwards. The British Aircraft Corporation has already manufactured hundreds of firing units and thousands of rockets. Rapier's manufacturing costs are well known, but Roland's are still a dark mystery. It seems the only point where Rapier is faulted is that the speed of re loading its launcher is slower than Roland's.

Turks Wary of Putting All Their Eggs in U.S. Basket

BY JOE ALEX MORRIS JR.

ANKARA—The feeling is mounting here that Turkey has put too many eggs in one basket.

That basket is labeled "U.S.A."

It is not particularly new. Former Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit traces it back 10 years to the time when President Lyndon B. Johnson succeeded through massive pressure in blocking a Turkish military landing on Cyprus.

Times correspondent Joe Alex Morris is based in Beirut.

This was followed, four years ago, by more American pressure to stop cultivation of the opium poppy. That worked too, for a time.

But the Turks are changing. They are not moving with breakneck speed toward a confrontation with their most important ally, but neither are they bowing to U.S. pressure the way they used to.

They invaded Cyprus last summer, despite U.S. efforts to stave them off again. Shortly before that, Ecevit announced that poppy cultivation would be resumed despite American protest.

But the situation has hardly improved since then. Congress imposed an arms embargo on Turkey last February in an effort to push the Turks back from the 40% of Cyprus they now occupy.

The Turks bitterly resent what they view as a crass breaking of mutual defense obligations on the part of the United States. On Cyprus, they have hardened their line, if anything.

About 7,000 American troops are still stationed here, but there is increasing political pressure to move some of them out, not those here in a NATO capacity, but others manning sensitive and often irreplaceable listening posts monitoring the Soviet Union.

The 6th Fleet no longer calls at Turkish ports. The Turks didn't make that decision, but U.S. officials have kept the ships away fearing hostile public reaction.

The embargo put the Turks in a dilemma. Their European NATO allies are sympathetic, but not prepared to step in and fully cover the military assistance which came from the United States.

In fact, they couldn't even if they wanted to. Turkey's air force consists largely of F-100 Thunderjets, an outmoded airplane no longer in use elsewhere, and the spare parts for which are available only in the United States.

There is no question of adopting a Willy Brandt-style ostpolitik and making up with the Russians, a traditional enemy with whom the Turks fought 13 wars in the past. Prime Minister Suleiman Demirel is dependent on, among others, a party which openly looks forward to the day when the Soviet system collapses and the "captive" Turks in the Soviet Union will be free to join what is seen here as their natural homeland.

To outsiders, this may seem like purest fantasy. But Turks recently celebrated something known here as Azerbaijan Martyrs Day, and speakers emphasized that the lives of Azerbaijani victims of Soviet oppression were not lost in vain.

"The idea of liberating Turkish regions, especially in Azerbaijan, is not an unattainable dream," Prof. Hikmat Tanyu told one meeting. "Our slogan must be: Here today, tomorrow in Azerbaijan."

More immediate danger lies in another direction—Greece. Not only Cyprus, but an unseemly squabble over mineral rights in the Aegean Sea which separates the two countries poisons the atmosphere there.

The Greeks have been putting troops onto islands lying close to the Turkish mainland, in contravention of the Treaty of Lausanne under which they were to remain demilitarized. This started under the military regime which collapsed last July, but has actually been speeded up by Premier Constantine Caramanlis.

There were tense moments a few weeks back when the Turkish air force launched reconnaissance flights over the islands. The Greeks didn't challenge them, and the Turks have since stopped, but the situation remains uncomfortable.

The political picture is complicated. The Turks obstinately reject any attempt to link their defense treaties to ATHENS, May 19—The Greek Government recently decided that six American destroyers using home-port facilities near Athens would have to leave and that an American base would have to be virtually closed down. At the same time the Government sought assurances that if Turkey attacked Greek islands in the Aegean Sea, the Americans would intervene.

The contradiction illustrates a central problem for Greece as she evolves a new foreign policy after more than seven years of military rule. The 10-month-old Government of Premier Constantine Caramanlis is widely respected and its problems are widely understood, but with regard to relations with the United States some of the Premier's allies are telling him: "You can't have it both ways."

Mr. Caramanlis withdrew Greek troops from the North Atlantic Treaty Organization during the Cyprus crisis last summer. Faced with the humiliation of the Turkish invasion, he had to do something to salvage Greek pride and strengthen his political position, and in one stroke he managed to undermine much of his leftist opposition.

Now he is pushing hard for Greece's admission to the European Economic Community, which he feels is essential for the country's economic future. He also sees a united Europe as an alternative to the superpowers.

No Love for Kissinger

When he visited Bonn last week to press his case for admission, he was told that if he wanted Europe's help, Europe expected something in exchange: Greece should return to the west. NATO. German Chancellor, Helmut Schmidt, also stressed that strong Europe must maintain close links with the United States.

Athens has berated Washington for helping the Turks and Secretary of State Kissinger is probably the most despised man in Greece. Yet Greek diplomats say that only he can solve the Cyprus problems even suggesting that he produce a specific plan—something he is reluctant to do.

Mr. Caramanlis, who is intent on asserting Greek independence, said in a recent interview that "we speak with the Americans at an equal level." Yet Athens has asked Washington to resume grants of military equipment, a program smacking of a patron-client relationship that had been ended by the military junta.

As for the American military facilities, about 4,000 people in uniform work at seven installations, performing a wide variety of tasks: communications, airplane and ship maintenance, surveillance of Soviet fleet movements, protection of tactical nuclear weapons.

After withdrawing Greek forces from NATO Mr. Caramanlis announced that Greece would close down facilities that did not serve her interests; even his political opponents hailed the move. But when the Greeks took a closer look, they realized that most of the installations did serve their interests.

The Obvious Target

"These facilities are very important and terribly convenient for us, but we can live without them" an American official said. "I doubt whether the Greeks can live without them.

Mr. Caramanlis was determined to do something significant, and the home-port facilities were the obvious target. The most visible program, it gave the Government the most political profit. Since it had been started by the military Government, American officials considered it an embarrassment and were happy to see it go.

But the end of program, coming at a time of rising fuel costs, will hamper the effectiveness of the Sixth Fleet just when Greece wants its protection. Accordingly, the Americans might well be allowed to keep certain ship-repair facilities and to resume liberty visits.

At first the Greeks also wanted the United States to vacate its Athens air base. After hard bargaining they agreed to let the most important facilities remain but insisted that they be merged with the adjoining Greek air base. Other American installations will also be placed under Greek command.

An important factor in the troubled United States-Greek relationship is the post exchange, a large department store in which American military and Government personnel —who make much more money than their Greek counterparts —are able to buy American products at duty-free prices.

The Americans say that if the Greeks want the security of the American military, they must allow the military to support itself. Greeks feel that the PX is an offensive symbol of American superiority and affluence and should be eliminated. The issue remains unresolved.

The Chinese Hands-Off

By PETER LISAGOR

NEWS ANALYSIS

WASHINGTON (CDN) — The mystery surrounding the role of the Chinese Communists in the Mayaguez crisis has been only partially cleared up by U. S. officials.

Secretary of State Henry Kissinger skirted the issue at a press conference Friday, saying the Peking authorities apparently decided upon a course of "formal disassociation form the diplomatic process."

In plainer English, what that meant was that Peking would have nothing to do with the whole affair.

As officials reconstruct the Chinese role, Huang Chen, the chief of the Chinese liason office here, was summoned to the State Dept. by acting Secretary of State Robert S. Ingersoll late last Monday afternoon. Kissinger was in St Louis for a speech at the time.

Ingersoll read a message that President Ford wanted delivered to the Cambodian governemnt, demanding the release of the capture freighter and its crew. Huang declined to accept the message. His explanation for refusing is not known.

Sometime later, the U. S representative in Peking, Ambassador George Bush, called at the Chinese Foreign Ministry and delivered the same message.

Twenty-four hours later, the Chinese rejected the note. Again no explanation for the rejection has been forthcoming.

Bush then went to the Cambodian Embassy in Peking and delivered the message. That is why Kissinger said he was "positive" that contact had been made with Cambodian authorities, presumably in Phnom Penh.

No word has ever been received from the Cambodians, despite several efforts, including a broadcast in the Khmer language on a channel known to be used by the Cambodians, according to U. S. officials.

In his meeting with the press, Kissinger seemed deliberately to gloss over the sequence of events involving the efforts to enlist Chinese help in reaching the Cambodians and possibly influence them.

One reason for this, it is understood, is that presidential press secretary Ron Nessen had mistakenly announced that Huang Chen had accepted the message at the State Dept Monday and returned it 24 hours later.

Kissinger was understood not to want to cause Nessen further embarrassment by revealing the mistake.

Kissinger was asked whether, in view of the "attempts at detente" with Peking, he was dissatisfied with the Chinese behavior

His answer was diffuse and purposely imprecise.

Saying that relationships with "potential adversaries" had to be seen in a more complicated framework than was normally the case, he observed that "certain common interests" outlined in the Shanghai communique issued during former President Nixon's visit to China in 1972 "remain valid."

Both countries have "different perceptions in different areas," and those differences will persist, he said.

He then implied strongly that perhaps the Chinese role had only limited possibilities.

"And finally," he said, "one has to leave it to those countries to play their role, either publicly or privately — if they choose to — that they consider appropriate."

Kissinger obviously wanted to say nothing that might jeopardize U. S. relations with a country Ford plans to visit later this year.

But it was plain that Peking was not about to interpose itself between Washington and Phnom Penh, even as a disinterested transmitter of messages.

MISSILES AND BALALAIKAS— U.S.-SOVIET NAVAL EXCHANGE

BOSTON

For the first time since World War II, U.S. and Russian warships exchanged visits—and the Americans stole the show.

In Leningrad, two U.S. guided-missile ships—the 7,800-ton frigate Leahy and the 4,500-ton destroyer Tattnall—steamed up the Neva River on May 12 in observance of the Allied victory in Europe in 1945.

As soon as the ships were opened to the public, 2,500 Russians shoved aboard, and, disregarding rain and hail, more lined up for a view. They got a thorough tour of the ships, including displays of some of the U.S. Navy's latest antiaircraft missiles.

Here in Boston, the Soviet antisubmarine ships Boykiy and Zhguchiy offered a more guarded look. Missiles were out of sight None of the visible armaments were demonstrated.

Propaganda available. While balalaikas played, Americans were directed to a long table with Communist propaganda pamphlets. The tour ended with a short walk back to the quarter-deck where more pamphlets and books were on display.

A flurry of activity came May 14 When the top U.S. naval officer, Adm James L. Holloway III, Chief of Naval Operations, was aboard the Boykiy, he got word of new action in the Cambodian Communists' seizure of the U.S freighter Mayaguez and hurried back to Washington.

Despite such doings, it was the U.S. guided-missile cruiser Albany nearby that attracted many Bostonians.

Visitors there got a five-minute display of the TALOS missile system in action, plus ship tours and coffee

Observed one American: "The Soviet Navy clearly was under orders to show nothing. The U.S. Navy, equally clearly, had orders to show practically everything—and did."

States cannot be pushed and that the United States is prepared to defend its interests." The case should not be overstated: there is no way of knowing to what extent the Communists' perception of American power and willpower have been affected.

It can be said, as one congressman put it, that the United States isn't really impressing anybody by proving that it can win a test of strength with a primitive, peasant country

But such arguments overlook the essential point—that if in the wake of Vietnam this country had backed off from meeting the challenge of a third-rate nation, what friend or potential adversary would have believed that we would act to protect our interests and those of our allies where the circumstances were more dangerous?

Mayaguez Incident: A Ford Message to Domino Players

BY ERNEST CONINE

It is clear that the Mayaguez incident provided the Ford Administration an excellent, comparatively low-cost opportunity to send a message to the Soviet Union, China, North Korea and the Arabs—notwithstanding the assertion of a top adviser that Ford's overriding concern was safety of the crew and the principle of free navigation.

That message was that neither the undignified retreat from Vietnam nor the isolationist voices in Congress has deprived the President of the power and will to act firmly and decisively when the occasion demands.

Though the point should not be exaggerated, it is of great significance and should be kept in mind during the inevitable politically tinged post mortems.

The White House reported Friday that letters and telegrams were running overwhelmingly in favor of the military rescue operation. There was some grumbling on Capitol Hill that Ford had not fully consulted Congress before taking action. But few Democrats were prepared to make a serious issue of it. The overriding reaction was one of relief that the crewmen were safe, and of praise for the President's handling of the crisis.

With the Presidency at stake in 1976, however, there will be a compulsion among Ford's critics in both parties to do some Monday morning quarterbacking at his expense. They will be joined by colleagues whose political motivation is minimal, but who genuinely wonder if the Administration overreacted.

It is already being said in some quarters that the United States used a sledgehammer to smash a flea. That diplomacy should have been given more time. That the President took a tremendous gamble which could have ended in tragedy if the Khmer Rouge had murdered the crew members instead of ultimately handing them over. That as it is, the United States lost two servicemen and 13 others are missing. That the exercise had the counterproductive effect of further alienating Thailand, from which part of the rescue operation was launched.

These are legitimate questions, but the answers are persuasive.

Start with the fact that the crisis did not begin with a big, bullying United States picking a fight with a small peasant nation. Unless the Administration is guilty of a massive falsehood, the Mayaguez was a merchant ship displaying no hostile intent, and therefore entitled to right of innocent passage. Whether the seizure was ordered by the Cambodian government or was the act of a local commander, it was an outrage. American citizens have a right to expect their government's protection in such circumstances.

The Administration tried diplomacy first—using the good offices of the United Nations, and trying to make representations to the Phnom Penh government through Cambodian diplomats in Peking and through the Chinese government itself. There was no response until the military operation was under way, and even then the Cambodians gave no indication of releasing the crew.

There was a concern, which proved justified, that the Cambodians would move the 39 crew members from the rather isolated island of Koh Tang to the mainland, if the Americans were taken into the interior while diplomatic efforts continued, a military rescue would no longer be a practical matter. The Americans might be killed—or they might be held for months while their captors extracted the maximum degree of humiliation from the U.S. government.

The United States had to apologize to the North Koreans, in effect, to get the crew of the Pueblo back a few years ago. That was a dubious exercise for a great power then; to have done the same thing in the global atmosphere of 1975 could have had damaging, ultimately dangerous consequences.

Whether or not one accepts the domino theory, there is no question that the circumstances surrounding the final collapse of resistance to the Communists in Vietnam brought the reliability of U.S. commitments into question elsewhere in the world.

It wasn't that friendly governments thought that more U.S. military aid would have saved the Saigon regime, or that direct American intervention was called for. The disturbing thing was the atmosphere in the United States, especially in Congress, which seemed to reflect a growing unwillingness to support any meaningful American role in the security of any nation anywhere.

There also was concern that Congress was adopting an obstructionist posture which would cripple the ability of the President to conduct responsible foreign policy.

The shock waves have been greatest in Southeast Asia. Thailand is rushing to accommodate itself to Communist power. So, to a lesser degree, are the Philippines, Singapore, Malaysia and Indonesia. But the effects have also been felt elsewhere.

President Ford and Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger have kept themselves busy in recent weeks assuring leaders of Australia, New Zealand, Japan and South Korea that he has no intention of presiding over withdrawal to a Fortress America.

Newspapers in Western Europe welcome the end of fighting in Vietnam, but expressed concern over the implications for Europe. European governments expressed faith in American commitments to NATO but privately they worried, too.

Meanwhile, there was evidence that the impression of American weakness could produce potentially dangerous effects in the Middle East. Some Arab leaders openly expressed the thesis that, on the basis of what happened in Vietnam, it was obvious that the United States would not stand by Israel in a pinch. Such an assumption, if allowed to stand, tended to make renewal of the Mideast war more tempting.

North Korean leaders recently went to Peking, reportedly to seek backing for an invasion of South Korea.

The Soviet Union, apparently giving first priority to expansion of trade with the West, notably refrained from exploiting the situation. But the experts wondered how long Russian good behavior will last if an impression of weakness continued to emanate from Washington.

In the face of all this, the United States could not allow itself to be put in the position of begging a third-rate country for the release of American victims of an unprovoked act of piracy. To have done so would have tempted other, stronger countries to test the American will in more dangerous ways and places.

On the other hand a military rescue operation could be conducted with comparatively little military or political risk. The island was isolated. Soviet or Chinese intervention could be ruled out.

Even if Thailand's protests over involvement of bases on its territory in the rescue operation were genuine, there was little to be lost. The Thai government has made it clear that it wants the bases phased out anyway.

Finally, it was very doubtful that the operation would constitute any lasting obstacle to an American accommodation with Hanoi and the new Communist regime in Saigon, if such a move is deemed desirable. Even as the military operation was underway, Hanoi Radio announced that the new South Vietnamese government was ready to accept diplomatic relations with the United States.

President Ford decided that the potential gains of a military rescue operation far outweighed the risks. And he was proved right. The ship was recovered. The crewmen were rescued, at a regrettable but comparatively modest loss in U.S. military personnel. And the diplomatic dividends have come pouring in, with praise from Britain, West Germany, Japan, Iran and other quarters.

Kissinger told newsmen Friday the incident "ought to make clear there are limits beyond which the United

NAVY -- CONTINUED

Allied fleets are unable to take up the slack. NATO navies are major elements in European waters. But these nations are short of long-range support ships, limiting their operations in distant areas.

As a result, ranking admirals at the Pentagon are concerned about the Navy's ability to police even the most strategic naval passages of the world, let alone the open seas.

Important "choke points." Specifically, they insist the U.S. would have difficulty controlling some 10 "choke points" vital to defense and international shipping during an emergency.

These passages include the Malacca and Sunda Straits through the East Indies, the Strait of Tsushima between Japan and Korea, the entrance to the Red Sea and the Suez Canal at Aden, Gibraltar at the western end of the Mediterranean Sea, the Baltic exits into the North Sea, the Bosporus between the Black Sea and the Mediterranean, and the ocean passages on either side of Iceland through which Russian ships from the north enter the Atlantic.

Even the Panama Canal is not classed as secure. Soviet submarines based in Cuba could endanger the western approaches, Navy leaders say.

To reverse the trend, the Navy wants to speed up its shipbuilding program.

Aim: 600 vessels. Earlier this year, the House Seapower Subcommittee agreed. It recommended that the U.S. embark on a 32.5-billion-dollar program to build 179 fast and modern vessels in five years, including 115 combat ships. The Subcommittee would also allow Navy shipyards to build new ships instead of just repairing them. The goal is a 600-ship fleet, built around carriers.

The Subcommittee recommended the completion of two more nuclear-powered carriers, sister ships of the recently commissioned U.S.S. Nimitz. These carriers, costing 1.2 billions or more each, would give the Navy four such nuclear ships able to cruise the world at 30-knot speeds indefinitely.

Endorsed as well were six "strike cruisers," each capable of operating without escort vessels in distant waters.

Still in the preliminary design stage, these cruisers would bristle with missiles for both offense and air defense. Surface-to-surface missiles would be able to hit enemy ships hundreds of miles away as well as bombard land targets at equal distances, according to plans. Each ship would carry its own vertical take-off planes or helicopters and have built-in equipment to fight off submarines. Total cost: some 750 million dollars each at present estimate.

Not everyone agrees with such recommendations. Skeptical Congressmen wonder why the Navy can't get along with vessels less costly than the carriers and other elaborate ships. A major debate centers on whether combat ships should be fueled by the atom or oil.

Scare tactics charged. The Navy's critics contend that service chiefs are "crying wolf" about their weaknesses—and Russia's strength—simply to scare Congress into appropriating more money for shipbuilding.

As these analysts see it, present shipbuilding schedules will greatly upgrade the fleet, cutting the average age of surface ships to under 10 years in 1980, compared with 13½ now. New nuclear submarines—about a dozen of which are to be commissioned by 1980—will improve the undersea force.

Some analysts also contend that the strength of the Soviet Navy as a worldwide surface force has been overstated by many. They note that the Russians have only two operational carriers and have concentrated on submarines and missile-armed ships.

U.S. Navy officers reply that the Soviet and U.S. fleets are structured for entirely different missions.

The Soviet Navy, which consists of 221 surface combatants and 235 attack and missile-carrying submarines, is designed to protect the flanks of Moscow's huge Eurasian land mass and to cut the sea lanes of industrial nations.

The U.S. has 164 surface combat ships, including carriers, plus 119 submarines, 41 of which carry ballistic missiles. The Navy's mission is to keep hostilities away from U.S. shores, project U.S. power overseas and guard sea lanes.

That's why the Navy needs more ships, say U.S. admirals. The key to an enlarged fleet, they believe, is the new series of carriers.

Arguments for carriers. Three top commanders—Admiral Holloway; V. Adm. Bill Houser, Deputy Chief of Naval Operations, and R. Adm. M. Staser Holcomb, director of the Navy's Systems Analysis Division—told U.S. News & World Report:

Carriers become especially important as the U.S. loses bases overseas. The admirals maintain that the large carrier is the least vulnerable ship ever built—that it can shrug off multiple missile and torpedo hits, and moves too fast to be hit by land-based missiles.

In the missile age, they assert that planes aboard carriers are basically "reusable missiles" which can attack any number of enemy targets.

Whether or not Congress accepts these arguments and votes funds for more new carriers won't be decided until later this year.

U.S. heading for clash on new pact with Panama

By Richard L. Strout
Staff correspondent of
The Christian Science Monitor
Washington

Another potential "Cambodia" sits on the doorstep of the United States — Panama.

A brand new treaty on the Canal Zone — after 11 years of on-and-off negotiation — waits only final touches, with Sen. Strom Thurmond (R.) of South Carolina already announcing he has votes to defeat it.

Tension mounts in small, proud Panama where riots, Jan. 9 and 10, 1964, caused 24 casualties, and temporary severance of diplomatic relations.

Comming to implementation now is an eight-point preliminary "agreement on principles" signed at Panama Feb. 7, 1974, between Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger and Panama Minister of Foreign Affairs Juan Antonio Tack, promising a new treaty. It incorporates just those points which conservative Senators Thurmond, John L. McClellan, James O. Eastland, Herman E. Talmadge, Barry Goldwater, John Tower, Carl T. Curtis, Paul J. Fannin, Roman L. Hruska, and others to the number of 37 oppose.

A third of the Senate (34) can block a treaty.

Developments seem hurrying the situation to a showdown. Foreign Minister Tack has been here in connection with the Organization of American States (OAS) meeting; diplomatic sources say the treaty issues have been reduced to a few, but vital, decisions. The Rev. Marcos G. McGrath, archbishop of Panama, a strong national advocate for treaty revision, is to hold a press conference here Wednesday.

Sides are being taken and the Women's National Democratic Club, through its board of governors, urges treaty ratification now rather than before the 1976 election.

In the 1964 election, President Johnson [illegible]ended conciliation, candidate Goldwater charged "Uncle Sam has been treated as a weakling — as a spineless pushover — as a symbol of a country that no longer has the will or the nerve to protect its citizens abroad, to defend its honor, to speak up for its principles."

The Hay-Bunau Varillas Treaty of 1904 sliced Panama in two with a 10-mile canal zone, gave the United States powers as "if it were the sovereign of the territory," and extended the treaty "in perpetuity."

"I took the Canal Zone and let Congress debate," Theodore Roosevelt declared after Panama revolted from Colombia.

Despite treaty modificaitons in 70 years, Panama protests "colonial status."

International events accentuate the problem:

— The world is dropping colonialism.

— "Third world" countries show increased militancy, expressed in the United Nations and elsewhere.

— Guerrilla warfare gives small countries a new weapon.

— Natural resources receive higher economic and political pay in the shrinking world and Panama's natural resource is its location and configuration.

The eight-point Kissinger-Tack "agreement on principles" promised, in part: "An entirely new interoceanic canal treaty" (abrogating the 1903 treaty); elimination of the concept of "perpetuity" and substitution of "a fixed termination date;" recognized territorial sovereignty of Panama; continued U.S. "operation, maintenance, protection, and defense of the canal" until the new, fixed-date treaty expired; larger phased participation by Panama in administration, protection, and operation of the canal.

IS U.S. NAVY BIG ENOUGH FOR ITS WORLDWIDE JOB?

From the Cambodia incident came honors for the fleet. But warnings are flying that, as powerful as the Navy seems, it is stretched mighty thin.

The U.S. Navy came out of the Mayaguez crisis with mixed feelings.

First—tremendous pride that it was able to play a helpful role—along with the Marines and the Air Force—in the rescue of the U.S. merchantman and its crew.

Second—concern that the drama left the impression that the U.S. Navy is able to dominate the seas at will.

The fact is, the Navy is worried about its strength, especially about how fast its stretched-thin fleets could bring power to bear in a more extensive emergency.

Time factor. Even in the relatively small-scale operation in mid-May, it took the carrier Coral Sea task force, then half way between Australia and the Philippines, two days to steam to the scene. The destroyer-escort Holt, in the area first, was unable to take much action until the carrier force drew nearer.

This drove home a point naval leaders have been making since before the end of the Vietnam War: As strong as the U.S. Navy is, it isn't powerful enough to patrol the world in defense of American interests and commitments.

Top officers are warning that the service is virtually a one-ocean fleet. Adm. James L. Holloway III, Chief of Naval Operations, told U.S.News & World Report that in case of simultaneous crises in the Far East and Europe, the Navy could adequately defend water routes in only one area.

The peacetime burden will grow even greater for the Navy as the U.S. is pushed out of bases in foreign lands. If Thailand, Spain, the Philippines and Turkey force the U.S. from their soil, the Navy expects to be required to take up additional burdens in those areas.

As things stand today:

- Numbers of ships are the main problem. In just six years, the U.S. fleet has dwindled from 976 ships to slightly fewer than 500, the least since 1939. That is 100 short of the number the Navy believes to be the absolute minimum to maintain an effective presence in two oceans.
- The key ships used to project U.S. power abroad—aircraft carriers—are scheduled to drop from 15 to 13 by the end of June. The number of amphibious assault ships has shriveled from 157 in 1968 to 66. In the same period, destroyers and frigates declined in number from 240 to 90.
- A rebuilding program, now under way, is likely to take considerable time. By law, new warships must be built in private shipyards, but these yards have been turning increasingly to construction of more profitable merchant ships.

As a result, most warship construction is concentrated in just three yards—and these yards are short an estimated 7,000 or more skilled workers. For these and other reasons, warships are rarely delivered on time. Some have been as much as 44 months behind schedule.

Detente: Past and Future

By Robert Kleiman

A French word with a double meaning is the central subject as the American and Russian foreign ministers meet in neutral Austria today. Détente not only means relaxation of tension; Harrap's dictionary also translates it as "trigger (of pistol, rifle, etc.)." Whether détente will lead to peace or end by triggering new conflicts is the overwhelming question that faces the post-Vietnam world.

Despite four Soviet-American summit meetings in thirty months, détente clearly is in trouble. A fifth summit is being delayed. Secretary Kissinger and Foreign Minister Gromyko in Vienna say they want détente to continue. But are their aims the same? The United States hopes for a more stable world. The Soviet objective is "peaceful coexistence," which is something else again.

A visitor to Moscow gets the impression that the Kremlin wants stability at present in Central Europe and on its China border, but elsewhere favors change—without war. The crumbling of Western positions from Indochina through the Mediterranean to the Middle East since 1973—with Soviet arms aid, Soviet diplomacy or Soviet-oriented Communist parties often involved—is seen as reinforcing a shift in the world balance of power favorable to Soviet interests.

This rapid change in the "correlation of forces" abroad, accompanied by economic crisis in the West, could boomerang and endanger détente, Moscow acknowledges. But the opportunities opened by the decline of American influence are tempting, particularly in the countries along Europe's southern littoral, such as Portugal.

Portugal's Communist leader, Alvaro Cunhal, with less than 13 per cent of the vote, has been able over the past year gradually to seize most of the key levers of power—in the media, unions, municipalities, government and Army—in alliance with a radical minority of officers of the Armed Forces Movement. This trend has been little altered by last month's election which gave 63 per cent of the vote to the Socialists and the center-left Popular Democrats.

Many West Europeans now see Portugal as a test case of détente. Even French Socialist leader François Mitterand, himself allied electorally with the Communists, sees Portugal more as a Soviet than as a local affair. He describes it to visitors as the first Soviet effort in a quarter-century to upset the status quo in Western Europe, taking over a NATO country through a left military dictatorship.

Mr. Mitterand was reinforced in that judgment when the Soviet Ambassador in Paris asked to call on him in March. The Russian delivered what Mr. Mitterand took to be a scarcely-veiled warning to halt the very limited aid and advice the French and other social democratic parties of West Europe were giving to Portugal's Socialists.

But, at the same time, the Portuguese Communist party's cars, trucks, offices, publications and estimated thousands of union organizers and other paid employes are believed by Western analysts to be financed largely by the Soviet Union at a cost of $10 million a month. A Soviet Embassy of 80, Lisbon's largest and most active, and a half-dozen known K. G. B. agents are said to provide further assistance.

The Soviet role in Portugal, the Mideast and Vietnam has usually been minimized in the past. "You give us too much credit," a top Soviet diplomat commented wryly only last month. But there was a different response last week after Mr. Kissinger's speech warning that the new trend in Soviet-American relations would be jeopardized if Moscow turned détente into "a formula for more selective exploitation of opportunities."

Two days later, Mr. Gromyko made an almost open defense of "selective détente." He attributed the "great victory" in Vietnam "to a very large extent" to the aid of the Warsaw Pact countries; he ridiculed Mr. Kissinger's abortive effort at a step-by-step settlement in the Mideast as "step-by-step away from settlement"; he described the left swing in Portugal as a result of Soviet détente policy.

Is détente then a total illusion? Is peaceful coexistence the continuation of the Cold War by other means?

The visitor to Moscow finds some Communist theorists asking whether inflation, recession, unemployment and the defeats of "American imperialism" have brought the West to "the general (i.e. final) crisis of capitalism" predicted by Lenin. There is no firm answer, but there is recollection that the last time this prospect arose, in the 1930's, it was not Communism but Fascism that took over and the Soviet Union lost more than 15 million lives.

Alongside Soviet-American rivalries in many areas, there also are common interests in preventing nuclear war, in avoiding other dangerous superpower confrontations (as in the Middle East). Odds still favor a 35-nation summit conference on European security and a Ford-Brezhnev SALT II agreement before the Soviet Communist Congress next February when Brezhnev may retire.

The nuclear era condemns the United States and the Soviet Union to coexistence, despite their ideological dispute. There is no alternative worth considering.

Robert Kleiman of The Times Editorial Board recently visited Moscow, Lisbon and the major West European capitals.

LAOS: THE LAST DOMINO IN INDO-CHINA FALLS

Communist domination of Southeast Asia continues to spread. Wendell S. Merick of the magazine's International Staff cabled this dispatch.

VIENTIANE

Here in the remote land-locked kingdom of Laos, the Communists have just wrapped up their conquest of Indo-China.

With North and South Vietnam as well as Cambodia already in Communist hands, leaders in Hanoi are on the way to achieving a decades-old goal of their late President, Ho Chi Minh, who died in 1969: to bring the entire region under North Vietnamese influence, if not outright control.

In sharp contrast to North Vietnam's overthrow of Saigon and the military victory of Hanoi-supported rebels in Cambodia, the take-over here has been relatively peaceful.

But it is just as decisive as Communist successes in Saigon and Phompenh.

The neutralist Premier, Prince Souvanna Phouma, seemed powerless in the face of Pathet Lao determination.

Sudden change. Despite Communist advances in neighboring South Vietnam and Cambodia, it appeared as late as mid-April that the shaky, two-year-old cease-fire between loyalist Government forces and Pathet Lao troops would hold. The 12-member coalition Cabinet—composed of 5 so-called rightists from the Vientiane Government side, 5 Pathet Lao and 2 neutralists—was under strain but hanging together.

Then the bottom began falling out. Cambodia surrendered to the Communist Khmer Rouge on April 17, and South Vietnam went under on April 30. Pathet Lao forces—already holding about two thirds of the land and one third of the 3 million population—mounted a series of attacks against Government troops. A prominent rightist politician was assassinated. Leftist students attacked the U.S. Embassy in Vientiane.

Finally, the rightist faction within the Cabinet collapsed. Four of the ministers resigned. Other high-ranking non-Communist officials and military commanders also quit and either fled into Thailand or pledged their loyalty to the Communist-dominated Government.

Among those who escaped to Thailand was Gen. Vang Pao, leader of the army of Meo tribesmen which had fought on the Government's side in the long war against Pathet Lao and North Vietnamese troops. Pao's force, known as the "secret army," was armed, trained and financed by the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency.

By the time the dust of the exodus had settled, Laos belonged to the Pathet Lao, even though they retained the facade of a coalition Government.

U.S. officials in Vientiane, maintaining a low profile, made little or no effort to slow the Pathet Lao's bloodless coup. They wanted to avoid a repetition of the hurried air evacuation of American citizens that marked the U.S. pullout from Cambodia and South Vietnam and were confident it would not be necessary.

"Unlike those two countries," one American said, "the 'other side' already is here mingling with us. There won't be that dramatic a change in Laos."

Nevertheless, the Embassy circulated a handbook of emergency evacuation instructions entitled "Bend With the Wind" and began in mid-May a quiet thinning out of about 1,000 Americans in the country.

Evacuation plans took on sudden urgency on May 14 when anti-American riots broke out in the royal capital of Luang Prabang, about 155 miles north of Vientiane, and at Savannakhet, 200 miles to the southeast.

Student-led mobs, who were protesting high prices and American aid to Laos, vandalized offices of the U.S. Agency for International Development and the U.S. Information Service in Savannakhet, student demonstrators seized three American AID officials.

Ascendency of the Communists to power came as no surprise to most foreign experts. Laos had been battered by an on-again, off-again civil war ever since 1953. For a time, there was hope that the cease-fire of February, 1973, and the coalition Government formed in April, 1974, would keep the country at peace, even though similar coalitions in 1957 and 1962 had soon fallen apart.

But gradually it became apparent that the country could not survive its divided state or increasing pressures from the North Vietnamese in Hanoi.

Common hatred. Like the Cambodians, the Laotians have a deep-rooted hatred for Vietnamese, based on centuries of conflict between the two peoples. Many analysts are convinced, however, that North Vietnam—as its price for boosting Communist Laotians to power—is stage-managing every move made by the Pathet Lao with orders relayed from Hanoi through the Pathet Lao "capital" at Samneua in northeast Laos.

This means that in the space of a little more than one month, Hanoi has emerged as the dominant power in Southeast Asia and as the overlord of all Indo-China.

Q What about talk in Congress about the U.S. pulling back on some of its overseas obligations?

A I think that if one examines the reactions on the Hill, that they are not in the direction of isolationism by and large. It is a scrutiny of what are regarded as unwise commitments.

Most of the reactions are strongly in support of NATO, our commitments to Western Europe. There is a recognition that the United States has a major role to play in the Middle East. I have heard of no suggestions that the United States cease its support of Japan or withdraw from its involvement with Australia and New Zealand.

Undoubtedly there is a difference between the tone of today's discussions and the general post-World War II reaction in which the United States felt itself engaged in the world up to the hilt. We are going to be more selective, but that is not neo-isolationism.

Q Then you don't feel that the average American wants his country to pull into a shell—

A Not at all. If one examines reactions of the general public, it is plain that most people—in contrast to some so-called leadership groups—feel the United States must remain a very strong military power, second to none. They support a defense budget of the present size or larger.

Q What "leadership groups" are you talking about?

A I mean individuals who have been polled in business, education and communications.

Q The establishment—

A It's a peculiar kind of establishment. It's an antiestablishment establishment.

These groups have certain aspirations with regard to what the United States should accomplish in the world. But they raise questions about whether it's appropriate to have the means to achieve those objectives. They suffer from the illusion that, having discovered some of the inadequacies of a position of strength, that this will be compensated for by a position of weakness.

They're just totally wrong, and it is not an illusion shared by the general public.

Q Will voters support increased military spending?

A I think they will. We must recognize that at this point we have a smaller percentage of men under arms than we had in the rather carefree demobilization period after World War II. The proportion of our public expenditures going for defense is the lowest since before Pearl Harbor.

I do not think that it is all that difficult to convey to the U.S. public that a military equilibrium underlies détente. After all, it is implicit in the American emblem, in which the eagle holds in one talon an olive branch and in the other talon a clutch of arrows.

Military strength and peace go together. The abandonment of one will ultimately result in the loss of the other.

is something that disappeared with the growth of Soviet military capability in recent years. At this stage of the game the European nations must take defense very seriously. They cannot be driven primarily by domestic political or budgetary considerations.

Q. What leverage does the U.S. have—aside from the threat to reduce forces—to persuade Europeans to spend more on their own defense?

A. The problem one faces is that the Europeans are more likely to move toward an accommodation with the Soviets in the event of an American withdrawal—particularly an American withdrawal that has the symbolic significance that it might have in the wake of Vietnam. Our point should be that we are prepared to keep our forces there, depending on European actions and a European sense of responsibility.

Q. What are the chances of persuading NATO countries to increase their armed forces?

A. The real question is: Are they prepared to make additional sacrifices to the extent necessary to maintain the military security of Western Europe?

That is a question that can be answered differently for the several nations. Some of them have made major contributions and have expanded their military strength markedly in recent years. Others have come to believe that it's all over in the wake of détente, and that they're more or less free to lose interest in maintaining military capabilities.

We think these countries should be prepared to spend more than 3 per cent of their gross national product in order to obtain security and retain independence. If they're not willing to spend more than 3 per cent of their GNP, there is some question about how serious they are.

WEAKENING OF NATO'S FLANKS—

Q. Mr. Schlesinger, how can NATO function now that one member—Portugal—has Communists in its Government?

A. Undoubtedly some of the developments on both the eastern and western ends of the Mediterranean have diminished the cohesion of NATO. The United States cannot provide its most intimate plans and secrets when there are Communists present in any planning meeting.

Q. Turning to the Middle East: Have the dangers of war in this area receded?

A. Not notably. There have been periods of greater immediate tension than the present one, but I would not say that generally the prospects of war have receded. I do think that all parties in the Middle East recognize the advantages of avoiding a new conflagration.

Q. Do the Israelis have the equipment they need to withstand another Arab attack?

A. At the present moment, the military balance is far more favorable from Israel's standpoint than it was in October, 1973.

Q. Would the U.S. be able to resupply the Israelis fast enough in event of war, despite the possible loss of plane-refueling stations such as the Azores?

A. Yes. Assuming there is a policy decision to do it and Congress votes the funds, we are capable of starting to deliver supplies into Israel about 36 hours after an order is given by the President.

Q. In view of congressional caution after Vietnam, what are the prospects of continued help for Israel?

A. The historical attitudes of Congress toward requests for Vietnam and Israel are as different as night and day. Congress has shown signs of approving any requests made by the Administration—and, in fact, some propensity to augment requests of some Administrations—for aid to Israel.

Q. If another Mideast war breaks out, is there anything the U.S. could do about another Arab oil embargo?

A. The United States could, of course, take action in response to a hypothetical embargo. And I think that we are less likely to be tolerant of a renewed embargo than we were of the initial one in 1973.

Q. What do you mean by "less tolerant"?

A. That implies that we might not remain entirely passive to the imposition of such an embargo. I'm not going to indicate any prospective reaction other than to point out there are economic, political or conceivably military measures in response.

Q. With reopening of the Suez Canal, do you expect a major Soviet naval build-up in the Indian Ocean?

A. I would expect that the Soviet presence in the Indian Ocean will expand. Reopening of the Canal reduces their lines of communication by something like 6,500 miles, and that would undoubtedly have some effect.

The Soviets are building a major facility at Berbera on the Gulf of Aden—so expensive a facility that it's obviously not intended purely for show purposes or designed to provide a demonstration project for the Somalis.

Q. What sort of installation is it?

A. It consists of port facilities, an expanded airstrip. They are constructing barracks. They are building a rework facility for either air-to-surface missiles or surface-to-surface missiles. That kind of expansion suggests that they are more than mildly interested in their military power astride the lifeline of the industrialized world to the Persian Gulf. I don't think there's any other reading.

Q. How will the United States respond?

A. We will have to maintain a military balance and be prepared to offset any expansion of Soviet military or naval capacity in the Persian Gulf area.

We still have our request for expansion of our communications facility at Diego Garcia. We would plan to enlarge that facility, increase the size of the airstrip, provide berthing facilities to the extent necessary.

MIDEAST: "U.S. HAS TO HOLD THE RING"—

Q. Then the U.S. is still determined to keep a strong force in the Mideast—

A. I think that the United States has got to hold the ring in the Middle East. There's just nobody else who can stand up to the Soviet Union. Some Americans want to go off in a sulk for five years. But if we do, we'll wake up some bright day and discover that the Soviets have achieved paramount power in the Eastern Hemisphere. We just are not in a position to indulge in that luxury.

Q. How does the United States stand in relation to the Soviet Union in terms of military strength?

A. The military balance between ourselves and the Soviet Union is a product of long-term trends. Quite obviously, if Soviet strength goes on growing by 3 to 5 per cent a year in real terms and the United States continues to shrink in military power, we will not be able to say for much longer that the United States is second to none.

Q. How much is Russia spending on its armed forces?

A. At this point they are outspending us by at least 20 to 25 per cent. One can live with a gap between ourselves and the Soviets as long as it remains modest and as long as our allies make serious contributions to mutual security. We do not have to compete with them in any particular fiscal year.

But what we cannot accept—what we cannot live with—is the trend of recent years in which the Soviets continue to increase strength while the United States continues to shrink. We cannot live with that over many years and maintain a military balance which will preclude Soviet preponderance in the Eastern Hemisphere.

Q. Wasn't détente supposed to be a "live and let live" arrangement that would avoid more military build-ups?

A. The Soviets do not use the term "détente." They use the term "peaceful coexistence," which is a phrase coined by Lenin and employed by Stalin. The Soviets see détente as a way to avoid the risk of war and expand their power relative to their former opponents. As long as they believe they can have things both ways, there will be no internal struggle over détente in the Soviet Union.

In the long run, the United States cannot accept an interpretation of détente that implies an ever-strengthening of the correlation of forces in favor of the Soviet Union. I think the Soviets will have to come closer to the view of détente as "live and let live."

A RETURN TO ISOLATIONISM? "NO"—

Q. Is the isolationist trend in this country growing?

A. No. I come to a different conclusion. I don't think that the neo-isolationist tendencies are indeed that strong. I think that everybody recognizes that the United States is in no position now to return to the kind of international policies we followed in the 1930s—that the rest of the world depends upon the very great counterweight to Soviet military strength that is represented by American power.

cation—than it does under conditions such as those which existed in Vietnam.

If the interests of the United States are openly and clearly attacked, I think that the response of the American public will be to fulfill the obligations into which we have entered. By contrast, I think the expression "No more Vietnams" refers to getting involved in what is perceived to be unclear and ambiguous internal turmoil—supposedly a civil war—which the Vietnam conflict seemed to be for so many years.

Q. Are the Russians likely to try exploiting the situation today in the wake of the collapse in Indo-China?

A. I think that the Soviets will be concerned that one of the reactions to events in Southeast Asia will be a weakening of forces in the United States supporting detente. For that reason, they will have good reasons not to rock the boat too soon. They may feel tempted, but they may decide this is not the time to give way to that temptation.

One must recognize that the Soviets look primarily at the realities of power—what they refer to as the "correlation of forces." They regard detente as a consequence of a shift of forces to the advantage of the Soviet Union. Their view is that the West is making accommodation to the expansion of Soviet military power. In the longer run, unless we are prepared to maintain a military balance vis-a-vis the Soviet Union, they will be inclined to take advantage of that shift.

Q. Returning to Asia: What changes do you see now in our defense posture in that region?

A. It depends in part on how the new governments in Cambodia and South Vietnam comport themselves. It depends also on the longer-term reactions of the American public, which are too early to assess.

Generally speaking, I think the United States will be less eager to involve itself in confusing domestic political and military turmoil on the Asian continent. But in all likelihood the U.S. commitments to Northeast Asia, to Korea as well as to Japan, will be perceived as something no one should challenge.

Q. Does that include Taiwan?

A. As long as we are bound by the treaty, of course, it would include Taiwan.

Q. Is there a danger that North Korea will be tempted to start trouble in hopes that Congress would force withdrawal of U.S. troops rather than involve them in a war?

A. I think that precipitating a crisis with the United States in this particular period would be a very rash action to take, especially where there are U.S. forces present. We have upwards of 40,000 men in South Korea.

South Korea guards the approaches to Japan. It lies in a confluence of four great powers—the U.S., the U.S.S.R., China and Japan. Also, it represents a historic involvement and commitment by the United States.

Any sudden weakening of that commitment—particularly after Vietnam—would be of such major significance that it could unravel the situation in Asia and possibly elsewhere.

Q. Are you saying that the U.S. would resort to drastic action if South Korea were invaded?

A. I wouldn't refer to "drastic action." But one of the lessons of the Vietnamese conflict is that rather than simply counter your opponent's thrusts, it is necessary to go for the heart of the opponent's power: destroy his military forces rather than simply being involved endlessly in ancillary military operations.

Q. Then North Korea would have to assume that the U.S. would strike back hard if South Korea were invaded—

A. I think they would have to conclude that the United States would take more-vigorous action than we were inclined to take during much of the Vietnamese War.

The main point is that a conflict that extends for 10 years—or even over many years, as Vietnam did—is bound to lose the support of the American public. Therefore, action must be more vigorous at the outset, particularly where there are American forces involved.

Q. So the U.S. wouldn't feel the same constraints to avoid heavy bombing, blockades and that sort of thing in Korea that we felt in Vietnam—

A. I would doubt it.

Q. What about fear of China's intervening?

A. I think the Chinese would attempt to avoid any such conflict, or to damp it down if it should get started in a small way, rather than to encourage or reinforce it.

Q. Mr. Secretary, who do you think gains from the Communist victory in Indo-China?

A. Hanoi gains, the Soviet Union probably gains—and China loses to the extent that the other two gain.

Q. Why do you say China loses and Russia gains?

A. There continues to be substantial tension between the Soviets and the Chinese. The Chinese now have a strong military state to their southeast, more closely associated with the Soviet Union than with China. To that extent, China's position is weakened.

Q. Does this mean China will become even more interested in cementing relations with the U.S.?

A. I think that China's interest in maintaining reasonably warm relations with the United States continues. They will be concerned to maintain such connections if they have confidence that the United States is not suddenly going to withdraw from the Western Pacific.

Q. Do you mean that the Chinese, who for years have tried to drive the U.S. out of the Western Pacific, now are bent on keeping us there?

A. I think that is correct. The Chinese no longer regard the Americans as the principal threat to their survival but as a useful balance against the Soviets.

Q. Will the Vietnamese allow the Soviet Union to establish naval bases in their country?

A. Given the attitude of the North Vietnamese Communists, I think this is not the moment in history when they are likely to encourage the establishment of foreign bases on Vietnamese soil.

Q. Does the United States want Japan to spend more money on defense instead of relying so much on American forces?

A. We would expect the Japanese to take seriously their role in the common defense. That includes particular emphasis on antisubmarine warfare, protection of lines of communication, air defense and the like. To the extent that this effort has been less vigorous in recent years than had been anticipated, we would expect a renewed emphasis.

Q. Switching to another part of the world: What is the impact of the Indo-China debacle in Western Europe?

A. The Western Europeans are much less concerned about Vietnam than the effect of the psychological repercussions within the United States—the self-confidence and ability of this country to carry on as leader of the free world.

Q. Will there be less pressure now in Congress to pull American troops out of Europe?

A. I hope it will not be a major issue this year. Somebody, of course, will raise it. But I think the general reaction will be that this is not the time to seem to be going back on American commitments. People who in the past have questioned the size of American forces in Western Europe will not be inclined to raise the question this year for fear that it will be misread.

The United States should maintain its forces in Europe and even be prepared to make some contributions to increase capability on the part of the NATO Alliance, provided that the European nations do their part.

EUROPE'S "FREE RIDE" ON DEFENSE—

Q. On the other side of the coin, have U.S. allies learned any lessons from Vietnam?

A. If our allies have learned a lesson, it's that the United States cannot do it by itself—that our allies must be at least equally serious about their responsibilities to themselves. That will be a very valuable lesson learned.

When we talk about credibility, one must remember that the credibility of the United States is not the only question. In the case of Western Europe, a number of the nations over there have enjoyed American protection and have felt they have had virtually a free ride with regard to their own defenses. It's less of an issue of whether the United States is inclined to abandon Europe than whether the Europeans are inclined to abandon themselves.

Q. What would you like them to do?

A. The propensity has existed in Western Europe to base their defense budgets on hope, on illusion, on the prospects of arms reductions by the East. Many of them have wanted to cut their defense expenditures to respond to various naive impulses within their electorates. That trend will have to be curbed.

The assumption that U.S. protection in and of itself relieves some European states of building forces in their own behalf

NOW— A TOUGHER U.S.

Interview With James R. Schlesinger, Secretary of Defense

Impact of Indo-China's fall is reshaping U.S. attitudes. Mideast, Russia, China, Europe all will be affected. Mr. Schlesinger came to this magazine's conference room to offer an assessment of what lies ahead for America.

Q Mr. Secretary, why did we take such tough action in dealing with the seizure of the American freighter Mayaguez by the Cambodians?

A American action must be firm when necessary and when important issues of principle are involved. In this case we were faced with a crude and illegal act of force.

American action was necessary not only to protect freedom of the seas and of innocent passage—long-term American objectives; more importantly, for the United States to countenance such an act or to have yielded to an illegal employment of force would have encouraged additional acts of hijacking or terrorism in the future.

Q Aside from the ship incident, is there a danger that the U.S. is losing prestige and power in the world as a result of our forced retreat from Indo-China?

A In terms of military balance in the world, Indo-China has had a relatively limited effect.

However, I do believe that the stature of the U.S. has been diminished at least temporarily, by what's happened in Southeast Asia. In terms of the way the United States is viewed around the world, it has affected what is sometimes referred to as the credibility of the United States. An historical episode of the Vietnam sort, involving a great power like the United States inevitably raises questions in the minds of some that have a detrimental influence on our world standing.

Q How long will these doubts about U.S. power last?

A It depends on the actions we take from this point out. It depends on how well we live up to other commitments, what we do about deployment of our forces overseas, what we do about the defense budget—the general cohesion that the United States exhibits. These other factors will perhaps be more significant than the Vietnam episode itself.

Q Are Americans losing their will to be world leaders?

A The real problem we face is what is happening to the moral stamina of the West, and in particular to Western leadership groups. That is not a problem confined to the United States. There is some tendency among our fashionable classes, first, to raise questions about whether power in itself is not immoral and, secondly, whether it is appropriate to fight for the values of the West—whether those values are even defensible.

So I think that our basic problem as a nation is not our physical strength or our stance. It is a question of reviving the underlying moral stamina and the internal fiber of this nation, as well as of other free-world nations.

Q How can the U.S. go about increasing its credibility?

A I think that we should act with sobriety and seriousness in the wake of Vietnam. We should demonstrate that the United States will continue to act with self-confidence, that it will not give way to an extended period of internal and destructive debate. Our energies should continue to be exerted in the outside world in a productive way from our own standpoint and the standpoint of our allies.

Q President Ford says the United States should stand by its commitments, but Congress says, "No more Vietnams." Who will prevail?

A The main point is that the United States fares far better under situations in which there is an unambiguous assault—an unprovoked aggression, an attack across a line of demar-

MAJOR POINTS MADE BY THE DEFENSE CHIEF

Vietnam impact: "Relatively limited" in terms of the world's military balance, but U.S. credibility "has been diminished, at least temporarily."

Role in Asia: U.S. will be "less eager to involve itself in domestic turmoil" but will probably live up to commitments to Northeast Asia.

North Korea: If North Korea "precipitates a crisis" in South Korea, "the United States would take more-vigorous action than . . . during much of the Vietnam War."

Soviet reaction: Russia's interest in preserving détente will, in the short run, keep them from exploiting the collapse in Indo-China.

China's reaction: Hanoi's close ties to Russia make China more interested in "maintaining reasonably warm relations with the United States" and in keeping the U.S. from withdrawing from the Western Pacific.

Arab oil embargo: The U.S. is "less likely to be tolerant of a renewed embargo" than in 1973. "There are economic, political or conceivably military measures in response."

Communists in Portugal: "The United States cannot provide its most intimate plans and secrets" in NATO planning meetings "when there are Communists present."

Indian Ocean: Reopening of the Suez Canal will speed expansion of "the Soviet presence in the Indian Ocean. . . . We will have to offset any expansion of Soviet military or naval capacity in the Persian Gulf."

U.S.-Soviet balance: "We cannot live with the trend of recent years in which the Soviets continue to increase strength while the United States continues to shrink."

Korean Dilemma

A redoubled case of war jitters has seized South Korea since the final Communist victories in Indochina. The official feeling in Seoul is that the triple blow to American prestige in Southeast Asia might inspire a new test of our determination, in the form of a fresh military adventure by Communist North Korea.

It is not an unreasonable fear, especially since Pyongyang's bag of tricks includes the capability for subversion and the infiltration of guerrillas as well as the means to wage a more risky conventional war recalling the 1950-53 conflict. No one can predict at this point what methods Kim Il Sung is prepared to follow in his "struggle for national reunification," despite his recent emphasis on propaganda and his endorsement of "peaceful means."

So there is a dreary logic in South Korean President Park's promulgation of yet another emergency decree — the ninth in a little more than a year — spelling out more curtailments of political liberty in the interest of facing the menace from the north. The order, prescribing severe penalties for criticizing the constitution and banning student political activities, apparently supersedes a government bid for bipartisan support of security measures.

South Korea may indeed face perilous times. But Park is grappling with a dilemma, largely of his own making, in meeting the danger. His past repression of dissent has eroded support of his regime at home and abroad, undermining national unity against the Communist threat. A further crackdown on the political opposition and free expression will not help.

The United States, meanwhile, is stuck with the unpleasantness of bolstering a democratically tainted ally who, like President Thieu of the ill-fated Saigon regime, is in danger of a ruinous loss of support by America's people and Congress. South Korea's security is based in part on the maintenance there of a 38,000-member American military force, inheritors of the United Nations mantle under which the 1950 invasion was fought off. The U.S. troops could mean the difference between war and continued truce on the peninsula; their presence between Seoul and the demarcation line is a possible deterrent to the Korean Communists, not just militarily but because North Korea's Soviet and Chinese allies seek detente with this country.

America's security interests in East Asia — most immediately the defense perimeter of Japan — include a firmly non-Communist South Korea. There is no doubt that South Koreans overwhelmingly prefer to stay outside the Communist orbit. It will be tragic if the cause is hurt by the Park government's inability to maintain a semblance of democratic respectability.

NEW ORLEANS TIMES-PICAYUNE 13 May 1975 (20)

Indochina: Three Down

With the effective ouster of the rightist representatives in Laos' coalition government and neutralist Premier Souvanna Phouma's broadcast announcement that "We must stop the fighting; the war has reached an end," the fall of what the West, viewing the world through the old colonial pattern, calls Indochina seems complete. Curiously, the sequence has not been at all that predicted — or feared — by Westerners: Laos, Vietnam, then, if ever, Cambodia. It came: Cambodia, Vietnam and Laos.

These were the three key dominoes of the domino theory. The rest can be named ad infinitum — Thailand, Burma, Malaysia, Singapore, India and on, island-hopping in the South Pacific and the China Seas.

But the instructive aspect of the progressive collapse of the Indochinese states is that each collapsed in its own way and each seems determined to stand back up its own way. The other dominoes are likewise individual states with their own problems and strengths.

Vietnam, the big frog in that small pond, has the strongest chance, judged by modern standards of statehood. It has an industrial base in the north, an agricultural base in the south, and a well trained and capable political leadership. Cambodia apparently is going to try a communized return to a traditional self-centered agricultural society. What Laos will do remains to be seen — as does whether Vietnam, which had its fingers in all the Indochinese wars, will now try to absorb Laos and Cambodia itself.

Those who argued against American involvement in the Southeast Asian ferment predicted that a Communist Vietnam under Ho Chi Minh would have been an Asian Yugoslavia — an independent variable rather than an extension of a Communist monolith. The early behavior of Ho's heirs seems to be bearing this out, though it may be that the Hanoi leadership will show itself as factionalized as has the seemingly monolithic Red Chinese leadership.

Judging Southeast Asia by our ideals of individual freedom and representative democracy, we must deplore the imposition of tyranny on the people there. But whether it will have a great effect on the worldwide struggle of the extreme left on one side and the rest of the political spectrum on the other must await fuller development of the new situation.

CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Hard questions remain

WASHINGTON — Now that some of the initial tumult of our hasty exit from Southeast Asia has died down and the remaining friendly governments in that part of the world commence the painful analysis of whether their national interests are best served by remaining aligned with the non-Communist West, we have some analyzing of our own to do.

Most public figures commenting on the shambles of our Far East policy utter euphemisms about "not looking back," but these rationalizations ignore the utility of history. If we can't learn anything from the past we must stumble into the future ignorant and vulnerable.

American influence has been displaced by Soviet and Chinese power in an area containing 58 per cent of the world's population. There is little solace in the cliche about America's inability to be policeman for the world. Hard questions remain unanswered, and Congress, now a full partner in foreign policy with the executive, must start formulating some answers.

What shall America's role be in the world? Is the doctrine of collective security too demanding, or is it irrelevant? Are we still the leader of the free world, or, like Great Britain after World War II, are we exhausted from the burdens of world leadership? Do we have any responsibilities to protect freedom beyond our shores? A former President once asked, "Can we ever be left in peace if we do not actively assume the burden of keeping the peace?"

World stability is not effortlessly obtained or painlessly maintained. Unless we begin to at least ask these questions we will never seek the answers upon which so very much depends.

The 'Hebert Memorial'

It has become fashionable to assert that government is functioning as efficiently as an outboard motor on the Queen Elizabeth II, and that the bureaucracy knows neither the day nor the hour. It is a pernicious attitude but one, unhappily, of substance. Watergate is cited as a coalescent on this outlook. Here's a less portentous example and one closer to home.

Public Law 92-426 was passed by Congress in 1972, providing for a "Uniformed Services University of the Health Sciences" — in lay terms, a military medical school — to be built on the grounds of Bethesda Naval Hospital.

More precisely, the embryonic facility should be called (and probably will be one of these days) the F. Edward Hebert Memorial Medical School. Hebert nutured the concept for 25 years as he worked his way up from congressional obscurity to the chairmanship of the House Armed Services Committee. That ascension was in 1971; within a single year, Hebert had brought committee members to see the merit of his idea and it became law. One member of Congress who opposed the Hebert baby on the House floor recalls the puissant chairman's unsubtle comment: "Remember, the Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away — and I'm the Lord here." Hebert, you may recall, was rudely deposed as chairman some months back. But his pet project lives on.

The Pentagon never requested such a medical facility. The American Medical Association did not want the school in 1972, does not want it now. Skeptics might argue that is reason to support the facility, but we think not. Bids are to be opened shortly for construction of the first structure for the complex, a $15 million science building; there is a request in the pending federal budget for $72.3 million in additional tax money for the school.

Just the other day, however, the Defense Manpower Commission urged that the entire project be scrapped, scuttled, forgotten. The panel offered cogent reasons: Cost per graduate is likely to reach $200,000, or five times the cost of securing military doctors by giving them scholarships to civilian medical schools in return for service; cost of the university itself, the study commission said, has swollen to more than double the anticipated $100 million.

Buttressed by that report and with the inital contract not yet let, one might expect a zephyr of reaction from Capitol Hill. There may be a press release or two in the mail but that will be about all. Why? Simple — that's not the way the game is played. A spokesman for one member of Congress who, in charity we shall not name, conceded that his boss was rigidly opposed to the medical facility. "But it might be interpreted that we were being vindictive toward Hebert if we were to come out against it now." Beautiful. The same sentiment was paraphrased from a few other congressional offices.

There is a worrisome shortage of physicians available for the military; few question that. But with an entering class of 150 students — to be enrolled by fall under the law — and with the additional mission of Hebert U. to train dentists, pharmacists and other medical personnel for the military, it is absurd to think the institution will ever make more than a dent in the physician shortage, now approaching 2,000 a year. A federally funded scholarship program now is producing 850 to 900 doctors for military duty at an annual cost of $34,000 per head.

The scholarship route is less expensive by far, produces more than five times as many doctors for the armed forces, and will not require the enormous investment represented by Hebert's personal monument.

The $72 million in the pending budget will sail through subcommittee and committee in all probability. There is a modicum of resolve by a few members in the House, and perhaps the Senate, to challenge the appropriation when it comes to the floor. It will be little more than a gesture. Not many people want to hurt Ed Hebert's feelings.

UNESCO's mindless offensive

Daniel P. Moynihan, slated to become the next U. S. ambassador to the United Nations, declared in a recent interview that "it is time for the United States to go into the United Nations and every other international forum and start raising hell."

We can think of no better forum— or must we now say, "worst forum"? —than the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization.

That organization, conceived with such high hopes, has been flagrantly violating its own charter, whose preamble declares that "since wars begin in the minds of men, it is in the minds of men that the defenses of peace must be constructed."

Instead, UNESCO, dominated by Arab, "third world" and Soviet bloc countries, has been carrying on an offensive against Israel, and in the most mindless kind of way.

Last November, it adopted a resolution banning Israel from European regional membership, leaving Israel in a kind of limbo, and voted to deprive Israel of $26,000 in cultural assistance. Now, the 40-member executive board has voted (over the sole negative vote cast by the U. S. but with several abstentions) to exclude Israel from conferences on education in the Mediterranean area.

One result of last November's resolution was an amendment, authored by Sen. Clifford Case of New Jersey and adopted by Congress, forbidding the spending of any U. S. funds— about 25 percent of UNESCO's $80 million annual budget — on UNESCO "until the President certifies to the Congress that such organization (1) has adopted policies which are fully consistent with its educational, scientific and cultural objectives, and (2) has taken concrete steps to correct its recent actions of a primarily political character."

Another result has been the worldwide protest by Nobel Prize Laureates, scholars, writers, artists and scientists, against the politicization of UNESCO and their withdrawal from its activities.

What does it profit UNESCO to pass resolutions if it loses its intellectual resources as well as its soul? We hope UNESCO does not collapse, but the U. S. cannot possibly support it unless it returns to its objectives of truth, the free exchange of ideas and mutual understanding among peoples.

Recapture Of The Mayaguez

THE capture by Cambodians of the U.S. freighter Mayaguez led to an armed rescue operation by U.S. forces. The end result was the freeing of the freighter by the U.S. Marines and release of its crew by Cambodia. The first part of the incident, thus, has ended.

But we see a grave implication in this incident. The American action in this case will make Asian national leaders have some second thoughts.

We do not want this American show of force to be reflected in future American policy for Asia. Any American stress on its known position of strength will only precipitate the sense of danger among Asian leaders in being an ally of the U.S., instead of deepening the trust of such leaders in the promise of protection by the U.S. It certainly will make Asians more wary of the U.S.

It is not difficult for us to fathom the sentiment of Americans concerning the Mayaguez incident. Even allowing for a 12-mile territorial sea rule, the point at which the Mayaguez was captured was outside Cambodian territorial waters.

Capture of a foreign ship on the high seas when the ship is engaged in innocent passage will naturally provoke the sentiment of the nation to which the vessel in question belongs. This is a reasonable reaction.

But the point of capture in the Mayaguez case was a mere seven miles from a reef which has long been a bone of contention in a drawn-out territorial dispute between Cambodia and South Vietnam.

If the Mayaguez was carrying ammunition for the American forces in Thailand, it will give the new Cambodian government some reason to think that the ship had been engaged in a hostile action against Cambodia as the local situation stands today.

The case reminds us of the capture of the U.S. intelligence ship Pueblo by the naval forces of North Korea in 1968. At that time, the U.S. government, despite its threat to use force and various demonstrations of force and military readiness to recapture the ship, refrained from any action against the North Korean captors. The U.S. patiently negotiated for a successful release of the ship's crew.

Compared with the Pueblo case, America reacted in the Mayaguez case with a rashness that was not becoming of a superpower. We wonder why it could not have exercised greater moderation which, to all appearances, it could have afforded.

The exercise of force by America can be officially explained as presidential action based on his duty to protect the lives and property of U.S. citizens. Moreover, America knew little about the nature of the new Cambodian government which it has been criticizing since its inception after the fall of Phnom Penh. Thus, the U.S. may have concluded that there was little to be achieved through official negotiations with the new rulers of Cambodia.

Maybe the U.S. felt it imperative to remove the blot on its escutcheon brought about by the pullout from South Vietnam. The U.S. leaders may have considered it necessary to take steps to stir the nation out of apathy and demonstrate to other nations that it has the power to enforce its will and promises.

Although there has been some Congressional criticism of President Ford's action to use force for the recapture of the Mayaguez, the general sentiment in America seems to back the President.

It is known that America had been reassessing its post-Vietnam Asian policy. The fact that the reassessment resulted in such use of force could be a minus factor for America regarding its relations with Asia, particularly from a long-range point of view.

America's policy of strength failed in Vietnam. But that strength was not limited to the military field. America's concept of might in all fields of international politics such as ideology, political system and popular will did not agree with the prevailing reality of Asia.

If America adheres to the idea of meeting force by force, America's future in Asia cannot be anything but gloomy.

America is clearly in a stage of disengagement in Asia. Therefore, the use of force in the Mayaguez case was not for any of its commitments in Asia but solely in the interest of its nationals. The exercise of force on such a narrow viewpoint is not only deplorable but it even put Thai government leaders in a spot because an American Marine task force arrived in the U.S. base in Utapao for the rescue operation without the consent of the Thai government.

The Thai government is being forced to publicly oppose the U.S. move. This U.S. operation causes serious concern to Japan, which has a similar defense arrangement with the U.S. We want greater prudence shown by our patron ally who professes to guarantee our national security.

National Defense

The war in Vietnam is over. The need for a strong national defense is not.

Most Americans will probably agree with that, even those who think the Pentagon gets far too big a share of the budgetary pie. But most Americans, even those who believe national defense should remain top priority, would also agree that the Pentagon, like everybody else these days, is in for some belt tightening. The House Armed Services Committee tightened the belt when it approved a $32 billion weapons bill— $3.7 billion below President Ford's request.

The end of the war does mean the end of a major item of military expense. There may be other areas where money can be saved, for example in the top heavy brass establishment. The Senate Armed Services Committee drastically cut the air Air Force's $749 million request for the B1 bomber. The cut permits testing of four prototypes but prohibits advanced spending for production before a choice is made.

While the U.S. and Russia are continuing efforts to avoid a nuclear war, both continue to develop non-nuclear weapons. Unfortunately, the end of the Vietnam War doesn't mean the end of the threat of conventional, or nonnuclear, wars elsewhere. It behooves us to be prepared.

Toward a Post-Vietnam Policy

As the casualty toll mounts and the details dribble in, it becomes apparent that the rescue of the Mayaguez was an imperfect military operation. Given the time pressures involved, the uncertainty about the whereabouts of the crew and the logistic difficulties in bringing U.S. power to bear with anything like surgical precision, mistakes were perhaps unavoidable. Those responsible for the operation had only the slimmest of hopes that the captives could be kept off the Cambodian mainland and thus be in a position to be rescued by a quick Marine thrust. But the effort was made, and its very failure is probably the best evidence why the United States, once committed, felt it was necessary to use the blunderbuss rather than the surgical knife.

American critics of the Indochina wars, who have as much right as the Secretary of State to ask what kind of people we are, should feel considerable relief that the Pentagon did not resort to the use of B-52 bombers. That would have been too reminiscent of the indiscriminate horrors we once inflicted on Cambodia. But having avoided the B-52 blunderbuss, the United States took other strong measures. Of these, the most unfortunate was the bloody and, as it turned out, the needless Marine assault on Tang island, the most controversial was the the bombing of mainland targets after the Cambodians had released the Mayaguez crew.

Obviously a Mayaguez post-mortem will have its military uses in pinpointing flaws in intelligence operations and the deployment of forces. Lessons are obviously to be learned, even if the weird circumstances of a week ago are not likely to be repeated. But both the administration and the Congress have a greater obligation to examine the diplomatic and political implications of the affair as the nation moves uncertainly into the post-Vietnam era.

Secretaries Kissinger and Schlesinger have already started this process with some very tough pronouncements. "There are limits beyond which the United States cannot be pushed," said Mr. Kissinger. Using Korea as a specific example, Mr. Schlesinger warned the North's Kim Il Sung regime that any attack against South Korea "could unravel the situation in Asia and elsewhere." In an interview with U.S. News and World Report, he said "one of the lessons of the Vietnamese conflict is that rather than simply counter your opponent's thrusts, it is necessary to go for the heart of the opponent's power: destroy his military forces rather than simply being involved endlessly in ancillary military operations. . . I think they (the North Koreans) would have to conclude that the United States would take more vigorous action than we were inclined to take during much of the Vietnamese war."

Mr. Schlesinger's views, if permanently adopted, would suggest a shift toward a more hawkish readiness to use U.S. military power massively than was the case during the Vietnam war. There is no doubt that the limited step-by-step involvement strategy of the Johnson-McNamara era was discredited with the passage of time. But what Congress must consider carefully is whether the only lasting alternative is the quintessential Pentagon strategy enunciated by Mr. Schlesinger. Many Americans who opposed the Vietnam war are probably not ready to see this strategy adopted on the basis of the emotions aroused by the Mayaguez incident. If the nation is to have a "great debate" on foreign policy and security that means something, its legislators should see whether other alternatives are available that would provide more hope of a peaceful world.

Making Haste Slowly on Cuba

The Organization of American States annual general assembly has probably taken the decisive step in an intricate process that should result in the return of Communist Cuba to membership. That, at least, is what Secretary of State Kissinger said was agreed, and nobody contradicted him. Formally, all it did was to call a special session for Costa Rica in July to reform the Rio treaty. The idea is that procedural changes will then enable the present voting lineup to restore Cuba by majority of the 24-member organization, without needing two-thirds. Once the result is obtained, the Ford administration might move to repeal the legal basis in this country for the embargo. There is no sense of rush.

As matters stand, Cuba is still the object of an official boycott by the OAS that is flouted by more than a third of its members. What has changed is that the United States is no longer seen as the obstacle. Critics of Washington's anti-Castro policy can see that genuine sentiment for it exists elsewhere in the Americas and is the real reason why the embargo has not been ended. A momentum toward normalization with Cuba has been created as undramatically as possible, but it exists. Since Mr. Kissinger told reporters about the complicated scenario, Britain has signed a trade agreement with Cuba, which now can hardly be an embarrassment to Washington.

The OAS is moving slowly but apparently with consensus. The assembly was unable to work up a confrontation between Latins and Yanks. The United States and Panama announced that they are nearly agreed to a new treaty on the Canal. The administration said it was trying to get Congress to amend the trade act in such a way that members of OPEC that did not embargo oil to this country, such as Venezuela and Ecuador, can recover most favored nation status. The most spirited contest was between Central and South Americans over a new secretary-general. A shift by the United States from abstention threw it on the seventh ballot to Alejandro Orfila, veteran Argentine ambassador to this country. Mr. Orfila, one of Washington's most lavish hosts, gets a house and an entertainment budget. One suspects that the delegates agreed behind closed doors that if they must bring a Communist delegation into the club, they might as well enjoy themselves doing it.

The B-52 contingency plan

The latest pastime of the anti-militarists is to denounce the administration for considering the possible use of B-52 bombers against Cambodia during the recent Mayaguez crisis. Having received no response to our protests to Cambodia, and having therefore determined upon military action, the National Security Council faced the question what to do if the aircraft carrier Coral Sea did not reach the area in time.

In this event, it seems, there was a contingency plan calling for B-52 bombing of the Cambodian mainland.

The plan became moot because the Coral Sea did arrive in time. Even if it had not, there is no evidence that a decision had been made to use the bombers: The plan was simply an available option.

No military operation can be carried out intelligently without contingency plans covering every likely—and even conceivable—eventuality. Even diplomatic negotiations require that military options be kept open. Egypt has refused to renounce belligerency unless Israel comes up with more satisfactory concessions than it has, and we can't blame Egypt.

Likewise Dr. Kissinger refused to rule out the possible use of force if a new Arab oil embargo should threaten the west with disaster, and he was soundly denounced by the Arabs and others. Yet here again, it is hard to see what other answer he could have given to the question asked of him. To have said "No comment" would have been interpreted even more ominously than the cautiously conditional words he did use. In a world as imperfect as today's one simply cannot rule out the use of force entirely.

Surely all of us are anti-militarists in the sense that we would prefer to live in a war-free, bomb-free world. But wishing or pretending is not going to make that kind of world. As long as the countries we deal with are busily building up their arsenals on the theory that military strength is still a decisive factor in determining the course of world events, it would be folly for us categorically to renounce the use of our own substantial arsenal, or even any part of it.

Britain to Proceed With Harrier Plane

BY HARRY TRIMBORN
Times Staff Writer

LONDON—Britain will go ahead with development of a naval version of the Harrier jump-jet fighter in a move to bolster both its military muscle and its sagging economy.

The decision is also aimed at forestalling possible construction in the United States of the unique warplane, which is capable of vertical takeoffs and landings like a helicopter.

Britain plans to build 25 Sea Harriers in the next six years at a cost of about $192 million. In addition, the government will go ahead with the planned construction of two antisubmarine cruisers, each 20,000 tons, at a cost of another $288 million.

No additional allocations are needed, since the money has already been earmarked under the British navy's long-term budgeting. But the projects are likely to anger left-wing groups, both within Parliament and without, which have been pressing for defense cuts in addition to those already announced by the government.

However, their anger will be tempered by the favorable impact the projects will have on Britain's growing unemployment. An estimated 3,000 jobs will be saved in the aircraft industry, and at least another 4,000 will be created in the shipbuilding industry.

The land version of the Harrier, developed in the mid-1960s, is the first foreign-built warplane used in the U.S. armed forces since 1918. The U.S. Marines have purchased about 110 Harriers, including eight later sold to Spain.

The Royal Air Force has about 93 land-based Harriers.

The plane is manufactured by the Hawker Siddeley Group, Ltd., but under a licensing agreement the Missouri-based McDonnell Douglas Corp. is entitled to build the plane for the U.S. government.

Earlier this year there were indications that Britain planned to scrap development of the Sea Harrier, on which considerable preliminary work had been done, as part of a massive retrenchment of its armed forces in the wake of the nation's severe economic ills.

But Britain now fears that failure to develop the Sea Harrier, could aggravate economic ills by shifting production of the plane to the United States. The two countries are engaged in a joint project to develop a super Harrier, with greater firepower and improved performance.

As Roy Mason, secretary of state for defense, put it at a press conference Thursday night:

"We have the world lead in this technology. If we close the shutters on this development of vertical takeoff aircraft, there is no doubt that the Americans will turn inwards and put up the shutters and we shall be frozen out."

The green light for the Sea Harrier is also expected to lead to a massive defense contract from Iran, which has long been interested in such a plane, along with a cruiser to use as its base. The ship would probably be one of the two planned for the British navy.

The Iranians, according to reports, withheld a decision pending the outcome of Britain's two-year review of the Sea Harrier project. In all, the Iranian deal would add about $480 million to Britain's foreign trade, now deeply in the red.

As for its tactical role, the sea Harrier was seen as bolstering NATO defenses against growing Russian sea power. Mason said the main threat to NATO forces in the Atlantic came from the growing Soviet submarine fleet, now said to total more than 250 vessels.

The Sea Harriers' main task would be to intercept long-range Soviet bomber reconnaissance planes, known by the NATO designation Bear, which are used to provide missile launching information for surface ships and submarines.

The Harrier would also bolster what many experts consider Britain's inadequate defense ring for its offshore oil and gas installations scattered over 400 square miles of the North Sea.

The threat here is from both conventional military forces and guerrilla groups.

Paper seized in Portugal

Communist move fought by Socialists

Lisbon (AP)—Communists seized control of the Socialist newspaper Republica yesterday. Thousands of Socialists who gathered outside to try to regain control of the paper had their way barred by armed paratroopers.

A lieutenant commanding the paratroopers said his orders were to prevent anyone from entering the building. A Socialist official said, however: "We are going in."

The Socialist party's leader, Mario Soares, a Cabinet minister, went into the streets with party cadres to spread leaflets saying that defense of Republica was the defense of freedom.

The threat of a confrontation developed as the nation's military leaders gathered in a special assembly under pressure from hard-liners to do away with strife between the country's political parties and bypass civilian politicians altogether.

The move by Communist printers to grab the afternoon paper—the only Lisbon daily outside Communist editorial control—posed one more problem for military men already troubled with a national economic crisis and disobedient Army units.

The printers who seized Republica told Raul Rego, the 62-year-old editor who served three jail terms under the old rightist regime, that his ideology was all wrong.

"There is no more authority in Portugal," Mr. Rego declared as he waited out the crisis in his office.

According to a report prepared for delivery at the 240-man armed forces assembly that began yesterday morning, the Army was prepared to discount the results of the April 25 elections, which gave an overwhelming majority to the Socialists and another moderate party.

Long forgotten was the Army's promise to return control of the country to civilians.

Instead of changing course toward the center and parliamentary democracy, the report on "perspectives of political evolution" indicated that the military was turning even farther left—verging on establishing direct links with workers and neighborhood soviets.

A thread running through another report was a frank disenchantment with party rivalries and a clear desire for the Army to run the country alone.

In its analysis of the elections, the report was especially harsh on the victorious Socialist party, holding it responsible for division in the working class and, by implication, of promoting cleavages within the armed forces.

As the Socialists were under fire, so, said military sources, was President Francisco da Costa Gomes, who has been an outspoken partisan of democratic rule and is associated with the Socialists.

There was an expectation by some military sources that the assembly would oust President Costa Gomes or so weaken his position by dismissing his supporters that he couldn't continue long in the presidential palace.

Equally, there were reports that Army moderates would not stand still for the president's ouster and that unit commanders were "counting tanks."

Though excluded from the assembly session, journalists were allowed a glimpse of the auditorium where officers and men from all three branches were waiting for the proceedings to begin. Alone at the head table while his colleagues conversed apart, the president sat despondently

In addition to the confrontation policies of the civilian parties, the military chieftains had a discipline problem within their ranks.

An artillery unit under the sway of splinter parties to the left of the Moscow-line Communists announced its discovery of a "vast Fascist plot" and began to arrest suspects on its own.

Discovery of the "plot" resulted from the detention of a national guard non-commissioned officer by a Maoist group which interrogated him for two days, then turned him over to the artillery regiment, where he denounced about 50 counter-revolutionary suspects

Laos Restricts Traveling And Orders All to Register

By DAVID A. ANDELMAN
Special to The New York Times

VIENTIANE, Laos, May 19—The Laotian Government announced today a series of regulations restricting travel within the country and abroad and requiring every Laotian to register with the national police.

At the same time, the Government asked all neighboring countries not to grant asylum to any Laotians—a demand aimed directly at Thailand, where most of the people who have left Laos have sought sanctuary.

The regulations appeared designed to stem the flight of Laotians abroad, a drain that is embarrassing to the country and damaging to the economy.

The regulations were promulgated in the Lao language only by the official national radio and the Laotion press agency. They were not translated into French, as has been traditional with government orders, stemming from the period until 1954 when Laos was a French colony.

The failure to translate emphasized that the regulations were for the attention of the country's citizens.

The regulations require that all Laotians obtain permission of the national police before traveling from Vientiane to any other area of Laos and before traveling abroad.

They also require that all Laotians report to the national police within 30 days with passports if they have them. It was not clear whether the police intend to confiscate any passports when such a visit is made.

In recent weeks, and particularly since the Communist takeover of South Vietnam and Cmbodia, Thailand, long a firmally of the United States, has repeatedly expressed a desire for neutrality and for friendship with her neighbors.

Now, with the Communist-led Pathet Lao assuming an even more dominant role in the Laotian coalition Government, Thailand is being asked for concrete proof of a desire to coexist with Laos.

Thailand has allowed limited stays to refugees from South Vietnam and Cambodia, but has demanded that they move on—generally, to the United States.

In other statements today, the Laotian national radio and press agency denounced persons who had fled the country, demanded their return and praised "recent protests to castigate and get rid of reactionary elements."

Both the radio and the press agency have recently grown increasingly strident in beginning to mirror the pronouncements of the clandestine Pathet Lao radio and the Pathet Lao press agency. The Laotion press agency, which once carried a good deal of domestic news and information, has been reduced to three or four pages of government pronouncements each day.

All the new edicts and the changes in the government information system have come about since the resignations nearly two weeks ago of right-wing cabinet ministers after a series of anti-American and antirightist demonstrations here and in other Laotian cities. Both the Communist and non-Communist sides in the Government have declared their intention to continue the coalition arrangement, and Premier Souvanna Phoum has promised replacements soon for the ministers who resigned. It is clear, however, that the Communisted Pathet Lao is ascending.

The American Embassy, meanwhile, issued a formal statement today that said: "The United States Government is prepared to enter into discussion with duly appointed representatives of the PGNU [Laotian Government] to modify, reduce or eliminate the U.S. economic assistance program to Laos in accordance with the policies of the PGNU and the United States Government."

The statement was issued as student demonstrators continued to control the southern Laotian town of Savannakhet, allowing only restricted movement by the Americans there, believed to number at least 14. The Americans have apparently been allowed to leave their houses, where they had been detained, but embassy officials in Vientiane said that students were still accompanying the Americans into town.

Sanford J. Stone, the chief official in Savannakhet of the United States Agency for International Development, reported on the student-controlled radio today that all the Americans there were well. He said, however, that "some people in Vientiane have been talking too much"—a statement that some here understood to refer to Voice of America broadcasts that told of new freedoms granted the Americans in Savannakhet.

5 Slain Yanks Left Behind in Ship's Rescue

By JOSEPH VOLZ

Washington, May 19 (News Bureau)—Pentagon officials conceded today that American forces had left behind the bodies of five marines and Air Force men killed in the fighting to free the captured merchant ship Mayaguez.

Pentagon spokesman Joseph Laitin also said that the U.S. death toll could increase to 21 "as soon as we finish muster." Most of the 16 men listed as missing were on a helicopter that went down in the Gulf of Thailand.

Laitin reduced to 49 the number of injured, however, from the 70 to 80 cited by Defense Secretary James Schlesinger yesterday. Laitin said some of the others had sufefred minor bumps and bruises.

Laitin was unable to say just where the five marines and Air Force men had been killed—at sea or on Tang Island—but said there was no question that they were dead because "there were sufficient eyewitness accounts."

He said that one reason the dead on the island were not recovered was that the marines were evacuated at night under heavy fire. Laitin said an effort was being made through diplomatic channels to recover the bodies.

Laitin released the names of three of the dead: Marine Lance Cpl. Ashton Loney of Albany, N.Y.; Air Force 2d Lt. Richard Vandegeer of Buckland, Mass., and Air Force Staff Sgt. Elwood Rumbaugh of Dothan, Ala.

The marines also left behind the bodies of two of their men killed in Saigon during the evacuation of Americans and South Vietnamese refugees last month. Laitin said at the time that the "State Department is doing everything possible to arrange their return." But Pentagon officials said today that the bodies of Cpl. Charles McMahon of Woburn, Mass., and Lance Cpl. Darwin Judge of Marshalltown, Iowa, were still in Saigon.

Laitin also said that:

- U.S. Air Force B-52 bombers on Guam had been alerted for possible action during the crisis, but he declined to name the potential targets.
- U.S. planes had flown 300 strafing and bombing runs and had damaged 17 Cambodian planes in one bombing attack on Ream Airfield, near the port of Sihanoukville, on the Cambodian mainland.
- "There was apparently not enough information on the amount of resistance" on the tiny Tang Island, where 200 invading marines encountered stiff fire from Khmer Rouge troops.

B1 Bomber Survives Test as House Kills Bid to Delete Funds

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON — The B1 bomber, in trouble in the Senate, survived an important test in the House.

By a vote of 227 to 164, the House rejected an attempt to delete from the defense authorization bill $108 million to begin procuring the B1, which is designed to replace the B52 as the principal U.S. bomber in the nuclear age.

Opponents of the B1 will try today to eliminate $840 million of research and development money, but their chances seem remote following yesterday's vote.

Last week, the Senate Armed Services Committee cut $222 million from the Air Force's request for the B1 during the fiscal year that starts July 1 and the following three-month transition period to a new fiscal cycle.

Opponents of the B1, which is nearing the end of the development phase at Rockwell International Corp., argued yesterday that it doesn't make sense to begin procuring the plane until the Air Force decides, in the fall of 1976, whether it wants to go ahead and build a fleet of the bombers.

The B1, they contend, is only marginally superior to the B52 and thus isn't worth its projected $20 billion price tag.

Supporters of the B1 argued that the plane is needed because of the Soviet Union's growing bomber fleet and that it's sufficiently better than the B52 to make it worth building.

Earlier yesterday, the House turned back attempts to cut $260 million for the AWACS airborne warning and control plane; $567 million for the A10 close air support plane, and $46 million to modify wide-bodies civilian cargo planes so they can carry tanks, trucks and other military equipment in wartime.

The authorizing bill merely sets spending ceilings. Money can't be spent until Congress passes a separate appropriations bill.

The House is due to take final action on the authorizing bill today. The full Senate has yet to act on the bill.

lated Thai sovereignty.

Premier Kukrit Pramoj ordered the recall of the Thai Ambassador from Washington and a complete review of treaties and agreements with the United States, especially those pertaining to bases, which played a vital role in the Indochina war.

Recently the Thai Government demanded that all American forces—currently about 25,000—be withdrawn by the end of February; the United States tacitly agreed.

The Thai Foreign Minister said at his new conference that in view of the American apology the Thai Ambassador would be called home merely for a few days' consultations. He said also that Thailand would work harmoniously with American officials.

The United States, in its note, said of its response to the seizure of the Mayagüez: "It is clear that by its action the United States was able to counter a common danger to all nations and to the world's commerce presented by this illegal and unwarranted interference with international shipping routes in the Gulf of Thailand."

"The United States Government wishes to express its understanding of the problem caused the Royal Thai Government and wishes to repeat its regret," the note said.

Despite the apparent resolution of the Mayaguez crisis, recent events have demonstrated growing potential danger o the Thai Government, both from neighboring Communist countries and from internal forces. Nonetheless, senior Western diplomats take an optimistic view, based on the idea that once Thailand is disencumbered of American military forces, much of the pressure will be relieved. They see her as a neutral country on good terms with her neighbors as well as with the rest of the world.

There is another widespread view. Pessimists say that no government has succeeded in coming to grips with the corruption that keeps many people in thrall to dishonest officials and policemen. In recent years, economists say, the gulf between the few rich and many poor in this country of 40 million has widened.

It is estimated that more than 320,000 Thais live under the control of a Communist guerrilla apparatus.

The Government is one of the weakest since World War II, being a coalition of 14 frequently quarreling parties. Doubt remains as to what the attitude would be if the United States found it necessary to use a Thai base for evacuation of Americans from Laos, where the Communist-led Pathet Lao is showing increasing domination. In any case the United States appears to have bound itself to act only with the Thai Government's permission.

Cambodia offers Amity

BANGKOK, May 19 (UPI) — The new Cambodian Government offered friendship to Thailand today and denied reports that it demanded that the border be pushed half a mile into Thai territory.

"Cambodia and her people wish that the two neighboring countries, Cambodia and Thailand, live peacefully within the limits of their own territory as neighbors forever," the Cambodian Information Ministry said in a broadcast monitored here.

AID ... CONTINUED

in support of Mr Ford's handling of the Mayaguez ship incident

"I hope the momentum continues," Mr Mansfield said

He and other administration supporters argued that the practical effect of the embargo was to drive Turkey out of NATO, to the detriment of Cyprus, Greece, and the U.S. Advocates of the aid ban, led by Senator Thomas F Eagleton (D., Mo.), said the rule of law was more important to American foreign policy than temporary calculations of the national interest.

Turkey, by using American-supplied arms for aggressive purposes, violated U.S. law, Mr. Eagleton said, and should not be rewarded for doing so.

Mr. Mansfield said he agreed with Mr. Eagleton that Turkey had violated U.S. law, but he said the practical consequences of the embargo were more important, particularly in hurting administration attempts to bring Greece and Turkey together over the Cyprus issue.

Both Greece and Turkey had made mistakes last year, Mr Mansfield said, but "the question is, what do we do in the present? The Congress cannot take over the negotiations which might conceivably bring about a reasonable settlement."

Fifteen Democrats joined 26 Republicans in supporting the administration's desire to lift the embargo. Thirty Democrats, joined by 10 Republicans, voted to keep the embargo intact. Eighteen senators were absent.

In a situation where every vote counted, there could be no single key votes. Several senators who often disagree with the administration on foreign policy—such as Edmund S. Muskie (D., Maine), Philip A. Hart (D., Mich.), and Mark O. Hatfield (R., Ore.)—voted in support of the President.

Senator Charles McC. Mathias (R., Md) voted to lift the embargo; Senator J. Glenn Beall (R., Md) voted to keep it in force.

Senator Beall, who is up for re-election next year, faces possible opposition from Representative Paul S Sarbanes (D., Md.), a congressman of Greek descent and a leading advocate of the embargo.

Senator Mansfield, in arguing to lift the embargo, noted that there are more Americans of Greek than Turkish ancestry, but both groups, he said, "have been good citizens."

"Have we forgotten the response of the Turks to our involvement in Korea over two decades ago," he asked.

Senator Mathias said he voted to lift the embargo because "if we did not give some indication that we are prepared to use the carrot as well as the stick, we would lose all our military presence east of Sicily, and I can't believe that is in the interest of the people of Cyprus, Greece, or the U.S.".

they learned of his job through Communist defectors, captured documents and intercepted messages.

When former President Richard M. Nixon ordered American troops into Cambodia in the spring of 1970, he said then that he hoped the forces would destroy the headquarters, then believed to be in Cambodia near Tay Ninh Province of South Vietnam.

But intelligence analysts never believed there was a permanent headquarters. They said that it moved around constantly.

In recent years, Mr. Hung was believed to have had his headquarters one the Vietnamese side of the border.

There was general surprise in the intelligence community when Hanoi and Saigon, in official reports last Thursday, publicly put Mr. Hung at the top of the list of South Vietnamese officials welcoming a North Vietnamese delegation to Saigon for the celebrations.

Titles Are Listed

Mr. Hung was identified in the Communist accounts of the event as a "member of the Vietnam Workers party Central Committee Political Bureau and secretary of the South Vietnam party organization."

The Vietnam Workers party is the Communist party of Hanoi. It was referred to during the long war as having "the major guidance role" in the revolution. But before the fall of Saigon Hanoi always insisted that the struggle in South Vietnam was led by the Provisional Revolutionary Government and the National Liberation Front.

Both these organizations were usually called the "Vietcong" in the West.

In listing Mr. Hung, the Communist reports ranked him ahead of Nguyen Huu Tho, the head of the National Liberation Front, and Huynh Tan Phat, president of the Provisional Revolutionary Government. In Communist countries, including North Vietnam, the order of precedence is usually meant to indicate the political ranking of party members and others.

Other Leaders Named

In addition to Mr. Hung, the Communist accounts also listed the name of Nguyen Van Linh, who was identified as the deputy secretary of the South Vietnam party organization. Mr. Linh, who was also known as Muoi Ut, was believed to be a member of the North Vietnamese party Central Committee, and was Mr. Hung's deputy in charge of political work.

Mr. Hung's military deputy, Lieut. Gen. Tran Van Tra, has already emerged as head of the Saigon area Military Administrative Committee.

Another Hanoi official who was publicly identified last week was Vo Chi Cong, listed as a member of the Hanoi party Central Committee, and the chief political officer in Da Nang.

He was listed by the Saigon radio as "secretary of the Zone 5, Vietnam Workers party committee."

Zone 5 is the way Hanoi has traditionally described the Da Nang area, indicating to American analysts that, politically, Hanoi is directing affairs in the old way, although formally Da Nang is still part of South Vietnam.

Joined Ho Chi Minh

Mr. Hung, 62 years old, was born in Vinh Long Province in 1912. According to a United States Government biography, Mr. Hung joined the "Revolutionary Youth League" of the late Ho Chi Minh in the nineteen-twenties and in 1930 was a founding member of the Indochinese Communist party.

In 1931, he was sentenced to death by the French but his sentence was commuted to life imprisonment on the island of Poulo Condore, now known as Son Island. He was freed in August, 1945, joined the Vietminh forces, and became a member of the military command in the south.

After the Geneva peace conference in 1954 split Vietnam in half, Mr. Hung became head of the cease-fire committee in South Vietnam and in 1955 head of the Vietminh liaison mission in Saigon.

To Hanoi in 1955

He moved to Hanoi in 1955 and joined the party Politburo in 1957. In 1960 he became First Deputy Premier to his old compatriot, Pham Van Dong. In 1967 he replaced Gen. Nguyen Chi Thanh as head of operations in the South after General Thanh died.

It is generally assumed in the intelligence community here that Hanoi plans to units North and South Vietnam eventually. But, for the moment, because of the different economies and life-styles in the two Vietnams, it has chosen to go slow on unification.

U.S. Intelligence Experts Say Pham Hung Emerges as Leader in South

By BERNARD GWERTZMAN
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 19—North Vietnam's fourth-ranking Politburo member, who for the last eight years secretly coordinated activities against Saigon, was reported today to have emerged as the apparent political leader in South Vietnam following the Communist takeover.

The prominence given the public appearance of the Politburo member, Pham Hung, last week at celebrations marking the Communist victory was regarded by the American intelligence community as a sign that Hanoi probably plans to direct developments in South Vietnam closely.

For the moment, however, the prevailing view of American specialists is that a separate South Vietnamese government will be permitted to exist and establish diplomatic relations around the world under Hanoi's guidance.

Mr. Hung was born in what is now South Vietnam, moved north in the nineteen-fifties, and held a number of top jobs, including First Deputy Premier in Hanoi, before going underground in 1967 and assuming command secretly of the Central Office for South Vietnam, which directed the political and military war effort against Saigon.

Mr. Hung was never publicly identified by Hanoi as the head of operations in South Vietnam, but American analysts said

Senate votes, 41-40, to lift embargo on Turkish arms aid

By THOMAS PEPPER
Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington— President Ford and his Secretary of State, Henry A. Kissinger, won the narrowest of victories yesterday when the Senate voted, 41 to 40, to lift an embargo on United States military aid to Turkey.

The issue, in the legislative sense, now goes to the House, where no similar victory is expected any time soon.

But administration spokesmen have said they were mainly interested in winning a Senate vote for psychological reasons—to show the Turkish people that Congress is potentially flexible, and potentially responsive to moves the Ankara government might make toward a negotiated settlement of the 9-month-long Cyprus dispute.

A broader issue at stake was the degree of trust and discretion Congress is willing to grant the executive branch.

Mr. Ford and Mr. Kissinger pressed for a vote this week in an effort to win support before a summit meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization next week.

Mr Ford will be among the heads of government attending the meeting, and he is expected to meet there with Constantine Caramanlis, the Greek prime minister, and Suleman Demirel, the Turkish prime minister

The embargo was placed on U.S. military aid to Turkey last fall, in the wake of Turkish use of American arms to extend their sector of military control over Cyprus. Turkish forces landed on Cyprus initially in July, in the wake of a Greek-instigated coup against the government of Archbishop Makarios.

Senator Mike Mansfield (D., Mont.), the majority leader and co-sponsor of the proposal to lift the embargo, linked yesterday's vote to sentiments expressed in the Senate last week

Thais Accept U.S. Regrets; Crisis Over Base Is Eased

By MALCOLM W. BROWNE
Special to The New York Times

BANGKOK, Thailand, May 19—The Thai Government accepted as a formal apology today an American note expressing regret over the misunderstandings that had arisen over use of a Thai base to recover the Mayagüez and her crew.

Soon after the note had been delivered the Thai Foreign Minister, Maj. Gen. Chatichai Choonhaven, said at a news conference that the case was closed and that he believed "bygones should be bygones." He said word had been sent to leaders of a demonstration that had been going on outside the American Embassy since Saturday that they should call it off.

There were still several hundred demonstrators outside the embassy at nightfall, with spokesmen continuing to offer threats and insults over loudspeakers, but soon thereafter they withdrew.

At the news conference the Foreign Minister drew special attention to the part of the United State note—replying to a Thai protest against the use of the U Taphao base in freeing the freighter and her 39-man crew from Cambodian control—that said:

"The policy of the United States continues to be of respecting the sovereignty and independence of Thailand. The unique circumstances that have led to the recent turn of events do not alter this traditional relationship, and are not going to be repeated.

"The Government of the United States looks forward to working in harmony and friendship with the Royal Thai Government."

While the Thai-American diplomatic crisis appeared eased, a delegation from the new Saigon Government ended a three-day visit saying that "favorable conditions for the establishment of new relations between the Republic of South Vietnam and Thailand" had not been created

The major sticking point was a demand by the three-member mission that aircraft, ships and military equipment brought here by Vietnamese refugees should be returned to Saigon. The mission has also demanded that the United States return the South Vietnamese planes it removed from Thailand on the ground that they had been provided to the former Government as military aid.

The statement also asserted that "to build a peaceful and independent Southeast Asia, the withdrawal of United States military bases and United States troops from this region is very urgent and indispensable."

The diplomatic crisis between Thailand and the United States arose last week when a Marine contingent was airlifted to the base at U Taphao, near Bangkok. The marines who recovered the Mayagüez, an American container ship, and her crew were flown from there.

The Thai Government, which is trying to establish relations with the Communist Governments of Asia, charged that the United States did not ask permission to use the base for an operation that both embarrassed the Government and vio-

Atomic Arms Talk Opened By Gromyko and Kissinger

By LESLIE H. GELB

Special to The New York Times

VIENNA, May 19—Secretary of State Kissinger met today with the Soviet Foreign Minister, Andrei A. Gromyko, in the hope that they could begin to make political decisions to surmount the technical difficulties that have plagued the nuclear arms talks.

Mr. Kissinger believes that the chances of movement in these talks were enhanced several weeks ago when Moscow hinted at an approach on how to distinguish between different kinds of missiles that could be combined with the American approach to missile verification.

Mr. Kissinger and his associates do not exude optimism about a breakthrough in Vienna. Their stated aim is to begin the process of sending Soviet and American delegations back to Geneva in June with new instructions.

Mr. Kissinger is in Vienna on the first leg of a trip that will take him through Bonn, West Berlin and Ankara, Turkey, by Saturday.

Today he joined Chancellor Bruno Kreisky of Austria for 90 minutes after having watched a horseback riding exhibition with Mrs. Kissinger.

Confident on Aims

Mr. Kissinger's confidence in reaching a nuclear arms accord with Moscow rests on the expressed belief that the major issues were resolved in Vladivostok last November. The two sides reached preliminary agreement to set ceilings of 2,400 strategic missiles and long-range bombers and, within that total, 1,320 missiles with the multiple independently targetable warheads known as MIRV's.

The Pentagon does not entirely share that confidence, particularly on the issue of how to verify whether a newly deployed missile bears multiple warheads.

The American position is that if a missile is flight-tested with multiple warheads, all missiles of that kind will be considered as having such warheads when deployed. American satellites can determine only whether a silo has been enlarged to receive a missile with multiple warheads; it cannot peer inside the missile once deployed to see if it contains such a warhead.

The Soviet approach to the impasse was not explained to newsmen, but the tentative reaction of Mr. Kissinger was.

The issue apparently revolves around the SS-18 missile, which has been flight-tested both with a single warhead and with a multiple warhead. The SS-17's and SS-19's, a few of which have been deployed already, have been tested only with multiple warheads.

The problem is how to determine whether the SS-18, once deployed, holds a single warhead or a multiple warhead. The apparent solution rests on the fact that the United States has observed hat the Russians have been placing recognizable facilities in plain view near missiles with multiple war-

GENERAL NEWS SUMMARY FROM THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

THE STRIP-MINE BILL will be vetoed, the White House said.

In disclosing President Ford's decision, energy chief Frank Zarb contended that the legislation would reduce coal production 40 million to 162 million tons annually, increase utility bills and eliminate up to 36,000 jobs the first yaer. The bill would require restoration of surface-mined land, tax coal to pay for a cleanup of abandoned mining areas and bar mining in some places. It is similar to one Ford rejected last December.

The vote on overriding the veto should be close. The bill has lost some House support recently through fears of higher unemployment if it passes.

ARMS AID TO TURKEY would be restored under a bill the Senate approved.

The measure passed, 41-40, after supporters argued that the Ford administration needs more flexibility in dealing with the Cyprus problem. The ban on military aid was imposed Feb. 5 because Turkey used

Questions on Ship Rescue Persist Despite Briefings

By PHILIP SHABECOFF

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 19 — Questions about casualty reports and other matters related to the Mayagüez incident persisted today despite new explanations from the White House and the Pentagon.

The Pentagon again revised its count of casualties in the Marine assault last week to rescue the merchant ship Mayagüez and its crew from Cambodian forces. At the same time, the White House press secretary, Ron Nessen, reported that President Ford had been "puzzled" and "frustrated" by his inability to obtain quick and accurate information about casualties.

Mr. Nessen insisted there was not "any intention to hide bad news."

Joseph Laitin, the Pentagon spokesman, said at a briefing that the estimate of wounded was now 49, not 70 to 80 as reported by the Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger.

The Pentagon's estimate of the number of killed and missing remained at five and 18, respectively.

Mr. Laitin said the lower count of wounded was a result of eliminating superficial injuries from the list. He said a final count was yet to come. He added that few of the 49 were seriously injured.

None of the bodies of the five known dead has been recovered. One, that of Lance Corp. Ashton Loney, from Albany, was left behind on Tang Island when the marines pulled out.

The four other men who are known to be dead are believed to have perished by drowning when their helicopter crashed into the sea. It is not known with certainty whether any of the 16 men officially identified as missing are dead, or how they may have died.

Mr. Laitin said it had taken

Senate Votes To Lift Turk Arms Aid Ban

By Spencer Rich

Washington Post Staff Writer

The Senate voted 41 to 40 yesterday to let President Ford restore weapons shipments to Turkey, which were cut off Feb. 5 by Congress because Turkey used American-supplied arms to invade Cyprus last July.

Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.), warning that prolonging the Greece-Turkey dispute over Cyprus could severely damage the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, made clear in an impassioned speech that the vote had been expressly scheduled to allay Turkish resentment of the United States and thus strengthen the hand of the President and Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger in forthcoming talks on a Cyprus settlement.

Kissinger is to visit Ankara this week, and then he and the President will attend NATO meetings in Brussels May 29-30 at which, according to Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman John J. Sparkman (D-Ala.), the President will meet with leaders of both Greece and Turkey.

"I would hope that the Senate would strengthen" the position of the President and Kissinger in negotiations "at this moment in history," Mansfield said. But the hairline margin of Senate victory for the bill, and the fact that the House has no immediate plans to take it up, may diminish some of the hoped-for impact.

Without House action, the embargo will remain in effect.

Communists Seize Newspaper in Lisbon

LISBON, May 19 (AP)—Communists seized control of the Socialist newspaper Republica todaysand armed paratrooperh bajred thousands of Socialists who gathered outside to try to regain control of the paper.

A lieutenant commanding the paratroops said that he had been ordered to prevent anyone from entering the building.

The Socialist party leader, Mario Soares, a Minister Without Portfolio, went into the streets with party workers to spread leaflets saying that the defense of Republica was the defense of freedom.

The threat of a confrontation developed as the nation's military leaders gathered in a special assembly under pressure from hard-liners to do away with a strife between the country's political parties and bypass civilian polfticians altogether.

The Communist printers' seizure of the afternoon paper—the only Lisbon daily outside Communist editorial control—posed a new problem for military men, who are already troubled by a national economic crisis and disobedient army units.

The printers who seized Republica told Raul Rego, the 62-year-old editor, who served three jail terms under the former rightist regime, that his ideology was all wrong.

"There is no more authority in Portugal," Mr. Rego declared as he waited out the crisis in his office.

According to a report prepared for delivery at a 240-man assembly of the armed forces, which began this morning, the army was prepared to disccunt the results of the April 25 elections. The elections gave an overwhelming majority to the Socialists and another moderate party.

The report, on "perspective of Political Evolution," indicated that instead of changing course toward the center and parliamentary democracy, the military was turning even farther left and verging on establishing direct links with workers and neighborhood Communist groups.

A thread running through another report was a frank disenchantment with party rivalries and a clear desire for the army to run the country alone.

The report analyzing the elections was especially harsh on the victorious Socialist party, holding it responsible for division in the working class and, by implication, for promoting cleavages within the armed forces.

so long to produce an accurate report on casualties because the marines had been evacuated to various ships and taken to different destinations. In view of the time thus required to take an accurate muster, there was "not any undue delay," he said.

Newsmen who had covered the Vietnam war recalled that the military had always been quick and precise with casualty lists and "body counts" in that conflict even unde rtrying combat situations.

Other Issues Raised

Mr. Nessen, who himself had reported from Vietnam, did not explain why last week's action produced more confusion.

A number of other issues still remained without clarification. For example, no prompt warning was sent out to merchant ships to avoid the Cambodian islands even though a South Korean vessel had been fired on in those waters.

The Foreign Boradcast Information Service, a department of the Central Intelligence Agency, reported on May 5 that a South Korean freighter had been fired on by "what appeared to be an armed Communist gunboat on the high seas." The next day the report noted that the South Korean Government had warned its merchant ships to stay out of the area.

The United States also had information several days before the Mayagüez incident that Cambodian gunboats had detained a Panamanian merchant ship. Despite these known incidents, the Defense Mapping Agency's Hydrographic Service did not issue a special warning to mariners, which is standard procedure in time of apparent danger.

After several inquiries, a Defense Department spokesman, Col. Tom Byrnen, said:

"We are trying to get some information about why the word didn't get down to the Defense Mapping people. So far we don't know why."

Another question was why the marines attacked Tang Island when the best information available indicated that the crew of theMayagüz had been taken to the mainland.

Administration spokesmen have said intelligence indicated that the crew, or some members, had been taken to the island. They did not say what this intelligence was.

Government officials reported that one of the Cambodian vessels off the island was not attacked by American fighters because a pilot had spotted what appeared to be American faces on the deck during one pass.

But the captain of the Mayagüez, Charles T. Miller, said United States planes were making low-level passes over the boat for four hours, firing across its bows and dropping tear gas and nausea-creating gas.

In any case, in view of the pilot's sighting, the possibility must have been raised before the Marine attack that all of the crew had been removed from the island and that the assault was not necessary.

Bombing of Mainland

Another issue that has been raised is why were the air attacks on the mainland necessary after the crew of the Mayagüez had been surrendered by the Cambodians?

The assault on Ream airfield and the oil storage near Sihanoukville was necessary, the Administration said, to keep Cambodian forces from reinforcing the defenders of Tang Island.

But, judging by the Government's own reports, the Cambodians had no ships and planes that could not have been interdicted by the warships and aircraft that the United States had on the scene.

The Pentagon appeared to have been surprised by the strength of Cambodian resistance on Tang Island. Mr. Laitin reported today that the defenders used heavy machine guns, mortars and other heavy arms in fighting the Marine assault

An April 17 Photograph

The Pentagon reported earlier that its intelligence had indicated that there were only a few people on the island. This raises the question why advanced surveillance devices and methods had not been available to the armed forces to produce better information.

The Pentagon spokesmen last week used a photograph of Tang Island that was dated April 17. A questioner at a briefing last week was unable to learn why the island had been photographed on that date.

Finally, there is the question why reports on the whole operation had been so confusing and late.

Mr. Laittin said today that there had been inadequate communication between the National Military Command Center and the Office of Public Relations, which was briefing the press.

None of the questions necessarily implied anything secretive in the Government's handling of the affair. But until the questions are resolved, a good many observers are going to feel uneasy about the incident.

SENATE -- CONTINUED

The February cutoff move had been led by Sen. Thomas F. Eagleton (D-Mo.) and Reps. John Brademas (D-Ind.), Paul S. Sarbanes (D-Md.) and Benjamin S. Rosenthal (D-N.Y.). They said Turkey used the American-supplied weapons illegally to invade Cyprus, despite specific prohibitions in American law against use of U.S. aid for aggression.

Eagleton told the Senate yesterday that lifting the embargo before Turkey has made serious moves to negotiate removal of its troops from Cyprus would give Turkey a "green light" to continue its present policies and even take further military action, secure in the knowledge that the United States won't exert any real pressure.

Eagleton also said the vote was an attempt to restore Kissinger's flagging prestige.

"President Ford and Dr. Kissinger are sending their emissaries around the Senate office building and saying, 'Win this one for Henry,'" shouted Eagleton, asserting that Kissinger had been wrong on Bangladesh, wrong on Vietnam, wrong on Turkey and "may have to give back his Nobel Peace Prize."

A Defense Department spokesman said commitments for approximately $169 million in arms for Turkey had been made by the administration before the Feb. 5 cutoff took effect, but precisely how much was actually delivered wasn't clear. The intitial administration request and envisioned at least $50 million more for Turkey. The Feb. 5 ban cut off all government-financed, government-guaranteed sales of arms to Turkey, plus all cash sales, whether from public or private sources.

Brademas, in a telephone interview yesterday, said that if the bill came up in the House he and his associates would again oppose it and predicted it would be defeated. "The question is whether or not we will enforce the law of the land," said Brademas, adding he didn't see any evidence that the administration had vigorously pressed Turkey or Cyprus for a settlement.

Charles McC. Mathias Jr. (R-Md.) was the only Maryland or Virginia senator voting for repeal of the aid ban.

Greek ethnic organizations have lobbied heavily in favor or the ban. Elias Demetracopoulos, a spokesman for Greek causes, said the bill passed yesterday represents a "desperate, massive campaign" to bolster Kissinger's prestige but, he said, the "very narrow margin" of victory, plus the unlikelihood of House passage, represents "a repudiation" of Kissinger's "eastern Mediterranean policy."

heads. If Moscow were to continue this kind of pattern, satellites would be able to verify the presence of such warheads.

Officials made clear that even though the SS-18 with a multiple warhead could strike more targets, Mr. Kissinger would prefer this to the single-warhead version, which packs at least 25 megatons and is thus regarded as a terror weapon and a serious threat to a reinforced silo.

Mr. Kissinger and Mr. Gromyko were scheduled to meet alone for several hours to be followed by a working dinner with their staffs. Ambassador Anatoly F. Dobrynin of the Soviet Union is also in attendance.

Their agenda included the nuclear arms talks and the 35-nation European security conference. Middle East discussions are set for tomorrow.

Kissinger Cautions Gromyko

By Murrey Marder
Washington Post Staff Writer

VIENNA, May 19—Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger reiterated to Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko tonight the American warning that U.S.-Soviet detente must not be used as a cover for "the exploitation of local conflict."

Kissinger expressed that cautionary view about the impact of Indochina on superpower relationships during five hours of talks with Gromyko.

Gromyko, in turn, stressed to Kissinger the Soviet priority on making quicker progress toward one of the oldest Soviet goals, a 35-nation European summit conference to help confirm the post-World War II borders in Europe. According to a U. S. spokesman tonight, the United States and its allies still consider it "premature" to set a final date to conclude that conference, in which the Western powers seek to increase human contacts across the East-West divide.

As a consequence, this first high-level U.S.-Soviet encounter since February indicated there will be continual maneuvering and bargaining throughout this summer over competing priorities on the Washington-Moscow agenda.

Kissinger and Gromyko, in the first of their two days of meetings here, only started to discuss the central topic of speeding up negotiations on U.S.-Soviet nuclear arms control. Still to be discussed is the major issue of how the United States and the Soviet Union will deal with the Middle East.

Before the Kissinger-Gromyko meeting began, U.S. sources stressed the need for intensifying negotiations in the strategic arms limitation talks known as SALT II, in order to meet the already delayed schedule for the next U.S.-Soviet summit conference in Washington. This planned meeting between President Ford and Soviet leader Leonid I. Brezhnev, originally expected in June or July, is presently planned for the September or October.

At the close of the initial meeting here, which took place at the resplendent Imperial Hotel which the American delegation is occupying, Kissinger told newsmen: "The talks were constructive and were conducted in a cordial and friendly atmosphere" and "some progress was made" on the topics covered.

Gromyko said he agreed, describing the discussions as "useful, constructive and friendly."

The two foreign ministers spent an hour and a quarter alone before bringing others into the discussions. Both Soviet ambassador to Washington Anatoliy F. Dobrynin and Walter J. Stoessel, U.S. ambassador in Moscow, joined the second stage of the talks.

On instructions from Kissinger, U.S. spokesman Robert Anderson made a point of telling newsmen afterward that "the subject of Vietnam obviously came up" in reviewing the world situation.

Kissinger reportedly told Gromyko essentially what he said in a speech in St. Louis on May 12 about the post-Indochina U.S. view of detente. Kissinger said then that the progress achieved in direct US.-Soviet relations has failed to be matched "in peripheral areas"—notably referring to Indochina.

"The willingness of the Soviet Union to exploit strategic opportunities—even though some of these opportunities presented themselves more or less spontaneously and not as a result of Soviet action," Kissinger said in St. Louis, "constitutes a heavy mortgage on detente."

In current relations, this American apprehension particularly includes the worry that the Soviet Union might try to exploit opportunities in the Middle East.

Gromyko's emphasis on the need to conclude what is formally known as the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe showed that the Soviet Union wants to strongly register its own frustrations.

This conference, first proposed by the Soviet Union more than two decades ago, has been meeting intermittently for more than two years. The Soviet Union hoped to conclude it in Helsinki on June 30, at the summit level. But that prospect is gone and the jockeying over a terminal date continues. Tonight, U.S. spokesman Anderson repeated that "there is much work to be done before we can assume that there will be a summit meeting."

In their talks here Tuesday, Kissinger and Gromyko are expected to spend a major portion of their time on the nuclear arms control negotiations.

If the American goal on this subject is achieved here, the two sides would move toward, or agree upon, joint instructions to their delegations working on a SALT accord. These negotiations are attempting to complete a formula reached in the Ford-Brezhnev meeting at Vladivostok last November. The main obstacle is agreement on how to achieve the established ceiling of 2,400 strategic nuclear delivery systems for each country.

MOSCOW STALLED IN FOREIGN POLICY

Gromyko Looks to U.S. Help to Resolve Europe, Arms and Mideast Issues

By CHRISTOPHER S. WREN
Special to The New York Times

MOSCOW, May 19 — The Kremlin's efforts to promote Soviet prestige through a succession of forums abroad appear to have been stalled despite some advantages offered by recent American setbacks.

The situation, in which Moscow is being frustrated by a timetable of its own optimistic making, figures in Soviet concern at a time when Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko is believed to be raising some of the more pressing problems with Secretary of State Kissinger at their two-day meeting in Vienna.

The Soviet Union has apparently learned that it cannot surmount some of these deadlocks alone. Perhaps most timely is the breakthrough needed for an accord limiting strategic arms that will justify a visit by the Soviet leader, Leonid I. Brezhnev, to the United States this fall. Beyond this are two other events sought by Moscow—the convening of the Middle East peace conference by Geneva and the wind-up of the European securbity conference at Geneva.

Moscow's hope of presiding over a meeting of European Communist parties later this year hardly depends on American cooperation. But Moscow seems to feel that such a meeting can be inhibited unless the other problems are resolved.

Judging by recent speeches, articles and private comments, the Kremlin is already feeling the pinch of time as it looks ahead to the 25th party congress set for Feb. 24. This is a good nine months away, but the Russians are counting on the series of international meetings to enhance Mr. Brezhnev's image in preparation for the congress, which will promulgate Soviet policy for the next five years.

Mr. Brezhnev's pending visit to Mr. Ford, now mentioned in terms of next fall, leaves scant time to negotiate specifics of a strategic weapons agreement, which hinges on the issue of verification of the ceiling on multiple warhead systems.

According to one Western dinlomat, Mr. Brezhnev has privately told visitors that he expects to see President Ford. Such a meeting was characterized by Mr. Gromyko last week as "an exceptionally important and maior undertaking." Yet there are no signs of preparations for the visit.

In theorv Mr. Brezhnev's trip does not hinge on a successful arms accord, but American diplomats concede that without it a meeting with Mr. Ford would look empty.

The 35-nation European security talks that Moscow wants to see wound up by the respective heads of state in Helsinki, Finland, are still snagged on such lingering East-West differences as advance notice of military maneuvers and improved working conditions for Western journalists in Eastern Europe.

The Soviet Union has muted its earlier proposal that the Helsinki wind-up should begin on June 30. Western diplomats tend to feel that if there is no rush to completion this week in Geneva, the final ceremonial phase in Helsinki will not take place until autumn.

There has been no visible movement toward a Geneva peace conference on the Middle East. Even after sessions here with Iraqi, Egyptian, Syrian and Palestinian visitors, the Kremlin seems baffled by Arab disunity as well as Israeli opposition.

In Libya last week, Premier Aleksei Kosygin said peace hopes depended "on the unity of the Arab countries."

Consequently, Moscow has fallen back to dwelling on preparations. Mr. Gromyko stressed the new emphasis last week in asserting, "We have in mind serious preparation for the conference and a serious approach to its tasks, although we are not as yet sure that all the participants in the conference have the same aim."

Perhaps the biggest frustration ideologically is the delay that the Kremlin has encountered on its proposed European Communist meeting from the Rumanians, Yugoslavs and Spaniards, who are afraid that the conference will be used as a bludgeon against China.

The problem was underscored by a meeting here last Thursday between Aleksandar Grlickov, a Yugoslav Communist envoy, and Boris N. Ponomarev, the Soviet party secretary who heads the Kremlin's effort. They reportedly failed to come to suitable terms for Yugoslav participation and their meeting wen virually ignored in the Soviet press.

Meanwhile, Moscow has been careful to keep on good terms with Washington, all but loking the other way last week when American marines were sent in to free the freighter Mayagüez off Cambodia. With even modest American cooperation, the Russians may be able to regain new momentum and carry through their hopes. But some Western diplomats feel the Kremlin will be hardpressed to wrap it all into a tidy package in time for the 25th pary congress.

Leader of Marines In Rescue of Ship Calls Battle Heavy

SUBIC BAY, the Phillippines, May 19 (Reuters) — United States Marines ran into more resistance than expected when they landed on Tang Island in the Gulf of Siam to help free the Mayagüez, the commander of the operation said here today.

"There was considerable exchange of hand - grenades," said Lieut. Col. Randall Austin. "There was very heavy combat. It was a classic heliborne asault in which unfortunately we enccountered heavy fire once on the ground."

At a news conference at the naval base here, he said that three of his men died and that some 71 of the 210-man marine force were wounded, many with minor injuries, and that 13 were missing after Thursday's dramatic rescue operation.

[In an interview in Washington during the weekend, Defense Secretary James L. Schlesinger put casualties for the whole air-sea operation to free the ship and crew at five dead, 16 missing and 70 to 80 wounded.]

Colonel Austin estimated that there were about 25 Cambodian casualties in a force of 150 on the island, but he said he had no exact count.

The commander said that he did not want to play down the casualties but that he regarded the operation as a success. He said his marines landed from helicopters at various points on the five-mile-long island.

The engagements were so close, he said, that "there were many instances when in fact the enemy threw hand grenades and our forces picked them up and threw them back."

At the news conference were two marines injured when two helicopters crashed on the island. They were awarded purple heart medals by Maj. Gen. Kenneth Houghton, commander of the Third Marine Division, based in Okinawa, who said in answer to a question on the operation. "At the risk of sounding like a warmonger, I think it added an elixir to morale."

The Mayagüez was heading for Hong Kong today from Singapore, where it arrived on Saturday after being found at anchor and released from Tang Island by the raiding marines.

The crew members, who had been taken off the ship, were held by the Cambodians for three-and-a-half days before being released in a Thai fishing boat with five fishermen who had also been prisoners of the Cambodians.

Twenty of the crew have left the Mayagüez since the incident —the company that owns the ship, Sea-Land Service of Menlo Park, N. J., had offered to replace them. Others are to be relieved later. Charles T. Miller, captain of the Mayagüez, is staying on to take over the new crew and resume normal freight operations.

Schlesinger threat dims peace talks

From Tribune Wire Services

THE CLIMATE for next month's United States-Egyptian summit was clouded Monday by American Defense Secretary James Schlesinger's warning that force might be used to break any new Arab oil embargo.

Egyptian officials described the warning as tactless and untimely. The semi-official newspaper Al-Akhbar headlined its report: "America returns to the old tune of resorting to force."

Schlesinger's remarks appear likely to embarrass President Anwar Sadat, already under criticisim in the Arab world for placing faith in the U. S. mediation efforts in the Middle East.

SCHLESINGER SAID in a weekend interview with the magazine U. S. News and World Report that the U. S. would be "less likely to be tolerant" of a new Arab oil embargo, and that economic, political, and conceivably military measures could be taken in response.

Observers said that the implied threat would increase hostility in the Arab world toward the U. S. and make Sadat's task more delicate.

Sadat will meet President Ford in Salzburg, Austria, on June 1 and 2.

There has been no public suggestion so far that the Arabs may reimpose an oil embargo—which they enforced at the time of the 1973 Middle East war—if there is no progress toward a permanent settlement.

BUT THE ARABS have said repeatedly that they consider such an embargo a legitimate political weapon and have compared it with the U. S.-instigated economic blockade of Cuba.

Arab diplomats here recall that Arab oil-producing countries, faced with reports last year that U. S. troops were being trained to occupy oilfields in the event of another embargo, warned that the Arabs would blow up oil wells rather than have them seized by force.

House Rejects Bids to Cut $32 Billion Arms Measure

By Richard L. Lyons
Washington Post Staff Writer

Critics of what they call a bloated defense budget lost a series of votes by wide margins last night as the House began debate on the $32 billion military hardware authorization bill.

The bill authorizes $26.5 billion for planes, ships and missiles for the year begining July 1, plus $5.5 billion for a three-month transition period after that as the government shifts to a new fiscal year begining Oct. 1.

The $32 billion total reflects a $3.7 billion cut made by the House Armed Services Committee in the administration's original request.

But critics said $2.4 billion of the cut was phony, representing aid no longer needed for South Vietnam and deferral of funds for inflated costs of naval vessels. They set out to try to cut $2 billion more on the House floor.

But chances that any major cuts would be made appeared slim as the first four amendments were voted down.

The closest was a vote of 227 to 164 defeating a proposal to cut out $108 million for long-lead-time procurement items for the B-1 bomber, a proposed successor of the B-52 but still in the research and development stage.

Rep. Les Aspin (D Wis.) led the fight to cut out the money, arguing that it made no sense under the "fly before you buy" system to buy parts for a plane that may never be produced or whose specifications may be changed.

But supporters of the B-1 contended that it is essential to put a new manned bomber into production as soon as possible and that any delay would be trifling with the nation's non-nuclear defense power. The plane is expected to cost about $85 million per aircraft. was a proposal to cut out $567 million for purchase of A-10 close support aircraft whose primary mission is to knock out tanks.

Critics said existing planes can do the job. But supporters said the A-10 can remain over a target area for two to three hours instead of the 30 minutes for currently operational planes and would have been a help in trying to rescue the crew of the American merchant ship Mayaguez.

Rejected 260 to 136, was an amendment to cut $260 million for purchase of three planes for the AWACS airborne-alert program. Critics said its function has been changed three times and called it a "system in search of a mission."

Also defeated 293 to 100, was an attempt to cut out $46 million to begin the program of converting 747s and other large commercial aircraft for use in an emergency military airlift, but meanwhile leaving them in commercial passenger service.

The bill, which only sets spending ceilings, represents about one-fourth of the entire defense budget. The $26.5 billion for the next 12-month period is $5.5 billion above the amount authorized for the current year. The money must be provided later in a separate appropriation bill.

Efforts will be made today to cut back other weapons systems including the Trident missile submarine, to cut back the level of American forces overseas, to make an across-the-board $1.9 billion cut, and to permit women to attend the nation's service academies.

Arms Sale to Jordan Hit

From News Dispatches

Israeli Foreign Minister Yigal Allon yesterday criticized the United States for selling arms to Jordan while withholding weapons from Israel.

The deal with Jordan coupled with an agreement to sell weapons to Saudi Arabia, "is a threat to the balance of power in our area," Allon said.

He also said that the deal with Jordan was not in line with Washington's reassessment of its of Mideast policy, during which it declared a halt to the processing of Israeli arms requests.

The arrangement with Jordan, concluded about the time of King Hussein's visit to Washington, included the sale of 200 antiaircraft missiles.

In the Israeli-occupied West Bank of the Jordan River, an explosion in a Palestinian refugee camp killed a woman and her teen-aged daughter and injured three children, Israeli security forces said.

A demolition team defused a bomb hidden in a paint can in a crowded area of Jerusalem yesterday. Over the past week there has been a sudden upsurge of bombings and attempted bombings in Israel and occupied territories.

Israeli Police Minister Shlomo Hillel told Parliament that 82 persons had been killed as the result of guerrilla activities since April 1974 as compared with nine during the period from April 1973 to April 1974.

In Lebanon, Palestinian guerrillas opened fire on two Lebanese jet fighters on a training flight over the northern party of the country, apparently on the mistaken assumption they were Israeli planes. A Lebanese spokesman said the aircraft escaped unharmed.

According to the Iranian newspaper Rastakhiz, organ of the country's only authorized political party, a secret meeting in Tehran last week between oil-producing and consuming nations paved the way for a world energy conference. A meeting in Paris last month failed to agree on the holding of a conference.

In Paris, where Shah Mohammed Reza Pahlevi arrived following talks in Washington, a spokesman in his party said, "We know of the report from wire services. His majesty the shah has not discussed such a secret meeting any time at his news conferences during his world trip."

A State Department spokesman said, "If they met secretly it was so secret that we do not know about it."

Throughout the Arab world there was angry denunciation by officials and in newspapers of a suggestion by U.S. Defense Secretary James Schlesinger that force might be used against any renewed oil embargo.

Schlesinger said in a U.S. News and World Report interview that "there are economic, political, and conceivably military measures" that might be taken in response to a new embargo.

These were among other developments in the Middle East yesterday:

- Arab chiefs of staff met in Cairo to improve "coordination" and to draw up an agenda for next month's Arab summit. No details were disclosed.
- Syria charged that Iraq has sentenced six persons to death and jailed another 82 for opposing Iraq's recent reconciliation with Iran. The official Syrian news agency said the report proves a Syrian contention that Iraq got its deal with Iran in return to reducing Communist influence in Iraq.

Consulate Protection

The House approved, 276 to 123, a bill to authorize nearly $10 million a year in additional federal protection for foreign diplomatic missions.

The measure would require the Treasury Department, which operates the Executive Protective Service, to provide protection in the six cities outside Washington with 20 or more diplomatic missions—New York, Chicago, Los Angeles, New Orleans, San Francisco and Houston.

The protection would not be provided around the clock as it is in Washington, but would be assigned case by case "in the event of extraordinary protective need . . ."

Critics argued that it amounted to police subsidies for those cities. "There is no reason to ask taxpayers in Maryland, Minnesota and Idaho to share this responsibility," said Rep. Robert E. Bauman (R-Md.).

Digging for 'Scandals' Questioned by Nessen

TIFFIN, Ohio, May 18 (UPI) —Reporters who always look for scandal, mistakes and wrongdoing in every news event and Government official are doing a disservice to themselves and their readers, Ron Nessen, the White House press secretary, said her Sunday.

Delivering the commencement address at Heidelberg College, Mr. Nessen said that excessive concentration by reporters on digging for suspected scandal diverts attention from coverage of events such as the economy and the energy crisis.

"I can tell you from being inside the Government that investigative news reports do affect the conduct of the Government's affairs for the better," said Mr. Nessen, "But a Watergate scandal comes along only once in a lifetime, or, hopefully, it only comes along once in a nation's history."

Soviets Said to Ease U.S. Suspicions of Arms Violations

By Michael Getler
Washington Post Staff Writer

Administration officials close to the U.S.-Soviet strategic arms talks claim that the Russians have eased some U. S. suspicions that they may have been violating or taking advantage of earlier joint agreements on limiting nuclear weapons.

These officials acknowledge that the U. S. military is somewhat less convinced than civilian officials by the Soviet explanations, but insist that progress in putting these issues to rest has been made.

Last fall, some intelligence and military officials were concerned that the Russians were building new missile silos, in violation of a 1972 arms agreement, and camouflaging this construction with claims that the new holes in the ground were for new command posts to control existing missiles.

There was also concern that the Soviets had developed a new mobile radar which could be used as part of an antiballistic missile (ABM) defense system. If true, this could also be a violation of the 1972 treaty limiting rival ABM systems.

Other concerns included claims in some quarters that the Soviets were putting covers over their submarine construction facilities so that U.S. satellites could not monitor how many missile-carrying submarines the Russians were building.

These concerns, which were not shared by many other officials, nevertheless were taken by the United States to the consultative commission set up by both superpowers to air such indications of non-compliance with the initial arms agreements.

According to U.S. officials, the Soviets replied with a considerable amount of technical data to back up their claim that command posts and not additional missiles were being installed.

There are likely to be about 100 such command posts, so this was among the most important concerns of U.S. negotiators.

U.S. officials say the principal concern was that the command post excavations looked just like missile silos and that even if a command post was installed in the underground chamber, it might be designed so that it could be quickly lifted out and be replaced by a missile.

Apparently, the Soviets supplied data showing that the command posts fixtures were permanent and could not be removed and provided other details which presumably would allow U.S. picture-taking satellites to verify the installations as command posts.

The Soviets reportedly also agreed not to operate their new radar during tests of missiles. The Russians apparently claimed the radar was for anti-bomber defense, but the United States felt that if it was operated during missile test flights—to see how it worked—it could also be developed as an ABM radar.

The dispute over allegedly covering up submarine construction areas reportedly dissolved after the Soviets made similar allegations about the United States.

As Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger and Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko are meeting in Vienna to try to work out problems that still stand in the way of a new arms accord being signed at a September summit meeting in this country, there have been indications of shifting U.S. positions on several issues.

Kissinger, who originally insisted that any missile tested with MIRV-type multiple warheads would be counted as MIRVed when deployed, apparently will back away somewhat from that position.

The Soviets are known to have deployed only a single warhead version of their big new SS-18 missiles thus far, though it has been tested about 10 times with multiple warheads.

The United States apparently is willing to allow the Russians to deploy perhaps 100 of these big missiles and count them as single warheads, if the Russians agree that they will not field any newer missiles that have both a single-warhead and multiple-warhead capability.

All told, the Russians are allowed slightly more than 300 of these big missiles and it is assumed the remainder will be counted as MIRVed.

Though the Soviets have tested the SS-18 with MIRVs, some U.S. officials believe there have not been enough tests for the Soviets to have confidence in it as an accurate MIRV weapon.

Thus, they believe that there is little risk in allowing the Soviets to count some missiles as carrying only one warhead.

This arrangement is viewed as almost certain to draw criticism from some on Capitol Hill, including Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.).

Presumably, it will be argued by critics that the United States will not be able to tell if the Soviets at some point convert the single-warhead SS-18 to a multiple-warhead version.

The United States is also known to be shifting its position on the new Russian "Backfire" bomber. Originally this new twin-jet bomber was not even mentioned in the proposed new arms accord to be signed later this year.

Now, however, the administration apparently wants the Russians to count it in the total of 2,400 individual strategic weapons each side is allowed.

North Korea says U.S. threatens nuclear war

Tokyo (AP)—North Korea said yesterday the United States considers South Korea a forward defense area and that U.S. officials have said "they would not hesitate" to use nuclear weapons in Korea if necessary.

A broadcast by the official (North) Korean Central News Agency alleged that President Ford and other American officials, as part of a pledge of continued military support to the South Korean government, said recently they would "launch all-out military intervention if necessary and would not hesitate in the use of nuclear weapons."

Asked for comment on the North Korean charge, Robert Funseth, a State Department spokesman, said "That's nonsense."

The North Korean broadcast said the U.S. will be "chased out of Korea and all other regions of Asia to the last man by the anti-imperialist revolutionary struggle of the Asian people as they were kicked out of Indochina."

The broadcast said U.S. "boasting" over the rescue of the merchant ship Mayaguez from Cambodia is the "last-ditch effort of those falling into decay. The U.S. imperialists calculate that they can stay in Asia as ever with strength. But this is a serious miscalculation."

The broadcast said the regime of South Korea's President Chung Hee Park "will perish for good" if it defies North Korea's "serious warnings."

The North Korean broadcast said President Park has spoken of giving up efforts toward a dialogue with the North and instead to "fight and win," and that he had taken steps to suppress the South Korean people.

Mr. Park and his co-leaders "are in a miserable position of lonely puppets as their fellow puppets of Asia such as Lon Nol of Cambodia and [Nguyen Van] Thieu of South Vietnam bit the dust one after another," the broadcast said.

It said the Park government uses the "sheer fabrication" of the threat of a North Korean invasion to divert the attention of the South Korean people and split the ranks of movements against Mr. Park's one-man rule.

Mayaguez Rescue Toll Revised

Again

The Pentagon once again revised its estimate of casualties in the Mayaguez rescue operation, reporting yesterday that 49 Americans were wounded.

Spokesman Joseph Laitin said the number of wounded was being reduced "for the time being" from the 70-to-80 estimate made Sunday by Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger. The toll of dead remained at five, with 16 listed as missing.

Officials at the Pentagon and the White House denied that the extent of U.S. casualties had been withheld purposely. There wasn't "any intention to hide any bad news," presidential press secretary Ron Nessen said yesterday.

"The President wants those figures as much as you do," Nessen said. "He is somewhat puzzled about the length of time it has taken."

Pentagon sources said the difficulty in obtaining an accurate casualty figure was due to the fact that the approximately 200 Marines and the Air Force crewmen flying them into action in helicopters were widely dispersed after the mission.

Thus, the military says, it has been difficult to get an accurate count of the surviving Marines. There is even some uncertainty, according to some sources, about precisely how many Marines were involved in the operation.

Many of the wounded, according to one Marine source, were "in the band-aid category," and only one Marine is so seriously wounded that he might not survive.

"There were a couple of headaches, some mild concussions and some slight hearing-loss reports," the source told United Press International. He said he suspected the concussions and hearing loss might have resulted from the dropping on Tang Island of a 15,000-pound bomb, the largest non-nuclear weapon in the U.S. arsenal.

The Pentagon also released yesterday the names of three of the servicemen killed. They are: Air Force 2d Lt. Richard Vendegeer, of Buckland, Mass.; Air Force S. Sgt. Elwood E. Rumbaugh, of Dothan, Ala., and Marine Lance Cpl. Ashton N. Loney, of Albany, N.Y.

Pentagon spokesman Laitin said the United States was making no efforts to search for bodies lost at sea. But the State Department acknowledged that it had contacted the International Red Cross in an effort to get the Cambodians to return any bodies that might have been left on the island.

Laitin said, "We are pretty certain no one was left alive on the island."

White House press secretary Nessen said he mas mistaken in announcing last week that Huang Chen, representative here of the People's Republic of China, returned a note to the State Department which he had been asked to transmit to Cambodia in connection with the Mayaguez seizure.

Actually, Nessen said, the Chinese representative declined to accept the message. The same message was given to the Chinese foreign ministry in Peking by George Bush, the American representative there, and it was returned the next day, Nessen said.

Washington—Tension between the United States and Thailand faded yesterday after the U.S. expressed official regret for "misunderstandings" arising from the rescue of the SS Mayaguez and its crew.

In Bangkok, Premier Kukrit Pramoj promptly treated the U.S diplomatic note as an apology "We shouldn't have any more trouble," he announced as hundreds of student demonstrators left the gates of the U.S. Embassy

Thai officials objected vigorously to U.S. use of a base in Thailand by marines engaged in seizing the Mayaguez back from Cambodia last week. Thailand has attempted, with mixed results, to come to political terms with its neighbors following Communist victories in Cambodia and South Vietnam.

In the State Department, a spokesman refused to characterize the note delivered in Bangkok by Edward E. Masters, deputy chief of the U.S. mission. Asked whether it was an apology, Robert E Funseth, the deputy press spokesman, said merely "I would just like to leave it where it is. We presented the note and they have accepted it."

The language of the note was open to different interpretations. Specifically, the U.S offered only "regrets for misunderstandings" arising from "unique circumstances [which] are not going to be repeated." Thailand's acceptance, a U.S. official said, "got us both off the hook."

The gesture to Thailand was only one in a series of developments resulting from the armed U.S. response to the seizure of the merchant vessel. In another, President Ford made known his irritation that the Defense Department, six days after the event, still is uncertain about the extent of U.S. casualties.

After one revision, a Defense Department spokesman said yesterday that the number of known dead remains at 5, with 16 missing. The number of wounded was revised downward to 49 from the "70 to 80" reported Sunday.

Joseph Laitin, assistant secretary of defense, said he hopes to have a "preliminary final figure" today. Of the five known dead, two were Air Force men and the rest marines.

The names of three of the dead were made public yesterday after notification of their families. They were Air Force Lt. Richard Vandegeer, of Buckland, Mass.; Air Force Sgt. Elwood E. Rumbaugh, of Dothan, Ala., and Marine Lance Cpl. Ashton N. Loney, of Albany, N.Y. Mr. Laitin said he could offer little hope for the survival of the missing, most of whom were believed to have perished in helicopter crashes at sea.

He added that he could "almost rule out the possibility" that any Americans were left alive on Koh Tang Island, the point of the brief U.S. invasion. The Mayaguez was seized there by the marines, though its crew of 39, later released by the Cambodians, had been transferred to another nearby island.

Ronald H. Nessen, White House press secretary, said Mr. Ford is "frustrated" and "somewhat puzzled" by the delay in reporting of precise casualty figures. Military officials explained that some marines had been separated from their units in the evacuation of Koh Tang Island and that casualties had been taken to separate hospitals in the Western Pacific.

Administration officials left no doubt, however, that they regarded the operation as an unambiguous success, both politically and militarily.

In that respect they assessed the outcome on several levels. Militarily it was a success simply because it worked, even though the operation was launched while the precise location of the Mayaguez's crew was unknown.

Politically it was regarded as a success, first, because Americans supported the use of force for the specific purpose of rescuing a single ship and its crew. More generally, in the official assessment, it demonstrated to the world that defeat in South Vietnam had not stripped the U.S. public of its will to use force when the circumstances required it.

This judgment prevailed even though further political setbacks are expected. U.S. officials said they expect Thailand to continue to loosen ties with Washington, even though the diplomatic note yesterday eased immediate tensions. The government in Bangkok has demanded the removal of the 29,000 Americans still there within a year

North Koreans Report Big Sihanouk Welcome

TOKYO, May, 19 (AP) — Prince Norodom Sihanouk, head of state of Cambodia, arrived in Pyongyang, the North Korean capital, today and was warmly greeted by President Kim Il Sung and tens of thousands of workers, a broadcast said.

The Communists' press agency said Prince Sihanouk was welcomed as "the good will envoy of the heroic Cambodian people, who won a great victory in their struggle against United States aggression and for national salvation."

Prince Sihanouk has lived in Peking since his overthrow in 1970 by Marshal Lon Nol, whose Government fell to Communist-led forces on April 17. A recent report from Peking said he did not plan to return to Phnom Penh uneil after the Cambodian capital was "rehabilitated."

WASHINGTON (UPI) -- DEFENSE-MINDED HOUSE MEMBERS HAVE SO FAR PREVENTED CRITICS OF PENTAGON SPENDING FROM CUTTING ANY MONEY FROM A $32 BILLION WEAPONS PROCUREMENT BILL.
FOUR SEPARATE PROPOSALS THAT WOULD HAVE SLICED NEARLY $1 BILLION FROM THE AUTHORIZATION MEASURE WERE EASILY REJECTED MONDAY AND THE HOUSE MOVED TOWARD FINAL PASSAGE TODAY. THE SENATE WILL START DEBATE LATER THIS WEEK ON ITS $30.3 BILLION VERSION OF THE SAME BILL.
THE PRIME TARGET OF THE CRITICS WAS THE B1 BOMBER. SO FAR, THREE PROTOTYPES HAVE BEEN BUILT AND ONE HAS BEEN FLOWN. THE PENTAGON WANTS 244 OF THEM, DESIGNED TO REPLACE THE AGING B52 AS THE NATION'S HEAVY BOMBER FOR NUCLEAR WAR AND OTHER MAJOR MISSIONS.
AN EFFORT TO CUT $108 MILLION FOR CONSTRUCTION OF A FOURTH PROTOTYPE WAS DEFEATED MONDAY, 227-164. A NEW EFFORT IS EXPECTED TO DELETE ALL OF THE $948.5 MILLION IN THE MEASURE FOR THE B1.
REP. LES ASPIN, D-WIS., A PENTAGON CRITIC, SAID "BOMBERS ARE OBSOLETE IN THIS DAY OF MISSILES," BUT A STRONG PENTAGON SUPPORTER, REP. JOE D. WAGGONNER JR., D-LA., SAID "IF YOU DO AWAY WITH CONVENTIONAL WEAPONS THEN YOU HASTEN THE DAY OF THE NUCLEAR HOLOCAUST BECAUSE YOU WON'T HAVE ANY WEAPONS LEFT TO FIGHT A CONVENTIONAL WAR."
REP. F. EDWARD HEBERT, D-LA., FORMER ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE CHAIRMAN, SAID "THE SOVIETS ARE VITALLY INTERESTED IN WHAT THIS HOUSE DOES ABOUT THE B1 BOMBER. THEY DON'T WANT IT. I WOULD HOPE WE WOULD HAVE THE GUTS TO KEEP THIS PROGRAM GOING."

AID 5-20
DAY LD
BY STEVE GERSTEL
WASHINGTON (UPI) -- THE SENATE HAS VOTED TO LIFT THE EMBARGO ON U.S. MILITARY AID TO TURKEY, GIVING A NARROW VOTE OF CONFIDENCE TO THE FORD-KISSINGER EFFORTS AT SEEKING A CYPRUS SETTLEMENT.
THE SENATE VOTED 41-40 TO SUSPEND THE EMBARGO, WHICH HAS BEEN IN EFFECT SINCE FEB. 5. THE HOUSE STILL MUST ACT.
BUT HIGH ADMINISTRATION OFFICIALS TOLD CHAIRMAN JOHN J. SPARKMAN, D-ALA., OF THE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE THAT SENATE ACTION ALONE MIGHT "ADD MOVEMENT" TO TURKEY-GREECE DISCUSSIONS OVER CYPRUS.
SENATE DEMOCRATIC LEADER MIKE MANSFIELD SAID PASSAGE OF THE BILL WAS "A FIRST STEP BUT A MOST IMPORTANT ONE TO BRING ABOUT A SETTLEMENT OF THE CYPRUS SITUATION WHICH, IN THE LONG RUN, WOULD BE IN THE BEST INTEREST OF GREECE, OF CYPRUS, OF TURKEY, AND THE UNITED STATES."
CONGRESS LAST YEAR IMPOSED THE EMBARGO AFTER TURKEY INVADED CYPRUS FOLLOWING A COUP WHICH TOPPLED THE MAKARIOS GOVERNMENT. CONGRESSIONAL BACKERS OF THE BAN CLAIMED TURKEY VIOLATED THE AGREEMENT UNDER WHICH IT RECEIVED ARMS AID. THE AGREEMENT STIPULATED THAT THE WEAPONS AND AMMUNITION COULD BE USED ONLY IN SELF-DEFENSE.
CONGRESS GRANTED TWO GRACE PERIODS, THE SECOND OF WHICH EXPIRED FEB. 5.
UNDER TERMS OF THE SENATE-PASSED BILL, THE UNITED STATES COULD RESUME ARMS AID IF TURKEY OBSERVED THE CEASE-FIRE, DID NOT INCREASE ITS FORCES ON THE ISLAND AND DID NOT SHIFT ANY U.S. ARMS TO CYPRUS.
SUPPORTERS OF THE BILL -- SOME OF THEM WITH A NOTABLE LACK OF ENTHUSIASM -- SAID THE LIFTING OF THE EMBARGO WAS NEEDED TO GIVE PRESIDENT FORD AND SECRETARY OF STATE HENRY A. KISSINGER FLEXIBILITY IN SEEKING A SOLUTION TO THE DISPUTE.
CHAIRMAN JOHN C. STENNIS, D-MISS., OF THE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE, SAID THE "BEST HOPE FOR A SOLUTION IS TO REMOVE THE HANDCUFFS FROM OUR PRESIDENT AND ALLOW HIM TO MANEUVER AS THE SITUATION DICTATES."
KISSINGER IS DUE TO MEET WITH THE TURKS AND GREEKS IN ANKARA WEDNESDAY AND FORD AT A NATO SUMMIT MEETING LATER THIS MONTH.
SEN. THOMAS F. EAGLETON, D-MO., LEADING THE OPPOSITION, NOTED TURKISH THREATS TO CLOSE U.S. BASES BUT ADDED "THAT IS NOT THE ISSUE.
"THE REAL QUESTION IS WHETHER THE UNITED STATES CAN AFFORD TO SUCCUMB TO BLACKMAIL," EAGLETON SAID. "IF THE UNITED STATES MAKES AN EXCEPTION TO AN IMPORTANT BILATERAL AGREEMENT TO SATISFY TURKISH DEMANDS FOR A RESUMPTION OF AID, WE WILL LEAVE AMERICAN BASES AROUND THE WORLD OPEN TO DIPLOMATIC EXTORTION."

U.S. warns North Koreans

WASHINGTON [UPI] — Defense Secretary James Schlesinger said Sunday that the United States might "go for the heart of the opponent's power" if North Korea invaded South Korea. He also held out the possibility of using military force to counter another Arab oil embargo.

Obviously buoyed by the recapture of the freighter Mayaguez from Cambodia and the liberation of its crew, Schlesinger predicted that the U.S. will follow a bold, no-nonsense policy toward direct aggressors in the post-Viet Nam era.

In an interview in U.S. News & World Report magazine, he said the nation learned lessons from its Viet Nam experience that will apply to future conflicts.

"U.S. COMMITMENTS to Northeast Asia—to Korea as well as to Japan—will be perceived as something no one should challenge," Schlesinger said.

Pressed for details on exactly how the U.S. would react to a North Korean invasion, he said:

"One of the lessons of the Vietnamese conflict is that rather than simply counter your opponent's thrusts, it is necessary to go for the heart of the opponent's power—destroy his military forces, rather than simply being involved endlessly in ancillary military operations."

Discussing the possibility of another oil embargo, Schlesinger said: "I think we are less likely to be tolerant of a renewed embargo than we were of the initial one in 1973."

ASKED WHAT he meant by "less tolerant," he replied:

"I'm not going to indicate

SADAT WILL SPEAK FOR ARAB NATIONS AT FORD MEETING

By HENRY TANNER
Special to The New York Times

DAMASCUS, Syria, May 18—President Anwar el-Sadat, winding up a week-long tour of four Arab nations, declared here today that he had obtained a mandate to speak for the Arab world, not just Egypt, when he meets with President Ford in Salzburg, Austria, on June 1.

Speaking at a news conference as Yasir Arafat, the head of the Palestine Liberation Organization, sat next to him, Mr. Sadat made it plain that he felt his trip had strengthened the Egyptian negotiating position.

Egyptian officials had said that the prime purpose of Mr. Sadat's trip was to create an Arab consensus on a Geneva peace conference and on what Arab governments expect from the United States.

Arrived From Jordan

Mr. Sadat arrived here last night from Jordan, Where he conferred with King Hussein. Earlier in the week he held lengthy private talks with the leaders of Iraq and Kuwait. Last night and again this morning he talked for several hours alone with President Hafez al-Assad of Syria.

Informed Arab diplomats from several countries said that the talks had led to an emerging consensus on the following points:

¶The Arabs insist that the Palestine Liberation Organization, the umbrella group for the guerrillas, attend the Geneva

U.S., Soviets To Focus on Arms Limits

By Murrey Marder
Washington Post Staff Writer

VIENNA, May 18—In talks opening here Monday, Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger and Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko are expected to explore a compromise to break a stalemate in the strategic nuclear arms negotiations.

Kissinger arrived in this Austrian capital tonight for a two-day review with Gromyko of the prospects for quickening the delayed pace of detente. The dominant subjects are the slowed-down strategic arms limitation talks (SALT) and the continuing threat of warfare in the Middle East.

"We will make every effort to improve prospects for peace," Kissinger said as he was greeted by Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky.

Newsmen were told of American hopes that the Soviet Union will not attempt to exploit major setbacks to U.S. policy since the previous Kissinger-Gromyko talks, in Geneva last February. The U.S. defeat in Indochina and collapse of Kissinger's Arab-Israeli shuttle diplomacy in March are hardly overcome by the display of American force in the freeing of the S.S. Mayaguez and its crew off Cambodia last week, U.S. officials concede. The Mayaguez affair, however, relieved the Ford administration of the "humiliation" it feared it might suffer from bargaining with Cambodia over basic American rights at a sensitive stage in U.S.-Soviet relations.

Pentagon lifts toll to 5 dead

Rescued crew says marines hit wrong isle

From Wire Services

The Defense Department yesterday said 5 American servicemen were killed and 70 to 80 men wounded in the rescue of the U.S. freighter Mayaguez and its 39-man crew from Cambodian captivity—with many of the losses coming in an invasion of what proved to be the wrong island.

James R. Schlesinger, the Defense Secretary, said in a Washington television interview yesterday that 16 men still are listed as missing.

"They hit the wrong island," said Bill Bellinger, 52, a mess attendant from Washington who was aboard the Mayaguez. "We were 25 miles away from the island the marines landed on. They went where they thought we were."

Meanwhile, a senior American official yesterday said the U.S. seriously considered B-52 bombing raids on Cambodia last week in order to recapture the American merchant ship and its crew.

Speaking aboard the plane of the Secretary of State, Henry A. Kissinger, en route to Vienna and talks with the Soviet Foreign Minister, Andrei A. Gromyko, the official said no one in the Ford administration wanted to use the big bombers.

ARMS ... CONTINUED

Kissinger were told that the National security Council's nuclear strategy "verification panel" met at the White House yesterday to coordinate policy for these Kissinger-Gromyko negotiations.

The United States is now described as prepared to consider a possible compromise on a technical but key issue deadlocked in SALT—how to verify the ceiling figures on strategic nuclear delivery systems agreed upon by President Ford and Soviet leader Leonid I. Brezhnev at Vladivostok last November.

It was decided then that each country would be limited to 2,400 strategic vehicles, including missiles and long-range bombers. Of those, no more than 1,320 could carry multiple warheads, known by the acronym MIRV.

Until now, the United States has said publicly that it would insist on counting as MIRVs all Soviet missiles tested with multiple warheads. In the detailed negotiations at Geneva, which recessed in an impasse last week, the Soviets balked at the American "counting rules." They proposed a formula to preserve the right to put either multiple or single warheads on some of the same missiles.

Newsmen were told that the United States is now prepared to consider other means to distinguish between single and multiple warheads, provided there is adequate verification of what types are used within the established ceilings.

The United States already has submitted to the Soviets some alternate ideas to combine approaches to this obstacle and other problems in SALT, it was learned.

Kissinger and Gromyko, who arrives here Monday, are not expected to get into technical negotiations, but to concentrate on a political compromise. If Gromyko offers movement on the Soviet side, the results will be reviewed at another White House meeting Saturday. Kissinger plans to be back in Washington then, after a week's tour which includes stops in Bonn, West Berlin, and an annual review meeting of the Central Treaty Organization in Ankara, Turkey, on Thursday and Friday.

Kissinger told a news conference Friday that arms limitation talks are "now at a point where a political decision will have to be made by both sides to move the negotiations forward and to break some of the deadlocks."

The Middle East is expected to be the prime topic of the Kissinger-Gromyko talks Tuesday.

The Soviet Union has been pressing to shift the Arab-Israeli negotiations to a renewed Geneva conference since the failure of Kissinger's March attempt to achieve a second Egyptian-Israeli military disengagement. But the Tunis (Reuter)—Soviet Prime Minister Alexei N. Kosygin had a first round of talks with President Habib Bourguiba of Tunisia yesterday morning. Another round is planned this morning just before Mr. Kosygin leaves after a two-day official visit.

Soviets also are wary about getting stuck with demanding a conference that ends in similar failure.

The Soviets will be pressing the United States on its intentions in Middle East diplomacy. Kissinger reportedly will tell Gromyko the United States cannot supply an answer until after the scheduled talk between President Ford and Egyptian President Anwar Sadat in nearby Salzburg on June 1 and 2, and a meeting between the President and Israeli Premier Yitzhak Rabin in Washington in early June, and perhaps talks with other leaders.

Gromyko, in a speech last Wednesday, chided Kissinger's step-by-step diplomatic Middle East effort, saying these approaches "ought to really be called 'the tactics of step-by-step further away from a settlement.' " That was an unusual personal jab at Kissinger by the Soviet foreign minister.

American officials, however, have chosen to treat Gromyko's remarks as "tit-for-tat" tactics, rather than bristling over them. Kissinger has reproached the Soviet Union in recent warnings that Soviet temptations "to exploit strategic opportunities" constitute "a heavy mortgage on detente." [The Soviet Communist Party newspaper Pravda published a strong endorsement of detente on the eve of the Kissinger-Gromyko meeting, news services reported from Moscow.]

Kissinger is counting on one expected development in the Senate to alleviate a problem on another front—strained U.S. relations with Turkey over the Greek-Turkish-Cyprus tangle. Senate majority leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) reportedly has informed Kissinger that he will call up a bill Monday—to suspend the Feb. 5 congressional cutoff on U.S. military aid to Turkey.

Without parallel action by the House, which is said to be out of the question, the Senate action could only be a token gesture toward Turkey. Kissinger, however, seeks to use it diplomatically as a show of goodwill, with hope that the gesture can be built upon diplomatically to make some progress in the Cyprus dispute that could induce the House to rescind the ban on U.S. aid to Turkey.

conference as a separate delegation, and Mr. Sadat will seek to persuade President Ford to join the Soviet Union in inviting the Palestinians to the conference.

¶King Hussein, in a major policy shift, is reported to have indicated that he may be willing to attend the Geneva conference without professing to speak for the Palestinians.

¶Mr. Sadat has assured Syria that he will not resume negotiations for a bilateral disengagement agreement with Israel, which broke down during Secretary of State Kissinger's last diplomatic mission in March.

¶Mr. Sadat will ask Mr. Ford to state publicly that the United States wants Israel to return to the lines that her forces held before the war of June, 1967.

¶Mr. Sadat has started an arbitration procedure that he hopes will lead to a settlement of the feud between Syria and Iraq.

King Hussein's attitude toward the Geneva conference was the most important subject discussed by the King and Mr. Sadat in Amman yesterday, according to informed sources.

In the past the King has taken the position that Jordan has no place at the conference because Arab leaders at their summit meeting in Rabat, Morocco, last October decided to recognize the P.L.O. rather than Jordan as the legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, including those in Jordan.

Egypt and other moderate Arab nations want Jordan to be present at the talks since she is a neighbor of Israel and a military power facing Israeli forces on a 200-mile front.

Mr. Sadat, before the Rabat meeting, had agreed with King Hussein that Jordan should speak for the Palestinians at Geneva. His assumption, and that of King Hussein, was that the Israelis might be willing to return occupied territory to Jordan but not to the P.L.O. This position was overruled by the other Arab leaders.

Rabat Decisions Irreversible

During his tour now, Mr. Sadat is understood to have concurred with the leaders of Kuwait, Iraq and Syria that the decisions made at Rabat cannot be reversed.

He withdrew his suggestions that the Arab League should represent the Palestinians in the initial phase of the conference or that the Arabs should form a single delegation that would include Palestinian members.

Informed Arab diplomats today said, however, that the Arabs would not insist that the Palestinians attend the conference from the beginning. They do insist, the diplomats said, that the principle of independent Palestinian participation be established from the outset. This position is believed to have the support of Mr. Arafat.

Mr. Sadat is expected to press this proposal at his Salzburg meeting with President Ford. The United States and the Soviet Union are co-chairmen of the Geneva conference and will have to send out invitations.

Seeks July Conference

Egypt is understood to be pressing for a resumption of the Geneva conference in July.

Egyptian officials said here today that they thought the consultations with the other Arab leaders had strengthened Mr. Sadat's negotiating position for his talks with Mr. Ford and also for Geneva.

They said that even the Iraqis had told Mr. Sadat that while they disagree with the entire negotiating process that he advocates, they wish him success and will not embarass him.

Meanwhile, members of President Sadat's entourage categorically denied that Egypt intends to seek American financial assistance to settle Egypt's huge debt to the Soviet Union.

This was not what the President said or what he meant in an interview published by the Lebanese weekly Al Hawadess and quoted by The New York Times and other papers, the Egyptian sources said.

Specific Uses for Aid

American financial aid for the current fiscal year and for next year has been clearly earmarked for specific purposes, the sources said. It permits the purchase of such things as wheat, machinery, industrial spare parts and desperately needed improvements in the port of Alexandria, Egypt's only major harbor, which is badly clogged.

American aid this year is $250-million dollars and is expected to rise to $350-million next year.

There is no connection between American financial assistance and the Egyptian debt to the Soviet Union, the sources said.

Mr. Sadat has asked the Soviet leaders to reschedule Egypt's huge dept, but his request has been rejected, he has stated.

Economic Needs Cited

In this situation, informed sources said, the Egyptian treasury will make payments to the Soviet Union only to the extent that vital Egyptian needs permit.

They cited theseveral hundred million dollars the Government is spending on subsidies to industry and agriculture as well as the need to improve the country's economic structure, which has been neglected because of the heavy military expenditures arising from the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Egypt is heavily dependent on financial assistance from the Arab oil-producing countries. Some of these Arab contributions go straight into the national budget and thus, by reducing other burdens, would enable Egypt to make larger payments to the Soviet Union, the sources said.

United States assistance, if it became heavy, also would strengthen Egypt's financial position and hence indirectly improve Egypt's ability to repay her creditors.

PENTAGON ..... CONTINUED

But he added such raids were a real possibility once it was decided that some kind of military action was necessary to carry off the rescue.

The official expressed anger over reports being leaked about the B-52 option, saying such acts make operation of the government nearly impossible.

A President must have the latitude to look at all the options, he said, without having someone reveal the alternatives in order to take credit for preventing them from being implemented.

The official did not say who might have leaked information about the B-52 idea and added there is no reason to think it occurred in the Pentagon.

It is known that Mr. Kissinger and Mr Schlesinger were in disagreement during the Mayaguez crisis, with the secretary of state pushing for quicker and harder military action than the Pentagon chief.

A Pentagon spokesman confirmed Mr. Bellinger's statement about invading the wrong island, saying that at the time, of the invasion, there was no firm information on the crew's location.

"The launch was made against the island where we knew the ship was on the presumption that some or all of the crew might be there," he said. "As things turned out, they apparently were on an island 25 miles away."

"They probably were unaware we had left the island," said Capt. Charles T. Miller, 62, of Fountain Valley, Calif. "I guess the marines from the destroyer escorts were not informed. They were coming from Subic in the Philippines and the surveillance planes were from someplace else."

The captain said the men were on an island his charts identified as Rong San Lem, about 25 miles from Koh Tang, also known as Tang Island. According to Pentagon reports, about 200 marines landed on the beach at Koh Tang and remained under heavy Cambodian fire for about 10 hours after the freed Mayaguez crew reached the destroyer U.S.S. Wilson.

Speculation about the marine landing on Koh Tang came during a shipboard post-mortem while 20 new crew members flown from the United States signed aboard the vessel. Twenty-one of the 39 men who were held captive will leave for home, Captain Miller said.

The casualty figures disclosed yesterday by Mr. Schlesinger still do not jibe with those of Captain Miller, who said Saturday he knows of at least seven marines killed.

The captain reiterated yesterday that seven dead marines already were "on ice" when he victims of a helicopter crash.

Until yesterday, the Defense Department was reporting 1 marine dead, 13 missing and 22 wounded.

"The numbers are a little bit higher than was initially released," Mr. Schlesinger said on the ABC program Issues and Answers. "As a result of the reassessment . . . I think the current indication is something like three marines and two airmen were killed . . . that is the general indication."

Mr. Schlesinger said he believes Captain Miller was in error when he told a press conference in Singapore that he had seen seven bodies aboard the Wilson.

"I think the captain was in error," the defense secretary said. "Those probably referred to wounded marines rather than marines who had been killed."

Asked about protests by Thailand over use of the air base there for the operation, Mr. Schlesinger said it was necessary for the United States to take the action it did.

"We took a response under the circumstances that was firm and judicious," he said. "It accomplished the objectives. This has been, including an element of good fortune, a very successful operation and I would not change it."

Of the diplomatic impact on Thailand and other Southeast Asian allies, Mr. Schlesinger said: "The main point is the United States must take action to defend the right of innocent passage, to defend the right of freedom of the seas. . . . I do not think, given the direct circumstances, that the United States could have reacted otherwise.

"We took an action that was firm and was also right."

Asked whether inability to communicate with the Cambodian government—in the absence of diplomatic relations—contributed to the situation, Mr Schlesinger said the issue of recognizing the Cambodian and South Vietnamese governments would have to be reviewed by the State Department.

"It is difficult at best, even for those prepared to recognize the Cambodian government, to communicate with it," he added.

He defended the operation against charges that U.S. bombers attacked the Cambodian mainland after the Mayaguez crew had boarded the Wilson, that the bombings were conducted to "teach the Cambodians a lesson."

"In all some 15 tactical air sorties were directed against the mainland. . . . This was a very prudent, limited use of force. . . . The motivation was clearly to protect the marines on the island [of Koh Tang]. The marines still were engaged on the island."

Captain Miller said the Mayaguez, which is named for a city in Puerto Rico, was scheduled to depart for Hong Kong before dawn today. He said much of its cargo had been unloaded during the night and replaced with Hong Kong-bound freight. The cargo was not opened when the containers were taken off the ship, but the ship's owners said it included only non-military goods.

The captain also said he had heard the Thai government does not want the Mayaguez to visit again at Bangkok or the port of Sattahip and that the ship would be transferred to the Hong Kong-Subic Bay (Philippines), run by its company, Sea-Land. Thailand, concerned about relations with its new Communist neighbors, has strongly protested the use of U.S. bases in Thailand to launch the rescue.

any prospective reaction other than to point out there are economic, political, or—conceivably—military, measures in response."

Schlesinger said the call for "no more Viet Nams" "does not necessarily mean the American people are flatly opposed to military solutions to problems.

"The main point is that the U.S. fares far better under situations in which there is an unambiguous assault—an unprovoked aggression, an attack across a line of demarcation—than it does under conditions such as those which existed in Viet Nam," he said.

"IF THE interests of the U.S. are openly and clearly attacked, I think that the response of the American public will be to fulfill the obligations into which we have entered.

"By contrast, I think the expression 'no more Viet Nams' refers to getting involved in what is perceived to be unclear and ambiguous internal turmoil."

Schlesinger also said the U.S. now has "a smaller percentage of men under arms" than it did after the World War II demobilization, and "he proportion of our public expenditures going for defense is the lowest since before Pearl Harbor."

HE SAID the trend of shrinking U.S. military power and expanding Soviet power must be halted if the U.S. is to maintain a workable detente with the Soviets.

"I do not think that it is all that difficult to convey to the U.S. public that a military equilibrium underlies detente," he said, "Military strength and peace go together."

Mrs. Binh Briefs 9 Envoys

South Vietnamese Foreign Minister Nguyen Thi Binh has briefed envoys of nine Communist countries and received their assurances of support in expanding the revolution, the Vietcong radio reported yesterday.

Mrs. Binh received ambassadors of the Soviet Union, China, Cambodia, Cuba, East Germany, Hungary, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia and Romania on Saturday, the radio said. Apparently they met in Saigon.

The briefing on the "situation after the /April 30? liberation" included "certain subjects which could reinforce links between the countries," the broadcast added.

The nine ambassadors assured they would "continue to support and aid our people in its efforts to protect and expand the results of the dazzling revolution," it said.

According to the same broadcast, another 400 prisoners from the Conson Island "tiger cages" returned to Saigon, bringing the total released to 1,300.

The Provisional Revolutionary Government ordered workers at Tansonnhut airport under the previous government to return to their jobs so that international flights could resume.

Finally, the radio acknowledged that people are starving but said the new rulers have distributed 1,100 tons of rice to more than 220,000 persons. It said committees have been formed to make citizens realize that "the present starvation is caused by the former regime."

U.S. Sends Bangkok Apology

BANGKOK, May 19 (Monday) (AP)—The U.S. government sent a note Monday to the Thai government expressing regret for the unauthorized use of Thai bases as a takeoff-point for the rescue of the crew of the freighter Mayaguez. The note stopped short of the apology demanded by the Bangkok government.

The note U.S. charge d'affaires Edward Masters handed to Thai Foreign Minister Chatichai Choonhavan pledged that "the unique circumstances that have led to the recent turn of events . . . are not going to be repeated."

"The United States regrets misunderstandings that have arisen between Thailand and the United States in the recent temporary placement of Marines at Utapao Air Base to assist in the recovery of the SS Mayaguez," the note said.

There was no immediate indication whether this would satisfy the Thai government. Premier Kukrit Pramoj said earlier that an expression of regret by Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger at a news conference last week was insufficient.

Kukrit today rejected a demand for a speedup in the withdrawal of the remaining 25,000 U.S. troops in Thailand.

Socialist party leaders and student activists had urged the premier last week to speed up the withdrawal because of the use of Thai bases in the American operation to free the Mayaguez.

The United States has agreed to withdraw 5,500 troops by the end of June and the rest within a year.

Students burned effigies of Uncle Sam and Kissinger in front of the U.S. embassy Sunday after an all-night vigil to back demands that Washington apologize for using Thailand in the rescue of the Mayaguez.

The students tore from the embassy gate the remnant of the American eagle seal they had defaced on Saturday and replaced it with a cartoon eagle bearing the inscription, "Bandit's Hideaway."

The crowd listened to speeches most of the day Sunday and then began to disperse after learning the foreign minister had set the Tuesday deadline for an apology.

A 61-union labor group—not a formidable force in Thailand—joined students in demanding withdrawal of U.S. troops as soon as possible and threatened "drastic action" against American acitivities in Thailand if there is no apology. It did not specify any action.

Several legislators have demanded a special parliamentary session on U.S.-Thai military agreements, but it will take days to get under way.

Chatichai told student representatives at his home that Thai Ambassador to Washington Anand Panyarachun, who has been recalled but is still in the United States, would be instructed to wait no longer before returning home if the apology was not received by Tuesday. Chatichai also said he would summon U.S. diplomats here for discussions.

Thailand, wanting to shake its identification with the U.S. war effort in Vietnam and get relations off on a safe footing with its new Communist neighbors, objected to the dispatch of more than 1,000 Marines to Thailand without Bangkok's permission and to the fact that American planes made bombing and strafing runs from bases here in efforts to free the merchant ship.

Prime Minister Kukrit told newsmen the United States could still have good relations with Thailand, its last ally on the Southeast Asian mainland, if Washington apologizes for its disregard of official Thai requests.

Thailand also is reviewing its military and economic agreements with the United States because of the Mayaguez affair. Under a secret agreement made in the 1960s, the United States still has 25,000 troops and 350 military aircraft at four bases in Thailand, but it has agreed to remove 5,500 by the end of June. The Thai government says it wants the rest out by March.

Russia fears China is stealing its friends

Moscow Bureau of The Sun

Moscow—The Soviet Union is showing signs of serious concern that China is succeeding in outflanking it with new diplomatic moves.

Moscow appears especially worried that the warm welcome given Teng Hsiao-ping, the Chinese deputy premier, in Paris last week will mark the start of a general warming of China's relations with Western Europe.

Similarly, Moscow is expressing concern that the earlier visit to Peking of a delegation of Japan's Socialist party, which had pushed the improvement of Soviet-Japanese relations for many years, will lend considerable weight to the movement in Japan to put ties with China ahead of those with the Soviet Union if a choice must be made.

Soviet commentators also have expressed unease recently over the visits of African and Asian leaders to the Chinese capital, seeing them all as part of "a hegemonistic Chinese drive against the Soviet Union."

They apparently included—but could not say so—the April visit of Kim Il Sung, the North Korean leader, in this analysis. Soviet specialists on Asian affairs expressed considerable anxiety privately over the "higher revolutionary unity" proclaimed by China and North Korea at the end of the visit.

The breadth of the Chinese diplomatic initiative—Mexico, Pakistan, Iran, Tunisia, Belgium have been involved so far as well as France, Japan and North Korea—seems to have caught the Kremlin by surprise.

Moscow had presumed that conflicts within the Chinese leadership would continue and prevent Peking from undertaking any serious diplomatic activities.

Moscow also appears to be shocked that several of its partners in the process of East-West detente, as well as what it regards as rightist and reactionary forces, have become Peking's active partners as well.

Pravda, the Soviet Communist party newspaper, published a lengthy commentary yesterday on the visit of the Japanese Socialists, who have had special ties to the Soviet Communists for a number of years, that portrayed the Japanese as renegades.

Pravda noted that only last October the Japanese Socialists sent a delegation to Moscow, and it had noted "the Soviet Union's important contribution to the cause of strengthening peace and international security." How could the party now align itself, Pravda demanded, with China?

The visit of Teng Hsiao-ping to Paris also has been widely commented upon by Soviet analysts, who regarded France not only as Moscow's original partner in East-West detente but as the pacesetter in European diplomacy.

Izvestia, the principal Soviet government newspaper, said in a weekend commentary that China had used the visit to "put new obstacles in the path of the relaxation of international tensions."

Peking opposes, Izvestia warned, European detente, even the very "idea of collective security and stronger peace in Europe."

The basis of China's European policy, Moscow said in an explicit warning to France and other Western European countries, is "anti-Sovietism," implying that European countries cannot improve their relations with China and expect to have closer ties with the Soviet Union as well.

Soviet commentators have expressed particularly strong concern at the new ties between China and the Common Market, seeing a Chinese effort to thwart the growth of trade between Eastern and Western Europe. But Moscow itself has not been able to recognize the Common Market and deal with it as a whole as China is willing to do.

As Soviet analysts assess the Chinese initiatives, they see Moscow's efforts at detente threatened and an effort by Peking to encircle the Soviet Union with China's friends.

The damage that the Chinese moves might do to Soviet efforts to improve relations with the West is the principal concern, however, for Soviet commentators see serious possibilities that some Western nations and Japan may decide to slow their rapprochement with Moscow to improve relations with China, that is, begin to play a balancing game.

"While the desire of most Japanese—and this can be said of most people in the West who are realistically minded, as well—is to normalize and improve relations with China Peking has set a high price for this, nothing less than adoption of an anti-Soviet stand," a Soviet commentator wrote last week.

"This places progressive Japanese in the position of weighing the benefits of better ties with China against better ties with the Soviet Union. Yet this is a false approach, and sensible people will see that by this very maneuver China has proven itself a false friend and untrustworthy."

The SALT Deadlock

Secretary of State Kissinger meets with Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko today in Vienna to try, among other things, to resolve the deadlock in the strategic arms negotiations intended to implement the agreement-to-agree announced with such fanfare at Vladivostok last November. The deadlock is itself a sign of the pitfalls in this manner of negotiating, and the resolution is likely to be worse.

Agreements on numerical ceilings were announced at Vladivostok, and a treaty is supposed to be signed at the Ford-Brezhnev summit later this year. In between, there are talks in Geneva that are supposed to work out the details. Details include the definitions of which weapons do and do not count against the Vladivostok ceilings and, above all, the matter of verification. That is, the means by which each side can tell whether the other is cheating, particularly whether it is installing multiple warheads (MIRVs) on more missiles than the agreement allows.

The Geneva talks are deadlocked because the Soviets have taken a totally intransigent position, insisting on settling each technical issue to their advantage. As an example of their tactics, when the negotiations opened they offered a proposed treaty text that put the contemplated follow-on agreements for force reduction in the context of their long-standing demand for compensation for U.S. nuclear forces in Europe and for "third-country" nuclear forces, thus reintroducing two issues on which they supposedly made "concessions" at Vladivostok.

Of more immediate concern is the question of what kind of bombers count against the total of 2,400 strategic delivery vehicles allowed by the Vladivostok agreement. The issue centers around the Backfire, the Soviets' most modern bomber. The Soviets are insisting that it not be included, on the grounds that it cannot without refueling fly from the Soviet Union to the U.S. and back. But since it is an extremely effective plane and could bomb the U.S. and land in, say, Cuba, the U.S. position is that it is clearly a strategic weapon. Since acceptance of the Soviet position would in effect count our bomber force but leave the most important part of theirs unrestrained, a quick test of the Kissinger-Gromyko results will be whether this U.S. position is abandoned.

A second issue involves the difference between the cruise missile, a sort of drone aircraft that can be launched by bombers distant from targets, and air-mobile intercontinental ballistic missiles. The agreement bans air-launched missiles with a range of over 600 miles. The Russians say this includes cruise missiles. The Americans say the whole context of the agreement concerns ballistic missiles. In any event, the range of cruise missiles is totally unverifiable. Especially since Mr. Kissinger's briefings disclose some confusion about whether the number is 600 miles or 600 kilometers, the disagreement seems a testimony to the danger of one-man negotiation. U.S. military representatives were present at Vladivostok.

Finally and most significantly of all, there is the whole question of verifying which missiles have been MIRVed. The U.S. position is that any missile that has been tested with MIRV warheads will be assumed to be MIRVed. The Soviets are resisting this approach. Secretary Kissinger has said quite strongly (see Notable and Quotable nearby) that without this verification formula there can be no agreement. What is being tested in Vienna today is whether he has the courage of that conviction.

These issues may be technical, but their importance is underlined by growing concern about Soviet violations of the SALT-I agreement. As part of its ban on anti-missile systems, for example, that treaty outlaws the use of air-defense radars in an ABM mode, though allowing exceptions for "range safety" and "instrumentation" tests. U.S. technicians do not believe the repeated Soviet tests qualify under this exception, and suspect they are in fact an effort to upgrade air-defense radars into ABM ones. In a number of similar ways the Soviets are pressing every ambiguity in SALT-I, but the U.S. has offered its protests only at the most routine level.

Surely this is a warning that the technicalities are important, all the more so since the context of the agreement is that the Soviet strategic developments are soaring while the U.S. developments are declining, and since at its best the Vladivostok agreement gives the Soviets a 3-1 advantage in missile throw-weight, the best single measure of destructive power and potential warhead numbers.

The danger is that the negotiators are working under a self-imposed deadline, which is bound to weigh more heavily on a democratic government than a totalitarian one. The U.S. will be severely handicapped in Vienna today, and at any forthcoming summit, unless its leaders are willing if necessary to go back to its people to say, yes, we thought we had an agreement originally, but since the Soviets have been less cooperative than we expected, we do not have an agreement today.

The naval challenge

The rescue of the freighter Mayaguez focuses dramatically on the importance of American sea power. Similarly do recent Soviet naval exercises demonstrate the Soviet Union's determination to become a global naval power. There is little doubt the Russians hope eventually to achieve parity with and even surpass America's present capability on the seas and to use their navy for political — and if need be military — purposes.

In the face of this Soviet challenge, several conclusions suggest themselves:

- It is vital to world stability and the West's security that the United States maintain its naval supremacy. The Russians do not depend on the seas for their survival; the West does. America must therefore keep its navy modernized, efficient and fully able to meet U.S. commitments around the world and to act as a deterrent to Soviet expansionism.
- In light of the American withdrawal from Vietnam and changing political perceptions in Asia and Europe, there is urgent need for a national discussion of what U.S. commitments are, what kind of navy America should have, and how well it is fulfilling its mission.
- While worldwide naval limitations are unrealistic at present, the Soviet Union and the United States ought to begin thinking about averting an unrestrained naval race. The first step could be agreement to limit force levels in the Indian Ocean.

On the first score, concern is mounting that the Russians are catching up with the U.S. in naval might. The comparison, made on the basis of numbers of vessels, is misleading because the nature and function of the two navies are dissimilar. The core of the U.S. Navy is the aircraft carrier, a powerful attack ship aimed at projecting American military power on shore, i.e., in a land war, and keeping sea-lanes open. A flexible force, it is capable of a variety of military operations, as so recently seen in the Gulf of Siam.

The Russians, on the other hand, are not yet able to use their navy to project power. They have concentrated on building an advanced system aimed at preventing the U.S. from contributing to a land war in Europe, interdicting the West's sea-lanes and supply routes, and at protecting their own submarine missile capability.

Although they do not have a massive offensive capability, however (and we are speaking here of conventional not strategic nuclear forces), the Russians have visibly improved their sustaining capacity at sea. With time they will be able to assert themselves more and more in crisis situations.

To respond to this challenge, it is necessary to reevaluate what kind of navy the U.S. should be building. Unfortunately, what drives naval programs, experts agree, is not actual need so much as institutional momentum, personalities, power rivalries within the service — and an often exaggerated cry of "The Russians are coming!"

To cite "NATO commitments" as the raison d'etre of force numbers and types is not

Making Contact

Even before the fast-moving operational details of the Mayagüez affair have been fully analyzed, one obvious diplomatic lesson stands out clearly. This is the acute difficulty, in crisis circumstances, of communicating with unfamiliar and unfriendly governments either directly or through unfamiliar and unfriendly intermediaries.

Since the evacuation of American personnel from Cambodia and South Vietnam, the United States has had no direct contact with the new governments of these countries. The Chinese Government may have been a natural channel through which a dialogue might be conducted with Phnom Penh, but Washington evidently found delays and confusion—if nothing worse—along this route. Even now it is not clear whether Peking played a constructive role in the attempt to negotiate release of the Mayagüez and its crew.

Only after the military rescue mission began did the United States receive the slightest official indication from Phnom Penh about why the Mayagüez had been seized—that it was allegedly engaged in espionage. This charge deserves Congressional examination, though it seems unlikely on the face of it, and both the United States Government and the owners of the merchant vessel vigorously deny it. Timely direct contact might also have forestalled the air strikes on the Cambodian mainland which Secretary Kissinger convincingly explained yesterday as an operation designed to protect the marines already engaged on Tang Island.

Even before the Mayagüez incident the Communist Government of Cambodia had given no sign of readiness to accept a return of American diplomatic representatives to Phnom Penh, but such a signal has now come from an important member of the new Saigon Government. Nguyen Huu Tho, Chairman of the Advisory Council of the Revolutionary Government and a man long known to United States analysts as a leading figure in the Vietcong, has indicated that relations with Washington would be possible if the United States did not interfere in South Vietnam's internal affairs.

Rather than letting the question of diplomatic relations drag on and become in itself a point of controversy, there are strong practical considerations for pursuing this suggestion from Saigon toward renewing at least a token American representation in South Vietnam.

BALTIMORE NEWS- AMERICAN 5/16/75 (19)

The Piracy Challenge

PRESIDENT FORD'S vigorous and successful military response to Cambodia's seizure of an American merchant ship on the high seas was absolutely essential.

Except as a calculated test of United States' nerve, the seizure of the unarmed Mayaguez and its crew of 40 in international waters made no sense whatever.

It was a reckless and wholly indefensible violation of all maritime law — an act of provocative banditry, an act of naked piracy.

Mr. Ford showed cool and careful restraint in at first attempting diplomatic means to obtain release of the ship and its crew. But when there was no prompt response from the Communist Brigands, he had but one honorable alternative.

The whole world was watching. Any faltering, any extended palaver, would only have reinforced the sneering view that our debacle in Indochina fatally weakened us as a creditable world power.

President Ford's unqualified order to retake the Mayaguez by force — as was done — has increased both international respect for the United States and the self-respect of its citizens.

Convincing notice has been posted that this nation, despite the disaster of Vietnam, is not going to be pushed around by anybody.

Mr. Ford merits great credit for his decisive leadership in the crisis. Similar credit is due to our fighting forces, who so effectively carried out his order on such short notice and under such difficult circumstances.

enough. What, it must be asked, should these commitments be? Why does the Navy need 15 carriers and not, say 20, or 10? Why does it always need two in the Mediterranean? How viable are big carriers in the Mediterranean in the event of a European land war? What should the U.S. do to strengthen its naval presence in Asia as it is forced to withdraw from its foreign bases there?

Some experts believe this post-Vietnam era demands a much more flexible navy. They suggest that smaller carriers and more ships with vertical-take-off aircraft are more functional than giant carriers, which are prohibitive in cost and therefore riskier to use.

A part of naval reassessment should be consideration of the possibilities for force limitations. At present there is no need to negotiate with the Russians, for the U.S. has the far superior navy. But the time may come when neither nation will want to continue an extremely expensive naval race.

A start perhaps could be made in the Indian Ocean, where the littoral states are anxious to keep the big-power presence at a minimum and where the big powers themselves have no central interest in the littoral states.

How the Russians would react to a U.S. proposal to limit deployment of forces in that region is problematic of course. In 1971 Brezhnev did hint of naval-limitation talks but, when the U.S. responded favorably, the Russians failed to follow up. If Moscow were to perceive now that Washington sought talk out of growing weakness, such negotiations would be meaningless.

It is self-evident that America must stay militarily strong. That includes a strong navy. But, against a background of strength, the cause of peace would be served by exploring the possibilities for naval restraint.

We urge President Ford to move in this direction.

NEW YORK NEWS - 18 MAY 1975(19)

THE MORNING AFTER

The Indochina debacle has had one beneficial effect. The anti-Pentagon lobby in Congress, which only a few weeks ago was happily planning an orgy of defense-spending cuts, has suddenly sobered up.

All at once, the "domino theory," which they laughed at and the warnings about the aggressive potential of communism which they derided, don't seem so foolish or fanciful.

In consequence the House pared only $3.7 billion from initial requests, and the Senate $5.5 billion—and both figures include sums asked for aid to South Vietnam and Cambodia.

It is difficult to tell at this point whether the action represents——back to sanity in dealing with the vital issue of national security, or marks only a temporary, tactical withdrawal. We hope that it is the former.

A FIRM TREND

The truth is that, as imposing as our military outlays seem, they are barely sufficient to preserve a minimum defense posture. In relative terms, expenditures for this essential safeguard of national existence take up less of the total budget than they have since the pre-World War II era when we were virtually unarmed.

And this has happened while a potential enemy, the Soviet Union, has devoted an increasingly greater share of its national production to weapons—and is now putting more into arms annually than we do.

The Mayaguez Rescue

Americans are understandably gratified at the freeing of a U.S. merchant ship and its 40-man crew after three days of Cambodian captivity. It is regrettable that military action was required to bring about the result, in the absence of diplomatic channels to the new Khmer Rouge government in Phnom Penh and the failure of whatever indirect communication was achieved. But the decision to carry out the rescue by force was correct in the circumstances, a judgment happily reinforced by the success of the effort.

President Ford followed a courageous and honorable course that well served the nation's interests in taking a hard line against the Cambodian provocation. At the same time he observed the legal requirements of the War Powers Act of 1973 for consultation with the congressional leadership on the military action. The immediate Capitol Hill reaction has been by and large devoid of serious criticism. This is due to the fact that the operation went well and was over quickly, rather than to any lessening of sensitivity about reinvolvement in Southeast Asia or any relaxation of Congress' drive for a greater role in foreign and military policy.

The benefits from the fruitful assertion of our international rights are on several levels. The liberated crewmen were saved a possibly long and painful captivity as hostages for whatever gains Cambodia's xenophobic revolutionaries hoped to make from their piracy. Through mishap or Khmer Rouge brutality, the seamen might not have survived at all. The container ship Mayaguez, whose voyage from Hong Kong to Thailand was interrupted last Monday, has been restored to its American owners.

The incident, more broadly, should increase international desire for a comprehensive treaty on the law of the sea. Few nations have the power or will to enforce their rights of peaceful transit so far from home, and a new world system is needed to set rules and bring about their observance. The Cambodians' boarding of a ship in a sealane 60 miles from the mainland and eight miles off an islet claimed by both Cambodia and Vietnam should impress on all seafaring nations the urgency of progress in the stalled sea-law conference.

In terms of American foreign policy, the strong and productive response to the Khmer Rouge insult is a welcome offset to the image of futility created by our string of reverses in Indochina. The picture of this country as a helpless giant deserves to be put down as an inaccurate caricature. The vigorous and competent handling of the Mayaguez outrage might help to do this for the benefit of both allies and potential adversaries. At the very least the nation is thankfully spared a repetition of the official humiliation it required to retrieve the Pueblo crew from North Korean hands.

We incurred some costs in solving the Mayaguez problem. There were casualties to the American force that landed at Koh Tang island in search of the merchant crewmen, who turned out to have been held elsewhere. A marine and an airman were reported killed, others were wounded and some may be missing. A dispute with Thailand over the stationing of marines there before the anti-Cambodian action has further strained relations with Bangkok, where a new government worried about coexisting with a growing array of Communist neighbors has served notice it wants to end the American military presence within a year.

More facts are needed for a full assessment of the incident. The Cambodians have not articulated their motives in the ship seizure, leaving in doubt even whether it was a government action or a local initiative. More information is awaited, too, on the military action and its exact relation to the release of the Mayaguez crew. Hindsight may indicate that less force, or just the threat of it, could have turned the trick. For the moment it is enough that the U.S. achieved its immediate objective—recovery of ship and crew—and headed off more serious trouble.

NEW YORK TIMES 18 MAY 1975 (19)

After the Mayagüez

A nation with the power to influence events in every area of the world, near and far, bears many burdens of decision and risk from which there is no escape. Such a nation is warily scrutinized by allies that depend upon it for their own survival and by adversaries that would probe its weaknesses of political will or military capacity.

The United States had to shoulder such a burden in recent days when hostile gunboats seized the American merchant vessel Mayagüez and her 39-man crew off the shore of Cambodia. When diplomatic initiatives were unavailing, President Ford ordered military intervention that successfully rescued both ship and crew.

As always in such an imbroglio, there were uncertainties and ambiguities. The Mayagüez was in what the United States regards as an international sealane but these are oil-rich waters claimed by both Cambodia and South Vietnam. If the United States had enjoyed normal diplomatic relations with Cambodia, negotiations could have been pursued with more clarity and confidence. If the new revolutionary government of Cambodia had made known its intentions sooner concerning the disposition of the ship, intervention might have been avoided.

There were the usual pressures of time. The President and his advisers concluded that they had to act promptly before the ship's crew might be removed to the Cambodian hinterland, for this country rightly wanted to avoid another prolonged wrangle with a Communist nation holding American citizens hostage for months or years and seeking to extract political advantage from their captivity. There were the usual painful costs of armed action. The crew of the Mayagüez was saved, but a score of brave Marines and Air Force helicopter pilots are dead, missing or severely wounded. There were diplomatic costs as well. The Government of Thailand whose territory was used by United States armed forces as a staging ground for the intervention has felt constrained to withdraw its ambassador from Washington and to protest strongly what it regards as an infringement of its sovereignty.

On balance, the risks proved worth the taking and the gains outweighted the losses. But the Mayagüez episode is not an occasion for jingoistic exultation. It offers rather a stern reminder of the heavy burden borne by the United States Government in the exercise of its essential responsibilities.

The Thai–American Tiff

In the wake of the Mayaguez incident, it is being said around this town that the irritation of Thailand over American military operations mounted from Thai territory is mostly for show. The Thais, one hears, are not nearly as anxious to be rid of the American military presence in their country as they pretend to be.

We wish it were so, but we doubt that it is. Thailand, now neighbor to three Communist nations of questionable friendliness, faces a serious problem. The efforts of Thai leaders to establish more cordial relations with Peking have produced no response. The Communist takeover in Laos exposes Thailand to the possibility of an increasingly virulent insurrection among the Lao population of its northeastern territories.

The case of the Mayaguez only served to heighten Thai anxieties over a continuing American military presence in their country. Previously, the government in Bangkok had demanded the withdrawal within a year of some 25,000 American troops — mostly airmen — still stationed in Thailand. Now the government is protesting that the use of Thai bases in the rescue operation was a violation of Thai sovereignty and that 1,100 U.S. marines were sent into Thailand at the height of the crisis over the objections of Premier Kukrit Pramoj. To show their displeasure, the Thais have recalled their ambassador to Washington — presumably temporarily — and are expected to demand a speedup in the timetable for the departure of the other American forces.

It would be foolish to dismiss this as mere posturing designed to appease Thailand's Communist neighbors. Traditionally, the country has preserved its independence by adroit maneuvering between the pressures of stronger powers, and it leans instinctively toward a neutralist posture whenever possible. Thailand's accession to the SEATO treaty in 1954 marked an abrupt departure from this traditional policy, under conditions which no longer apply.

For many years — indeed, ever since the formulation of the so-called Nixon Doctrine — the most perceptive of the Thai leaders recognized the change and began to question the contribution to Thailand's security of thousands of American troops on Thai soil. Today, in the wake of Vietnam and Cambodia, there is no longer any question: The troops are a liability and a danger which the Thais would like to be rid of. The Mayaguez incident merely dramatized the fact that the forces in Southeast Asia will be used only to protect American interests, which do not necessarily coincide wih those of Thailand. It is our impression that, in inviting them to leave, the Thais mean exactly what they say.

WASHINGTON POST 18 MAY 1975(19)

The Look of Reality in Laos

THOSE NOW celebrating the power and the glory that the United States supposedly restored to itself in the Gulf of Siam had better turn their attention northward a bit to the dusty little town of Savannakhet in Laos. For there, three Americans working for the Agency of International Development were arrested the other day by a group of aroused students of a leftist persuasion who wished to obtain certain murkily described political concessions from the government of Laos, or from the United States or from somebody. Strange as it may seem to the administration, these students, despite their proximity to the scene, did not seem to be terribly impressed by the American show of force in the matter of the Mayaguez.

So what is the Ford administration now to do? According to the Secretary of State at his news conference Friday, in the Mayaguez affair the United States refused to be "forced into a humiliating discussion about the ransom of innocent merchant seamen." Leaving aside for now the question of whether the administration would be dismissing negotiation as "a humiliating discussion about ransom" if the crewmen of the Mayaguez had been detained on the Cambodian mainland instead of being safely returned, the immediate question is whether the administration now will refuse to contemplate a diplomatic approach in Laos out of a similar fear of being "humiliated." We would hope not. We trust that the administration will have the garden-variety good sense to realize that the situation in Laos must be understood and handled in its own terms, and that there is simply no possibility of automatically translating a muscle-flexing exercise in one unique context into a general policy applicable elsewhere at will.

One must note, too, that it is all too common for American citizens to be taken captive in tense political circumstances around the world. We are prime targets, not only for governments but for insurgencies and terrorists beyond any government's control. If the United States has now embraced the policy that it will regard any negotiating effort by the captors as a deliberate attempt to humiliate the United States, then we are in for some very bloody and frightening episodes. Frankly, we do not really think that the U.S. government means to abandon all tactical flexibility in these difficult situations, involving American hostages, by committing itself to an iron-clad policy of no negotiation. That is the danger, however, if the administration starts to believe its own superheated rhetoric, and thus becomes a prisoner of it.

The whole developing situation in Laos, in fact, demonstrates nothing so much as how special and limited the meaning of the Mayaguez affair is. In the Gulf of Siam, given Cambodia's weakness and isolation and the particular island geography involved, it was feasible to send in the Marines. By colossal good luck, all the crewmen got out alive. In Laos, however, the circumstances are much more typical of most local situations in which the United States finds itself involved aboard. Unlike Cambodia, Laos has other foreign friends. Other Americans live there and are vulnerable. The United States has a political interest in the country. And the geography—Laos is landlocked—precludes bringing a ship up alongside.

With the recent Communist victories in South Vietnam and Cambodia, the American-supported faction in the Laotian coalition is fading fast, as expected; the premier, hoping to reach "an accord with history," is counselling accommodation. But Laos is still among that very large group of countries in which the United States cannot send in the Marines at will. In short, reality is complicated in Laos, as it is in most places, and in ways that it was not for a few days—but only for a few days—in the Gulf of Siam.

The Pentagon's Concern Is, Once Again, North Korea

By JOHN W. FINNEY

WASHINGTON—Shortly after the fall of South Vietnam, Defense Secretary Schlesinger observed that it would be "particularly inopportune," in view of shaken confidence in American power and steadfastness, to consider major reductions in United States forces in South Korea, the last American stronghold on the Asian continent.

Declarations of American determination have been flowing from the Administration ever since the fall of Saigon but the Schlesinger statement reflected a new policy emphasis

Following the forced exodus from South Vietnam, the emphasis in American defense policy, and in the nation's geopolitical interests, is shifting from Southeast Asia back to Northeast Asia. Korea becomes the focal point because as American strategists see it, that is where the interests of China, the Soviet Union, Japan and the United States converge.

There is a certain irony that American security interests should return to South Korea 25 years after the United States fought a costly, indecisive war in that country. That war provided a crucial turning point in post-World War II policy and in many ways was a stepping stone to involvement in Indochina.

After four years of occupation immediately after World War II, the United States had withdrawn its forces from South Korea. In a declaration representative of another era and other attitudes, Secretary of State Dean Acheson in January, 1950, suggested that South Korea lay outside the "defense perimeter" of the United States. For all the subsequent criticism and controversy over the Acheson statement, it reflected the prevailing military doctrine, espoused by both Gen. George C. Marshall and Gen. Douglas Macarthur, that the United States should never again become involved in a land war in Asia.

The Korean War Begins

The policy changed abruptly with the North Korean attack on June 25, 1950. Suddenly, the policy of "containment of Communism," which until then had applied primarily to Europe and the Middle East, was extended to Asia. The United States began its postwar rearmament and extending its commitments through mutual security treaties with 40 countries. It became almost a logical progression from "containing Communism" in Korea to taking military action to stem Soviet and Chinese influence in Indochina.

In a way, Korea is becoming a symbolic test of whether this postwar policy that led to Vietnam is to be changed, of whether the United States will continue to view itself as an Asian power on alternatively withdraw into a role as a Pacific power.

It is evident that the Ford Administration wants to maintain a foothold as an Asian power by keeping an American military presence of 40,000 men and untold numbers of tactical nuclear weapons in South Korea. As one of the "forward movements" in foreign policy in the wake of Vietnam, President Ford has laid down the aim "to tie more closely together South Korea with the United States" and has committed himself against reductions in American forces.

The Pentagon also still talks about projection of American military power onto the Asian mainland. Thus, Gen. George S. Brown, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in his annual military posture statement to Congress earlier this year, said "our pri-

NEW YORK TIMES - 19 MAY 1975

The Morning After

By Anthony Lewis

CHICAGO—The rule laid down by the United States in the Mayagüez affair must go something like this:

When a foreign country seizes an American ship, claiming a violation of its waters, the U.S. will unilaterally judge that legal claim. If we reject it, we shall demand the ship's release, allow a day or two for its return and then launch a military attack. As one distinguished voice put it in commenting on the Mayagüez: "Once established diplomatic procedures had failed to achieve prompt recovery . . . , President Ford had no alternative but to employ direct military means."

Exactly: No alternative but immediate force. So the next time Ecuador seizes an American tuna boat for fishing within a claimed 200-mile limit that we do not recognize, Washington will give Ecuador a day or two and then bomb. And the next time we seize a Russian vessel for fishing within our claimed limit, all who cheered the Mayagüez action will understand and sympathize when the Soviets serve an ultimatum on us.

Wise decisions by governments, as by judges, require dealing with particular facts in terms of larger principle. That is, the case at hand must be decided with an eye for the consequences in cases as yet unimagined.

By that standard the American action against Cambodia last week was folly. It reflected no general principle of law, diplomacy or morals that we would really be prepared to follow in other cases. For all the bluster and righteous talk of principle, it is impossible to imagine the United States behaving that way toward anyone other than a weak, ruined country of little yellow people who have frustrated us.

Respect for facts goes along with respect for principle in wise decisions. Do we know the facts of the Mayagüez affair? Does what we know give us confidence in the wisdom and humanity of our government's actions? Consider just three questions.

1. Was there any ground for Cambodian suspicion of the Mayagüez?

A Cambodian communiqué said that American observation planes had flown over the country daily since the Khmer Rouge victory last month. It said that small boats carrying Thai and Cambodian agents with radio equipment and bombs had been caught in Cambodian waters. It said the Mayagüez had entered those waters and was stopped for questioning.

The United States has made reconnaisance flights and tried to land spies elsewhere in the past. When the Pentagon Papers were published in 1971, we learned that before the Tonkin Gulf incident of 1964 there had been provocative raids against North Vietnam. Are we sure the Cambodians had no reason to be edgy when they saw the Mayagüez? Are we sure the ship was in international waters?

2. How much time was allowed for diplomacy?

At 5:03 A.M. May 12, Eastern daylight time, Washington heard about the seizure of the Mayagüez. At 2:00 P.M. that day the White House announced the news and began diplomatic efforts for release of the ship.

The Cambodian communiqué said U.S. planes began strafing and bombing around the ship and islands about five hours after the White House announcement. The delayed United States report put the first air attack on Cambodian gunboats at 1:00 A.M. May 14, or 35 hours after diplomatic moves began. When were the first attacks? In any event we allowed less than a day and a half for a response from the untried and isolated government of a shattered country.

3. What was the purpose of U.S. military action?

The official reason was to save American lives and property. But the timing suggests there was more to it than that.

At 8:15 P.M. May 14 Washington learned of a Cambodian broadcast offering to return the Mayagüez. At 9:15 the White House demanded the crew be released and promised to cease military action if it was. At 10:53 the United States destroyer Wilson, communicating from the scene, said a small boat was approaching with at least thirty white men aboard. At 10:57, nevertheless, United States planes bombed a Cambodian airport miles away. At 11:14 President Ford was told that all the crew was safe. At 11:50 United States planes bombed an unused oil refinery.

That record speaks volumes. The last attacks, at least, could only have been punitive in purpose. They were designed to punish a "little half-assed nation," in Senator Barry Goldwater's elegant phrase.

Bombing an unused refinery after the ship and crew were recovered: That's really big brave stuff. It was indeed Barry Goldwater's vision of America that prevailed last week: a bully among nations, acting without consultation, without concern for facts or principle.

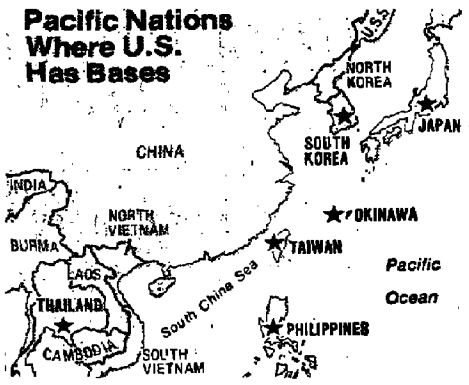
mary policy objective continues to be to maintain a stable military and political balance in Northeast Asia."

The strategic importance of Korea lies not so much in Korea itself as in Japan, which General Brown noted is "key to our policy in Asia." No policy makers in the Pentagon or the State Department, would seriously contend that a Communist Korea would pose a direct military threat to Japan. Rather, the concern is that political or military upheavals in Korea would lead to insecurity in Japan, with the threat that a Japan now dependent upon the United States for its defense would rise up once again as a militaristic power in Asia.

In many ways, therefore, the American commitment in Korea is to reassure Japan, which as a major economic power is of considerable strategic interest to the United States.



The Mayaguez Example

Within the Ford Administration there is considerable concern—and even more in South Korea—that the North Korean Government will be emboldened by American setbacks in Indochina to test American intentions in Korea. Leading Administration officials went out of their way to emphasize that the military rescue of the merchant ship Mayaguez should demonstrate to North Vietnam that the United States stood ready with force to meet its commitments. The message was also intended for South Korea, which persistently has wanted firmer assurances than the commitment under the 1954 Mutual Security Treaty that the United States would meet an attack on South Korea "in accordance with its constitutional processes." With Congress trying to restrict the warmaking powers of the Presidency, that obviously does not represent an iron-clad commitment in Korean eyes.

After Vietnam, pressure that had been building up in Congress to begin the withdrawal of forces from South Korea seems to be abating. Even the more outspoken, younger liberals believe that this is not time to press for overseas troops reductions. In addition, through entertainment of visiting legislators and other means, South Korea has built up considerable influence in Congress.

This, however, may be temporary. A new generation of legislator is coming to Washington who has no memories of World War II or Korea and to whom the threat of a militaristic Japan is a myth that guided his predecessors. There is also the question of how much longer the legislators will be willing to make a large commitment to reassure Japan, which has grown prosperous spending less than one per cent of its gross national product on defense while the United States has been spending about six per cent.

If not this year, therefore, then maybe the next or the year after, a Congressional test will come on whether the United States wants to maintain a sizable military presence in South Korea. Upon the outcome of that test will come a decision on whether the nation wants to continue a "forward defense" policy of Asian commitments that became implanted with the Korean war or wants to begin pulling back to a new line of defense built around bases in the Pacific.

Is Thailand Hanoi's next domino?

Lewis M. Simons

BANGKOK—With Cambodia and South Vietnam under Communist control, a question being asked in Thailand with increasing freqeuncy is: How much more does Hanoi want?

Some Thais are convinced that now that Saigon has fallen, the North Vietnamese will swiftly turn their full military might on this country, "the next domino." Others believe Hanoi will be satisfied with control of all Vietnam and friendly Communist or Socialist regimes in neighboring Laos and Cambodia.

But no Thai or foreign observer here doubts that the Hanoi regime will step up its support for the burgeoning Thai Communist insurgency in the north and northeast of the country and the political unrest blossoming in Bangkok and other cities. The judgment is that with increased North Vietnamese help and official inability or unwillingness to recognize and deal with the insurgency and its causes, Thailand is about to become a major crisis.

THAILAND IS RIPE for a full-fledged insurrection. With strikingly rare exceptions, top political, military and police officials are thoroughly corrupt. Their interests are focused on accumulating comfort and wealth in Bangkok while the problems of the countryside are ignored.

The government, patched together into a coalition from more than a dozen political parties, is unstable. With a population of 41 million and growing at the rate of 3.3 per cent a year, demand for farmland is quickly outstripping availability.

Meanwhile, the insurgents, too, are building their numbers. Although the Thai insurgency has been nominally active for at least a decade, in the last few years intelligence sources have detected annual recruitment increases as high as 20 per cent.

The insurgents, known as the Thai Peoples Liberation Armed Forces, are thought to number 8,500, with about three-quarters of their strength in the north and northeast. This part of the country is ideal for their activity. Income is lower than anywhere else in Thailand — about one-sixth of what it is in Bangkok — and alienation from the mainstream of Thai society is most keenly felt by the tribal hill people in the region.

A NUMBER OF THAI and foreign experts believe the Communists' successes in Cambodia and South Vietnam will inspire not only the Thai rebels but large numbers of rural Thais as well. At the same time, Communist gains in Indochina already have taken their toll on the morale of Thailand's government, military and police leaders. This crumbling from within, even more than North Vietnamese assistance from without, is likely to prove crucial to the Communist campaign.

One Western expert in anti-insurgency tactics who has worked in Southeast Asia for nearly 20 years said officers and men of the top-heavy royal Thai army have no will to meet the Communists on their own ground and when contact is unavoidable the government troops fight it out only if they have an overwhelming numerical superiority.

"This army has been molded by the U.S. Army," he said, "and Vietnam has proved beyond all doubt that the Americans are not prepared to fight an Asian guerrilla force. Neither are the Thais."

Top army officers seem far more interested in politics and lengthening their strings of cars, racehorses and women than in spending their time fighting what seems a remote and insignificant enemy.

Retrieving the Mayaguez: 'It Was Pure Ford'

High Pentagon officials, backed by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, argued strongly during President Ford's secret deliberations with the National Security Council (NSC) for rock-bottom minimum use of U.S. military power—less than the President finally ordered—in the rescue of the pirated Mayaguez.

Mr. Ford rejected their argument for strict application of the "rule of proportionality"—meeting an enemy's force with no more than the minimum required counterforce. The President opted instead for "a higher degree" of American counterforce, or what some military analysts call "equivalence plus."

This shows that often-maligned Pentagon hawks, operating within new congressional restrictions on the use of military force, are now more conscious of political backlash than their counterparts in the State Department and Central Intelligence Agency (CIA).

This was no bare-knuckle, backroom brawl. Nor did it convert the austere cabinet room of the White House, where the NSC held its deliberations, into a debating society.

Rather, the threads of the pro-and-con discussion over what kind of military action the United States should take lead to no villains, no heroes. Those threads do reveal that the President ruled in favor of "equivalence plus"—but also overruled at least one State Department suggestion for American bombing of the civilian-military Cambodian airfield outside Phnom Penh.

That bombing proposal—opposed by the Pentagon—stemmed from a diplomatic effort to milk maximum psychological advantage from a case of piracy on the high seas. It was cloaked, of course, in conventional military argument—that the Cambodians might use the airfield against the American force in the Gulf of Siam. But it would have been a clear case of overkill.

Whether Secretary of State Henry Kissinger favored it is not known. But the President vetoed it as provocative.

Thus, Mr. Ford asserted his own will in a crisis that, with only a little mismanagement or a bit of bad luck, could have escalated to extremely dangerous proportions. As one administration insider told us: "Don't think this was a Kissinger or (Defense Secretary James) Schlesinger extravaganza. It was pure Ford."

Among all the considerations behind the President's rejection of a strict "rule of proportionality" was the looming problem of South Korea. He chose to employ slightly more military force than required in order to signal the Communist government of North Korea that any military probe across the demilitarized line into South Korea would not only be turned back; it would assure punishment of North Korea.

The thesis: No distinct, unprovoked act of aggression should be given a free ride. Simply righting the wrong would not discourage similar acts in the future. The needed increment: punishment, to make the aggression more costly to the aggressor than to the victim.

The backdrop of Mr. Ford's planning was a virtual blackout of accurate intelligence, a factor that made the decision to intervene far more risky than it actually turned out to be, which was risky enough.

At the time Mr. Ford decided definitely that he would use force to recover the Mayaguez and its crew, the vessel was reported by U.S. intelligence to be somewhere in the sprawling harbor of one of Cambodia's most populated cities: Kampong Som (formerly Sihanoukville). The truth was far different. The vessel actually had been towed to Koh Tang Island, a fact not known to the Pentagon until

Leaving to Meet Gromyko

Rescue Bolsters Kissinger

By Jeremiah O'Leary
Washington Star Staff Writer

Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger departs today for important discussions with Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko in Vienna, Austria, with his diplomatic hand considered strengthened by the United States' swift and decisive handling of the Mayaguez affair.

Diplomatic observers believe that the successful military response to seizure of the U.S. merchant ship by Cambodia last week restored American credibility at a time when it was never lower in the eyes of allies and potential adversaries after the collapse of Cambodia and South Vietnam.

Kissinger is viewed as in a much better position now to deal with Gromyko on the most pressing issues before them — the deadlock between the Arabs and Israelis in the Middle East and the suspended negotiations on the question of a new strategic arms limitation treaty between the two superpowers. Their talks, however, will cover the whole range of issues between the two countries, including European security, reduction of forces by the NATO and Warsaw Pact nations and future trade relations in the light of the controversial emigration clauses in the U.S. Trade Act.

IN THE TWO days set aside for his talks with Gromyko, Kissinger is expected to explore any remaining possibility that U.S. mediation might yet bring about a new Israeli-Egyptian separation of forces in the Sinai without resorting to the Geneva peace conference. U.S. diplomats believe that reconvening the Geneva conference under present conditions would inevitably lead to a stalemate and heighten the danger of new hostilities in the Mideast.

The Israelis so far have been adamant in their refusal to negotiate with the Palestinians at Geneva or anywhere else unless they are incorporated in the Syrian, Jordanian or Egyptian delegations. At the same time, Egypt is unwilling to issue a unilateral declaration of non-belligerency, which is Israel's price for giving up the key Sinai passes and the captured Abu Rudeis oil fields. Kissinger would attempt another shuttle diplomacy effort, but only if he had some reasonable prospect of flexibility on both sides.

The unknown factors are whether the Kremlin is willing to use its influence with the Arabs to make another Kissinger mediation effort worthwhile; whether the United States can use its review of Mideast policy to pressure Israel into a less rigid negotiating stance, and whether the Russians would cooperate to give the Geneva conference some hope of success.

THE SALT II talks also have a high priority. The discussions on a new 10-year SALT agreement bogged down at the technical level recently and have reached the stage where decisions are needed at the highest levels. The SALT II agreement originally was slated to be signed next month at a summit meeting in Washington between President Ford and Soviet leader Leonid I. Brezhnev. That meeting has now been delayed, probably until September.

Kissinger will wind up his talks with Gromyko on Tuesday and fly to Bonn for talks with West German officials and a speech to the Senate in West Berlin.

On Wednesday night, Kissinger will go on to Ankara for two days of discussions with Turkish leaders. Kissinger is intent on trying to reach a solution on the Cyprus problem that led to a major rift between the secretary and Congress and threatened the whole southeast flank of NATO because of the strained relations between the United States and both Turkey and Greece

To shore up NATO, Kissinger's task is to persuade Turkey to reduce the size of its invasion force on Cyprus and the scope of its enclave on the predominantly Greek island and to agree to a resettlement of the thousands of displaced refugees there.

KISSINGER RETURNS to Washington Friday for a 48-hour stay before leaving again Monday, May 26, for Paris to take part in the opening of the International Energy conference. On May 29, he will fly to Brussels to join President Ford in participating in a NATO chiefs of state meeting. High on the agenda at Brussels will be the uncertain future of Portugal, which has swung to the left in the hands of it new military leaders, and Portugal's role in NATO.

On May 30, Ford and Kissinger go to Madrid to confer with aging Generalissimo Francisco Franco, primarily on the future of U.S. bases in that non-NATO country. On June 1 and 2, the two American leaders will be in Salzburg, Austria, to confer with Egyptian President Anwar Sadat about prospects for a Middle East settlement. Ford and Kissinger will go on to Rome on June 3 and return to Washington the following day.

Another Hitler-Time?

Joseph Alsop

Mr. Alsop writes a syndicated monthly column.

In the inner group of American policy-makers, the post-Vietnam reassessment is naturally proving both intense and painful. The pain mainly arises from the somberness of the central question being debated. No one has put it quite that way, but the question can be best summed up as follows:

Can you have another Hitler-time without a Hitler?

It is a pretty important question for everyone in America. The truth is that a significant number of extremely intelligent insiders now see this country as well into a process like the one that led to World War II. One rather widely quoted formula runs, "After the Rhineland (in 1936 and the last really easy chance to stop Hitler) but not yet past the point of no return."

If we are in fact in the midst of a process resembling the tragic developments of the 1930s, it would of course be better if we were also face to face with another Hitler figure. So loathsome a man, so free with his threats and open about his aims, would surely arouse the country in short order. But the bureaucratized Soviet leaders, tirelessly, relentlessly plodding forward on iron-shod feet, could hardly be less Hitler-like.

The Soviets have no grand, obsessive Hitlerian plan of conquest. They do not take Hitlerian risks. They merely follow Lenin's advice to probe with bayonets any situation that looks mushy, withdrawing only if the bayonets meet steel.

In the American policy-makers' debate, the foregoing view of the Soviets is justifiably taken for granted from long experience in the Middle East and elsewhere. But quite another point is being made by those debaters who hold that you can indeed have another Hitler-time without a Hitler. They are also arguing that it took a lot more than Hitler to produce the Hitler-time.

This is, of course, exactly right. The historical Hitler of the final prewar phase, hovering over Europe like a greedy bird of prey, instilling fear in almost all the trembling, awe in far too many, was not the mere creation of his own misbegotten genius.

This common conception of Hitler is both cheap and superficial. For a deeper understanding of Adolf Hitler's brilliant initial successes, you have to remember a rule laid down by the great German strategist, Karl von Clausewitz, and often quoted nowadays by Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger. The rule is that those who fight in self-defense are always to blame for wars, since their enemies always ask nothing better than getting all they want without fighting.

At the beginning of the Hitler-time in 1932, every possible advantage lay with France and Britain. They were the responsible great powers of the that period—whereas the United States was then peripheral—because they were the dominant powers in Europe. Each was richer by far than Germany. Together, they also enjoyed a wide military superiority over Germany—until Hitler's rearmament was well advanced.

Yet the British and French refused to increase their own strength in step with Hitler's rearmament. They missed their easy chance in 1936, when Hitler was committed to resign if the reoccupation of the Rhineland met with the slightest resistance. They made the sordid Munich agreement in 1938. And in the end they had to go to war anyway, with every former advantage already lost to them, because their only other choice was to get ready to submit to Hitler a bit further down the road.

Two factors quite external to Germany in truth created the situation that Hitler exploited so long. The first factor was the flaccid British and French acceptance, as the '30s progressed, of a position of grave military inferiority amounting to military disarmament. Worse still, however, was the second factor. Almost until the moment when they belatedly turned and fought, the British and French were morally disarmed as well.

These grim facts from the past now haunt the discussions of the American policy-makers for an extremely simple reason. Post-Vietnam, the signs are plain that the United States now suffers from the kind of moral disarmament that finally ended the long careers of Britain and France as great powers in the world.

One must not take too seriously the more macabre kind of thinking that now flourishes on the floor of the U.S. Senate. Yet Sen. Frank Church of Idaho is after all a fairly representative Democratic member of the present Foreign Relations Committee. So it was a sign not to be ignored when Sen. Church recently announced on television that he saw no reason for the United States to defend any positions on the other side of the Pacific. That ocean, he said, would be a good enough "moat."

Presumably this means Sen. Church now wants to throw away all that is symbolized by the Iwo Jima monument, with its little group of Marines desperately struggling to raise the Stars and Stripes. Beyond much doubt, too, Sen. Church was specifically thinking about South Korea, which has swiftly become a major danger point because of what has happened in Cambodia and South Vietnam.

The South Koreans now fear, and the North Koreans now expect, another American abandonment. The megalomanic North Korean Communist dictator, Kim Il Sung, has just gone to Peking to argue that the precedent of American abandonment of Southeast Asia has now made it quite safe to launch another attack on South Korea. According to reports, Kim will later go to Moscow—which he has scorned to do for 10 years—in order to present the same thesis.

Fortunately or unfortunately, meanwhile, America's credit in the world is deeply engaged in South Korea—not to mention the Middle East, because of Israel, and several other danger points as well. The higher thinkers, of course, say that our country's credit in the world is of no consequence. The trouble is that they are mostly too well heeled to know what it is like to get a bad credit rating.

More down-to-earth persons know better. A good credit rating permits a man to do all sorts of desirable things that a bad credit rating prevents; and even more important, a good credit rating protects a man from all sorts of unpleasantness that a bad credit rating unfailingly invites.

Any nation's credit in the world further has precisely the same effects as a private credit rating. So we can fear the worst if we now lack the will to maintain our national credit in South Korea or elsewhere. Again, however, the higher thinkers in the Senate and the ghastly groves of academe now maintain that there is no real worst to fear.

They had better go back and study the Cuban missile crisis of 1962. The United States then enjoyed crushing superiority in strategic weapons and in local conventional forces. Above all, the United States then had the will to fight, if need be, to get the Soviet missiles out of Cuba. Nikita S. Khrushchev's move in Cuba was in fact a probe of the firmness of this U.S. will. If the needed will had been lacking, too, Cuba would now be bristling with Russian missiles aimed at our heartland.

Cuba further typifies the kind of renewed Soviet probe that may come someday and come, too, in the absence of America's now-lost military superiority! What else can we expect if the American loss of will is also proven, later on, by a whole series of ducked challenges like the one that will perhaps occur in South Korea? Or does anyone seriously suppose that the Soviets have changed Lenin's rule about testing mushy-looking situations?

Maybe Cuba seems too farfetched, despite the record, and you also do not give a damn about Israel. Then you might consider the remote and ill-defended Persian Gulf. Here the energy jugular of the United States and the West is now nakedly exposed. So what will the President, the Congress and the higher thinkers do if a long course of American weakness finally invites a Soviet decision to seize control of the Persian Gulf?

In sum, imitating the British and French in the tragic '30s will be catastrophically dangerous for the United States in the troubled '70s—even if we now have no Hitler figure to make us see the danger clearly!

late Monday.

Yet, Mr. Ford's decision to seize the boat wherever it was had already been taken on the logical grounds that to wait supinely for deliverance at the hands of the bizarrely revolutionary Cambodian government would make intervention progressively harder. In the background was Mr. Ford's refusal to let the Mayaguez become another Pueblo, whose crew languished in a North Korean prison for 11 months in 1968.

Any repetition of the humiliating Pueblo affair was ruled by the President as utterly unacceptable. Steering his thin line between State Department hawks, aiming for maximum political effect, and Pentagon doves, fearful of another outburst of anti-military animus from Congress, he followed his own convictions and wrote a bold new chapter of history.

A Necessary Reaction

CARL T. ROWAN

I don't know whether the Cambodian Communists seized the American freighter Mayaguez out of giddiness, stupidity or what. I do know that they could not have picked a more dangerous time for this gambit in small-power stupidity.

I don't know whether Sen. Henry Jackson of Washington and Sen. George McGovern of South Dakota thought about the grim national considerations or not. I am sure that they and some other Democrats erred, both in terms of this nation's well-being and their own political futures, when they implied the United States ought to take a "paper tiger" attitude toward a most grievous national affront.

This was no case of a man suddenly intervening in a matrimonial quarrel of strangers, as one might consider the earlier U.S. intervention in Indochina. This was a case of your boy or mine walking home from school on a public sidewalk, suddenly being grabbed by a hostile neighbor who is gloating over the fact that he dumped garbage on our lawns last week and we took it with little more than a whimper. It was inevitable that President Ford would react the way any proud parent would.

Cambodia created a situation where she either had to surrender the Mayaguez's crew unharmed or face slashing military attacks from the United States.

Why was this?

President Ford and his top advisers knew better than most Americans that the recent debacles in Indochina have had a devastating effect on U.S. prestige in the world. They knew that not only had the Soviet Union and the People's Republic of China been further encouraged to "fish in troubled waters," but that even the puniest of nations wanted to make sport of kicking Uncle Sam in the shins.

Ringing in the minds of Ford and Secretary of State Kissinger were a thousand messages of criticism and derision, none more rapier-like than the following by Wolf H. Halsti, one of Finland's leading foreign affairs analysts:

"My confidence in American power is utterly destroyed. A country that does not know how to use the enormous power it has, has none."

Against the background of this kind of talk around the world, the United States simply cannot afford to look gutless and helpless in the face of a brazen act of piracy by a band of ragtag Cambodians.

Perhaps you think the situation was not so serious as to justify military strikes at Cambodia. You, like other Americans, have been inclined to dismiss the criticisms of Asians (Thailand, Singapore, the Philippines) as just the plaints of politicials worried about losing their power and privileges.

But Halsti has no such interest, and listen to what he says in an interview in "Freedom at Issue," the magazine published by Freedom House:

"Why should the East Europeans have any confidence in the United States on America's present showing? What do they see in the United States? An unprecedented moral crisis, a paralysis of leadership and a creeping isolationism. After Vietnam the Americans are in no mood and no position to undertake open-ended foreign commitments . . ."

It was against this sobering background that President Ford did what the circumstances demanded. I support him.

It was Cambodia that foolishly stuck its snickering head too far into the mouth of a wounded tiger.

Lessons of the Mayaguez

Tolstoy's famous insight into the chancy nature of battle finds vindication once again. The rescue of the Mayaguez and its crew abounds in ifs and maybes. The whole operation would have ended tragically, for example, if the master of the Mayaguez had not been an alert figure able to persuade his captors to turn him and his crew loose when American military operations got under way.

So nobody can confidently draw conclusions from the episode. But with the overriding importance of luck ackowledged, certain discreet and tentative lessons seem to emerge.

First is the utility of having a wide range of military options available to a President. When initial word came of the seizure of the Mayaguez, there was a push inside the National Security Council to punish Cambodia by B-52 bombing.

Defense Secretary James Schlesinger and the uniformed military in the Pentagon wanted nothing to do with such undiscriminating punishment. They were against tit-for-tat and other diplomatic games. They drove hard for the more limited and sharply targeted operation that was, in fact, ordered.

They thus gave the lie to the argument that all military forces ought to be cut because the Pentagon will inevitably use whatever is available. On the contrary, it seems clear that if the limited amphibious operation had not been available, President Ford would have felt obliged to go for the brutal, and probably useless, bombing.

A second lesson is the unreliability of intelligence filtered through the fog of war. There was no advance warning that the Mayaquez was traversing dangerous waters, although other ships had been recently seized by Cambodia in the same area.

While the off-loading of the Mayaguez crew on Kno Tang Island was spotted, the move of the whole crew from Kho Tang to another island was missed. Submarines were sent to Kho Tang in what might well have been a useless mission. Moreover, the estimate of resistance they would meet on Kho Tang was gravely understated. But all that, as anybody who has done wartime intelligence work knows, is par for the course.

The inflated claims of psychohistory were also unsaid by the rescue operation. Pop psychologists, trying to judge from a distance, assumed that President Ford, after a string of setbacks, was driven by the need to prove his method. In fact, far from acting tough, the President's main role was to go for the limited operation.

I happened to be in the White House during some of the most anxious moments of the crisis. I was struck by the apparent lack of psychological tension in men very close to Mr. Ford. Coming away, I asked the veteran White House correspondent of the Associated Press, Frank Cormier, his impression of the mood. "Calm," he said.

Another more subtle lesson emerges from the behavior of Thailand. Thai political leaders railed against the rescue operation in public and called for withdrawal of the U.S. force. Thai military leaders, privately, insisted that this country had to go in and rescue the ship and its crew—using force, and the sooner the better.

In the past Americans had a wide tolerance for such doubletalk by foreign nations. In the present case, the Thai behavior prompted U.S. demands for a withdrawal of all U.S. forces from Thailand.

The enduring lesson is that the need for candor in this country, plus a feeling that we shouldn't help countries that don't want our help, combines to reduce American tolerance for foreigners who say go away publicly while privately appealing for assistance. In the future, the commitments that are worth most to the United States will be the commitments foreign nations have the guts to acknowledge in public.

Yet another lesson applies to congressional control of foreign affairs. Precisely because ifs and buts bulked so large in the past few days, the Mayaguez affair demonstrates that it is impossible to foresee all contingencies.

A measure of discretion has to be left to the executive authorities. Congressional wisdom lies in not trying to anticipate what cannot be anticipated.

My impression is that the Congress, much as the President, acted in a responsible way during the Mayaguez affair. Which brings us to the final lesson. It is that the government can do some things and do them fairly well. The notion that government is condemned to bungle and fumble everything it touches is exposed as a wild generalization. That applies not only to foreign affairs, where President Ford is an activist, but equally to managing the economy.

It was not, self-consciously at least, a part of the fallout from the trials and tragedy of Vietnam. Neither was it a public relations exercise—some tasteless attempt at military image-polishing. Least of all was it that.

No. The 1,000 or so student officers at the U.S. Army Command and General Staff College at Ft. Leavenworth were about a more serious business. Their purpose, for two and one-half uninterrupted days, was to consider their several responsibilities as soldiers in the uniform of their country.

A few journalists and academics had been invited to participate in the symposium, for whatever uncertain contribution they might make. And also enough major generals and brigadiers assembled in one place, there on the old fort looking eastward from its bluff across the Missouri River, that the Russians, if they had known about it, might have been tempted to a preemptive strike. So many glittering stars that a one-time second lieutenant gone all to rumpled suits and middle age had consciously to keep his hand stuffed in a pocket lest it leap twitching up in involuntary salute.

But all of them—the generals no less than the journalists and professors—were outsiders. The event belonged to the students, most of them majors with a scattering of lieutenant colonels and senior captains. It was for them to ask, and if possible to answer, the questions.

Hard questions. Is the individual first a military officer, responsible to the dictates of the system, or first a human being answerable to personal conscience? What happens when professional mission and one's own value system come into conflict? What sorts of compromises can decently be made? And what sorts cannot?

In short, is it possible to reconcile the highest standards of moral integrity with a successful career—or even with survival—within the military establishment?

It had to strike any fair-minded listener with astonishment to hear how freely, how fiercely, these midrank officers—some of them the top leaders of tomorrow's armed forces—were willing to punish themselves and challenge their superiors with that kind of introspection.

In the civilian world, our options are somewhat freer. At last resort, if a collision of values cannot be resolved, we may change jobs. Move to another newspaper. Sign on with a different bank. Apply for a position on another faculty. The career soldier cannot look for a different Army to serve.

Moreover, few of our moral choices involve life and death. And most of them are made behind desks or in board rooms, not in the pressing fury of the bunker or the trench.

And yet how many of us—in the course of our whole careers—have ever, in so concerted, so deliberate or so open a fashion, set about trying to define the relationship between our professional obligations and our human ones? Between principles and promotion? Between private honor and blind obedience? And how many of us ever will be called upon to pay with our livelihoods—and conceivably with our lives—for our choices?

It was, all in all, not an especially pleasant two and one-half days for anyone concerned, the participants or the observers. But it was a remarkable experience and an illuminating one.

My own military service dates back to those fine, comfortable, cocksure days before it was learned that some wars are unwinnable and that the most critical battle of all is the political one for public understanding at home. When, within the bounds of strict legality, there was no such thing as a "good" order or a "bad" order; they all were carved in stone.

I was astonished to find how generally those memories have been overtaken by change.

Amazing, first of all, is how young the majors have gotten. Nearly all of them have served a combat tour, and some of them two or three. And yet, to a man, they are in their 30s, often their very early 30s. Probably it is only the time-warp of middle age that creates the memory of an old man's Army. Maybe it never was.

Amazing, too, the level of skills and of sophistication they represent. It's true the students at Leavenworth were the cream of their age and rank groups. But well over half of them owned master's degrees in some nonmilitary discipline. Many had two.

I found them a reflective, widely informed, genuinely inquiring and relentlessly candid class of professionals, full of self-directed wit, willing to ask—and be asked—questions of elemental principle. Willing to say to 2-star generals not only that it is permissible to question the decency of an order but that there are in fact occasions when an order must be disobeyed because there are higher obligations even than the one to discipline and the flag.

That is strong stuff. If you have spent any time around or in the military establishment, you know just how strong. Granted that the Command and General Staff College is nominally an academic environment as opposed to a strictly military one. Granted, too, that after these students go on to their eventual assignments, every conflict between the ideal and the expedient may not invariably be resolved on the side of the graces. Perfection, like piety, is a rare commodity, otherwise fewer people would have to spend their whole lives seeking it.

Still, it cannot be doubted that if the sort of constructive self-examination evidenced at that recent symposium comes in time to permeate the services, the result will be a military establishment that is better led, with a more refined sense of duty, than any that has ever gone forth to win a war or defend the peace.

There was, as mentioned earlier, very little direct reference to Vietnam. But Vietnam was nevertheless the tapestry into which many of the themes and issues were woven. One heard the name of Calley mentioned. And My Lai. One heard the term "body count" used as a kind of code for any such blind stupidity as believing that victory is measurable by corpses, even fictitious corpses.

Then, on the evening before the last morning of the symposium, the last American was plucked by helicopter off a rooftop in Saigon and the government of South Vietnam surrendered unconditionally to the invading Communists.

And on the chalk board in one of the classrooms the next day someone had written: It's all over over there.

No one referred to that epitaph to a war. None of them even acknowledged it. They simply went on talking, a while longer, about the kind of men and officers they hoped and intended to be—the kind they would insist that the system let them be. And then, at the appointed time, they went off to the main auditorium for the concluding session.

A journalist spoke. The professors spoke, and one of the generals. And a student for his fellow officers. There were questions from the floor. Finally it was the turn of the commandant of the college, a major general, who, after some summarizing comments, seemed to hesitate just an instant and then asked them all to stand.

It must be a hard thing to say a public prayer from the lighted stage in an auditorium of 1,000 professional soldiers of many backgrounds and several faiths, or none at all. In the Army, praying is the chaplain's job. But this obviously was something that it had occurred to the general spontaneously in that moment to do.

The long habit of command had shaped his manner. So that when he spoke to God he still sounded a little like a man addressing troops. But his sincerity was not to be doubted, nor the plain decency of what he asked.

He prayed for all those who had suffered in the war just ended, and those who might yet suffer after it. And for the country. And for the wisdom to understand duty. And for the courage to do it. And finally he prayed for the friends and comrades that all of them—every single man there—had left behind on that bloody field.

It was a moment very full of emotion.

Somehow reluctant, then, to pronounce an Amen, which seems more a preacher's word than a general's, he simply stopped, having said what was in his mind.

And after a pause told them: "Now just go quietly out of here."

They did. And it was a little time before some present could comfortably speak.

Army Resumes Drug Tests On Pups

By EDWARD COLIMORE
Staff Reporter

The Army has resumed drug-related experiments with beagle puppies at Edgewood Arsenal but denies the dogs are being used in biological or chemical warfare research.

The beagles are put to sleep for autopsies following the tests dealing with their ability to tolerate toxic levels of insecticides, detergents, adhesives and aerosols.

The puppies are also used in a series of experiments on the methods of disposing of obsolete chemical warfare agents.

Lt. Col. Hugh Waite, Army chief of the news branch in Washington, said 100 beagles, aged seven months to a year were procured one month ago for the tests.

He said the Army is accepting bids from commercial breeders until May 24 for another 350 dogs.

"The surgeon general, the Dept. of Army staff and the Congress have been notified," Lt. Col. Waite said. "All tests meet the guidelines established by the Institute of Laboratory Animals."

The spokesman said the Army plans to use:

- 116 puppies in a parathione experiment for the Food and Drug Administration to determine the "no effect" level of parathione insecticides.
- 48 in a consumer product safety commission test on detergents, adhesives and aerosols.
- 20 in toxicological screening of proposed non-lethal riot control agents.
- 180 in neuropharmocological studies to determine physiological effects of drugs proposed for use in the prophylaxis and treatment of effects of anticholinesterase in man.
- 50 in safety testing to define hazards associated with the disposal of obsolete chemical warfare agents.
- 144 in preclinical testing of a therapeutic formula for treatment of anticholinesterase.

Mrs. Brenda Eckstein, an Edgewood Arsenal spokeswoman, said the beagles are put to sleep after experiments are performed.

"The laboratory studies are related to health, safety, immunology and therapeutic drugs," Mrs. Eckstein said. "Once completed, the animals are put to sleep. Autop-

He hawks the Army and sales are good

By Monroe Anderson

WILLIAM RHEA could sell a Dale Carnegie course to W. Clement Stone, some U.S. Savings bonds to Leonid Brezhnev, or a used Chevy to Henry Ford.

He could be rich; instead, he says he'd rather be happy.

"Anyone can sell a vacuum cleaner or a car, that's there to be seen and examined," says Rhea. "But you can't imagine the enjoyment I get when I can say to myself, 'I sold this person exactly what he needed and I sold him that product without really showing it to him.' "

So instead of making money selling baubles and bonds, Rhea sells his riches, his enjoyment, his product, his life—Staff Sergeant Rhea sells the new Volunteer Army.

"I sell the Army," says Rhea, "like most people sell insurance—anywhere, everywhere, and all the time."

A former helicopter maintenance supervisor with three years service in Viet Nam, Rhea is averaging 158 per cent of his assigned monthly recruitment quota. That gives him the best record of any of the 146 recruiters in the 34 Cook, Du Page, and Lake County recruiting stations which make up the Army's Chicago Recruiting Command.

A 28-YEAR-OLD bachelor, he divorces little of his free time from his work time. He's one of five recruiters in the station at 11019 S. Halsted St., but he spends as little time as possible in the office, putting in 13 or 14 hours a day—plus a few more during weekends—in search of new bodies and minds.

As many days as not, his search takes him on a walk down Michigan Avenue thru the business district in his recruiting area. There, he visits with merchants, talks with customers, or corners people on the street.

Not unlike the friendly stranger passing out candy to the kiddies, Rhea pulls slick Army brochures from his Army decal-covered briefcase. Then he begins his siren song about the great joys of being in today's Army.

THE NAME OF THE game is personal contact—"Anytime I meet people I try to be in uniform, so they'll know who I am"—and personal conversation—"eight girls enlisted after just talking to each other about what I had told them," says Rhea.

And when he isn't spreading the word on the street, he spreads it at the universities. He frequently hangs out at Olive-Harvey and Chicago State Colleges. There he plays cards with the students in the lounges, reminding them how much it's costing them to attend and letting them know how much the Army would pay them for attending.

And to make sure the market is covered from every angle, Rhea makes it a point to date college counselors: They know which students are in academic or financial trouble and may be most susceptible to his pitch.

At night, Rhea keeps his uniform on, combs his Afro out to "street" length and heads for the bars. Altho he doesn't smoke or drink, he likes to visit bars because "anything can pop up in a bar," he says.

A former high school athlete, the muscular 6-foot-4, 210-pound Rhea spends Saturdays at the local YMCA playing basketball with the teen-agers, talking to coaches, and trying to convince all to send anyone who needs a good, steady job to him. On Sundays, Rhea, who admits to be only nominally religious, goes to at least one of the 35 to 40 churches he keeps regular contact with.

EVEN HIS OWN past and personality can be put to use to spread the message and push the product. A native of Johnson City, Tenn., where he was valedictorian of his high school class, Rhea deliberately speaks in his Southern accent.

One of his favorite ploys is to tell a young city dude: "I'm just a country boy who don't know much about the city so I'd appreciate your letting me know what's going on."

All the time Rhea spends searching and talking out of the office is designed to get potential recruits into the office. Once across from his desk, Rhea says he can sell his prospective recruit in half an hour.

"What I do is paint pictures in the mind," Rhea says of his sales technique.

"He's got to want to do something," explains Rhea. "So you find out what that is. But you never give a person a full spiel because he's going to have some objection. It's like fishing, you give them just enough of that worm to get them on the hook."

OBVIOUSLY, RHEA is a very good fisherman. Since he became an Army recruiter in March, 1974, he has persuaded 15 women and 75 men into signing the bottom line.

Since the draft ended in March, 1973, the Army's 7,000 recruiters nationwide have had to go it alone in making sure there are enough new troops available to maintain the Army's minimum authorized strength of 782,000. To do that, the Army needed 250,000 new recruits in the 1974 fiscal year.

For a while no one was sure that recruiters would be able to keep the soldiers marching. "It really was hard because we were living Viet Nam down," Rhea reluctantly admits.

However, times have changed. The recession and its ensuing ranks of unemployed have forced more and more young Americans to retreat into the Army as an economical sanctuary. For example, an Army recruit now gets about $7,000 a year in pay and benefits, more

Kissinger's Challenge

By James Reston

WASHINGTON, May 17—The next twelve months, beginning the last quarter of the twentieth century, are likely to be a critical period in the politics of the world, and a test of the leadership of the major powers.

For the last few years, Washington, Moscow, and Peking have been dealing with the problems of the past, with the hangovers of the Second World War in Europe, the Middle East, and Southeast Asia. But now there is a pause that can be either creative or destructive, and we have come to a fork in the road, where there will either be a decline into separatism, nationalism and protectionism, or a determination to break with the past and create a new world order.

WASHINGTON

In the next few weeks, some specific questions will have to be answered:

● In June, the British people will vote on whether to join the European Common Market.

● Within the next few days, Secretary of State Kissinger will meet with the Soviet Foreign Minister, Andrei Gromyko, to discuss, and hopefully to clarify, among other things, what they really mean by the policy of "détente."

● Again in June, President Ford will meet President Sadat of Egypt in Europe, and later in the month, Prime Minister Rabin of Israel in Washington, and both times he will have to answer a fundamental question: What Israel is Washington defending—Israel where she stands now in the Sinai, the passes and the oil fields she captured in the 1967 war, or Israel back roughly to her 1967 borders?

● After that, President Ford will be going to China, where he will have to answer the question whether the United States wants to go on recognizing the regime on Taiwan as a potential government of all China, or cut from Taiwan and recognize Peking as the sovereign capital of that country.

The questions now in the headlines —the recovery of the American ship and men in Cambodia, the withdrawal of the Ambassador of Thailand from Washington, the demonstration, as Henry Kissinger puts it, that there are limits to Americans' patience, are not the main questions.

The issue now is what Kissinger has always said it was—whether the nations can get away from these secondary considerations of the past, and deal with the primary questions of military security, economic stability, inflation, hunger, unemployment, population control, monetary control, trade prices and even redistribution of wealth in the coming months and years.

It will be interesting to see now whether Kissinger, the historian, will turn from the divisive issues of the early '70's to the creative opportunities of the 80's. The credibility of the United States does not depend on defeating the Cambodians— as one of his colleagues described it, "intimidating an ant and pretending it was a tiger"—but in defining the problems of the future and coming up with imaginative proposals to deal with them.

Time is a critical factor in this challenge to President Ford and Mr. Kissinger. None of the major governments of the world is now very secure. Within a year, the Presidential election of 1970 will dominate decisions in the United States. China and the Soviet Union are governed by old and fragile men. Franco in Spain and Tito in Yugoslavia are loitering down into the shadows, and when they go, the strategic questions in Europe may be very different.

But for a little while, roughly between now and the Presidential primary elections of next spring, Mr. Ford and Mr. Kissinger have a chance to give the world a more hopeful vision of the coming years.

They have been putting out fires these last few days, and devoting a great deal of energy to ceremonial occasions with the Shah of Iran and other visitors, and consulting with the leaders of Congress, and defending their Cambodian policy with the press —all of which have their uses—but in the coming months, there is a brief opportunity, even a challenge, to get down to fundamental things and come up with some new creative ideas.

The President is much stronger now on Capitol Hill than he has ever been in his brief stewardship. The Congress is beginning to realize that maybe it went too far in limiting his authority in dealing with Cyprus and Soviet trade and immigration policy, so it supported him on Cambodia, particularly because it was a success, and will probably be more responsive to his leadership elsewhere in the coming months.

The main question is whether he and Kissinger will take advantage of this opportunity. They are not really in a weak position, either at home or abroad, if they deal creatively with the larger questions. After the last World War, it was the United States, and nobody else, that came forward with policies for the reconstruction of Europe and Japan, for the control of atomic energy, for the organization of the United Nations, and for the stabilization of world trade.

Vietnam and Watergate diverted Washington from these larger visions of a decent and orderly world, but they are behind us now, and the President and his Secretary of State, despite all their troubles, disappointments and blunders, still have a chance to lead again with new ideas and concepts, looking, not to their immediate personal and political problems, but to the end of this century.

than a second lieutenant was making a decade ago.

THE PAY AND OTHER Army benefits such as guaranteed specialized job training, guaranteed base location, and a variety of educational benefits, all have made Rhea's job easier.

When he joined the army nearly 8 years ago, says Rhea, "all I was guaranteed was three hots and a cot."

However, in the new Volunteer Army, even the barracks cots have given way to semiprivate rooms more akin to college dormitories. K.P. and other onerous tasks now are done mostly by hired civilians.

So, for all of Rhea's hard-sell tactics, he says he feels no remorse: "I know the Army can help a lot of these people. They don't know what they want to do."

But the Army's new-found attractiveness, combined with the great selling abilities of Rhea and recruiters like him, have caused some new problems—the Army now is upgrading its standards.

During the month of January, for example, Rhea says he processed 37 people; the Army took only 11.

"Now, it's not a matter of quantity. I can get that," says Rhea. "But now I've got to find quality."

sies are performed to get he research answers.

"The beagles used are purebred. Using them reduces the variables and minimizes the number of animals that have to be used. In many ways, they are acceptably close to humans."

An official of the U. S. Army Materiel Command in Washington, said the beagle is the best laboratory animal because of its physiological responses are so much like humans.

He said the Edgewood dogs would not be used in any chemical biological warfare related experiments to comply with an amendment attached to the military appropriations bill by Congress last August. The amendment banned the use of Pentagon funds to buy animals for chemical-biological warfare tests.

Meanwhile, at Aberdeen Proving Grounds, two laboratory analysts attempted to answer charges by U. S. Sen. William Roth Jr., R-Del., that the Army killed or maimed nearly 500 animals in testing nonlethal weapons for crowd control use.

Sen. Roth said hard rubber balls and other less lethal projectiles were fired at high velocities at baboons and pigs. He said the projectiles were aimed at heads, faces, kidneys and other areas of the body to determine the extent of wounds.

The two Army scientists, who asked not to be identified, said 443 animals were used in the tests from 1973-1974 at the Land Warfare Laboratory at Aberdeen Proving Grounds.

They said 38 baboons and pigs were killed during tests and the others that survived were put to sleep for autopsies.

"We were trying to find something that might prevent another Kent State tragedy, one scientist said. "We want to give the man with the gun another choice.

"Look at the policeman. He has a 19th Century pistol and a caveman's club. These weapons can do real damage. A nonlethal weapon that stuns gives him another choice."

The scientists said the project, costing more than $1 million in military and justice department funds, did not produce a working nonlethal weapon.

However, tests results showed the most acceptable projectile to be a silicone ball, 1.25 inches in diameter. The ball fired at a velocity of 250 feet per second wold be safe at a close distance and produce a sting at 200 feet.

Other projectiles tested included a baseball, beanbag, clay pellet, "super ball," and water-filled plastic ball.

AAI, a Cockeysville firm, developed the compressed gas-powered weapon that fired the projectiles.

The unfashionable Schlesinger CHICAGO TRIBUNE 18 MAY 1975 (19)

Pentagon's professor shows his style

By Nick Thimmesch

WASHINGTON—Of late, Americans have seen a lot of James Rodney Schlesinger, the pipe-smoking Secretary of Defense, first because of the evacuations of Phnom Penh and Saigon, and then, last week, the spectacular recapture of the U. S. merchant ship, S. S. Mayaguez, and its crew by Marines and naval forces.

His appearances in the press and on television during the evacuations put him in the unpleasant role of letting the public know that we truly had lost in Viet Nam, that it was a debacle.

But with the Mayaguez, Schlesinger had a winner, a successful mission which prompted many a "hurry!" across the land. On Thursday, the day after the ship's recapture, the only American official to appear on TV was Schlesinger. Somehow, Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger wasn't around.

FOR SCHLESINGER, who has spent more time defending the Defense Department's basic right to exist than he has in the chore he prefers—correcting its internal problems—the Mayaguez episode was a desperately needed tonic.

"Gulliver is rising, I believe," he told me Friday, alluding to the hero bound by the tiny Lilliputians. "He may now feel justified in not lying flat on his back, even if there are no bonds on him.

"The American spirit needs stirring," he said. "The leadership groups in this country seem to think that the West has no right to defend itself, that the use of force is not moral. I spend too much of my time defending the corpus of the Department of Defense.

"But it has even been satisfying articulating the case for defense across the country. It has to be a major effort to develop appropriate attitudes. We've made some progress, even if we've only stopped the heedless hostility toward the military establishment. It's all been part of the disillusionment of our time."

During those dismal nights when Americans were being evacuated from Phnom Penh and Saigon and during the Mayaguez outing, Schlesinger prowled the Pentagon's command center, in 18-hour stints, occasionally uttering forceful growls, and increasing the admiration that the military brass holds for him, an American who has never served in the Armed Forces.

Schlesinger is not the sort of person who exudes charm or wins friends and influences people readily. He is a loner and individualist. He appeared in his rarely-worn tuxedo at a state dinner at the White House last week, but neglected to affix his cufflinks. No matter.

Three years ago, he appeared at the White House correspondents dinner in the tuxedo but forgot to wear his bow tie. Told this at the door, he unbuttoned his collar, and said, "Now no one will know I don't have a tie on."

HE HAS made a career out of being unfashionable. His clothes, lifestyle, ideas, and bluntness marked him as a contrary fellow when he came into the new Republican administration in 1969, and hardly as one who would rise to Cabinet level. Consider Schlesinger's against-the-grain record.

At the Bureau of the Budget: Tho billed as sympathetic to defense needs, and expert in them, Schlesinger as assistant budget director, put the knife to $6 billion in weapons plans, and singlehandedly killed the Air Force's Manned Orbiting Laboratory and the Navy anti-submarine carrier task forces.

At the Atomic Energy Commission: Chairman Schlesinger told utility company executives complaining of his seeming to side with environmentalists: "Gentlemen, I'm not here to protect your triple-A bond ratings."

At the Central Intelligence Agency: After retiring 1,200 of the 18,000 employes and ordering that a road sign reading CIA be put up, replacing one that had read "BPR" [Bureau of Public Roads], Director Schlesinger said: "The trouble with this place is that it has been run like a gentleman's club, and I'm no gentleman."

At the Department of Defense: Secretary Schlesinger responded to charges that Henry Kissinger complained to Israeli Ambassador Simcha Dinitz that during the Arab-Israeli war he was in a one-man fight with the Pentagon and couldn't get the Pentagon to move: "There is a difference between dragging your heels and having your shoes nailed to the floor by national policy."

Given these typically ornery and impolitic stands, the question naturally arises in fashion-conscious Washington: Will James Schlesinger spoil success?

AND SO it is with many who are a bit startled on meeting the unconventional Schlesinger, whose past just doesn't seem to hang together right.

Schlesinger's close friends acknowledge he displays an arrogance which they claim is really a projected shyness. He lives simply in a markedly unpretentious home where he is about as "old shoe" as a mortal can get. He has had just one wife, is father to eight children, and finds that quite enough social life.

Schlesinger was catapulted into the defense job because of Watergate. He succeeded Elliot Richardson, who scarcely had time to warm his chair at the Pentagon, when he was snatched by President Nixon to relieve then Atty. Gen. Richard Kleindienst. It was the second catapulting in six months for Schlesinger. He had arrived at his previous job, director of the CIA, just as quickly, because the beleaguered Richard Helms suddenly found reasons to become ambassador to Iran.

Schlesinger, at 44, was the youngest man to take over the Pentagon, and is the first defense secretary in recent history not to have served in the military.

Neither fact means a damn to him. Nor does his gathering reputation that he refuses to fit into Washington's social mold, won't comply with the media's demands to simplify and compress complicated notions into brief quotations for printed page or precious broadcast time, and has disdain for much of the American so-called intellectual community.

"I am skeptical about the intelligentsia," he once said when asked about his reputed intellectual toughness, "and have been for some time. I suppose I am identified with them. But I recall what our friend, T. S. Eliot, said on that subject—that 'the intelligentsia as a class is not distinguished by a strength in intellect.'"

All this is spoken by a man who was educated in the finest schools, was graduated summa cum laude from Harvard University in 1950, went on to take two more degrees in economics from Harvard, and won himself a travel fellowship for his scholastic excellence. He's written tons for the scholarly prints, and spent his life in academic and think tanks. So he doesn't think much of the intelligentsia.

JAMES R. SCHLESINGER is the first defense secretary to direct that huge establishment and apparatus in 11 years without a war to fight. He has the job of rebuilding at a time when seeming detente suggests the contrary, and when Congress and the public aren't deeply in love with the military.

Schlesinger has the mission to convince Americans of what he believes and also accomplish a redirection of our strategic nuclear strength, and the maintenance and modernization of our conventional forces. And he has Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger to contend with.

THE DIFFERENCES between Kissinger and Schlesinger have come into the open and blossom like flowers in the spring. Schlesinger's supporters feel that while they might be substantive on both men's part, Kissinger also resents Schlesinger's rise to power and stubbornness at the Pentagon walls. An article, based on a book by CBS correspondents Marvin and Bernard Kalb [both partial to Kissinger], reported that the two secretaries indulged in a burocratic battle over the speed of moving military supplies to Israel during the October war.

As usual, Kissinger's ambiguity served him well, for he could tell the Arabs he slowed the shipments to stabilize the military situation, and he could tell the Kalb brothers that he had to get Nixon to order Schlesinger to "get the supplies there."

By the time Schlesinger was able to give his version, and Bernard Kalb suspects it is closer to the truth than what the State Department put out, Schlesinger looked second-best to Kissinger.

Schlesinger is an infant when it comes to manipulating the press, planting stories, touching up and technicoloring his image. His friends are few but they are people like William D. Ruckelshaus, Charls Walker, former Treasury official, and Richard Whalen, the author and former Nixon administration watcher.

Whalen feels there is a rift between Schlesinger and Kissinger based on the two men's characters.

"Jim Schlesinger is more of an idealist than Kissinger is," Whalen explains. "Back in 1967, I met him when I was working for Nixon and getting ready for the campaign. He did work for us in the 1968 campaign at a distance on Viet Nam. I was supposed to get together with him at Mission Bay [after Nixon's nomination], but I had a final blowup with Mitchell and Haldeman, and Jim called and wanted to know where in the hell I was that night we were to meet. I told him I bailed out, and he should stay the hell away, too, which he did. He would have hurt himself by getting too close after me.

"But if Nixon would have had sustained exposure to Schlesinger, it crosses my mind that it might have been Schlesinger, rather than Kissinger, picked to fill the National Security Council role.

"Then Nixon would have had a man with a settled, consistent, coherent philosophy, a committed Republican, a Nixon loyalist, and in some ways, a more admirable man than Kissinger. Schlesinger would have been more accessible to the ordinary American who looks at Kissinger thru the media image of a magician, a great maker of the New World balancing, something I think has changed for the worse. Schlesinger is an American type, a guy who could explain and justify, and defend changes in foreign policy. But perhaps he was too honest and direct to be worked in.

"THERE IS respect for Kissinger on Schlesinger's side because he is a gentleman. There is openness, intellectual respect and no envy whatsoever. I don't think that Kissinger, for his part, reciprocates this gentlemanly, open relationship. Kissinger is much more a knife-wielder and a backbiter."

Schlesinger was born in New York City, Feb. 15, 1929. His father was a prosperous certified public accountant. Schlesinger met his wife, Rachel, in 1948 when he was a Harvard junior and she was a freshman at Radcliff. They were married in 1954.

After he earned his doctorate in economics, he taught at Harvard for three years and then took a job at the University of Virginia. There he was asked to teach a course in international relations because he was the only one around who believed labor unions were here to stay.

By the end of the 1950s, he became interested in the economic aspects of national defense, and in 1960 wrote "The Political Economy of National Security." The theologians at Rand Corporation were impressed, and brought Schlesinger into their tank in 1963 as a defense analyst who wound up poking holes in systems analysis, then all the rage because of Robert S. McNamara.

His Robert Taft Republicanism and first-rate professional reputation weren't good enough to bring him into the Nixon administration's defense picture in 1969, simply because he had irritated then Defense Secretary Melvin Laird.

But he was recruited to the Bureau of the Budget by Robert Mayo.

When the Environmental Protection Agency was being formed, Ruckelshaus wanted Schlesinger to join him as his deputy. Kissinger objected because he wanted Schlesinger to remain in the budget bureau. By now Schlesinger was regarded as an irreverent challenger to assumptions and assertions. Yet, Nixon named him chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission in summer, 1971.

Schlesinger soon shook that agency up, improved the licensing system and solved problems in weapons management. He stumbled into great approval by Nixon, when he took his wife and children to Amchitka, in the Aleutians, to demonstrate to the world, doubting ecologists, and a skeptical governor of Alaska, that the underground explosion of a nuclear warhead there was a safe exercise.

President Nixon was so impressed with the news pictures of Schlesinger and his wife Rachel, that he sent her a letter praising her solidarity with her husband.

WHEN THE torrents of Watergate alt entatively flushed and beached administration officials, suddenly Schlesinger was running the CIA and Richard Helms was ambassador to Iran.

Schlesinger showed guts in getting his agency to fully describe its role in the unfortunate Ellsberg episode. This involved getting a CIA psychiatrist, who specialized in psychiatric profiles, Dr. Bernard Malloy, to write and sign an affidavit relating how David Young and E. Howard Hunt, claiming they represented a Nixon aide and Kissinger, pushed him to do such a profile on Ellsberg for purposes of defaming him.

"He's an unflappable individual," says Whalen. "Think of the jobs thrown at him i the past three years, and how he had to go into the CIA and open the windows and closets. He has great capacity for orderly, disciplined thinking.

"Jim doesn't worry about his socks matching, or his tie fitting in with his color scheme. His shirt tail hangs out over the back of his trousers, whether he's at home or in the office."

SCHLESINGER won't eat in good restaurants. There are times when 50 cents in a vending machine brings him an awful hamburger for lunch. His 1964 car still works, and he donated his 1960 Falcon to the CIA for shooting practice. A $20,000-a-year burocrat could afford his modest home in Arlington, Va.

Schlesinger is admired but remains a constant puzzlement to Joe Laitin, a seasoned government information man who befriended him at the Bureau of Budget. "Jim doesn't look over his shoulder," says Laitin, "to see if anyone is gaining on him. He is a people-one is gaining on him. He is a people-

"Strip thru that layer of Jim's intellectual arrogance, and do you know what you'll find? Another layer of intellectual arrogance. I say that, knowing that he's one of the best and nicest men I've ever met in government."

In Saigon, the Attitude Is Conciliatory

The new rulers of Saigon are continuing their methodical approach to normalizing South Vietnamese society and have begun to turn their attention outward as well. They are opening relations with other nations, and have proposed doing so with the United States.

During a three-day victory celebration, Nguyen Huu Tho, chairman of the advisory council of the Provisional Revolutionary Government, offered to establish relations with all countries.

Britain, Japan, Canada, India and other nations have already recognized the new Government in line with their traditional policies in such matters: Recognition is extended when a new regime has established control over its nation, no matter what the nature of the regime. France and some other nations had never broken relations but only withdrawn their ambassadors. The French mission has again been upgraded to embassadorial level.

The Saigon authorities have notified the United States that Algeria will take over the former South Vietnamese Embassy in Washington and will handle Saigon's affairs in this country. The Ford Administration has acknowledged receiving the notification. But Secretary of State Kissinger made clear there will be no hurry to initiate diplomatic relations. The matter is still "under consideration," he said.

The tendency in Washington at present is to place the new Saigon and Cambodian rulers in the same category as the hostile Governments in North Korea and North Vietnam. The Commerce Department has announced a general trade embargo against South Vietnam and Cambodia.

According to reports from American newsmen still in Saigon, the people of South Vietnam have been favorably impressed by the polite behavior of the Communist troops. The Communists, following the Maoist precept, "Do not take from the people so much as a needle or a piece of thread," have been scrupulously careful to pay for all food and other supplies.

Life in Saigon has returned to normal. Foreign journalists have been registered and are allowed to report, although communications have delayed their dispatches.

Authorities in Saigon and Hanoi continue to suggest that eventual reunification of the North and South remains a principal goal. The Saigon area commander, Lieut. Gen. Tran Van Tra, was quoted as saying reunification had been stipulated in the 1973 Paris peace accords. The regime has said it wants to carry out the terms of the accord but General Tra gave no date for when reunification might occur.

Mayaguez Captain Tells Story of Rescue

By SYDNEY H. SCHANBERG
Special to The New York Times

SINGAPORE, May 17—The captain of the Mayaguez, the American freighter that was released by the Cambodians Thursday in the midst of a United States air, sea and land assault, said today that he and his crew were aboard a fishing boat that was strafed and tear-gassed by American planes.

Captain Charles T. Miller, who brought his container ship into Singapore today, said that the strafing incident was the "worst experience" in his 42 years at sea—a career that included tours on Liberty ships in the Pacific in World War II and kamikaze attacks during the invasion of Leyte Gulf.

Strafed for 4 Hours

The 62-year-old master of the Mayaguez, who is from Fountain Valley, Calif., held a news conference on the pier alongside which he had just berthed the 10,485-ton cargo ship. The session with the press was arranged by his company, Sea-Land Service, of Menlo Park, N. J. The corporation's executives wished to demonstrate among other things that the Mayaguez was not a "spy ship" and was carrying no arms or ammunition.

The captain said that on Wednesday he and his crew were traveling from Tang Island to the Cambodian mainland under guard on a fishing boat. American warplanes, he said, followed the boat for four hours, harassing it tenaciously and, with fortunate accuracy—no one was killed—strafing its bow and sides and even hitting it with tear gas. It was a futile attempt to make the boat turn back to the island, 30 miles off the coast, where the Mayaguez was anchored.

Does Not Blame Pilots

"You have to give our pilots credit," the captain said. "They can put a thread through the eye of a needle a mile away. They did everything that was possible without blowing us out of the water to try to get this boat to turn around and take us back to the ship.

"If we were strafed or bombed once, we were bombed a hundred times by our jets. Ten foot forward of our bow light. Rockets and machine gun fire. When they saw that was not going to work, two jets overflew the boat from bow to stern approximately 70 feet above us and they tear-gassed us.

"The first gassing wasn't too bad. I don't blame the pilots. They were only trying to keep us out of Sihanoukville. They wanted us returned to the vessel. After a half hour passed and we were still going, we were gassed second time. Everybody on the ship vomited; skin was burning; a couple of men were struc by shrapnel.

"The third engineer, who had a bad heart, passed out for about 20 minutes. We thought he was dead. Actually we didn't realize the condition the man was in for the first five or 10 minutes because we were all pretty sick ourselves. After we got in close to Sihanoukville the jets left us alone and they put the [reconnaisance] plane on top of us again."

The ordeal of the Mayaguez crew began Monday afternoon when Cambodian gunboat fired across the bow and then seized the vessel.

According to Sea-Land Service officials, the ship, bound from Hong Kong to the port of Sattahip in Thailand, was carrying such general cargo as Israeli oranges and oil-drilling clay, plus some supplies for American commissaries and post exchanges in Thailand—including liquor and shaving cream.

The company's interest in establishing its respectability was lost in the drama of the adventure as related by the spare, grizzled Captain Miller. He and his 38 crewmen looked reasonably well but some, including the captain, showed signs of sleeplessness and deep emotional strain.

Twice, during his account, the captain choked up, tears filling his eyes—once when he spoke of being finally picked up by the destroyer Wilson about 10:30 A.M. Thursday and again when he spoke of meeting a wounded marine major in the ship's hospital.

"I talked to the marine major that took in the first chopper to Koh Tang island that was shot down," Captain Miller said. "He had about a quarter of his back torn off with shrapnel, I cried. People were being killed to save me."

Captain Miller faltered, began to weep, it took him few minutes to compose himself. He continued, speaking of the marine officer: "And he took it like soldier. He says: 'Captain, all I wanted to see was your men released. Don't worry about me.'"

The captain also said that at least seven marines were killed on the island, in addition to the 13 already reported missing and believed dead. The Pentagon has reported casualties as one dead, 13 missing and 22 wounded.

The captain said the seven marines were already "on ice" aboard the Wilson on Thursday morning—when the operation still had 11 or 12 hours to run.

Captain Miller and his men all said they were never abused by their Cambodian captors. There were even accounts of kind treatment—of Cambodian soldiers feeding them first and eating what the Americans left, of the soldiers giving the seamen the mattresses off their beds.

But at the same time Captain Miller said several times that he and his crew had moments when "we didn't think we would ever get out alive—we thought we would be shot or have our heads cut off one way or another."

Repeatedly, Captain Miller praised the efforts of President Ford and American armed forces in trying to secure the crew's release.

"Let me tell you one thing," he said. "If it wasn't for our Air Force, our Navy and our marines, I don't think this crew would be standing before you today."

The captain, telling of the start of adventure, said that on Monday morning, his ship was challenged by a torpedo boat. "I reduced the ship's speed to maneuvering," he said. "The engines were stopped at 11:21 A.M. after the gunboat had fired at me with antiaircraft guns. I stopped the vessel and the motor torpedo boat pulled alongside.

"Seven men boarded my vessel—seven armed men anywhere from 10 years old to around 30—all carrying gernade throwers, shoulder rocket throwers, AK-47's, and a U.S. Army field pack telephone," the captain said.

"None of the men that boarded the vessel was able to speak English. The only thing they could do was point in the direction of the gunboat and indicate that I follow the ship. The evening of May 12, I dropped the anchor on the shoreside of Wai Island and armed insurgents aboard the ship.

"During the night nobody was allowed to sleep. At any time I tried to leave the bridge with eight or nine of these armd insurgents that came aboard at Pulao Wai Island they would make me go back up on the bridge. So I sat on the bridge all night with the armed men, the officer on watch and several other men."

On Tuesday the ship was moved to Tang Island and "a launch came alongside with more armed insurgents and the crew was ordered to get off the ship," the captain said.

"They took us ashore in two fishing boats with two armed patrol boats to lead us into "During this time our jets"—Koh Tang Island," he said. reconnaissance planes—"came along and found we were anchored off ths island.

OAS chief favors 'dialogue' with U.S.

By RICHARD O'MARA
Rio de Janeiro Bureau of The Sun

Rio de Janeiro – Immediately after being elected secretary general of the Organization of American States Saturday, Alejandro Orfila, 50, promised to revive the "new dialogue" between the United States and Latin America.

Mr Orfila is Argentina's ambassador in Washington and one of the most popular diplomats in the hemisphere. He just might be able to do it. Where he is sure to have trouble, though, is encouraging a dialogue between Argentina and Brazil, the two largest countries in South America.

The Brazilian government led the fight against the Argentine's election at the OAS meeting, which ends today in Washington. It endorsed and lobbied strenuously for the Dominican Republic's candidate, Victor Gomez-Berges. 35 Mr Orfila's victory, assured by the vote of the United States, was received here yesterday with a notable lack of diplomatic grace.

Diplomatic sources in Brasilia were quick to point out that the secretary generalship of the OAS is more a ceremonial post than one with actual power.

Brazil reportedly will review its balance sheet regarding contributions to the OAS. Also, it was hinted that Brazil was disappointed that Mr Orfila won with American help – the Argentine got only the 13 required votes—and saw this as an action that could weaken what Brazil regards as its special relationship with the United States.

Brazil expressed its opposition to Mr Orfila—who had been the favorite for months – long before the opening of the OAS conference. The government here regards an Argentine at the head of the OAS as inimical to Brazilian interests.

Broader French NATO Role Draws Critics from Left, Right

By Bernard Kaplan
Special to The Washington Post

PARIS — Paradoxically, one reason that President Valery Giscard d'Estaing may have refused to attend next month's NATO summit meeting in Brussels is because France currently is collaborating more actively with NATO than at any time since withdrawing from the military side of the alliance a decade ago.

Cooperation with NATO has improved so much recently that, on both the left and right, Giscard has been accused of planning to re-enter the integrated military command that the late President de Gaulle quit in 1964.

The French Communists have launched a propaganda campaign based on the allegation. While it is almost certainly not true, Giscard was thought to see a political need to dampen the attack by the De Gaulle-like gesture of boycotting a summit conference initiated by the "Anglo-Saxons."

Military cooperation between France and NATO never really ceased. But, under De Gaule and later Georges Pompidou, it was kept well-camouflaged from the public here. The policy was to decide individual acts of collaboration in terms of direct French national interest.

NATO planners were thus hampered by a lack of assurance of longterm French cooperation.

Without an announcement, Giscard has dropped much of the secrecy and committed his government to a general policy of cooperation, at least in some spheres. According to the respected Paris newspaper Le Monde, the rapport between France and NATO is now "without complexes."

Observers here date the change from France's acceptance of the declaration made at last June's NATC foreign ministers meeting in Ottawa, which proclaimed a 'common Atlantic defense" as "interdependent and indivisible." A statement of French support for NATO was written into the final communique of Giscard's encounter in Martinique with President Ford in December.

Shortly thereafter, Giscard declared that "our military means are, essentially, directed against the Soviet Union." This refuted De Gaulle's "all points of the compass" doctrine, under which French strategy no longer assuemed that the Soviets were the main potential enemy.

Writing in the semi-official "National Defense Review,' the recently retired chief of naval staff, Admiral Marc de Joybert, explained that 'currently, France's military forces form no more than a part of the whole" (part of the allied forces in Europe.

An indication of the new French attitude was last November's appointment of General Rene Chesnais to head France's military liaison mission at NATO military headquarters. An aide de camp to both generals Eisenhower and Ridgeway when they were allied supreme commanders in the early 1950s, Chesnais is regarded as thoroughly "pro-Atlantic."

The naming of Gen. Alexander Haig as supreme allied commander also has helped improve rapport between France and NATO. Haig is viewed here as a francophile, a reputation he gained while serving in the Nixon White House.

Air and naval cooperation between French and NATO forces in the Western Mediterranean appears to have stepped up considerably over recent months, even though this is officially denied here. Sources say that the French fleet is now helping the U.S. Sixth Fleet keep tabs on Soviet naval movements in the area.

French naval and air units in February joined in a NATO exercise off Portugal. The French Communist Party immediately labeled this a "provocation."

According to sources here, there has also been a noticeable increase in collaboration between NATO and the French nuclear striking force. In recent months, a significant number of allied officers reportedly visited the main French nuclear command post at Taverny and other nuclear bases.

Technical collaboration appears to be on the rise as well. Within NATO, France, for instance, now participates in meetings of the directors of national armaments planning. A French observer regularly sits at the deliberations of Eurocom, a division of Eurogroup, a NATO body dealing with coordination of weapons production.

A general of engineers now heads the armaments section of the permanent French diplomatic 'delegation at NATO headquarters in Brussels. One of his duties is to represent his country on the supervisory committee of NADGE, NATO's long-range aerial detection network.

Observers here do not see Giscard's decision to move closer to NATO necessarily as an expression of pro-Americanism. They reason that France originally pulled away from NATO because it felt it was completely dominated by the United States, then at the height of its world power. The gesture did not involve a real risk for the French since, with or without them, American-backed NATO was considered here to be strong enough to protect Europe from Soviet pressures.

Now, however, Giscard reportedly believes that international developments reflect a waning of American power. From the French viewpoint, this suggests that France's support for the alliance may be more necessary than in the early 1960s and that there may now be greater scope for French influence in NATO.

But Giscard is unlikely to seek formal re-entry into the military command. He would have to pay too high a price domestically.

French aloofness from NATO is part of the Gaullist mythology of "national independence" to which even Giscard carefully continues to pay lip service. Politically, it is regarded as untouchable.

Prime Minister Jacques Chirac, titular leader of the Gaullists in government, gave a skillful demonstration of myth-maintenance in rebutting Communist accusations over NATO. French participation in NATO's long-range aerial detection system was for "our security," he said. French "liaison" with the allied command was for reasons of "coordination" and had nothing to do with "integration." Participation in NATO naval maneuvers resulted from a "bilateral" accord. And so on.

So far as NATO is concerned, this was one more indication that France increasingly must be judged not by what its leaders say but by what they do.

Seoul Feels Indochina Reverberations

Events in Indochina have caused uneasiness among the United States allies in east Asia, but nowhere more than in South Korea. South Korean analysts and some American officers expect trouble from the Communist regime in North Korea, not necessarily conventional warfare, but in the form of subversion.

Japanese experts, who are watching the situation because of Korea's proximity to the Japanese islands and because of extensive economic ties between the nations, also see little likelihood of war. They reason that neither the Americans, the Chinese nor the Russians want that, and that the big powers have enough influence to make their wishes felt.

But they believe limited armed conflict instigated by the North is possible. The Government of President Park Chung Hee is already weakened by internal unrest.

The Japanese and other foreigners note that the stated objective of North Korea is still to take over the South. The recent trip to Peking by North Korean President Kim Il Sung was believed to have been to seek support for that aim. He is reported planning a similar trip to Moscow.

The repressive nature of the Park regime in South Korea and the unrest that it faces seem likely to intensify. Last week, curbs on political dissent were tightened again. A new emergency decree prohibited all political activities by university students.

Navy Sees Lesson for Hill in Ship Incident

By Vernon A. Guidry Jr.
Washington Star Staff Writer

The Navy is hoping that the Mayaguez incident and the evacuation of South Vietnam will make the task of selling the need for increased naval forces to Congress easier.

Events of "the last month are bound to have caught the attention of Congress" says a high-ranking Navy man dryly.

It is felt that the responsiveness and flexiblity of naval forces, particularly the carrier, were demonstrated, along with their necessity in providing a "forward posture" for the United States in a time of shrinking U.S. flexibility ashore overseas.

THE SHARPLY adverse public reaction of the Thai government to the use of U.S. bases there as a staging area for the U.S. campaign against Cambodian captors of a U.S. merchant ship are cited as evidence of the perishable nature of bases in foreign countries.

Yet, it was the unavailabilty of U.S. naval forces, at least with the immediacy deemed essential, that prompted use of Thai bases as the jumping-off point for Marines involved and recapture of the container ship Mayaguez.

The surprising seizure of the ship early Monday morning, Washington time, by Cambodian gunboats found U.S. forces occupied elsewhere.

"We couldn't have been worse postured," says a Navy source.

THE ARMADA that had been assembled for the evacuation of South Vietnam had long been disbanded. Two aircraft carriers were, according to a

U.S. EASES POLICY ON BALTIC STATES

By JAMES F. CLARITY
Special to The New York Times

LENINGRAD, May 17—The United States, through its consulate here, is diluting a 35-year-old policy of refusing to recognize the incorporation of Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia into the Soviet Union.

Western diplomats here feel that there is a gradual but unmistakable American movement toward de facto, if not formal, recognition of the Soviet Baltic republics, which were placed under Moscow's rule in 1940. Since the United States consulate opened here 22 months ago, the diplomats note, American contacts with political, economic and cultural officials in the Baltic republics have significantly increased.

The American consul general Joseph W. Neubert, said in an interview that United States policy of nonrecognition had not changed. But he acknowledged that in effect he was now the United States ambassador to the three republics. Since he became consul general eight months ago, Mr. Neubert has visited each of the Baltic capitals—Vilna in Lithuania, Riga in Latvia, and Tallinn in Estonia—which fall within his consular district.

Americans of Baltic origin have expressed concern that the United States is drifting away from its policy of nonrecognition. Acting on their behalf, Representative Edward J. Derwinski, Republican of Illinois, recently received a letter from Kempton B. Jenkins, a Deputy Assistant Secretary of State, affirming United States policy.

Mr. Neubert adheres to American policy protocol by not making direct contacts with the highest party and government officials in the Baltic republics, but he has met with their deputies.

Military Action Defended

By Fred Barnes
Washington Star Staff Writer

The White House, defending its military action in the Mayaguez affair, has asserted that the use of force was influential in convincing the Cambodians to release the 40 captured merchant seaman.

"The minimum force used in this did have some influence on the Cambodian actions," said White House Press Secretary Ronald Nessen, citing two examples.

First, it was shortly after the United States began its military operation Wednesday to free the seaman that the Cambodians announced by radio that the Mayaguez would be released.

Then, following the bombing of bases on the Cambodian mainland that destroyed 17 airplanes and some amphibious craft, a boat with the seaman aboard was cut loose.

NESSEN SAID there is no way for the U.S. government to know exactly what motivated the Cambodians to take the two steps, since there was no contact between American and Cambodian officials.

But the press secretary contended that "the sequences of events would indicate that the military action influenced their decision."

3,000 THAIS MARCH ON U.S. EMBASSY AS PROTEST GROWS

Formal Note Says Bases Accord Is Under Review —Apology Is Asked

By MALCOLM W. BROWNE
Special to The New York Times

BANGKOK, May 17—Thailand today formally expressed indignation that the United States had used a Thai base in the Marine operation two days ago to recover an American merchant ship from Cambodian forces, and 3,000 demonstrators marched on the American embassy here.

The chargé d'affaires, Edward S. Masters, was summoned by Foreign Minister Chatichai Choonhavan to receive a note, saying that Thailand planned an immediate review of "all aspects of cooperation and commitments" between the two countries.

The note specifically mentioned the agreement under which the United States has permitted the use of military bases, which played an importnat role in the Indochina war.

Student Demonstrators

The demonstration at the embassy was organized mainly by activists at Bangkok's Thammasat University, but included some labor and other outside groups.

The demonstrators spent the afternoon with a three-hour march through Bangkok from the university, reaching the embassy shortly before nightfall.

As loudspeakers blared invectives against alleged American imperialist practices in Thailand, the crowd tore the United States seal from the embassy gate and erected a 12-foot effigy of Uncle Sam on top of the gate, presumably for burning as the night wore on.

Speakers demanded that the United States Government issue a written apology to Thailand for the Marine rescue operation tonight, implying that the mob planned to go beyond burning the effigy if the demand was not met.

Thai newspapers published excerpts from a news conference by Secretary of State Kissinger, in which he said, "insofar as we have caused any embarrassment to the Thai Government, we regret those actions."

Foreign Minister Chatichai said at a news conference, that the statement could not be considered an official apology and that Thailand's protest stood. He added that the Thai ambassador to Washington, who was recalled yesterday for consultations, might not return.

Mr. Chatichai also conferred today with a South Vietnamese diplomatic mission that arrived yesterday to demand the return of military aircraft and boats that came to Thailand during the collapse of the former Saigon government. The three-member group was greeted at Bangkok Airport last night by Vietnamese residents who presented flowers.

As the crowd outside the embassy cheered and yelled obscenities, about 80 Americans, including some Marine guards in civilian clothes, as well as 50 Thai policement, including Bangkok's police chief, waited inside the compound.

The crowd was not expected to storm the gate, but precautions included turning out the compound lights. The flag, normally lowered at 6 P.M., was left flying for the night.

One of the leaders of the demonstration was Seksam Prasertkul, a former student of Thammasat University, whose fiery harangues in October, 1973, played a large role in gathering the crowds that brought down the military government of Gen. Thanom Kittikachorn.

At that time, nearly half a million students, workers and other demonstrators took to the streets, overwhelming the police, and ordered a civilian government into power.

Since then, the authorities have been careful to avoid inflaming the students.

But, today, efforts to organize a large crowd clearly failed. Despite the use of sound trucks roaming the city and the march from the university to the embassy, most people took little notice of the demonstrators.

Thailand, which traditionally adjusts her foreign policy to accommodate whatever major foreign force appears to be dominant in Southeast Asia, is seeking to make amends for her role as an American ally in the Indochina war.

Her main objective is to shut down the American bases as quickly as consistent with the need to avoid damaging the Thai economy.

The government, before the Marine operation, demanded that all American forces—now numbering about 25,000—be withdrawn by next March, and the United States has been reducing these forces steadily.

If Thailand were to demand an earlier deadline, the United States has indicated that it would comply.

In the meantime, Premier Kukrit Pramoj said yesterday, Thailand will demand close supervision of the bases.

One Thai official said recently:

"You know how it has always been on those bases? Even the Prime Minister could not get in without advance arrangements by the Americans, although prostitutes were always given freedom of the bases whenever they choose to come or go."

said, "that these three cities fall within the consular distric and that our relations with their officials are developing quite well." The consul general said the Baltic republics were a major part of his job. Th consulate, rather than the embassy in Moscow, has responsibility for reporting on the Baltic region to the State Department.

The American nonrecognition policy, diplomats feel, is also being weakened by increasing Baltic-American contacts in culture and education. A number of American performing groups have visited the Baltic republics.

Preliminary discussions are under way to bring American educators to Baltic universities to teach English. There are no American exchange students now in the Baltic republics, but their arrival is considered likely in the next few years. American tourists may visit the Baltic capitals and there are no special restrictions on American imports of goods produced in the Baltic republics.

American officials are said to feel no strong pressure from Soviet officials for a formal change in United States policy. The Soviet Union, according to diplomats, seems content with the present Americans are said to doubt that formal recognition will come soon, but they believe that it is inevitable.

The Soviet incorporation, which many Baltic emigres denounced as a Soviet usurpation, took place after Stalin had signed a nonaggression pact with Nazi Germany in 1939. When Germany attacked the Soviet Union in 1941, it occupied the Baltic states. At the end of the war, Moscow resumed its control.

The Baltic governments in exile still maintain officially recognized missions in Washington. Some diplomats here, noting that the emigre leaders are getting old, feel that pressure against recognition of Soviet control will fade.

ACTION ... CONTINUED

mainland bases was the most controversial aspect of the military operation, and the White House insisted it was absolutely necessary.

There was nothing punitive about the bombing raid, Nessen said. It was carried out to nullify the "real threats" that 2,400 Cambodian troops, the airplanes and the amphibious craft posed to the Marines who landed on the island 30 miles from the mainland.

THE DECISION to bomb was supported by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the press secretary said. Ford also was urged to be cautious by several Democratic leaders in Congress, Nessen said.

The leaders, reportedly Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield and Majority Whip Robert Byrd, voiced their doubts about the bombing runs at a White House session with Ford on Wednesday shortly after Ford had ordered the military operation.

"It would be too great a risk not to have this supportive action on the mainland," Ford was quoted by Nessen as telling the congressional leaders. "I could not forgive myself" if the 2,400 Cambodians attacked the Marines, Ford added.

There was never any thought given to the possibility that the use of military force in Cambodia might improve Ford's political standing at home, according to Nessen. "The sole consideration was the safe recovery of the ship and crew."

IN TERMS of telegrams to the White House, the reaction to the President's decision to use military force was overwhelmingly favorable.

Since the first conflict with Cambodian gunboats on Tuesday, telegrams and letters were running more than 5 to 1 in favor of Ford's policy — 2,657 for and 507 against as of about noon yesterday.

The White House also asserted that Ford carried out his obligation under the war powers resolution to consult with Congress before committing troops to combat. "The President believes he complied with the statute," Nessen said.

The spokesman said there is no requirement under the resolution that the President gain the approval of congressional leaders before ordering American servicemen into combat.

NAVY ... CONTINUED

Navy man, "in the wrong place and pointed in the wrong direction" at the time of the seizure. They were still involved in handling refugees and aircraft from the evacuation.

The carrier Coral Sea, which eventually played a key role in the Mayaguez incident, was headed for Australia when it was ordered to turn around and head for the Gulf of Thailand.

The closest U.S. ship was the destroyer Holt, which was at sea near Subic Bay in the Phillipines when the seizure occurred.

The Holt, which was to carry a Marine boarding party to the Mayaguez, was the first U.S. ship to arrive in the vicinity of the Cambodian island that was to be the focus of the U.S. military operation. The ship arrived some time after 2 p.m. Wednesday, Washington time. The military operation began in earnest some hours later

THE CARRIER Hancock, says a Navy source, could have been at the scene equipped with helicopters for the Marine assault on the island in 36 to 48 more hours. But this officer stresses that such w delay might have negated advantages offered by the Hancock.

In any event, says this analyst, it was the "forward posture" of the United States, both with its naval forces and its forces in Thailand, upon which the rescue depended.

And the message to Congress will be, "If you don't have a land base, you will have to fill that void with naval forces."

Congress has been resistant to that message as ship costs mount. The Navy has some 500 ships but says it should have 600 vessels to do its job.

THERE ARE now 15 aircraft carriers, but not for long. The force will shrink to 13 next fiscal year, and 12 active carriers with one in an emergency reserve role through 1980.

Even at that, the Navy is retaining two aging carriers it had hoped to retire in the next two years.

One reason for retaining older carriers is delay in completion of the nuclear-powered carrier Eisenhower. The ship was to have joined the fleet next fiscal year but the schedule has slipped to fiscal 1977 or beyond.

Construction of a new nuclear carrier, the Vinson, is scheduled to begin this fall with an estimated price tag of $1.1 billion.

U.S. reports 1 killed, 13 missing, 22 injured

By CHARLES W CORDDRY
Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—The Defense Department reported yesterday that the military rescue of the merchant ship Mayaguez and its crew cost the life of at least 1 American, and possibly 13 others still listed as missing, and injuries to 22 servicemen, at least three of them serious.

In reporting the casualties, which were said to be subject to further confirmation, the department's spokesman said he could not "give any great hopes" for the possible survival of the 13 missing men, who went down at sea off Tang Island in a helicopter struck by Cambodian gunfire. They are believed to be United States marines. Air Force helicopter crewmen and Navy corpsmen.

The spokesman, Joseph Laitin, also reported for the first time that there was a second air strike late Wednesday night against facilities at the Cambodian port of Kompong Som—more than an hour after the 39 Mayaguez crewmen, freed by the Cambodians, pulled alongside the U S destroyer Henry B. Wilson in a fishing boat manned by five Thais.

Previously it had been announced only that a strike from the carrier Coral Sea hit the Ream airfield near Kompong Som at 10.57 P M. Wednesday, Washington time. The Wilson sighted the crew approaching at 10 45 P M Mr Laitin said the second strike occurred at 11.50 P.M. and was "mainly" against the port's oil storage facilities.

In view of official assertions that the sole purpose of the military operation was rescue of the ship and crew, and of some congressional criticism even of the first air strike, Mr. Laitin was asked why the second one was not called off.

In an agitated voice, he responded that the oil storage targets were struck because there were "200 marines on an island [Tang] under heavy attack."

That was a reference to the marines who were taken by helicopter to Tang Island, beginning at 7.20 P M Wednesday, when it was still thought some of the Mayaguez crew might be there. Cambodians on the island, 30 miles from the mainland, gave stiff resistance with what Mr Laitin has called "small-caliber" weapons. Others said the weapons were AK-47 rifles, machine guns and mortars.

Asked the connection between that battle and mainland oil storage facilities, Mr Laitin said planes and boats need fuel, presumably a reference to concern that Cambodians might try to menace the U.S. operation, and "this was part of the battle plan."

Cambodian planes previously had been reported knocked out in the 10.57 air strike. In a related development yesterday, Henry A. Kissinger, the Secretary of State, maintained at his news conference that "there seems to have been some relationship between the release of the crew [of the Mayaguez] and the attacks on the mainland."

He said crew members were told "they were being released on the assumption that this would end the bombing attacks."

This version seemed contradicted by the Defense Department's logs of the operation, showing the crew was released before any bombs fell.

The only planes the Cambodians could have seen overhead before 10.57 P.M., Pentagon officials said, were reconnaissance aircraft, which were not bombing or shooting.

A strike on the Kompong Som port facilities originally had been scheduled for 8.45 P.M., but both White House and Defense Department sources said it was called back after planes were in the air, because of concern about foreign ships in the harbor. That strike's targets were scratched from the list.

On the question of casualties, Mr. Laitin said it was still difficult to compile accurate figures, because marines and airmen in the Tang Island operation were scattered, after being rescued or withdrawn, to ships, to U Tapao base in Thailand and to Okinawa, which is the marines' home base. Rosters are still being checked, as are various hospitals on ships and bases.

Mr. Laitin said ships are still searching the Gulf of Thailand area, but there "is no indication that anyone was left on the island."

The 13 missing men were among 26 on a downed helicopter. Half are known to have been rescued. The wounded were on another helicopter brought down just short of the beach at Tang.

Mr. Laitin said the Air Force dropped a 15,000-pound bomb of the type used in Vietnam to clear landing zones, "at some time during the action" on Tang Island. He said he did not know the target, but the bomb could have been used to clear a landing area for the second wave of marines.

Army to resume tests on beagles at Edgewood

By EDNA GOLDBERG and TOM HORTON

The Army has resumed its controversial procurement of beagle puppies for chemical-related experiments at Edgewood Arsenal, a spokesman for the military said yesterday.

The Army denied, however, that the dogs would be used for chemical or biological warfare research, such as the beagle nerve-gas tests that touched off a furor among animal groups and several members of Congress.

The beagles are to be used in research dealing with their ability to tolerate toxic levels of insecticides, detergents, adhesives and aerosals, the Army said.

Researchers also plan to use the puppies in a series of experiments on methods of disposing of obsolete chemical warfare agents.

Mary Downey Wilkes, executive secretary in Baltimore for the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, said she has called on all of Maryland's congressmen to investigate the beagle experiments at Edgewood Arsenal.

"We're not going to drop this," she said.

Meanwhile, at nearby Aberdeen Proving Ground, the Army presented two scientists at a morning background briefing yesterday in an attempt to answer charges by a United States senator that it had killed or maimed about 400 pigs and baboons in testing various projectiles for crowd control.

The two scientists from the project, who asked not to be identified because they feared "harassment," said that of 443 animals used in tests of "less-lethal weapons" since 1972, 38 had been killed by the projectiles.

They said the tests, which involved firing various experimental projectiles at heart, brain, kidney, spleen and liver areas, were concluded in August, 1974, and no further tests or purchases of animals are planned.

They admitted that so far the tests at Aberdeen, which cost about $1.6 million in military and Justice Department money, have produced neither a working model of a crowd control device, nor any definite plan for ever making one.

The most satisfactory projectile, the scientists said, proved to be a silicone ball, 1.25 inches in diameter which, fired at a speed of less than 250 feet a second, produces only a sting.

spokesman said the Army already has procured 100 beagles, aged 7 months to a year, and will open bids in late May for another 350 of the dogs.

An official of the U.S. Army Materiel Command in Alexandria, Va., said that after last year's public outcry over the proposed purchase of beagle puppies for testing, the Defense Department did "an intensive review of beagle procurement."

Their findings indicated that the beagle is still the best standard laboratory animal because "their physiological responses are acceptably close to those of humans," the official said.

An Army spokesman said that the Edgewood dogs would not be used in any chemical-biological warfare related experiments to comply with an amendment attached to the military appropriations bill by Congress last August. The amendment banned the use of Pentagon funds to buy animals for chemical-biological warfare tests.

Another set of Edgewood beagle tests is aimed at developing a vaccine to protect against chemical agents, such as tear gas, officials said.

A spokesman said the dogs would be used under guidelines for the care and use of lab animals established by the Institute of Laboratory Animals.

The tests of the baboons and pigs at Aberdeen came to light last week when Senator William V. Roth, Jr. (R., Del.) called them "unnecessarily cruel and barbaric."

In his charges Senator Roth also named AAI, a Cockeysville firm, as the holder of the Army contract for the tests. AAI officials denied that they were involved.

Yesterday at the press conference, one of the scientists said that "AAI provided the materials and some personnel."

Marvin J. Kahn, executive vice president of AAI, while continuing to deny that any of his people were involved in the tests, said that AAI designed the compressed gas-powered weapon that fired various projectiles at the test animals.

Shah Visits Air Base and Then Meets Schlesinger

WASHINGTON, May 16 (Reuters)—The Shah of Iran inspected American radar-carrying planes at Andrews Air Force Base today and then flew by helicopter to the Pentagon for talks with Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger.

The Shah, in the United States on an official visit, is known to be considering the purchase of four or five of the $110-million Boeing 707's equipped with an airborne warning and control system that can scan a 200-mile area.

The Shah is also said to be considering the purchase of other planes, including Fairchild A-10 attack bombers and Grumman F-14 fighter jets. He has already bought more than $2-billion worth of American arms in the last 10 months.

While in his visit, to end next week, the Iranian leader may conclude two major financial deals. One is the Shah's investment of $300-million in the Pan American World Airways and the other is a United States agreement to build nuclear energy plants in Iran.

President Ford and the Shah, at a private White House meeting and a public toast last night, pledged continued economic cooperation.

Service is too selective, is sexist, U.S. judge rules

Butte, Mont. (AP)—A federal District Court judge ruled yesterday the Selective Service System is unconstitutional because it is sexually discriminatory.

In the first such decision in the nation, Judge W. D. Murray said draft laws must apply equally to males and females.

Dismissing a grand jury indictment against an alleged draft dodger, Judge Murray held Selective Service laws "establish a sex-based classification which burdens and penalizes members of one sex and not another," thereby "violating the defendant's constitutional rights to due process and equal protection under the Fifth Amendment."

Judge Murray held: "Legislation limiting the draft to male citizens denies them the equal protection of the law. All citizens, male and female, must be subject to the draft on an equal basis."

The decision came in the case of Kenneth Reiser, 22, of Bozeman, Mont., who was indicted by a grand jury November 30, 1973, for allegedly refusing to submit for induction into the armed forces.

In Washington, Peter Straub, the general counsel of the Selective Service System, said lower courts have held draft laws do not discriminate sexually and therefore are constitutional. This has been upheld by the Supreme Court three times.

USS Nimitz to make its first voyage

By Nat L. Kline
Globe Staff

The Navy's newest nuclear-powered aircraft carrier, the USS Nimitz, recently commissioned at Norfolk, Va., will begin its first voyage in July.

It will go to the Caribbean for training operations and later be deployed with other carriers of the Atlantic Fleet.

President Ford, in a recent speech at the Navy League Convention in New Orleans, termed the Navy a major instrument for resolving crises short of war. Navy representatives say Mr. Ford's statement has been bolstered by the Mayaguez incident.

The Mayaguez crisis, they say, backs up the Navy League speech about the need for strong aircraft carriers and their air groups, and for Navy-Marine Corps teams.

The Nimitz is termed the largest warship in the world, with a flight deck of four and a half acres, carrying a hundred aircraft of varied types and capable of storing provisions for three months. Its two nuclear reactors enable her to steam more than 12 years without refueling.

The next nuclear carrier, the Eisenhower, is expected to be delivered in 1976 or 1977 and the Vinson in 1980 or 1981.

President Ford at the Nimitz commissioning, also said that without the five aircraft carriers operating off South Vietnam and the skill and performance of the military personnel the rescue of US citizens and Vietnamese from Saigon could not have been done in less than 24 hours.

Angola Rebel Group Accused on Arms

LISBON, May 17 (Reuters)—Portugal's chief representative in Angola has accused the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola of distributing arms to civilians and children in an indiscriminate manner.

Gen. Antonio Silva Cardoso was quoted by the Lisbon weekly Expresso today as having said that the present situation in the West African territory could lead only to chaos.

From 500 to 1,000 people are estimated to have died in fighting between the Popular Movement and the Zaire-based National Front for the Liberation of Angola in the Angolan capital of Luanda earlier this month. The National Front attributed the fighting to indisciplined hastily armed youths.

Fourteen Soldiers, No Army

NEWPORT NEWS (AP) — What do you do with 11 Cambodian and three South Vietnamese military officers who are receiving training here for armies that no longer exist?

If you're U.S. Army officials at Ft. Eustis, you keep feeding them, housing them, paying them, and figuring that sooner or later they'll go away.

Capt. Dean Tiba, assistant post information officer, said last week that "the whole situation is in limbo."

ALL OF THE foreign officers arrived at Ft. Eustis near the first of the year for training in a school of transportation.

They have remained here helplessly as their countries — and in some cases their wives and children — fell under Communist control.

The Transportation School classes end this month and so far the only decision the U.S. Army has made concerning the men's fate has been to offer them a 30-day extension to their stay here.

"We don't know what will happen. We haven't gotten new guidance (from the Department of Defense) for two weeks," Tiba said.

ONE DEPARTMENT of Defense message that did get through, however, was that the Cambodian officers were not to talk with reporters.

"We got that in a classified message," Tiba said.

He said the Cambodian embassy in Washington requested that the Department of Defense send the no-communication communication.

The message came about three weeks ago, Tiba added, long before the Khmer Rouge seized the U.S. merchant vessel Mayaguez and the U.S. marines went in under fire to get it back.

TIBA SAID he feels the foreign officers will opt to remain in this country. "All the ones I've talked to say they want to stay."

If they didn't, he added, they may encounter difficulty in getting back home.

"It would be very hard for the U.S. to get them back the way things stand right now," he said.

The probable chain of events after the officers lose their U.S. pay and living privileges in late June will be for the men to be simply declared refugees.

"I imagine they'll be processed like all the others, try to find sponors and employment," he said.

SOME OF THE men are no longer attending their Transportation School classes, but most are sticking with their studies in hopes that it will help them get jobs here, Tiba said.

The school teaches land, air and sea methods of moving men and equipment, and Tiba said the training could prove useful in merchant seafaring, trucking, air freight or railroad employment.

Some of the South Vietnamese officers are still "sitting on pins and needles," hoping that their families will turn up in the thousands of refugees who fled just prior to the Communist takeover, he said.

Tiba said he imagines the morale among all the officers is very low, but added "it's hard for the American mind to understand how (they) feel."

Defining our commitments

President Ford assured South Korean officials last week that the United States will keep its security commitments to their country if it is invaded from North Korea. In saying this, he hoped both to offer comfort to the South Koreans and to convey a warning to the North Koreans, whose words have been increasingly ominous since the Communist sweep thru Indochina.

In fact, there wasn't much else Mr. Ford could say. It was one of those automatic, unavoidable responses that have to be made, and the Koreans—both North and South—know that it means what Congress decides it will mean, and no more. Our 1954 treaty with South Korea commits us only to respond to aggression in accordance with due constitutional process.

This is why a mass rally in Seoul recently called for a "strengthened" commitment by the U. S., and why some Korean legislators have urged that our response be automatic. Our present commitment is far from automatic, especially since a recent poll shows that 65 per cent of Americans would oppose U. S. intervention in a new Korean war, and only 14 per cent would favor it.

Since it is probably unrealistic to expect a modern, democratic government to make long-term automatic military commitments, the South Koreans can feel comfortable only if the administration's commitment to them reflects a national consensus. The more specific that commitment is to be, the more clearly it must be concurred in by Congress and the public.

Wars often break out simply because one government does not perceive clearly how another may respond to a given provocation. The late Charles Bohlen, once ambassador to the Soviet Union, attributed the outbreak of the Korean War in 1950 to a miscalculation by Stalin about how the U. S. would respond to an attack there.

There is, of course, also a problem of being too specific in stating foreign commitments: To draw or even suggest a line beyond which we won't respond is, in effect, to give the green light to aggressors to move into areas beyond the line.

The ideal policy, no doubt, would be to make clear and specific commitments where we know beyond question that we must and will live up to those commitments, while keeping our commitments vague in areas where we want potential aggressors to think we will respond more vigorously than we care to promise.

There is the added problem, in a democracy, that neither the executive nor his administration can be too specific, knowing that the nation's course of action will be determined in part by a lawmaking body with a mind of its own and by the public. At the moment, the public is vigorously opposed to anything resembling another Viet Nam. And as Mr. Ford told the South Koreans, Congress' foot-dragging has had a damaging effect on his plan to modernize their equipment.

Our commitments tend generally to be rather vague. Even in Western Europe, where our interests should be the strongest, we have no iron-clad obligation. At our own insistence, the North Atlantic Treaty, like the Korean and Southeast Asia treaties, merely commits each member, in the event of an attack, to take "such action as it deems necessary" thru its "constitutional processes."

In short, a country's intentions are not measured only in words. They are measured by public opinion, the presence of troops, military capacity, and a variety of other factors.

Where we have no doubt about our intentions, a firm commitment can be clearly enunciated—and should. Beyond this, where we prefer to leave our options open, even our strongest words will be subject to skeptical assessment by others.

In this no-man's-land, the most effective steps we can take for freedom are to demonstrate that we as a people thoroly believe in it. Yet in deciding which nations to aid and which to shun, we must be guided by one criterion and one alone: The ultimate importance of that aid to the security of the U. S. If it is determined to be essential to our security to aid Spain or the Philippines or Taiwan or, as it apparently has been, South Korea, then it becomes irrelevant to mutter about imperfections in the political structure of those countries, which are minor compared with those in the Communist world.

In a democracy, in short, a successful foreign policy must inevitably depend largely on the confidence of the people that the policy is right and on their determination to stick to it. The world must know that we prize our free system, and it must know that we have the military strength to support any decision we make.

Thailand: A Chance for Real Restudy

Thailand's prime minister tried repeatedly to convince Washington he really did not want his country used for military action to recover the Mayaguez But officials in Washington told reporters the Thai protests might be "for domestic consumption," and the Marines went directly from Utapao air base to Tang island Now Mr Kukrit has called his ambassador home, which may provide a chance—if Washington will use it—for a real restudy of America's new relations with Thailand.

When Thailand was Siam, its location made it a buffer between the competing colonialisms of Britain and France. Siam accepted British protection and thereby remained the one coastal country from the Indian Ocean to the Gulf of Tonkin that did not become a colony It also refined the art of "bending with the wind" that it later used in World War II. Again today, Thailand is ideally located to be a buffer among Southeast Asia's competing Soviet, Chinese, North Vietnamese and American forces. The new government's desire to move in that direction was shown by its request that American forces leave Thailand by next year But Washington may try to do little more than prune some air bases no longer needed for Vietnam. Pentagon officials tell some newsmen they still hope to retain a "residual presence" in Thailand.

The short-range convenience of American bases in Thailand cannot be denied, and the new government might yet prove amenable But it would inherently risk giving Thailand the appearance of a post-Vietnam American bulwark. That would erase Thailand's potential as a buffer and might grant her growing local Communist insurgency a patriotic appeal it need not be given.

Thailand's fragile coalition government faces many problems in coping with the guerrillas. Corruption, partly fueled by the American military presence, debilitates the army and much of the bureaucracy and gives the Communists a potent talking point. The military prefers to fight American-style, with helicopters and jeeps, and does little damage to an enemy that moves on foot and lives among the villagers. An unnecessarily large American presence—conceivably any military presence at all—would only aggravate these problems.

The government also has important natural advantages. Patriotism is still on the government's side against the Chinese and Vietnamese influences of the Communist insurgency. Thai rice farmers are among Southeast Asia's most prosperous, and the essentially conservative, Buddhist Thai people deeply revere King Bhumibol Adulyadej. No one can guarantee that these resources will enable the Thai government to defeat its Communist insurgents. But the government's natural advantages would surely be undercut by any major American military presence. Washington's problem, as it reviews policy toward Bangkok, will be to balance the short-term convenience of its bases against possible injury to Thailand's best hopes of keeping its Communist insurgency from maturing to a full-scale civil war.

Cambodia: U.S. Attacked After Crew Released

The new government of Cambodia accused the United States yesterday of launching a "ferocious, insane" assault 20 minutes after the release of the American merchant ship Mayaguez and its crew.

Cambodian Information Minister Hu Nim, in a broadcast over radio Phnom Penh, described the Marine landing on Tang Island as "an act of open aggression."

Suez Symbolism

When the Suez Canal was shut down in the Arab-Israeli war of 1967, a commercial calamity was perceived by some observers. But the maritime world has done very well without this shipping shortcut, and in fact has made other arrangements which may render the canal a less valuable property for Egypt than in years past. This does not lessen in any way, however, the favorable symbolism of the canal's reopening.

In fact, the timing itself may be a good portent. Egyptian President Anwar Sadat announced late in March that he would open the canal for business on June 5, despite the breakdown of Secretary of State Kissinger's peace mission in the Middle East. Most notably, this action is being taken without the sought-after final disengagement agreement with Israel. It adds a certain optimistic note, however small, in the wake of Kissinger's stunning failure to organize some sort of solid accord. It suggests a strong desire for peace on Sadat's part, and perhaps a feeling that renewed war is not very likely.

Whether this is a modest consolation offering to help reduce the widespread pessimism about the upcoming Middle East meetings in Geneva, we cannot say with any assurance. If this is so, then so much the better. Other factors, of course, cannot be discounted: Egypt wants and needs the revenues which the canal will produce, the Russians are anxious to secure this shorter naval route to the Indian Ocean. No doubt some other countries with legitimate commercial interests have been urging Cairo to hasten the reopening.

The revenues, though, may be rather disappointing, because those new supertankers that now carry so much of the world's oil are too large to use the canal, and passenger ships have vanished from the seas in large numbers. But European nations especially will derive some benefits from restoration of this freight route, and a few of them need all the help they can get.

Relaxation of tensions would have been abetted much more had Israeli shipping and Israel-bound cargoes not been banned from the canal by Sadat, but his reopening move can be seen nonetheless as a hopeful sign. When those two German freighters moved out of the canal last week, after entrapment in the littered and mined waterway for eight years, there was a pleasant sensation of release. If Suez can be swept clean of its many obstructions and traffic resumed again, perhaps other obstructions in the Middle East — those that frustrate the best of diplomacy — someday will yield.

Pirates Take Note

Pentagon and White House reports of the rescue of the Mayaguez and its crew depict an operation of limited and efficient use of force after diplomatic efforts had been fruitless. That sort of cool restraint can only be commended.

It was risky. It could have gone wrong, and both ship and crew could have been lost. There already have been quibbles from Congress and other quarters. But, given the possibility that the crew might have become hostages on the Cambodian mainland, and faced with an absence of response to diplomatic appeals, the President had no alternative.

The operation was a success in humanitarian terms. The nation rejoices in the safe return of the seamen, even as it mourns those lost in the operation. And it was a success in terms of a world more or less committed to a rule of law. The firm, uncompromising response to piracy serves the interest of every nation, because secure passage on the high seas is important to every nation.

In a sense, this was the first test of the War Powers Act adopted over a presidential veto at the end of 1973. The result was reassuring. It worked well.

The President may argue that he was acting on his own constitutional authority, but he must know how ambiguous that authority is. We prefer to think that he was acting precisely as the War Powers Act provided, utilizing the flexibility provided for just such an emergency, while accepting both the responsibility to keep Congress informed and the limitation on protracted action without specific congressional sanction. The fears that led Richard Nixon to veto the act, fears that it would paralyze emergency presidential action, proved unfounded.

The operation was made no easier by the protests of Thailand. We can understand the sensitivity of the new democratic government in Bangkok as it adjusts to the Communist conquests in neighboring states. But Thailand must surely understand that the American actions, mounted from American bases in Thailand, were directed at keeping open Thailand's own sea lanes, in protecting Thailand's own ocean commerce. The Mayaguez was en route from Hong Kong to Thailand when it was seized.

This rescue will also stand as a reminder of the importance of carrier task forces in a world in which the United States will have fewer and fewer foreign land bases.

Perhaps the most perplexing question is why the Cambodian government did what it did, less than a month after the Khmer Rouge took control of the country. Time may tell whether it was the beginning of a campaign of disruption and defiance of the norms of international relations, or whether it was an isolated, impulsive act of vengeance.

An important lesson has been taught by the American armed forces. It is that piracy, no matter what the motive, cannot be tolerated.

No Longer At War

Predictably enough, some congressmen and Pentagon officials have been quick to air their dissatisfaction with President Ford's proposal to stop special educational benefits to those who join the armed forces after July 1. The opponents argue that without the added inducement of educational benefits the military will not be able to meet its manpower quotas through voluntary recruitment.

Every branch of the armed forces has, in fact, exceeded its quota since last November. With military pay scales closer than ever before to civilian levels, there is no reason to extend costly benefits that have never been provided during peacetime. Educational benefits should of course be continued for Vietnam-era veterans. Beyond that, however, Mr. Ford's proposal is a heartening reminder that "America is no longer at war."

The Long Green Line

AT A TIME when U.S. naval and military capabilities around the world are being challenged on an almost daily basis, President Ford, Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger, and Navy Secretary J. William Middendorf, II, have cast a big vote for strength and stability by nominating Lieutenant General Louis H. Wilson, Jr., to be the next (and 26th) Commandant of the Marine Corps.

Wilson, currently serving as Commanding General of Fleet Marine Forces Pacific, arrived in Washington on 5 May for a few days of high-level meetings at the White House and Pentagon, and on Capitol Hill. Speedy confirmation of Wilson's nomination for the Commandant's post is expected from both the Senate Armed Services Committee and, shortly thereafter, by the full Senate. A Medal of Honor winner, a combat-tough Marine veteran of World War II, Korea, and Vietnam, the Corps' top ground force commander, and an officer richly, and deservingly, respected by seniors and subordinates alike, Wilson is expected to succeed General Robert E. Cushman, Jr., the outgoing Commandant, on or about 1 July—thus breaking the Corps' long established tradition of New Year's Day change of commands.

The qualities of person and personality which have propelled Wilson to the top, and which have made him (in the words of veteran defense columnist Robert D. Heinl, Jr.) "one of the bravest and ablest leaders of the Corps," all will be needed in abundance, and then some, through the next four post-Vietnam years. Those years might be tumultuous indeed. The Marines, with the other U.S. services, are passing through a major period of transition, shifting their own orientation from trans-pacific to Europe and the Mideast. And they must replenish their weapons inventory at a time when defense expenditures have become increasingly unpopular both with Congress and with the U.S. body politic at large.

Finally, with the Army considerably reduced in strength from its Southeast Asia peak, and with the renewed emphasis within all the services on rapid response capabilities, the Marines are now, more than ever before, most likely to be called on first in future emergencies. Under Wilson, as under his many illustrious predecessors, they will always, we know, "keep their honor clean." We are extremely proud, therefore, to issue a salute of welcome to General Wilson, and to extend our sincerest best wishes, to him and the Corps, for every success during his tenure.

We also want to pay well-deserved tribute at this time to General Cushman, and to General Earl E. Anderson, his Assistant Commandant, who also is planning to retire in the near future. It was under the leadership of Cushman and Anderson—both of whom were among the Corps' finest combat commanders in Vietnam during the peak of the war—that the Marines began their still ongoing restructuring and reorganization toward a possible transatlantic conflict.

Cushman's early departure—six months short of what would have been the normal 1 January turnover date—is somewhat ironic. Under a quirk in the retirement laws a so-called "pay inversion" takes place, depending on the date of retirement, which pays a handsome premium to early retirees but exacts a heavy financial penalty from those who elect to remain on active duty and serve their country for just a few months longer. (Cushman told reporters in April that he himself stood to lose over $100,000 during his expected retirement lifetime if he were to remain in service until 1 January.)

Cushman has been a vigorous spokesman for a change

THE NEW REPUBLIC - 10 MAY 1975 (18)

Congress and Intelligence

The Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) wants congressional approval to build an $80 million headquarters on the site of a former air force base in Washington, DC. We suspect most people familiar with the CIA and FBI would be hard put to say what the DIA does or has done that would justify setting it up in the nation's capital's fifth most expensive government building.

Since 1961, when it was created to manage the various intelligence collection and distribution operations of the individual military services, DIA has been busy trying to win back, from the civilians at CIA, control over military intelligence estimates. That control is important to the Pentagon because intelligence estimates are the foundation upon which the army, navy, air force and marines build their future weapons and force structures. The inroads DIA has made in this effort—not just the so-called "substandard facilities" it claims to have—may be behind the Pentagon's decision in this tight budget year to solicit $86 million to house DIA's 3000 Washington-area employees.

The fight between DIA and CIA over military intelligence information has been financially wasteful and politically damaging. A former CIA analyst, Samuel Adams, recently wrote how his military opposite numbers deliberately misrepresented North Vietnam and Vietcong force level estimates to justify Pentagon policies. During the 1969 congressional debate on the Safeguard anti-ballistic missile system, CIA and DIA produced contradictory data on Soviet offensive and defensive missile systems. The CIA material was used to oppose the Safeguard; DIA intelligence to support it.

The DIA's daily intelligence digest circulates in the Pentagon and competes for readership in the rest of the national security establishment with the CIA's daily digest. In addition the DIA puts out reams of regular studies on "existing or impending foreign military trends, activities, or threats" and on a myriad of other subjects including "counterintelligence." Within the Pentagon a sharp distinction is made between DIA, acting as a manager and processor of intelligence information, and the intelligence branches of the individual services, which do the actual collection.

It was once held that the establishment of DIA would inevitably lead to a unification of the various services' intelligence and security operations. That has not happened. In 1971, after the embarrassing revelations of army domestic spying were disclosed to Sen. Sam Ervin's constitutional rights subcommittee, the Pentagon did set up a Defense Investigative Service combining in one organization the personnel security investigations for all Defense Department agencies. But behind this unit each service still maintained its own individual counterintelligence and criminal investigative operations. The army's Counterintelligence Corps, which did the civilian information collection that so aroused the nation, still exists.

Each service also has its own overt and covert intelligence collectors. And on top of that, they each operate electronic listening organizations called "security services." These units use sophisticated in the law, to correct what is generally recognized as a serious inequity, but has thus far been unable to succeed in his efforts for remedial legislation. For this reason, and because the rest of the Corps' general officer ranks would be similarly affected, Cushman risked (and received) a somewhat unfavorable press by seeking to have his successor named well before 1 September, on which date the pay inversion sets in. With the next Commandant, Wilson, now named, other USMC generals who might be affected by the succession are now free to make their own individual plans without being unfairly penalized for their continued service.

Anderson's departure, like Cushman's, leaves one with mixed emotions. With his retirement the Corps, and the Nation, lose another fine officer, an articulate and able leader fully and eminently qualified in every way to be Commandant himself—Anderson was, of course, as Cushman's alter ego, among the top runners to succeed Cushman. He is still a relatively young man, however, and will undoubtedly be heard from again in the future.

It is consoling to realize, as Cushman and Anderson join the glittering roster of great Marine alumni, that the Marine system produces so many leaders of such high caliber that the Corps is not now, never has been, and never will be dependent on the talents and leadership of any one individual. When a Greene, or a Chapman, or a Cushman, retires, there will always be another Marine of the Wilson quality to take command. And behind and beside the Commandant will always be such men as Walt and Krulak, Anderson and Chaisson, and many another in that long green line of heroes which stretches back to the beginnings of the Republic, and forward to the far horizons of the future. ■

The Greek-Turk Talks

It would be hard to exaggerate the importance of the meetings under way in Rome of the Greek and Turkish Foreign Ministers—the first high-level contact in many months between the estranged allies. Heading the agenda for Messrs. Bitsios and Caglayangil is the question of how to take to the International Court of Justice the sharing of oil resources on the Aegean continental shelf between the two countries—a highly emotive issue that has recently bedeviled relations between the Governments of Greece and Turkey.

They will also discuss other outstanding issues such as flying rights over Aegean areas close both to the Greek islands and mainland Turkey, the possible demilitarization of those islands and, perhaps most important, the Cyprus question. Both Governments say they hope for enough of a beginning in three days of talks in Rome to warrant further meetings between Prime Ministers Caramanlis and Demirel at the North Atlantic Treaty Council session in Brussels at the end of the month.

Nothing could give a greater lift in morale for the Atlantic Alliance community than the resolution of the formidable problems that have threatened at intervals over the last ten months to provoke war between Greece and Turkey. The Greek Cypriotes have made proposals that go far toward meeting Turkish demands for a bicommunal federal state on the island.

By offering in return some concessions it has previously hinted it would be willing to make—troop withdrawals, a pullback from some of the territory seized by the Turkish Army last August, etc.—Turkey could clinch a settlement that should satisfy the Turkish Cypriotes. By such actions, the Turks could also insure a resumption of American military aid.

Peking and Paris Strengthen Ties With a Visit

Teng Hsiao-ping, China's Deputy Premier and the highest-level Chinese Communist official ever to visit Western Europe, has completed a week-long visit to France. The trip was treated as one of considerable importance by both nations: by France, as evidence of her improving ties with developing nations, many of which hold China in high esteem; and by China as an opportunity to express support for the more united Europe she considers important as a restraint on the Soviet Union.

France has recently sought better diplomatic and trade relations with developing nations and the Arab world. She helped formulate the Lomé agreement for improved trade with 44 developing nations, and opposed American attempts to break the oil-ducers' cartel.

devices to overhear or automatically record radio transmissions. Though each service maintains its own capability for communications intelligence, there is a managing organization, the National Security Agency (NSA), to coordinate the entire operation. NSA, like DIA, sets out the tasks that the individual services are to undertake to meet Pentagon needs. But the services are also free to undertake some intelligence collecting on their own. For example the army's Security Service in 1963 overheard and recorded walkie-talkie radio transmissions during Martin Luther King's march on Washington. They used them again in 1968 in Chicago during the Democratic convention. In 1969 and 1970 the military services, listening overseas, picked up radio telegrams sent by American radicals and anti-Vietnam war leaders traveling abroad.

Neither NSA nor DIA has ever been subject to extensive congressional inquiry. Neither was established by statute so neither has been barred by law in any way from undertaking, for example, domestic police type activities. Their joint budgets run over four billion dollars. CIA's is about $750 million.

The Rockefeller commission examining the CIA's domestic activities is due to make its report in June. Thanks in part to a tip President Ford gave New York Times editors, John Kennedy's assassination has become the subject of the commission's inquiry and public concern. That concern is also reflected in a decision by the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence that it, too, will look into assassinations in addition to CIA activities in Laos, Chile and the US, and FBI wiretapping and counterintelligence.

The House Select Intelligence Committee has had trouble getting underway. With a vague charter and a broad-spectrum political make-up, the committee has had a problem selecting a staff director. Perhaps it would be wise for both the Senate and House intelligence committees now to stand aside on the explosive Kennedy assassination issue and give it to a separate joint committee. Then they could devote more time to probing DIA and NSA, which represent problems that will be with us in the future.

'Commitments' could drag U.S. into war

By James McCartney
Knight Newspapers

WASHINGTON — Like it or not, the United States could be dragged into a new war by any one of hundreds of "commitments" President Ford is fervently assuring the world he is determined to honor.

The nation has 41 formal mutual defense treaties with nations across the globe, from Korea to New Zealand, Norway to Turkey.

Beyond that, it has a network of military bases the administration considers "commitments"—more than 340 major bases in 30 countries overseas, at least 3,000 minor ones.

BEYOND THAT, it has scores of "executive agreements" with nations on every continent that raise the question of whether the U. S. should intervene if threats arise.

In addition, the U.S. has pledged to provide a "nuclear shield" for Europe, Japan, Korea, and Latin America. It has strongly suggested publicly that the "shield" extends thruout the Pacific, to the shores of China. This means we would use nuclear bombs in the defense of allies attacked by nuclear weapons.

These are the commitments the President and Secretary of State Henry Kissinger are talking about in a concerted campaign to reassure U. S. allies that the U.S. intends to stand by them in the wake of the collapse of South Viet Nam.

THE DRIVE already has brought a parade of foreign leaders to Washington to meet and be photographed with President Ford. It will continue on a European trip late this month.

The message Ford has delivered personally to leader after leader is the message he delivered to Congress in the dying days of South Viet Nam: "We will honor our commitments."

But few here, even at the top levels of government, can say precisely what all of the commitments are.

That is because U.S. commitments have been built up over a quarter of a century since World War II and have become so complex, and often so subtle, that there is nowhere to go to get a list.

THE STATE Department press office, for example, recently was asked for a list of "major" U.S. commitments, and was unable to supply one.

A State Department lawyer who specializes in treaties referred a reporter to a list of "Treaties in Force" published by the department in January, with 445 pages.

The list made no mention of a major commitment to the survival of Israel—for the simple reason that the U.S. has no treaty with Israel.

YET TOP officials of the department say the U.S. commitment to Israel ranks as one of the nation's most serious. Every President, beginning with Truman, has verbally guaranteed Israel's survival.

The point is that commitments include formal treaties involving many nations and ratified by the Senate; bilateral [two-country] treaties; announced agreements, sometimes in the form of communiques; public announcements by a President, or a Cabinet official; and perhaps secret communications between heads of state.

"A commitment can be very

solid and deep, ratified by Congress, or it can be a general intention on our part," said one top State Department official.

"THE PRESIDENT is using the term these days in his broadest foreign policy sense—meaning all kinds of commitments—because questions are arising now from our allies about our intentions. This was the price of Viet Nam."

One Senate foreign policy expert said: "A commitment is often what a President says it is and tries to sell to the public when he wants to do something."

The U.S., for example, had no treaty with South Viet Nam. Bit it went to war in Viet Nam, anyway—citing the Southeast Asia Collective Defense Treaty [SEATO], to which South Viet Nam wasn't a party, as legal authority.

IN A VERY real sense, then, the nation's most important "commitments" are not what is on paper anywhere; they involve what the President in power believes to be important.

Today, top officials say the most important U.S. commitments are, in order:

● The North Atlantic Treaty Organization [NATO], a treaty signed in 1949, involving 14 countries. The U.S. has pledged to go to war if any are attacked. To officials, NATO is the most sacred of all U.S. commitments. The U.S. has fought in two world wars to keep Central Europe in friendly hands and NATO is designed to prevent a third world war, this time with Russia.

● The survival of Israel. This is a totally different package in which no treaty is involved. The U. S. has not pledged to use its own troops to defend Israel, but Presidents repeatedly have accepted responsibility for Israel's survival in a sea of Arabs. Exactly what the U. S. would do in a crisis, officials say, would depend on the circumstances. If Russia sent troops to the Middle East, U. S. troops might be sent, too. Said one top official: "If Israel couldn't defend itself with our arms, we would be hard put not to go to war."

● South Korea and Japan. This is now considered the most sensitive area in the Far East because the interests of four of the world's great powers converge—China, Russia, Japan, and the U. S.

THE U. S. HAS 40,000 troops in South Korea equipped with nuclear weapons, including some on the North Korean border. They play the role of "trip wire" in case of attack.

To some top officials the Korean-Japanese commitment is even more important than the commitment to Israel—but Israel lies in an area where dangers are more immediate.

A vitally important point now, however, is that top officials are not identifying the U. S. "commitment" to Thailand as among major concerns.

THIS IS important because Thailand has long been described as the next of the threatened "dominoes" in Southeast Asia if Viet Nam and the rest of Indochina were to fall to the communists, as they now have.

Thailand is a member of SEATO, which President Johnson used to justify U. S. intervention in Viet Nam, and the organization, on paper, still stands. But the U. S. has written if off.

Officials now expect Thailand to move toward "accommodation" with Communist regimes in North and South Viet Nam, Laos and Cambodia. Eventually, they expect it probably will seek neutrality.

SAID ONE official: "The Thais will probably align themselves with the Third World."

The U. S. also has a mutual defense treaty with Taiwan that history has overtaken and which the U. S. has carefully avoided mentioning since President Nixon's visit to Communist China in 1972.

The U. S. will not go to war over Taiwan, officials say privately, regardless of the treaty.

IN SPITE of its worldwide commitments, and the current administration campaign to try to provide reassurance to allies, the Viet Nam War unquestionably has had a major impact on thinking of policymakers about U. S. military involvements.

"It is clear that the U. S. no longer can play the role of world policeman," says Joseph Sisco, undersecretary of State. "It is essential that our policy be one of selective engagement."

He says this means that administrations will have to provide "clear cut justification in terms of our national interests" of any military plans.

PERHAPS EVEN more importantly, Congress has tightened the reins on the President and the executive branch.

A War Powers Act passed in 1973 as a direct outgrowth of Viet Nam requires the President to inform Congress, in writing, within 48 hours, of any use of U. S. troops "equipped for combat in a foreign nation."

It also requires withdrawal of the troops in 60 days unless Congress specifically approves the war.

The Senate also has sought to define just what a "national commitment" is thru a non-binding "sense of the Senate" resolution adopted in 1972.

IT SAID there are no national commitments unless Congress has agreed formally that there are.

Kissinger has said that a lesson of the Viet Nam War is that Congress must concur in military actions.

Nevertheless, the Ford administration clearly has a far more hawkish view of the U. S. world role than many Democrats in Congress, and a stronger sense of U. S. "commitments."

Only a few weeks ago Ford insisted publicly that the survival of Cambodia was of "vital interest" to the U. S. The statement was, in a way, an attempt to convince Congress of a "commitment." Congress didn't agree, refused money and the U. S. withdrew.

KISSINGER'S personal style of diplomacy leads to many executive "commitments" that currently defy the ability of Congress to exert effective control. He may promise anything behind closed doors.

Congress still has not found a way to handle that kind of problem not covered by the War Power Act.

But the act still will make it necessary for an administration to explain its actions to Congress and to the public in far more detail than was provided in Viet Nam, once troops are committed.

The debate is far from over. It is only beginning.

Warns Russia May Rule Waves

Washington, May 18 (News Bureau) —The Soviet Union may soon supplant the United States in the position of "overriding dominance of the oceans," according to a Library of Congress study made public today.

The report, prepared for Sen. Ernest F. Hollings (D-S.C.), chaiman of the Senate National Ocean Policy Study, concluded that the Soviet Union is challenging the U.S. and have already surpassed it in several areas related to seapower.

Sen. Ernest F. Hollings

It said the Soviet merchant fleet has outstripped its fishing and oceanigraphic programs have attained equality with the Americans.

Although it concentrated on nonmilitary ocean activities, the study also said the Russian Navy is expanding "very rapidly" and has shifted "from a basically defensive posture towards inclusion of an offesive capability, appropriate for making global political impact and challenging the U.S. presence in many areas not contiguous to the Soviet Union."

"A Very Serious Matter"

"At a time of growing U.S. dependence on foreign sources of oil and raw materials," Hollings warned, "further erosion of our overall ocean capablities is a very serious matter . . . particularly in view of the growing maritime strength of the Soviet Union."

Among the study's findings were that:

● The Soviet merchant marine moved from 23d to 6th place in the world between 1946 and 1974, while the U.S. merchant fleet was slipping from first to eighth.

● The Soviet Union has greatly improved its fishing industry in the past two decades and is "likely to become the dominant fishing nation of the world in the near future."

● Although the Soviet Union is still behind in offshore drilling and production capability, it is speeding to catch up by importing Western equipment.

The Laws Under Which Mr. Ford Took Action

By ANTHONY LEWIS

As the affair of the Mayagüez was played out last week, public and Congressional attention focused largely on questions of war, diplomacy and politics. But the Mayagüez affair also raised profound questions of law and constitutionality. They were very much in the minds of White House lawyers and it was said, President Ford.

The "law" most quoted during the Mayagüez events was the War Powers Act passed by Congress late in 1973 over President Nixon's veto. It asks Presidents "in every possible instance" to "consult" with Congress before sending the armed forces into hostilities, and in any event commands them to "report" to Congress within 48 hours. White House aides did inform leading members of last week's military plans, if not exactly consult them, and the President did send a formal report thereafter.

But the really relevant law was not the general language of the War Powers Act but a specific statute prohibiting American military activity in Indochina. It was passed by Congress in June, 1973, and signed into law by President Nixon on July 1. It prohibited all combat activity in Indochina after Aug. 15 of that year.

The language has been re-enacted in each defense appropriations bill since then. In the current law it reads as follows: "None of the funds herein appropriated may be obligated or expended to finance directly or indirectly combat activities by U.S. military forces in or over or from off the shores of North Vietnam, South Vietnam, Laos or Cambodia."

On their face, in the ordinary meaning of the language, the words totally and explicitly prohibit what President Ford did last week. So the question must be: Is there some loophole, some escape from the flat language that appears in the statute book as a command?

This question was discussed last week with President Ford's counsel Roderick Hills, who made clear that it had been a weighty one for him and his colleagues.

Some have suggested—Senator Henry Jackson did last week—that the 1973 law banning Indochina combat was somehow "superseded" by the later War Powers Act. Mr. Hills saw no force in this argument, and no legal comfort for the President. He said the law was on the books and, on its face, would seem to have prohibited use of the funds that in fact were used to send the Marines and aircraft to the Gulf of Siam. But in the unlikely event that a court will try to apply a statute, that would not end the discussion. The court would first look at the legislative history—the debates before passage—to see whether they suggested a different meaning for the words of the statute. And it would measure the act against the Constitution.

The 1973 Congressional debates are not very illuminating in this case. Members did not discuss a situation like that of the Mayagüez. Last week one of the bill's sponsors, Senator Frank Church of Idaho, said he had not intended to keep a President from using force to rescue American citizens. But even the most flexible ideas of statutory interpretation did not allow authors of bills to give ex post facto accounts of their meaning.

The Constitution confided to Congress the power to declare war. Money for the armed forces must also be voted by Congress, in regular appropriations. To use the power of the purse to restrict war-making by the United States thus sounds like an act well within Congress's power, and a traditional way of using the power.

On the other hand, Presidents have for many years committed the armed forces without asking Congress first. The business of fighting enormous wars without a formal declaration, as in Vietnam, is a recent and much-criticized development. But back into the 19th-century Presidents did use the military on their own for such lesser actions as protecting American lives and acceptance of the principle at the time helped set a precedent.

The great legal test of Presidential war powers came when President Truman seized the steel mills in 1952 to prevent a strike during the Korean war. The Supreme Court held the seizure unconstitutional. Justice Robert H. Jackson wrote that the branches of the United States Government are not totally separate; their powers overlap. A President's power is "at its lowest ebb" when he acts against the "will of Congress"; the courts can sustain him then only by holding Congress powerless in the area—and they would hesitate to do that.

Maintaining Equilibrium

"Presidential claim to a power at once so conclusive and preclusive," Justice Jackson wrote, "must be scrutinized with caution, for what is at stake is the equilibrium established by our constitutional system."

Mr. Hills, perhaps reflecting that outlook, did not argue directly that the 1973 appropriation act was unconstitutional if applied to restrict a President's power in the Mayagüez circumstances. He was careful, indeed, to say that President Ford had not treated the law as unconstitutional. Rather, he took a more sophisticated position often taken by the Supreme Court when faced with a grave Constitutional question over a statute. That is to give the statute's words a narrow meaning, even a strained meaning, in order to avoid the constitutional question. For example, the Supreme Court, rather than decide whether the Constitution allowed withholding of passports on political grounds, held that the old passport laws did not authorize such withholding.

A court might put it this way, Mr. Hills argued: "We should not assume that Congress would lightly interfere with the true constitutional war powers of the President—and what could be more at the heart of the true power than assuring the free passage of vessels in international waters and the safety of American citizens? Congress has the power of the purse. But if it gives the President armies to command, and the duty, he must exercise it...

"There is a rational argument," Mr. Hills concluded, "to show that the President did not willynilly ignore the law or declare it unconstitutional." Mr. Hills added that the President had discussed the legal issues very seriously with him and his senior counsel and old friend, Philip Buchen.

One curious thing about the role of law in the Mayagüez affair was how little anyone mentioned it. Mr. Hills said he thought that that was unfortunate—that there should have been candid discussion of the law. Very likely politics overwhelmed concern for the law, as it occasionally does, at least during the drama of last week.

The years of Vietnam and Watergate were often said to have carried great lessons about respect for law and the Constitution. If those lessons were learned, there will be further reflection in Congress and the country about the legal basis for the President's military actions in the Mayagüez affair.

The Mayaguez Incident: Is Singapore the Key to U.S. Need for Bases?

BY ROBERT S. ELEGANT

HONG KONG—In a week when direct military confrontation between the United States and Cambodia has emphasized the need for American bases in Southeast Asia, the recent advice of Singapore's Prime Minister Lee Kwan Yew—spoken in rather blunt terms—takes on added significance.

Lee has definite ideas about where the United States went wrong in Vietnam, and what it ought to do now in Southeast Asia. He has not hesitated to enunciate those ideas, whether on his home base or, as last week, at the White House.

The prime minister apparently believes that he can tell other people what to do because of his spectacular success in maintaining internal stability and in creating a thriving economy in his small island state, despite major difficulties. Perhaps his semimiraculous performance does give him that right, even if he rules with an iron hand.

Lee's prescription in part goes like this: The United States must reassure its friends by a strong, continuing military presence. Further precipitate withdrawals could cause total collapse of confidence and spread havoc from Western Europe through the Middle East to the Far East, gravely damaging American interest everywhere.

President Ford's decision on Wednesday to retrieve the captured cargo ship Mayaguez and its crewmen from Cambodia must have reassured Lee to some degree. Yet almost-concurrent actions by the Thais no doubt disturbed the prime minister almost as much as they did the President.

America's "allies," the Thais, have not only demanded an accelerated withdrawal of the 27,000 American troops now in their country but have also decided to "return" to the new Saigon regime some 50 American-supplied aircraft flown to U.S. bases in Thailand by refuge-seeking South Vietnamese pilots.

Bangkok further objected to the arrival of about 1,000 U.S. marines in Thailand to take part in the recapture of the ship. A foreign ministry spokesman warned that the action meant Thailand "can't be friends with the United States."

Thailand, the last American stronghold in continental Southeast Asia, is preparing to close down the major air bases. The extensive Sattahip naval base that the United States built in Thailand at Thai request, and at great expense, will soon be unusable. Having lost faith in American guarantees of their security, the Thais don't want to provoke their Indochinese Communist neighbors by retaining those U.S. bases.

Given the present apprehensive atmosphere in Southeast Asia, the Thai attitude is wholly understandable—if not notably gracious.

But it poses a major problem for U.S. military planners. The Thai bases were not only important to Indochina, they have also enabled the 7th Fleet and the air force to maintain a strong presence directed southwest toward the Indian Ocean and the South China Sea. That power has comforted oil-rich Indonesia and safeguarded Japan's vital sealanes to Middle East petroleum fields.

Contrasted with the current Thai attitude, Lee is quite another case. He has repeatedly and vehemently said he wants the United States to remain militarily strong in Southeast Asia. Moreover, strategically located Singapore possesses excellent naval bases and military airfields, which are now being vacated by vestigial British Commonwealth forces.

If Lee puts his bases where his mouth is, he could practically ensure the U.S. presence he wants. For its part, the United States could maintain and even extend its power, while demonstrating the determination to fulfill its commitments as Ford has said he will.

Even more than the Cambodian action, setting up bases in Singapore would be a symbolic and practical move which would greatly increase our ability to influence future events and help restore confidence among nations that depend on the United States for peace and security. These range from the European community through Israel all the way to Japan and the People's Republic of China—perhaps even Thailand itself. All that could come about without undertaking any new commitments, spending large sums, expending U.S. forces in Asia or risking again being bogged down on the Asian land mass.

Offering the United States long-term use of those bases would benefit Singapore greatly. Under British rule, those bases employed large numbers of skilled workers, most of Chinese origin, a human resource available nowhere else in Southeast Asia. The economic benefit to Singapore is obvious, while the cost to the United States would—if anything—be less than present costs.

Singapore would also feel much more secure because of the American presence, located as it is between two bigger powers, Malaysia and Indonesia. Lee has implicitly aligned himself with the United States by his own utterances. But even the formally nonaligned though strongly anti-Communist Indonesians would feel more secure if Singapore gave the United States bases they cannot offer.

The southern tier of Southeast Asia is worried about two distinct threats: the resurgent Indochinese and their mechanized "guerrillas" on the one hand, and Russian expansionism on the other.

Lee could dramatically allay those fears by offering bases to the U.S. Navy and Air Force. American strategists would almost assuredly jump at the offer. Even those prudent American statesmen who properly fear overcommitment should welcome the opportunity to help stabilize a volatile situation that could lead to new wars—particularly since it would involve no new commitments or major expenditures.

It will be interesting to see whether Lee Kwan Yew is, as his critics charge, intoxicated by the sound of his own words or whether he will make the gesture his own voluble logic dictates

Pathet Lao Taking Charge

The gradual erosion of the power of some pro-American politicians in Laos continues. They have been replaced by the Communist Pathet Lao.

The decline began on May 9 with the resignation of five rightist ministers from the coalition Cabinet of neutralist Premier Prince Souvanna Phouma. Their jobs, though apparently not their formal titles, were taken over by Communists. At the same time, there were student demonstrations and protests over the American presence.

In the southern Laotian city of Savannakhet, American officials were placed under house arrest by the demonstrators. Other American officials in the Laotian capital, Vientiane, were reported studying evacuation of the Savannakhet Americans, but were being cautious for fear of provoking a major incident.

Other countries were reported preparing to remove their nationals from Laos. Some Americans have left but the United States says it is not planning to remove the 300 Embassy officials and 490 dependents in the capital.

Refugee Funds Are Agreed To

The resettlement of the Vietnamese refugees appears no longer to be a political issue in the Congress. Both Houses have voted to authorize $405-million in relief funding for the program.

In the Senate, where the vote was 79-2, the usual procedures were reversed as authorization for the money was approved before a bill itself had cleared the floor. The money was needed immediately because existing funds for transporting, feeding and housing the Indo-chinese refugees is just about depleted. The Senate will probably push through a bill approving the refugee program sometime this week.

The difficulties for officials and for the refugees are now administrative. Of the 130,000 refugees, fewer than 10,000 have been processed. The majority are waiting in camps for the completion of security checks and the appearance of sponsors before they can be "admitted" to the United States. An emergency office has been pulled together in Washington to attempt to cut through some of the tangles.

Semper Fi

Washington.

The Marines were in trouble before their rescue of the Mayaguez. They still are. Despite their performance and their reputation, they continue to be budgetary stepchildren among the armed forces. They deserve better.

What they did this week in the Gulf of Thailand was a classic, romantic Marine operation. It was in fact a near duplicate of their action in the first naval battle in our national history, the raid on New Providence in the Bahamas in March, 1775.

As they stormed ashore on Tang Island this week, so they landed near Nassau then, capturing 88 cannon and assorted other booty from the British. Through the Barbary wars, the Mexican War, the banana wars of the early 1900's, they were always there. And the reputation they built in those years has turned out a disadvantage in modern times.

The assumption grew that the Marines were useful primarily to fight ill-equipped primitives in little sideshow operations. The grain of truth in that persists even to this day, even after World Wars I and II, Korea and Vietnam.

Between the great wars, the Marines perfected the techniques of amphibious warfare that were essential to winning World War II. In that war, their strength over half a million, they were the spearhead of the advance on Japan. Theirs was the most admirable record in Korea. They developed helicopter warfare doctrine while the Army was still scattering troops all over the landscape by parachute. In Vietnam they held the northern end of the country through the years of toughest fighting.

Yet regardless of their battle streamers, despite the fact that they always have loaded more men into their rifle companies and fewer into administrative overhead than the other services, the Marines still come in as an afterthought when the Pentagon splits up the money for equipment. It still supplies the Marines as if they were sailing to the Caribbean to protect the interests of the United Fruit Company.

In 1942, when Army infantrymen already had the new Garand M-1 rifle, the Marines still had the 1903 Springfield. In Korea, the Marines routinely marched over distances the Army would not consider crossing without trucks. In Vietnam, when Army divisions had the new M-16 rifle, the Marines still had the heavier M-14. When the Army had the new, faster Huey helicopters, the Marines were still making assaults from chugging old Seahorses.

Today, the Marines are still getting along with pre-Vietnam tanks, anti-tank and anti-aircraft missiles, although the latest versions of those weapons have been sent by the shipload to nations of the Middle East.

That is one cause of faltering morale among career Marines. Another is even more depressing, and harder to solve.

The all-volunteer Marine Corps, now 196,000 strong, has been plagued by violence and crime in its ranks. Desertion is up. Serious racial problems have rent units that survived earlier because of their tight-knit spirit. These troubles have created others, driving some career Marines to resign.

That was where the Marines stood before the fall of Vietnam. Under these discouraging circumstances, the Marines have demonstrated again that they can fill the assignment they were given in 1947, to be the nation's first-line force in readiness.

Thus when thousands of Americans and Vietnamese had to be evacuated from Saigon, it was the Marines who handled the job with outstanding speed and skill. When the Vietnamese refugees needed a place to flee to, the Marines built tent cities overnight.

And when the Cambodians snatched the Mayaguez in the Gulf of Thailand, it was the Marines who took it back, less than three days later. They were called on because they were available, they were mobile, they were trained—and they had a tradition of boarding ships and capturing islands that goes back to when John Paul Jones was a mere lieutenant.

When the dollars are divided up, they deserve better.

Drunken-Sailor Image Seems True

By Jack Anderson and Les Whitten

The image of the drunken, brawling sailor apparently is founded in fact.

According to an official study, a startling 38 per cent of the Navy's enlisted men confess they are boozers, with a drinking problem which they describe as "critical," "very serious" or at least "serious."

What's more, 25 per cent of the sailors told the researchers that their excessive drinking had often made them belligerent. Half this number, 12 per cent, acknowledged tangling with the law during their alcoholic binges.

The study, stiffly titled "Attitudes and Behavior of Naval Personnel Concerning Alcohol and Problem Drinking," was conducted for the Navy by the Bureau of Social Science Research, a Washington-based research firm. We have obtained a copy.

The report is a shocking indictment of the Navy's inability to cope with its alcoholics, who number in the tens of thousands.

Alcohol is so much a part of Navy life that only one in 20 enlisted men in the survey claimed to be non-drinkers. Another 23 per cent said they were able to control their drinking. But the remaining 72 per cent admitted that their drinking habits could cause complications ranging from "potential problems" to "binge drinking."

Yet only 6 per cent of the problem drinkers said they had sought help. Two-thirds of the officers, who were questioned about this, agreed that the alcoholics don't trust the Navy brass. Over half of the enlisted men, echoing this view, said they were afraid to seek Navy counseling for fear it would hurt their careers or mark them as troublemakers.

One of the most alarming disclosures in the report was that 44 per cent of the enlisted men had been drunk at least six times at their present duty station.

One out of four confessed that alcohol had actually affected the performance of their duties at some time during the past six months. Somewhat fewer officers, 17 per cent, admitted similar alcohol-related difficulties.

A disturbing 19 per cent of those interviewed reported that their fondness for booze had caused financial failures.

The number of chronic alcoholics in the Navy is conservatively estimated at 30,000, and their alcoholism costs the taxpayers at least $45 million a year.

Navy spokesmen, in response to our inquiries, agreed that alcoholism is a serious problem for the Navy. They insisted, however, that Navy alcohol recovery programs are treating 4,000 alcoholic servicemen a year and are successfully returning 70 per cent to active duty.

Meanwhile, many sailors, having been promised absolute anonymity, declared candidly that the Navy was one of the main causes of their excessive drinking.

Footnote: Comparable studies indicate that 13 per cent of civilian tipplers are guilty of unsociable behavior under the influence of alcohol. Only 3 per cent admit "loss of control" after overindulgence.

South Koreans Meet On Security Issues

SEOUL, South Korea, May 17 (AP) — The National Assembly convened today for a four-day special session expected to endorse President Chung Hee Park's defense and internal security measures in the wake of Communist victories in Indochina.

The New Democratic party, the chief opposition group, agreed earlier in the week to give support to the policies, reflecting fear of a North Korean invasion.

Japan's Kyodo news service reported that North Korea had accused South Korean troops of "military provocations" near the demilitarized zone and warned that this would bring "serious results."

Kyodo said a North Korean broadcast reported that South Korean troops had fired machine guns twice at North Korean soldiers, but it made no mention of casualties.

We Still Carry a Big Stick

By JAMES WIEGHART and FRANK JACKMAN

Of the News Washington Bureau

BY THE TIME the last marine had been taken off the beach of tiny Tang Island under cover of darkness Thursday night, the great international flap over Communist Cambodia's "act of piracy" was just about over.

The loose ends were all tied up. The United States formally reported to the United Nations Security Council that it had resorted to the "inherent right" of self-defense under Article 51 of the UN Charter, to retrieve the captured merchant ship Mayaguez and her 39-man crew from the Cambodians. And President Ford carefully informed Congress of what he had done and why, in accordance with the War Powers Act of 1973.

On the face of it, the Mayaguez rescue operation in the Gulf of Thailand was a classic application of military force to achieve a limited objective — liberate the ship, free the crew unharmed, punish the Khmer Rouge, and clear out.

The fact that the crew had been removed from Koh Tang long before the marines landed and that the ship was recovered, abandoned, before Navy carrier jets bombed Ream airfield near Sihanoukville dimmed the luster of the exploit somewhat. But nothing succeeds like success — even the U.S. dollar gained on the European money markets — and no one of importance was making much of a fuss about it.

Kissinger's Discreet Briefing

Except for — presumably — the Khmer Rouge, everyone thought it quite an achievement. As is his custom, Secretary of State Kissinger even pointed the way for reporters with a little discreet "senior American official" backgrounding.

The crisis seemed to blow up out of nowhere early Monday morning when word reached Washington that vessels identified as Communist Cambodian gunboats had fired on and seized the 10,435-ton container ship Mayaguez, bound from Hong Kong to Sattahip, Thailand, with a miscellaneous cargo. The 31-year-old ship, owned and operated by giant Sea-Land Services Corp. of Menlo Park, N.J., the leading U.S. cargo carrier in the Indochina area, was 60 miles off the Cambodian coast at the time of the seizure, apparently well outside territorial waters but near an island claimed by Cambodia.

By Thursday, the crew was back on board the Mayaguez and the ship—no Flying Cloud—was puttering down to Singapore. The 200-plus marines employed in the helicopter assault on Tang Island — Pentagon brass called it a "vertical envelopment" — were aboard the aircraft carrier Coral Sea, and the big Navy task force assembled for the operation was dispersing.

As for the Khmer Rouge — that mysterious, ragtag band of peasant insurgents who emerged from the obscurity of a decade of jungle struggle into the world spotlight only last month — they came out of the operation with their bathtub navy largely sunk, their air force virtually nonexistent, and their motives in all this as cloudy as ever.

The last president of Cambodia, Sau Kham Khoy, now a refugee at Camp Pendleton, Calif., probably summed it up as well as anyone. Maybe, he said, the Communists seized the Mayaguez because "they needed a boat." After all, he pointed out, most of the Cambodian navy sailed away with Lon Nol and his friends.

The Khmer Rouge, said Khoy, "are uneducated, they know little of politics, and they are savage. The only thing they understand is force."

The United States emerged from the crisis — on the surface at least — with some of the honor it had lost on the way out of Vietnam partially restored. President Ford had issued an ultimatum: Release the Mayaguez and its crew or suffer the consequences. Then he enforced it to the letter.

It has become clear that, for the Ford administration, the Mayaguez incident had a much larger significance than the recovery of an aging cargo ship and its crew. Top White House and State Department officials quickly passed the word that bold and forceful measures had demonstrated to the world, to friend and foe alike, that despite its Indochina humiliation, the U.S. was a force to be reckoned with, that Ford and the nation had not only the power but also the will to act.

The message to America's friends and allies was that the U.S. would live up to its commitments. To potential adversaries — the Soviet Union, Communist China, and, most especially, Communist North Korea — the Mayaguez incident was a bright red warning signal to tread lightly and not to misread post-Vietnam agonizing over foreign policy as signs of irresolution or weakness.

But, as is often the case, the message came out somewhat garbled in some quarters. Once-friendly Thailand, with a wary eye on the new Communist masters of Vietnam and Cambodia, publicly fumed at the use of the big U.S. air base at Utapao as a staging area for the marine helicopter assault teams. Prime Minister Kukrit Pramoj indicated that he might speed up his earlier "Yankee-go-home" demands to slim down further the U.S. garrison of 25,000 there. In the streets of Bangkok hundreds of students demonstrated, shouting "Bastard Ford!"

In Peking, the Chinese government, which served as a channel of communication in the brief diplomatic effort to free the Mayaguez, denounced the ship's recovery as "an outright act of piracy." Moscow played the story straight in dispatches from the official Tass news agency, however, omitting editorial comment.

Cautionary Note to Kim Il Sung

North Korea's leader, Kim Il Sung, was attending South Vietnam "liberation" ceremonies in Hanoi while the marines were liberating the Mayaguez. If the American show of force did anything to cool Kim's well-known ardor to "unite" Korea by marching south again, it will have more than served its purpose.

On Capitol Hill, members of the House and Senate — who have sensitive antennae to pick up the slightest shift in public opinion — were euphoric. Member after member rose to point to the operation as proof that the U.S. was not to be trifled with.

But perhaps there has been overreaction to the Mayaguez incident. The facts are these: A half dozen rickety patrol boats and the wild small-arms fire of a couple of hundred fanatical peasants are no match for U. S. carriers, destroyers, jet fighter-bombers, aerial gunships, and helicopter-borne assault teams. These are not new facts.

While the Mayaguez incident should serve as a source of gratification for Americans, even a source of pride, it is surely not to be offered up to the world as proof of power.

If the Ford administration hopes that belting a few zany reds during a 14-hour engagement on an island at the end of the world will somehow cow the Communists and deter red aggression worldwide when the huge decade-long expenditure of men and treasure in Vietnam could not do so, those hopes may well be only a fantasy.

Austria Says Detente Hurt By Belgrade

Reuter

VIENNA, May 16—Austria today rejected sweeping Yugoslav protests against Austrian government policies, and said Belgrade's sharply-worded complaints were in "flagrant contradiction" of the spirit of detente.

Chancellor Bruno Kreisky took unusual action in authorizing a special declaration to answer charges leveled by Yugoslavia in a statement issued in Belgrade on Tuesday.

The Yugoslav statement accused Austria of failing to fulfil obligations toward Yugoslav minority groups, as stipulated under the Austrian state treaty of 1955, and of tolerating hostile activity aimed against the Tito government.

Yugoslav-Austrian relations have been sharply strained since right-wing Austrians tore down Slovene-language signposts in the Austrian province of Carinthia in 1972.

The Austrian declaration called the Yugoslav accusations "insulting," and said Yugoslav behavior toward Austria in recent times was "astonishing."

The Yugoslav statement was in "flagrant contradiction of the spirit of the policy of detente," and the accusations it contained were "sharply rejected," Austria said.

The Demise of South Vietnam

By William C. Westmoreland

CHARLESTON, S. C.—Senior American and Vietnamese officers who observed at first-hand the collapse of the Vietnamese Army and the disintegration of morale of the people have given me further insight into the recent tragedy in South Vietnam.

To appreciate the predicament of South Vietnam one must understand several salient facts. First, any military force on the offensive has the advantage of the initiative. The North and South Vietnamese Armies could not be viewed as two boxers in a ring with no initial advantage to either. North Vietnam, as the invader, was capable of massing its forces at points of its own choosing without fear of an attack on its home territory.

Conditions of the cease-fire enabled the North Vietnamese to outflank the South Vietnamese Army on every front. Hanoi's violations of the Paris cease-fire agreement greatly strengthened its military advantage by use of the demilitarized zone, Laos and Cambodia, to say nothing of the large-scale build-up of forces and their reinforcement with modern Soviet matériel.

South Vietnam's sole aim was to hold on to its territory and avoid encroachment along the cease-fire line. Its troops were spread, making them vulnerable to defeat at any point that the enemy chose to mass his forces for attack. Hanoi was prepared to engage twenty divisions in the South. (It subsequently did. South Vietnam fielded thirteen divisions.) The stage was therefore set adversely for the South Vietnamese last January.

In 1973 and 1974, there had been only local engagements along the cease-fire line, with both sides jockeying for key territory, in some cases in technical violation of the cease-fire agreement, but with no widespread violations.

In those skirmishes, the South Vietnamese acquitted themselves well. But last January Hanoi decided to test the South Vietnamese leadership and the United States. A large attack was made in Phuoc Long Province some forty miles north of Saigon.

President Nguyen Van Thieu chose not to commit his reserve strength to defend the area, or to counterattack when it was lost; he did not want to suffer the inevitable personnel and equipment losses or expend limited supplies fighting for an area not deemed critical.

The United States passive reaction after this major violation of the Paris peace agreement by the North Vietnamese dismayed the Government in Saigon. During January, February and March, many Congressmen visited Vietnam, and President Thieu drew the obvious conclusion that further United States support was uncertain. He established policies to husband supplies and conserve trained manpower and equipment. (As an example, the ration imposed on ammunition was one grenade per combat soldier per month and 85 rifle bullets per soldier per month.)

Foreseeing a big enemy offensive, he conceived a withdrawal strategy to concentrate his regular forces in the critical areas along the coast and around Saigon.

Mr. Thieu's carefulness and caution served him well as the political head of the country for ten years. But undue caution is not a virtue for a military commander. Thus, for political and psychological reasons, he delayed putting into effect a strategy that could have temporarily thrown the enemy off balance and put the South Vietnamese Army in a sounder military position.

In March, the Communists attacked from bases in Cambodia and seized the remote provincial capital of Ban Me Thuot. By accident, South Vietnamese bombs devastated the command headquarters of the defending brigade, and efforts to recapture the city failed.

President Thieu wanted to make a stand at Ban Me Thuot since it was considered the capital city of the montagnards and its loss would destroy the morale of the tribesmen who populated the highlands.

Subsequently, the commander of Military Region II, Maj. Gen. Pham Van Phu, ordered a withdrawal from the highlands to the coast. His plans and preparations were inadequate to accomplish the most difficult of all military maneuvers. Hampered by hordes of refugees, closed roads, demoralized montagnard soldiers expected to secure the route, and by inaccurately delivered bombs, the withdrawal became a disaster. General Phu, an officer of excellent reputation, had been fighting for 24 years and had worked himself up through the ranks.

The enemy then began to put strong pressure on the outnumbered, outflanked and overextended South Vietnamese troops in the Hue area to the north.

Gen. Ngo Quang Truong, considered the best field commander in South Vietnam, advised President Thieu that he could hold Hue. Mr. Thieu announced on the radio that Hue would be defended to the last man. Without knowledge of Mr. Thieu's statement, but confronted by the overwhelming forces, General Truong ordered a withdrawal. Upon learning of this development, Mr. Thieu ordered General Truong to retake the city. It was too late. The tens of thousands of fleeing civilians clogged the roads, communications were lost and military units disintegrated. General Truong was helpless; he had lost control. Panic reigned.

The strongest link in the Vietnamese society is the family unit. Dependent families usually live near the soldiers. As soldiers learned of the withdrawal, they thought of their families first, and many broke ranks to find and try to move them to safety.

This debacle made it impossible to organize the defense of Da Nang, South Vietnam's second largest city, and it fell without a fight. Unnoticed at the time, South Vietnamese troops fought hard and successfully in the Mekong Delta and Saigon regions.

After twenty years of struggle, morale was shot. It was a tragedy of errors and circumstances. North Vietnam had flagrantly violated the Paris agreement. The United States had not provided adequate support in contrast to that furnished North Vietnam by the Soviet Union and China. (Twenty per cent of all aircraft were grounded for lack of spare parts.) The United States Congress appeared to be disposed to stop military aid. The signatory powers who were to assure success of the Paris agreement were silent.

Despite a letter from President Richard M. Nixon to Mr. Thieu saying that the United States would react vigorously to a major Communist violation of the Paris cease-fire agreement, we were paralyzed by the Case-Church amendment, which prohibited the use of funds for Southeast Asia combat activities. That action by the Congress not only tied the hands of President Ford but also removed our only deterrent to large-scale attack. I am told that members of the South Vietnamese National Security Council were in possession of copies of the Nixon letter and that they did not fully understand the implications of the Church amendment.

South Vietnam had suffered a major defeat and Mr. Thieu had lost face. Saigon's élite general reserve troops —paratroops and marines—were crippled by heavy casualties. The end of the Republic of Vietnam was near at hand. The Machiavellian Hanoi regime and its lockstep, closed society had virtually achieved their long-sought goal, domination of Indochina.

Was defeat of South Vietnam inevitable? Ultimately yes, under the conditions that prevailed: specifically, total violation of the Paris agreement by Hanoi; United States impotence, and the negative conduct of those nations that were to assure success of the agreements. But emphatically not from a lack of courage and heart

Mr. Ford and the Rule of Law

The gamble taken by President Ford in using armed force against Cambodia, starting with air strikes against Cambodian gunboats Tuesday evening, was based above all on this hard conclusion: The U.S. had to seize the occasion of Cambodian piracy to prove it both could and would react with decision and power to international lawlessness.

There was no split of any kind in the National Security Council (NSC). Indeed, every top official in the administration agreed that whatever the risk, a show of American will and power was absolutely essential following the humiliation of South Vietnam.

In ordering American attacks on the Cambodian gunboats to block an obvious Cambodian effort to remove the American crew of the Mayaguez to the Cambodian mainland, neither the President nor the NSC even attempted to figure out an answer to this potentially explosive question: What if the Cambodians should use the gunboat attack as the pretext for murdering some 40 American crewmen?

"Of course we had contingency plans," one top presidential aide told us. "But we couldn't sit around and try to estimate every possible contingency when we are dealing with a primitive government which has virtually no outside contacts with the world. We had to act." In the climatic triumph of Mr. Ford's policy, that question is mooted. But it shows the President's faith—and determination—in the plan he followed.

The underlying assumption of the President's aides was that the U.S. must deal with such an act of piracy as a Western nation acting in a civilized fashion: Demand immediate return of the ship and crew and map a contingency plan to seize both by force if the demand was not met within a reasonable time.

Following seizure of the Mayaguez by Cambodia just after midnight, Sunday, the President allowed almost 48 hours to go by without any military response. Next, the basic plan of isolating the little island in the Gulf of Thailand, where the Mayaguez was held, went astray when Cambodian gunboats moved toward the mainland about 15 miles away. The President then gave his order to halt the gunboats.

At that point, the U.S. went the full and necessary distance to prove what Mr. Ford and his Secretaries of State and Defense, Henry Kissinger and James Schlesinger, had been preaching nonstop ever since the catastrophic end of the Vietnam war: Despite that national humiliation, no foreign country should make the mistake that the United States was discarding its role as world leader, or was reluctant to take strong action where demanded.

Indeed, the private remarks of top officials here make it abundantly apparent that the Mayaguez seizure became the ideal case to prove the point.

In the background was the utter failure of all efforts to open some kind of circuitous diplomatic channel to the revolutionary Cambodian government of the Khmer Rouge. The Soviet Union has been kicked out of Phnom Penh for failure to break with the old regime. The People's Republic of China, according to one high official, informed the U.S. it would try to help, and did so, but proved the point that the jingoistic Cambodian regime was simply beyond reach.

On Tuesday evening, Mr. Ford ordered word passed to congressional leaders that "appropriate action" would be taken. Perhaps in retrospect the President should have summoned these leaders to the White House for a face-to-face conversation. Sen. Mike Mansfield of Montana, the Senate Democratic leader, for example, said later that he had not been "consulted," on the theory he was told, not asked.

Other criticism in a Congress now showing dangerous symptoms of taking over American foreign policy from its feuding committee rooms was also heard, raising ominous questions about a vicious partisan debate erupting from the President's bold action.

But on that point Mr. Ford and his top aides, often indecisive and vacillating on lesser matters, showed no concern this time. They assumed that whatever partisan outcry might ensue, the American people as a whole would react with overwhelming approval to the President's powerful response to an unprovoked act of piracy on the high seas.

"Sure they'll try to demagogue it," one senior presidential aide told us. "That's par for the course. But no one considered that as part of the problem."

Thus, in this first, clear show of American power since the Indochinese fiasco, Mr. Ford has demonstrated what he is often criticized for lacking: a talent for leadership and command, in a case void of ambiguity to him and his advisers. Despite political risks, no one around him exhibited second thoughts about the obligation of the U.S. to underwrite the rule of law in the world.

by the long-suffering Vietnamese soldier.

Could the outcome of our involvement, based on actions by several Administrations, have been realistically different? Yes, perhaps. Between 1962 and 1965, when political chaos was rampant in South Vietnam and the lack of cohesiveness of that heterogeneous society became clearly evident, we could have severed our commitment with honor—but not without strong political reaction in light of President Kennedy's inaugural address.

Again, after defeat of Hanoi's Tet offensive in 1968, we could have used our military power, brought Hanoi to its knees, and negotiated on our terms. At that time we had in Vietnam the finest military force ever assembled. But again the political reaction in the United States would have been intense.

Born of our post-World War II policy of "containment" of aggression, our Vietnam venture suffered from overextension of our nation militarily, economically, and psychologically.

We failed to accomplish our objective in Southeast Asia and can take little solace from that fact that we delayed a Communist take-over of Indochina by ten years. The military power and the cost required to accomplish our idealistic purpose in Vietnam exceeded that which was apparently acceptable to many of our people.

I hope our vast expenditure of precious resources will not be a total loss. We are challenged to overcome our current international image of disorganization, unreliability and impotence. Let's have no witch-hunt, but let's not sweep under the rug. If we are introspective, analyze our mistakes, and heed in the future the lessons to be learned, we can emerge a stronger nation.

All segments of our nation must share the blame for our failure and should engage in self-examination—policy-makers, planners, diplomats, military leaders, politicians, bureaucrats, the news media and the body politic.

The comic strip character Pogo has aptly summed it up: "We have met the enemy and he is us."

Schlesinger warns North Korea

Washington

Defense Secretary James Schlesinger said in an interview released Sunday that if North Korea invaded the South the United States would hit back harder than it did during much of the war in South Vietnam.

He also warned, in an interview with U.S. News and World Report magazine, that the United States would be "less likely to be tolerant" of a new Arab oil embargo and that economic, political and, conceivably, military measures could be taken in response.

Mr. Schlesinger said North Korea would be acting rashly if it precipitated a crisis with the United States.

Another Foreign Policy Plus for Mr. Ford

On the heels of the spectacular triumph in the Mayaguez incident, Gerald R. Ford's embattled presidency is nearing a second successive foreign policy win: breaking the ominous deadlock with Congress over barring U.S. military aid to Turkey.

More important, the virtual certainty that the Senate will vote Monday to lift the arms embargo assures a delay in the expected closing down by Turkey of vital American base facilities. Once started, that process could erode even more dangerously the strained relations between the United States and its longtime valuable ally.

The private Senate headcount shows a minimum of 53 senators ready to vote to end the arms embargo imposed last fall by the Greek congressional lobby after Turkey's use of U.S. arms in invading Cyprus.

What makes the timing so important is next Wednesday's meeting of the Central Treaty Organization (CENTO) in Ankara. In confidential negotiations with congressmen leading the Greek lobby, administration officials have pointedly warned that Secretary of State Henry Kissinger and his political deputy, Under Secretary Joseph J. Sisco, would find themselves in a diplomatic hornet's nest in Ankara unless Congress showed some give on the arms embargo.

That word has now switched a number of senators. Softening their anti-Turk animus even more, however, is the fact that Monday's vote, unlike the similar vote last fall, follows the November election. The well-financed Greek-American lobby had far more leverage last fall.

Sen. Thomas Eagleton (D-Mo.), who led last fall's Senate bar of all U.S. military aid to Ankara, is still opposed. However, Eagleton will confine himself to a speech opposing the amendment, and not make an all-out fight against it.

Only two weeks ago congressional leaders of the Greek lobby privately warned the White House that if the President insisted on forcing a Senate vote now, Kissinger would be "burned to a crisp" in the debate. Following Mr. Ford's new eminence as a strong President boldly moving to assert American rights in last week's dramatic Cambodian rescue, such threats have vanished.

A footnote: The administration has no intention of pressing for an early vote in the House, where the Greek lobby is stronger and shows little interest in compromise. The Turkish government, however, will accept the Senate vote as a signal of major change in Washington, enough to postpone the closing of U.S. bases.

Just What The Doctor Ordered

By C. L. Sulzberger

PARIS—Overnight, by resolute and skillful leadership in the Mayaguez crisis, President Ford has seemingly moved from the doldrums of Hooverdom toward the vigor of Harry Truman. He made up his mind; he consulted political leaders; he acted; and he succeeded. Small as the incident may later seem in history, a polluting stain is being erased from the previous American image of lassitude, uncertainty and pessimism.

This is a matter of world ideological concern as well as strategic balances because too many democracies are sick. The oldest, Britain, staggers toward disaster. People forget how long Italy has appeared to be at death's doorstep. And the United States, leader of them all, for too long gave the impression of reeling both at home and abroad. Now a new vibrancy creeps into the picture.

Only this week a commentator had written in The Times of London: "The [American] political parties are losing their hold on the electorate. There are now more voters who dislike most of what they see in both parties than approve of either."

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

'A polluting stain is being erased from the previous American image.'

The internationally renowned "American tempo" and productivity still lag and the work ethic with its emphasis on speed and efficiency—whether prompted by puritanism or by the capitalistic profit motive—has certainly undergone visible and withering change.

In this uncertain age American flabbiness is not only harmful to the United States. France's Nouvel Observateur, an intellectual leftist weekly, asserts that "many governments allied to Washington are asking themselves about the value of this alliance and on what protection they can count. Their anxiety is manifest."

The magazine specifically cites Israel, West Germany and Japan. Moscow's Literaturnaya Gazeta contentedly purrs: "Profound processes are rocking the existing political and economic structure in both Western Europe and the United States."

The health of an individual democracy depends on its institutions but also upon the quality of its leaders. In the instance of Britain, the fact that it has no written constitution—although it is the oldest constitutional democracy—has curiously been a great strength. Pitts and Churchills are far rarer than Harold Wilsons but the British paradox of relying on something that isn't really there worked miracles.

Now, however, Britain has spent itself into a paralysis compounded by bankruptcy, dilapidation, maximal leisure and minimal discipline. Eight years ago, when visiting Montevideo, I wrote: "Contemporary England might well take a southwesterly look at Uruguay while murmuring: 'There but for the grace of God go I.' For Uruguay is the welfare state gone wild." Well, the British got there in the end.

Britain's current inflation rate of over 30 per cent is far beyond the limit at which the stability of even the most well-entrenched democracy is assured. It was not difficult in the nineteen-sixties to see that Uruguay, once South America's most promising land, had become a pilot project pointing to the disintegration of similar exaggerated systems elsewhere.

Historians rarely agree on what precisely saps the vitality and determination of a nation. It may be a succession of bloodlettings or over-extension of commitments, word-weariness or moral dissolution. The real reason Charles de Gaulle vetoed Britain's entry into Common Market Europe a dozen years ago was his conviction that Britain wasn't working hard enough.

The science of politics differs from the art of governing because politics means just staying ahead of the mob, not leading it. What we find today in Britain and Italy is a plethora of politicians and no statesmen. The mob obeys the logic of its own passions and in Britain there seems now to be only a flock.

Nobody wants dictators. Democracies simply require leadership, not followship; Franklin Roosevelts, not Coolidges. One reason for the democratic malady is a lack of such quality at the top: Britain, intent on suicide by nibbling itself to death; the United States, until this week, still stunned by Watergate and Indochina.

Many countries, cut adrift when for months there was an evident absence of U.S. leadership, felt forced to follow the principle that if you don't know where you're going, any road will get you there. And that's where we ourselves were headed earlier this week.

Now Gerald Ford seems to have put an end to that sad phase. Abruptly he has shown Americans and the world that he knows how to get where he wishes to go. Hopefully, he also possesses a good sense of direction.

GARRY WILLS

The Need for Reflection on Vietnam

The lesson is simple, and learning it should not be all that difficult. But we cannot learn it by urgently repeating to each other that we must not learn.

There is nothing more interesting about our collapse and withdrawal from Vietnam than the injunction that we should not allow ourselves to think about it. God knows, we thought very little about our entry into that country and what thoughts we had in the course of our engagement were muddied by slogans, deception, and conflict. At the end, we fled (almost too late) from "peace with honor" we pretended to believe in. If we are not to think about it now, then we have foreclosed all thought on the subject.

President Ford says all the lessons are learned — just after proving that he had learned nothing except to call for more arms and money and men, as we had done from the outset.

Now this poses an interesting question. Anyone of rounded human capacities should grow from each experience undergone; and how grow but by reflection? Yet now all reflection is interdicted (lest it turn to recrimination). No passions are to be "recollected in tranquility." Just buried in oblivion. We have the build-up of a mandated non-think on Vietnam.

Why is that? The experience, after all, was novel to America — we are not used to losing. Normally, the rarer the experience, the more need for reflection. Vietnam was our longest war by far — we fought it 10 years openly, and twice as long covertly.

Yet all our other (shorter) wars called forth vast libraries of assessment afterward. No one said this time of assessment was unnecessary then. Why did meditation go out of fashion so quickly?

The fear, of course, is of a new McCarthyism; and the parallel is with our "loss" of China. But we did not wage open war for between one decade and two over Chiang Kai-shek's regime. We did not lose 55,000 men to overthrow Mao Tse-tung. Nor engage in the largest carpet-bombing venture in mankind's history over the withdrawal to Taiwan. The comparison is absurd.

It would be suicidal for any organization or individual to forbid study of its own experience, especially an experience of setback or defeat. Why do people so readily fall in with this prescription for America in the post-Vietnam period?

I suppose because analysis so easily turns to accusation, on both sides. What one side sees as creeping escalation (where a quantum jump was called for) the other side calls a "secret war." Strategy and tactics are both called too much, too soon, and too late, too little. Our own internal divisions were reflected and magnified all through the course of the war — our racial troubles, our generation gap, our revolt against the experts.

But analysis of Vietnam should not be given ourselves. It was self-preoccupation that made us so sure we could do what we wanted to Asians. The true lesson of Vietnam is so obvious we miss it — especially if we indulge in further fascination with ourselves. Seen in the light of history, Vietnam will clearly be just one episode in the receding of colonialism. This movement has dominated the history of Asia and Africa for a quarter of a century. It was our naive assurance that we make all things new that led us to overlook the obvious. France could not hold Indochina, any more than it could Algeria. But we stepped in front of the wave and said stop. It did not listen. Why did we expect it to?

Year of the United States

By C. L. Sulzberger

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PARIS—In vanished days when we were given to proclaiming basic policy intentions, 1973 was dubbed by Washington as its "Year of Europe," meaning that American diplomacy intended to focus on that vital area. This idea was never more than a propaganda blast. The year wound up in the silence of an energy famine and intra-allied throat-cutting.

There is no point in resurrecting the 1973 label now, even though both President Ford and Secretary Kissinger are coming to this continent. Slogans are not useful diplomatic devices and Mr. Kissinger, the man who lost his claque, is wise enough to recognize this.

In order to reassess its global role, the United States must recognize certain basic truths. It is no longer a superduper power preaching an American century but suddenly, perforce, what Mr. Kissinger recommended in a little-noticed speech (New Delhi, November 19, 1974): "America sees a world of free, independent sovereign states as being decidedly in its own national interest."

Within this framework, however, independent sovereign America must protect itself and its friends. That, too, is a "national interest." Psychologically, as much was reaffirmed by President Ford in the Mayaguez incident.

A pro-American ambassador recently told me: "Everyone is now learning that if you are an ally of Russia, you are supported to the end; if you are an ally of the United States you are supported so long as the vagaries of mass opinion and the convenience of politicians go along.

"Everyone with any sense of decency hated what the Russians did to Hungary in 1956 and Czechoslovakia in 1968 when they suspected each might leave the Soviet bloc. They moved right in and supported their political allies. Their brutality has been forgotten in the era of détente.

"Obviously America shouldn't and couldn't do that. But your policy of diving deeply in and totally out has made you hated on both sides in Indochina, just as you are hated by both Greeks and Turks for your inability to make up your minds to do something."

Michel Gauvin, the Canadian who headed Vietnam's International Commission of Control and Supervision, says: "It is a tragedy that such a great, generous and powerful nation as the United States could be humiliated and have peace with honor stolen from it because of internal division and lack of leadership."

Europeans never worried so much because of the Indochina disaster to Washington's policy as they did about American resolution and clarity of vision. The almighty dollar's depressing dip is more symbolic over here than the lowering of the Stars and Stripes in Phnom Penh and Saigon.

Continental observers have for long seen the Southeast Asian war being lost in the Mississippi and Hudson valleys, not along the Mekong, as a result of United States indecision and confusion back home. Increasingly, since General de Gaulle first posed the problem after the Cuba confrontation, they wondered if America was ready to risk destruction of New York and Washington if Soviet land forces occupied Lübeck.

They have seen the United States shift increasingly to a flexible strategy reliant on conventional weapons; yet Russia has ten times America's tank production and is speedily narrowing America's seapower lead. And the result? Europe falters down a road toward "Finlandization," with its left becoming more anti-capitalistic and its right more anti-American.

"Prestige" is an unfortunate, often misused word but the United States had to do something about refurbishing its prestige as a reliable ally backed by a reliable national resolve. Hopefully the unexpected Mayaguez affair helped in this respect. At the same time, Washington must come out with clear-cut support for the European community and stop saying one thing while doing another.

The latter remains fundamental. Of course, lesser reforms are also needed. For example, we are going to have to cease handing out important diplomatic posts as political spoils; this is no time for second-rate envoys. And it might be a very good idea if some of our chief leaders wore gags when out in private: Mr. Kissinger confiding to Israeli colleagues; Secretary Simon on Iran's Shah ("a nut"), Rockefeller on how grateful Greece should be that Turkey invaded Cyprus.

With leaders who permit themselves such indiscretions in the electronic age, an isolation ward might indeed be the best place for the United States to shelter in this giddy world. As the comic strip says; We have met the enemy and he is us.

Three days in May may change U.S. history

By PETER J. KUMPA

Washington.

Along the northern shores of the Gulf of Thailand, where there are reefs, scrubby islands and good fishing, a bizarre collision of men, ideas and forces took place in three long days of May last week that may affect future American history.

The brief, bloody crisis over the ship Mayaguez was by all accounts an accident.

On one side, there was the spirited and victorious new Cambodian government that had directed vigorous patrolling of its share of the coast and somewhat questionable portion of offshore islets (some have a Vietnamese claim). For nine days, the new Cambodians had been stopping ships (at least four) and firing on others in long-established and undisputed international shipping channels.

Such a danger to freedom of navigation should have been flashed quickly to all mariners. It was not for still inexplicable reasons. From middle-level bureaucrats, the word was passed to the insurance companies on the usually sound theory that those who have something to lose will protect their interests with the greatest speed.

Policymakers in Washington—suffering post-Vietnam fatigue—were unaware of the flinty situation. Neither did they know of the voyage of the Mayaguez, a 10,000-ton converted container vessel, a U.S.-flag ship, that had left Hong Kong with a crew of 39 Americans, a cargo of considerable PX stores, for the Thai base of Sattahip (containing a port, a B-52 bomber base and hundreds of Americans connected with the military).

Early last Monday (Washington time), two Cambodian gunboats stopped the Mayaguez some 60 miles from the coast and some 8 miles from the Paule Wai Islands. Before the radio room was reached by the boarding party, messages went out that told of the removal of the crew and the capture of the American vessel on the high seas.

President Ford was given a full report as he awoke that Monday. A National Security Council meeting was called. Diplomatic efforts were started immediately through the People's Republic of China, the only country with ties and communications to the new Cambodia, for the return of crew and ship.

Later, a mystery developed whether any such demands had gotten through, for the Peking liaison chief here returned the United States note a day later. The Secretary of State, Henry A Kissinger, however, has no doubts about delivery, for a copy was handed over to the Cambodian Embassy in Peking. What heightened the mystery in the first days was a blank lack of response Nothing, until military operations were well under way late last Wednesday (Washington time) was anything heard from Cambodia. In one of the many "could have beens" in the incident, a quick response may have averted the use of force.

The United States took the seizure very seriously. Nothing raises American anger quicker than interference with lawful shipping or the capture of its merchant crews, a reflex action going back to Barbary Coast days and the founding of the republic. Mr Ford labeled the seizure "an act of piracy" and "serious consequences" were predicted unless the men and their ship were returned.

What alarmed the policymakers more was the break in the Cambodian pattern. Unlike some of the other incidents, the Mayaguez crew had been removed. A Panamanian vessel had been simply stopped and searched for two hours.

The vision was raised of haggling for the lives of Americans with the Cambodian Communists. It might take months, as with the Pueblo seizure by North Korea in 1968. And it would be bartering with the sort of inhumane leaders who had ordered some of their own countrymen sent from hospitals and surgical tables to certain cruelties and likely deaths out of the city during the fighting last month.

Beyond the need to save American lives, there was a further vision of the United States, its credibility strained over the fall of Vietnam, taking a humbling stance when it clearly had a legal, historic right to protect its people and its shipping. Was the Mayaguez to be the start of a string of other seizures, other incidents?

President Ford made the ultimate decision to draw the line. There is no evidence of disagreement in the National Security Council by either the military men or the diplomats. There was strong sentiment in Congress for action.

The 45,000-ton carrier, the Coral Sea, that had started for World War II anniversary celebrations in Australia, was turned around. With it came destroyers. Marines from from Okinawa were alerted and then flown to Thailand, a nervous ally that now was opposed to antagonizing its new Communist neighbor. The Thais opposed use of their territory for any military operation. At least publicly, the protest was ignored.

The military tactics were dictated by what was known and what was guessed at last Tuesday and Wednesday. The ship had not been brought into the port of Kompong Som. It had traveled half-way from its seizure point and was still 30 miles from the coast "lying dead in the water" by the jungle-covered Tang Island. From continuous observation from Thai-based aircraft, it was concluded that the crew were either on one of three possible places—the 3-mile-long Tang Island, below-deck on the ship itself or somehow on the mainland. The first step was to prevent gunboats and other smaller Cambodian vessels, from moving back and forth, possibly transferring the American captives.

Early last Wednesday morning (again Washington time), American aircraft tried to prevent shore-to-island movement and sank three gunboats and damaged some others. One was allowed to escape to Kimpong Som when the pilot noticed a huddle of what might have been crewmen on deck.

Diplomatic messages were continued the language escalated (an actual ultimatum was prepared but never sent) with no response. Last Wednesday afternoon, Mr. Ford gave the decisive order The Marines would storm both Tang Island and the Mayaguez. Facilities on shore would also be struck, in part to prevent any T-28 fighters from attacking helicopters bringing in Marines and also to keep Cambodian forces "occupied" ashore.

The Marines were landing and taking fire at Tang Island as a domestic Cambodian service was issuing its first word on the Mayaguez. It was offering the ship back while denouncing the American action, saying nothing about returning the crew but attacking alleged spying attempts. It took less than than an hour for this word to reach the White House which immediately offered an end to military operations for the return of the men. To reach the Cambodians quickly, a special broadcast was made and the message also given the news services.

A 10.23 P.M. Wednesday, a Thai fishing vessel bearing a white flag, approached one of the destroyers. All of the crewmen were aboard but the count took until 11.07 P.M. Then, the White House ordered all "offensive" operations halted. Some of the bloodier fighting still came to extract the Marines from Tang Island, an operation that in hindsight proved unnecessary. Some of the heavier strikes on the Cambodian mainland took place later, starting at 10.57 P.M.

There has to be more than a suspicion that some of these attacks were reprisal messages—for the Cambodians in the future or for other potential adversaries.

Mr. Ford emerged out of the incident with a new reputation as a decisive leader.

It was Secretary Kissinger who

Diplomacy Minus Morality

The global rout of Henry Kissinger's policies — and his attempt to disarm his own handiwork by laying it at the door of an obstreperous Congress and an unsteadfast people — calls for comment.

Kissinger has cut a great swath through our times. He has a formidable intellect and an arresting eloquence. He is possessed of an awesome drive and dedication. He is a brilliant negotiator and a commanding personality.

But he has made one great mistake. As the chief navigator of our foreign policy since 1969, he has kept the flag of American idealism deliberately lowered and has sailed the seven seas without a moral rudder. He has been willing to do what must be done to get "results," ready to make common cause with any pirate who controlled a useful ship.

If the expediency of the moment called for throwing the gentle Cambodian people into the maw of an already lost war in order to facilitate our retreat from it, or for the terror bombing of Hanoi at 11:59 of the war to disguise the surrender inherent in his peace terms, well — that's the way the game is played.

If the calculations of power politics caused America to stand before the Solzhenitsyns of the world with eyes averted while placating their oppressors, or to deceive Congress and the public as to exactly what had been done or pledged in their name, well — it isn't easy to be Bismarck.

For a time, Henry Kissinger dazzled Washington. He was adept in the backrooms at producing accords that meant different things to different signators, assiduous in building up houses of cards by ambiguities.

He practiced a diplomacy of duplicity and manipulation, putting expediency ahead of principle. He underestimated the American ideology. He forgot that there comes a time when the foreign policy of a democracy is no stronger than the people's respect for it.

One by one, the houses of cards have fallen in. Success would have permitted at least a pragmatic defense of his tactics. But where are the victories?

The Indochina debacle is merely the latest example. By 1969, the Vietnam War was lost. It was painfully evident that we could not forever defend a regime that could not defend itself.

Yet instead of facing the true reality and dismantling the war in the most humane and least costly manner possible, Richard Nixon and Henry Kissinger prolonged it for four years in pursuit of appearances. They had their eye on the global chess game and domestic politics.

That the Nixon-Kissinger "peace with honor" was never more than a cynical slogan, that the Paris peace accords were made only to be broken was obvious even to the Joint Chiefs. Their secret estimate was that under the Paris agreement, the Saigon regime could not survive, for the accord left large North Vietnamese forces within South Vietnam, building up for the final kill.

The Vietnam mistake was part of a pattern. Here is the dismal record, which must be understood before it can be corrected:

• Early in his regime, Kissinger found our official coldness toward South Africa and Rhodesia inconvenient and quixotic, based as it was on mere ideological considerations. He thought he could saddle the issue and, with a little manipulation, play up to both sides. His first secret tilt was toward the white supremacist nations, while he sought to placate the black nations with U.S. aid. It didn't work. Today the black Africans — almost the whole continent — are convinced we're against them.

• During the India-Pakistan war, we claimed neutrality while tilting toward Pakistan. It was another maneuver in the chess game. Thus, we ineffectually backed the abject loser and alienated the world's largest democracy.

• In the Greek-Turkish war over Cyprus, Kissinger's passion for meddling and manipulation embroiled us to such poor effect that it cost us the enmity not of one side but of both. But Greece and Turkey had been long-time U.S. allies.

• In Latin America, Kissinger's neglect of our traditional allies has turned them against us. He was compelled to cancel a trip south of the border because he was advised secretly that his visit would cause riots in some countries.

• By the time of the Secretary's attempt to mediate the Arab-Israeli hostilities, the long pursuit of pragmatism at the expense of principle had exacted its awful price. Kissinger had compromised so many interests, had carried so much water on so many shoulders in so many parts of the world, that President Ford had to take personal charge of the Middle East negotiations.

• In Portugal, U.S. Ambassador Stuart Nash Scott tried to establish friendly relations with the new military government. He advised Washington that Portugal was not lost to the Communists, that the United States should bolster the moderates who wanted to remain in the Atlantic Alliance. Kissinger not only refused to listen but fired him for his wrongheadedness. Now Portugal has concluded a wholly free election, with 92 per cent participation. The Communists wound up with only 13 per cent of the vote. The ousted ambassador was right; Kissinger was wrong.

If Kissinger's mistakes suddenly are catching up with him, he has told friends plaintively that it isn't his fault — if the presidency had retained its authority, if the Congress had not rebelled, if the people had not flagged.

But that is the point. The foreign policy of a great democracy, if it is to endure, must be forthright and based on principle. Free men will not long shed blood or spend their treasure to support mere facades, manipulations and secret deals.

An American foreign policy that does not recognize this is built on sand.

doubted that the Cambodians had planned the entire operation. It appeared to be a case of a local commander taking an initiative but with his headquarters later taking advantage of it. Why were there no answers to diplomatic message for 60 hours? What was the Cambodian motive? The cries and charges of CIA-espionage are not taken seriously here. Phnom Penh's new rulers may be paranoid. They may mistake normal shipping for fishing squabbles in the area as threats to their authority.

In hindsight, it is easy to see some tactical mistakes. But without action, the situation might also have been far more tragic. In one still disputed account, the Mayaguez crewmen are supposed to have credited the onshore bombing for their release.

The hope here is that the incident has served notice that the United States is not a toothless nor a paper tiger: that it has its limits of patience and that it will stay out of local Asian disputes unless it has no other choice

Greece and Turkey Open Talks on Rift

ROME, May 17 (UPI)—Greece and Turkey opened talks today on issues that brought the neighbors and Atlantic Alliance members close to war less than a year ago.

The Foreign Ministers of the two countries met at the Turkish Embassy for the first round of negotiations on the Cyprus problem and a more recent conflict over oil rights in the Aegean Sea.

Dimitrios Bitsios of Greece and Ihsan Febri Caglayangil of Turkey will move their talks to the Greek Embassy tomorrow.

The talks, the first ministerial contact between the two countries in nine months, will pave the way for a meeting between Premier Constantine Caramanlis of Greece and Premier Suleyman Demirel of Turkey in Brussels later this month.

SUMMARY OF NETWORK NEWS IN THIS ISSUE

John CHANCELLOR, Charles QUINN, and Lou ALLISON, all of NBC News, report on Mayaguez casualties. QUINN reports on the revised Pentagon casualty estimates of five dead, 16 missing and 49 wounded and includes a statement by Secretary LAITIN about why the estimates were delayed and tentative. ALLISON reports from Subic Bay on a press conference called by the commander of the Mayaguez attack Lt. Colonel Randall AUSTIN who relates the heaviness of the fighting on Koh-Tang island. He also includes a statement by Sergeant SALINAS about the crash of his helicopter and his escape at sea from it. CHANCELLOR reports on the names of three of the five killed soldiers and that the dispute between Thailand and the United States has been resolved by a regrets letter. Richard VALERIANI, NBC, reports that Secretary KISSINGER and Soviet Foreign Minister GROMYKO are meeting in Vienna to discuss SALT, the European Security Conference, detente and the Middle East and that no concrete results are expected from the talks. CHANCELLOR and Catherine MACKIN report that the Senate has passed by one vote a bill to end the military aid ban on Turkey but that action in the House on the bill is unpredictable. CHANCELLOR reports on three events in Vietnam and that the Pentagon will open a fourth refugee center in Indiantown Gap, Pa.

Roger MUDD, Ike PAPPAS, Keith KAY, and Paul HAYES, all of CBS News, report on Mayaguez news. PAPPAS reports on the revision of the Pentagon casualty estimates from the Mayaguez fighting and on previous estimates. He reports on Secretary LAITIN's statement that the Pentagon will withhold nothing from the operation and that he confirmed that the bodies of killed soldiers were left behind. KAY reports on the Subic Bay press conference called by Lt. Col. AUSTIN and includes a statement by AUSTIN on the heavy fighting at Tang island and also a statement by one of the wounded Marines. HAYES interviews the father of 2nd Lt. Richard VANDEGEER who was killed in action in Cambodia. MUDD reports that Thailand is satisfied with the U.S. note of regret for the Mayaguez incident as it relates to Thailand and that a fourth refugee camp will be opened by the Pentagon. Marvin KALB, CBS, reports from Vienna on the KISSINGER-GROMYKO meeting and on expected issues and the American hard line stance following Indochina losses. He also, MUDD, reports the Senate's action in passing a bill to end the arms cutoff to Turkey, and that the House is debating action on a $32 billion weapons bill.

Harry REASONER and Ted KOPPEL, ABC News, report on the KISSINGER-GROMYKO talks in Vienna, on the cautious atmosphere and on the issues to be discussed. Bill ZIMMERMAN, CBS, has a report on the Egyptian armed forces since the 1973 war and Egypt's willingness for either peace or war vis a vis Israel. Howard K. SMITH and Tom JARRIEL, ABC, report on Mayaguez casualties. JARRIEL reports that the White House is annoyed with Pentagon delay in releasing casualty figures and on the defense of the operation by the White House in attacking Cambodian facilities on the mainland. Lou CIOFFI, ABC, reports on the current status of USAID officials and programs in Laos and that the Pathet Lao will accept U.S. AID money but not supervision. SMITH reports on Senate action regarding Turkey. REASONER reports on the smoothing over of relations with Thailand. SMITH comments on adverse reactions by some Americans to the military action taken by the U.S. to free the Mayaguez. He gives his reasons for the necessity of the operation; freedom of the seas; possible imprisonment of the crew and the failure of diplomatic channels.

Mayaguez Casualties

JOHN CHANCELLOR: Good evening. President FORD was described today as somewhat puzzled about the delays in the final casualty count in the Mayaguez rescue operation, but the White House also said there has been no attempt to hide any bad news. At the Pentagon a spokesman said getting accurate figures isn't easy and there was a sharp drop in today's estimate of wounded men which yesterday was 70 or 80. Today the Pentagon listed only 49 as seriously wounded. Others had injuries such as broken ankles or bruises. Here's the latest on the casualties from Charles Quinn at the Pentagon.

CHARLES QUINN: The Pentagon announced today the latest casualty figures; five dead, 16 missing, 49 wounded. These figures have changed several times since Wednesday, the day of the attack. Each time the Pentagon cautioned that the figures were incomplete, subject to change. The total is much higher now than first reported. At a briefing today reporters asked Pentagon spokesman Joseph LAITIN why it's taking so long to get a final casualty list.

SECRETARY JOSEPH LAITIN: I don't think that there's been any undue delay. We have tried to get you the casualty list just as fast as is humanly possible once the smoke of battle cleared away. All I can tell you is that we have done our utmost, that we have held back nothing.

QUINN: LAITIN said the figures came slowly because troops were spread out over several ships, that getting an accurate picture is complicated. But many people here at the Pentagon aren't buying that, they say they are puzzled, they say they simply don't understand what's taking so long. Even today's figures are not final, those are expected tomorrow. Charles Quinn, NBC News, at the Pentagon.

CHANCELLOR: Of the 16 missing men the White House said today that there are no indications any of them was taken prisoner. And the names of three of the five men killed were released today: 2nd Lt. Richard VANDEGEER (?) of Bucklin, Mass. of the Air Force; Air Force Staff Sergeant Elwood E. RUMBAU of Doffen, Alabama; and Marine Lance Corporal Ashton N. LONEY of Albany, New York.

In the meantime some of the dead mens' comrades were telling some of the story of the Mayaguez operation to the press. Lou Allison has that story from the Philippines.

LOU ALLISON: A Marine general and the Colonel in charge of the beach landing itself described the fighting to reporters but they refused to answer questions on why that particular island was attacked or why the bombing of the mainland continued after the civilian crewmen were released. The officers brought two wounded Marines with them to the news conference. They confirmed the new, higher casualty figures and said there was little hope that any of the 13 missing men might be alive. The battallion commander Lt. Colonel Randall AUSTIN of Glenside, Pennsylvania said his men met heavier resistance than he'd expected, but said they'd killed about 25 of the enemy.

LT. COLONEL RANDALL AUSTIN: Oh it was certainly very heavy combat. It was a rather classic heliborne assault, I think, in which unfortunately we encountered very heavy fire from the ground. Indeed there was very, very much close combat. I have several reports from my officers and men that were on the ground that there were many instances where the enemy had in fact thrown hand grenades in at our people and they had picked them up and thrown them back.

ALLISON: The Colonel said he thought most of the American casualties occurred in helicopter crashes. Sergeant Victor SALINAS of Corpus Christi, Texas and Corporal R. J. HUGHES of Louisville, Kentucky were both burned when their helicopter was hit and exploded.

SERGT. VICTOR SALINAS: It was just a big ball of fire. The pilot managed to put the bird down. After we got down most of the people started getting out -- as it was just a big ball of flame and inside the helicopter was all pitch black smoke.

ALLISON: After the news conference HUGHES and SALINAS were awarded their Purple Heart medals. Other wounded Marines and the rest of the attack force are due to arrive here soon aboard the carrier Coral Sea. Lou Allison, NBC News, Subic Bay, the Philippines.

CHANCELLOR: And from Bangkok today came word that our troubles with the government of Thailand are over, at least temporarily. The United States today formally regretted a misunderstanding through which over 1,000 Marines were sent to Thailand without the Thai government being told in the Mayaguez affair. The regrets, which were short of an apology, were accepted, although the Thai Premier Kukrit PRAMOJ still wants to renegotiate all of the treaties with the United States.

DECLASSIFIED

SALT Talks

CHANCELLOR: Secretary of State Henry KISSINGER and Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei GROMYKO sat down today together in Vienna for two days of talks devoted to detente, strategic nuclear weapons, the Middle East and other matters effecting both super powers. KISSINGER told reporters, I think we'll make some progress here. The atmosphere was friendly and as Richard Valeriani reports from Vienna, this meeting is one in which atmosphere may be as important as substance.

RICHARD VALERIANI: GROMYKO arrived today and went to KISSINGER's hotel for a later afternoon meeting and a working dinner. They had an extra long handshake for the benefit of photographers before going inside to begin talking about American-Soviet negotiations on limiting offensive nuclear weapons. The negotiations are apparently stalled on the problem of counting multiple warhead missiles once they're deployed. But the American side is confident the problem of verification and other technical difficulties will be worked out in time for a FORD-BREZHNEV summit this fall. Today's agenda also included a discussion of the long dragged out European Security Conference which is likely to end with an East-West summit meeting of 35 heads of government sometime this summer. KISSINGER and GROMYKO came to Vienna this time rather than going to Geneva, their usual meeting place, because Geneva is too closely identified with the Middle East peace conference, something which the Russians are pushing but which the Americans are still trying to finesse. The two men will have a chance to renew their disagreement over the Middle East during tomorrow's talks. Nothing concrete is expected to result from these meetings, at least not immediately. But in light of the recent setbacks to American foreign policy around the world, the atmospherics here will probably be as important as the substance. Richard Valeriani, NBC News, in Vienna.

Ban On Turkey Lifted Seen Possible

CHANCELLOR: Back in Washington the Senate voted today to end its three month old ban on military aid to Turkey. The bill went to the House where its prospects are seen as uncertain. Catherine Mackin has the story on today's Senate action.

CATHERINE MACKIN: The purpose of the White House in asking for a vote now on this controversial issue was to strengthen the hands of President FORD and Henry KISSINGER in their meetings later this month with the leaders of Greece and Turkey. Those opposed to this aid say the Senate vote this close without a majority in favor cannot be counted as the moral victory the White House wanted. The administration has pressed hard to have the aid restored, some say the lobbying has been intense.

MAN: Now they're running all through the halls of the Senate, as they run saying, win this for Henry. Henry's had a tough way to go in Vietnam he may have to give back his peace prize. He's had difficulty in his shuttle diplomacy in the Middle East. He needs a victory, win this for Henry. Well that's a lot of hokum.

MAN: I don't think anybody's out to win this for Henry KISSINGER, I think that the question is what's in the national interest. And I think this is the way Secretary KISSINGER views things. So that is the essential and fundamental reason why I think we should vote for this bill.

MACKIN: Aid to Turkey is given virtually no chance of passing in the House unless Turkey relents and provides some humanitarian relief to the people of Cyprus. So the White House is not pressing for a vote this week in the House, because if it did it would fail. Catherine Mackin, NBC News, Washington.

News From Vietnam

CHANCELLOR: ...these reports today out of South Vietnam and Saigon. The people of Saigon celebrated the 85th birthday of Ho Chi MINH, the hero of North Vietnam. Vietcong officials executed a criminal in public but spared two other accused men when a court asked that they be released. Two ships docked in Saigon today, one carried hundreds of political prisoners held by the old government on Con Son island, the other was a Navy vessel carrying sailors who fled when the old regime fell and who are returning voluntarily.

Refugee News

CHANCELLOR: President FORD named a 17 member committee today to advise the government on refugee resettlement. The committee will be headed by John

Mayaguez Aftermath; Casualties

ROGER MUDD: Good evening. Five days after the American invasion of Tang island to rescue the freighter Mayaguez the United States still does not know how many men it lost. The Pentagon said today it will have a preliminary final count by tomorrow, the White House promises it will not hide any bad news. Ike Pappas brings us up to date now on the Pentagon's latest casualty figures.

IKE PAPPAS: The Pentagon has revised downward to 49 the number of wounded in the Mayaguez recovery. There has been confusion over the number of casualties. Immediately after the battle the Pentagon listed one dead and eight wounded. The next day 13 missing were added and the wounded figure went to 22. Yesterday Defense Secretary SCHLESINGER revealed five were killed, 16 missing and between 70 and 80 wounded. Today the Pentagon cut the wounded figure back to 49, explaining SCHLESINGER was counting even slight injuries such as sprained ankles. Of the 16 missing 13 are believed to have been aboard a helicopter that crashed at sea. The Pentagon does not hold out much hope that they're alive. Three of the five confirmed dead were identified today. They are Air Force 2nd Lt. Richard VANDEGEER of Bucklin, Mass.; Air Force Staff Sergeant Elwood RUMBAUG of Delton, Alabama; and Marine Lance Corporal Ashton LONEY of Albany, N.Y. President FORD and others have been concerned over the Pentagon's slowness regarding the number of casualties. Charges have been raised that the Pentagon was attempting to make the operation appear better than it really was in terms of losses. Spokesman Joseph LAITIN denied the charges.

SECRETARY LAITIN: Statement same as Quinn report on NBC Nightly News.

PAPPAS: LAITIN confirmed none of the bodies of the five dead Americans has been recovered, the body of at least one Marine killed-in-action was left behind on Tang island because of heavy enemy gunfire during the nighttime withdrawal. It was the second time in the past month that American Marines have failed to return with their dead. The two American Marines killed in the attack on Tansonnhut Airport in the final hours just before the American evacuation of Saigon were also left behind. The State Department is attempting to recover American dead from Saigon and from Tang island. Ike Pappas, CBS News, the Pentagon.

MUDD: At Subic Bay, the U.S. Naval base in the Philippines, the commander of the Marine assault force on Tang island recounted today what happened. Keith Kay reports.

KEITH KAY: The press conference was limited in scope, only the direct involvement of the Marine Corps was discussed. On hand was the commanding officer of the Marine security force, who described the battle on Koh-Tang island.

LT. COLONEL AUSTIN: Every helicopter that came in received heavy small arms and machine gun fire. And the troops that -- the enemy troops that -- had moved in very close to ours and our perimeter were bringing a very high volume of fire on our troops. It was being returned and their was a considerable exchange of hand grenades along the line at that period of time.

KAY: In all about 210 Marines were involved in the operation on Koh-Tang island. Two of the wounded Marines were at the press conference. They never made it to the island, their helicopter was shot down just yards from the beach as they flew in on the initial assault.

MARINE: When the helicopter caught flames there was just a big ball of fire. The pilot managed to put the bird down. Anyway after I made my way out through the window I could see most of the bodies -- not bodies but most of the Marines -- already swimming out towards the sea. We got so spread out to a point that for awhile I thought I was the only one out there. I understand myself and others were in the sea swimming for about three and a half hours when we made our way up to the destroyer. Afterward we learned that there were 13 Marines altogether that got picked up and were safely onboard.

LT. COL. AUSTIN (?): These young Marines were just -- you know their training and they want to get out and do their job. At the risk of sounding like warmonger, I think it has an elixer on the morale.

KAY: After the press conference the commanding general of the 3rd Marine Division, Maj. General Kenneth J. HORTON, pinned Purple Hearts on the two wounded enlisted men. Keith Kay, CBS News, Subic Bay, Philippines.

MUDD: As Ike PAPPAS reported, one of those killed in the U.S. invasion was 27 year old Air Force Lt. Richard VANDEGEER. Reporter Paul Hayes of Hartford station WFSB talked today with the airman's father.

PAUL HAYES: High in the Berchires along the Mohawk trail is a home Lt. VANDEGEER has never seen. His father is there though, where he remembers his 27 year old son as a professional but very much an individual.

MR. VANDEGEER: Well he was always a A student in high school, graduated with honors -- which, of course, when he went to college --Ohio State by the way -- he thought he knew it all. So after two years he went into the Army and he became a Warrant officer, helicopter pilot. And he's always been very good at school, in school, and very bright.

HAYES: What was your reaction when you heard this?

MR. VANDEGEER: Well my reaction at first of all of course as a father I didn't believe it because Richard not only went through very stringent training and exacting training -- and by the way he was also a champion type swimmer -- so the first thing I heard when he went into the water, I thought well there's no problem some 16 year old Khmer Rouge probably has him under gunpoint by now. But that was not so.

MUDD: In response to Thailand's demand for an apology over the use of a Thai base in the Mayaguez rescue the United States instead today sent its regrets. It was an unsigned note which expressed regret for any misunderstandings and promised future respect of Thailand's sovereignty and independence. Thailand said it considers this an apology and a Thai official declared the case is closed.

Pentagon and Refugees

MUDD: The Pentagon said today it plans to open a fourth Vietnamese refugee center, this one at Indiantown Gap, Pennsylvania. Meanwhile President FORD named a special committee, serving without pay, to give advice on resettling refugees.

SALT Talks

MUDD: In Vienna today Secretary of State KISSINGER and Soviet Foreign Minister GROMYKO began two days of talks on nuclear arms negotiations and the Middle East. More on the story from Marvin Kalb.

MARVIN KALB: KISSINGER had just taken his wife Nancy to one of those famous Viennese luncheons topped by chocolate cake and whipped cream when he came upon an example of middle America in middle Europe, a Yankee tourist bellowing out his pride at the way the U.S. used its power to recover the merchant ship Mayaguez. But even as KISSINGER, sitting in dark shadow, watched a performance of the high strutting horses of the Spanish Riding School he seemed preoccupied by Indochina, by the obvious problems of Soviet-American relations. Clearly the bloom is off detente. After a courtesy call on Austrian Chancellor KREISKY a reporter asked: Are your expectations high for this GROMYKO meeting? No, began KISSINGER's cautious response.

SECRETARY KISSINGER: No, we have a number of problems to review and I hope to make some progress.

KALB: The usual handshakes preceded this meeting, their first since the American debacle in Vietnam. But their smiles were thin. Tonight they focus for the most part on the strategic arms negotiations now deadlocked over the issue of verification. KISSINGER wants to break the deadlock, apparently GROMYKO does too, both sides looking towards final agreement if possible by the time Soviet leader BREZHNEV visits President FORD this fall. More important perhaps than any one issue, KISSINGER wants to disabuse the Russians of one dangerous notion, that because of recent American setbacks in Indochina the U.S. has become a kind of paper tiger. Overall, therefore KISSINGER is stressing a reasonably hard line in policy, backed up by that show last week of American military strength during the Mayaguez episode. Marvin Kalb, CBS News, Vienna.

Senate Votes To Lift Ban on Turkey

MUDD: By a margin of one vote, 41-to-40, the Senate today approved a bill lifting the ban on U.S. military aid to Turkey, a move aimed at freeing Secretary KISSINGER's hands in dealing with the problem of Cyprus. The measure now goes to the House.

Kissinger-Gromyko Talks

HARRY REASONER: There's a lot of information available today about what Henry and Nancy KISSINGER had for lunch and who led who into the room for the first Vienna sessions between Secretary KISSINGER and Soviet Foreign Minister GROMYKO. That's what reporters send back to the home folks when they haven't got much substantive to report. While not much yet to report, there's considerable weight to the meeting. From Vienna Ted Koppel talks about that.

TED KOPPEL: There is a limited choice of neutral countries in Europe. KISSINGER wanted to avoid Switzerland this time around because it calls to mind the Geneva Conference on the Middle East which the United States still hopes to bypass. So the choice was Vienna, KISSINGER arriving last night, GROMYKO this morning. The scheduled agenda focuses on the European Security Conference, the effort to get a new strategic arms limitation agreement and the smoldering powder keg in the Middle East. For most of today, however, KISSINGER was a visible study in nonchalance, visiting Vienna's famous Spanish Riding School in the morning and then escorting his wife Nancy to lunch at one of the more renowned restaurants in town. The animated chatter that preceded this afternoon's first meeting masked an ominous undercurrent to these talks. This is the first high level Soviet-American meeting since the fall of Cambodia and South Vietnam and KISSINGER is determined to leave no doubt whatsoever in GROMYKO's mind about the continuing forcefullness of American intentions. The overriding atmosphere of caution gives little promise of spectacular diplomacy. And so over tea and cookies at the Imperial Hotel, KISSINGER and GROMYKO launched a discussion the results of which won't become visible for weeks to come. Neither side is expecting a breakthrough in either the SALT talks or in the agonizingly slow process towards peace in the Middle East. But these talks are essential nevertheless to restore momentum to the SALT negotiations which stalled a couple of weeks ago in Geneva and to the Middle East peace talks which are now a necessity looking for a forum. This is Ted Koppel, ABC News, Vienna.

Report On Egyptian Forces

HOWARD K. SMITH: The most visible evidence that Egypt expects peace with Israel is the reopened Suez Canal and the return of Egyptian civilians to live there. But Egypt is also prepared if things turn out differently. ABC's Bill Zimmerman has details.

BILL ZIMMERMAN: The reopening of the Suez Canal and the resettlement of the Canal cities is a high stakes gamble by Egypt's President Anwar SADAT, a gamble on peace and failing that on Egyptian soldiers and pilots, a gamble that the Egyptian Air Force has learned the lessons of 1967 when Egypt was caught by surprise and lost most of its planes on the ground. Now Egypt's bases are well camouflaged, the MIG-21s are concealed in concrete shelters. Many of the pilots have combat experience and those who have shot down U.S. made Phantoms of the Israeli Air Force are highly regarded. As it did with Egypt as a whole, the 1973 war restored much of the confidence and self esteem of the Egyptian Air Force. On the Sinai SADAT is gambling on the army which sits on gains made in 1973 when it crossed the canal and overran the Bar Elav line. Most of the Sinai remains in front of the Egyptian soldiers but the canal, vitally important militarily and economically, is behind. The morale of the army was greatly improved by the advances made in '73 but there remains a general acceptance that the job is not finished.

PRESIDENT ANWAR SADAT: We have a mission to defend the canal -- I mean to defend our people in the main cities in the canal and to secure the unification in the canal and we'll do it. And also we have another mission, to liberate our land and we will do it, sooner or later, by peace or by war.

ZIMMERMAN: It is here that SADAT's gamble will be decided and his future and that of Egypt will be determined. SADAT has cast his lot for peace by his decision to reopen the canal and to resettle the canal cities. But at the same time he has made it clear that if his land is not returned to him peacefully there will be sooner or later another Middle East war. Bill Zimmerman, ABC News, on the Sinai.

Mayaguez Casualties

SMITH: The Marine Major General who commanded the assault on Cambodia's Tang island in the Mayaguez incident hailed the operation today as a success inspite of heavy casualties. At the risk of sounding like a warmonger, said Maj. Gen. Kenneth HORTON, I would describe it as an elixer for morale. The Pentagon today released the names of three of the Americans killed-in-action in the Mayaguez fight. Those listed were: Air Force 2nd Lt. Richard VANDGEER of Bucklin Mass.; Air Force Staff Sergeant Elwood RUMBAU of Dauphin, Alabama; and Lance Corporal Ashton LONEY of Albany, N.Y. Today the Pentagon said its toll from the incident for the time being, in its words, is five dead, 16 missing and 49 wounded. But it will have what was called a preliminary final count tomorrow. Meanwhile the White House indicated that President FORD is not happy with the way the Pentagon has been handling those casualty figures. ABC White House correspondent Tom Jarriel reports.

TOM JARRIEL: The Commander-in-Chief is said to be frustrated, a military that can fire from a speeding jet fighter with precision 15 feet in front of a moving Cambodian patrol boat can't seem to account for its troops. The President like the press is asking for the final casualty figures, but not getting anything more than revised tentative, incomplete ones. The delay prompted questions from reporters about a possible coverup. White House news secretary Ron Nessen says they aren't trying to hide the casualties or attempting to conceal the bad news. Nessen also continues to defend the heavy use of military strikes ordered by the President, described among advisers as equivalency plus. It was overkill to bomb the Cambodian oil facilities after the ship and its crew were released, according to the President's spokesman, because the Cambodian ships and planes might have used that fuel in a counterattack. As far as Marines landing on the wrong island, the President's spokesman says, hindsight is always 20-20. After spurring the military to complete their casualty count the President today turned to another problem, the resettling of the tens of thousands of Vietnamese refugees. He signed an order establishing a 17 member advisory commission to work toward integrating the Vietnamese into American life. Tom Jarriel, ABC News, at the White House.

REASONER: The United States today sent a note to Thailand expressing regret over the use of Thailand based Marines in the Mayaguez rescue. The note was taken as a formal apology by Thailand, thus easing the diplomatic crisis between Washington and Thailand.

U.S. AID In Laos

REASONER: In Savannakhet, Laos about a dozen Americans, mostly AID officials and their dependents, remain,under a kind of limited house arrest. The student demonstrators holding the Americans say they will let them go if some provincial officials are ousted and if U.S. AID programs are stopped. Lou Cioffi has a report on American assistance to Laos and the people who administer it.

LOU CIOFFI: Vientiane's modern childrens' clinic is only one example of American aid that's been given to Laos through its various programs, and this year alone another $30 million in economic help is slated for this country. But against the background of what happened in Cambodia and Vietnam, this kind of help is being forgotten. For the Communists the AID program is a symbol of American presence in the area. There are 1,200 Americans here right now, of this number 715 are government employees and their dependents. In the housing areas outside of Vientiane there's no sign of any crisis or panic, life there just could not seem more normal.

WOMAN: In circumstances like this where people aren't sure what's going on we get nervous. But in fact we have had reassurances from the Prime Minister, from (unintelligible) that there is no reason for us to panic, so we're not panicking.

CIOFFI: While there's no evacuation as such, the United States has started to cut down on the number of USAID and other government employees here. The Pathet Lao, which has just about taken over the country, says it will accept American aid but without American supervision on how it's spent. American officials here doubt that Congress back home would ever agree to simply sending a check to Laos. And so the American AID program and the Americans who run it are going to stay here in Laos for the time being simply because no one has asked them to leave. This is Lou Cioffi, ABC News, Vientiane.

up the vote is considered mainly a gesture of support to Secretary of State KISSINGER's Cyprus diplomacy when he visits Turkey later this week.

Comment: Howard K. Smith

SMITH: The Mayaguez incident was remarkable, but not as remarkable as the reaction or overreaction to it since it ended. It's a little out of proportion for the administration to jubilate about victory over a not quite fifth rate power. But criticism of the administration for what it did is downright ridiculous. A page of letters to the editor in the Washington Post today slams the U.S. for bullying a small nation. And Mr. Anthony LEWIS, in a column in the New York Times, makes the same charge. Well the operation, it seems to me, was simple matter-of-fact necessity. The Cambodians seized a merchant ship in normal shipping lanes on the high seas. They did not answer our demand that the ship be released. Both to save the crew and to sustain the principle of freedom of the seas we had to act with very little information and quickly, before the crew could be dispersed to confinement and rescue would be impossible. Mr. LEWIS said we should have waited for diplomacy to work. Well in the Pueblo case we did and condemned its crew to 11 months of unendurable physical torture. Some have suspected the ship of having an intelligence mission. That has proved wrong, but what if it did, such operations are normal. Russian trawlers hover constantly three miles off our shores checking ship movements and radar. When they occasionally -- which is rather often -- stray in close the normal procedure is not to seize them but to conduct them back out. What the Cambodians did was 100 percent wrong, what the U.S. did was right, but it was only right not great.

CBS MORNING NEWS CBS TV

Mayaguez Incident

BRUCE MORTON: Freeing the Mayaguez cost more than we thought at first. Secretary of Defense James SCHLESINGER said on ABC's Issues and Answers that five U.S. servicemen were killed during the rescue effort, 16 others are still missing and 70 or 80 more were wounded, many of them only slightly. The Secretary said it took a long time to get the casualty figures because, "there had been a number of choppers that had been down, we were running a muster onboard the ships in order to assess the damage, we attempted to get out the results as they became clear." SCHLESINGER said that even these new casualty figures are not final.

Betty FORD told UPI that the casualties were what bothered the President. He was upset about the casualties, Mrs. FORD said, he had hoped that they could pull it off without any casualties but it was the fact that they had to save those men who were on the ship. They just felt the only thing they could do was go in.

Interview With Macomber

HUGHES RUDD: The current U.S. Ambassador to Turkey is William MACOMBER and Toki Roberts had a talk with him about Turkish and U.S. relations the other day.

AMBASSADOR WILLIAM MACOMBER: They feel that they've been our friends for many years, back to the days of Korea and before they've stood with us and they've depended heavily on us and they've served us well. And they've depended heavily on us in the sense that they've got all of their military equipment from us. And they think this hand of friendship that they have been extended to each other -- suddenly our hand's at their throat and we're suffocating their military strength. Now if you look where Turkey sits vis a vis the Soviet Union they just can't stand that.

ROBERTS: Is this process reversible, this damage to our bilateral relations?

AMBASSADOR MACOMBER: Yeah, that's -- you bet it is. This is a time of great danger out here and it's a great mistake to get into what is really sort of a family fight. The Turks and the Greeks who always do better when they have good relations. Their interests are advanced when they have good relations and history shows that and their interests are undermined when they don't.

U.S. FORCES left Cambodian territory after freeing a seized ship and its crew.

Navy and Air Force helicopters, operating under cover of darkness and a barrage from U.S. planes and destroyers, plucked about 200 Marines from Koh Tang island off Cambodia 14 hours after they went in to retrieve a vessel the Cambodians seized Monday. Although the ship and all 39 of its American crewmen were rescued, at least one U.S. servicemen died in the military effort and many were wounded.

The operation was widely hailed as a success that strengthened America's world image following the Vietnam debacle, as well as lifting military morale and aiding President Ford politically.

Reaction to the operation in most Western capitals was favorable, although it was criticized by some French, Lebanese and Danish newspapers. The Soviet news agency Tass reported it without comment, while China, which the U.S. had hoped would intercede with the Cambodians on American behalf, called the sinking of three Cambodian gunboats an act of piracy.

The U.S. bombed an airfield on the Cambodian mainland just about the time the 39 crewmen were delivered to a U.S. destroyer by a small fishing boat flying white flags. The raid was ordered to prevent Cambodia from reinforcing the troops it had on Koh Tang while the Marines were there.

The seized merchant ship, the Mayaguez, left the Gulf of Thailand early yesterday under its own power, heading for Singapore. Its crew may be flown back to the U.S.

Thousands of Thai demonstrators burned an effigy of President Ford, and Premier Kukrit Pramoj said his government is reviewing its relations with the U.S., although they won't be broken. The hostility stems from the Pentagon's flying 1,100 Marines into a U.S. base Wednesday without notifying the Thais. The U.S. is removing the last of those Marines to an aircraft carrier.

South Vietnam's new government said it's willing to establish diplomatic ties with the U.S. but wants Algeria to handle its affairs in Washington for now. In Hanoi, North Vietnamese officials acknowledged at a victory celebration that their troops had fought in the south.

Marines lifted from island; casualties of siege unknown

By CHARLES W CORDDRY
Washington Bureau of the Sun

Washington—Approximately 200 marines were lifted off Tang Island early yesterday in helicopters, under protection of aircraft and naval gunfire, as United States forces successfully ended a 14-hour operation to rescue an American merchant ship and its crew that were seized by the Cambodian Communists Monday

At a late hour yesterday the Pentagon still was unable to provide complete information on casualties in the Thailand Gulf operation, which President Ford set in motion Wednesday after diplomacy failed to regain the ship and 39-man crew

Officials said, on the basis of fragmentary reports from the several ships and bases involved, that one marine was known to have been killed and one Air Force man might have died

The Pentagon denied reports that 14 men were listed as missing It said they had been in a downed helicopter but had been rescued

A relatively large number of the marines who landed apparently were wounded and were being treated aboard ships after being rescued by helicopter Five Air Force helicopters were destroyed or damaged by Cambodian small arms fire in taking marines into the island

There were no reports of combat plane losses either in attacks on the island or in strikes on Ream Airfield near the Cambodian port of Kompong Som.

The merchant ship Mayaguez, boarded by 48 marines at 8.30 A.M Wednesday, was under way with its full crew aboard by 4.40 A.M yesterday, en route to Singapore

There still was some mystery about the whereabouts of the ship's crew during its captivity and the manner in which

WASHINGTON, May 15 — Under the cover of aerial and naval gunfire, 200 marines were lifted by helicopters today off an island in the Gulf of Siam, completing the military rescue of an American merchant ship and crew that had been seized by Cambodian forces.

There was no immediate information from the Defense Department on casualties suffered in the 14-hour operation. Pentagon officials said they appeared to be light despite the sometimes stiff resistance encountered on Tang Island.

Pentagon sources said one marine and one Air Force man had been killed and eight marines and six Air Force helicopter crewmen were missing. But a Defense Department spokesman said that thus far there had been only one verified casualty—a marine killed by small-arms fire on the island.

In addition, an unspecified number of wounded were being treated aboard Navy ships.

Ford, staff relieved at ship success

By PETER J. KUMPA
Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—The White House yesterday reflected President Ford's satisfaction that the difficult military operation to rescue the Mayaguez and its crew from Cambodian captivity had gone well.

The mood was one of a sense of relief The crisis atmosphere of three days faded quickly with the arrival of the shah of Iran, and Mr Ford plunged into the diplomatic problems of another part of the world.

Ronald H. Nessen, the presidential press secretary, issued figures showing that the flow of telephone calls and telegrams was in heavy support of Mr Ford's decision to use force to rescue the American merchant vessel.

In a 2½-day period from the time of the capture of the Mayaguez to the release of its crew, the White House received 4,171 telegrams and letters backing strong action by President Ford. About 520 messages opposed tough action.

Telephone calls indicated even greater support for the President. There were 1,978 backing Mr Ford's actions and only 157 against them. Another 4,000 telegrams were stacked up and had not been sorted.

With heavy congressional backing, the President was emerging from the incident as a leader who had succeeded in making very difficult choices But a White House spokesman brushed aside any questions on whether the Cambodian incident had elevated Mr Ford's political status. With final casualty tolls still to come, this seemed an inappropriate line of questioning.

If the White House was reluctant to discuss politics at such a time, Hugh Scott (R., Pa.), the Senate minority leader, was willing to say bluntly that the Ford prestige had been greatly enhanced.

Senator Scott told a news conference that he was reaffirming his support of a 1976 ticket of President Ford and Vice President Rockefeller.

"This can only elevate him," the senator said about Mr Ford.

Asked if taking military action might hurt the President against such a possible primary challenger as Ronald Reagan, the former California governor, Mr Scott argued that, "on the contrary, it shows we have the man we need. It can only enhance his standing."

But even with the military operation over, there remained some blank areas and some critical unanswered questions.

According to Mr Nessen, the White House was never certain whether the Cambodians received its demand for the quick release of the ship and its crew. He said there was simply "no response" and denied that the call amounted to a 24-hour ultimatum.

Mr Nessen said he could not be certain that the diplomats of the People's Republic of China had even passed along Mr Ford's demands. State Department sources indicated otherwise.

A question remained whether quicker communications might have averted some of the military action. A Cambodian broadcast that began at 7:07 P.M. (Washington time) Wednesday and ended at 7:26 P.M. was not summarized and translated into English until 8:06 P.M. It offered to surrender the ship, though it did not mention the crew.

At 8:15 P.M., the message reached the White House. It was another 14 minutes before the Secretary of State, Henry A. Kissinger, could pass the word to Mr Ford.

The problem was that the Cambodian message was on the domestic service. Was it purely a local advisory to the Cambodian people or an advisory to the Americans?

Back came a quick reply by President Ford through news channels and broadcasts that the ship had already been seized but welcoming the development.

The problem was that the marines were engaged almost at the start of the broadcast. Still, the final air strikes against the airfield at Ream did not come until 10:57 P.M., 16 minutes before operations were called off.

RESCUE -- CONTINUED

craft on Monday, drew general praise from members of Congress. There was some criticism that Mr. Ford should have consulted more with Congress before ordering the operation.

Acting in compliance with a provision of the War Powers Resolution that requires the President to report to the Congress within 48 hours of the initial commitment of troops to hostilities, Mr. Ford sent a letter to representatives of Carl Albert, Speaker of the House of Representatives, and James O. Eastland, president pro tempore of the Senate, at about 2:30 A.M. today. Congressional leaders had received White House briefings earlier.

Schlesinger Lauds Move

Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger, at an early-morning news conference at the Pentagon, described the rescue as "an eminently successful operation incorporating the judicious and effective use of American force for purposes that were necessary for the well-being of this society."

In a statement, Mr. Schlesinger said the operation "represents a much needed and timely reaffirmation of the freedom of the seas."

"Moreover, it represents a firm and measured response to the high-handed and crude use of force," he added. "To countenance such an act would mean the weakening of international order and civilized communication."

Privately, key Administration officials described the operation as a warning to North Korea and other Communist nations that the United States, in the wake of the Vietnam war, still stood ready to meet force with force to protect its interests.

The operation which included a strike by 25 Navy carrier planes against the Ream air base near Sihanoukville, was ordered by President Ford at about 5:30 P.M. yesterday after he had concluded that diplomatic efforts were futile.

The 200 marines were lifted by helicopter from the U Taphao anr base in Thailand to secure Tang Island before boarding of the Mayagüez, anchored a mile offshore. When a platoon of marines an hour later boarded the ship from the destroyer Harold E. Holt, they found the ship deserted.

Crew Returns to Ship

The Defense Department had assumed that some of the crew members might be held on the island. But all 39 seamen appeared last night in a small boat manned by five Thai fishermen who had come from the port of Sihanoukville, 30 miles away.

The crew members were taken aboard by the destroyer Henry B. Wilson and then transferred to their ship.

The Mayagüez, under its own power, set sail at 7:30 A.M., eastern daylight time for Singapore. Charles T. Miller, captain of the ship, sent a message to Mr. Ford that said:

"Dear Mr. President, the captain and officers and crew of the S.S. Mayagüez thank you and all the brave military forces who are fighting and dying to save our lives."

The marines ran into unexpectedly stiff opposition in its helicopter assault on Tang Island. Initial intelligence, according to military officials, was that only about 20 persons, mostly old, were on the island.

Instead, the marines encountered a Cambodian force estimated at 150 men. The presumption of Pentagon officials was that the Cambodian Government had moved in the forces in anticipation of an American military assault.

Recovery is Swift

The original plan had been to send in additional marines to occupy the entire island, which is three miles long and two miles wide. When the Mayagüez was recovered more quickly than expected, the 200 marines, who had advanced a few hundred yards into the island, stopped their advance and consolidated into a beachhead.

The withdrawal of the marines, which was completed at 9:10 A.M. Eastern daylight time, was delayed for several hours as the Cambodians drove off the helicopters trying to make their way to the island. Finally two Navy destroyers laid down protective fire and Navy attack planes conducted straffing runs to hold down the Cambodian troops.

The marines were flown to the carrier Coral Sea, lying 10 miles off the island, and then transferred by helicopter to U Taphao air base to rejoin 900 marines being held in reserve. Because of Thai objections, the Pentagon plans called for the entire Marine force, flown in Monday from Okinawa, to be removed from Thailand.

In the initial assault on Tang Island, three Air Force helicopters were shot down and two others were damaged, but managed to make their way back to Thailand.

The loss or disabling of the five helicopters provided a serious handicap in the withdrawal. The Air Force had started with only 11 helicopters to support the operation. For the withdrawal it was left with six helicopters, each capable of carrying about 25 marines on the four-hour round trip to U Taphad.

Early in the morning, a debate went on in the Pentagon over whether to use the six helicopters to withdraw the marines in two stages. This would have meant that after the first flight, 100 marines would have been left on the island for four hours, facing a Cambodian force of 150 men.

It was decided to wait four hours until the Coral Sea, with three additional helicopters, reached the area. In addition, this meant that the marines could be quickly shuttled out to the carrier.

The vulnerability of the helicopter force was also cited by Pentagon officials as one reason for ordering the air strike against the Ream base, which had a few American-built T-28 jet trainers. Officials feared that the T-28's might be used to try to shoot down some of the helicopters.

In the air attack, planes from the Coral Sea destroyed 17 aircraft, bombed the runway, and destroyed a hangar, Pentagon officials reported.

Mr Ford's reasons for ordering these strikes were simple.

He was quoted as saying that "I would never have forgiven myself" if an estimated 2,400 Cambodian troops in Sihanoukville had been able to take to available amphibian craft and attack the marines on the island 30 miles from shore.

The risk for such an attack may not have been great, but Mr Nessen explained that it was an anguished decision by the President and one that he felt could not be avoided. The press spokesman said that Mr. Ford felt it was "too great a risk not to have this supportive action on the mainland."

Still, it was not totally clear whether, had communications been swifter, the military action might have ended sooner.

The communications gap may have been too narrow in this case. But there was still no complete explanation why the Mayaguez had not been told that a Swedish and a Korean ship had been fired upon recently in the same area, while four other ships had also been stopped by the new Cambodian Communist authorities.

Admiral, Ex-POW, Plans to Retire

NORFOLK, Va., May 15 (AP)—Rear Adm. Jeremiah Denton, who led the return of U.S. prisoners of war from Hanoi two years ago, announced today he is retiring from the Navy.

Denton told friends earlier that he began thinking about leaving the Navy when the South Vietnamese government began to fall. In a speech today at the Armed Forces Staff College, where he is commandant, Denton avoided mention of South Vietnam.

Denton, 50, spent 7½ years as a prisoner of the North Vietnamese and was awarded the Navy Cross for enduring extreme torture during his imprisonment.

After his release, he made a brief speech ending with "God Bless America" after stepping from a U.S. plane at Clark Air Force Base in the Philippines.

MARINES ... CONT'D

he Cambodians released the 39 men It appeared from statements of Pentagon officials that the crewmen were taken from the Mayaguez and kept for a day on Tang Island, 60 miles from the Cambodian shore.

They then were taken to Kompong Som, possibly aboard a gunboat that was spared in attacks by American planes Wednesday that sank three others From the port they were moved, it was reported, to a small island just off the coast, where they were when the U S. military operation was launched last night

The Cambodians put them aboard a fishing vessel manned by five Thais and sent them toward U.S Navy ships, with white flags displayed, when the American attacks started

The destroyer Wilson picked up the crew just after 10.45 P M., just 24 minutes before aircraft, already airborne, struck the Cambodian mainland itself

If controversy grows out of the military operation, it seems likely to center on whether the air strikes should or could have been called off at that late moment They were launched from the carrier Coral Sea in a move described by the White House and Pentagon as designed to cripple Cambodian planes that might have menaced the helicopter or other operations.

Informed sources described them also as a major part of the overall American design to demonstrate national will in the face of a challenge to freedom of the seas.

President Ford, elated by the operation's success, went on television at about 12.30 A.M yesterday to announce the freeing of the ship and crew, and express appreciation to the military participants for their "valor and sacrifice."

The rescue operation, involving marines and Air Force men based in Thailand and at least six warships, was premised on the possibility that the Mayaguez's crew members might be scattered—on Tang Island, the ship itself and the Cambodian mainland.

Attacks were mounted in sequence At 7 20 P M Wednesday, the first wave of Air Force helicopters from Thailand took 135 marines into Tang Island Three helicopters were destroyed, one was damaged but delivered its marines and another was damaged and returned with its marines to U Tapao base in Thailand.

Of 25 marines aboard one of the destroyed helicopters, the Pentagon said, "many" were reported wounded. They were rescued by another helicopter

At 8 30 P M a boarding party of marines from the destroyer Holt seized the Mayaguez, finding no one aboard it.

The marines on Tang Island, meanwhile, were encountering stiff opposition. An hour and a quarter after the Mayaguez was recaptured, the crew appeared alongside the Wilson in the Thai fishing vessel and word reached the Pentagon at 10.53 P M

Four minutes later, the air strikes hit the Cambodian base With the ship and crew retrieved, the effort to take the island was called off By then however, the Air Force had just six helicopters left to ferry marines back to Thailand, a 180-mile trip. It was decided that it would be safer to await the arrival of the Coral Sea —about 10 miles off the island —and take the marines to that ship.

This occasioned about a five-hour wait, during which the marines dug in and defended themselves until they could be lifted out of the island—an operation completed at 9.10 A.M yesterday

At a predawn press conference, James R Schlesinger, the Defense Secretary, said the Cambodians freed the crew in his opinion, "in order to terminate the combat actions directed primarily at the mainland"

The American operation, he said, was "eminently successful," involving judicious use of force "For purposes that were necessary for the well-being of this society," Mr Ford was carrying out his responsibility 'to protect the lives of Americans as well as ships at sea," Mr Schlesinger said.

"What criticism there is, is likely to be captious, he added."

Cambodia assails U.S.

Bangkok Thailand (AP) —Cambodia called the American recapture of the United States merchant vessel Mayaguez a "savage, ferocious, insane and flagrant act of aggression," while North Vietnam pledged its "full support to the Cambodian people in their fight to preserve the integrity of their land, sea and air"

A Cambodian government spokesman, Hu Nim, in a radio broadcast monitored here, said the Khmer Rouge had returned all American crew members of the Mayaguez yesterday "at a time when U S aircraft were carrying out savage bombing and strafing raids"

Mr Hu Nim said three to six U.S F-105 fighter-bombers carried out raids against the Cambodian naval base at Ream and struck at the airport, oil refinery and other installations of the deepwater port of Kompong Som

U. S. Move Backed In Europe but Some Call it Overreaction

By ALVIN SHUSTER
Special to The New York Times

LONDON, May 15—The freeing of the American vessel Mayagüez was generally approved in Western Europe today but viewed as an effort by Washington to compensate for the recent defeats in Indochina.

Some critics charged that President Ford overreacted to a relatively minor incident and suggested that the Americans should have allowed more time before sending in the marines. And some newspaper editorials, particularly in France, were critical, describing the exercise as an example of unnecessary "gunboat politics."

Many of those interviewed by correspondents of The New York Times, however, reflected understanding of the American action and said that Washington appeared to have no other choice.

While governments withheld any formal comment, several officials said privately that they were relieved that the rescue operation had proved successful and that the United States had demonstrated, in even a limited way, that it was not a helpless giant in the aftermath of the loss of Indochina.

The British, of course, engaged in similar acts in the days when they ruled the waves. They call it the "Nelson touch" after the exploits of their favorite sailor, Admiral Lord Nelson.

"The reaction of the United States appears on present evidence to have been both right and effectively executed," said The Times of London. It said the rescue operation demonstrated that the United States had not lost the will to fight or the ability to mount a quick and effective operation far from its shores.

Some political analysts said that whatever the arguments over the issue of "overreaction," the swift action would serve to reassure those in Europe worried over whether the Americans would become gun-shy in view of the Indochina defeats.

Owners Deny Seized Freighter Had Any Secret Mission

By WALTER H. WAGGONER
Special to The New York Times

MENLO PARK, N.J., May 16 —The owners of the American merchant ship Mayagüez said categorically today that the vessel, seized by Cambodian gunboats on Monday and freed last night by American marines, contained "no arms, no ammunition, no hazardous or secret cargo of any type."

Michael R. McEvoy, chairman of the board of Sea-Land Service, Inc., which owns the Mayagüez, insisted repeatedly during a news conference at the company's headquarters here, that neither the ship nor its crew was involved in anything other than the "peaceful mission of trading with friendly nations."

He described as "ludicrous" allegations that the Mayaguez was a "spy ship" and speculation that the company was under charter to or in some way working for the Central Intelligence Agency."

He said that the Mayagüez would be "opened to the world" when it arrives in Singapore on Saturday.

"The world will see this ship, its cargo and its men," Mr. McEvoy declared. "They will see that Sea-land and its employes were not involved in any spying activities."

Asked at least twice whether he could "state categorically" that the Mayagüez was not involved in "some Government mission," spying or otherwise, Mr. McEvoy replied:

"The mission of the ship was purely peaceful. The extension of trade with friendly nations was its only mission."

The ship's contents, insured for about $5-million, Mr. McEvoy said, consisted of 107 containers of routine commercial cargo, 77 containers of military cargo and 90 empty containers.

The commercial goods ranged from aspirin tablets to food, he said, while the military cargo was broken down as follows: two containers of mail; 26 of machine parts, supplies and replacement equipment; three of subsistence supplies, including refrigerated cargo; eight of additional commissary supplies, and 38 of liquor, beer, soft drinks and other post-exchange items.

Mr. McEvoy said the company was "very dismayed and discouraged" by charges that the ship was engaged in espionage.

"It was a very peaceful ship," he declared repeatedly.

Mr. McEvoy also said at the news conference, conducted at the company's offices of the Executive Plaza Building here, that the Mayagüez was now enroute to Singapore.

Exchange of Messages

A message received here this morning from Capt. Charles T. Miller, the Mayagüez's commanding officer, described the crew as "alive and well" and estimated that the vessel would arive in Singapore at 3 P.M. Saturday, local time, after a journey of 46 hours.

Company officers immediately radioed back:

"Your conduct and that of the crew is in the highest tradition of the American merchant marine."

The crew was also told that Sea-Land and R. J. Reynolds Industries, Inc., the parent company, would fly home any members that wanted to join their families after their ordeal.

Mr. McEvoy said that the company had not entered the Government's policy-making process during the ship's captivity and had not put pressure on Washington to take steps on behalf of the captured Mayagüez.

R. J. Reynolds officials nevertheless applauded President Ford's action in dispatching United States marines to recover the ship.

In a telegram to President Ford, Colin Stokes, board chairman of R. J. Reynolds Industries, and J. Paul Sticht, president, said:

"We are very grateful for your action in recovering the crew of our ship, Mayagüez, and we mourn the loss of our men in our armed forces who sacrificed their lives in this operation. We are seeking the names of those families. We are also attempting through the Defense Department to fly a new crew at our expense to the ship and return the ship's crew to their families as soon as possible. For the personnel of our Sea-Land subsidiary and ourselves, we are very grateful to you and our Government."

Pentagon: 'sea, air power more essential now'

By Guy Halverson

Staff correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor

Washington

The successful recovery of the Mayaguez underscores the value of quick-strike, carrier-based U.S. sea power — and long-distance strike aircraft.

This is the view of senior Pentagon analysts, particularly at a time when the United States may soon be forced out of its present forward bases in Thailand and face troop or base pullbacks from other regions in the next few years.

Although the recovery combined both the U.S. Air Force and Navy (the Air Force flew marines from Thailand to the destroyer Holt, for example) it was the close-in presence of the Navy vessels that enabled the operation to be successfully completed.

It is also noted here that it was the large Navy presence in the South China Sea that enabled the evacuations from Cambodia and South Vietnam to be successfully carried out.

Yet, Navy officials say, the Navy's "quick-strike" potential has been severely slashed by budget-minded congresses in recent years.

- The overall size of the U.S. Navy fleet now is at its lowest level since pre-World War II, despite a heavy Soviet build-up of its sea power.
- By the end of fiscal 1976, the Navy will have only 13 aircraft carriers (of which one will be a training vessel) compared with the present fleet of 15 carriers. Some Navy officials say they are "hard pressed" to maintain current fleet operations.

Of the current carrier force, seven are in the Atlantic Fleet (two are in the Mediterranean, five on the U.S. East Coast), five are in the Pacific Fleet (one is at Pearl Harbor, four on the U.S. West Coast), and three are in the Western Pacific off Vietnam (expected to be reduced as the size of the carrier fleet is cut back).

- The Navy has so for been frustrated by Congress in its efforts to develop a new mobile "strike cruiser" and a swift moving sea-control ship.

"When we lost South Vietnam, we frankly lost a lot of our military flexibility in the Western Pacific," says one Defense official. "That's why this whole question of sea power is so important."

"The need for extra reliance on U.S. sea power is even more important now than perhaps at any point during the past decade," says a Navy official. "By relying on carriers such as in the Persian Gulf region you don't have to depend on the national political sensitivities you have with military land bases. We're free to operate when and where we want."

The "second stage" of the retrieval operation — involving landing of marines on Koh Tang Island, off Cambodia — took place over some 14 hours. Marines from Thailand were flown to the destroyer Holt. Several hundred marines were sent ashore on the island itself.

(Monitor correspondent Godfrey Sperling Jr. Reports from Washington that the President resisted advice from the joint chiefs that would have entailed more force.

(Wider options presented which included more indiscriminate bombing of the mainland — beyond just the military bases. Saturation bombing was a suggested option.

(The President resisted, keeping in mind the primary objectives (1) the security and safe release of the crew (2) and the security and safety of those involved in the rescue.

(The President determined to use just the amount of force necessary — and no more.)

FORD BECOMES BOLDER on foreign policy—and not just in Cambodian affair.

He aims to reassert U.S. influence after Vietnam. The President, wanting to show strength in the world's eyes, opted for quick, strong military action to free the Mayaguez and its crew. Next: He'll assume a bigger role in seeking Mideast peace—meeting with Egypt's Sadat, Israel's Rabin. The U.S. hopes for another Sinai disengagement. Putting Ford's prestige on the line may help.

The President, on his impending trip to Europe, will seek to reestablish the U.S. position as leader of NATO and the West. Later Ford expects to attend an all-European summit in Helsinki, along with Brezhnev. He hosts a stream of foreign dignitaries meantime: the Shah of Iran arrived at the White House yesterday.

It may all be Kissinger's doing: The chief diplomat is eager to restore presidential power and prestige in foreign affairs.

Thailand to Protest Use Of Base by U.S. for Raid

By H. D. S. Greenway
Washington Post Foreign Service

BANGKOK, May 16 (Friday) —Thai Prime Minister Kukrit Pramoj scheduled a Cabinet meeting for today to consider diplomatic moves against the United States, following Tes-

The Thais consider use of their bases in that operation to have been a clear violation of sovereignty.

It was an unfriendly act by a friendly country," the prime minister was quoted as saying on return from a day in a nearby province Thursday eve-nin.

Kukrit ruled out severing diplomatic relations. But other options, such as the temporary recall of the Thai ambassador to Washington and taken out in the 25,000 U.S. servicemen in Thailand may be discussed.

The Foreign office spokesman said that this incident "could cause public opinion in Thailand to push us towards quickening the pace of American withdrawal."

It was necessary to establish a future understanding with the United States to prevent this sort of thing from happening again, he said.

Unofficial American sources have said that all the 1,400 Marines are now out of Thailand.

A protest rally was held here last night and drew several thousand people, most of them students, and an effigy of President Ford was burned. The students said more demonstrations were planned.

A Foreign Ministry spokesman yesterday described the American use of Thai bases as "a breach of faith" and said it was an act that went against the expressed wish of the head of the Thai government."

He said he doubted that anything as drastic as a break in diplomatic relations would follow, but added: "Perhaps this incident could cause public opinion in Thailand to move toward quickening the pace of American withdrawal."

He said it is necessary to establish an understanding with the United States to prevent this sort of thing from happening again, adding that a decision on what diplomatic move to make might be announced Friday.

On Tuesday and Wednesday Kukrit stated publicly—and privately to U.S. charge d'affaires Edward Masters—that the United States could not use Thai soil as a springboard for military action against the new Cambodian government. He told Masters that the Marines that had been flown here against the wishes of the Thai government should be removed "immediately."

It appears that the United States ignored the wishes of the Thai government on every count. The Marines who were flown in here Tuesday and Wednesday were used in the Mayaguez rescue, the Thai spokesman said, as were American planes flying from Thai bases north of here.

The Thai military authorities assured him, the spokesman said, that American planes flying from Thai bases had not been directly involved in the sinking of Cambodian gunboats on Wednesday; but he said he had no assurances about the bombing of Sattahip on Thursday.

The U.S. began withdrawing the Marines Thursday, but as of mid-afternoon, the spokesman said, he had no word from the Americans that the remaining Marines had left Thailand. Masters had promised to call him as soon as all the Marines were gone, he said.

[Asked about this apparent violation of the Thai demand that the Marines be withdrawn "immediately," spokesman said, "To quote Ron Nessen, 'immediate is immediate.'" AP reported. He was referring to a remark by President Ford's press secretary about the American demand that Cambodia return the Mayaguez "immediately."]

Masters had told the premier that the U.S. embassy had not been informed that the Marines were being sent to Thailand, the spokesman said, adding: "And I would like to believe it."

Although the Americans may now be congratulating themselves on the success of the Mayaguez adventure, the operations has severely strained relations with Thailand, America's only remaining ally on the mainland of Southeast Asia.

The Thai government has little wish to make a big issue of this, officials said privately, but the violation of sovereignty had been so flagrant that Thailand has to make some gesture.

Thailand has been in a state of shock since Cambodia and Vietnam fell to the Communists. With Laos going the same way, albeit peacefully, Thailand is trying to adjust diplomatically to the new realities in Southeast Asia.

It is not easy Thailand shares long borders with Laos and Cambodia. The Cambodians have become belligerent about the border demarcation, the new South Vietnamese government has criticized Thailand for letting the Americans get away with so many of the planes flown here by fleeing South Vietnamese pilots, and Hanoi has criticized Thailand for allowing riots against Vietnamese settlers in the north.

The Association of Southeast Asian Nations is holding a foreign ministers' conference in Kuala Lumpur and, as the Foreign Ministry spokesman pointed out, the timing of this humiliation at the hands of the Americans comes at a particularly embarrassing time since the Thai foreign minister is "discussing peace and neutrality" in the region.

The American move has further widened the split between left and right in this country and, as one government man said, "This has made it very hard for any of us with pro-American sympathies to be heard. We would simply be shouted down."

Soviets Declare End of Rights In East Berlin

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y. (AP) — The Soviet Union declared yesterday that the United States, Britain and France have "no rights whatsoever" in East Berlin remaining from World War II.

A Soviet note to Secretary General Kurt Waldheim rejected a joint declaration to Waldheim last month that the three Western powers continue to have rights and responsibilities in East as well as West berlin.

"Normal and businesslike cooperation on a broad international basis" would be served if all parties would "take into consideration the political and territorial situation which actually exists in that area (Berlin) as a result of events in the postwar period and as now recognized and accepted by the immense majority of states," the Soviet note declared.

It accused the United States, Britain and France of taking a position "clearly contrary to legal and factual realities."

The situation, the note declared, is that East Berlin is the capital of East Germany and "an integral part of that country, from which it is inseparable (with) exactly the same legal status as any other part of the territory of the (East) German Democratic Republic ..."

Hill Members Protest More Military Trims

House backers of a $32 billion weapons procurement bill argued yesterday against more cuts in the Pentagon's request, saying the recovery of the SS Mayaguez, which was seized by Cambodia Monday in the Gulf of Siam, proved the value of a strong U.S. military force.

The Mayaguez incident was raised as the House finished general debate on the authorization measure. Voting on 20 or more proposed amendments is to start Monday.

The House Armed Services Committee had cut $3.7 billion from the $35.7 billion sought for the 15-month period ending Sept. 30, 1976. Liberal Democrats said they will strive to trim at least another $2.8 billion.

Rep. Ronald V. Dellums (D-Calif.) will try to insert a mandate to reduce the 511,000 U.S. troops stationed around the world by 70,000, leaving it to the Pentagon to decide where the cuts would be made.

Other critics want to eliminate $948.5 million from a program to develop the B-1 bomber.

TIMING OF ATTACK RAISES QUESTIONS

By R. W. APPLE Jr.
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 15—The American attack in the Gulf of Siam was already in progress, according to official accounts, when President Ford received word that the Cambodian Government was willing to release the American merchant vessel Mayagüez and its crew of 39.

But there remains considerable confusion as to the reasons why air strikes were carried out on the Cambodian mainland at almost the moment the crew members were approaching an American destroyer in a small fishing boat.

The sequence of events that unfolded last night and early this morning over and off the coast of Cambodia, and at the White House and Pentagon, was still not completely clear late today.

But a careful reconstruction, based on interviews with American officials, as well public briefings, yielded the following picture:

Since the capture Monday of the Mayagüez, a containership, by Cambodian forces, diplomatic initiatives had evoked no response. Indeed, the White House press secretary, Ron Nessen, said this morning, Mr. Ford not only had no idea what had motivated the Cambodians, he also had no idea whether they ever received the messages he had sent them, mainly through the Chinese.

According to Representative Thomas P. O'Neill of Massachusetts, the House Democratic leader, the final communication constituted a 24-hour ultimatum demanding the ship's release.

Ford's Preliminary Moves

Mr. Ford then took three steps before authorizing the final land-sea-air assault.

He ordered an attack on Cambodian patrol boats to try to prevent the removal of the American crewmen to the mainland, an attack in which three of the boats were sunk. He consulted once more, yesterday afternoon, with the National Security Council. He arranged to meet with bipartisan Congressional leaders to tell them his plans.

At 7:07 P.M., Wednesday, Washington time (6:07 A.M. Thursday, Cambodian time), while the meeting with the Congressmen was going on and while American forces were moving into position for the assault, the Phnom Penh radio broadcast a statement offering to free the ship and the crew. It was the Communist Government's first public comment on the affair.

The Word Is Received

An account of the broadcast, making it clear that the Cambodians were ready to accede to American demands, appeared on news agency wires here at 8:19 P.M. A less complete, somewhat garbled version—passed from an American monitoring station to Maj. Gen. Brent Scowcroft of the National Security Council to Secretary of State Kissinger to Mr. Ford—reached the President no more than three or four minutes earlier.

By then, according to logs maintained at the Pentagon and the White House, the operation was under way. At the direction of Mr. Ford, who was in the State Dining Room for a party for the Premier Joop M. den Uyl, of the Netherlands, Mr. Nessen issued a statement calling upon Phnom Penh to release the crew members unconditionally. It was also broadcast by short wave. He issued the statement at a 9:15 briefing.

In Indochina, meanwhile, a fleet of 11 CK-53 helicopters had set out from U Taphao Air Base in Thailand for the hour-and-45-minute flight to the area where the Mayagüez was held. Three copters feeled off and lowered a platoon of 48 Marines by sling to the destroyer escort Harold E. Holt.

Marines Land and Dig In

The rest off the copters flew on to Tang Island, a C-shaped patch of jungle foliage with good sandy beaches. Encountering heavy fire from dug-in Cambodians, the helicopters put down a force of 100 marines at island's eastern end and the men dug into a semicircular perimeter undear fire.

One helicopter went down in the surf and two went down on the beach. Two others managed to limp back to Thailand, together with the six that were undamaged. It was 7:20 P.M., Washington time.

Though the original plan called for a sweep across the island, that never happened, even after a second contingent of 100 marines arrived. The men remained on the beach, taking heavy but sporadic small-arms fire, for more than 12 hours while the Mayagüez and her crew were freed. Capturing the island was unnecessary, Defense officials explained, because the American crewmen were not there.

Navy Ships More In

The scene now shifts to the ships and planes of the Navy.

In the flotilla assembled off the coast, in addition to the destroyer escort Holt, were the carrier Coral Sea, the guided missile destroyer Henry B. Wilson, the destroyer Baussell, the guided missile frigate Gridley, the destroyer escort Lang and the store ship Vega. The senior officer was Rear Adm. R. P. Coogan, aboard the Coral Sea.

While planes from the Coral Sea and the guns of the Wilson supported the marines on the beach, the Holt came alongside the Mayaguez, lying dead in the water. In Washington it was 8:20 P.M., about the time news of the Phnom Penh broadcast reached Mr. Ford.

Ten minutes later, marines clambered aboard the container ship—and found no one. In the mess, plates with warm food were found, indicating a hurried departure.

At about 9 P.M., word was passed to Washington that the ship was empty—which may account for the American statement. 15 minutes later, demanding the release of the crew members, which the Cambodian radio had already promised.

Communications between Washington and the task force were almost instantaneous, with radio reception uninterrupted.

At 10:15 P.M. here, the Coral Sea began launching A-7 and F-4 fighter-bombers for a strike on the airfield at Ream, on the mainland near the port of Sihanoukville, called Kompong Som by the fallen Cambodian Cambodian Government.

But there were other events in train near the Wilson, which was closer to Tang Island. At 10:45, a small fishing boat, manned by five Thais who had been captured with their craft several days ago, was sighted, white flags flying, by sailors on the Wilson. Eight minutes later the destroyer flashed word to the Pentagon that 30 or more Caucasians appeared to be in the boat—it later developed that all 39 of the Mayagüez crewmen were aboard.

Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger did not pass that word to the President, however, until 11:14 P.M., a lapse of 21 minutes. During that 21 minutes, the Navy planes began their strike at Ream—either at 10:57 or at 11:09, depending which of two Pentagon briefings was accurate.

The Pentagon said later that 17 enemy planes had been destroyed on the ground, a hangar had been smashed and the runways had been cratered.

Momentum Is Cited

But since both the container ship and the crew had been recovered before the first wave went in, why was the strike not stopped? Some military officials argued that it was necessary to protect the Marines still on Tang Island; a civilian source said that the momentum of the operation was too great to reverse quickly.

But if the need was to protect the marines and their helicopters against attack by Cambodian T-28's, why were the raids not carried out at the onset of the assault? Or why didn't the American fighters simply orbit the airbase, waiting to pounce on any Cambodian plane that prepared to take off?

Further confusion arose from Mr. Schlesinger's statement, at his news conference today, that the crewmen "arrived at the Wilson as a result of what is presumed to be the decision of the Cambodians to deliver them up in order to terminate combat activities directed primarily at the mainland."

It is presumed that the crewmen were taken from the Mayaguez to Tang Island and then to Sihanoukville, from which they set out by boat for the Wilson. They must have left shore long before the first American "combat activity" on the mainland—the air strikes.

How, then, could the air strikes have motivated the Cambodians to put the crewmen in the boat and send them out?

Ship Heads for Singapore

In any event, all 39—for a time, it was thought that the number was 40, but that was revised—were in good shape, according to a message from the Mayagüez capain. At 7:30 P.M., her boilers fired, the ship set sail for Singapore, and is due there Saturday.

On Tang Island, there was trouble. The helicopter force, reduced by losses, was driven back by Cambodian ground fire as it attempted to land to extract the marines.

So the Coral Sea, at her top speed of 30 knots, pulled closer to the island to reduce the flight time, and aircraft and naval guns were used to lay down a barrage of fire on the Cambodians defending the six-square-mile islet.

At 7:13, just as the Mayagüez was getting ready to weigh anchor—and more than six hours after President Ford had promised, in a nationally televised statement, that the marines still under hostile fire were "preparing to disengage" —the first of those on the beach were lifted safely off.

Not until 9:10 A.M. today, Washington time — well after dusk in the Gulf of Siam—did the last helicopter leave the island, the site of the first American ground combat since 1973. It arrived on the Coral Sea's flight deck at 9:20

Even then, the casualty toll was not known. One death—a marine killed on the beach—was confirmed, and there were reports of perhaps 14 missing and others wounded

ASEAN Meeting

KUALA LUMPUR — The foreign ministers of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) concluded their meeting amid signs they may recommend against the holding of an ASEAN summit scheduled for Jakarta in June.

Some officials privately expressed apprehension that such a meeting might be interpreted by the Communist governments in Cambodia and North and South Vietnam as an attempt to "gang up" on them. The ASEAN countries have taken steps since the fall of the pro-American governments in Cambodia and South Vietnam to woo the new Communist states as well as North Vietnam.

The communique isued at the conclusion of the three-day meeting welcomed the end of fighting in Cambodia and South Vietnam. The ASEAN States are Malaysia, Thailand, the Philippines, Indonesia and Singapore.

Members of Congress Generally Endorse the Military Action Against Cambodians

By DAVID E. ROSENBAUM
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 15 — Along with the general mood of euphoria in Congress over the success of the operation in the Gulf of Siam, there was mild criticism from some Senators and Representatives that President Ford should have complied more explicitly with the law requiring him to "consult with Congress" in advance of military operations.

The law, called the War Powers Resolution, was enacted in 1973 over a veto by President Richard M. Nixon. It resulted from a Congressional deside to have a more influential voice in the conduct of war.

Consultation Provided

The measure was designed to give the President the power to strike quickly when the circumstances demanded, but to allow Congress the right to be consulted and to end military operations if they were not seen as warranted.

Under the law, "the President, in very possible instance, shall consult with Congress before introducing United States armed forces into hostilities or situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances, and after every such introduction shall consult regularly with the Congress until United States armed forces are no longer engated in hostilities or have been removed from such situations."

Senator Henry M. Jackson of Washington said today that he gave Mr. Ford "high marks for the way he handled" the incident. Representative Morris K. Udall of Arizona agreed that the President was "right to act the way he did.

Both Mr. Jackson and Mr. Udall are announced candidates for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Praise From Goldwater

Senator Barry Goldwater of Arizona, representing the conservative wing of the Republican party, said the President did "the only thing he could have done."

Senator Mike Mansfield of Montana, the Democratic leader of the Senate, and Senator Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, the assistant leader, said they were grateful that the operation had been successful.

Leaders of the House of Representatives were equally generous with their praise.

Two liberal Democratic Senators questioned whether Mr. Ford had made the right decision.

Senator George McGovern of South Dakota declared that the strike had been "precipitous in view of efforts to try some diplomatic relief." Senator Gaylord Nelson of Wisconsin asked, "What vital national interest was at stake?" He said that the incident was a matter "for negotiation, not force."

A Republican, Senator Edward W. Brooke of Massachusetts, did not criticize the operation directly, but sent a series of questions to Secretary of State Kissinger about the circumstances of the ship's capture and the rescue operation.

The War Powers Resolution requires the President to report to the Speaker of the House and the president pro tempore of the Senate within 48 hours of the initial commitment of troops to hostilities.

Mr. Ford complied with the requirement today. At about 2:30 A.M., White House officials arrived at the suburban homes of Michael Reed and Bill Simpson with a two-page letter from Mr. Ford to Carl Albert, the Speaker, and James O. Eastland, president pro tempore of the Senate.

Mr. Reed is Mr. Albert's legislative assistant, and Mr. Simpson is on Senator Eastland's staff.

The White House said that the notification period did not actually expire until 6:20 this morning, 48 hours after American planes fired across the bow of the Mayagüez, the captured merchant ship, to prevent the ship from being moved into a mainland port.

The letter of notification raised the question of whether Mr. Ford had complied with the consultation section of the law.

It was nearly 7 o'clock Tuesday evening, more than 12 hours after the first shots were fired, before Congressional leaders were informed of the hostilities.

Between 6:55 and 8:30 P.M., White House officials telephoned more than a dozen leaders in the Senate and House to inform them of the situation.

By all accounts, the calls amounted to a notification of the action rather than a consultation.

"I was not consulted," Mr. Mnasfield said. "I was notified after the fact about what the Administration had already decided to do."

William T. Kendall, a Congressional liaison officer for etahe White House, acknowledged that he had been given a prepared statement to read to the Senators on what amounted to a fait accompli.

However, Mr. Kendall declared, "if anyone had said, 'I think this action is inadvisable,' I would have written that down and put it in my memo and it would have been seen by the President."

None of the leaders, objected to the military action, Mr. Kendall said.

There was no dissent in Congress from the President's contention that he had the Constitutional authority and obligation to intercede with force under his powers as commander in chief.

Some Members Critical

Nor was there any objection to the President's having acted despite several laws prohibiting the use of troops in combat in Indochina.

The view was that the President's Constitutional prerogative prevailed over those laws and that, besides, the laws had been enacted specifically to keep the United States from becoming involved in combat in support of a regime in Southeast Asia.

But Senator Thomas E. Eagleton, Democrat of Missouri, who was one of the principal authors of the War Powers Resolution, declared that the President was required to consult with members of Congress before the fact, if possible, and "at least hear out their advice."

Senator Byrd said that he told Mr. Ford at a leadership meeting at the White House last night that the President "might have been in a lot better position, had this operation not been successful" if he had actually sought advice from Congress.

Representative John B. Anderson of Illinois, the third-ranking Republican in the House, said he was disappointed that Mr. Ford had done no more than "calling up and saying here's what we've decided."

"That doesn't really fit the new era of divided responsibility," Mr. Anderson said.

SCHANBERG GETTING SPECIAL POLK AWARD

The journalism department of Long Island University announced yesterday it was giving a special George Polk Memorial award to Sydney H. Schanberg, the Correspondent of The New York Times who remained in Cambodia to report on the fall of Phnom Penh to the Khmer Rouge.

Prof. Jacob H. Jaffe, the curator of the Polk awards, said that the citation of Mr. Schanberg marked the first time since 1949 that a newsman was being added to the group of regular Polk winners after formal announcement of the awards, two weeks ago, and that it was the first time anyone was being given a Polk for an achievement within a current year.

The citation to Mr. Schanberg, reads in part: "Sydney H. Schanberg was heroic, brilliant and tireless, incisively probing and explaining every feature and angle of the Cambodian experience. He has set an example for newsmen to remember and be inspired by. He has served readers as no historian ever could. In world journalism he is one of the giants."

The Polk awards, awarded by the university for journalistic achievement, are named after a CBS-TV correspondent who lost his life while attempting to interview guerilla leaders during fighting in Greece. Mr. Schanberg won the regular Polk award for international reporting in 1972 for his coverage of the India-Pakistan War.

SOVIET WITHHOLDS COMMENT ON RAID

By CHRISTOPHER S. WREN
Special to The New York Times

MOSCOW, May 15—The Soviet Union withheld comment today on the American military operation that freed the freighter Mayagüez and 39 crewmen seized by the Cambodians.

The incident was noted this afternoon by Tass, the official press agency and the Government newspaper Izvestia. The reports were factual, without criticism of the operation.

The Moscow radio limited itself to a reading of a Tass dispatch from Washington. The evening television news program made no mention of the incident, reporting instead preparations in Houston for the Soviet-American space flight in July.

While the Kremlin often waits a while to comment on world events, the initial silence suggested that Moscow was concerned about saying anything that could jeopardize the accommodation with Washington at a time when relations have been put under some strain by the Communist victories in Indochina.

Moscow has problems of its own with the new government in Phnom Penh. The Russians are understood to be upset by the treatment given their caretaker staff at the Soviet Embassy in Phnom Penh, who were transported out of Cambodia along with other foreigners by the new Communist Government.

It was considered a measure of the progress of détente that the Soviet press refrained from polemical reaction to the American military action.

The Tass dispatch reported complaints by Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts; Senate majority leader Mike Mansfield of Montana; Representative Bella S. Abzug, Democrat of New York, and others in Congress. Tass also noted without comment a demand by Thailand that American marines be withdrawn from the country immediately and quoted "the American press" as having reported that the operation had caused "protests in many countries."

U.S. Marines Recapture Seized Merchant Ship

By Michael Getler and Carroll Kilpatrick
Washington Post Staff Writers

U.S. armed forces recaptured an American merchant ship and recovered all its 40 crew members last night as Marines fought their way onto tiny Tang Island against opposition from Cambodian forces.

President Ford announced the successful recovery to the nation shortly before 12:30 a.m. today. He praised the "valor and sacrifice" of the troops that carried out the operation.

The Pentagon said early this morning that no total of U.S. casualties was available, but it was reliably reported that at least four of the 12 Air Force helicopters went down during the initial landings on Tang Island and the destroyer escort USS Holt.

Shortly after 10:30 p.m. Washington time, the U.S. destroyer Wilson reported sighting a small boat flying white flags. At 11:15 p.m., Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger called Mr. Ford with the news that the small boat held about 30 of the 40 crewmen and that they were safely boarding the Wilson.

It was still not clear early this morning whether the crewmen were released by Cambodian forces or were rescued.

Later it was learned that all the crew members were safe, presumably all of them found aboard the small boat, and that five Thai citizens had also been recovered. They were presumed to be the crew of a Thai fishing boat captured several days ago by the Cambodians.

At 11:09 p.m., U.S. fighter-bombers from the aircraft carrier Coral Sea launched air strikes against the airfield at Ream near the Cambodian port of Kompong Som. Mr. Ford said air strikes were made against "nearby military installations."

Presidential press spokesman Ron Nessen acknowledged that there were "some casualties" among the U.S. Marines and other forces. One helicopter crashed on Tang Island and two at sea. A fourth went down on the coast of Thailand and a fifth, according to informed sources, landed safely in Thailand but was badly damaged by gunfire.

In announcing the safe recovery of the Mayaguez and its crew early this morning, President Ford said: "The forces that have successfully accomplished this mission are still under hostile fire and are preparing to disengage."

Sources indicated that U.S. air strikes against the Cambodian mainland had been halted.

Mr. Ford said: "I wish to express my deep appreciation and that of the entire nation to the units and the men who participated in these operations for their valor and for their sacrifice."

Angry Thailand calls ship sinkings 'piracy'

Bangkok, Thailand (AP) —Long-time allies Thailand and the United States faced off yesterday over the sinking of three Cambodian gunboats by the U.S. and the 1,100 American marines flown here as part of efforts to free a merchant ship captured by Cambodia.

An angry Foreign Ministry official, learning that the Cambodian boats had been sunk by U.S. planes flown from Thai bases, said it was "piracy" and "madness—an action taken with no thought for the consequences to Thailand."

And Prime Minister Kukrit Pramoj demanded that the marines be removed by this morning, without citing an hour. Otherwise, he threatened "drastic action."

"What if Cambodia decides to retaliate?" asked the ministry official. "It cannot retaliate against the Americans; they are too far away. But it can retaliate against Thailand, which is right next door.

"The United States must pay for whatever consequences follow from this."

The Thai military command, which clears all international military flights in and out of the country, apparently was notified in advance of the arrival of the marines. But a communication gap has existed between the government and the military since the military dictatorship was overthrown in October, 1973.

VIENTIANE, Laos, May 14—Anti-American demonstrators ransacked United States mission buildings in the cities of Luang Prabang and Savannakhet today, and embassy officials here said that as a result, the evacuation of Americans scheduled to leave later in the year would begin at once.

Here in Vientiane, the American chargé d'affaires, Christian A. Chapman, filed a formal protest with the Laotian Government headed by Prince Souvanna Phouma and demanded police protection for Americans and American installations.

U. S. MARINES ... CONTINUED

The President reached the decision on final plans for the military operation during a lengthy mid-afternoon meeting with the National Security Council.

Nessen said the "military operations were well under way before" the United States received the first Cambodian government statement on the incident since the Mayaguez was seized Monday—an offer to return the ship.

But the two-pronged assault had already successfully recaptured the Mayaguez with Marines who were helicoptered to the destroyer escort USS Holt and then stormed over the rail when the Holt drew alongside the freighter.

Other Marines, flying in helicopters from bases in Thailand, landed on three-mile-long Tang Island under fire from Cambodians.

Jet fighter-bombers from the U.S. aircraft carrier Coral Sea also attacked the island in support of the Marines.

The first Cambodian announcement came in the form of a communique read over radio by Information Minister Hu Nim at 7:07 p.m. Washington time in the 19-minute broadcast, he said, according to an unofficial translation.

"Based on the position that we are unwilling to provoke any dispute, and as a peace-loving people, we will release that ship . . . but we will not allow the U.S. imperialists to violate or spy in our territorial waters. We will not allow them to threaten us to release the ship at any specific time."

The U.S. Marine operation against the island had begun about 6:30 p.m. Washington time.

The White House announced it had sent the following urgent message to Cambodian authorities after the Marine operation was under way and after Washington had received the Cambodian offer to return the Mayaguez.

"We have heard a radio broadcast that you are prepared to release the SS Mayaguez. We welcome this development if true.

"As you know, we have seized the ship. As soon as you issue a statement that you are prepared to release the crew members that you hold, unconditionally and immediately, we will promptly cease military operations."

A White House spokesman gave no indication how the message was sent to the Cambodian government with which the United States has no relations and which has kept itself sealed off from the outside world since conquering Phnom Penh April 17.

The official confirmation that the United States had retaken the Mayaguez and landed Marines on Tang Island came from the White House at 9:15 last night, Washington time.

White House press secretary Ron Nessen made the dramatic announcement as President Ford, described as weary from a long two days of crisis meetings, was having dinner with the Prime Minister of the Netherlands, Johannes Den Uyl.

The Marine operation came hours after U.S. Air Force warplanes destroyed three Cambodian patrol boats.

American A-7 jets and AC-130 gunships operating from bases in Thailand strafed the patrol boats after there were "indications that the Cambodians appeared to be attempting to move captive American crewmen from the ship and the island to the mainland," the Pentagon said.

The Mayaguez crewmen are known to have been taken off their ship to the island soon after their capture and the Marines were seeking to rescue any still on the island.

Despite the attempts to move crew members to the Cambodian mainland, 34 miles away, Defense Department sources said late yesterday, as the Marine attack was getting underway, that they "thought" most of the crewmen were still on the island, but they were not certain.

Defense Department spokesman Joseph Laitin acknowledged that one of the roughly seven or eight Cambodian patrol boats in the area succeeded in getting to Kompong Som on the mainland. Senior officials also said this boat appeared to carry about 40 passengers and that U.S. pilots thought they saw some "Caucasian faces" aboard and may have chosen not to fire on that boat when those faces were sighted.

Though officials concede that from a military standpoint there are very few significant targets in a rural country like Cambodia—even more so after the new Communist rulers have dispersed the urban population into the countryside—plans for either bombing of airfields or mining of ports have been considered, it was learned.

In moving the Marines directly from Thailand onto the USS Holt and the island, the United States may well have complied with a demand by the nervous government of Thailand to get the Marines out of the country fast. On the other hand, by moving the Marines virtually into direct combat from those bases, the United States appeared to be disregarding a Thai demand that it not use Marines from its bases to take back the captured ship by force.

A Thai Foreign Ministry official called the earlier sinking of gunboats an act of "madness—taken with no thought for the consequences to Thailand," the Associated Press reported.

Meanwhile, the United States, which had virtually no forces except airplanes in the vicinity of the Cambodian coast when the incident took place last Monday, is now building up a sizable force.

Aside from the Coral Sea, destroyers and some 1,100 Marines, another attack carrier, the Hancock, was steaming toward the area and a helicopter carrier, the Okinawa, with more Marines aboard, was also heading for the Gulf of Siam. The Okinawa and the Hancock were thought to still be about a day's sailing time away.

In addition, there were indications that Air Force tankers for mid-air refueling were being moved from their regular bases and that some other warplanes at bases in Japan and on Guam were at least being placed in a higher state of readiness.

In describing the attack on the patrol boats, the Pentagon first said that in addition to the three boats reportedly destroyed, four others were damaged and immobilized. Later, however, Laitin said there wasn't enough information to verify that four had been damaged.

The entire outbreak of firing at the patrol boats—which began late Tuesday night Washington time, Wednesday morning Cambodian time, is still somewhat confusing. Pentagon sources say apparently some of the vessels were coming out from Kompong Som, others were heading into the port, and one or two others may have been hiding in coves.

Laitin said that U.S. planes, prior to their attack on the boats, had been receiving small-arms fire from the Cambodian boats. Laitin said that after giving warning (presumably by shots across the bow) the U.S. planes attacked in an effort to block the movement of the captive crewmen to the mainland.

Yet, the vessel which may have had crewmen aboard wasn't stopped. Some Pentagon sources said they were confident that there were no Americans on the ships that were destroyed. Others said they were not completely confident.

The Cambodian statement, monitored in Bangkok, said, according to United Press International

"On May 12, at 2 p.m., our patrol ship spotted a large ship headed towards our territorial waters.

"The ship continued on its way deeper into Khmer territorial waters, passing Poulo Wai Island, about four or five kilometers to the east. Our patrol ship then intercepted the ship to investigate and report to higher authority. While investigating them, two F-105S circled over the ship the entire day. Since dawn of May 13, four to six F-105 and F-111 continued to fly over Poulo Wai Island, Tang Island and in the area of the port of Sihanoukville (Kompong Som)."

Hu Nim said the Mayaguez deliberately entered the territorial waters of Cambodia.

"We are sure that it was not by error in navigation because the American ship has electronic radar and modern, scientific equipment," he said. "It was a violation of our territorial waters—spying, in order to cheat world opinion and to accuse Cambodia of provoking a dispute."

"The Ford administration must be responsible, before Cambodia and her people, before the people of the world, as well as before the American people and their politicians, for their acts of spying and violations of Cambodian territorial integrity."

The broadcast was apparently made by Hu Nim when the Khmer Rouge thought they were still in control of the ship.

". . . for the Mayaguez, we have no intention of keeping it indefinitely or to provoke any dispute," Hu Nim said. "What we want to find out is what the ship's intention was and we want to warn them not to violate our territorial waters in the future.

"It is for this reason that our patrol ships intercepted the Mayaguez. To investigate their intention and report to higher authorities for a decision to allow it to leave Cambodian territorial waters, and to warn them not to spy and provoke disputes, as we did with another ship, flying the Panamanian flag, which was released by us on May 9."

Gromyko Chides Kissinger on Large Defense Budget

By CHRISTOPHER S. WREN
Special to The New York Times

MOSCOW, May 14—Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko today rebuked Secretary of State Kissinger for having defended an increased American military budget while at the same time advocating the relaxation of tension between the United States and the Soviet Union.

Mr. Gromyko, who is scheduled to meet Mr. Kissinger in Vienna Monday, asserted in an apparent departure from a prepared text that the two positions, laid out by Mr. Kissinger in a speech at St. Louis this week, "do not quite jibe."

The Soviet minister said Mr. Kissinger's speech Monday contained "a number of correct statements"—that détente with the Soviet Union should be pursued and that President Ford should seek to lessen the danger of nuclear war.

But he said the Secretary had also criticized Americans who opposed inflated military budgets.

"Those two things—a sympathetic attitude toward détente and an increase in military budgets—do not quite jibe, to put it mildly," Mr. Gromyko declared.

The Soviet Foreign Minister also criticized Mr. Kissinger's step-by-step approach toward a Middle East solution, contending that it was a step back rather than forward.

In what appeared to be a hardening of the Soviet line toward Israel, Mr. Gromyko contended that Israel could obtain a "sufficient guarantee" of its interests provided she recognized the right of the Palestinians to create their own state and withdrew from occupied Arab territory.

Mr. Gromyko leveled the criticism in a speech delivered today on the occasion of the 20th anniversary of the Warsaw pact, the military alliance of the Soviet bloc.

Western diplomats were puzzled why the traditionally cautious Foreign Minister chose to fault Mr. Kissinger publicly five days before their meeting, making their expected discussion of arms reduction and other issues more difficult.

It was suggested that Mr. Gromyko may have been articulating indirectly some of the Kremlin's dissatisfaction with the reported deadlock last week at Geneva in working out a satisfactory new Soviet-American strategic arms limitation agreement before the visit that Leonid I. Brezhnev, the Soviet leader, plans to make to Washington this year.

It was also possible that the Foreign Minister may have learned of the American sinking of three Cambodian gunboats and was venting his emotions. The remarks taking Mr. Kissinger to task were not included in the official text of the speech circulated by the official press agency Tass.

Mr. Gromyko was more conciliatory toward Israel only three weeks ago when he told the visiting Syrian Foreign Minister, added Abdel Halim Khaddam, that Moscow was preoffer the "Strictest guarantees" of Israel's existence as an independent state.

The edge in Mr. Gromyko's remarks on the Middle East possibly reflected Soviet uneasiness about President Anwar el-Sadat's willingness to leave the way open to partial measures outside the peace conference on the Middle East that the Soviet Union is trying to convene at Geneva.

It also indicated Moscow's frustrations with both Israeli attitudes and continuing Arab disunity at a time when Moscow has been pressing to prepare a conference that will have some hope of success.

Mr. Gromyko said the Soviet Union was ready to do its part to advance detente with the United States. He singled out Mr. Brezhnev's expected visit to the United States as "an exceptionally important and major undertaking" that has significance "for Soviet-american relations and for the world in general."

However, the Soviet minister contended that Moscow would advance its relationship with Washington "on an equal, equal and only equal basis."

In the royal capital of Luang Prabang, north-central Laos, students entered the Agency for International Development compound and broke windows, smashed desks and threw typewriters out of the building.

Savannakhet Contact Is Lost

In Savannakhet, students marched on that city's A.I.D. compound. As they reached the walls, the mission's radio transmitter failed, cutting off the compound from the outside world. Communications remained cut through the night.

American embassy officials in Vientiane said it was believed that no one had been injured in either attack.

It was not known here whether the three Americans held in Savannakhet were hostages, were free to leave or were simply remaining as evidence of what one embassy official characterized as "good faith." Laotian Government officials immediately sent a joint Pathet Lao-Vientiane rightist negotiating team to the city.

American embassy officials said that while some Americans were leaving because of the anti-American actions, a full-scale evacuation had not yet begun.

Evacuations of Americans from provincial areas to Vientiane have, however, begun. By nightfall all but two American officials and one American private citizen had left Luang Prabang. Two A.I.D. officials reportedly remained in the royal capital, but were said not to have been in the compound at the time of the attack.

American officials here said that predictions of such a demonstration had been persistent in Luang Prabang since the weekend, and that evacuations to Vientiane were ordered on Monday. The last Americans reportedly left about noon today, or four hours after the attack began.

Identities Are Withheld

There had been no indications in Savannakhet that any demonstrations were in prospect, and no evacuations were reported. The identities of the three Americans being held there were withheld by the embassy here. Beside those Americans, there are 13 more in Savannakhet, two with official status. Most of the rest are dependents.

British sources said that their embassy here was believed to be considering ways of evacuating British subjects from Luang Prabang.

As the demonstrations were going on, so was a meeting of the Laotian Cabinet, at which the vacancies created last Friday by the resignations of four rightist ministers and a rightist deputy minister were reportedly considered and replacements named.

Those resignations were prompted largely by a demonstration of students and teachers Friday in Vientiane against rising prices and foreign economic influences. Some of the demonstrators stoned the United States Embassy and briefly invaded the embassy compound, attempting to haul down the American flag. They weer dispersed by Government policemen.

Half an hour before today's cabinet meeting was to begin, Mr. Chapman, the American chargé, met with Premier Souvanna Phouma, and later an American official said Mr Chapman had "reminded" the Government of its assurances of protection for Americans.

livered a formal protest note to U.S. charge d'affaires, Edward E. Masters, demanding the removal of the marines from the territory of America's only remaining ally on the Southeast Asian mainland. He told newsmen the incident violated Thailand's sovereignty.

The State Department in Washington said the U.S. Embassy in Bangkok was in "diplomatic contact" with Thai officials about the protest, but spokesman Robert Funseth refused to disclose the content of the discussions.

The United States has 25,000 troops regularly stationed in Thailand, which the neutralist-leaning Bangkok government wants out within a year. The United States has committed itself to reducing the force by 28 per cent in the next two months.

Charles S. Whitehouse, the new U.S. ambassador to Thailand, also uninformed about the dispatch of the marines, flew into Bangkok to take up his post and was met by 40 or 50 students yelling: "American go home" and carrying signs such as: "Bastard Ford, Get Your Troops Out."

Mr Whitehouse walked, nodding and smiling, between the ranks of the students and issued a prepared statement saying that he hopes to further "friendship and co-operation between our two peoples in the months ahead."

Mr. Kukrit summoned Mr Masters yesterday and handed him a note saying that the marine incident "is not consistent with the goodwill existing between Thailand and the United States."

"Unless these forces which have entered against the wishes of Thailand are withdrawn immediately, the good relations and co-operation existing between Thailand and the United States would be exposed to serious and damaging consequences," the note added.

Meanwhile, Hanoi Radio said the new government of South Vietnam had dispatched a diplomatic mission to Thailand, the first known diplomatic mission it has sent to a non-Communist country since the Viet Cong captured Saigon. It said the delegation, headed by Nguyen Minh Phuong, would take over the old regime's Bangkok embassy and "retrieve" aircraft and ships taken to Thailand by Vietnamese refugees.

A week ago, the U.S., with Thai military acquiescence, removed more than 100 of the best aircraft that Vietnamese refugees had used to flee Saigon, but it halted the removal and left an undetermined number here after the Thai government protested.

The planes were supplied by the United States, but the new revolutionary government in Saigon claims the planes and says America has no right to them because all U.S. war equipment was supposed to have been removed from Vietnam under the 1973 Paris peace agreement.

Washington Silent on the Thai Protest

By BERNARD GWERTZMAN
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 14— The United States Government maintained silence today about a Thai protest against the dispatch of 1,100 marines to Thailand for possible use in rescuing an American merchant ship seized by Cambodians.

The State Department and the White House refused to comment on the note demanding an immediate withdrawal of the marines. All that was said officially was that discussions were going on in Bangkok to resolve the matter.

But privately, State Department officials said that if the Pentagon's plans for deploying the marines aboard the carrier Coral Sea went as schéduled they should be out of Thailand soon, perhaps tomorrow.

American officials said the marines had to be sent to Thailand to get them from Okinawa quickly to the Gulf of Siam where the American container ship Mayagüez had been seized. Presumably with the Coral Sea now entering the area they can be ferried by helicopter to the carrier.

There was sympathey for the problem Thailand faced because of the entry of the marines. In recent months Bangkok has sought to adopt a more neutral attitude in Southeast Asia.

Premier Kukrit Pramoj, in a note delivered to the American Embassy, said the dispatch of the marines was "not consistent with the good will existing between Thailand and the United States."

The note said unless they were pulled out immediately, the good relations and cooperation "would be exposed to serious and damaging consequences."

State Department officials said Mr. Kukrit had no alternative but to make a protest in view of his efforts to seek better relations with China and North Vietnam and to avoid antagonizing the new Cambodian Government.

But some officials said they believed that the protests coming from Thailand would soon be forgotten because the Thais also did not want to sever their relations with Washington, their major ally for the last 20 years.

The Thais said they had not received any advance warning of the dispatch of the marines to the American-operated, but Thai-owned air base at U Taphao.

American officals would not confirm this, and one official said "Obviously Kukrit would have preferred that there would be no publicity about this."

The United States and Thailand are allies under the 1954 accord that established the Southeast Asian Treaty Organization, a now moribnd organization. Under the treaty, the United States was obligated to "Act to meet the common danger in accordance with its constitutional processes" if Thailand or any other of the treaty area states was a victim of aggression. The other members were Australia, Britain, France, New Zealand and the Philippines.

In 1962, the United States affirmed its obligation to Thailand in a communiqué signed by Secretary of State Dean Rusk and Foreign Minister Thanat Khomin.

Six Air Bases Used

Beginning in 1964, the United States began to upgrade air base facilities with Thailand's permission, and by the time the Vietnam cease-fire accords were signed, Americans were using six Thai air bases.

In 1973 there were about 46,000 Americans stationed in Thailand. Now the figure is closer to 25,000, with extensive cuts planned for the next few months as part of the Thai Government's efforts to reduce the American presence.

The dispatch of any American forces has to be cleared formally with the Thai Government under the base accords, and the Thais were supposed to approve the targets of air strikes mounted from Thailand.

Thus, the Thai Government was supposed to have approved the dispatch of the marines to Thailand yesterday.

The Thais have always been sensitive to suggestions that they are not masters of their own fate. They have not sought publicity about the bases, and it has been difficult for American newsmen to visit the bases.

This sensitivity was strengthened with the overthrow of the military-led government last year and the rise to power of a civilian regime. The Government, now led by Premier Kukpit, seeks the left-wing parties that have sought the complete withdrawal of Americans.

Mr. Kukrit's moderate Social Action party ran fifth among the 22 parties represented in last January's elections. He himself was a newspaper publisher and columnist, who played the role of an Asian Premier in the movie "The Ugly American" in real life, he became Premier on platform calling for teh withdrawal of American forces in a year.

The Thais contend that their security now lies in making friends with China and alleviating concern in North Vietnam about their policies. At the same time, the Thais want to continue receiving Amercian aid.

Some American officials said a strong stand by the United States in the Cambodian seizure might actually reassure the Thais even though protests would be made.

Soviet assails Kissinger on detente

Moscow Bureau of The Sun

Moscow—Andrei A. Gromyko, the Soviet foreign minister, attacked Henry A. Kissinger, the United States Secretary of State, for his policy of a "tougher detente" in a hard-hitting speech here yesterday.

The Soviet minister also criticized sharply Mr. Kissinger's efforts to mediate a Middle East settlement, calling his step-by-step approach "a step-by-step movement away from a settlement," and he warned against any resumption of the mediation effort.

Mr Gromyko said that the Soviet Union is ready and anxious for a further improvement of relations with the U.S., particularly a new agreement limiting strategic arms.

But he stressed that Moscow will not compromise its principles for "passing, temporary interests" and will remain loyal to its Warsaw Pact allies and its commitments in the Middle East, Indochina and Latin America.

Mr Gromyko spoke at a meeting marking the 20th anniversary of the Warsaw Pact, the Soviet-led military and political alliance of six other East European countries.

He departed from his prepared text to answer directly Mr. Kissinger's recent foreign policy speeches in which the American secretary of state outlined a tougher, more hard-headed approach to relations with the Soviet Union and China following American setbacks in Southeast Asia.

Referring specifically to Secretary Kissinger's speech Monday in St. Louis, Mr. Gromyko attacked Mr. Kissinger's criticism of those calling for reductions in military spending, particularly new weapons.

"To put it mildly, those two things—a sympathetic attitude toward detente and an increase in military budgets—just do not go together," Mr. Gromyko said.

The Soviet foreign minister expressed Moscow's concern that Washington is trying now to revive its efforts to mediate a Middle East settlement or new troop disengagement.

A return to the step-by-step approach, he warned, would be "a serious mistake," and he added that any support it gets from Arabs, chiefly Egypt, is due to "a plain misunderstanding" of where it will lead.

In an apparent reference to American congressional efforts to force the Soviet Union to increase Jewish emigration, Mr. Gromyko declared, "equally, equally and only equally are we ready to continue our business with the United States in the interests of people of both countries as well as in the interest of strengthening peace."

The Soviet Union, he said, "will never sacrifice the sovereignty and dignity of our state, the principles of our socialist foreign policy, the interests of our allies in the Warsaw Pact to passing, temporary interests."

Mr. Gromyko is due to hold two days of talks with Mr. Kissinger in Vienna next week, and his remarks yesterday inevitably will color those negotiations on strategic arms limitation, the Middle East and the European Security Conference.

Ford: 'Entire Crew Has Been Rescued'

President Ford, early today made a brief statement to announce the rescue of the U.S. merchant ship Mayaguez and its crew members:

At my direction, United States forces tonight boarded the American merchant ship SS Mayaguez and landed at the island of Koh Tang for the purpose of rescuing the crew and the ship, which had been illegally seized by Cambodian forces. They also conducted supporting strikes against near-by military operations, or military installations.

I have now received information that the vessel has been recovered intact and the entire crew has been rescued.

The forces that have successfully accomplished this mission are still under hostile fire and are preparing to disengage.

I wish to express my deep appreciation and that of the entire nation to the units and the men who participated in these operations for their valor and for their sacrifice.

If Thailand doesn't want us—

Until the sinking of several Cambodian gunboats by American planes Wednesday, the loudest sounds coming from that area were Thailand's protests at being involved in American efforts to get the freighter Mayaguez and its crew back from the Cambodians who had pirated it on the high seas.

Prime Minister Kukrit Pramoj on Wednesday demanded the withdrawal of United States Marines sent to American bases in Thailand. Earlier he had warned that, if the Marines were sent there, "we cannot be friends with the United States any more. . . . We will not allow the American troops to use our soil for any war. We have enough trouble with our Asian neighbors as it is. . . . I have made myself absolutely clear."

He certainly has. Of course it is possible that he turned up the volume on his protest for the benefit of his Communist neighbors and that he was willing to cooperate with the United States when his hand was over the microphone. But as matters stand, we must assume that he was sincere.

If so, we cannot quarrel with Thailand's right to make its own decisions. But the prime minister and his people should understand that the decision has long range implications, too.

If Thailand does not want to be involved in maintaining international law and order when the rights of Americans are violated by its unruly neighbors, can it continue to count on our help if that unruliness should later be directed against itself? After all, the Communists have long been a threat to Thailand. A rebellion among Vietnamese in the northeastern part of the country is supported by Hanoi; insurgents in the south are supported by Communist China. And relations with the Khmers of Cambodia have never been good.

Perhaps the Thais think that by dissociating themselves from the United States, they can dissipate these threats and survive as a free and independent people. And who knows? They may be right.

But judging from history, the prospects are not encouraging. Laos is the most recent evidence that neutralists are not immune to Communist designs.

So Thailand may find that in making a decision for itself today, it has helped to make a decision for the United States tomorrow, if it chooses to chart its own course, without reference to others, then it will be in a poor position to expect help from the American people and Congress under the SEATO agreement if that course should lead it onto the rocks.

NEW YORK TIMES 15 MAY 1975

Right of Rescue

Once established diplomatic procedures had failed to achieve prompt recovery of the seized American merchant ship Mayagüez and its crew from Cambodian naval forces, President Ford had no alternative but to employ direct military means to protect American lives and property. There will be time and occasion later to examine the many unanswered questions about the whole incident; the immediate point is that no responsible government can tolerate capricious interference with its shipping in international waters. We are assuming, of course, that the Mayagüez is exactly what it appears to be—a merchant vessel on a normal commercial run.

The Ford Administration showed proper restraint in the early aftermath of the ship's seizure, in attempting diplomatic interventions rather than rushing into the immediate reprisal urged by some unthinking United States Senators. Even now, the sole United States purpose should be to retrieve the vessel and crew, not to "punish" or retaliate by a massive show of force against Cambodia.

A quite different set of issues, however, is raised by the Administration's dispatch of Marines to a base in Thailand over the protests of the Thai Government. Here it may be that the United States has infringed upon another nation's sovereign rights; however that legal point is resolved, the Administration's action threatens to shatter whatever was left of American-Thai cooperation in Southeast Asia.

Mr. Ford's Own Crisis

The Ford presidency has been bedeviled since its inception with one inherited crisis after another —the legal fate of Richard Nixon, the plunge into recession, the collapse of American power in Indochina Debate has been intense over Mr. Ford's handling of each of these problems, but in every instance criticism has been muted by sympathy for a straight-forward man suddenly burdened by the world's troubles The Mayaguez incident is something quite different Though its roots lie deep in the past, it has explosively sprouted in Mr Ford's own time This crisis is his as surely as the Bay of Pigs was John F Kennedy's, despite Eisenhower administration mistakes in Cuba.

If it is any comfort to Mr Ford, the present confrontation with revolutionary Cambodia could hardly turn out more disastrously than the Cuban adventure—which was initiated by the United States—at least not in terms of prestige damaged. Yet Mr. Kennedy emerged a more respected leader for having admitted his mistakes with a rare and heartening candor As of this writing, Mr Ford does not have to admit anything Nor should he The President is dealing hour to hour with an extraordinarily dangerous situation—one that may well determine whether the American posture in the post-Vietnam era is to be one of distorting outrage toward small tormentors or of cool pursuit of global policies worthy of a great power The stakes are large indeed, not only on the scene in Southeast Asia, but in determining the country's attitude toward Mr. Ford and his quest for a full White House term.

Our initial reaction to the President's sending marines to Thailand without so much as a by-your-leave to the troubled, nervous government in Bangkok was decidedly negative. Only a week ago, this newspaper said the United States should be "exceedingly discreet" in dealing with friendly Asian governments that have reason to fear neighboring Communist regimes. Instead, we were exceedingly indiscreet—so much so that we may have done permanent damage to Thailand's potential as a "neutralist" buffer state among the competing interests of North Vietnam, China, the Soviet Union and the United States in Southeast Asia. But despite our critical view of the affront to Thailand, it is important to keep in mind that Mr. Ford's immediate objective was one all Americans could support: freeing the Mayaguez, a U.S. merchant ship, and its crew.

This was a difficult, complicated task given the logistics of the situation, the uncertain impulses of the Cambodian revolutionaries and the strong tide running in the United States for resolute action after all the humiliations of recent weeks. Obviously there were many factors beyond Mr. Ford's personal control. Yet as President he will be held responsible for the manner and effectiveness with which he applied U.S. power Toughness is tempting, as the direct military action to recover the ship and crew indicates. But in the end Mr. Ford will have be to judged not on gestures but on results, and thus on the way he leads the United States into the post-Vietnam era. As a man seeking the presidency in his own right, he should not want it otherwise.

The Korean Issue

Victory can be a pretty heady thing. North Vietnam, with its arsenal of newly captured U.S. weaponry, suddenly is in the role of the communist spokesman for Eastern Asia.

"Get out of Korea," was the message from North Vietnam to the U.S. early last week. The North Vietnamese used the same tired phrases such as "U.S. imperialist aggressor forces" and promised an even heavier defeat for the "Ford clique" if America does not change its policy and withdraw all troops and weapons from South Korea "at an early date."

They were attacking a statement by Defense Secretary James Schlesinger at a news conference that South Korea was a forward defense area of the U.S. and that American forces will stay even after the South Korean army completes its modernization program.

The action that began June 25, 1950, when North Korea attacked its southern neighbor, is called the Korean Conflict and a United Nations Police Action. But anyone who was there can testify that it was a war, and to a large degree an American one.

Now, nearly a generation after U.S. forces became involved, there are 38,000 to 40,000 American military personnel there. Seldom in more recent years has much been heard about what some call a blackwater area of Asia. But it was far from that when Americans struggled in the shrinking perimeter around Pusan, went ashore from the Yellow Sea at Inchon in an action that cleared the south of the invader, or retreated through the snow from the Yalu River when the communist Chinese intervened.

But the invaders understood power. And after needlessly long negotiations the guns fell silent and a line was drawn. The country remained partitioned.

The whole matter of the partition, as applied in this century, raises some serious questions. Partition has generally not worked well. The main reason for this is that it is meant in most cases to be only an interim solution, to get adversaries to stop shooting and start talking. And yet it seems to be the policy to allow the arrangement to become permanent. And often at some point there is another price to pay, such as lives, treasure, prestige and failure of policy.

Divided Berlin festers, in spite of what wishful thinkers calll detente. Although quiet, it always contains the seeds of miscalculation. It is where the raw nerve ends of East and West touch. We are witnessing the trouble that "two Irelands" has brought. Cyprus could be heading toward a type of partition. And of course Korea remains divided. Most of all, we have just had a nasty lesson on the results of a partition in Indo-China.

Now that the North Vitnamese have brought it up, the U.S. probably should take a look at Korea. But certainly not because they said so. Are we to keep troops there idefinitely? According to Mr. Schlesinger we certainly will for the forseeable future. But at some point there must be a settlement.

The U.S. is going to have to decide quickly where its interests lie in Asia. In doing so it could well consider Korea, but for far different reasons than the North Vietnamese mention.

KANSAS CITY TIMES
28 APRIL 1975 (15 MAY)

For Korea It's a Different Story

Korea is not Vietnam and 1975 is not 1950. Yet here is Kim Il Sung, then as now the leader of North Korea, warning the United States to withdraw all its troops from South Korea and threatening to reunite the country by force.

Kim's remarks were made at a state banquet in Peking. He congratulated the Cambodian Communists on their victory and sought to relate conditions in Cambodia and South Vietnam to those in Korea. It is a comparison that does not stand up under analysis.

For one thing, the United States maintains its defense commitment to South Korea with a considerable military presence. There are 37,000 U.S. troops on the scene. They are there both symbolically and to act as a "trip wire" in case of a North Korean invasion. The 15,000 soldiers of the U.S. 2nd Infantry Division guard the only two important invasion routes to Seoul. The infiltration methods that have worked so well for the North Vietnamese cannot be duplicated in Korea, which is a rather narrow peninsula and does not have jungle vegetation to conceal invading guerrillas.

Moreover, the 600,000 men in South Korea's armed forces are well trained and fairly well equipped. They do not even faintly resemble the South Korean army that was overwhelmed by North Korea's Soviet tanks in the summer of 1950. South Korean divisions were rebuilt and were giving a strong account of themselves when the armistice was signed in the summer of 1953. Communist China had entered the war but only because U.S. forces had smashed through North Korea all the way to the Yalu River bordering Chinese Manchuria.

Peking and Moscow were allies then, but not any longer. The Chinese are much more concerned about their long and nervous border with the Soviet Union than about the expansionist ambitions of the Kim Il Sung regime. The North Koreans have a jet air force now, but so does South Korea, plus the advantage of a 33-million population compared to the 15 million in North Korea.

If Kim Il Sung were to strike again and without the early advantages he enjoyed in his 1950 aggression, he would be biting off more than he can handle. He has been making warlike noises for most of the past 22 years. Apparently the events in Cambodia and Vietnam have inspired his new display of verbal belligerence. But the situation of tough readiness that he faces in South Korea speaks much louder than Kim's threatening words.

Broadcasting to Closed Societies

RADIO FREE EUROPE, broadcasting to East Europe, and Radio Liberty, broadcasting to the Soviet Union, have successfully weathered a difficult transition from CIA sponsorship to open operation under a public board, and from cold-war programming to a more careful and responsible programming consistent with the changing international scene. Not being the official voices of America, these stations have the independence to offer their large and attentive audiences unvarnished news—especially news of those domestic developments which the local governments customarily censor. The purpose of the stations is simply to satisfy a continued longing, in the closed societies to which they broadcast, for honest communication and facts.

Americans could, of course, join with the local Communist governments in a partnership to suppress the local news. But this would serve no useful or legitimate political purpose and and it would be a crude violation of our own values. There is no contradiction between the existence of detente and the broadcasting of news. On the contrary, the real contradiction is between the existence of detente and the suppression of news, which is what the Communist authorities try to do by jamming Radio Liberty and Radio Free Europe. Americans have exactly the same right to broadcast to the Russians that they have to broadcast to us. No one has to listen who doesn't so choose.

In the last year, and at specific congressional bidding, substantial changes have been made in the organization and operation of the two stations in order to make them more efficient and economical. By informed consensus, they are now better fit than ever to perform their essential service of communication. It remains only for the Congress, as it weighs their budget requests in the current cycle, to provide the small additional sums necessary to let them do their job.

Historians Will Judge Vietnam Now

The quarreling and hurling of charges over Vietnam simply will not fade away, however much that might be wished in the interest of postwar tranquillity. First the South Vietnamese president, Nguyen Van Thieu, accused the U.S. of bad faith in not keeping a pledge by President Nixon to intervene directly to defend South Vietnam against any North Vietnamese attack. Now one of Thieu's former ministers has released apparently genuine copies of Nixon letters to Thieu that confirm what Thieu has stated.

Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.), who made the same charge himself earlier, is calling for an investigation with testimony by administration officials. That obviously means Secretary Henry Kissinger, with whom Jackson has had differences. If Jackson, one of the most powerful senators, wants such an inquiry, no doubt there will be one.

In that case the fact that Senator Jackson is an active candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination while seeking to investigate a Republican administration cannot be discounted as a motivating factor. Whatever President Nixon and/or Secretary Kissinger may or may not have promised the Thieu government outside the specific terms of the dishonored Paris agreement became immaterial in August of 1973. At that time Congress flatly banned the use of any American military action, directly or indirectly, in Indo-China.

This decision, it is now clear, facilitated the drive of the North Vietnamese to their final victory. Without fear of any retaliatory bombing by the United States, Hanoi could send massive amounts of troops and supplies through the demilitarized zone and along the Ho Chi Minh trail. The Communists could also deploy surface-to-air missiles in South Vietnam in violation of the Paris pact.

As the Communist build-up proceeded to its climax of total conquest, any reassuring words in the past from Richard Nixon or Henry Kissinger might as well have been written on the wind. It is now pointless to speculate whether Congress would have acted as it did in the matter had the Nixon White House not been weakened by the Watergate revelations. No investigation by Congress can enlighten in this connection. We doubt that there is political capital to be made from it either.

Thus the kind of inquiry that Senator Jackson is talking about could not have much more than historical interest. And in due time the professional historians will shape their own judgments of this and all other aspects of the Vietnam catastrophe.

DETROIT NEWS - 7 MAY 1975(15)

A sensible defense pact

The decision of Canada to renew the North American Air Defense agreement for a further five years was sensible and practical. It is encouraging to note that a parliamentary committee, representative of all political parties, was unanimous in that decision.

There was anxiety over the issue. Hard-core nationalists were fighting for a termination of the cooperation that has existed between the air forces of Canada and the United States for 17 years. Opponents of NORAD said the common air defense affronted Canadian sovereignty and is an unwanted vestige of a cold war that — they say — no longer exists.

Canadians contribute three squadrons of fighter planes to NORAD, plus skilled personnel to man and maintain radar units. The NORAD commander is American, the deputy commander Canadian. One station, at North Bay, is under Canadian command and shortly all radar surveillance in Canada will be carried on by Canadians when a new center is opened in Edmonton.

The United States has been sensitive to Canadian feelings. The NORAD arrangement has been revised so that Canadian squadrons cannot be brought to full alert by an American order. A military alert of Canadian forces remains a Canadian prerogative.

There is an important peripheral consideration in this issue. NORAD is a place where Canadians and Americans meet on a person-to-person basis to work at the solution of a common problem. Those who serve NORAD get along together exceedingly well.

If we are to improve American-Canadian relations, we need more cooperative institutions which bring the people of the two countries together in common cause. Where that is done, Americans and Canadians have a way of coming out of the relationship with mutual admiration and respect. And there is no loss of national identity, either.

DETROIT NEWS - 7 MAY 1975(15)

In more ways than one, Uncle Sam is now "the Ugly American" in Asia. Thailand, seeking a new Asian neutralism that can live with communism, has asked the United States to withdraw 7,500 of its 25,000 troops from Thailand by June 1—and the rest within a year. The United States is complying with the request although some U.S. officials think the Thai government is divided on the complete withdrawal.

In interviews with U.S. newsmen, however, the new Thai prime minister, Kukrit Pramoj, said the Thai government now has to avoid any policy that could lead critics to call it a lackey of the United States. So the ouster of the U.S. troops is required although Pramoj said Thailand still wants to be friends with the United States.

By a strange twist of fate, Pramoj himself played the role of a prime minister of a fictitious Southeast Asian country in the movie, "The Ugly American." The warnings he issued to the United States then as an actor now are being repeated by the real life prime minister.

The new demand from Thailand was not unexpected. Even before the fall of Cambodia and South Vietnam to the Communists, the Thais were beginning to read the handwriting on the wall. Kukrit Pramoj himself won a narrow vote of confidence in the Thai parliament in mid-March only after pledging he would have all 25,000 U.S. troops withdrawn in a year.

So while the domino theory may have been discredited, the effects of the Communist victory are showing up in new actions taken by Asian nations against the United States. In the Philippines, Singapore, Malaysia, Korea, Taiwan and even Japan, leaders have expressed concern over the new situation—and many have begun to lean to the left.

So far the U.S. reaction to these moves has been mild.

But now U.S. deeds, not words, will determine whether the world believes the United States or whether it concludes that this country lacks the will even to defend itself adequately in the wake of the Indochina defeat.

As this country reassesses its policies, its former allies in Asia are losing no time in adapting themselves to the new situation. If this country plans to continue to play an effective role in Asia and elsewhere, it will have to make its position known by more than pleasant generalities.

SEA POWER APRIL 1975(15 MAY)

A Modest Proposal

DEFENSE SECRETARY James R. Schlesinger says, in his FY 1976 posture statement, that the United States doesn't have enough sealift.

He doesn't put it quite that way, of course. What he says, specifically, is that "the present amphibious force of 65 ships has sufficient capacity (if all ships are available) [emphasis added] to transport simultaneously the assault elements of slightly more than one Marine Amphibious Force (MAF), i.e., one Marine division/wing team and supporting elements."

But, he immediately adds, and this is the kicker, "Our amphibious shipping . . . is about equally divided between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. Thus, to conduct a single MAF-size lift and subsequent assault, it would be necessary to shift half of our amphibious shipping from one ocean to the other. Moreover, about 15 percent of the Navy's ships are in overhaul status at any given time and thus are not immediately available."

The SecDef well knows, of course, that any potential adversary in today's fast-moving world isn't going to be waiting around too patiently while the United States leisurely shifts half of its amphibious shipping "from one ocean to another." Which means that, for all practical purposes, the Navy and Marine Corps now have considerably less than half the sealift needed to mount any credible sort of assault from the sea. But, in view of what happened during the Yom Kippur War (when U.S. Army and Air Force units in nearby European countries were virtually landlocked because of the noninvolvement policies of this country's NATO allies), U.S. forces at sea might be the only quick reaction forces available in future crises.

There is help on the way, but it's still way over the horizon, in the skinny string of five (reduced from nine) LHA multipurpose amphibious assault ships now being built. Two quick points here, though: (1) LHA #5, according to Schlesinger's own testimony, won't be delivered until FY 1978, "about 44 months beyond the original delivery date"; and (2) when all five ships finally are operational, the Navy-Marine Corps amphibious assault team will, "for the first time in years," still have, according to Marine Commandant General Robert E. Cushman, Jr., only "the minimum acceptable level of amphibious lift." The key word, we think, with all respect to the Commandant, is "minimum."

One thing more: Schlesinger also points out that "the substantial capability of the LHAs may also permit us to use these ships for occasional forward deployment in place of an aircraft carrier."

Fine idea, in our opinion. We second the motion. We also would like to switch it around a bit, and suggest that our long-range thinkers consider using a couple of aircraft carriers as, first, interim LHAs, and later as additional LHAs.

We would not, let us quickly add, take any of the Navy's dwindling force of first line carriers off the line for such a purpose. But we would note that the Navy has for some time been planning (albeit reluctantly) to retire two HANCOCK-class carriers in FY 1976. We would note further that the HANCOCKs displace some 33,000 tons, and that the long-awaited LHAs, at 39,300 tons, aren't all that much bigger. Finally, putting these various facts together, we would suggest that the Navy, Marine Corps, and Defense Department at least talk over the possibility of keeping the HANCOCKs in active service for a few years longer as somewhat makeshift amphibious assault ships.

There might have to be some reconfiguring and restructuring, we realize. And when all is said and done the retread carriers still could never be as capable as brand new amphibs, "purpose-built" (as the British say) from the keel up.

But the fact still remains that we need sealift, vitally. We don't have enough of it right now, and won't get much more—and then only the "minimum acceptable" amount—for a few more years. But given the present state of the world and current budgetary restrictions, we don't think the country can afford to wait six or seven years for the optimum ships the Corps would really prefer, and we are reasonably sure Congress would not be willing to pay for them in any case.

So what we are suggesting, really, is a quick fix which would use off-the-shelf ships, as it were, to fill a gaping hole in the current U.S. national defense posture. Not the ideal solution, perhaps, but the ideal solution is probably unattainable.

The HANCOCKs are already operational. Before banking their fires, we should determine whether their useful lives might be extended a few more years, in a half-life status, perhaps, with minimum crew and reduced maintenance. We might consider using them as Reserve training ships, even, to take advantage of the many carrier-experienced skills available in the ranks of the USNR. And we might want, carrying the brainstorm one step and one oceanic crossing farther, to ponder the possibility of packing the ships with all the equipment needed by a MAF and "forward-basing" them, one in the Med and one in WestPac—there to be ready, in an emergency, to be married up with Marine reinforcements airlifted from the States.

Those looking for bargains shouldn't be misled into thinking a reconfiguring/reconstruction/retrofit such as that suggested here would be cheap. It wouldn't be. But it would be much less expensive, for short-term purposes, than any other alternative now available.

What happens if the powers that be at the Pentagon take up this modest proposal, refit the HANCOCKs, and then never have to use them?

It could happen, but that's a contingency we can live with quite comfortably. It's much better to have the capability and not use it, than to need it and not have it—which is the fix the Navy and Marine Corps are in right now. ■

The Real Victory

French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing's decision to turn France toward the future instead of the past by abandoning further celebrations of the World War II victory over Germany—and commemorating the first tangible step toward post-war European union instead—has aroused angry criticism from political right and left. But history is likely to vindicate him.

It was a mere five years after the anguish of Hitler's war that Jean Monnet's imaginative proposal to pool the coal and steel of West Europe was offered to Bonn by French Foreign Minister Robert Schuman. It initiated a French-German reconciliation after three wars in 70 years that has made another armed conflict between these one-time enemies inconceivable for the forseeable future. And it opened the way to a nine-nation Common Market.

Most Frenchmen and Germans now alive have no first-hand recollection of World War II. And while the Nazi horrors will not and must not be forgotten, annual celebrations of the 1945 victory after the passage of 30 years have become an anachronism in an era when France, Germany and seven neighboring countries have put narrow nationalism and the past aside and pledged themselves to a common future.

Where is America's defense perimeter?

Charles W. Yost

Washington

During a visit to one of the United States military service schools last week I was asked where, after America's withdrawal or exclusion from Vietnam, the U.S. defense perimeter in the Western Pacific should be. What commitments will the American Congress and people henceforth support?

The answer depends in part on how one defines the question. What exactly is meant by the term "defense perimeter"? How wide a one do U.S. interests and U.S. capabilities require or permit it to defend?

At one extreme, advocates of "fortress America" might limit their perimeter to the waters adjacent to the 50 states, relying still — as 40 years ago — on the oceans to protect us.

At the other extreme, the U.S. has the Truman Doctrine which declared without reservation that "it must be the policy of the United States to support free peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation," and President Kennedy's inaugural pledge that "We shall pay any price, bear any burden, support any friend, oppose any foe to assure the survival and the success of liberty."

It is unlikely that either of these extravagant positions would be espoused by many Americans today. Fortress America was sunk at Pearl Harbor. The brief time when the United States presumptuously placed its defense perimeter at the very borders of the Soviet Union and China is also gone with the wind.

The question where the "perimeter" should now lie reflects a natural anxiety by the military to know what, in the post-Vietnam situation, they are expected to be prepared to defend.

It is important to be precise on this score at a time when some at least of America's allies are wondering how reliable its commitments are. On the other hand, the U.S. cannot but recall the trouble Dean Acheson fell into 25 years ago when he defined a perimeter in the Western Pacific and was misinterpreted to have given a hunting license for anything outside it.

One rule of thumb would be that, at this moment of apprehension and reassessment, the U.S. should unequivocally confirm those commitments made by due constitutional process, that is, with the consent of the Senate and the knowledge of the American people. This would apply to the North Atlantic Treaty, to Japan, to South Korea, to the Philippines, to Australia and New Zealand, to the Organization of American States (OAS).

There may be some instances even within this group where America's defense embraces may no longer be entirely welcome. President Marcos of the Philippines says he is reassessing U.S. relationship. Some members of the OAS have been wondering aloud whether their organization would not be more homogeneous and balanced without the disproportionate weight of the United States. Certainly the U.S. should not attempt to maintain a military relationship with any who do not want it.

There are also commitments which are either less formal and far-reaching or have been eroded by time. The Southeast Asian Treaty Organization, whose charter in any case obligated the U.S. only to consult, has become moribund. Though the U.S. has been only an observer in CENTO, it has a separate and categorical defense agreement with Iran.

Israel is a special case. While there is no

The White House— at a tense hour

WASHINGTON — In the showdown period for the S. S. Mayaguez, the outside of the White House radiated with the beauty and energy of spring.

But inside the building, the strengths and weaknesses of the President were being tested, along with the vitality of Congress. The problem was how to get the crew of 39 back to safety, along with the ship and its cargo worth $1 million.

Six hours after the Mayaguez radioed a "Mayday" distress signal, the White House took a dramatic stand for boldness in the situation. Thru spokesman Ronald Nessen, President Ford branded the capture "an act of piracy."

Underlying that statement by Ford was a real concern that went far beyond the 39 crewmen. He was worried in the first place about American reaction to the loss of South Viet Nam, and what that war has done to American influence thruout the world.

Now, with a U. S. ship seized, the President and his aides guessed that the American public — even the one-time "doves" — would not sit still for a revolutionary Communist nation to cut away further at our interests. The mood was to do something at the highest levels.

The response of talking tough therefore came swiftly, while information about what had happened remained at bare minimum levels. Example: At first, the White House wasn't positive about the type of Cambodian forces that took the ship.

Some of the later information put out by the administration came also from newspapers — data like the cargo and names of the crewmen.

In hastily called sessions of the National Security Council, the military pointed out the high risks involved in recovering a boarded ship. Diplomatic overtures for the quick release of the crewmen were made thru the Chinese.

At the same time, the overworked 7th Fleet was rerouted where possible and sent steaming toward the scene. [Some ships still carry 12,000 South Vietnamese.] Marines trained in quick strike tactics were alerted.

The sense of emergency was thus placed on a far higher level than in similar situations back in the days when American power was almost unquestioned and in times when the President was politically strong enough to make quick decisions.

By late Tuesday, Ford was acting by now in consultation with leaders of Congress. His staff called them by phone to give classified information that Cambodians appeared to be trying to take the crewmen to the mainland.

Ford received a "strong consensus of support and no objections" to the action he was about to order then at 5:30 p. m. Tuesday, according to the White House. U. S. jets swooped in to destroy three Cambodian patrol craft and immobilize four others.

Wednesday morning the destroyer Holt reached the area as the first of the limited U. S. naval forces available for further use. When the freighter was first seized Monday, there were only bare-bones naval forces even within two days' sailing time.

The American military situation initially was so weak that it took a reconnaissance plane nearly 10 hours just to locate the Mayaguez. The government of Thailand was objecting strongly in public to Marines being airlifted to its soil as elements of the rescue effort.

Spokesmen for the President said after the sinking that he was acting well within his authority to protect American lives and property. The White House even took time to announce the building of a swimming pool for Ford.

Outside, it was still bright and sunny.

Perdicaris Alive, or...

ESSAY

By William Safire

WASHINGTON, May 14—On the eve of the Republican convention of 1904, a Moroccan bandit named Ahmed Raisuli kidnapped an American citizen, Jon Perdicaris, who had been living near Tangier. American and British warships were rushed to the Moroccan capital, three Marines went ashore to assert our serious intent, and President Theodore Roosevelt demanded that the Sultan force the bandit to release the American.

This demand took the form of a telegram from Secretary of State John Hay which set a standard for succinctness in ultimata: "We want Perdicaris alive or Raisuli dead."

Read aloud at the convention nominating Teddy Roosevelt as candidate —he had moved up from the Vice Presidency but had not yet been elected in his own right—the tough telegram was received with roars of patriotic enthusiasm.

And it worked, not just for Perdicaris, who was ransomed by the Sultan and released, but for Roosevelt, who showed the world and the American voter that he was not a leader to be trifled with.

After the election, it turned out that Mr. Perdicaris might not have been an American citizen after all, and that he had probably been released before the dramatic message was delivered, but the diplomatic point was made: The United States would protect its nationals anywhere in the world.

Three generations later, another unelected President faces a somewhat similar challenge in the Mayagüez affair. A cocky new Communist regime has kidnapped 39 Americans and a ship, possibly for barter or some other reasons, and has triggered a military response. But times have changed, and what is in the national interest may not be in the President's political interest.

America's opinion leaders—especially old hawks, like Senator Jackson, who needs some dovish support—are likely to turn on the victim rather than on the pirate. They will ask: What was that merchant ship doing over there in the first place? Can we be sure it wasn't a spy ship? Wasn't it under military charter? Did we provoke the incident to get ourselves re-involved in Southeast Asia or to assuage our injured machismo?

Unless our military action is stunningly successful right away, the central theme of the President's critics will be (a) we were not really consulted, and (b) what harm would it have done to wait and ask everybody else to help?

But the responsibility to protect American lives is the President's and cannot be abdicated, and waiting could have caused great harm. We are not dealing with a superpower, where diplomacy is the only route and hot lines are in place; we are dealing with a minipower whose leaders have no concern for human life and are not susceptible to the normal pressures of politics and economics.

America is no longer a world power whose will to use its strength is undoubted. Not long ago, we could afford to overlook provocations like the Pueblo and the "flying Pueblo" because our resolve was not in doubt. Now, however, with foreign affairs too much in the hands of Congress, the President is forced to assert U.S. strength to dispel the doubt that does exist.

'Not long ago we could afford to overlook provocations like the Pueblo.'

This is not the way it should be. Retreat is dangerous, and the steady retreat of American willpower in the past two years invites the kind of incident we face off the shores of Cambodia now. As a certainly-great power, we could afford to be patient and long-suffering about these incidents before; as a maybe-great power, we have to react lest our inaction invite every nation to strike at our interests everywhere.

"National honor" may be a phrase that invites derision these days, but a reputation for strength has been protecting Americans abroad for some years; hesitation and handwringing in the face of this latest provocation pose the greatest danger. A long delay, presented as caution, is most incautious: It causes other powers to line up pro and con, and could elevate an incident into a searing decision between war and knuckling-under.

President Ford is not thinking of nuking anybody back to Stone Ages, or starting the Southeast Asian involvement all over again. He cannot even threaten Phnom Penh, because nobody is home. Our attack on the Cambodian gunboats is a measured response to piracy; the hostages are in great peril, but if we acquiesce in this technique of international relations, we will encourage the seizure of many other Americans elsewhere in the world.

Decisiveness should not be equated with hot-headedness, nor national honor with jingoism. Perdicaris was released and Raisuli met no harm. This is the first test since an isolationist Congress took charge of America foreign policy, and if the President can hold the country with him in stepping up to it courageously, we can deter others from testing our resolve in much more serious ways.

formal treaty, nor has Israel wanted one, it is clearly understood in both countries that the U.S. will assist Israel to meet threats to its security, and would if necessary join in resisting a threat to its survival.

Another special case of a different kind may be Taiwan, with which the U.S. has a formal defense treaty and yet it recognizes, as both Chinese governments insist, that Taiwan is an integral part of China. The U.S. maintains diplomatic representatives in both Chinese capitals. It is certainly anomalous and awkward to claim that this fragment of another great power constitutes an essential part of the U.S. "defense perimeter."

This survey illustrates the complexity and risk of trying to do what the U.S. military would naturally prefer, that is, be utterly precise about where America's defense perimeter lies all over the world. In some areas, there is not and must not be any ambiguity. In many others, ambiguity is inherent in the situation and is indeed more in the U.S. interest than an iron-bound commitment to unpredictable and uncontrollable regimes.

In gray areas outside those where U.S. defense commitments should remain unequivocal, a valuable conception, suggested by Prof. Lincoln Bloomfield of MIT, is what he calls "spheres of abstention."

These would be areas which the U.S. and the Soviet Union, and perhaps in some cases China, would agree lay outside either their "defense perimeter" or America's, and in which the U.S. would jointly forego any military intrusion or presence.

The whole Indian Ocean area would be a prime candidate for such a sphere of abstention or "zone of peace" — as India and other littoral states have for some years been urging, so far to no avail. So might well be the Persian Gulf.

If such spheres could be gradually expanded, defense perimeters might in time shrink to the borders of the superpowers and their closest allies, to the vast benefit of their own security and that of everyone else.

Spoils of War: Reds Inherit U.S. Supplies

Huge Stocks of Rice, Fertilizer Will Ease S. Vietnam Transition

BY GEORGE McARTHUR
Times Staff Writer

HONG KONG—The staggering value of the military plunder which Hanoi's forces captured in the south has been publicly if shamefacedly acknowledged. It is less well known that the North Vietnamese seized a nation relatively bulging with economic and agricultural assets—largely provided by the United States.

The implications of this are that only the grossest kind of mismanagement—which appears unlikely—could make the occupation of the south anything but economically benign.

Appearances to the contrary, South Vietnam was no war-ravaged country at the end. The damage that was evident had largely been wrought by the North Vietnamese themselves, often senselessly.

More important, the North Vietnamese soldiers took over warehouses bulging with rice. There was a mass of essential fertilizer on hand.

This means that the political problems of Hanoi in the south have been enormously lessened for probably one full year, allowing plenty of time for the next rice harvest. There will certainly be political unrest and possibly outbreaks of physical opposition here and there. But in a nation where hunger is the most potent of all political problems, there will be none.

The actual records in American office buildings were largely burned and the South Vietnamese government's records were always a mess. That will hardly be a problem to the military occupation which is now inventorying its assets very thoroughly.

The south had just completed one of its most successful rice harvests in years. There was also an estimated 200,000 tons of American AID rice on hand (plus some rice that had been intended for Cambodia and never got there). In fact, some southern economists were thinking of exporting rice this spring. Almost everyone agreed that with proper management exports could be achieved next year.

With the assistance of American AID experts and money, the Saigon government had also begun to build up fertilizer stocks—absolutely essential to the miracle strains that now make up a substantial percentage of delta crops. This fertilizer will go far toward easing any peasant resentment in the delta for at least one year—but by then Hanoi will face a problem.

Another delta problem is petroleum

Hanoi's Paeans of Victory

Hanoi has summed up its victory in these words: "The Vietnamese people's strength has crushed the aggressive force of U.S. imperialism, the most powerful imperialist chieftain and the most vicious enemy of mankind, and has upset its counter-revolutionary global strategy, thus making an important contribution to the offensive posture of the (world) revolution."

These words, from the army paper Quan Doi Nhan Dan, are being repeated in dozens of different ways in newspaper articles and radio broadcasts which stress the historic nature of the defeat inflicted on "four successive U.S. presidents." The United States came to believe that material power allowed it "to become an international gendarme," to rally the forces of "international capitalism," and to stop the forces of socialism.

It therefore sought to build in Vietnam a "dike to hold back the red wave that was flooding South East Asia." Thus did Vietnam become the testing ground of U.S. power and prestige. But what the test proved was that U.S. power was "limited," and that its limits had "reached breaking point." Its defeat showed that America would never again be able to act as an international —"or even regional"—gendarme.

Never before had the world situation been "as good as it is today," never had imperialism experienced "such fierce crisis and contradictions." The world revolutionary forces "are, clearly, in the strongest offensive position," while the imperialists' capability to wage war is "increasingly" limited. "Thus, the world revolution now has better conditions under which to develop."

But what will Hanoi do with its victory, now that it has got it? At the end of last year, the Hanoi dailies carried a series of articles by General Nguyen Vo Giap, the defense minister. He insisted on the importance of Marxist-Leninist precepts, but he presented them in a nationalist Vietnamese sauce which neither Moscow nor Peking would find to its taste. In a similar series of articles which he wrote more than 15 years ago to celebrate the victory of Dien Bien Phu, Giap explained why the Vietnamese revolution differed from both Russia's and China's, and had to follow its own path.

Ever since then Hanoi has sought to present its own revolutionary model as more relevant to the needs of the many nations suffering under the "neo-colonial" yoke. This Marxist-nationalist mixture was usually presented discreetly, so long as Hanoi was dependent on Soviet and Chinese arms aid, but the triumphal ending of the war may remove some of the earlier inhibitions.

There is less insistence now on Hanoi's role as the focus of a world revolution that has been betrayed by both Russia and China. But this theme, which once underlay Hanoi's comments on the willingness of Moscow and Peking to open their doors for Nixon's summit visits, revealed an intense distrust of its allies. Hanoi accused the big powers of pursuing their own interests to the detriment of the smaller nations. Whatever gratitude Hanoi may now feel for Soviet and Chinese arms supplies will be tempered by its fear of the new competition between Moscow and Peking for influence in Indochina.

Both Moscow and Peking see Indochina as the route to influence in large areas of Asia. They may be as wrong as Washington was, but the great powers do not learn from each other's mistakes. In competing for influence in Hanoi, they may—as great powers often do—seek a degree of control which the Vietnamese would see as infringing their own independence, as has happened on earlier occasions when Sino Soviet rivalry was focused on Hanoi.

When General Giap wrote of thousands of years of Vietnamese history during which the nation resisted the invasions of Chinese "feudalists," he was revealing something of Hanoi's fears of China's future intentions. The greater distance once made Russia the less dangerous ally, but a demand by Moscow for a naval base at Camranh Bay would bring Soviet power not only to the center of Asia, but also to the strategic tip of Vietnam.

Both the Kremlin and Peking may feel entitled to some reward for their arms aid, but Hanoi may prefer to pay in agricultural produce rather than in strategic facilities and in political influence. To protect itself against too tight an embrace by its Big Brothers, while extracting continued economic aid from them, Hanoi will need allies in the world Communist movement and in the "national liberation movement," where Moscow and Peking are competing for influence. One way to gain such allies is to obtain recognition of Hanoi's own "revolutionary model," and to inspire its emulation if possible.

This is where the intense nationalism of the Vietnamese Communists, which leads them to claim a unique role in developing a model suitable for other nations, could cause them to become a challenge to both Moscow and Peking. In the paeans of victory this theme is muted, while the United States is execrated. But the United States is withdrawing from the area. In the long run Russia and China could present a greater threat to Vietnam, precisely because all three are Communist, and because the two biggest powers have imperial ambitions in the area.

It may seem unthinkable now that Hanoi might welcome the retention of an important U.S. role in South East Asia, and in Asia generally. Yet this is how Peking feels today, although only a few years ago that too would have been unthinkable.

The cost of defense

By the Associated Press

Washington

Adm. Hyman G. Rickover testified recently that hundreds of millions of dollars in excessive profits have been made on defense contracts.

But, Admiral Rickover told a Senate-House Economic Committee, the Renegotiation Board which is supposed to recover excess profits from such contractors is inept and ineffective.

Admiral Rickover, the Navy's top expert on nuclear-powered ships, said defense firms are constantly filing unjustified claims for extra payments from the Pentagon. He estimated at least 30 percent of such claims are excessive.

The admiral also had some unkind words for workmen in shipyards which build Navy vessels. He said they spend one-third of their time loafing, driving up costs drastically.

He offered a number of suggestions as to how to prevent some of the excess profits:

- Put the Renegotiation Board under control of Congress, taking it away from the President.
- Settle all claims for extra payments strictly on their legal merits, and not on the basis of what might be needed to keep a company with large military business operating.
- Enforce the law against false claims strictly, with prison terms for company officials convicted of making them.

Sen. William Proxmire (D) of Wisconsin, a long-time critic of the Renegotiation Board, endorsed all of Admiral Rickover's criticisms of the agency and added some of his own.

Mr Proxmire noted that the board has been without a chairman since last November and charged that President Ford has "failed to keep his promise to reinvigorate the Renegotiation Board."

"The board has the potential for making a valuable contribution to the management of defense purchasing by reducing its costs and creating incentives for efficient operations," the Senator said.

"Unfortunately the board has fallen far short of this goal." However, Rex M. Mattingly, acting chairman of the board, testified that he understood Mr. Ford would make nominations for the two vacant positions on the agency soon.

Mr Mattingly said great strides had been made in getting the agency "back on the track of carrying out its primary functions of assuring the public that excessive profits on defense and space contracts are in fact being eliminated."

Two accountants employed by the subcommittee, Woodliffe Jenkinson and Bernard Trescavage, testified that three leading defense contractors may have made large profits on which little or no recovery was made by the Renegotiation Board in 1967, 1968, and 1969.

They said their analysis indicated some of the companies made as much as 59 percent on net worth, whereas the industry average was around 15 percent.

The three companies were identified as Mobil Oil Corporation, McDonnell Douglas Corporation, and Northrop Corporation.

because the tractor, the powered plow and gasoline water pumps and outboard motors are now staples. The old water buffalo frequently went into the cooking pot. But with tight management and a little outside help from the north, the delta can easily be kept running for the next 12 months.

Doubtless the various Communist levels of government and management will take credit for this. The first year, however, will largely be a free gift from the United States and the old Saigon regime.

Hanoi will benefit in other quite visible, even glittering, ways.

Saigon's 15 tons of gold remain in the Central Bank. A good bit has already been written about efforts of President Nguyen Van Thieu to get the gold out of the country.

Evidently several efforts by the generals and others to smuggle at least some of it to Europe failed—the thieves couldn't get everybody paid off properly. The United States Embassy had made plans to get the gold more or less legally flown to American vaults. Again the plan fell through—and one must suspect foot-dragging on the part of officials who still hoped for personal profit—because all the red tape seemed to multiply and time ran out. There is still talk—and nothing more—that Thieu managed to get a few million dollars by ship to Taiwan. So far, Asian gold markets have reflected no confirmation.

In addition to the gold, South Vietnam had about $130 million in foreign exchange holdings scattered around, some at home and some in American, French and Swiss banks. As the conquest of South Vietnam is internationally legalized as it probably will be, much of this money will also doubtless flow back to Hanoi, though the amount is obviously questionable.

In addition South Vietnam had about $50 million in drawing rights with the International Monetary Fund. The experts will have to untangle that.

Then there is a question of consumer goods, always in short supply in Hanoi. This may prove something of an embarrassment.

At the time of its collapse, South Vietnam had been in a severe economic depression for a year, mostly affecting the cities. But consumer goods were abundant, even overabundant. Many merchants had bulging warehouses they were unable to unload during a time of unemployment. The invading North Vietnamese troops have thus inherited more refrigerators, washing machines, radios, television sets, electric fans, hi-fi sets, gas and electric stoves and more than the economically pressed residents of Hanoi ever dreamed of.

In addition there is little doubt that the North Vietnamese military forces, already with an eye out for watches and similar items, will confiscate scooters and other motor vehicles in greater abundance than Hanoi has ever seen.

Undoubtedly the straitlaced economic morality of Communist North Vietnam will be tested to find a solution. Whatever the solution, living standards in the south are generally likely to remain higher than those in the north for some time to come.

The headlines of the last days of the war focused in good measure on the destructive battles starting at Ban Me Thout and ending at Bien Hoa. Measured by past standards, however, the overall destruction was minimal. The Communists were able to get the Hue-Da Nang railroad running almost immediately, not because of repair miracles but because the destruction had really been limited to a few bridges of relatively small size.

The vast destruction wrought by rockets and artillery on Bien Hoa, just outside Saigon, was largely a political demonstration. The south had lost the war and was teetering on surrender. Similarly, Communist rockets at Tan Son Nhut, on virtually the final night of the war, wrought widespread destruction, most notably wrecking a new international airline terminal that had been two years under construction.

The South Vietnamese troops gave way to some destruction in the final days but it was minor. Unlike those days of the French pullout of Hanoi in 1954—when some American "spooks" under Gen. Edward Lansdale had rather juvenile visions of leaving nothing but destruction behind—the Americans in Saigon destroyed very little besides communication equipment (one departing American emptied his .45 into an antenna atop the embassy). About the sneakiest thing the Americans did was to insist that all the safes in the embassy—and there were 50 or more—be emptied and then carefully closed so that the North Vietnamese would have to call in safe crackers to make sure no secrets were left behind.

All this is not to suggest that Hanoi took over a blossoming paradise with hardly a problem on the horizon. The reorganization of the country and the shortage of trained people will doubtless make for severe economic turmoil at some time in the future. But for the immediate future the North Vietnamese are getting something of a free ride—largely due to the United States—and they will certainly use it to make political capital.

Fears of 'Laos Nightmare' Discounted

BY JACQUES LESLIE
Times Staff Writer

VIENTIANE—Laos, it seems, is about to join its Indochina neighbors as a Communist state. But in contrast to South Vietnam and Cambodia, in all likelihood there will be no "Laos nightmare," most observers here believe.

Any forebodings of Americans flying away in helicopters and frightened refugees streaming across the border are probably misleading.

The events of the past week-rightist government ministers resigning and fleeing the country, demonstrators throwing rocks at the U.S. Embassy and Communist control of the nation's armed forces—might conjur up such scenes. But they are held unlikely to happen.

"I think what was going to happen in Laos has already happened," said a Western diplomat Tuesday. "I think the (Communist) Pathet Lao have got what they wanted. They show every sign of wanting to preserve this form of government."

Though few other observers would make such a bold prediction in a place as unpredictable as Laos, most agree with the thrust of the statement. Most expect that Laos' coalition government, which is now dominated by the Communists, will not be replaced soon by a more straightforward form of Pathet Lao rule, even though the Pathet Lao have the power to shape the government virtually as they wish.

One reason is that if the coalition government falls, the United States would probably stop giving economic aid, which is now $32 million a year. As it stands, Laos is probably the only country in the world receiving aid from both the United States and Communist nations such as North Korea and Outer Mongolia. But the United States is by far the largest aid doner to Laos. Given the mountainous kingdom's current vast economic problems, a sudden cut-off would be a major blow.

But while Lao leftists seem to want American aid to continue, they are trying to drive out the U.S. Agency for International Development. The main reason is resentment over use of AID in the past as a cover for U.S. Central Intelligence Agency employes. It seems likely that the United States and the Lao government will strike a compromise reducing AID to a fraction of its present size of 162 officials.

Signficantly, Vientiane radio Tuesday morning rebroadcast an an interview given a month ago by the Lao coalition government's deputy prime minister, Phoumi Vongvichit, who is a Pathet Lao. In the interview, Phoumi said that relations between the United States and Laos were improving, and added, "Laos would be glad to accept United States aid offers, but they must not have strings attached. I hope aid will be provided directly to the (coalition government)" instead of through AID.

American military aid to Laos will undoubtedly end, since control of the rightist Vientiane army, which was the sole recipient of the aid, has passed to the pathet Lao. U.S. military aid was expected to reach almost $30 million in fiscal year 1975.

"No decisions have been taken" on military aid, a U.S. Embassy official said, "but obviously the situation is going to have to be studied."

Beyond a desire to maintain U.S. economic aid, observers doubt the Pathet Lao assumption of power will resemble Communist takeovers in South Vietnam and Cambodia for other reasons.

Most obvious is that the Pathet Lao do not need to assert themselves militarily, since they have taken control of their former adversary, the Vientiane army. Even before this was accomplished, there had been little fighting in Laos since a cease-fire was established more than two years ago. Since then, incidents have occurred on an average of once a week, and casualties have been "what you would expect in traffic accidents," a diplomat said.

Nor has bitterness among Lao been comparable to that in Cambodia and South Vietnam. One reason is that much of the fighting in Laos was done by Americans, Vietnamese, Thais and hill tribesmen such as the CIA-trained Meo. Even Lao who do not approve of the Pathet Lao do not seem to fear them. (See LAOS, Pg 6-F)

Laos: A Domino Falls

Laos became the first post-Vietnam domino to fall, some three months earlier than even pessimists in the U.S. government thought possible, with a shove from the now imperial North Vietnamese politburo in Hanoi.

This points to wishful thinking, presently being modified, in high-level Washington. The hope that Laos might drift on in a neutralist never-never land while Communists tightened their hold on the rest of Indochina reflected an underestimation of how deeply the U.S. humiliation has affected Asian governments (and buttressed popular anti-Western jingoism). This misjudgment was compounded by another: A belief Hanoi would pause to digest South Vietnam before consolidating its hegemony over Indochina.

Thus, the widely derided domino theory is fully revived thanks both to the shock effect of the Vietnam debacle and the militancy of Asian Communists. The lightning collapse of Laos speeds and heightens the danger for Thailand. Future dominoes may be Malaysia and Singapore, with the Philippines and Indonesia menaced in the future.

Laos was the inevitable domino, its fate always determined by events elsewhere. Militant revolutionary communism was exported to dreamy, superstitious Laos by the armies of North Vietnam. All that prevented their quick triumph was intervention by Washington in the form of CIA military advisers, military aid and air support.

No Laotian better understood his country's future dependence on external events than its philosophic prime minister, Prince Souvanna Phouma. Recognizing that Hanoi sought the old French imperial role of ruling all Indochina, Souvanna believed that only "the great powers" — that is, the United States — could prevent it by guaranteeing Laotian independence. Thus, in the late 1960's he changed from neutralist to staunch anti-Communist, defending U.S. bombing of the Ho Chi Minh Trail in the panhandle of Laos. As recently as April 1973, when we last interviewed the Prince, he stoutly opposed unilateral withdrawal of CIA advisers and royal Thai army units.

What returned Souvanna to neutralism was the U.S. congressional surge for disengagement from Indochina. If the Americans were going to abandon South Vietnam and Cambodia, he knew Laos was doomed to conquest unless it accommodated to the Communists. The result was the one-sided 1973 peace treaty establishing a coalition government.

There was strong feeling in the State Department and U.S. embassy in Vientiane that the Lao coalition would muddle along idefinitely even after the Communist conquest of Cambodia and South Vietnam. If the nonviolent Laotians had been left to their own devices, perhaps it would have.

Saigon had not even fallen when, according to well-informed specialists here, the North Vietnamese politburo ordered an offensive. Communist Pathet Lao troops attacked Maj. Gen. Vang Pao's royal Lao army units at the crossroads town of Sala Phou Khoun between Vientiane and the royal capital of Luang Prabang.

If the Pathet Lao had run into trouble, there was help in reserve from 30,000 North Vietnamese regulars, supplied with Soviet tanks and heavy artillery, stationed in Laos. These crack troops no longer could be neutralized by U.S. B52 bombing strikes. Nor did Vang Pao's troops any longer benefit from CIA guidance or Thai artillery support. Demoralized, the royal Lao troops retreated.

Vang Pao called on air support from obsolete T28 propeller-driven fighter-bombers piloted by plucky Meo tribesmen, but that only fit into Hanoi's scenario. The Communists listed this as one of many provocations by royal Lao armed forces and demanded the resignation of right-wing ministers and generals.

Old (73), sick and terribly tired, Prince Souvanna Phouma backed this virtual coup to prevent bloodshed. With no possibility of outside help, the domino fell. Rightist cabinet ministers decamped to Thailand along with top officers in Vang Pao's command. Vang Pao himself, leader of the Meo people as well as a royal Lao army general, surrendered his command but stayed with the Meos in their once doughty fortress of Long Tieng to await the grim future. Souvanna and King Savang Vatthana may remain as figureheads, but will be followed by the People's Republic of Laos.

The case of Laos as a domino is unique in inevitablity and speed but not in kind. The same conditions prevail in Thailand. While Bangkok frenetically seeks to cut ties with Washington and accommodate to its Communist neighbors, three separate insurgencies intensify, with help from Peking and Hanoi. The northeast Thai insurgents, with a remarkable record for cutting up government troops, are guided by the Chinese and supplied by the North Vietnamese. The long-range prognosis for preserving Thailand from Communist control: mediocre.

How quickly other dominoes fall cannot be forecast. But Asia today faces confident revolutionary communism with Hanoi, far from immersed in postwar reconstruction, encouraging it everywhere. If that pattern holds, the Laos domino is only the first. Others will fall, more slowly, but with stakes incomparably higher.

Mr. Lee's common sense

We are indebted to Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew of Singapore for the most sensible thing said yet about the consequences in the world from the American refusal to save the Saigon government from final defeat at the hands of Hanoi.

While President Ford and Secretary of State Kissinger were reassuring every VIP visitor who stopped by (and the list has been a long one) that the United States will keep its commitments, Mr. Lee suggested that it would be helpful for the President and the Congress to speak with one voice.

The statesmen of the world are no dummies. All of them have long since learned something about the way the American Constitution operates. They know without anyone having to tell them that a president in Washington can make valid commitments only by and with the consent of the Congress.

The American creditability about which Dr. Kissinger so worries these days results from the fact that President Nixon made commitments without the knowledge or consent of anyone in the Congress. The text of his letters to former President Thieu of Vietnam belong to an aberrant phase in American history. Mr. Nixon was certainly not the first American President to make private commitments but I know of no case in American history where any other President made such a strong commitment without any assurance of congressional backing.

Those commitments to President Thieu were characteristic of what is now generally called the era of the "imperial presidency." Beginning with the Kennedy administration there was a growing assumption around the White House that a president could commit the United States by his own word.

Any president at any time can commit himself. He can say, quite properly, that under certain circumstances he will try to persuade the Congress to take some special course of action. But he cannot promise that the course of action will be taken. That must depend on the Congress. Mr. Nixon made a specific promise to President Thieu that in the event of a violation of the Paris agreements he would take military action.

That promise had come to seem normal around the White House by 1973. It would not have been normal in the pre-Kennedy period of American history. Eisenhower was extremely careful to operate foreign policy exclusively within the limits of known congressional approval. President Truman was equally scrupulous. In the period just before Pearl Harbor President Roosevelt was widely accused of lagging behind public opinion. He had no intention of making a single warlike step without first being sure he had Congress, and public opinion, behind him.

The willingness of the United States to fulfill its commitments is not in question. But the ability of any president to make a secret commitment on his own responsibility is in tatters.

Prime Minister Lee has put his finger on this point. A presidential policy without the approval of Congress is worthless. It always should have been, and usually was. President Ford cannot regain the confidence of the outside world by merely asserting what will happen. He will regain it (insofar as it may have been lost) by practicing a foreign policy limited strictly to what Congress and public opinion will support.

Perhaps it would be a prudent thing to have a review of all existing American commitments. Let Congress go over the list and decide in each case whether the commitment should be confirmed or repudiated. Perhaps there has been too much in the way of easy commitments. Probably fewer than all the commitments on the books right now would have assured congressional approval if put to the test.

No one can actually know right now what the United States might do under all circumstances. I think we do know that it will sustain the NATO alliance and its members. It is committed to fight for South Korea by contract and by the fact of 38,000 American troops there now. (The U.S. Second Infantry Division is deployed between the frontier and Seoul.) The U.S. is bound both by treaty and by obvious self-interest to fight for Japan. Beyond that? There are some murky places on the map where the extent of the American commitment may well be fuzzy and uncertain.

Such uncertainty can be dangerous. It was fatal in 1950 when the North Koreans thought they could march South without any American intervention. They made a mistake. It is desirable, indeed it is urgently vital, to avoid the danger of someone making a similar mistake in the future. There should be no doubt about what the United States will or won't do.

The way to remove those doubts is for President and Congress to speak with one voice. In effect, that means for the President to be careful to keep always within the limits of congressional support. President Ford is, I submit, operating well within those boundaries.

LAOS -- CONTINUED

Thus, both a large American evacuation and the creation of thousands of refugees seem unlikely prospects. Even if an evacuation were necessary, it would be far simpler than in South Vietnam or Cambodia because only the Mekong River separates Vientiane from the security of Thailand.

To be sure, the events of the last week, particularly last Friday's demonstration, have caused some nervousness among foreigners. "Lots of people were confused and the rumors became way too dire," an American said. "People wouldn't let their kids go swimming at a pool four miles outside of town. People started mailing home things like their jewelry."

U.S. Embassy charge d'affaires Christian A. Chapman held a meeting Monday evening at a movie theater inside Vientiane's AID compound with about 120 American residents. Chapman did not mention evacuation plans and reassured the group that the Laos government still wanted friendly relations with the United States.

"They've told us so many times we're beginning to believe it," said one person who attended the meeting.

Chapman also distributed a circular saying, "I do not believe that there exists at this time any significant danger to American personnel; if I believed that such danger did exist, I would obviously have taken other and appropriate measures to meet the situation."

For foreign Asian residents, the situation is much graver. Many are Chinese and Indian businessmen who do not see a future for themselves under Pathet Lao rule. Many have left Laos, and more will do so.

U.S. Embassy officials say they helped some of their roughly 75 Vietnamese employes in Laos to leave the country. But they left unexplained how the Vietnamese, who hold South Vietnamese passports which the Lao government no longer recognizes, obtained necessary exit visas.

Many observers expect that in the next few days the coalition government will announce new cabinet ministers to replace the rightists who resigned. They undoubtedly will be pliable officials who will bend to the will of the Pathet Lao. The Pathet Lao will probably also move slowly to integrate the national army with its own force.

But neither step should be particularly dramatic. Referring to Premier Souvanna Phouma, who has apparently decided to work with the Pathet Lao to bring about the reunification of Laos, one diplomat said, "The Pathet Lao already make the decisions and put them up to the prime minister, who signs the paper."

AF SPACE TESTING: Although details are sketchy, the Air Force may have suffered a setback in its program to develop new methods of satellite survivability. The service on April 12 lost a satellite when the modified Atlas F missile launching it from Vandenberg AFB, Calif., had to be destroyed 301 seconds into the mission. The Atlas' engines lost thrust for an as yet unexplained reason. The satellite was one of a series in the AF's Space Test Program, which has been emphasizing perfection of survivability techniques in the face of a potential threat by the Soviet Union to disable U.S. military spacecraft. The April 12 satellite was bound for polar orbit.

Detente Always Sounds Good, but Seeing Is Believing

By JERRY GREENE

Washington, May 14 — From the viewpoint of the average American taxpayer, the appearance of two Russian destroyers in Boston harbor this week is about the only evidence of detente to become visible since the French word for relaxed tensions suddenly became popular a few years back.

Of course it is comforting for the public blood pressure to witness the peaceful exchange of warship visits — two American destroyers are at anchor at Leningrad — with crews of both vessels making like carefully chaperoned tourists.

It is helpful for peace of mind, too, to hear of the massed Soviet leadership signing a statement on the anniversary of VE Day hailing the advent of an era of "peace and reason" following an end to the Cold War.

But it is more encouraging to the practical-minded to find Secretary of State Kissinger moving about the U.S dropping large hints to the Russians that detente must be a two-way street if it is to be worth much or last very long.

In his appearance at St. Louis a couple of days ago, Kissinger combined a touch of optimism with a veiled warning to the Russians: "The U.S. is determined to maintain the hopeful new trends in U.S.-Soviet relations on the basis of realism and reciprocity. But it is equally determined to resist pressures or the exploitation of local conflicts."

Kissinger, in what could be called an extension of President Ford's caution earlier about other nations fishing in the world's troubled waters, told his St. Louis audience that Russia's willingness to exploit strategic opportunities "constitutes a heavy mortgage on detente."

That was about as tough as Kissinger has ever been in speaking publicly about Russia and detente, a slightly hardened line of considerable significance coming shortly before his meeting next Monday with Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko. The two will confer in Vienna on the stalled strategic arms limitation talks (SALT) and a new Geneva conference on the Middle East.

By odd coincidence, the apparent development of a turn toward realism in detente emerged at the White House and State Department at the time of publication of a new study of the subject by the American Enterprise Institute. The author of the small book, Vladimir Petrov, is a professor of international affairs at George Washington University.

Petrov did not oppose detente, but he said that he was presenting "an argument in favor of maximum realism in appraising our own strengths and weaknesses as well as those of the adversary and of the international environment in general."

The professor held that contrary to a common view in this country, Soviet - American detente does not signify the end of adversary relationships but a rejection of war and threat of war as the ultimate means of resolving their conflicts. Petrov could not find a defined consensus in the U.S., including the government, as to what detente is about except for a general view that it reduces the threat of a nuclear war and promises a reduction in the cost of armaments.

Petrov's research convinced him that the Middle East has been "a most difficult testing ground for detente" for both the U.S. and the Soviets, that Americans may have had "unrealistically high" hopes for cooperation in working out a peaceful settlement.

The author foresaw an inevitable, continuing rivalry between the U.S. and Russia in the Middle East, with neither superpower ever able to fully dominate the region.

Viet failure and detente

By Henry Huglin

What effects can our great failure in Vietnam have on the tenuous and limited detente between our country and Soviet Russia?

Well, conceivably, it may lead to the Soviets abandoning detente — and the world becoming considerably more dangerous for us and other peoples

Or, whatever detente remains may be an even more onesided affair than it now is — unless we can restore our weakened position in the world effectively and soon.

Though important, detente has really been more illusion than substance.

Since the Soviets' failure over sneaking nuclear missiles into Cuba in 1962, they have talked relatively softly, touted detente, and lulled us and most of the rest of the noncommunist world. Meanwhile, they have markedly built up their military strength to try to attain superiority over us. They have also flooded arms into the Arab nations and stirred the Mideast cauldron. And they have massively armed the North Vietnamese and at least tacitly encouraged them in their gross violations of the Paris accords and pursuit of their military conquest of South Vietnam.

NOW WE MAY be at a crucial turning point in our relations with the Soviets.

Our nation's strengths, will, and dynamism played the major role in what stability, countering of aggression, and peaceful progress there have been in the world for 30 years, and constituted a major reason for the Soviets' willingness to pursue detente.

However, now, as the result of the appearance that we lost our will and let the South Vietnamese down in their greatest crisis, our image abroad is weakened.

As a result, the Soviets may now adopt toughened conditions for detente, in taking even more adamant stances than those they have already taken in the drawn-out and fruitless but important negotiations on European Security and Co-operation and on Mutual and Balanced Force Reductions in Europe.

The Soviets may even try to exploit our apparent weakness of will and withdrawal from a resolute superpower role. They may well start putting pressure, subtly or openly, on us and on our allies and the neutral nations to swing things their way, or else; and they step up their encouragement of subversion and violent revolution in weak countries wherever they can.

So, detente may go by the board or become even more illusory than it is now

OH, THE SOVIETS will continue to be willing to negotiate; a tenet of communist doctrine has long been that negotiations are a means to achieve their expansionist aims But they have always been hard negotiators, with the basic attitude which President Kennedy described — when Chairman Khrushchev threatened to blockade Berlin in 1961 — as "What's mine is mine, what's yours is negotiable."

Further, the Soviets reinforced their "what's mine is mine" attitude in the "Brezhnev Doctrine" — after they suppressed the Czechoslovakian liberalization movement in the "Prague Spring" of 1968. This doctrine, in effect, declares that once a nation has a communist government, it will not be allowed to change to another form of government or even to moderate its regime in ways unacceptable to the Kremlin.

This "Brezhnev Doctrine" is complementary to the Soviets' other doctrine of so-called "peaceful coexistence" which, in essence, amounts to a policy of avoiding open war between them and us, but allowing them to continue encouragement and political and military support of subversion or conquest by force of arms of whatever regimes are in charge in noncommunist nations — to install communist ones with links to Moscow.

SO, WE ARE now likely to have a time of testing by the Soviets. After the Bay of Pigs fiasco in 1961, the Kremlin interpreted that bungle as a weakness of will and perceived an opportunity to sneak their nuclear missiles into Cuba — regardless of our overwhelming military superiority at the time. What may the Kremlin be tempted to do to capitalize on our perceived present weakness, when our will power is widely questioned and our military superiority is rapidly fading?

Now, a cause for further concern is that we Americans will not soon be able to reach a renewed consensus as to what the world is like and what our role should be. Our reactions to Vietnam have so warped our normal perspective that we may not be able collectively to think clearly and determine a sound future foreign affairs course — without a grave crisis which would bring our situation into stark perspective.

We need to hope that, whatever crisis jolts us out of our widespread escapist mood of wishful-thinking isolationism, it will not be so crucial as to present us with a ghastly choice of backing down to Soviet power and toughness or risking nuclear war.

We should — but likely won't until we face a severe crisis — realistically focus anew on the world and its dangers and inescapable responsibilities for us, renew our strengths, will, confidence, and unity, and gird ourselves for coming challenges.

CURRIE URGES RESTRAINT ON TECHNOLOGY EXCHANGE

Sees Danger In Loss Of Technological Initiative

Dr. Malcolm Currie, the Pentagon's director of research and engineering, yesterday was urging restraint in the United States approach to the issue of exporting its technology either to our NATO allies or to the Soviet Union.

Currie, warning that the U. S. technology "is one of the few key assets we have left with which to barter on a world-wide basis," said it should also be recognized that "our military friends are also our industrial competitors."

'Under Guise Of Detente'

The Pentagon research director told an economic gathering in Detroit that the Soviet Union is attempting "under the guise of detente" to eliminate its great deficiency in production technology through the acquisition of complete turn-key plant operations in the critical, high-technology areas.

He said the Soviet technique for acquiring this technology is designed to "appeal to our sometimes naive acceptance" of the vast new markets and the U. S. quest to solve its immediate trade deficit and cash flow problems.

Currie said the sharing of technology with the U. S. allies could produce dividends "under the right circumstances." He said this "complex issue" must be approached with caution and after extensive study and, then, the U. S. should demand two requirements before the technology is sold: 1) a measurable and appropriate long-term quid pro quo; 2) the U. S. must re-invest to keep its advanced technology reservoir full.

Stressing that the Soviet Union has "clearly achieved strategic nuclear parity," while their "staggering" momentum and level of effort continue. Currie pointed out that the Soviets recently declared that technology is "the most important area of competition between the two major world-opposed systems."

He said the Pentagon is urgently in need of the $10 billion R&D program it is requesting of the Congress for FY 1976, not only to pursue developments affecting the strategic and conventional balance of power, but "to begin to revitalize the fundamental base of technology on which continued security rests."

Currie said the new Congressional budget committees offer a bright hope and are a healthy development, because of the need to have a multi-year approach to financial planning as a part of the legislative process. He said, however, the program is still operating in confusion and has not taken the necessary steps to make long term trade-offs among priorities, "to really recognize the implications of current legislation."

Currie expressed hope that these new committees will set up a system where all areas of concern in the national budget are perceived as controllable. He explained that by 1980 at the current rate, "the so-called 'uncontrollable' socio-economic programs" will have an annual growth larger than the entire Defense budget. "We're reaching a point where the whole Defense establishment could be cancelled, and we would only stave off the problems of national spending on socio-economic programs by less than a year."

He said one of the major sources of strength in the U. S. is the close interrelationship between the civil and military technology areas. He said this relationship has paid off well -- "Our national defense requirements have driven technology to a level of excellence which benefits our society as a whole. At the same time, our defense needs have been well served by strong civil industry."

Currie said this is a source of power, "this interlocking strength," lacking in the Soviet system "and their leaders know it." He said their civil technology "is still shabby" and they are striving to catch up. One way is their efforts to acquire turn-key production capabilities in such areas as integrated circuits, computers, computer software, aircraft, jet engines, avionics and specialized instruments.

'Not Optimistic'

He told the Economic Club of Detroit that they understand the "technological initiative," and what it means to have it and to understand what it means when it is gone. He admitted that he was not optimistic about the future of the nation as a whole to understand and dedicate itself to that initiative.

"Without a revived sense of understanding and commitment, I cannot be optimistic about our future. Will we survive to the year 2000 in the form which we cherish -- or are we in a late Roman period? -- Now is not the time to recede by default from the fundamentals of our greatness."

Israel's 'Inflexible Stand'

By Amos Kenan

A stubborn war of eighty years between the Arab world and the movement for the return to Zion, today embodied by the State of Israel, is on the brink of ending. It would be a pity and a crime if it took another war to convince the parties involved to come to peaceful resolution.

Israel has always said that the Arab world will not discuss frontiers with her; instead the dialogue is always about her right to exist. Now, however, when the Arab world seems ready at last to accept an independent, Jewish political state in the Middle East the Israelis are not responding positively to this extended hand. Almost all the Arab leaders are ready to grant legitimacy to a Jewish state, given Israeli territorial concessions. Yet the Israeli Government maintains an inflexible stand in not being willing to give up conquered territories.

The spark that will ignite the next war is in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. This is what lies behind the failure of Secretary of State Kissinger's recent mission seeking a new Egyptian-Israeli accord. This is why a Geneva conference may be doomed in advance. This is also the reason for the offensive Israel is now initiating, through the American news media, against the Ford Administration.

An international consensus has developed on the question of Israel's frontiers. The Soviet Union, the United States, Western Europe, and Arab countries in direct confrontation with Israel, are willing to grant legitimacy to a Jewish state and even to guarantee the security of Israel's frontiers, provided that Israel withdraws from the territories conquered in June, 1967.

Even the Palestine Liberation Organization has indicated a willingness to recognize Israel, provided that she withdraws from occupied territories and recognizes the Palestinians. The trouble is that no Government in Israel today appears capable of delivering the necessary goods.

It doesn't matter if Yitzhak Rabin thinks one way or the other; the fact is that neither he nor anyone in a position to take over as Prime Minister could convince the public of the necessity for withdrawal.

Any government that tried to convince the Israeli public would be immediately toppled by an angry public, which would accuse that government of selling out. Within Israeli public opinion the extremists rule; the Government is too weak to force them out. Because of its weakness the Government has not in any way prepared the public to accept withdrawal and concessions.

Mr. Kissinger failed because of the Israelis. The Israelis demanded that the Arab world settle for an Israeli promise of only small-scale, insignificant withdrawal. The Arabs were not born yesterday; they, of course, wanted to know what would come next. This, the Israelis were unwilling to tell. Now, many Israelis feel that if they could force Mr. Kissinger out of office and isolate Mr. Ford they could clear the way for postponing a

The way to Mideast peace

By Charles H. Percy

Washington

In our national preoccupation with the rapid-fire sequence of events in Vietnam, there has been a tendency to overlook a blunt warning of trouble ahead in another quarter. Jordan's King Hussein, on a private visit to Washington recently, told us insistently that a new military confrontation in the Middle East could be only months away.

King Hussein has spoken in this ominous way before. When I visited him in January he described the situation in his tinderbox region as "a false peace that is shrinking by the hour." Whatever the timetable, we ignore Hussein's warning and others like it at our peril. Time indeed is running out on our best opportunity to avoid what he calls "the military option" in the Middle East.

Nor can we be at all confident that any new resort to arms can be localized. Renewed fighting between Arab and Israeli will instantly heighten the danger of confrontation between the United States and the Soviet Union, the two superpowers so deeply involved there.

If war comes it will not be because a majority or even a sizable minority on either side wants it. It will come because not enough was done to prevent it.

Seldom in history has a third party labored so diligently — and to some degree successfully — to achieve peace as the U.S. has done and is continuing to do in the Middle East. Yet ultimately only the Arabs and the Israelis themselves can create an accommodation more lasting than the "false peace" we cling to now.

What, then, can the moderate, peace-seeking leadership on both sides do to bring about a settlement that might endure?

To begin with, I believe the Arabs must try to better understand Israel's deep fears for its safety, indeed for its very existence. Such fears are rooted in memories of the holocaust. They were fed by the rhetoric of Nasser, who left Israelis with the impression that he would like to see their young nation pushed into the sea. And currently they are embodied in the "dream" of Arafat — expressed last fall at the United Nations — to create a secular Palestinian state of Muslims, Jews, amd Christians.

To most Israelis, this was a threat to the survival of Israel as a primarily Jewish state. At the very least, the Palestine Liberation Organization's wanton terror raids and its unwillingness to accept Israel's sovereignty can only add to Israel's understandable fears.

Arab leaders could ease those fears by saying publicly and clearly what they have told me and others privately: that they do accept Israel's right to exist. (And while they're at it, they might literally put Israel "on the map" where it rightfully belongs. I have not seen the state of Israel on a single Arab map.)

One step Egypt in particular could take is to allow passage of Israeli-cargo and Israeli-flag ships through the Suez when it is reopened next month. And there are other moves that can come, once it is established that Arab and Israeli intend to coexist in peace: an end to the Arab boycott; the opening of trade and the beginning of cultural and nonmilitary exchanges; the allowing of free migration to Israel of Jews living in the Arab countries, giving them the same rights accorded all other residents.

The Israelis, for their part, must try to dispel the growing impression that they are rigid in negotiations. This does not mean that Israel is expected to take actions contrary to its national security interest; even its enemies would not expect that.

Yet it must understand the unified Arab insistence that there can be no meaningful settlement until a permanent homeland is established for the displaced Palestinians. Who more than the Israelis should be sympathetic to the desire of Palestinians for recognition and a home of their own?

One can understand Israel's reluctance to negotiate with the PLO, given that organization's repugnant record of terrorism and threat. One may also regret that a man who is an acknowledged terrorist chieftain is the chosen spokesman for the Palestinian liberationists — a leader both acknowledged and supported by the entire Arab world. But unhappily in this world we cannot choose our adversaries. If Israel continues to refuse to talk with Arafat and the PLO, there is no possibility of a durable peace.

I also believe there will be no peace for Israel, no security for Israel, until it withdraws from most of the lands it has occupied since the 1967 war. Egypt and Syria are no more likely to passively and permanently forfeit that land than Israel would if the positions were reversed. While adjustments will probably have to be made in the pre-1967 borders, especially along the strategically critical Golan Heights, the return of most of the occupied territory is a prerequisite to any settlement that is to have any chance of success.

At this point, concessions are seen by many in both camps to involve risk. But not to make concessions is to risk more. Those on both sides who hesitate might well recall the admonition of the remarkable former Israeli Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion: "Real peace with our neighbors . . . a settlement they will not reluctantly agree to live with, but will enthusiastically welcome from their hearts as essential for our common future — that is our only true security."

Saudi Arabian Arms Agent Gets $45-Million Fee

Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon has advised a Saudi Arabian businessman it will rise no objection to his collecting a $45-million commission on a fighter maintenance and training contract being negotiated between his government and the United States.

A spokesman for Adnan M. Khashoggi, an arms salesman who has built a fortune representing American companies selling weapons in the Middle East, said Pentagon officials told him reports that the Defense Dept. was alarmed about the size of his prospective fee were inaccurate.

The spokesman, Ed Moss, said Maj. Gen. Howard M. Fish, chief of the Defense Security Assistance Agency, told him it ws "none of our (the Pentagon's) business" how much Khashoggi gets.

"We are neutral," Fish was quoted as saying.

The $45-million fee represents Khashoggi's standard four-to-five per cent take on a proposed $850 million contract offer by the United States for the Northrop Corporation tomaintain Saudi Arabia's fleet of F 5E aircraft and train its pilots.

It is one of the largest agents' fees ever publicly identified.

The contract was negotiated under the foreign military sales program, under this program, the U.S. government buys goods and services from the manufacturer and sells them at cost plus fees and overhead expenses to the recipient government.

Moss said none of the money was used for bribes or purchasing influence in the Middle East. He noted that in Saudi Arabia, all profits from the sale of oil go directly to the king and he distributes them as he see fit. Consequently, public officals are so rich they cannot be bribed.

A statement from Khasoggi distributed here noted that Triad Marketing, the arms middleman company he heads with his two brothers, "acts as interpreters in a sense. We know our country and how to organize the facilities to do the work there. We explain to our government and its experts the technicalities involved in designing and manufacturing highly sophisticated equipment which only a few nations can make."

He noted that his fees are "often less then recommended by the Pentagon to American companies for their representatives all over the world."

Moss noted that one of Fish's assistants, Joseph Hoening, recently advised American arms exporters that agents fees of five or six per cent — and even as high as 21 per cent for small contracts — were standard in most countries.

Hoening — in the same report which was disclosed last week by the Hearst Newspapers — said bribery of public officials by arms manufacturers, through inflated agents fees, was a common practice, particularly in the Middle East.

A spokesman for the Pentagon said, "our position is that we do not advocate bribery." Defense regulations bar contracts containing fees for agents who seek "to obtain any government contract or contracts for its principals through the use of improper influence or which holds itself out as being able to obtain any government contract or contracts through improper influence."

Moscow To Divert Aid From Vietnam To Arabs

Russia is preparing to divert arms shipments originally destined for North Vietnam to the strategically important Middle East.

Modern military equipment, including tanks, armored cars, heavy artillery, and anti-aircraft guns loaded aboard ships at Soviet Pacific coast ports, is to be rerouted to Iraq, Syria and Egypt. That is the private message sent last week from Moscow by an Iraqi delegation to its government following their meeting with top Russian leaders in the Kremlin.

The highly classified message, intercepted by a U.S. intelligence Communication Center in the Middle East, is considered to be one of the most important documents to fall into the hands of U.S. authorities in recent years.

The hard core of the message is that if and when Hanoi puts the finishing touches on the takeover of South Vietnam, massive amounts of Soviet arms earmarked for that battle area can be shifted to pro-Moscow clients in the Middle East.

Shipments to Iraq from the Soviet's Far East stockpiles are expected to begin immediately, with the flow of arms to Syria and Egypt following as soon as Cairo opens the Suez Canal to international shipping. The opening is set for around June 10.

Only a miraculous defense of the Saigon area by the out-gunned and outmanned South Vietnamese military, and setbacks by the invading North Vietnamese, could upset or alter the Kremlin's timetable for the introduction of massive amounts of military equipment from their Far East stockpiles into the Middle East and Persian Gulf area.

As an integral part of the new Middle East arms deal, Soviet leaders have demanded that the three Arab nations join in the Moscow directed diplomatic campaign to force the U.S. to cut off all military aid to the beleaguered South Vietnamese government.

The Russians bluntly told the visiting Iraqi delegation that the quicker South Vietnam falls the sooner massive arms aid will be available from their bulging Far East stockpiles.

Significantly, Soviet diplomats in the Middle East are stressing that the flow of Soviet arms from their Far East stockpiles can be used to pressure the U.S. into forcing concessions from Israel at the coming Geneva Conference.

The reasoning of the Russians is that the last thing in the world that the Ford Administration should want is a build-up of Soviet arms in the Persian Gulf region from two different directions. All of the Soviet arms now flowing into this region are shipped from Black Sea and East German ports or sent via air through Bulgaria.

The new Russian arms aid strategy for the Middle East has caught U.S. policy-makers off guard and so far they haven't figured out what to do about it.

settlement and perhaps for a fresh round of fighting.

A withdrawal from the West Bank has only one meaning for most Israelis: the creation of a Palestinian state. Israelis generally are not willing to recognize the Palestinians and, of course, they are not willing to accept a Palestinian state bordering theirs.

Until now, Israelis could claim in their defense that Palestinian ideology and tactics rendered dialogue impossible. A shift, however, has recently occurred. Even the P.L.O. appears to be willing to recognize Israel under certain conditions. Now, many Israelis argue that this new readiness to recognize Israel is only tactical and lacks long-range credibility.

The view of the Middle East by Israeli political leadership and public opinion bears little relationship to the view of much of the rest of the world. This disparity has led to Israeli isolation. Isolation breeds despair and may lead to war.

The October, 1973, war may at least have taught some Israelis the necessity of making concessions to Egypt and Syria. Not many Israelis are as yet prepared to make concessions to the Palestinians. Certain Israelis believe that their state should initiate a new war soon; they believe that Israel would win and would thereby occupy additional Arab territory. According to this reasoning, Israel could thereafter return the newly acquired territory and hold onto the desired West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Another war in the Middle East would be a historical and political catastrophe for all concerned. Even a military victory would in reality be a defeat for Israel. The increased bitterness and calamity of fighting and loss of life would make peaceful negotiation even more difficult. It is a moral obligation of the American public generally and the American-Jewish public most especially to prevent so deadly a gamble by Israel.

APG Admits Killing Test Animals

By EDWARD COLIMORE
Staff Reporter

Helpless animals were maimed and killed by hard rubber balls fired from experimental, "non-lethal" weapons during U.S. Army tests conducted at Aberdeen Proving Grounds from 1973-1974, an Army spokesman said today.

Hank Paulick, the spokesman, said at least 38 baboons and pigs were killed with the newly-developed gun or put to sleep because of serious injuries suffered in the tests.

"More than 443 animals were used by a team of Army researchers in the Land Warfare Dept.," Paulick said.

"After animal experiments were concluded in June, 1974, the group of researchers disbanded.

"The tests were conducted in compliance with guidelines set down by the National Science Foundation and National Research Council."

However, he said, some animals were killed.

"Those that did not die, but were seriously injured were put to sleep. A veterinarian and pathologist were always present."

Paulick said the project, which was federally-funded through the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration, was to provide data in the weapon's usefulness in fighting crime.

"This type of weapon would be used by a policeman to arrest a purse snatcher. The crime doesn't warrant shooting the suspect, so the patrolman would stun him with a non-lethal projectile. These bullets are sometimes referred to as 'bean bags.'"

The weapon, designed and manufactured by AAI Inc., a Cockeysville firm, uses a non-explosive device to fire hard rubber balls or other bullets.

Although tests have been concluded, AAI Inc., formerly Aircraft Armaments, Inc., has a government contract which does not expire until September, 1975.

Marvin Cahn, vice president of the company which develops military and non-military electronic equipment, siad his designers built a prototype according to government specifications.

"There was some liason," he said. "We had our people present to observe and instruct the Army in use of the weapon.

"Compared to a conventional gun, the weapon exhibits a low velocity and does not use gun powder to power the projectile."

Cahn said he was not aware of the Army's animal experiments.

"The government contacts us and we make a bid. The lowest bidder gets the job. Then we design and manufacture the product. I did not know the details of the tests until recently."

The Army's experiments have drawn much criticism.

Sen. William V. Roth Jr., R-Del., charged the tests were inhumane.

In a letter to Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger and Atty. Gen. Edward H. Levi, Roth said the project "involves unnecessary cruelty to and barbaric treatment of, animals for extremely dubious purposes."

He said projectiles were shot at heads, faces, kidneys and other areas of the animals' bodies to determine the extent of wounds. Roth said the animals are then killed and autopsies performed to assess damage.

The Delaware senator also charged that the experiments were conducted to test the effectiveness fo the "superballs" for possible use as a crowd control weapon.

"I do not believe it is proper or desirable that the sort of weapons contemplated in this project should be used against crowds of human beings," Roth said.

"All too often new, and supposedly more humane weapons, are being misused and too lightly employed."

The $512,000 project also drew criticism from the Maryland Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

Mrs. Mary D. Wilkes, a spokesman for the group, said the tests were "pitiless."

"We have fought Aberdeen Proving Grounds and Edgewood Arsenal all the way to the Pentagon to have inhumane experiments to animals cancelled," She said.

"It seems bold of us to say we have the Pentagon under surveillance, but we do. We won't tolerate cruelty to animals from any source."

ARMS CONTROL TODAY - APRIL 1975(15 MAY)

WHAT POLICY FOR NERVE GAS?

Matthew Meselson

During World War II Germany produced, but did not use, a new super-toxic class of lethal chemicals, the nerve gases. During the 1950s and 1960s the United States produced thousands of tons of nerve gas and stockpiled nerve gas weapons designed for tactical battlefield use. These are stored mainly in the continental U.S., with a lesser quantity deployed in Europe, in the Federal Republic of Germany. We have no reliable estimate of the size or the composition of the Soviet poison gas stockpile, although the U.S.S.R. and a number of other countries could readily produce nerve gas.

Lethal chemicals are generally considered to be weapons of mass destruction. For example, under not uncommon meteorological conditions a single light bomber could deliver enough nerve gas to cause a high percentage of fatalities over a downwind area of several square miles. But despite the potential of nerve gas and certain other lethal chemicals for inflicting mass casualties, quite effective protection can be provided for combat troops, in the form of modern gas masks, protective clothing, vehicle air conditioners, and other equipment. Although an initial resort to nerve gas would inflict heavy casualties on military units if caught off guard, its subsequent use against troops with modern protective equipment would be much less effective, a fact of potential importance for chemical arms control.

Edging Toward Chemical Arms Control

The principal treaty dealing with chemical weapons is the Geneva Protocol of 1925. All militarily important nations are parties, including the members of NATO, the Warsaw Pact, and the People's Republic of China. After nearly fifty years of alternating controversy and inattention, the United States has finally become a party to the Protocol, following its ratification by President Ford on January 22, 1975, with the undivided support of the Senate. The Protocol is, in effect, a no-first-use agreement. It does not prohibit stockpiling of chemical weapons or reprisal in kind against a violator. However, the U.S. and U.S.S.R. as parties to the Biological Weapons Convention of 1972 have undertaken, under Article IX, to negotiate effective measures for prohibiting the development, production and possession of chemical weapons of war. At Moscow, in July, 1974, President Nixon and Secretary Brezhnev declared their agreement to consider a joint initiative at the Conference of the Committee on Disarmament (CCD) in Geneva to obtain an international convention eliminating the most lethal chemical weapons. This was reaffirmed by President Ford and Secretary Brezhnev at Vladivostok last November. However, no such initiative has yet been made nor has the United States put forward any proposals of its own.

. . . And Away From It

Meanwhile the Department of Defense has renewed its request, voted down in the House of Representatives last year, for funds to build a facility to produce a new generation of nerve gas weapons, safer to handle and store, called binaries. Only $8.8 million is being sought for the new facility but over the course of several years it would cost approximately $1,000 million to produce binary nerve gas weapons to replace the existing stockpile and perhaps three quarters of a billion more to dispose of the latter. For two years the Defense Department has testified before Congress in favor of binaries, while the Director of the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency has testified against. The case for buying binaries is not that they are more effective on the battlefield—in fact they are not. Rather, the arguments for and against them are largely psychological and political. Advocates consider that their safety features will overcome public opposition to transportation and forward deployment of nerve gas weapons. Critics argue that a major new round of chemical weapons procurement will spoil chances for negotiating a chemical arms control treaty and will stimulate the international proliferation of chemical weapons.

U.S. Policy at a Crossroads

While the dispute over binaries has occupied center stage, the present situaton represents a crossroads of a more fundamental nature. Broadly defined, the choice is between (1) replacement of the existing stockpile with binaries or at

Unconditional Amnesty Haunts Ford

— By J. F. TERHORST —

Washington — Thinking the unthinkable is an exercise for which Presidents rarely seem to find time. Yet President Ford pondered the unthinkable for his administration the other day — unconditional amnesty for the young Americans who fled the country rather than serve in Vietnam.

He waded only briefly, then moved on to more pressing matters on his agenda. But the thought remains in the back of Gerald Ford's mind, where he has thrust it for now. It is one of those things that will not go away.

The occasion was a staff meeting in the President's office last week. Ford assistants were pleased with the public reaction to his earlier news conference, especially because Ford had looked so "presidential."

But a question had come up. While the President had rightly insisted on the necessity of welcoming thousands of Vietnamese refugees seeking sanctuary here, he had declined to offer this same hand of fellowship to the thousands of American boys who, for reasons of conscience, had refused to fight in Vietnam. The inconsistency of the administration's position already had been noted on the editorial pages of a few major papers. Others, too, would soon note it. What about it, sir?

The point had not escaped Ford. Having adopted the theme that "The war in Vietnam is over" and that recrimination and anger must now give way to healing and unity, the White House could not easily argue that America should deal more generously with the Vietnamese who fled their country than with America's own sons.

The room fell silent while the President reflected, but it was obvious from the impatient stirrings of key aides, including his staff chief, Donald Rumsfeld, and Coundelor Robert Hartmann, that unconditional amnesty was an issue fraught with explosive politics.

An Officer's Scornful Quip

A senior staffer punctured the silence with a scornful quip. Perhaps, he suggested, the draft evaders could be welcomed home and Medals of Honor given them by the President.

Ford sighed and asked Rumsfeld to get on with the rest of the day's schedule.

The amnesty question, nonetheless, is getting more gingery every day, and not only for Ford. The Presidential Clemency Board, expanded from nine to 18 members by executive order, began a three-day session even though the names of the newcomers had not been formally announced by the White House. According to Chairman Charles Goodell, the board couldn't afford to waste a day if it were to complete its review of approximately 20,000 cases of draft evasion and military desertion by the September deadline.

In addition, the White House Office of Management and Budget is looking into the board's mushrooming staff of almost 400 people on temporary assignment from other agencies. They investigate each of the cases and make recommendations for clemency action. Most of these cases involve young men under 20 who have been convicted of military or draft offenses and seek a chance to clear their names by performing alternative-service work for up to 24 months. Because of the legal complexities of each case, Goodell has insisted that two thirds of his staff have legal experience—thus making the clemency program one of the highest-priced temporary projects in the federal government.

New Problems Cropping Up

Meanwhile, new problems crop up in the field. Because of high unemployment, many of the clemency applicants cannot find jobs in which to perform their alternative service. And some who do find approved employment have been forced out of work by hard-liners who contend that such jobs should go to honorably discharged Vietnam veterans. "Unfortunately," the board wrote the mother of one Kansas youth, "some Americans have not found it in themselves to react in the spirit of forgiveness and reconciliation."

Despite his rejection of the idea the other day, the concept of unconditional amnesty continues to tug at Ford.

Determined to cut federal spending, he is keenly aware of the millions of dollars being spend on his limited amnesty program and its uneven results.

Now that the war is over, his lawyer's instincts tell him also that equity is not served by demanding more from the young Americans who fled Vietnam service than from the Vietnamese who fled to save their lives—some of whom reportedly evaded military duty in their own land. As a father of three sons of draft age who did not have to serve, he is conscious, too, that others' sons could not take advantage of draft-law loopholes. And Ford knows that if he could use his moral authority to evacuate so many Vietnamese from Saigon, he has the same authority to welcome home the wayward Americans in Canada and Sweden.

At the moment, the President is dissuaded from so doing by the feeling that those who didn't serve in Vietnam owe a debt to those who did—and by the certain knowledge, abetted by his staff, that the political right would have one more reason to oppose him for the presidency next year.

However unthinkable just now, the thought of undonditional amnesty is on Ford's mind. As he said at his news conference, "There's always a chance in the future if the facts justify it." He will find them.

U.S. Residence Hit In Buenos Aires

Reuter

BUENOS AIRES, May 14—The residence here of U.S. ambassador Robert Hill was riddled with machine-gun bullets tonight, U.S. embassy sources said.

Police guarding the residence exchanged fire with a group of men who were operating from a car. Police said one guard was wounded and two attackers were arrested.

The embassy sources said Hill witnessed the attack from a window and was not hurt.

cord the rejection of the current inventory, possibly with some modifications to suit newer types of aircraft and artillery, and (2) renunciation of lethal chemical weapons, either through international agreement or unilaterally, seeking a treaty afterwards.

It is not maintained that chemical weapons are needed to deter war itself. Our conventional and nuclear forces serve that role. Neither do senior officials consider that we would have any important incentive to be the first to attack with gas should major war occur. Stated U.S. policy has long been not to start poison gas warfare, a doctrine further solidified by U.S. ratification of the Geneva Protocol. Rather, it is argued that the prospect of retaliation in kind would contribute importantly to deterring the Soviets from using the nerve gas that they must be assumed to possess and that, if such deterrence fails, our retaliation could enable us to defend Europe without necessitating immediate resort to nuclear weapons. The rationale for these beliefs rests not on the direct casualty-producing capability of nerve gas, which would be minimized by the use of protective equipment, but rather on the reduction in fighting efficiency that results from wearing masks and suits and taking other protective measures. It is contended that the ability to retaliate in kind in the combat zone and in rear support areas would allow us to impose on the Soviets the same protective posture they impose on us, greatly reducing the advantages to them of any protracted use of gas. However, it must be admitted that our retaliatory capability does nothing to reduce the advantage to the Soviets inherent in the initial casualties and confusion that could be inflicted by a surprise gas attack on our forces.

But technical military considerations aside, the case for having nerve gas rests on psychological assumptions that go to the heart of NATO defense doctrine. Would our nerve gas deter Soviet first use or would it instead encourage them to think of a desperate moment that they might use nerve gas to break a battlefield deadlock without provoking a nuclear response? And if NATO is attacked with nerve gas, would our retaliation in kind help to gain time and promote the sanity needed to terminate hostilities? Or would it so complicate the calculations of both sides as to preclude the clarity of analysis and communication needed to stop a war short of all-out nuclear exchange? Indeed, must not nuclear weapons inevitably come rapidly into play in response to any determined Soviet thrust into Europe, thereby completely overshadowing the question of gas warfare?

Setting the Example

It is generally agreed that in addition to the cost in resources, there are other costs of stockpiling nerve gas and having an active nerve gas program. Today no nonnuclear nation is thought to have stockpiled nerve gas weapons. It is very much in our interest to preserve this situation. Our great wealth allows us to expend enormous quantities of conventional munitions in tactical war and to maintain large strategic and tactical nuclear forces. Very few countries even approach this capability. However, nerve gas weapons have the potential of wide area coverage at relatively low cost. Their proliferation would greatly enhance the capability of smaller countries and perhaps even of dissident paramilitary groups for threat, harassment, and destruction. The United States and the Soviet Union set the pace and direction of military developments throughout the world. The more interest we display in nerve gas weapons, the more we pioneer their technology and invest in them, the more lesser military powers are likely to question their case for refraining from acquiring nerve gas weapons of their own.

On a different level of concern, the rapid and accelerating advancement of biochemistry and the biological sciences is inevitably leading to a profound ability to manipulate life processes for good or ill. Over the long run, it may be very important to create an international consensus that such knowledge is not to be exploited for military purposes. The possession of nerve gas weapons maintains institutional commitments to such exploitation. In contrast, if nerve gas can be eliminated we would be free to create an atmosphere in which our increasing knowledge of life processes is directed solely to man's benefit and in which research is conducted under the more or less open public scrutiny that is probably necessary to ensure such beneficial use.

SUMMARY OF NETWORK NEWS IN THIS ISSUE

John CHANCELLOR, Charles QUINN, Catherine MACKIN, Carl STERN and Richard VALERIANI, all of NBC News, report on the rescue of the Mayaguez. QUINN reports on the sinking of the gunboats; the securing of the Mayaguez by Marines; the landing on Koh-Tang island; air strikes; the recovery of the crew; and a statement by Secretary SCHLESINGER on freedom of the seas in reference to the military action. He also includes a statement by Secretary LAITIN concerning the removal of U.S. forces from the area. He reports two dead, a dozen wounded and 14 missing. MACKIN reports on statements by Senators GOLDWATER, JACKSON, NELSON and others concerning the U.S. military action in Cambodia. STERN reports on the question of Presidential authority versus the War Powers Act of 1973. Arthur LORD, NBC, reports on the adverse reaction of the Thais to the use of Thailand as a staging area for the attack. CHANCELLOR reports a summary of the Mayaguez rescue; the Cambodian transmission; public support for the action; notification of the Congress; and other nations' reactions to the incident. VALERIANI reports on the current diplomatic relationship with Thailand in the aftermath of the Mayaguez rescue. CHANCELLOR reports that the three AID officials in Laos are still captive and have been threatened with death. CHANCELLOR reports on a statement by Sea-Land Services, Inc., chairman MAKAVOY concerning the mission and the cargo of the Mayaguez.

Bob SCHIEFFER, Ike PAPPAS, Phil JONES, Mike LEE, David DOW and Eric SEVAREID, all of CBS News, report and comment on the Mayaguez rescue and related topics. PAPPAS gives a chronology of the unfolding of events of the military aspect of the rescue operation from beginning to end. JONES reports that the difficulties in the operation were the lack of information on the whereabouts of the crew and the lack of communication between the two governments. He includes a statement by President FORD on the rescue of the crew. LEE reports on a statement by a Sea-Land spokesman thanking the military and the government for the rescue. He also includes a statement by a member of a captured seaman's family and his reaction to the rescue. DOW interviews Lloyd BUCHER on his reaction to the rescue operation and on what would have or have not happened if the U.S. had intervened militarily to rescue the Pueblo. SEVAREID comments on the success of the mission; reviews the underlying assumptions for the rescue mission; discusses the procedure in international law; and probable reasons why the U.S. undertook the military rescue. SCHIEFFER reports on casualties of the operation; telegrams coming into the President and other items.

Harry REASONER, Howard K. SMITH, Frank TOMLINSON and Frank REYNOLDS, all of ABC News, report on the Mayaguez rescue. TOMLINSON reports on the military facits of the operation, the securing of the ship and fighting at Koh-Tang island, and on the smoothness of the operation. REYNOLDS gives a chronology of the unfolding events in the rescue operation, including the communication between the U.S. and Cambodia. REASONER comments on what it means to be a Pacific power now in relation to 40 years ago and on the doubtful usefullness of Thailand as an American ally.

Mayaguez Returned; Reactions

JOHN CHANCELLOR: Good evening. The rescue of the American ship Mayaguez has been successful, its 39 crewmen have been returned safely to their ship and the Marines who landed on Koh-Tang island in the Gulf of Siam to accomplish all this are now off the island and on the carrier Coral Sea. There was heavy fighting. The cost is presently reckoned at one Marine, one Air Force man killed, some wounded -- we don't know how many -- and around 14 missing, eight Marines and six Air Force helicopter crewmen. The crew of the Mayaguez suffered no injuries, they were found afloat in a fishing boat with fishermen from Thailand apparently released by the Cambodians. This is Defense Department film of part of the operation in which a number of helicopters were lost or damaged. There's Koh-Tang island as the Marines headed in toward the beach. It was a tough landing and for a time the helicopters couldn't land because of heavy Cambodian fire. The Cambodian guns were silenced by American planes, but even so, some of the helicopters were hit. Our correspondent Charles Quinn has spent the last few days at the Pentagon covering the Mayaguez story. Here he is now with the story of what happened.

CHARLES QUINN: The first American strike came late Tuesday night, Washington time, off the island of Koh-Tang against the Cambodian gunboats which had seized the Mayaguez. The Americans said they did it to stop planes from moving the captured American seamen to the mainland, three gunboats were destroyed. Twenty-one hours later President FORD ordered the rescue of the Mayaguez and its crew. Marines, flying by helicopter from Thailand, landed on the destroyer Holt, then boarded the Mayaguez. No one was aboard but in the ship's mess the Marines found warm food and hot tea. At the same time more Marines and helicopters invaded the island of Koh-Tang. The first chopper moving in was shot down about 100 feet offshore. Five minutes later a second chopper came in and was hit, it crashlanded on the beach, the Marines got out and took cover. A third helicopter was also knocked down on the beach, more choppers came, the Marines swarmed out, the fight was on. Just before 11 o'clock last night an air strike was ordered from the carrier Coral Sea against Ream airbase on the mainland near the port of Kampong Som. At about the same time the destroyer Wilson, also lying off the island of Koh-Tang reported a small fishing boat approaching from the direction of the mainland under a white flag. Minutes later the crew of the Mayaguez scrambled aboard the destroyer, the Americans were safe. Fighting on Koh-Tang continued, resistance was stiff, at times heavy. Half the helicopter force was now out of action; three destroyed, two disabled, so the Marines decided to wait for the Coral Sea, still more than six hours away by helicopter. While the fighting was still going on Defense Secretary SCHLESINGER explained the reason for the action.

DEFENSE SECRETARY SCHLESINGER: It represents a much needed and timely reaffirmation of the freedom of the seas and of peaceful transit. Moreover, it represents a firm and measured response to the high handed and crude use of force. A countenancing such an act would have meant the weakening of international order and of civilized communication.

QUINN: The Marines were through by chopper and small boats, sometimes under heavy hostile fire. A number of helicopters were driven off. Finally it was over. Pentagon spokesman Joseph LAITIN announced the end.

SECRETARY JOSEPH LAITIN: At 9:10 AM EDT Washington time the last helicopter brought out a number of Marines and helicopter crewmen which it is believed are the last of the security ground force on the island.

QUINN: The number of American casualties is still not clear, reports are conflicting and incomplete. The best estimates now are two dead, about a dozen wounded, 14 missing. Much earlier today SCHLESINGER said the price paid was significant but small, he said, in relation to the contribution to this nation and the civilized world. Charles Quinn, NBC News, Washington.

CHANCELLOR: The White House, in commenting on a Cambodian radio offer to give up the ship, indicated that because of the nature of the transmission it wasn't sure the offer was the real thing and that soon after that the attack in any case was underway. But there was general jubilation at the White House. Tom Brokaw has the story of the President's involvement.

operation. A national poll conducted by NBC News this week shows support for military action from about two out of every three people polled.

CHANCELLOR: President FORD notified Congress early today in a letter of the military action he had ordered to rescue the Mayaguez and its crew. That was in conformance with the War Powers Act of two years ago which requires the President to make such a report within 48 hours of the time the action is taken. However, in a single sentence at the end of the letter he said he took the action pursuant to the constitutional authority, making no mention of the War Powers Act. Catherine Mackin has more on that and on congressional reaction.

CATHERINE MACKIN: The letter was a brief summary of the Cambodian incident with a concluding paragraph that said the President ordered the operation under his authority as commander in chief. Senate leader Mike MANSFIELD said there was nothing new in it but the President had lived up to the War Powers Act in reporting to Congress. There was more criticism in Congress today than earlier of all the military power President FORD used, although some refused to go on the record with their criticism. But most in Congress strongly supported the President. Here is a sample of opinion on both sides.

SENATOR GOLDWATER: And had he not done what he did every little -- as I say half assed -- nation in the world would be taking shots at us. And I think now they're going to think twice before they try it.

SENATOR JACKSON: And I give him high marks in that he did in the end restrain the use of force in the operation.

SENATOR GAYLORD NELSON: It is they believe that this is the way that a super power has to prove its virility and its credibility, but I think it's more a sign of weakness than strength to respond in this way to an incident which was relatively minor.

CONGRESSMAN: I sense in the Congress and in the administration in recent weeks a great deal of frustration because of the way Vietnam ended. And I think there probably was something of a reflex to want to prove that we were tough, prove that we were willing to act decisively and perhaps take military action.

MAN: You'd think that the Cambodians had landed in San Diego the way the President reacted to this.

MACKIN: The general view in Congress, even before the mail starts coming in, is that the President's conduct in this incident will be overwhelmingly politically popular in the country. When the costs are known both in dollars and in manpower the feeling is this could change somewhat, but in the short term the Cambodian incident stands to be a political plus for Mr. FORD. Catherine Mackin, NBC News, Washington.

CHANCELLOR: Others, however, were raising the question of whether President FORD, in ordering military action to rescue the ship and the men, had complied with the War Powers Act of two years ago in which Congress established its right to be consulted before the President takes any such action. For more on that story here's Carl Stern.

CARL STERN: The White House has once again shown Congress (unintelligible) how American forces are used. There was barely a whimper from Congress, which only two years ago decided overwhelmingly that it should have a voice in such matters. Presidential Counsel Phillip BUCHEN (?) said there wasn't time to consult Congress beforehand, and even if there had been such planning can't be shared with Congress. He said the Senators and Congressmen are not bound by secrecy laws. He said any dissident could thwart the operation just by divulging it. Whaamo, said BUCHEN, all Hell would break loose. On the other hand, Harvard law expert Ronald BERGER (?) called the action unconstitutional and deplorable. He said that President FORD had done great damage to the idea of consulting Congress and that Congress had just caved in. He also criticized the President's action as machismo to show we're still men after Vietnam and he questioned whether the U.S. had exhausted every diplomatic step first as international law seems to require. On Capitol Hill Jacob JAVITS, the author of the 1973 War Powers Bill, said the President's compliance with the bill was not 100 percent, but added that any inquiries into the legality of the action at this point would be nit-picking. Carl Stern, NBC News, Washington.

CHANCELLOR: ...the military action as piracy. Japan said a container ship in open waters must not be seized. Israel expressed gratitude that a dangerous situation has ended. Some newspapers in many countries criticized the American operation, while others applauded it. There was angry reaction from Thailand as Arthur Lord reports.

ARTHUR LORD: The news that U.S. Marines and planes from Thailand were used in the Mayaguez rescue operation sparked a fresh round of anti-American demonstrations in Bangkok. A small group of students gathered in front of the American Embassy, yelling anti-American slogans demanding that the U.S. pull all its military forces out of Thailand. The demonstrators presented U.S. officials with a list of their demands which was accepted by a charge d'affairs. Local newspapers scored the United States for the action. One newspaper editorial called it a slap in the face of Thailand. Thai government officials, aware of the mixed feelings of the people and worried about Communist takeovers in Vietnam and Cambodia, seemed embarrassed about the whole operation.

DECLASSIFIED

THAI OFFICIAL: (Unintelligible)

CHANCELLOR: The United States has now ordered the last of the 1,100 man Marine rescue force out of Thailand. And the Thai Prime Minister Kukrit PRAMOJ criticized the United States for bringing them in in the first place, for using Thailand as a staging area. The United States is preparing a response, as Richard Valeriani reports.

RICHARD VALERIANI: The Thais are especially angry because they were given no advance word of the American military action. The administration is now considering a formal apology to Thailand for having used that country as a springboard despite its protests. The apology would contend that the United States had no alternatives once it became clear that diplomatic efforts were not working. But Thai diplomats indicate that an apology would be regarded as a minimum response to their protests and they feel something more has to be done to resolve the crisis which they regard as serious. They scoff at the contention of a senior State Department official who maintains that Thailand is saying one thing publicly and another thing privately. However officials here do not foresee a break in relations. Apart from the Thai reaction top administration officials are highly pleased with the results of the operation. They claim they gave diplomacy every chance to achieve results but when they got absolutely no response from the Cambodians they felt they had to act forcefully to preserve American credibility in that part of the world. One top official here said one purpose of the military action was to signal mainland China and North Korea that the United States still considers itself a major Pacific power and will act like one when it has to. Richard Valeriani, NBC News, at the State Department.

AID Officials Hostage in Laos

CHANCELLOR: In Laos three American officials taken hostage by Laotian students yesterday are under house arrest today. The State Department says they're safe, but there are reports that the students have threatened to kill them. Laotian officials are trying to negotiate their release. The three are Sanford STONE of Cleveland, Daniel STARE of Columbus, Indiana, and Charles PERCY of Salem, West Virginia.

Sea-Land Statement

CHANCELLOR: The ship Mayaguez will arrive in Singapore on Saturday. Then, according to Robert MAKAVOY (?) chairman of the Sea-Land service the company which owns the ship, the world will find out that it was not a spy ship and that it carried neither arms nor ammunition. MAKAVOY said this and other things at company headquarters in Menlow Park, N.J. today.

ROBERT MAKAVOY: There were 77 container loads of military cargo; 107 commercial container loads; and 90 empty containers. Now 77 military containers -- 26 of those carried parts and replacement equipment; three containers subsistence supplies for the American military in that part of the world, including three contained foodstuffs, including refrigerator cargo -- that would be meat, produce and so forth -- eight carried additional commissary supplies, shaving soap, all the things that are sold in commassaries and PX; and 38 carried a combination of liquor, beer, soda pop and other PX items on its way to that part of the world. Not one single piece of arms, ammunition and no hazardous cargo of any kind. It was involved in no espionage. When it gets to Singapore -- I was in the process of saying -- the world will be able to see what this ship is all about, they will know all about what cargo it carried, it will see the men who manned the ship and find out that Sea-Land Service and none of its employees are involved in any kind of espionage activity. That is not our business.

DECLASSIFIED

BOB SCHIEFFER: Good evening. The captured American merchant ship Mayaguez and its crew are safe and a 14 hour battle between U.S. and Cambodian forces in the Gulf of Thailand is over. At least one American serviceman was killed in the fighting, at least eight were wounded and some may be missing. Ike Pappas at the Pentagon and Phil Jones at the White House have the story.

IKE PAPPAS: A chronology of the rescue of the ship and its crew reveals the story of a precise, professionally executed military operation that had its own touches of irony and moments of high adventure. The chronology goes like this. 5:15 Eastern Time last night, the first helicopters depart Utapao Airbase in Thailand carrying over 200 Marines, 49 of those troops are designated as a boarding party to get to the Mayaguez and to seize her. 7:00 PM, the Mayaguez boarding party reaches the destroyer Holt watching over the merchant vessel. The 49 Marines are lowered to the decks by rope ladders from three choppers hovering overhead. 7:07 PM, the Cambodians broadcast the word that they are ready to release the ship. The broadcast is translated into English and the word is sent to the White House but it is too late to call off the operation, the first helicopters are already only minutes away from Tang island. 7:15 PM, the main body of Marines approaches Tang island. Their job is to land there and to search for crew members believed being held on the island. The first chopper to approach is shot down in the water by Khmer Rouge Communist troops, all 26 aboard make it to the western shore. 7:20 PM, another attempt is made to land on the eastern shore. Again helicopters come under intense fire. The first chopper in actually crash lands but all survived. The Marines have now landed and are engaging the enemy. They are supported by American fighter-bombers from the carrier Coral Sea which has arrived in the area. 8:30 PM, the Holt pulls alongside the Mayaguez close enough to allow the Marines to board and to seize the ship the same way Marines did it 200 years ago, over the rail ship-to-ship. The boarding party finds nothing, only a few bowls of warm rice and hot tea in the mess. The crewmen are not aboard but the Marines raised the American flag. 9:30 PM, the main Marine landing force continues to meet stiff opposition from about 200 Communist troops on the island. They moved inland but the going is slow. There are reports of casualties. 10:23 PM, the destroyer Wilson, also in the area, reports a small boat is approaching it flying white flags. It gets closer. The skipper reports he sees 30 members of the Mayaguez on the small boat. Later it is reported all 39 crew members plus five Thai fishermen also released by the Cambodians were rescued. The President tells the nation the crewmen have been saved. It is later revealed the crewmen were moved three times before being released; from the Mayaguez to Tang island to Sihanoukville on the mainland and then to a tiny unidentified island where they were finally let go. 10:57 PM, American warplanes attacked the Ream airbase on the mainland to knock out any possibility the Cambodians would launch an air attack on the Marines, 17 Cambodian planes on the ground are destroyed. 4:40 this morning, the Mayaguez, its crew now aboard, is underway under its own power heading for Singapore her cargo intact. 7:13 AM, the Marines, attempting to withdraw by helicopter, encounter difficulty, heavy fire from Communist troops make it difficult for the choppers to depart. The Marines are for a time pinned down, but heavy suppressive fire from American planes and warships off the coast quiet the Communist troops and the pull out speeds. 9:10 AM, the last helicopter leaves the island for the Coral Sea, the operation is over. But to this hour this evening the Pentagon will not discuss casualties. One Marine is confirmed killed-in-action, at least eight and probably many, many more wounded. Ike Pappas, CBS News, Washington.

PHIL JONES: The President's problems throughout the crisis were the lack of hard intelligence on the exact location of the Mayaguez crew and the lack of success in making diplomatic contact, direct or indirect, with the Cambodian government. But finally with a military report that Cambodian efforts might be underway to move the Mayaguez crew to land, the President ordered a full military response. Aides say there was lots of discussion on the options, but never disagreement on the scope of the operation, all agreed it had to be a quick and limited stroke. But it was hours later before the President had anything to smile about. It was a relief that the rescue had been completed and the President appeared in public for the first time to report on the crisis.

PRESIDENT FORD: I have now received information that the vessel has been recovered intact and the entire crew has been rescued.

JONES: And during the early morning hours this letter arrived on Capitol Hill from the White House, the President complying with the War Powers Act and notifying Congress of the use of American forces in hostilities. So far telephone and telegram reaction received here at the White House has been light but heavily in favor of the President's actions.

(other report, commercial)

SCHIEFFER: One of the telegrams received by President FORD today was from Charles MILLER, the commanding officer of the rescued ship. He said, "the captain and officers and crew of the S.S. Mayaguez thank you and all the brave military forces who are fighting and dying to save our lives." Thanks also came today from the company that owns the ship, Mike Lee has that story.

MIKE LEE: Sea-Land Services, Inc., which owns the Mayaguez, has been the largest U.S. commercial shipping firm serving Indochina throughout the Vietnam war. Today Sea-Land praised President FORD for his handling of the crisis and paid tribute to the Marines who rescued the crew.

SEA-LAND SPOKESMAN: We're deeply saddened by the loss of American military men in this action. Our heartfelt sympathy and everlasting gratitude for the sacrifice they made goes out to the families of these fine men. I know that the master of the Mayaguez as well as every mate, engineer, able bodied seaman, oiler, wiper and messman would join with me and all Sea-Land employees in applauding the courageous action taken by their rescuers. Their valor and their willingness to sacrifice their lives to protect American citizens makes us all proud to be Americans.

LEE: CBS News today sampled reaction of family members of the Mayaguez crew, among them Willy PASTRANO, former light heavyweight boxing champion of the world whose father is among the rescued.

WILLY PASTRANO: I think that the U.S. government did the only thing it could do and I'm proud of it, I'm proud to say I'm an American. As I said before, God bless America.

SCHIEFFER: The Cambodian seizure of the American ship was reminiscent of the Pueblo capture seven years ago. And tonight from San Diego David Dow takes a look back at that incident.

DAVID DOW: When the U.S.S. Pueblo and its crew were captured by North Korea in January 1968 the U.S. did not react with military force. Eighty-two Pueblo crewmen spent 11 months in captivity. One crew member died of injuries suffered in the ship's capture. The Pueblo's skipper, Lloyd BUCHER now retired reacted today in San Diego to the freeing of the Mayaguez.

LLOYD BUCHER: Well my feelings last night as that news began to come in was one of absolute delight. I was so happy that things had turned out as well as they did. I am very happy that we apparently have some real leadership again in Washington and I know that the bulk of America today is very proud of our country and proud of the people that put this whole thing together.

DOW: BUCHER speculated on what might have happened had the Marines gone in after the Pueblo.

BUCHER: The point is that had it been done I doubt if the Mayaguez thing would have ever come to pass to begin with. And perhaps we may have been able to have carried our way a little bit better in the peace conference over Vietnam. Maybe things altogether would have been different, who knows. That's speculation and perhaps they may not have but they could not have been any worse.

DOW: David Dow, CBS News, San Diego.

SCHIEFFER: China called the U.S. military rescue of the Mayaguez and its crew "an outright act of piracy." The Soviet Union reported the incident without comment. In Thailand the official reaction was outrage. The Thai Prime Minister said, it is obvious that U.S.-Thai relations have to be reviewed.

(other reports, commercials)

SCHIEFFER: The rescue of the American merchant ship Mayaguez and its subsequent effects on this country are the subject tonight of Eric Sevareid's commentary.

ERIC SEVAREID: Nothing succeeds like success and no success matches a successful gamble. Gratification is enhanced by the sheer relief. Most people in this political capital feel relieved by the recapture of the ship and its crew, the hawkishly inclined feel pure pleasure. But there is little doubt that it was a gamble that might have gone disastrously wrong. Approval of the U.S. Marines use in this affair has to be based on certain assumptions: that the American ship was not in Cambodia's territorial waters, that it was an innocent vessel, that our surveillance aircraft were fired upon first, that the efforts at a solution through diplomacy were genuine and were genuinely rebuffed. So far there appears no reason not to make these assumptions. Cambodia is tiny, the United States is mighty. A calm and confident great power acting consistently with its belief in international law would have submitted the case to the world court. The U.S. government at this moment in history is neither confident nor calm. It is nervous, and one of the things it is nervous about is the nervousness of other governments, that of North Korea for one. It was North Korea that got away with the capture of our spy ship the Pueblo some years ago. It is North Korea that has been testing America's resolution since the fall of South Vietnam. This specifically had to be much on the minds of the President and his advisers, as well as a general concern that the U.S. not be perceived anywhere as a wet paper tiger. The President won his gamble and will no doubt stand much higher in public esteem as a result and his authority with the Congress will be enhanced. Had he lost the military gamble he would have also lost another big round in a struggle with Congress because he did not consult with Congress about this action as the new War Powers Resolution quite plainly requires, he informed some congressmen many of whom would now be at his throat had the operation failed. And no doubt many will now persuade themselves that they were all for military action from the outset. As John KENNEDY remarked, success has 100 fathers, failure is an orphan. One casualty of the operation is our relationship with Thailand, a temporary casualty at least but not a very big one. Washington is not beloved in Bangkok these days, but Bangkok is not beloved in Washington either. Bangkok thinks we are discreditable as an ally. Washington thinks Bangkok -- long famous for its eye to the nearest exit in case of fire -- should be the last ally to talk about credibility. Anyway the ship affair is over. Winston Churchill once said, I don't bother about countries like Cambodia and they don't bother me. A good precept for a bad season.

Comment: Harry Reasoner

HARRY REASONER: Some of the questions about the way the United States can function in the far Pacific that are now being asked invite comparison with similar questions in a more naive world power in the late 1930's. It seems to me that on a real time basis now or on a comparative basis with then -- it seems to me the answers are not all that depressing. There are three things you might say at the moment as an American advocate in the wake of a final debacle in Indochina and the first test since, the Mayaguez affair. First, don't worry about Thailand. Thailand is the only substantial national entity in SE Asia that has never been a colony. The ruling class in Thailand is rich, fat, corrupt and about as representative of its people as the mafia is of Sicily. Linked by treaty and tradition to Britain and the U.S. in December of 1941, its government found no difficulty in declaring war on both countries in January of 1942 and it had no problem four years later in declaring war on Japan. This ability to accomodate is inate and the way to deal with Thailand is to be as realistic as it is, we don't need it, we don't owe it, we never bled together. Second, the 40 years of technology since the last time we worried about being a Pacific power have changed things, you can be a Pacific power now without a chain of land bases. And third, our lineup of countries sharing our self-interest in the Pacific is different and stronger, Japan for instance. And in a community of interests based on concern about Russia, the Peoples Republic of China. Overall, the conclusions about the recent events need not put us in a panic. We have faced up to decisions in the Pacific and they have been the right ones. And if we lose Thailand's help it is not to worry.

Mayaguez Rescue

HOWARD K. SMITH: What history will call the Mayaguez incident is over. The ship with its 39 American crewmen safe aboard is proceeding under its own power to Singapore. The release followed an attack by U.S. planes and Marines on Cambodian forces on the mainland, on the island called Koh-Tang, on Cambodian patrol craft and a boarding of the Mayaguez itself. For hours after the Cambodians surrendered the ship and its crew the U.S. fought with planes and guns to secure the disengagement of the Marines who had landed on the jungle covered island. We have a report on the fighting from ABC's Pentagon correspondent Frank Tomlinson.

FRANK TOMLINSON: About 200 Marines home based on Okinawa were flown out of Utapao Airbase in Thailand by helicopters. It was more a scene like Vietnam than the Pacific operations of WWII. In full battle gear the Marines headed for Koh-Tang island not knowing what to expect.

DECLASSIFIED

DECLASSIFIED

What they found was more resistance than anyone had bargained for. The helicopters landed to barrages of ground fire from Khmer Rouge troops using small arms that peppered the choppers as they landed on the little three mile by one mile island. After storming ashore on the white beaches the Marines ran into what was described as stiff resistance that pinned them down in the tropical jungle most of the day. There were at least three helicopters lost in the operation. One crashed after receiving heavy ground fire, leading to dramatic rescue operations for 26 men trapped on the far side of the island under enemy fire. Many in that helicopter were wounded. Tentative figures show one Marine killed and possibly 30 or more wounded. About 20 men are still unaccounted for. But all present evidence shows no one left on Koh-Tang. Those 20 are believed spread among several ships and at Utapao Airbase. The operation went so smoothly that many of the Marines are already back at their home base on Okinawa and some are still onboard the freighter Mayaguez. But as in all military operations there were casualties and some of the wounded are hospitalized on the carrier Coral Sea and at Utapao. Here in the Pentagon the operation, which went so swiftly it had no code name, is considered a complete success. Secretary SCHLESINGER says in his professorial manner that the lesson of the Mayaguez is salutory. In plain language that means don't mess around with American ships on the high seas. Frank Tomlinson, ABC News, the Pentagon.

REASONER: It's obvious that a great deal has happened since this program was broadcast last night. To help explain exactly what has occurred Frank Reynolds has compiled a chronology of the events.

FRANK REYNOLDS: The ship had been in Cambodian custody slightly more than 48 hours when the decision was made to take it back. Yesterday afternoon at 3:30 the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense and others were summoned to the White House for yet another meeting of the NSC. The acting chairman of the JCS explained the military situation. At this point there had been no satisfactory diplomatic response from the Cambodians. The President made his decision and at 4:45 the orders went out to the military commands. At 6:30, as the task force in the Pacific began to move, congressional leaders were called to the White House. The President informed them of his decision and told them the operation was underway. At seven minutes after seven Washington time Phnom Penh radio in a domestic broadcast announced the ship would be released next Monday, but the English translation of that broadcast was not received at the White House until one hour later. Meantime, the Marines were on their way. At 7:20 the first units stormed ashore at Koh-Tang and came under heavy fire.

Now at 8:06 the translation of the Phnom Penh broadcast reaches the White House. Brent SCOCROFT, a KISSINGER deputy, relayed the word to the Secretary of State who informed the President. At 8;20, as Mr. FORD chatted with the visiting Prime Minister, the destroyer Holt moved alongside the Mayaguez and Marines boarded the American ship. None of the crew was onboard. At 9:18, with the Mayaguez in custody of the Marines, the U.S. responds to the Cambodian broadcast.

MAN: As you know we have seized the ship. As soon as you issue a statement that you are prepared to release the crew members you hold, unconditionally and immediately, we will promptly cease military operations.

THE U.S. RETOOK a seized ship and 39 crewmen after sinking Cambodian boats.

The Pentagon said a small Cambodian boat flying a white flag brought about 50 American seamen to a U.S. destroyer in the Gulf of Thailand. There wasn't any immediate word on the other nine crewmen of the U.S. merchant ship Mayaguez, seized by the Cambodians Monday. Shortly before the release of the 39 men, about 200 U.S. Marines recaptured the ship and went ashore on an island where it had been moored, encountering resistance from Cambodian troops there.

The release followed a radio broadcast from Phnom Penh that Cambodia was ready to return the merchant ship, which was accused of spying and violating Cambodian territorial waters.

The U.S. forces lost at least two helicopters in the operation, which also included air strikes against Ream airfield on the Cambodian mainland near Sihanoukville. President Ford ordered the rescue effort nearly 24 hours after sending U.S. planes to sink three Cambodian patrol boats in a bid to block Cambodia from bringing the captured U.S. seamen to the mainland.

The White House said it acted with "a strong consensus of support" from congressional leaders in the attack, which wasn't announced for 11 hours.

Thailand demanded that the U.S. immediately remove 1,100 Marines flown to an American base there early yesterday without prior notification to the Thais. The planes that sank the Cambodian boats also took off from the base in Thailand, U Tapao. The 1,100 Marines were withdrawn to a U.S. aircraft carrier early today.

Ford's Action Is Supported in Congress

By PHILIP SHABECOFF
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 14—The White House said today that President Ford had consulted with Congressional leaders before ordering an attack on Cambodian patrol boats. At least some of those leaders insisted later, however, that they had not been consulted but merely informed of a Presidential decision already made.

However, members of Congress generally expressed approval of the President's action and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee adopted a strong resolution of support this evening acknowledging the President's constitutional right to order military operations.

Yesterday the White House press secretary, Ron Nessen, told reporters that President Ford would "consult" with Congress before ordering any military action to rescue the seized American freighter Mayagüez, or its crew.

Action Called Constitutional

He quoted the Congressional War Powers Resolution of 1973, which states, in part, that "the President in every possible instance shall consult with Congress before introducing United States armed forces into hostilities or into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated."

Roderick Hills, a counsel to the President, told a questioner that Mr. Ford had acted under his Constitutional war powers to protect the lives and property of Americans. When asked to cite the specific authority within the Constitution, Mr. Hills said that he did not have the exact article in front of him.

But he insisted that the inherent right of the President to use war powers to protect lives and property had not been challenged. The only open question, he said, was the appropriate level of military response.

Ford Waited 11 Hours to Tell American Public of His Action

WASHINGTON, May 14 (UPI)—President Ford waited at least 11 hours before informing the American people today that United States warplanes had attacked Cambodian boats.

A short time later, Mr. Ford called the National Security Council into session at the White House for the third time in 24 hours to continue efforts to gain release of the United States cargo ship commandeered by Cambodian forces in the Gulf of Siam.

The President conferred periodically with Secretary of State Kissinger, and White House officials sought to portray a sense of calm.

During the President's only public appearances, at the start and end of a meeting with Premier Joop M. den Uyl of the Netherlands, Mr. Ford gave no indication that he was under great pressure. At one point, he and Mr. Kissinger exchanged jokes about soccer with the Dutch leader.

Administration sources said that the first United States air strikes against Cambodian patrol boats began by 1 A.M., Eastern Daylight Time, today and that at least five of the craft had been hit within an hour. The first public acknowledgment of the operations came about noon from the Defense Department. There was no official explanation for the delay in announcing the action taken by the American planes.

At that point the White House press secretary, Ron Nessen, said he was unable to provide further details about either the military action or the status of the 39-man crew that was aboard the merchant ship Mayagüez when it was seized Monday.

Asked whether the United States was now at war with Cambodia, Mr. Nessen replied, "Not that I am aware of."

Administration sources said that President Ford decided to order the air strikes late yesterday afternoon after the first

Washington—The Ford administration sent in the marines and used aircraft against Cambodia just as a day of general political support for Mr. Ford here was beginning to show cracks.

And the actions also were taken just as a report of a decision to release the ship reached the city and appeared to have caught the White House totally by surprise.

While the timetable of the military operations was not made clear immediately, it appeared possible that the marines and the Navy planes engaged the Cambodians after the Phnom Penh radio report had reached Washington.

It probably will not matter as much politically as the success or failure of the efforts to get the 39 crewmen out alive—and there were reports from the Pentagon that 30 of them had been recovered by the marines—but if the appearance of disregarding the offer to free the ship and going ahead military anyway is confirmed, it could deepen any such reaction.

Senators and representatives had just finished meeting with Mr. Ford and had left the White House when the Phnom Penh radio report came over a

SUPPORT -- CONTINUED

United Press International ticker at 8:17 P.M. Ronald H. Nessen, Mr. Ford's press secretary, said the President had not learned of the report from UPI but from some other source. He would not say when Mr. Ford learned, but it was plainly not long before.

And the military moves the President intended to take—actions that the congressmen would not describe—were plainly scheduled to begin soon, perhaps in minutes. They were announced 60 minutes later.

Two of the leaders, Senator Milton R. Young (R., N.D.) and Representative Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., (D., Mass) told reporters that the results would be known by about 10 P.M. Others thought it might take longer.

But accounts of the meeting made it clear that even though the President was applauded when he came in, there was some uncertainty about his course. The congressmen did not challenge his legal authority but they indicated some reservations about the course he chose.

They were not for the most part quarreling about the wisdom of the earlier efforts to prevent gunboats from taking the captive crew to the mainland, efforts that resulted in sinking three Cambodian vessels, with one, where white faces reportedly were seen on deck, apparently allowed to get to shore.

But at least some of the Democrats were edgy both about the degree of consultation the President used before that action and last night's set of moves. And there were reservations expressed at the White House meeting about whether at least one of the steps planned in last night's operations might not needlessly threaten the crewmen's lives.

Mr Nessen had proclaimed at a White House briefing that when the leaders had been read a statement of the President's plans Tuesday afternoon (by the White House's Congressional Liaison Office), "this is considered to be consultation." Despite its likely legal sufficiency, politically the step was plainly not so considered by some of those notified on the Hill Senator Mike Mansfield (D., Mont.), the Senate majority leader, was testy in his account of the phone call he received He said he did not bother to object to what was read to him "becase it was already decided."

His reservations were echoed by his deputy, Senator Robert C. Byrd (D., W. Va.), after the White House meeting. "At least some of the leaders in the two houses should have been called in" to offer their opinions, he said, instead of being "advised after the fact."

And Mr. Byrd, while not identifying the precise American moves that troubled him, said that while he had supported Mr. Ford's actual decisions with some reservations about the degree of restraint employed.

Earlier, Capitol Hill had been producing general approval. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee cheered Mr Ford's use of "his constitutional powers within the framework of the War Powers Resolution."

Although Senators Edward M. Kennedy (D., Mass.) and George McGovern (D., S.D.) were critical of a lack of restraint they saw in American policy, others such as Senator John O. Pastore (D., R.I.) and Representative Lester L. Wolff (D., N.Y.) backed the President up.

Republicans were almost without exception supportive, but one senior GOP legislator, in a conversation between the report of the Cambodian offer and the announcement of the U.S. military moves, said it would "defy logic" not to hold up any armed actions to see if the offer was real. He could not be reached for comment later.

But the Democrats had plainly positioned themselves to attack the President for not consulting them—even last night, they said, they were "told" and not asked—and for a military overreaction that, if the rescue failed, they might say was more interested in saving face than in saving the crewmen's lives.

Saigon Diplomacy

France announced its recognition of the new government of South Vietnam and said that the two countries shortly will exchange ambassadors. Elsewhere, the Provisional Revolutionary Government moved to extend control of South Vietnamese embassies abroad.

The North Vietnamese charge d'affaires in London took over custody of the South Vietnamese embassy at the instruction of the PRG in Tokyo, the Cuban government took custody of the South Vietnamese embassy until diplomatic relations are established between Japan and the new Saigon regime, and a PRG delegation arrived in New Delhi to take charge of the embassy there.

On other fronts, Belgium said it was moving to establish relations with the PRG. In Geneva, the World Health Organization's annual assembly approved the membership of North Vietnam, 116 to 0. The United States and seven other countries abstained.

FORD -- CONTINUED

White House legal department, indicated that the President believed that informing Congress of his actions satisfied the requirement of the War Powers Resolution that he consult with Congress before beginning military operations.

The resolution does not require prior approval of military action by Congress, he asserted.

At today's news briefing, Mr. Nessen said that the President, through his Congressional relations staff, "did consult" with Democratic and Republican leaders of the House of Representatives and Senate between 5:30 and 6 P.M. yesterday, "three hours before the fact." A statement issued by the Defense Department today indicated that the attack began shortly after 8:30 P.M., Eastern Daylight Time.

However, Senator Mike Mansfield, Democratic leader of the Senate and one of those listed by Mr. Nessen as having been consulted, said in a telephone interview today:

"I was not consulted. I was notified after the fact about what the Administration had already decided to do."

In a statement released later, Senator Mansfield said: "I did not give my approval or disapproval because the decision had already been made. My reaction at this point is that there are a lot of questions to which I want answers."

Senator James O. Eastland, Democrat of Mississippi and President Pro Tempore of the Senate, and Senator Clifford P. Case, Republican of New Jersey, the ranking Republican on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, also said that they had not been consulted but had been informed. Mr. Eastland said he had been told after the attack.

Both, however, indicated that they strongly supported President Ford's action against the Cambodian boats.

The majority leader of the House of Representatives, Thomas P. O'Neill of Massachusetts, also said he had not been consulted but only informed.

The House minority leader, John J. Rhodes of Arizona, was quoted by The Associated Press as having said that he had not been notified until after the Cambodian vessels were sunk. But a spokesman for Mr. Rhodes told a questioner: "He was notified beforehand. We are calling it a consultation. Mr. Rhodes has no complaint."

A member of the White House Congressional liaison staff told a questioner that leaders of the Senate had been called about the President's planned action, starting with Senator Mansfield at 5:55 P.M., yesterday and concluding with Senator Eastland at 8:20 P.M., or shortly before the attack on the Cambodian vessels began. Memorandums of each call were sent to Max Friedersdorf, head of the Congressional relations staff, who had presumably passed the response along to the President, the staff member added.

This staff member said that about half the Senators had voiced approval of the President's action while the others simply "acknowledged" the information. Earlier today, Mr Nessen said that the response of the Congressional leaders to the "consultation" was "a strong consensus of support and no objections."

The members of Congress were not given any legal basis for the President's order for military intervention when they were contacted by the White House staff. At today's briefings at the White House, Mr. Nessen said that "the President has authority to protect the lives of Americans and the property of Americans under the Constitution."

Although several members of Congress charged that the President had violated the War Powers Resolution by failure to consult Congress, there was little criticism of the military action itself.

The resolution adopted by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, while it will not be voted on by the full Senate, was intended as a vote of Senatorial confidence. It was approved unanimously and said:

"Committee condemns an act of armed aggression on an unarmed U.S. merchant vessel in the course of innocent passage on an established trade route.

"The President has engaged in diplomatic means to secure its release and we support that.

"Third, we support the President in the exercise of his constitutional powers within the framework of the War Powers Resolution to secure the release of the ship and its men.

"We urge the Cambodian Government to release the ship and the men forthwith."

of the National Security Council meetings.

Mr. Nessen said that Congressional leaders were advised of the decision at about 5:30 P.M. by White House aides, who reported that "there was a strong consensus of support and no objections."

Mr. Ford's next meeting with the Security Council started at about 10:20 P.M., soon after Mr. Kissinger returned from a speaking engagement in Kansas City. The session lasted a little over two hours. Officials said that Mr. Ford then spent a few minutes in the Oval Office and headed for the Presidential quarters, getting to bed at about 1 A.M. for about four hours of sleep. They said that he got no phone calls during the night.

Mr. Ford reached his desk at about 7:40 A.M. and after receiving his regular early-morning intelligence briefing, he met with Mr. Kissinger for about 45 minutes. He saw the Secretary of State three more times during the morning before meeting with the Security Council.

Thai Tells U.S. to Remove 1,100-Marine Unit Today

Threat to Relations

By The Associated Press

BANGKOK, Thailand, May 14 —Premier Kukrit Pramoj today gave the United States until tomorrow morning to remove 1,100 marines brought to Thailand without his permission and promised "drastic action" if his demand was not met. He did not specify the action.

The Premier told newsmen that Thailand did not intend to be drafted into American preparations to take back the American merchant ship Mayagüez. Cambodian gunboats seized the ship on Monday, and it was last reported lying in the Gulf of Siam 30 miles off the Cambodian coast.

First reports from the Thai Foreign Ministry said 800 marines arrived before dawn at the United States Air Force's U Taphao base on the south coast, but Mr. Kukrit later said that Edward E. Masters, the American chargé d'affaires, had told him that the final total was 1,100.

Panamanian Ship Stopped

A Thai protest note warned of "serious consequences" to relations between the United States and Thailand if the marines were not removed.

Meanwhile, Thai communications sources reported that Cambodia today seized another foreign merchant ship, the Panama - registered Eastern Grand, but released it after nearly two hours. The sources said the ship was intercepted near Panjang Island, 85 miles off the coast.

Mr. Kukrit, who told Mr. Masters yesterday that Thailand did not want her territory used to stage any armed operation related to the Mayagüez, summoned him again today to deliver the ultimatum.

The text of the Thai protest note follows:

"It is recalled that on May 13, 2518 [the year according to the Buddhist calendar] the Prime Minister informed the chargé d'affaires of the American Embassy that Thailand does not wish to become involved in the dispute between the United States and Cambodia over the seizure of the vessel Mayagüez, and that Thailand will not permit her territory to be used in connection with any action that might be taken by the United States against Cambodia.

"On May 14, 2518, the Thai Government learned that the United States Government had sent some elements of its Marine forces into Thailand as part of its reaction against Cambodia.

"The Thai Government considers that this action by the United States Government is not consistent with the goodwill existing between Thailand and the United States. And unless these forces, which have entered against the wishes of the Thai Government, are withdrawn immediately, the good relations and cooperation existing between Thailand and the United States would be exposed to serious and damaging consequences."

The Premier used stronger language to newsmen, charging that the arrival of the marines was "a violation of Thai sovereignty."

Meanwhile, 40 or 50 student protesters, shouting, "American, go home," were at the airport for the arrival of the new Ambassador to Thailand, Charles S. Whitehouse.

Mr. Whitehouse walked nodding and smiling between the ranks of the students and issued a prepared statement saying that he hoped to further "friendship and cooperation between our two peoples in the months ahead."

The National Student Center, which led the uprising that ended the military dictatorship 19 months ago, accused the United States of using the seizure of the freighter Mayagüez as an excuse to intervene again in Indochina.

Mr. Masters first learned from a news report from Washington that the marines were on the way. The Thai military command, which clears all international military flights, apparently was advised in advance. Presumably it did not pass the information on to the Government, a communication gap that has been common since the military dictatorship was overthrown in October, 1973.

Thailand under the military dictatorship was a staunch supporter of the United States war in Indochina and provided the bases from which most American air operations originated in the last years of the war. The present civilian Government is seeking a way to live with its new Communist neighbors and to return to the traditional Thai neutrality that kept the country independent while the rest of Southeast Asia came under European domination in the 19th century.

United States officials threw an unusual screen of secrecy around the crash of a United States military helicopter in northeast Thailand yesterday, raising speculation that it was on a mission in connection with the Mayagüez or the arrival of the marines.

Informed sources said all 23 persons aboard were killed when the aircraft crashed near the Laotian border and about 35 miles west of the United States Air Force base at Nakon Phanom. The sources said the passengers were Air Force men en route to U Taphao.

Approach to Sihanouk On Ship Release Fails

By John Burns
Toronto Globe and Mail

PEKING, May 14 -- Attempts by U.S. diplomats here to engage Prince Norodom Sihanouk and the Chinese government in efforts to secure the release of the American container ship Mayaguez reached a standstill Wednesday in the wake of the negative response to the initial representations on Tuesday.

Officials of the U.S. liaison office refused any official comment on the representations but it was learned that Prince Sihanouk and the Peking embassy of the Khmer Rouge government had failed to respond to requests for the ship's immediate release.

The Chinese foreign ministry, asked to intervene with the Phnom Penh authorities on Washington's behalf, was understood to have refused on the ground that the matter was not its concern.

The official Hsinhua News Agency had not reported the seizure more than 48 hours after it occurred and diplomats attached significance to the non-committal stance taken by vice premier Teng Hsiao-Ping, who was questioned about the incident in Paris.

Teng, who has been in effective day-to-day control of the government since Premier Chou En-Lai went into hospital a year ago, was asked what China would do if Washington took military action to get the vessel back.

American jets bomb base, sink 3 boats

By CHARLES W. CORDDRY
Washington Bureau of the Sun

The United States recaptured the merchant ship Mayaguez and retrieved at least 30 of its 39 crew members last night in a series of military actions against Cambodia ordered by President Ford three days after Cambodian gunboats seized the ship in the Gulf of Thailand.

Joseph Laitin, Defense Department spokesman, announced at 11.15 P.M. that a small boat bearing white flags had drawn up to the U.S. Destroyer Wilson, near Koh Tang Island, with the 30 crew members, and the destroyer took them aboard.

Mr. Laitin said the information had been conveyed to President Ford by James R. Schlesinger, Secretary of Defense.

He said the crew members had been sighted about 10.30 P.M. That was about 35 minutes before an air strike was launched from the carrier Coral Sea against Ream Airfield near the Cambodian port of Kompong Som.

Mr. Laitin also reported that in an action related to the recapture of the ship, 135 marines had landed on Koh Tang Island and more were going ashore. The marine landings on the island , it was understood, began about 7.20 P.M. Marines in that operation were brought by Air Force helicopters from Thailand. The marines who seized the ship previously had been moved to the destroyer Holt from Thailand .

Before Ronald H. Nessen, White House press secretary, issued the announcement, press dispatches from Bangkok, Thailand, reported a Phnom Penh broadcast saying the Cambodians were releasing the ship and ordering it on its way.

In response to this, Mr. Nessen said Washington messaged Cambodia: "As you know, we have seized the ship. As soon as you issue a statement that you are prepared to release the crew members you hold, unconditionally and immediately we will promptly cease military operations."

The operations ordered by Mr. Ford were:

- Marines to seize the Mayaguez.
- Additional marines to land on Koh Tang Island, where the ship was anchored, to rescue any crew members there. It was learned from other sources that the landing party was made up of 150 marines flown in by Air Force helicopters from Thailand. It was understood they encountered some opposition, but there were no details.
- Up to 1,200 marines for the operation if needed.
- U.S. aircraft from the carrier Coral Sea to carry out "associated military operations" in the Thailand Gulf to protect the military operations to retrieve the ship and crew.

The latter operations were not spelled out, but were the ones that the congressional source reported included air strikes on shore installations.

Earlier in the day, American warplanes destroyed three Cambodian patrol boats in an attempt to prevent movement of crew members of the Mayaguez to the Cambodian mainland, the Defense Department announced.

The Mayaguez was anchored about 500 yards off the island of Koh Tang, which lies 30 miles from the Cambodian coast. It was taken there after being seized about 60 miles from Cambodia in what President Ford called an act of piracy.

Before the U.S. military action was announced, President Ford called the fourth meeting of the National Security Council in three days to consider how to recover the ship and crew and what actions to take against the Cambodians.

The administration mobilized a fleet in the Thailand Gulf, ordered 1,200 marines into U Tapao Air Base in Thailand and directed Air Force helicopters and crews from several Thai bases to assemble at U Tapao. Authorities said the carrier Hancock left Subic Bay in the Philippines Tuesday and also was steaming to the gulf.

Navy and Air Force aircraft have been flying over the seized ship since it was taken by the Cambodians.

One urgent consideration at yesterday's security council meeting, an informed source said, was the Thai government's demand that the U.S. marines be withdrawn immediately.

Thailand, the government in Bangkok said, "does not wish to become involved in the dispute between the United States and Cambodia over the seizure of the vessel. . . and will not permit its territory to be used in connection with any action which might be taken by the United States against Cambodia."

A question was posed for leaders here, it was said, whether, in order to satisfy Thai demands, to move the marines to U.S. Navy ships before employing them in any action at Koh Tang island or elsewhere. An alternative was to move the marines directly into action with Thai-based U.S. Air Force helicopetrs.

Mr. Laitin announced the attacks on patrol boasts yesterday at midday, giving only sketchy information and refusing to answer questions.

He said it appeared Tuesday evening that the Cambodians were trying to take the Mayaguez crew from the ship and from Koh Tang to the mainland. U.S. aircraft —identified by others as Air Force AC-130 gunships and A-7 attack bombers—undertook to block the move.

Mr Laitin said small-arms fire had been directed at American planes for several hours before this. At first he said three craft were destroyed and "about four others" were crippled. Late in the day, he said he had found there was "not sufficient verification to support" the statement about the crippled craft.

Others suggested that those boats may have raced to the protection of Koh Tang island.

Public Reaction Favors Bombings to Free Ship

The White House press office reported that initial reaction to the bombing was running strongly in favor of the President. As of 4:30 p.m. yesterday, the White House had received 668 telephone calls favoring getting the ship out, 34 against and nine calls from people merely commenting on the situation.

The White House also received 250 calls from people favoring bombing the ships, 51 calls against, and 295 telegrams favoring the bombing and 90 against.

A State Department spokesman said only four telegrams had been received there as of 4:45 p.m. yesterday. "They can be characterized as urging a vigorous American response," he said.

Suit Asks Building Halt At Base for Trident Subs

By Timothy S. Robinson

The ability of the nation to survive a nuclear missile attack, a subject normally reserved for closed congressional hearings and Pentagon war rooms, was the underlying issue in a recently completed trial here in an almost-empty federal courtroom.

The trial pitted a group of environmentalists against the military, and attorneys say the decision could have a direct influence on future litigation concerning the applicability of environmental laws to military bases.

Following more than a eek of testimony, U.S. District Court Chief Judge George L. Hart Jr. asked both sides to submit proposed legal and factual findings. His decision is expected by June.

The nuclear weapon at issue is the Trident submarine, praised by Defense Department officials as the country's most important future weapon defense against nuclear attack.

Scheduled for operation in 1978, the submarine will bear more and better nuclear weapons than the current Poseidon submarine and will be larger, quieter, and the most "Survivable" of defense systems in the event of a nuclear attack, Pentagon officials testified.

Trident has a "brickbat O-1" priority, a national defense code that is now held by only two defense systems—the Poseidon and the land-based Minuteman III missile system.

With congressional approval of the system, the Navy is converting an ammunition storage dump near Bangor, Wash., to a base out of which Trident crews will train and the missile-carrying subs will operate. The base, at its peak, will employ more than 30,000 persons, according to plans.

A group of environmentalists, called "Concerned About Trident," is asking that base construction be blocked because it says the Navy has failed to comply with environmental laws.

The environmentalists say:

The Navy never has prepared an environmental impact statement on the $15 billion Trident program.

The Navy's environmental-impact statements prepared on the Bangor site were drawn up after the decision was made to put the missile base there and are therefore a sham.

The Navy has not prepared a new environmental-impact statement on the Bangor site since recent congressional approval of a speeded-up completion date for the base.

Hart already refused to block the construction of the base pending the completion of the trial before him, and has indicated in court that he intends to weigh heavily the national-security aspect of the base in his decision.

The federal government asked that the trial be conducted because of the "public interest in having a controversy of this complexity and importance resolved on a full and complete record."

Environmentalists say building the base will have a detrimental effect on fish and wildlife in and around Hood Canal near Puget Sound, where the base is being built. They also say the Navy has not properly considered the effect on the area of the thousands of people who will arrive to build or operate the base, or the possibilities of nuclear hazards arising from handling weapons.

The Navy says, basically there is a point at which national defense takes priority over environmental concerns. The Navy points that it selected a site that is currently a base and that will take little additional construction, compared with building a base from scratch.

The Navy also says it has prepared the necessary environmental-impact statements and that no decision was made on locating the base in Bangor until after those impact statements were considered. The Navy says it selected Bangor from among 89 sites, which were narrowed to four possible locations.

Those final four sites included three on the Atlantic Coast and one on the Pacific Coast. At that point, the decision was made to put the base on the Pacific Ocean, government officials testified in court.

Three former secretaries of Navy and Secretary of Defense James Schlesinger, have filed affidavits supporting the decision to put the Trident base on the Pacific, and admirals who testified last week said the decision is even more important now than when it was made about two years ago.

With a bluntness reminiscent of the height of Cold War, the admirals discussed the necessity of giving the Soviets "another whole ocean to worry about" when defending against submarine-launched missiles, and of the need to be within easy striking distance of Moscow and Peking.

Vice Adm. R. Y. Kaufman testified that "at the risk of sounding parochial I'd say the Trident is No. 1" in terms of importance on the list of future defense systems.

When attorney David Sive attempted to cross-examine Kaufman on alternatives to Trident that may have been considered by the Navy, including the possibility of no new weapons, Hart interrupted:

"If the world becomes sweet and gentle and no one has any weapons we don't need this weapon. That is perfectly patent to anybody."

Although not claiming that the military is automatically and absolutely exempt from the requirements of the National Environmental Policy Act government attorneys have said in documents filed in the case that "...there are circumstances in which federal activities of a political nature are involved that are beyond the reach of NEPA and ... some of those actions about which the plaintiffs here complain are actions of that political character.

"...At several significant stages in the development of the Trident system, decisions were made, which had as their basis, considerations of national defense, international relations and the security of this nation as its role as a world power. These decisions are beyond the power of this court to review."

Another aspect of the Trident suit is the stand taken in behalf of the government by the Pacific Legal Foundation, a group that has sided with environment a list in the past.

In some-times sarcastic tones PLF attorneys noted that "without the Trident system, it cannot be guaranteed that foreign adversaries will not unleash vastly superior weapons, at which time all of the [plaintiffs] exhortations of naive environmental damage will have become ironically academic."

The nation's delicate Strategic Arms Limitation Talks with the Soviet Union could be undermined by a decision against Trident, the PLF attorneys continued, adding: "What bargaining power do we have in nuclear limitation talks if the Soviets know we are limiting ourselves because of domestic environmental concerns?"

PLEA FOR U.N. HELP MADE BY THE U.S.

By KATHLEEN TELTSCH
Special to The New York Times

UNITED NATIONS, N. Y., May 14 — The United States asked Secretary General Waldheim today to do what he could to help obtain the release of the merchant ship and crew seized early Monday off Cambodia.

The seizure was an illegal and unprovoked action that posed a threat to international peace, the United States Representative, John Scali, said in a letter handed to the Secretary General.

Mr. Waldheim responded by offering his good offices to the Governments concerned. He appealed to them to "refrain from further acts of force in order to facilitate the process of peaceful settlement."

Mr. Waldheim sent messages to Prince Norodom Sihanouk, titular head of the new Cambodean government who is in Peking, and to Phom Penh.

Mr. Scali's request was made a few hours after announcement in Washington that American aircraft had been fired on by the Cambodians and that the planes attacked and sank Cambodian gunboats in the vicinity of the seized freighter. The timing prompted some here to complain that the United States turned to the United Nations after—not before — had it resorted to force, when it could have appealed earlier.

American officials offered no explanation, but it was bewell aware that potential United Nations help was limited since there was no direct contact with the new Communist authorities in Phnom Penh. It was also believed that the request to the United Nations was something of an afterthought.

Since the Communist takeover there has been only one communication, on April 30, in which the new Foreign Minister, Sarin Chhak, claimed Cambodia's seat here; the message came via Peking. Mr. Waldheim acknowledged it but received no reply.

"The trouble with offering good offices is that one has to be sure they are welcomed by everyone, and it is difficult in this case to know where to address the offer," a United Nations official said.

The United States' letter said it had initiated "certain steps through diplomatic channels" to obtain the release of vessel and crew. Washington has asked Peking to intervene, but it is not clear how much influence the Chinese have with the new Government even though Prince Norodom Sianhouk, its titular head, is in Peking.

The letter also reserved the right to take measures to protect the lives of the Americans and the property involved, as provided in Article 51 of the United Nations Charter, which recognizes the right of self-defense against armed attack without waiting for action by the Security Council.

U.S. will 'thin out' personnel in Laos

BY DEAN MILLS
Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—The Ford administration, worried about the increasing dangers to Americans in Laos, has urged a "thinning-out" of American officials in that country.

Robert L. Funseth, a State Department spokesman, said in announcing the decision that there are no plans to evacuate all Americans or to close the American Embassy in the Lao capital of Vientiane. He said the Lao government has not requested that the embassy be closed and that the embassy remains in contact with the government.

With the resignation of rightist ministers last week, the Communist-led Pathet Lao are in effective control of the government. But unlike the Communist takeovers in Cambodia and South Vietnam, there has been no change in the structure of the government so far and therefore no technical reason for the United States to break diplomatic relations.

Mr. Funseth said that the American aid program for Laos is "under general review" as a result of anti-American demonstrations and the changes in government in Vientiane. The United States has not suspended aid despite recent developments.

The State Department said student demonstrators in the town of Savannakhet had seized three American officials of the Agency for International Development and were holding them. The American Embassy in Vientiane reported that the officials were not believed harmed.

Mr. Funseth described the "thinning-out" of American personnel in Vientiane as a process that is expected to take place over a period of several weeks beginning this week.

Americans in outlying areas already have been instructed to move the capital, he said. There is no reason, he said, to believe that American troops will be needed to protect the withdrawal process.

There are about 1,000 Americans in Laos now, 150 of them are "unofficial" Americans. The rest are the 320 officials and their dependents.

Pentagon to Probe Hunting Trip Reports

By Peter Gruenstein
Capitol Hill News Service

A Civil Service Commission official says the Defense Department will investigate charges that military officers and Pentagon officials used a duck hunting lodge owned by Northrop Corp., in apparent violation of an executive order.

Anthony L. Mondello, CSC's general counsel, said yesterday: "That smells. People shouldn't be doing that."

"Northrop is a recognized defense contractor," Mondello continued. "They should not be in the business of entertaining military and civilian officials. It's as simple as that."

Rep. David Henderson, D-N.C., chairman of a House civil service subcommittee, said he would ask the Defense Department and the Civil Service Commission for a timetable on the investigation. "If we're not satisfied with their investigation and if it's not prompt enough, then I'm sure the subcommittee would want to get into it."

MONDELLO SAID that, under civil service procedures, federal agencies bear primary responsibility for investigating allegations of ethical misconduct.

As previously reported by Capitol Hill News Service, trips to Northrop's hunting lodge by 123 military officers and 21 Pentagon officials between 1971 and 1973 were in apparent violation of an executive order prohibiting the acceptance by federal employes of anything of "monetary value" from a company doing business with the government.

During the time the trips were made, Northrop was competing for a multi-billion dollar contract to build a lightweight air combat fighter, the F17.

The Pentagon yesterday released a strongly worded letter written by Deputy Defense Secretary William Clements on Jan. 15, reminding military officials of the gift prohibition rule.

CLEMENTS cited a Defense Department directive defining gifts as including "any tangible items, intangible benefits, discount, tickets, passes, transportation, and accommodations or hospitality given or extended to or on behalf of the recipient.

"These prohibitions are not a matter of degree. There will be absolutely no relationship with defense contractors which violates or appears to violate the provision . . ."

Barbarous Piracy

By Anthony Lewis

The diplomacy of violence: That is still, then, to be our trademark. Once again an American Government shows that the only way it knows how to deal with frustration is by force. And the world is presumably meant to be impressed.

The Khmer Rouge were wrong and foolish to seize the American merchant ship Mayaguez, if the facts were as stated in Washington. They violated necessary norms of international behavior. We had reason to be concerned, especially about the fate of the crew.

But using a sledgehammer to crack a nut is self-defeating for nations as for individuals. Violent escalation of the conflict could hardly be expected to achieve the immediate aim of the crew's release; to the contrary, it might heighten the danger. More broadly, the military action showed a lack of that perspective expected of a great power—the perspective, in this case, recent history.

Imagine that in 1775 and for years after an enormously powerful state equipped with futuristic weapons had intervened in our Revolutionary War. From bases in Canada it rained destruction on the thirteen colonies. A million Americans, a third of the population, fled their homes; 300,000 were casualties.

When the war was finally over, how might the victorious Americans have felt about that foreign state? If one of its ships had sailed into what were claimed to be Americans waters, might we have been tempted to board and seize the vessel?

A comparison between America in 1775 and Cambodia in 1975 is not so far-fetched. The peasant society of Cambodia today is hardly more advanced, technologically, than eighteenth-century America. Cambodia was just as defenseless against B-52's as the thirteen colonies would have been.

American planes dropped 250,000 tons of bombs on Cambodia between 1969 and Aug. 15, 1973, when Congress prohibited all U.S. military action in, over or on the waters adjoining Indochina. Between a third and a half of Cambodia's 7.5 million people became refugees. Jon Swain of The London Sunday Times, one of the correspondents recently evacuated, described the physical damage he saw as follows:

"The entire countryside has been churned up by American B-52 bomb craters, whole towns and villages razed. So far, I have not seen one intact pagoda. . . . The war damage here [Kompong Chhnang], as everywhere else we saw, is total. Not a bridge is standing, hardly a house. I am told most villagers spent the war years living semi-permanently underground in earth bunkers to escape the bombing."

With that background, Americans should be slow to point a finger of moral disapproval at the Khmer Rouge. Nor can we rightly take a lofty position on the need to respect law. Washington has not reacted with force when Ecuador seized U.S. fishing boats more distant from shore than the Mayaguez was. And the American bombing of Cambodia was itself of dubious constitutionality.

The United States also bears a heavy responsibility for the political character of Cambodia today. If we had not invaded the country in 1970, and then intervened massively in her civil war, Prince Sihanouk would doubtless have returned to power soon with a left-leaning but more traditional regime. The Khmer Rouge movement would not have developed as it has, in all its hardened zeal. Most of the human suffering of the war would have been avoided.

The Khmer Rouge inherited a ruined nation. We are rightly horrified by accounts of the harsh measures taken. But after what has been done to them, are the Cambodians really to be blamed if they are xenophobic?

Those Americans who had a part in the savagery of our policy toward Cambodia over the years should be particularly slow to utter deploring pieties now. Secretary of State Kissinger, a principal author of the policy, has described events in Cambodia as "barbarous," "inhuman," "very tragic" and "an atrocity of major proportions." A man so steeped in the blood of Cambodians should have the shame to remain silent.

And now the insensitivity is in deeds as well as words. Once again we have to show the world how tough we are: The attitude of the teen-ager proving his manhood did not end with Richard Nixon's Presidency. Demonstrative violence is in fact a central element in Henry Kissinger's diplomatic philosophy. But how long must it be our country's?

How disheartening, too, to see the Mayaguez affair evoke from Congress the old jingo talk and calls for Presidential action. Senator Clifford Case, co-author of the 1973 ban on military action in Indochina, lived down to his reputation as a pusillanimous liberal by telling President Ford that he could ignore the law. Have we learned nothing from Vietnam about law and the Presidency? Have we forgotten that America had the world's respect when she stood for patience and magnanimity in human affairs?

Why Ford Shifted To Military Tactics

By JAMES McCARTNEY
Inquirer Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON—President Ford switched from diplomatic to military tactics in the crisis over the captured merchant ship Mayaguez because of fear that some of the 39-man American crew might be taken out of reach, where they could never be rescued.

But well-placed government sources said late yesterday that some members of the crew may already have been moved to the mainland. And others may be on a nearby island, called Koh Tang, under guard by a small Cambodian naval garrison.

The President ordered what White White House Press Secretary Ron Nessen described as "an inhibiting action" late Tuesday after a National Security Council (NSC) meeting.

The situation was tense.

The ship lay motionless, about a mile off Koh Tang, which is about 30 miles from the Cambodian port of Kompong Som.

The President had put his word on the line. He had labeled the seizure of the ship by the new Cambodian Communist government "an act of piracy." He had demanded its "immediate release" and declared that failure to release it "would have the most serious consequences."

U. S. warships from throughout the Pacific were steaming to the scene to back up the presidential statements. Combat-equipped U. S. marines were en route to Thailand from Okinawa, Japan.

But as the NSC met Tuesday afternoon, the military possibilities of saving the crew appeared in danger of slipping away.

U. S. reconnaissance planes were reporting that some crew members might have been moved onto the island, and that some already might have been taken to the mainland.

The President stood the risk of finding himself in a situation — so frequent in the Indochina war — where vast U. S. power might appear impotent.

At some point in the late afternoon the President gave the Pentagon authority to "isolate" the ship, and the island, so that no more Americans could be taken beyond reach.

It was what one White House source described as a "preventive tactics," chosen after initial diplomatic efforts to free the ship and crew had failed.

The President's initial decision to resort to force was not designed to rescue the sailors.

It was designed, instead, sources said, to try to keep as many men as possible in a psoition where they might be rescued, if a decision should be made later to try to do so.

"Obviously, the President wanted to take the diplomatic route," said one White House official.

"But if the men were moved, we'd lose control. The option of trying to extricate them would be diminished. They'd be out of reach."

Once arriving at the decision, the President instructed his Congressional liaison staff, headed by Max Friedersdorf, to contact key members of Congress to let them know.

Calls began to go out between 5 and 6 p.m. Tuesday, on a "classified" basis, to top Democratic chairmen and ranking Republicans on the Armed Services, Foreign Relations and Appropriations committees.

They were told that the President had ordered the military to use "minimum force" to isolate the freighter and keep the gunboats from removing the crew. According to the White House, none of the congressmen or senators objected.

The White House described this process as "consultation." But Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield complained that he wasn't "consulted before the fact," but was "notified after the fact."

Sadat Says He'll Ask U.S. For Aid on Debt to Soviet

BY HENRY TANNER
Special to The New York Times

BEIRUT, Lebanon, May 14—President Anwar el-Sadat said in an interview published today that he would seek financial aid from the United States to settle Egypt's large debts to the Soviet Union.

Mr. Sadat, in an interview in the Lebanese weekly Al Hawadess, was quoted as having said that aid would be one of the topics he would discuss with President Ford in Salzeburg, Austria, on June 1 and 2.

Mr. Sadat arrived in Baghdad tonight from Kuwait, where he spent three days in conversations with Emir Sabah al-Salem al-Sabah, the Kuwaiti ruler. Mr. Sadat will visit Jordan and Syria before returning to Cairo early next week.

In the interview, President Sadat reiterated his frequent complaint that the Soviet leaders had refused to agree to requests for a rescheduling of Egypt's debts.

Estimates of these debts stemming from military and economic assistance including construction of the Aswan High Dam, range from $4-billion to $7-billion.

"The Soviet leaders won't give me even a grace period," Mr. Sadat was quoted by the weekly. "We are contacting Arab countries for speedy action to straighten out Egypt's economy and to enable her to honor her commitments to the Soviet Union and others. These contacts are not confined to Arab countries but will be extended to the United States."

Financial talks between the United States and Egypt have been conducted in Cairo in preparation for the Salzburg meeting of the two Presidents.

The interview was the first time President Sadat indicated so clearly that without immediate help Egypt would not be able to honor her commitments to foreign governments including the Soviet Union.

Mr. Sadat's four-nation tour is regarded by informed diplomats as a reflection of a subtle but fundamental policy change decided upon by the Egyptian President after the failure of Secretary of State Kissinger's "shuttle diplomacy" in March.

For the last 18 months, since Mr. Kissinger's first gisit to Cairo after the war in October, 1973, Mr. Sadat has been acting with deliberate independence as far as other Arab leaders were concerned.

Now, while still relying on the United States as the key to the Middle East conflict Mr. Sadat has resolved to operate stricly within the Arab context and to seek an Arab consensus before making a move.

According to Egyptian officials the present tour has three main objectives:

¶To seek an Arab consensus on what the Arab countries should expect from the United States in the coming stage of negotiations.

¶To mediate local disputes between Arab states, notably between Iraq and Syria over the waters of the Euphrates River and between Iraq and Kuwait over their border which has never been formally delineated.

¶To seek financial and military support from the oil-producing Arabs.

At a news conference in Kuwait President Sadat conceded that he had discussed Egypt's "enormous" economic difficulties with the Kuwaiti Emir.

In his news conference remarks and in the interview with the Lebanese weekly, Mr. Sadat reiterated a challenge to the Ford Administration to state clearly and publicly that the United States wanted Israel to withdraw from Arab territories seized during the war of tories seized during to war in 1967.

"The time has come for the United States to say whether it protects Israel within its borders or with the Arab territories that the Israelis seized by force," he said.

This apparently will be his key request to President Ford.

Hairy Guardsmen Reinstated in Neb.

LINCOLN, Neb., May 14 (UPI)—Two Army National Guardsmen whose hair was ruled too long to satisfy regulations have been reinstated, Gen. Francis Winner, Nebraska adjutant general, said today.

Douglas Mosier was terminated several weeks ago, and William McClatchey was due to be separated from the service. Both have been retained as helicopter mechanics, Winner said.

The state attorney general advised that guard regulations concerning uniform standards were not clear enough to enforce.

Algeria Seeking Viet Assets Here

Associated Press

The United States has received three diplomatic notes from Algeria seeking to assume the administration of South Vietnamese assets in the United States, including the former Saigon government's embassy.

All the notes said essentially the same thing, State Department spokesman Robert Funseth reported. That is, the Provisional Revolutionary Government in Saigon has asked Algeria to take over operation of the assets. Funseth said the American response has been the same: the matter is under consideration.

"THE SUCCESSFUL ACTIONS OF THE U.S. FORCES, ASSOCIATED WITH THE RECOVERY OF THE SS MAYAGUEZ AND ITS ENTIRE CREW HAVE A SIGNFICANCE FAR GREATER THAN THAT REPRESENTED BY THIS UNWARRANTED AND ILLEGAL HIJACKING EPISODE.

WASHINGTON (UPI) -- WITH OVERWHELMING FORCE, U.S. MARINES HAVE RECOVERED THE MERCHANT SHIP MAYAGUEZ AND RESCUED ALL 40 CREWMEN FROM THEIR CAMBODIAN CAPTORS.

PRESIDENT FORD SAID TODAY HE PERSONALLY ORDERED U.S. AIR FORCE FIGHTERS TO DRIVE AWAY THE CAMBODIAN GUNSHIPS THAT SEIZED THE UNARMED AMERICAN VESSEL ON MONDAY. MARINES RECAPTURED THE VESSEL WEDNESDAY, UNOCCUPIED BUT WITH FOOD STILL WARM IN THE GALLEY.

THE MARINES LANDED AT KOH TANG, A TINY ISLAND IN THE GULF OF THAILAND, IN THE FIRST STEP OF THE SWIFT RESCUE. SIXTY MILES AWAY, NAVY FIGHTERS SCREAMED OVER THE CAMBODIAN MAINLAND AND BOMBED AN AIRFIELD IN A FURTHER DISPLACE OF FORCE.

THE FIGHTING ON THE ISLAND WAS FIERCE AND CONTINUED INTO THE EARLY MORNING HOURS, WASHINGTON TIME. DEFENSE SECRETARY JAMES SCHLESINGER SAID AMERICAN TROOPS HAD BEEN KILLED, BUT REFUSED TO GIVE NUMBERS OR DETAILS.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, WASHINGTON TIME, A THAI FISHING BOAT CAME UP TO THE DESTROYER USS WILSON, WHITE FLAG FLYING. THE 40 AMERICANS WERE ABOARD.

THE MAYAGUEZ WAS TOWED OUT OF THE AREA. THE CREW REBOARDED AND FIRED ITS BOILERS, AND ITS HONG KONG-THAILAND VOYAGE RESUMED.

SCHLESINGER CALLED THE CAMBODIAN SEIZURE OF THE MAYAGUEZ "A HIJACKING," AND TOLD A PREDAWN NEWS CONFERENCE THE KHMER ROUGE HAD BUCKLED UNDER THE U.S. MILITARY MIGHT AND WERE FORCED TO RELEASE THE CAPTIVES.

FOR A FEW HOURS, AMERICAN TROOPS AGAIN FOUGHT IN INDOCHINA. FORD MUST, UNDER THE WAR POWERS ACT, EXPLAIN HIS DECISION TO CONGRESS, AND PREPARED LETTERS FOR DELIVERY TO THE HOMES OF CONGRESSIONAL LEADERS ABOUT DAWN TODAY. THE EARLY REACTION OF MANY LAWMAKERS WAS TO SUPPORT HIM.

THE WHITE HOUSE WAS PLEASED WITH THE LIGHTNING SUCCESS. SINCE THE COMMUNIST VICTORIES IN VIETNAM AND CAMBODIA, FORD AND SECRETARY OF STATE HENRY KISSINGER REPEATEDLY HAVE WARNED FOE AND BOLSTERED FRIEND THAT THE UNITED STATES WOULD STAND AND FIGHT WHEN NECESSARY.

FORD HIMSELF MADE THE ANNOUNCEMENT.

"I HAVE NOW RECEIVED INFORMATION THAT THE VESSEL HAS BEEN RECOVERED INTACT AND THAT THE ENTIRE CREW HAS BEEN RESCUED," HE SAID. "THE FORCES THAT HAVE SUCCESSFULLY ACCOMPLISHED THIS MISSION ARE STILL UNDER HOSTILE FIRE BUT ARE PREPARING TO DISENGAGE."

FOR THE FIRST TIME, CAMBODIA'S COMMUNIST GOVERNMENT MENTIONED THE SEIZURE WEDNESDAY AND CLAIMED THE SHIP WAS IN ITS TERRITORIAL WATERS. THE RADIO BROADCAST HINTED OF "ESPIONAGE OR PROVOCATIVE ACTIVITIES."

THE MAYAGUEZ WAS BOARDED MONDAY BY THE CREW OF A CAMBODIAN GUNSHIP ABOUT 60 MILES OFF THE COAST. THE OWNER, SEA-LAND CORP. OF MENLO PARK, N.J., SAID ONLY 30 OF THE 266 CONTAINERS IN THE SHIP'S CARGO HELD MILITARY SUPPLIES -- AND NONE OF THESE WERE WEAPONS, MUNITIONS, OR CLASSIFIED MATERIAL.

KISSINGER SAID DIPLOMATIC EFFORTS WOULD BE EXHAUSTED BEFORE TROOPS WERE SENT IN. REP. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, D-MASS., SAID CHINA HAD BEEN ASKED TO GIVE CAMBODIA A 24-HOUR ULTIMATUM. NO REPLY WAS RECEIVED, AND THE DEADLINE PASSED BEFORE DAWN IN THE GULF OF THAILAND, TUESDAY EVENING WASHINGTON TIME.

EIGHT CAMBODIAN GUNBOATS BEGAN LEAVING KOH TANG HEADED FOR THE CAMBODIAN PORT OF KOMPONG SOM. THEY WERE FIBERGLASS, ABOUT 30 FEET LONG -- LIKE SMALL OCEAN-GOING PLEASURE BOATS IN THE UNITED STATES -- AND ARMED WITH A SINGLE MORTAR OR MACHINE GUN.

THEY WERE STRAFED BY A7 AND F4 FIGHTER PLANES FROM U TAPAO AIR BASE IN THAILAND, EACH ONE ARMED WITH WEAPONS MORE SOPHISTICATED THAN THE BOATS. THREE VESSELS SUNK.

South Korea Bans Dissent, Curbs Travel

By Don Oberdorfer
Washington Post Foreign Service

TOKYO, May 13—South Korea's President Park Chung Hee issued a sweeping presidential edict today banning virtually all internal dissent on threat of prison terms of up to 15 years.

The new measure, one of series of off-again, on-again restrictions on domestic opposition over the past 16 months, also contains a ban on unauthorized departures of people and money from South Korea.

In a brief statement Park said he had issued today's lengthy decree "to consolidate national unity, coalesce national opinion and enable all people to prepare themselves thoroughly for an impregnable posture of national security" in the face of "a growing danger of miscalculation" by Communist North Korea.

To a large decree, public and political opinion recently had been coalescing behind government policy, following the fall of Indochina and the recent visit to Peking by North Korean President Kim Il Sung. Park's latest "emergency decree" runs the risk of refueling the opposition, even if its expression is suppressed for the time being by presidential power.

U.S. Said to Plan Cutback in Laos

From News Dispatches

VIENTIANE, May 13 — There were reports today that the U.S. embassy has decided to evacuate some Americans, as several more army units formerly aligned with the Laotian rightist faction pledged their loyalty to neutralist Premier Souvanna-Phouma and the Pathet Lao official named acting defense minister yesterday.

According to an authoritative source who told of the evacuation plan, the United States is also considering closing down American operations in some parts of Laos following the collapse of the rightist side in the tripartite coalition.

The source said it has not yet been determined how many of the approximately 820 American officials and their dependents in Laos would be sent out.

U.S. weighs options on seized ship

By PETER J. KUMPA
Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—President Ford called the third meeting of the National Security Council in two days last night to consider options on how to recover the merchant ship Mayaguez, seized Monday by Cambodia and still held in the Gulf of Thailand 30 miles from the coast.

Henry A. Kissinger, Secretary of State, flew back from a Midwest speaking trip to attend the extraordinary top-level policy meeting, which also was attended by James R. Schlesinger, Secretary of Defense, and William E. Colby, director of the Central Intelligence Agency.

A White House spokesman denied reports that the ship had started moving during the day. "We have no information that the Mayaguez is moving," Ronald H. Nessen, presidential press secretary, said. He stated that it was still in the same place that it had been in the morning, near Koh Tang Island off the Cambodian coast.

American warplanes kept a constant watch on the ship and the fate of its crew remained a mystery. There was no hard information on whether the American crewmen had been taken off the ship or were still aboard as hostages. It was understood from informed sources that it was fear for their lives that delayed any quick naval action to recover the ship.

One U.S. Navy P-3 Orion reconnaissance plane dove through a heavy cloud cover early yesterday for a better view of the ship. It took one round of small-arms fire in the tail, but no one was injured. Other surveillance planes included jet fighters and Air

'Nothing we can do,' Teng says

Park noted in his announcement that some nations have expressed uneasiness or misgivings about U.S. defense commitments following the Indochina collapse. "However, our government continues to place trust and confidence in the U.S. commitment based on the Korea-U.S. mutual defense agreement, and will endeavor to further strengthen the traditional ties of close friendship and cooperation with the United States," he said.

There was no recognition in the statement of the possible adverse impact in the U.S. Congress or executive branch of the new moves to suppress internal opposition.

Park's statement called on North Korea to desist from what he called 'the daydream of communizing the whole of the Korean peninsula" and to move toward early resumption of the now-frozen North-South dialogue.

He warned that if North Korea launches another invasion, "We shall then take the occasion to eradicate their threats once and for all. I solemnly warn, therefore, that any reckless adventure by the North Korean Communists will only lead to their destruction."

The South Korean leader did not explain the basis for his unusually strong threat of retaliation against the North.

Park, who first took power in a 1961 military coup and was elected to three terms as president in popular balloting, seized nearly total control under martial law in October 1972.

As opposition to one-man rule began to grow, he issued "emergency decrees" against domestic dissent in January and April 1974. He repealed the decrees last August in the face of foreign and domestic criticism, and released most of the 200 political prisoners from their cells in February.

In effect, today's edict reinstates the previous ban on opposition to Park's rule and in some respects goes further than before.

Among other things, Emergency Measure No. 9 makes it a crime, punishable by prison terms of one to 15 years, to:

- Advocate or petition for revision or repeal of the martial-law constitution under which Park assumed unchecked power.
- Broadcast or publish any news report of any opposition to the martial-law constitution.
- Stage any student demonstration or assembly that "interferes" with politics.
- Move any Korean-owned property out of the country "with intent to perpetrate a property flight."
- Publicly oppose the new emergency edict, or report on any such opposition.

The new decree gives government ministers sweeping power to close down universities, broadcasting stations, newspapers or other enterprises, or dismiss any member of their staff or administration, in enforcing the strictures. No judicial review of such measures is permitted.

The decree also explicitly permits arrests, detention, search and seizure without warrant — all of which have been commonly practiced in recent years in South Korea.

Last year's decrees, one of which authorized the death penalty for dissent, prescribed trial by closed military court. The new decree calls for trial by civil court. No ground rules for the conduct of the trials were specified.

SHIP ..... CONTINUED

Force AC-130 gunships that have range and staying power.

Officially, the White House, the State Department and the Pentagon declined to say what military and diplomatic efforts were being made to recover the American merchant ship, which was seized by Cambodian gunboats while en route from Hong Kong to Sattahip in Thailand.

But, according to informed sources here, the People's Republic of China was being used to apply diplomatic pressure while a number of Navy warships led by the carrier USS Coral Sea headed for the scene and marines in Okinawa were placed on alert.

President Ford, who had labeled the seizure "an act of piracy" and demanded the immediate release of the Mayaguez, was awakened twice in the night for reports on the incident. Yesterday morning, he presided for nearly an hour over the second National Security Council meeting considering what steps to take on the captured vessel.

Whatever action the President may decide to take, he seemed to have strong backing in Congress, where demands for military action were growing. Emphasizing the word "if," Mr. Nessen said that if there were any decision for military steps, Mr. Ford would consult fully with Congress.

Senator Robert C. Byrd (D., W. Va.), assistant Senate majority leader, urged the President to set a 48-hour deadline for the release of the ship. If it were not met, he said, the United States should take "whatever action is necessary" for its return.

According to two legislators who had meetings with the President on other matters, Mr. Ford was acting coolly and deliberately in the crisis. Said Senator Jacob K. Javits (R., N.Y.): "My feeling is the President is determined the ship and crew must be returned [but] he's keeping his shirt on." Representative John B. Anderson (R., Ill.) also was convinced that Mr. Ford would consult with congressional leaders before leaving diplomatic channels to get the ship back.

Mr. Ford was awakened at 2.25 A.M. and again at 5.20 A.M. for reports on the incident. He also talked with Secretary Schlesinger at 7 A.M., with the White House declining to say what was discussed.

One report had the President ordering 150 marines to fly to Thailand in a show of strength while alerting another 1,000 marines on Okinawa. But informed sources explained that it was standard procedure to alert troops in such instances. The possibility of using marines from nearby Thailand may be moot, for in Bangkok, Prime Minister Kukrit Pramoj of Thailand said his country would not permit bases there to be used for military action against Cambodia.

Mr. Nessen refused to comment on the Thai position

Early yesterday, the White House reported that the Mayaguez was anchored close to the island of Koh Tang, about 30 miles from the port of Kompong Som, now renamed Sihanoukville, which is about 30 miles northeast of the point where it was seized by two Cambodian gunboats, about 8 miles from the rocky island of Paule Wai.

During the night, it had been escorted by the Cambodian vessels and had not gone to port as originally believed. There was no explanation for the stop,although a Pentagon spokesman said it was "apparently dead in the water."

From the last messages from the ship—given before the Cambodian boarding party reached the radio room—it is known that none of the crew of 39 had been injured during the takeover despite some gunfire.

Whether the crew had been moved off the vessel could not be determined . No spokesman here would even say whether any of the men had been sighted. There were, however, reports that more than two Cambodian vessels were in the area.

Late yesterday, there was a report that the ship had begun a slow movement. It was not headed away from the coast but it was not clear if it was headed for .Sihanoukville. Later, informed sources said, the erratic movement had stopped.

American aircraft kept the ship under continuous surveillance, which was made difficult at times by the cloud cover.

There was no confirmation that the Cambodians had been reached through diplomatic channels. And there was noting but speculation on the motives in seizing the ship.

[In Washington, however, White House press secretary Ron Nessen said, "No evacuation has been ordered."]

With the action by 10 units today, some 13 military organizations in the Vientiane area have expressed support for the government following the resignation of four rightist Cabinet ministers and two key generals over the weekend.

The national radio broadcast a statement from the air force commander, Brig. Gen. Bouatha Phottivongsa, pledging support for the coalition and banning unauthorized movements of military aircraft. The grounding of planes and a prohibition against the movement of military equipment was decreed yesterday by the acting defense minister, Kham Ouane Boupha.

The staff of the Finance Ministry also expressed support for the coalition government today and demanded that Ngon Sananikone, a leading rightist politician who was one of the ministers who resigned, be replaced by the Pathet Lao deputy finance minister.

Three companies of cadets at the police academy took a stronger approach. After declaring their support for the coalition, they failed to do so by Thursday they would be considered to have abandoned their posts.

The Mayaguez Affair

THE NEW CAMBODIAN government's seizure of the American merchant ship Mayaguez poses an unwanted and difficult challenge to the Ford administration. Obviously, the United States must protect its citizens and their property from arbitrary acts by foreign states. Particularly at this moment of post-Vietnam uncertainty, the government is bound to be worrying about whether its will is still being taken seriously in the world. And yet the facts of this incident are still very few and dim. Certainly the basic prerequisites for the use of force—that the facts be known, that the Congress and the public be informed of the choices and risks, and that diplomatic alternatives be exhausted—have not yet been met.

What we do know is that an unarmed merchant ship under charter to the U.S. military, carrying supplies but apparently not weapons to U.S. military bases in Thailand, was intercepted in what Cambodia claims are its territorial waters eight miles from an island sitting 60 miles off the Cambodian coast in the Gulf of Siam. Whether this was an act of "piracy," as the administration at once claimed, is not clear to lawyers. In the absence of any explanation from the new, uncommunicative and intensely nationalistic government of Cambodia, one can only speculate on what its purposes were. To be tough and anti-American? To assert a territorial claim to an island also claimed by the Vietnamese? To take a chip for bargaining against the return of Cambodian property taken abroad by members of the former government? To protest the delivery of military supplies to American military installations on the territory of a neighboring state, Thailand, with which Cambodia has poor relations?

The United States has approached Peking for help in obtaining the release of the ship and its crew of 39. But there are no visible results as yet, and it is far from certain that China could do very much, even if it wanted to. Some approach to the United Nations Secretary General might also be appropriate. What would certainly not be appropriate, however, would be the policy recommended by Sen. James L. Buckley (Con.-R-N.Y.): "immediate punitive air and naval attacks." That he could toy so cavalierly with the lives of the 39 hostages, without having any way of knowing what actually had happened, and without considering what the targets or costs or risks of renewed bombing might be, suggests a truly astonishing inability to learn anything from Vietnam. The appeal by Sen. John Sparkman (D-Ala.) to retrieve the ship "any way we can" was only slightly less ill-considered.

The administration itself has threatened Cambodia with "the most serious consequences." It would have done much better first to build its case. As it was the administration last night found itself in the awkward if not untenable position of making plans to fly marines into American bases in Thailand, despite the Thai government's publicly stated refusal to permit use of those bases for military action against Cambodia. In fact, a more gratuitous display of American helplessness would be hard to conceive. The administration should not be raising the specter of force until it can supply the American people with convincing evidence of the rightness of its case as well as an explanation of why there is no effective alternative. American honor is being tested. But so, after Vietnam, is American common sense.

BALTIMORE SUN 14 MAY 1975

Dealing With Gunboat Diplomacy

The safe and speedy retrieval of the merchant ship Mayaguez with its crew and cargo should be the overriding concern of Washington in dealing with the incident. It was seized by boats from a Cambodia in the throes of transformation under a violent revolutionary regime that is consolidating control and spurning foreign contact. In the face of provocation by a little-known adversary, a great and self-confident power should move calmly and rationally. The first step before contemplating any action must be to find out why Cambodians did what they did, both through monitoring their broadcasts and through diplomatic lines in Peking. American bluster is unlikely to retrieve the Mayaguez, and precipitate violence might get the 39 seamen killed. Whatever a handful of marines can do, they cannot protect hostages in hostile custody.

There are some reasons to think the Mayaguez may have been seized as part of Cambodia's assertion of sovereignty over islands also claimed by South Vietnam and over waters in a 12-mile radius from them. This in turn would be part of an attempt to get economic control over a fair share of the Gulf of Thailand. Although Cambodia has a large coast, the boundaries with Vietnam and Thailand could be extended seaward in such a way as to deny it much seabed. The second session of the United Nations Third Law of the Sea Conference broke up in Geneva last week with the sea still in anarchy. There is no internationally respected way to resolve disputes over islets and over competing claims of mainlands and adjoining islands to continental shelfs.

The Mayaguez was at least the third vessel harassed by Cambodians in the same location this month. The waters are international under American doctrine but claimed by Cambodia since 1969. One puzzling aspect of the affair is why the owners of a merchant ship carrying military cargo allowed it to go so near a trouble spot involving a virulent government. The Gulf of Thailand is wide. A ship bound for Thailand need not go so near Cambodian-claimed islands.

If the assertion of territoriality was the motive, the Mayaguez is a pawn in a dispute not directed at the United States and its return should be easily managed. If another motive is involved, however, such as the acquisition of hostages for leverage in a dispute with the United States over something else, the incident could prove ugly and difficult. Dispatching marines to Thailand, where the United States already has considerable forces, only endangers Thailand's relations with the new Cambodia, and with this country. Clear communication between Washington and Phnom Penh is the first requisite and the only hope for the seamen now in Cambodian hands.

Retrieving the Mayaguez

Coming as it did on top of the other reverses U.S. policy has suffered in Southeast Asia, the Khmer Rouge seizure of the U.S. ship Mayaguez is a kind of last straw. With the 40 American crewmen now being held by Cambodia, we are confronted with all the doubts and dilemmas that surround the terrorist and hijacking incidents we have already come to know too well.

No blanket laws can be laid down to deal with such situations; judgments must be made by responsible authorities in light of the particular circumstances of each incident. We do not yet know what the appropriate method will be in this incident, but in dealing with it President Ford will be the responsible authority, and he will need the broadest possible latitude. The least Congress can do is to make clear that he has the authority to use U.S. military forces if the occasion demands.

Naturally, the President's first step must be to make some intelligent appraisal of Khmer Rouge aims. Specifically, did the new Cambodian government make a misjudgment that can be resolved with diplomacy, or was this a deliberate provocation by an "outlaw" government, a declaration that the new Cambodian regime will not abide by the normal standards of international conduct?

The Mayaguez was some 60 miles from the Cambodian shore, but only eight miles from a small rock island claimed by both Cambodia and Vietnam. Possibly the Cambodians are merely interested in making a point about ownership of the island and their 12-mile limit. They recently had fired on a South Korean ship and stopped a Panamanian freighter in the same waters. If they are willing to release the Mayaguez and its crew, it would be well worth a U.S. pledge to give their rock a wider berth.

If, however, there is really a question of "piracy" on the high seas, as President Ford declared, it becomes a different issue. Given the behavior of the new Cambodian regime so far, there is every reason to suspect that the seizure is intended as an act of defiance of foreign nations in general and the U.S. in particular. If so, the next step is hard to predict. It could be the release of the Mayaguez crew, along the lines of the release of refugees from the French embassy in Phnom Penh. But something worse is also easy to imagine.

Congress has legislated against the use of American military power in Indochina and the Mayaguez incident points up the difficulties in such limitations on American power. White House counsel thinks the President can legally use force in this instance and Senator Case says the limitations do not preclude "police actions" (like the one in Korea in 1950?). Secretary Kissinger says the President has "certain inherent powers" to act. But the very ambiguities of present law are an inhibition to quick action.

Beyond that, there is the question of the next Mayaguez. One of the big questions about this incident is, since the Cambodians had already assaulted two other ships, where was the U.S. Navy? The Navy is now moving into the Gulf of Siam. If the Cambodians move against another U.S. merchantman, should the Navy stand by pending a congressional resolution?

Freedom of the seas, and more broadly freedom of Americans to travel and trade in the world, is one of the bedrocks of American foreign policy. We learned from the Barbary pirates that sometimes enforcing this right requires the use of force. We are now back to that simple bedrock, and are learning again that there is no withdrawal from the world.

CHICAGO TRIBUNE
14 MAY 1975

Cambodia turns to piracy

In a matter of a few days, the new government of Cambodia has shown its utter contempt for the principles of humanity and international law. First it uprooted millions of city people, including the aged, the wounded, and the ill—and herded them out into the countryside to toil in the fields. Now it has seized the United States merchant ship Mayaguez and its crew on the high seas. We seem to be witnessing the birth of a miniature monster.

The United States must secure the release of the ship and its 39 crewmen, most of whom are Americans. President Ford has denounced the seizure as an act of piracy, and Secretary Kissinger has called it unacceptable.

The diplomatic approaches being made to Cambodian leaders thru other governments are a correct first step. Cambodia, like an individual, is entitled to a chance to explain its behavior and correct it before any more damage is done.

But Mr. Ford quite rightly warned of serious consequences if Cambodia fails to return the ship and crew promptly—and promptly should mean hours, not weeks. Having issued this warning, he is preparing to carry it out. Naval vessels and Marines have been ordered into the area.

Liberals like Hubert Humphrey are right enough so far in warning that we should "stop, look, and listen" before using force. But if we know Mr. Humphrey, he will still be chattering on long after the crisis has turned to another humiliation like the one that lasted for a year after the Navy's Pueblo was seized by the North Koreans in 1968. That we cannot tolerate.

Another thing we must do right away is to stop playing coy about what the Mayaguez was carrying. If our cause is as just as it appears, the last thing we need is evasiveness. If the ship was carrying arms to Thailand, there is nothing improper about that. It was traveling in international waters and its seizure is plainly unacceptable. If unpunished, it will surely become the first in a series of intolerable harassments thruout Southeast Asia.

Flushed with their success in taking over Cambodia, the Khmer Rouge seem to be trying to taunt the United States, perhaps to prove that they can exact payment from us for our alleged transgressions against them. This is what was known in the days of Britain's might as "twisting the lion's tail." The British Empire never allowed the twisting to become intolerable. Neither can we allow Uncle Sam's beard to be this badly singed.

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER - 14 MAY 1975

Shooting is a last recourse

In a characteristic reaction to the seizure of a U. S. merchant vessel by a Cambodian gunboat, Sen. James Buckley demanded that the U. S. shoot first and ask questions later.

"A failure by the United States to react swiftly and clinically will only invite further outrages against the persons and property of American citizens," the New York Republican-Conservative declared. "I therefore urge the President to order immediate punitive air and naval attacks on appropriate targets in Cambodia."

That would assure the slaughter of a lot of Cambodians, but would it not also assure the slaughter of the 40-man crew of the Mayaguez?

The right course is to think first, and then perhaps we need not shoot at all. What happened, and why, in the Gulf of Siam are not at all clear, and the parallels with events in the Gulf of Tonkin 11 years ago are not so remote as to be brushed off entirely.

This is not to excuse what President Ford called "an act of piracy" by the new Cambodian regime, whose aims so far are as ambiguous as its behavior toward its own populace has been odious. Nor is it to rule out force in every and all circumstances.

Still, there is at least considerable room for doubt that the new Cambodian regime, having triumphed after years of war, is anxious to provoke a war with the U. S., and there is scarcely any room for doubt that a new round of hostilities in the Far East would not be in the American interest.

This nation's first recourse should be diplomacy, and its second and third recourse as well. That may not satisfy hawks like Sen. Buckley, but it is the best way of getting the results this nation wants.

To Halt Nuclear Spread

The threat of nuclear energy to mankind, recognized for three decades but still t[illegible]tle controlled, lies in its dual nature. Like fire, it can be used beneficially or destructively. No task confronting the United States, the Soviet Union and other advanced nations—which supply reactors, fissionable materials and other peaceful nuclear equipment to the rest of the world—is more important than heading off an accompanying spread of atomic weapons.

The energy crisis is stimulating interest in nuclear power the world around. In addition to 221 nuclear power plants operational or on order in the United States, there are now 274 power reactors operating or planned in 26 other countries. By 1980, they are expected to produce annually as a by-product more than 40,000 pounds of plutonium that, extracted from spent fuel rods, could provide enough weapons-grade fissionable material for more than 2,000 Hiroshima-size bombs.

The first line of defense against this horror is the 1970 nuclear non-proliferation treaty, which is now getting its first scheduled review at a month-long United Nations meeting in Geneva attended by most of its 91 parties, including the five Euratom countries which have just ratified—West Germany, Italy, Belgium, Holland and Luxembourg.

Efforts will be made to urge ratification by 17 other signatory countries, including Japan and Switzerland. But it is increasingly doubtful that some, such as Egypt and Turkey, any longer have that intention. And the nations which have refrained from signing include such potential weapons-states as India, Brazil, Argentina, Israel, Pakistan and South Africa.

Some treaty adherents are also suspected of nuclear weapons intentions. Iran is said to be seeking an American or French license to build a chemical reprocessing plant capable of extracting weapons-grade plutonium from spent fuel rods. So too, reportedly, is South Korea, feeling more insecure than ever in the wake of the United States withdrawal from and the subsequent collapse of South Vietnam.

This trend can be slowed and possibly halted only through concerted action by the supplier nations to withhold such critical equipment as reprocessing plants and to tighten safeguards over the sales of other nuclear materials to parties to the non-proliferation treaty and, even more so, to non-treaty countries.

No sales at all should be made to non-treaty countries that fail to accept these tighter international safeguards. The International Atomic Energy Agency might be given responsibility for conducting peaceful nuclear explosions for non-nuclear countries—but only if an I.A.E.A. study shows such explosions to be environmentally and economically feasible, something American experts increasingly doubt.

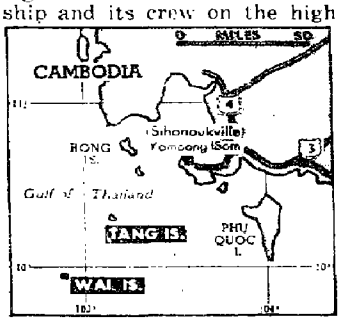
A BRAZEN ACT OF PIRACY

President Gerald Ford has reacted with commendable vigor to Cambodia's seizure of an American merchant ship and its crew on the high seas, an indefensible and open violation of international law.



The unarmed Mayaguez was boarded by the Red brigands as it sailed past the island of Poulo Wai, 55 miles from the Cambodian mainland. The vessel and its crew were later taken to another island — Koh Tang, 25 miles away.

The facts of the incident speak for themselves. They add up to naked, provocative banditry on the part of the new Communist rulers of Cambodia in defiance of rules all civilized nations have followed for the protection of peaceful ocean-going commerce for three centuries.

In the circumstances, Mr. Ford has shown forbearance in choosing diplomacy as the course of first resort in attempting to pry the Mayaguez and its crew from Communist clutches.

But we hope he has made it abundantly clear to Cambodia—directly or through intermediaries such as Red China—that neither he nor the American people will tolerate protracted palaver.

If the ship is not speedily released and sent on its way, Mr. Ford has indicated a readiness to act decisively and retake the Mayaguez by force, using whatever military measures are necessary to carry out the task.

He should not hesitate to do so. Any faltering on our part will further diminish respect for the U.S., and give every tin-pot tyrant in the world the idea that he can prey on American shipping with impunity.

The Men and the War

To the Editor:

I should like to make a partial reply to the April 7 Op-Ed article by Gloria Emerson, my experience in Vietnam being at least equal to hers and my knowledge of some of the individuals she assailed being hardly less. Loose libels, as Edmund Burke said, are to be passed by with silence and contempt. With that I agree, so long as it is an attack upon one's person. But when it is an envenomed and unsupported calumny of one's friends, that is a wholly different matter.

The late Creighton Abrams had been my personal friend since war days in Europe. Ambassadors Ellsworth Bunker and Sam Berger I came to know through personal contact in Vietnam. Others in the group hit by Miss Emerson are obviously in her view more birds of a feather.

But I speak first of Abrams. True, nothing ill was said of him, but his likeness was there conspicuously midway in the graphic gallery so arrayed as to strike the eye like a police line-up. The collective character was presented as if "from its horrid head sprang pestilence and war."

Abrams was a highly disciplined, self-contained professional. Few civilians got to know him very well, and certainly no female correspondent ever found the approach to his innerliness. I knew his character, his devotion to country, his concern for his fellow man, his passion for justice, his conviction that abuse of power was an evil beyond excuse.

Out of a few trivial episodes Miss Emerson faults Ambassador Bunker as a "man unmoved by life itself." He is somehow villainous because he liked to be with other Yale men and sing the Whiffenpoof song. Nothing said of Ambassador Bunker or implied of Sam Berger was to me in any degree recognizable. I rated them as sympathetic individuals, possessed of a large humanity, dedicated to duty amid tasks of utmost difficulty in posts where personal danger was a fact of life.

Miss Emerson wonders what these men now dream. There is no answer, so I will tell her what I dream. By extension, she would damn all of us who tried to serve our country in Vietnam. Now that the checkered flag is down and it's open season on those who tried among the losers, we need only wallow in this kind of garbage, and we'll make of the United States a land that nobody cares to serve.

Takeover in Laos

The Communists are on the verge of taking over power in Laos. The event, which has been pending for the last 20 years, is causing little stir in the world — or for that matter in Laos itself. So far, the collapse of the coalition government of Communists, neutralists and rightists and the quiet takeover of the key government posts by the Communists has proceeded with a merciful lack of violence. In the wake of Vietnam and Cambodia, it seems almost like the inevitable outcome in the last of the Indochinese states.

What has happened, apparently, is that the rightist members of the government — including the ministers of defense and finance — read the handwriting on the wall and resigned. They are expected to be replaced by their Communist deputies or else by less powerful non-Communist figures. Meanwhile, several thousand wealthy, upper-class Laotians have fled the country into Thailand, along with many Vietnamese and Chinese businessmen. And neutralist Premier Souvanna Phouma has warned that 'some important changes are about to occur" which will bring Laos into "an accord with history." Most observers in Laos expect the change to be gradual rather than violent, with Souvanna perhaps remaining for a time as a figurehead. So far, despite some hostile demonstrations, the American embassy in Vientiane is sitting tight.

The effort to set up a coalition government in Laos was perhaps unrealistic from the outset. The first was installed after an international conference on Laos held in Geneva in 1961; the latest dates from the cease-fire and peace accords of 1973. But even during the long years of bitter fighting between the royal Lao forces (including units of hill tribesmen organized and equipped by the Central Intelligence Agency) and the troops of the Communist Pathet Lao, Communist detachments remained in the capital, maintaining the fiction of a coalition. As long as the outcome of the war in South Vietnam and Cambodia remained in doubt, the arrangement had a certain logic. Now that logic must give way to the general Communist victory throughout Indochina.

Who cares? Everyone has long since forgotten that Laos was where it all began: that it was the threat of a Communist takeover in Laos in 1961 that brought the first serious American intervention in Indochina, at a time when the danger to Vietnam was still considered remote. That threat inspired John F. Kennedy to send a detachment of Marines to Thailand and call for a meeting of the SEATO powers in Bangkok, where the United States received the firm backing of Britain — and the less enthusiastic backing of France — to prevent the impending Communist grab. This, in turn, led to the Geneva conference and the Rube Goldberg coalition compromise which the Communists immediately proceeded to ignore.

But that, of course, was long ago, when a good many countries in addition to the United States were seriously alarmed about the prospect of Communist expansion in Asia and still believed they could prevent it. Today, no one is likely to worry very much about a Communist takeover in Laos, except the Laotians themselves and perhaps the Thais, who do not relish the idea of still another Communist-dominated country on their indefensible northeastern frontier. And even the Thais at this point are far more likely to accommodate than resist. Truly, much has changed in the course of the last 14 years.

Guest Editorial: ARMED FORCES JOURNAL - APRIL 1975 (14 MAY)

NOT MANY PEOPLE REALIZE IT, but the United States has been supporting a costly and inefficient civilian army for many years. This army is 40% larger than all our uniformed services combined, and it costs the taxpayers 50% more to maintain. In sharp contrast to our real Army, it is growing rapidly all the time. It does not protect our Nation's interests abroad, and it does not always respect our liberties at home. It is not answerable to the public for its actions. It has been known to be lazy and arrogant, and to show excessive concern for preserving its own power and importance.

The institution to which I refer is the Federal bureaucracy, which currently numbers more than 2.9 million employees and costs more than $35 billion a year, 11% of the total Federal budget. The interests of the Country demand that it be reformed, reduced, and brought under control.

I do not wish to impugn the integrity or ability of individual bureaucrats. Most of them, like most Americans, are patriotic, loyal and well-meaning. However, the system of which they are a part is so cumbersome and disorganized that a complete overhaul has long been desirable. The present economic crisis has made such an overhaul not just desirable but essential.

President Ford recently asked Congress to limit Federal employees to a 5% increase in pay this year, in order to help reduce the Federal deficit. I support this proposal. However, I feel the President should go further. The President should immediately institute a program to eliminate all Federal jobs, in every Department and Agnecy, that are redundant, unproductive, or unnecessary . . . .

The Federal government is not obliged to provide any individual with a job. It is obliged to provide the entire Country with economic stability. To do this, it must cut back the mammoth Federal budget, which has more than tripled in a little over a decade. Surely one of the best places to start is the $35 billion that goes annually to support the bureaucracy.

Neither will this policy mean a necessary decline in the quality of government service. Far from that, a reduction in manpower is likely to produce a corresponding increase in efficiency. This is what has happened in our Armed Services, whose personnel is now at the lowest level since the Korean War. The Defense Department has proven that, properly equipped, it can do the same job just as well with fewer people. Civilian departments can and must follow its example.

There is a further benefit to manpower reductions beyond the savings in wages and salaries. A monstrous bureaucracy like ours has a vested interest in keeping government spending high. Government spending is a bureaucrat's livelihood. The larger the appropriations for his department or agency, the greater his power and influence. As a result, Federal officials who oppose increased government expenditures are few and far between. Those who favor reducing expenditures are practically nonexistent. Clearly, government spending can never be cut unless the government itself is cut back first.

There are now almost 3-million members of our civilian army, serving in 11 executive departments, the executive office of the President, and 80 independent agencies. A nation of free men and women does not need that much supervision. What is more, the Country cannot afford that much supervision. ■☆■

Ford Misled on Vietnam Collapse

Jack Anderson and Les Whitten

The swift collapse of South Vietnam badly surprised President Ford who was misled, according to White House sources, by the national intelligence estimates.

These estimates are supposed to provide the President with the best possible analysis of what is likely to happen.

He was assured, for example, that the South Vietnamese army should be able to hold off the advancing Communists for several months. Even after the Saigon defenses began to crack, the national intelligence estimate predicted that Hanoi would negotiate with Saigon and form a coalition government.

The beleaguered Central Intelligence Agency was the first, say our sources, to warn that a Communist victory was imminent. The CIA recommended that the United States use its leverage to persuade the Saigon leaders to form a "peace government," which could negotiate a truce.

This would have given the United States more time to arrange an orderly and dignified evacuation. The CIA was overruled, however, upon the advice of American Ambassador Graham Martin who called upon President Nguyen Van Thieu instead to form a war cabinet supposedly to stiffen the resistance.

Although the Joint Chiefs of Staff correctly predicted more than two years ago that President Thieu would not survive and that the Communists would win the final struggle for Vietnam, the Pentagon badly misjudged the South Vietnamese army's ability to hold the line.

The Pentagon estimate was that the South Vietnamese would battle the Communists to a standstill along the approaches to Saigon. The only exception was the Air Force intelligence chief, Maj. Gen. George Keegan, who warned that the defenses would collapse.

It was the Pentagon's assessment that the South Vietnamese infantry divisions on the line were as good as any American divisions. Then why did they buckle? From the secret cables, here is a thumbnail analysis:

President Thieu was shaken by the capture of Banmethout in

Why We Lost the War

Could we have won the war in Vietnam? Of course we could. Sen. Barry Goldwater and a few others are saying so but nobody is paying much attention to them and there is no good reason why anybody should. We had the power, as Gen. LeMay told us, to bomb North Vietnam back into the stone age.

Why didn't we do it? The answer usually given is that by doing it we would have risked Chinese intervention of the kind that forced us to settle for a divided Korea in our previous Asian war. But it was at least questionable whether China, preoccupied with its own cultural revolution and mindful of its historic antipathy to the Vietnamese, would have gone to the rescue of its Southern neighbor. The risk was nevertheless there.

Mr. Crawford is a former columnist for Newsweek.

A more compelling reason for our failure to win the war in the only way it could have been won was our unwillingness to accept responsibility for the degree of devastation and bloodshed this would have inflicted. Some call this squeamishness. Others call it a decent respect for the opinion of mankind. Squeamishness or respect for civilized standards—it amounts to the same thing differently stated and differently weighted.

Defeat in Vietnam has hurt us, worse probably than we are disposed to acknowledge. It has raised questions around the world about our dependability as defenders of our allies and even more of weak nations not our allies. It has cost us something in self-confidence. It has cast doubt on our competence to hold our own in a contest for advantage, if not survival, with authoritarian systems.

Even the limited war we fought sandpapered the sensibilities of many, perhaps in the end a majority of Americans. Just recently a respected columnist has referred to the "carpet bombing" of Hanoi. Had that been a carpet bombing there would now be no Hanoi to celebrate victory in its

The 'Lessons' Of Vietnam

It was not long after the Korean war ended in 1953 that the Vietnam war began heating up. The fall of Dien Bien Phu followed the Korean ceasefire by barely more than a year.

Now that Saigon has fallen and the Vietnam war is at an end, there is inevitable speculation about the outbreak of a second Korean war.

The United States is linked to South Korea by a formal treaty and by the presence of some 30,000 American troops south of the 38th Parallel. And yet, a recent national opinion survey sponsored by the Chicago Council on Foreign Relations found American voters overwhelmingly opposed to U.S. intervention, should North Korea again invade South Korean territory.

These simple facts suggest why, desirable at it may seem to many people, the United States cannot declare a moratorium on foreign policy debate. President Ford and most Democratic leaders have joined in pleas that the nation be spared an orgy of recriminations over "who lost Vietnam."

That is sentiment to which all may subscribe. But the President presumes too much when he goes on to assert that the debate is unneeded because everyone has "learned the lesson" of Vietnam.

Different people have learned very different lessons from Vietnam, and well-ordered streets. It was selective bombing of military targets that wasn't quite accurate enough to avoid some civilian structures, including a hospital, which became exhibit-A in the tours conducted for visiting Americans determined to be appalled by their country's barbarism.

Hanoi could have been razed as Dresden was in World War II. The Red River dikes could have been cracked to release flood waters. At one point the rumor that they had been attacked set off an outraged cry of protest in this country. Unquestionably American power, had it been fully employed after the Tet offensive or at some other opportune juncture, could have won the war against North Vietnam and left its indigenous Vietcong cadres in the South unsupplied.

The question is whether we would have been better off winning that way than we are losing as we did. Probably not. Why, then, did our leaders take us into a war destined to harm us whether we won or lost? Because they thought we could win using only limited military means. Thus the Green Berets in Kennedy's scheme of things to beat the invaders at their own guerrilla game. And thus Johnson's determination to escalate enough to meet the challenge posed by the Russian and Chinese arming of North Vietnam. They both miscalculated. So hindsight makes wise men of their surviving critics.

American statesmen who warned this country over the years against enmeshment in land wars on this Asian continent doubtless recognized that a Western army fighting an Oriental army would be handicapped by Western conscience. Attitudes toward the value of life are too different. Even in the war against Hitler certain standards of military conduct were maintained. Prisoners of war, for example, were reasonably well treated over all.

In North Vietnam prisoners were sadistically abused. Civilian populations in the South were systematically terrorized, not by impersonal bombing and shelling, which were bad enough on both sides, but by night marauders on the ground kidnapping and murdering thousands whose only offense was that they sympathized with the Communists' enemies. The Phoenix operation, an attempt to fight fire with fire, never burned with enough conscienceless vigor to accomplish its purpose.

We cringed at pictures of Vietcong and North Vietnamese prisoners being kicked around by their South Vietnamese captors and at exposes of tiger cages for Saigon's political prisoners. If our people on the scene tried to moderate the conduct of our Asian allies the attempt was not well enough publicized and in any case seems to have been largely unsuccessful. Rough stuff on the battlefield occurs in every war. Continued abuse after the battle is over is unforgivable. At least, our side opened its prisoner-of-war camps to Red Cross inspection; the other side never did and we never learned until their release how savage its treatment of our men had been.

We keep hearing that the Paris accords, which were to end the war with honor on both sides, were violated by North and South alike. This is to equate cannon balls with bird shot. It became apparent that the North Vietnamese and the Vietcong never had the slightest intention of abiding by the treaty's terms. The South's violations were minor by comparison, maybe because he South lacked the resources to violate them as much as it would have liked. Whatever the reason, the equal division of blame is a distortion of the evidence.

How we Americans will weather the defeat in Vietnam is not yet clear. The immediate signs are depressing. Resistance to the succor of refugees is indecent in a nation of immigrants and refugees. The number is so small that assimilation should be fairly painless even in a time of economic recession. Perhaps it is only a first spiteful reaction of a people unaccustomed to defeat. Hopefully it will change as we get used to the loss.

More troublesome for this country's future is the burgeoning of extreme pacifism. A wave of antiwar sentiment follows every war but it seems more than usually virulent this time for understandable reasons. If there is a sure way for the United States to lose its influence in this world it is to convince friend and foe that American public opinion will never again stand for use of military force in any circumstance.

Another phenomenon of this immediate post-war period is complaisant acceptance of communism as an unobjectionable alternative to democracy. We are invited to be ashamed of our anti-communism during the cold war. It was, we are told, irrational demonology. Anyway Stalin is dead and detente is in force. What if all Asia follows the Vietnamese example? What if Western Europe is Finlandized? We will find out when and if these things happen that there was something not to regret in our cold-war attitude—and perhaps even something to regret in our failure to use our full power against North Vietnam.

until those conclusions are tested in debate, there can be no hope of agreement on a set of premises from which post-Vietnam policy can begin. Nothing makes that plainer than their differing views of the Korean situation.

Some have concluded from Vietnam that the United States should "never again" intervene on behalf of a regime which maintains power through repressive policies, which is marked by corruption and which commands only a dubious loyalty of its own subjects—even if that regime is attacked by a Communist government of no more savory character.

They argue that the U.S. treaty commitment to Korea shoud be abrogated and the American troops withdrawn as quickly as possible.

Others think the lesson of Vietnam is that the United States should never again be asked to fight a limited war on the mainland of Asia. They would support American intervention in Korea only if we were ready to go "all out for victory." Echoing the late Gen. Douglas MacArthur, they say there must be no "privileged sanctuaries" for the aggressor, or the United States should not fight again.

A third group concludes that the lesson of Vietnam is that we have been blinded by a fear of monolithic communism which has lost its relevance, if it ever had any. They argue that regimes like North Vietnam or North Korea, which maintain considerable autonomy, even as they derive support from both Peking and Moscow, are more worrisome to the Communist superstates than they should be to us.

Their view, of course, is that the United States should make it clear now that we no longer have a strong interest in who controls the Korean peninsula, and let the rival claimants settle their own quarrels.

A final group believes that a Communist Korea would put intolerable flank pressures on Japan, a linch-pin of the entire non-Communist economic and political world, and would force that country either to change its basic world orientation or to rearm—neither of which is desirable for American national interest.

From their perspective, the United States should make it clear in advance, not only to Pyongyang but to Moscow and Peking, that the United States cannot accept, and therefore will resist, a military move aimed at South Korea.

If detente is not to become a license to fish in troubled waters, they argue, the Communist giants must show their capacity for self-restraint. And if they do not, then let us disabuse ourselves of the myth of detente and reckon with the risks of the real cold war world.

All four of these views are held by people who firmly believe that they have properly assessed "the lesson of Vietnam." It is not too soon now for Congress and the President to open the debate on what that lesson really is. Tomorrow may be too late.

the central highlands last March. He concluded that his troops were spread too thin and ordered a strategic withdrawal.

But Thieu was indecisive. He would issue orders, than cancel them. He couldn't decide where to make a stand.

Finally the commander of the Second Military Region, after a meeting with Thieu, returned to his men and announced: "We're pulling out tonight."

They, not only abandoned their heavy equipment but left the First Military Region outflanked. What was supposed to be an orderly withdrawal, thereafter, turned into a pell-mell rush for the coast. Panic spread, with every man for himself, until the hasty retreat became a total rout.

What Kind of Dominoes?

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

By C. L. Sulzberger

PARIS—The only thing we know so far about the validity of a dominoes theory in Southeast Asia is that South Vietnam and Cambodia have been conquered by revolutionary armies and Laos is falling over the brink.

The incidence of guerrilla violence in Malaysia and Thailand has increased —but not drastically. North Korea seems preparing for another go at South Korea but that pertains to the domino game only in the broadest sense.

If some states—notably Malaysia, the Philippines and Thailand—are straightening out their relations with Peking, that is not astonishing. So is the United States. And, somewhat unexpectedly, an initial (perhaps temporary) result of the abrupt new look in Asia is a rise of Chinese influence, weakening Leonid Brezhnev's publicized hope to outflank southern China.

Saigon's Provisional Government has taken pains to insist it won't choose sides in the Sino-Russian quarrel. Since Saigon's sponsor, Hanoi, is believed more subject to Moscow's influence than Peking's, this assurance by Gen. Tran Van Tra seems inferentially friendlier to China.

Even Kim Il Sung, North Korea's redoubtable bullyboy, is advertising to everyone that among "evil spirits" his "ideological battle" hopes to eradicate is "feudal Confucianism." "Confucianism" is a dirty word in China, not Russia. This is significant because North Korea borders both.

The relatively tolerant appearance Saigon seeks to give the world may or may not endure. Logically it would seem improbable in view of the Indochinese dominance by Hanoi's disciplined spartan system which, after all, made the South Vietnam conquest possible.

As for Cambodia, it is very hard to judge its ideological future by its revolutionary present. The latter seems, by all accounts, to be the work of a kind of fanatical jacquerie, whose early actions make Russian Bolshevism look conservative and make Chinese Maoism look like a ceremonial tea.

All one can say at this stage of the great dominoes game is that the United States has lost a great deal of influence but it is by no means certain that either Russia or China has gained much or even that Communism, as most people understand the word, will end up triumphant in the newly revolutionized areas.

Although it experienced certain unsuccessful heresies like Trotskyism, Marxism was considered a monolithic doctrine until Marshal Tito's Yugoslavia fought Stalin down on a combination of ideological and national issues. The crack Tito caused in the monolith was merely the first of many. Eventually the old Russian idea that Communism abroad could be used as an obedient servant of Kremlin dictates at home began to appear absurd.

Since Tito's rebellion, varieties of

Promises, Promises!

By James Reston

WASHINGTON, May 13—The United States isn't very good at handling defeat, probably because it hasn't had much practice. It has been excessively self-critical about the collapse of Vietnam and Cambodia, and now our officials seem obliged to go around reassuring everybody that Uncle Sam is a stout and dependable fellow after all.

Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew of Singapore came here the other day, after turning back shiploads of Vietnamese refugees who sought safe haven in his country, and lectured us on how to be a reliable ally and regain the confidence of Asia. Nevertheless, President Ford gave him a big splashy dinner at the White House, where the Prime Minister turned his toast into a stump speech, and then went on "Face the Nation" and implied that the United States had not only been unreliable but maybe even dishonorable in Southeast Asia.

Some of this sort of thing was probably unavoidable, but confusing the American record in Southeast Asia with the American record in the world over the past thirty years is a little silly, and if the world is in doubt about how the United States will react to any serious challenge to its vital interests, the postwar record is fairly clear.

Washington reacted to the Soviet threat to Berlin with the airlift; to the Soviet Sputnik challenge in outer space by going to the moon; to the disaster of the Cuban Bay of Pigs with the blockade of Khrushchev's Cuban missiles in the second Cuban crisis; to the Communist threat to Greece and Turkey with the Truman Doctrine; to the economic wreckage of Europe after the last World War with the Marshall Plan; to the Soviet pressure on Japan with a security pact and the most generous and imaginative economic and political setlement ever offered by a victorious nation to a defeated nation.

The revisionist historians are having a field day now, but in the postwar era, the United States has been at its best when confronted by serious trouble and at its worst when it was sweet-talked into dreams of a phony perpetual peace.

Moscow misjudged Dean Acheson's Pacific "defense perimeter" speech, which left Korea out of the protected area, but found an American Army in Korea soon after the North Koreans attacked the South, at the Soviet Union's urging.

The Russian threat to dispatch airborne divisions to the Middle East produced an immediate American worldwide alert and a compromise cease-fire—not a very good one—but the Moscow threat or bluff or whatever it was, got the usual stern American re-

Taiwan's Future

By George T. Chang

KEARNY, N.J.—President Ford is scheduled to visit China this fall. Undoubtedly the Taiwan issue will again be raised at the highest level, and a compromise might be worked out in the process of improving diplomatic relations between the United States and China.

The reaction of the majority of Taiwanese toward the rapprochement between the United States and China has been mixed. They welcome the emergence of new pragmatic policy on both sides. But on the other hand, they resent that the right and existence of 16 million Taiwanese have been totally ignored.

Strong desire prevails among the Taiwanese to have a decisive say about their political future. In view of the current conditions outside and inside Taiwan, one may conceive no circumstances under which the application of the principle of self-determination of people is more pertinent and urgent.

To deny 16 million literate citizens the right to decide their own political future as well as their own form of government is to violate every principle of contemporary law and politics.

Given a free and honest referendum today on Taiwan, the overwhelming majority of the people of Taiwan would choose to establish a democratic and independent state of Taiwan, both in fact and in law.

Despite uncertainty about the possible impact of the Presidential trip on future United States-China relations, one of the trip's outcomes is certain and predictable. The trip will constitute another serious blow to the present regime in Taipei.

Full diplomatic recognition of China by the United States, if realized, would mean, among other things, complete diplomatic isolation of the Nationalist regime.

This international isolation, coupled with the deteriorating internal economic situation, would push the regime to the brink of collapse. To prevent internal turmoil or even bloodshed, the regime must immediately take the following measures as the first steps toward a more revolutionary change of its structure and character.

First, announce Taiwan as a new political entity, thereby severing de jure and de facto its linkage with past Chinese internal conflicts and

MCGOVERN SEES U.S. SEEKING UP TO 5000 CRUISE MISSILES. Sen. George McGovern (D-S. D.), in seeking a ban on U. S. cruise missiles (Defense/Space Daily, April 30), said that the Navy could seek to deploy as many as 2000 cruise missiles and the Air Force, between 2000 and 3000.

He asserted that Congress should first consider a prohibition against "any new long-range cruise missile of any kind." He said a "lesser, but still meaningful prohibition," would be to allow the more verifiable air-launched long-range cruise missiles, on the condition that all above a certain range cutoff point would be counted against the 2400 delivery vehicle ceiling set at Vladivostok, but to ban any sea-based long-range cruise missiles.

He said the cutoff point above which sea-based cruise missiles would be banned and air-launched cruise missiles counted could be 100 kilometers, or roughly the range of the Harpoon anti-ship missile.

Noting that the Administration indicated at Vladivostok that air-launched missiles with a range above 600 kilometers should be counted under the 2400 vehicle ceiling, McGovern pointed out that a cruise missile with a nominal range of 600 kms "could be altered to go over 2000 kilometers, or perhaps more."

proclaiming its intent to live in peace with all neighboring countries, including China.

The majority of the Taiwanese believe that China's vow to "liberate" Taiwan is motivated by the fact that the Nationalists remain a party to the Chinese civil war, continue to claim the title of "Government of China," and adopt "recovery of the Chinese mainland" as a national policy.

The Taiwanese also believe once the provocation is removed and a more representative government expresses its nonhostile intention, the tension in the area will be greatly diffused, paving the way to create a more favorable atmosphere in which a peaceful coexistence could be worked out between the people of Taiwan and China.

Second, end the quarter-century-long martial law. The so-called Chinese civil war has long dwindled down to a verbal war without significant military action on either side.

The indefinite state of siege maintained by the Nationalists on Taiwan has long lost its justification. It now serves only as a cynical device for the rulers to suspend indefinitely civil liberty and suppress political opposition. Return to democratic normality of political life is a prerequisite for a socio-political change essential to the island's stability.

Third, release all political prisoners, thereby providing a basis for genuine collaboration with opposition forces. Taiwan has been politically the most repressive area in the world. Many intellectuals and youths are being tortured and are languishing in military prisons.

Fourth, conduct general and free elections, thereby creating an open environment for a peaceful transfer of political power.

These measures must be taken urgently within Taiwan. Washington and Peking, too, must realize that unless and until the right of self-determination of the 16 million people of Taiwan is fully recognized by all parties concerned there will be no peace in the region.

sponse.

In short, whenever the United States has seemed to be wavering and the Soviet Union has probed and tested America's will and its strengths, the United States reaction has been clear and swift.

In fact, if there is a danger in the present mood of disappointment and failure in Southeast Asia, it is not that the United States will fail to react in the future but that, if pushed on the assumption of American weakness, that it will overreact, as President Kennedy did in Vietnam after his humiliating blunders at the Bay of Pigs.

The threat to the United States in the last decade was not primarily a military or strategic threat, unbalancing the power of the world, as the Pentagon insisted, but a philosophical and economic threat, dividing the American people and unbalancing their trust in one another and the dependability of their institutions at home.

To allow these divisions to go on, after the loss of 56,000 lives and over $150 billion in aid would really have raised serious and justifiable doubts about the judgment and reliability of the United States as the principal defender of Western civilization.

The allies of this hemisphere, in Europe, and in Japan and the rest of Asia will know they are in serious trouble and will know they are insecure when America is diverted from its primary interests by secondary considerations, and weakened by unemployment, inflation and mistrust.

Meanwhile, verbal assurances by President Ford and Secretary Kissinger that America is a faithful ally are not likely to do much good, and in any event, will not impress either our allies or our adversaries. If they have not learned how America reacts to adversity after Berlin, the Middle East, Cuba, and the Marshall Plan, they probably won't be impressed by Mr. Ford's apologies or Mr. Kissinger's promises.

The truth is that a united America, out of Southeast Asia, is stronger and more reliable than a divided America fighting for dubious goals around Saigon. And if the allies don't see that after the record of the last thirty years, no amount of rhetoric out of this city is likely to convince them.

DOMINOES -- CONTINUED

Communism quite independent of Moscow appeared in China, Albania, Rumania and also infected other parties out of power such as Italy's. Indeed, a revolt within a revolt occurred in Yugoslavia itself when Milovan Djilas, once Tito's Number Two, struck out at what he considered stifling bureaucracy.

Djilas spent years in jail as a consequence of his dissent and is still refused permission to travel or to print his writings. He discusses some philosophical aspects of what we now see in Asia in an anthology called "Parts of a Lifetime," just published by Harcourt Brace Jovanovich.

In a piece called "Bureaucratic Nationalism," previously unpublished but written less than four years ago, he says: "Communism is an ideology, that is, a complete, closed doctrine. It is impossible to remove one pillar without shaking the other pillars and the entire structure. . . . We are witnessing the birth of a very specific kind of pluralism: the pluralism of nontolerant, nondemocratic nationalisms."

He wrote in 1954 (hitherto unpublished): "What the term Marxism means today has no more connection with the real Marx and his theory than does the contemporary Church with the Bible." In November, 1971, he added:

"Communism is Communism only if it is realized; that is, if it struggles for power—its real and realizable goal. And power can be conquered and maintained only on real, national grounds. Exactly because of that . . . Communism must split apart and come into conflict on national grounds. . . .

"The contemporary world, which is becoming united through diversity and where each day science and art reveal anew the indefinable complexity of nature, society and man, will complete the decomposition of ideology, at least as we know it. This is the dramatic fate that awaits Communism, which was once the most scientific ideology, the ideal ideology, the sole world ideology."

Admiral Moorer Looks Back at Vietnam

'The Ending Is Sad and Unfortunate'

THIS article is excerpted from an interview conducted by The National Public Affairs Center for Television last week. Adm. Thomas H. Moorer, a veteran of 41 years in the Navy, was chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in the crucial Vietnam years 1970-1974; before that he was chief of naval operations. The interviewer was Henry Trewhitt, Washington correspondent for the Baltimore Sun.

Admiral, you just retired recently as the nation's foremost military commander and you're now free to speak as you wish, without the discretion that's required of a sailor on active duty. I'd like to look back at Vietnam.

We've just ambiguously lost our first war, and I wonder what you would say to the parents of the 40 some thousand American boys who died in that war. Did they die in vain?

No, not in my opinion, because we did, I think, do quite a bit in Southeast Asia to stabilize the area at the time. We indicated that we were willing to make such sacrifices of blood and treasure to support what we considered to be right.

I also think as a side issue, for instance, that there are other areas in Southeast Asia, such as Indonesia for instance, that wouldn't be in the stable condition they are today if the United States had not been willing to go into Vietnam.

On the other hand, of couse, I think that the ending is sad and unfortunate, and to me in particular, who spent about 10 years of what I consider to be my most mature and productive years, struggling with this thing, to see the little Communists driving tanks supplied by the Soviets and at the same time using rifles supplied by the Chinese in an area which at one time was occupied by U.S. forces, doesn't leave me very happy, I can tell you.

Admiral, that really leads us directly almost to the "domino theory," which was first articulated I guess by the late President Eisenhower in 1954, and what he said in effect was that the countries in Southeast Asia would follow in sequence and there would be strategic consequences throughout the area, and I think probably by implication, the globe, if the United States allowed Vietnam to fall to communism. Do you see the domino theory at work now? Has it proved out?

Yes, I think that in one sense it certainly has, and, of course, we don't know yet just what will happen. But I think there's clear indication, both in the Pacific, and for that matter in Europe, that nations do not have the confidence in our country that they have had in the past.

Furthermore, looking to the future, I think that the acquisition of all of Indochina will permit the Communists to use such things as the great rice resources to bring pressure to bear on other nations in that area, and, of course, you've already seen indications from the Philippines—today there was quite a bit of talk about withdrawing from Thailand, and world-wide, I think you will see that the so-called uncommitted nations might have second thoughts, or at least more thoughts, about supporting the U.S. position than they have had in the past.

Let's review just briefly what's happened to the so-called dominoes. Now we have South Vietnam under Communist rule, Cambodia also under Communist rule, Laos is in a formally neutralist position, but certainly dominated by Communist forces, and the Thais are in the process of asking the United States to leave.

You mentioned Indonesia; I suppose there have been no direct consequences there, as far as I know, and the Philippines are talking about our leaving. Now do you see this as a hegemony sort of movement forward of communism, or is it really a matter of individual Communist parties at work here, and do we expect to see a unified Communist front in this area?

Well, I think, of course, each individual group has its own local objectives, but on balance, it is true that the Soviets and Chinese assisted the North Vietnamese. In other words, their interest they considered to be in confluence with those of North Vietnam.

I don't look at the domino theory as if we're going to have a situation that just goes click, click, click, like that. But it's the gradual erosion of the things that have made our country prosperous and strong that concerns me.

I don't think that this is going to happen overnight, but I think it weakens us, and of course many Americans understandably say, well, what in the world interests us in Southeast Asia? What does that have to do with my daily life? Well, it has quite a bit.

For instance, if one visits the Malacca Strait, he will see what's taking place down there in terms of commerce, and things of this kind. So our standard of living, our trade, our economic and political influence, all are certainly affected by the situation that's just developed.

Admiral, everything we've said leaves a fairly bleak outlook for Southeast Asia, taken in isolation [sic], and yet you said you didn't believe that those American forces had died in vain there. What do you think the United States accomplished in that 15-year enterprise?

Well, of course, as I said, we certainly didn't accomplish what I thought at the outset that we were going to accomplish. But at the same time, I think that looking back on the conditions that prevailed at the time that the commitment was made, it would have. . . .

. . . What are those, in your judgment, that determined the commitment?

At that time, of course, we were dedicated to blocking aggression in any part of the world that [it] happened to be taking place.

I see two anachronisms in the points you have made, Admiral, and I wonder if you would agree with them. One, with regard to public support of the war. Didn't the United States undergo that experience earlier in Korea when public support definitely, or the absence of public support really, definitely became a factor in the terms under which we ended the Korean War, and it certainly was a factor in which the French ended the first Indochina war, and doesn't the experience of the French indicate that United States political leaders and strategic planners should have taken into account the French experience more than they did?

Yes, I think so, but I think perhaps the thing that deterred them from really accepting that entire line of thought was that of course we felt that, you know, and quite probably, that we could do anything, and we could have done anything if we, in my view, had have brought that war to a close.

I think that quite a bit of the restraint that was placed on our military people was caused by the concern about what the Soviets and the Chinese were going to do. But, I don't think that they ever had any intention of involving themselves in Vietnam.

Let me come specifically to that point of what the United States should have done militarily in South Vietnam, not politically, but militarily, to bring that war to a successful conclusion. . .

Well, I think that in the first case the troops should have been landed in North Vietnam. They should have been landed in the Vinh area perhaps, or in an area where we could have had forces north of those passes that feed down into the Ho Chi Minh Trail That's one thing.

I certainly think that Haiphong Harbor should have been mined at the very outset. Everyone was wringing their hands as to what the Russians would do if we mined Haiphong Harbor. Seven years later we mined it, they didn't do a thing, and they never would have done anything, in my view.

And then we should have put the pressure on the area of Hanoi, Haiphong, etc., and brought the thing to a close. I think that, we had the power, we had almost unlimited power. Now, we did all these things. We went into Cambodia in 1970, we went into Laos in 1971, we mined Haiphong in May of '72, and we bombed Hanoi in December of '72. All I'm saying is we should have done all those the same day.

Admiral, what about tactics on the ground. We had an air-mobile concept—the use of ground forces transported by helicopters with high mobility, with high flexibility. Did that work, in the short-term sense?

I think it worked, but I also think that you've got to remember that again, that the North Vietnamese were a highly disciplined army that had been fighting for years, that they were not too concerned about casualties. They did not have an identification problem. They didn't care certainly about killing the South Vietnamese. And they were in the jungle warfare context.

And consequently, it always takes far more forces to defend civilized areas than it does to attack from the outside. And that again comes back to my point about invading North Vietnam—we should have reversed it so they had the problem of defending the cities instead of having to defend the cities down south.

Admiral, let's come back to that December 1972 period in the bombing—the so-called Christmas bombing of Hanoi. Do you regard the Paris peace accords that were reached as a result of that

'Never again' is not enough

Roscoe Drummond

Washington

The response of most Americans to the tragedy and cost of the Vietnam war is: "Never again."

But "never again" is not a sure guide to the future. It is not a policy, it is a hope.

The danger of "never again" is that the exact set of circumstances which drew us into Vietnam will not likely occur again. The need is to develop some settled and acceptable guidelines so that when another crisis confronts us we will be in a better position to stop, look, and listen before acting too quickly.

The premise of a very large part of America's role was well expounded by President Nixon before the fate of South Vietnam was visible. This was what the President termed the Guam doctrine.

Its essential thrust was this: While the U.S. should reduce its military presence in some parts of the world and must avoid any rash commitment of combat troops, it should provide material assistance to nations which show a resolve to defend themselves against outside aggression.

But there are caveats to such a policy. Are we going to aid nations indiscriminately whenever their frontiers are violated? Shouldn't the U.S. avoid open-ended commitments? Should we refuse to help countries whose governments are quite repressive and less democratic than our own?

All fair questions. Everyone will not give the same answers to them, but their validity seems to me to make it desirable that the President and Congress agree on basic guidelines in order to profit from the lessons of Vietnam. I would say that, at the very least, the guidelines ought to embrace four main reservations.

The U.S. should aid an aggressed nation only:

1. When there can be no appreciable doubt that the American interest is deeply involved.

2. When a recipient country shows persuasive evidence it will use such aid to good advantage.

3. When Congress is given the opportunity by the President to approve such action — and does approve it.

One of the most crucial of all the lessons to be learned from Vietnam is that we must never again allow any doubt to exist that when the government of the United States makes a promise, explicit or moral, it will fulfill that promise. The only way this can be assuredly avoided is when both the President and Congress are united in approval.

Otherwise, after Vietnam, it will not be a credible promise. America's word must be totally trustworthy. This is the way to make sure we do not repeat one of the great mistakes in Vietnam. That mistake came when in the peace agreement, the President made a moral commitment to continue aid without knowing whether Congress was willing to carry it out.

4. There is a further caveat and it deals with a matter which many of the critics of Vietnam view with the greatest concern. They ask: Why help any country where civil rights and individual freedom are under attack by the regime we are proposing to assist? These issues are not black and white. They are relative.

My answer would be that the U.S. should provide material assistance to a nation defending itself against outside aggression only when the prospect of achieving government by the governed will be enhanced by its successful defense.

The Kremlin eyes Europe

By Eric Bourne

Vienna

The Warsaw Pact — Russia's answer to NATO — completes its 20-year term this week and will be renewed automatically for a further 10 years.

Within a few months its seven members will meet with the NATO powers (the United States and Canada included) and the European neutrals in an East-West, all-European conference on security and cooperation.

A Soviet proposal for such a conference, tied originally to the "neutralization" of Germany, is older than the Warsaw treaty itself and has been the present Kremlin leadership's principal political goal in Europe since the mid-1960s. It might have come earlier but for Russia's use of force through the pact to crush the Czechoslovak reform movement in 1968. As it was, the West made the Kremlin wait another four years before agreeing to begin its preparation.

Now, in the new atmosphere of detente, it looks to be "in the bag" and this, together with the fact that the Russians are not prolonging their "NATO," prompts questions of what line Soviet policy for Europe may adopt after such a conference.

The Russians created their Warsaw Pact in May, 1955, as a response to Western European Union and NATO's enlargement by the admission of a rearmed West Germany. Like the North Atlantic treaty, it stipulated that an attack on one member would be an attack upon all and it was described as a defensive alliance of nations facing "the common danger" of a possible "rebirth of militarism" in West Germany.

This was the constant target over the years, until it was silenced first by the Soviet-West German nonaggression treaty and later by general European detente (though, in their current negotiations with NATO on force reductions in Central Europe, the Russians still harp most on West Germany's military potential).

The Warsaw Pact, however, provided also a very convenient new basis for keeping Soviet troops in Eastern Europe, over 10 years after the war had ended. And, although these were withdrawn in 1958 from Romania, the only East-bloc state without a border "open" to noncommunist Europe, they were retained elsewhere in the area as a sure means of control in an uncertain period when national self-interest had begun to make itself felt, as in Poland and Hungary.

Both the "domestic" raison d'etre for keeping the pact going and its value as an instrument of foreign policy opposed to NATO remain. But a new European situation will apply after the security conference is an accomplished fact, and the Warsaw treaty itself gives one clue to what may become the bloc's new political thrust for the future.

One of its concluding articles says that if and when a system of collective security comes about on the basis of a general European treaty, the Warsaw Pact "shall cease to be operative" the day that treaty enters into force. (The simultaneous dismantling of NATO, of course, is implicit.)

The 35-nation European conference is not concerned with such a treaty. But the declaration expected to emerge from the final "summit" will undoubtedly be interpreted and exploited by the Russians as a kind of "peace and security treaty by proxy," confirming inter alia the status quo for Germany and Europe.

It has taken the Russians 20 years to get the security conference. They doubtless reckon that now a treaty on collective security might not take so long. In any event, it will probably be much heard of in the next ten years of the Warsaw Pact.

MOORER -- CONTINUED

bombing as just simply a matter of capitulation on the part of the United States?

No, I don't think so at all. I wouldn't call it capitulation. I think that it was quite clear that the bombing in Christmas of '72 had a significant effect on the North Vietnamese, and it appeared at that time as long as they were faced with that possibility in the future, that they would in fact comply with whatever agreement they happened to make.

As you recall, they were very much readied to get back to Paris and talk about these terms. Because I think they were visibly shaken. They ran out of missiles, and if we had have really wanted to at that time, or taken the action against them, they would have been in a very, very serious position. So in nine days they were ready to go back.

As you recall, we had stopped the bombing back in the early fall, and there had been a lull there for a while, and they had been very difficult with respect to agreeing to any kind of final cease-fire. And I think this made "Christiens" out of them, if such a thing can be done in Hanoi, and consequently it was thought, I believe, by people in this country as well as in South Vietnam, that so long as they had the threat of a repetition of this kind of action, which in my view should have been taken years ago, they would in fact comply.

I think your remarks imply that you do not agree with the argument with some in this country that the Christmas bombing of Hanoi was undertaken as much to convince the South Vietnamese to sign those accords as the North Vietnamese then.

That was absolutely ridiculous, in my view. I think that one of the things that's missing in all these discussions is the grave concern so many of us had about the POWs, and I'll go to my dying grave and I'll never understand why the American people were willing to tolerate this medieval torture year after year and not get aroused over it.

And President Nixon was very much concerned about the welfare of these POWs. And I think one of the greatest satisfactions he got out of his term of office was having an opportunity to welcome these boys home.

And I think that if we had not bombed as we did in December of '72, that the POWs would still be in Hanoi.

Admiral, you mentioned earlier, the North Vietnamese concern for repetition of the Christmas bombing, in other words a respect for strategic bombing. . . .

. . .That was the first time they really got the treatment they should have had several years before.

Former NATO Chief Defends U.S.-European Ties

By KINGSBURY SMITH
Hearst Headline Service

ROME, May 14 — Europe is "terrified" by America's setbacks in Vietnam and by its own inability to control events in Portugal, Cyprus and the Middle East.

With the threat of Soviet military and political power increasing, the Atlantic Alliance and NATO are more vitally important than ever.

The Atlantic Alliance remains the bulwark of Western Civilization. If America abandons it, the United States will become a second-rate power; freedom — and probably peace — will be lost.

These are the views of one of Europe's outstanding statesmen, Manlio Brosio, former Secretary General of NATO and now a member of the Italian Senate.

In a written response to questions submitted to him in connection with President Ford's forthcoming visit to Europe, Senator Brosio warned that the free world cannot "win the struggle to preserve Western Civilization, "nor save peace," if "we do not believe any more in the issues at stake."

Not long ago one of America's leading commentators wrote that the European allies would not be unduly alarmed by the defeat of American policy in Vietnam. Others have asserted that America's abandonment of Vietnam would be welcomed by its European allies.

The statements of Senator Brosio, one of the most respected political personalities in Europe, would seem to indicate that some American commentators have strange sources of information.

Following are the questions submitted to senator Brosio and his answers:

Q—To what extent do you feel the credibility of America's commitments to the European allies have been affected by recent events in Vietnam, by the attitude of Congress toward that problem, and by the public opinion poll indicating a majority of the American people would be opposed to the use of American troops to fight in defense of West Berlin, or even Western Europe?

A—No doubt European people, not only conservative ones, but also moderate, enlightened democrats and democratic socialists are today astonished and terrified by the setbacks of the United States in Vietnam, and its inability to control situations in Portugal, Cyprus and the Middle East.

They are also puzzled by the attitude of Congress and by certain trends in American public opinion. The prestige of the United States in Europe has lowered, due also to an excess of previous confidence, and of blind, lazy reliance on United States decisive might (military and diplomatic).

Q—What could the United States do to help restore confidence in the credibility of its commitments to the NATO allies?

A—To restore confidence, the United States should, first of all, demonstrate its continuing interest in the Atlantic Alliance, not only by words, but mainly by deeds, doing everything possible in the Atlantic Council and at NATO headquarters, to show its presence, its authority and its resolve.

The activity and the determination of the U.S. government are the decisive elements: Congress and public opinion are

'Smart' Nuclear Warheads

FRANK VAN DER LINDEN

WASHINGTON — Sen. Thomas J. McIntrye has aimed a low blow at Defense Secretary James R Schlesinger by accusing him of promoting "nuclear warfighting doctrines which could lead to a terrifying new strategic arms race."

The New Hampshire Senator also assailed a fellow Democrat, Sen. Henry Jackson of Washington, who is also a leading aspirant for the presidency, for endorsing Schlesinger's proposals to improve this country's long-range nuclear missiles.

McIntrye said Schlesinger and Jackson "would not only dramatically increase the accuracy and yield of our current Minuteman missiles," but would also develop a new "terminally guided MARV" which would enable the warheads to change their course in flight and strike enemy targets with "virtually perfect accuracy."

"YOU'VE HEARD of "smart' bombs," McIntrye told a New Hampshire audience when he broke the news of the "MARV." "Well, this would be a 'smart' warhead."

The average American would be delighted for his country to have an improved reentry vehicle such as "MARV" if it would help to deter the Soviet Union from starting a nuclear war. McIntrye quoted a friend of his as saying, "When we go squirrel hunting back home we want to have the most accurate rifle we can get."

But the New Hampshire Senator isn't at all happy over the prospect of moving ahead of the Russians in missile technology. Quite the contrary. He charged that the Schlesinger-Jackson program would "actually dimish our national security by putting a hair trigger on nuclear war."

McINTRYE, WHO is chairman of the Senate Armed Services Subcommittee on Research and Development, arrived at his odd conclusion by following Alice-in-Wonderland logic. He reasoned that the Russians agreed to the "SALT" arms control deals of Moscow and Vladivostok only because of the central premise of "mutual vulnerability."

Translated into plain language, that means that neither of the two superpowers could be sure of knocking out the other's missiles without suffering a devastating counter-blow by the surviving weaponry. Thus, each is deterred from making an attack, and there is no war.

McIntrye and like-minded men fear that, if the United States Minuteman missiles could be equipped with a "MARV" that could kill the Soviet missiles with pin-point accuracy, the Russians would strike us first. Thus, their reasoning goes, improved U.S. weapons would "destabilize" the arms balance.

BUT SCHLESINGER recently assured the Armed Services Committee: "We are not interested in developing a disarming first-strike capability against the Soviet Union, and improvements in the Minutemen III force should in no way be construed as such.

"How far we go with our counterforce options, such as terminally guided MARV, and hard target capability in a new ICBM MX and the Trident II submarine missile, will depend upon the pace and extent of the Soviet counterforce developments.

The Secretary told McIntrye that the "MARV" is an "iffy" program, "there is no intention of deploying it at the present time" and final tests are "years in the future."

Despite these assurances, the Senator accused Schlesinger and Jackson of promoting "a terrifying new strategic arms race."

If there is to be such an arms race, the Russians will start it by developing their own larger nuclear missiles.

U.S. Should Reassess Strategy

In ancient times it was customary to execute the messenger who brought bad tidings. A century ago a Kansas weatherman was almost lynched when the tornado he predicted levelled a town.

Today we are seeing a revised version of this scenario: those of us who have emphasized the disastrous impact on America's world-standing of our walk-out in Southeast Asia are being blamed as the dominoes (yes, dominoes) fall.

Don't misunderstand me. I am not going to fight city hall: the American people have consciously or unconsciously decided against being a "Great Power." This does not for a minute mean that we are prostrate and helpless; it simply signals our unwillingness to play a major role on the world stage.

Moscow, for example, had no great intrinsic stake in Vietnam — the Indochinese contribution to the Soviet gross national product or to Russian security was nil, but the Politburo poured military assistance down the Vietnamese "rat hole."

Why? Because they correctly saw the outcome in Vietnam as a test of their will to be a "Great Power." And the message has gone out: Moscow doesn't let its allies down.

Symbolically, Vietnam has been their revenge for the 1962 Cuban missile crisis when, as Dean Rusk said, "We were eyeball to eyeball, and they blinked first."

Obviously I am profoundly unhappy about this national decision to go fishing, but on the practical level what worries me even more is that the President and the National Security Council may decide to demonstrate to the world that we have not lost our "machismo."

After the failure of the Bay of Pigs, enormous pressure was brought on President Kennedy to "do something." I visited the White House about two days after Castro had rounded up the last of the expeditionary force and everyone I talked with seemed to feel a need to demonstrate that we were not, as one put it, "a crippled giant."

Indeed, they scared me to death because the proposed ideal location for this display of muscle was Laos! I sardonically suggested they look at a map (I am a great believer in looking at maps), but this advice was spurned and I was politely told I just didn't have any guts.

Right now our main task is to caulk the boat. Because of our national and governmental focus on Indochina over the past decade, we have sadly neglected other vital matters. I have argued here for years — to take one instance — that there is no NATO strategy, and at the moment it is beginning to look as though the absence of a strategy will be matched by an absence of allies.

At this moment we are in limbo: the American people have signed off on the major premises of our policy since World War II, but no coherent substitute has been offered.

If it is to be continentalism, let us face that fact and make the necessary shifts in our commitments that will provide symmetry. And please, Mr. President, stop telling the world our credibility is undamaged: it merely makes you sound foolish.

important, but less impressive in European minds.

Unfailing loyalty to Israel, clear-cut attitude towards Portugal, firmness and balance on the Greek-Turkish controversy and on the energy problem are also essential.

Q—Why is maintenance of NATO still important?

A—The Atlantic Alliance and NATO are not only important, but more vital than ever. The threat of the expanding Soviet military and political power is increasing, slowly but steadily.

For Europe, the alliance is a question of life or death, freedom or servitude. For the United States it is a question of remaining a great world power or of declining to a second-rate power, retreated in isolation. The loss of Europe to U.S.S.R. supremacy would mean exactly that.

The Atlantic community remains the source and the bulwark of Western Civilization: If the Americans do not care for it any more, it will be lost for us all and for the world, alongside with freedom, and probably with peace.

Q—Has detente proved good or bad for the west?

A — Detente has always been a deceptive word. The Soviet Union has only understood and practiced peaceful coexistance — that is, a struggle of political and social power without actual fighting.

Peaceful co-existence in Europe has been useful. It has spared us the horrors of war. But the idea of detente, that is the relaxation of efforts and vigilance, and the illusion of an easy reconciliation of opposing and conflicting social systems, has done more harm than good. It is not a reality. It is a delusion which has greatly helped the advance of Communism in many countries — Portugal, Vietnam, Ethiopia, and maybe other countries in the near future.

"We are engaged in a struggle which we want to keep peaceful, but we cannot win it, nor end it with a draw, nor save peace, if we do not believe any more in the issues at stake."

ZUMWALT SAYS U.S. WOULD LOSE WAR WITH RUSSIA

Calls For $8 Billion Boost In DOD Budget

Former CNO Adm. Elmo Zumwalt declared this weekend that if war were to break out between the United States and Soviet Union at this time, the U.S. would face "almost certain defeat."

He said, however, that he believes that the two countries are "too rational" to engage in war.

Zumwalt blamed Congress for the decline in America's defense capability, charging that Congress "has been so penurious in its budget, we do not have the capability to stand up to the Soviet Union today." He said that the U.S. naval capability has been dwindling since the 1962 Cuban missile crisis and now has only a 50 percent chance of retaining control of the waterways.

Sees Increased DOD Budget Inducing Detente

Zumwalt said the way to halt the Soviet Union's rush to arms superiority is to increase the U.S. defense budget -- a move which he said would encourage arms limitation agreement.

He said if Congress were to increase the DOD budget by as little as $8 billion in FY '76 over the $104 billion requested, "this would send a spike on the fever chart back to Moscow and they'll begin saying, 'hey fellas, let's cool it. The natives are getting restless."

Mideast prospects

Joseph C. Harsch (14)

There is one reason for thinking that just possibly this summer will bring a general settlement of the most dangerous unsolved international problem in the world today. That problem is, of course, the relationship between Israel and the neighboring Arab states. The one reason it might be solved is because the Soviet Union wants something this summer which Washington need not give without getting something of value in return.

Moscow wants to get a conclusion this summer of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. The one and only thing of importance which can come out of that conference would be recognition of Moscow's control over the countries of Eastern Europe. Moscow has that control de facto today, but it has never yet had that condition recognized by the United States as de jure.

For example, if you look through a copy of the Congressional Directory you will discover that the U.S still recognizes a Latvian and a Lithuanian legation in Washington and an Estonian legation in New York City. There are charges d'affaires attached to each of these legations and they are listed in the official Washington diplomatic list published by the Department of State. In other words, the U.S. has never officially recognized the Soviet conquest and suppression of these three formerly independent Baltic states.

This fact has galled the Russians, just as the continued U.S. recognition of Taiwan galls the Chinese. Moscow would like to have the whole world, including the U.S., accept the de facto situation in Eastern Europe as being legal and permanent.

There are substantial colonies of Estonian, Latvian, and Lithuanian people in the U.S. who care about their former homelands and have voting power. Hence Washington is reluctant to grant such recognition of Moscow's conquests. If it does, what would it get in return?

It may be conceivable that a Mideast settlement could be reached over Moscow's objection, but it is not likely. But with Moscow's full cooperation a settlement would come within the boundaries of realism. The settlement would not only be possible, it would even be probable.

That would require, however, a conscious decision in Moscow to give up the advantages it has enjoyed so far from continued Mideast strain and tension. It would probably require the formal and contractual recognition of permanent frontiers for Israel. It would mean full cooperation with American diplomacy at a reconvened Geneva conference this summer. It would require a joint Soviet-American settlement plan which the two would present at Geneva and, in effect, would impose on the Israelis and Arabs.

Obviously, Moscow is not going to give up the many advantages it enjoys from nonsettlement in the Middle East without getting something of value in return. But there is the possibility of the trade. There is some evidence that the Kremlin is moving in this direction. It would stand to gain something as well as losing much. It would gain security against the danger of another confrontation with the U.S. over the Middle East.

Soviet cooperation in reaching a Middle East settlement has always so far been the will-o'-the-wisp of the problem. It has always slipped away just when it seemed to be in hand. Can it be captured this summer? Just possibly. And if captured, where does it lead? It leads to Arab recognition of Israel within its pre-1967 boundaries with a guarantee of those boundaries by the Arabs and by both the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. It also means a political future for Palestinians in West Bank Jordan and some form of joint or international control over the old city of Jerusalem.

It could happen this summer if American diplomacy could work out the terms of the settlement with Moscow. But it would mean getting going — now.

Diplomats Eye Mideast Pact

By KINGSBURY SMITH
Hearst Headline Service

NEW YORK — There is a mood of cautious optimism among some well-informed UN diplomats concerning the prospects for progress within the next two months towards a new Israeli-Egyptian military disengagement agreement.

It is believed that Israel and Egypt are prepared to make new concessions to bridge the gap that caused the collapse of Secretary of State Henry Kissinger's shuttle diplomacy peace efforts in March.

Whether the concessions will be sufficient to bring about a new agreement in the step-by-step negotiating process is uncertain but some of the UN diplomats closely associated with Middle East developments are inclined to believe they will.

This mild optimism is based partly on diplomatic reports from Jerusalem, Cairo and Washington, and partly on the belief that the Israeli and Egyptian governments realize there will be grave danger of a new war this summer if a new military disengagement agreement in the Sinai has not been reached by July.

It is expected Egyptian President Anwar Sadat will tell President Ford what new concessions he is prepared to offer during their meeting in Salzburg June 1 and 2.

The American government has been applying strong pressure on Israel to make greater concessions than it was prepared to offer in March; and it is assumed Premier Yitzhak Rabin will submit new proposals when he confers with President Ford in Washington June 11 and 12.

The Israeli government is pressing Washington for a resumption of talks on Israel's pending arms requests to coincide with Premier Rabin's visit.

Israeli diplomats say it would be politically easier for Rabin to offer new concessions if the arms supply discussions were resumed. They were suspended in March when President Ford announced the U.S. intended to make a "reassessment" of its Middle East policy.

Suspension of the talks reflected the deep disappointment of the President and Secretary Kissinger over the Israeli government's refusal to make greater concessions for a deal with Egypt in March.

Continued suspension of the talks, which involved Israel's request for $2.5 billion in economic and military aid in the coming fiscal year, is viewed by Israeli diplomats as unfair pressure, especially since the State Dept. agreed early this month to supply Jordan with sophisticated surface-to-air-missiles, obviously intended to be used against Israel in the event of a new war.

While Rabin may discuss new concessions during his visit to Washington, Israeli diplomats believe it will be politically impossible for him to actually make them before the arms supply talks are resumed.

One of the reasons for moderate optimism in UN circles is yhe belief, based on diplomatic information from Jerusalem, that Rabin is prepared to drop Israel's insistence on a nonbelligerency pledge from Egypt as a condition for the withdrawal of Israeli forces from the Sinai passes and oil fields.

The Israeli leader is reported to be willing to accept "specific acts" which would demonstrate Egypt's peaceful intentions. Israeli insistence on the nonbelligerency pledge was a major factor in the breakdown of the March negotiations.

Among the "specific acts" that Israel had in mind are: Egyptian consent to extend the mandate for the presence of the UN peacekeeping force in the Sinai for three to five years; and establishment of early warning stations in the buffer zones to reduce the danger of surprise attack.

Another encouraging sign was Sadat's announcement last month at he would reopen the Suez Canal June 5. Israeli Defense Minister Dhimon Peres said that if Egypt did so and allowed ships to carry goods to and from Israel, the Israeli government would be willing to make "significant concessions."

Sadat actually gave such a commitment in a secrrt rider to the military disengagement agreement of January 1974. In this addition, which was not made public but was handed to Kissinger, Sadat said:

'As a first step, all cargoes destined for and coming from Israel would be permitted through the canal from the time of its reopening."

While the Egyptian leader is not prepared to allow ships flying the Israeli flag to pass through the canal until the state of belligerency os ended, his assurance that Israeli cargoes would be permitted was regarded by the American government as a major concession.

A Pleading For Patience On Portugal

By Mary McGrory
Washington Star Staff Writer

Sen. Edward W. Brooke, R-Mass., is proposing a course of action towards Portugal which is not costly or destructive or irrational — and therefore, perhaps, unlikely to get off the ground.

He suggests that in dealing with the new left-wing government in Lisbon we exercise diplomacy, patience and understanding.

Portugal, which has been taken over by a radical military group called the Armed Forces Movement, has so far indicated that it wishes neither military aid nor increased economic assistance. What it wants of us, Brooke thinks, is to be left alone — with particular reference to the C.I.A. — to work out a new way of doing things after 25 years of strongman, one-man Salazar rule.

Brooke, who has always been interested in Portugese affairs — he has a fair number of Portugese constituents — was in Portugal in April, shortly after the military took over.

Point of View

He found a conciliatory and open-minded attitude among the new leaders. Prime Minister Vasco Goncalves, for instance, assured him that Portugal intends to continue in NATO. He is also willing to permit the U.S. air bases in the Azores — prohibiting only their use for resupply. Portugal, of all the European nations during the October war, permitted U.S. planes bound for Israel to refuel in the Azores, and thereby suffered from the displeasure of the Arabs.

"We had a dictatorship under Salazar for 25 years," Goncalves reminded the senator, "and the U.S. never expressed the slightest concern."

The leader of the Socialists, Mario Soares, explained to Brooke that the Armed Forces Movement was sparked by junior officers who learned anticolonialism in Angola and Mozambique, two outposts of the Portuguese Empire.

"This country was under the control of 100 families and three banks," Soares told Brooke. "It was inevitable that we would move to the left."

It is possible, as Brooke wrote to President Ford in a letter on his return, that Portugal could move to the left without going Communist. The Socialists emerged from the recent election — in which 92 percent of the voters exercised the novel franchise — with 33 percent of the returns.

The Communists got only 12 percent.

The accession of the left-wing dictatorship to power caused the usual growls of disapproval in the administration, which has always preferred to deal with more congenial right-wing military dictatorships and does not trust a country that is going left to stop at socialism.

Brooke found our ambassador, Frank Carlucci, exhibiting patience and understanding towards the new rulers, for which, it was said, he was denounced behind the scenes by the secretary of state for being insufficiently "tough" and "hardline." This report was subsequently denied by the secretary of state. Our previous ambassador to Portugal also failed in this regard and was dismissed. Carlucci, however, is still in place, perhaps due to Brooke's intervention.

Brooke fears that the weak showing of the Communists in the election will not calm the fears of the administration.

"Five percent would have been enough to unnerve them," he sighs.

The members of the constituent assembly are not the new representatives of the Portuguese people. They are charged only with drafting a new constitution in the next five years. The Armed Forces Movement will be in control, meanwhile, and will have the power to ratify the document.

Brooke has had no reply to an April 8 letter to the President, in which he suggested that by over-reacting we might be "accelerating rather than inhibiting a Communist takeover."

It is difficult to say if the administration's easily-activated fears are in this case real or imagined. The President and the secretary of state have created a climate where reasonable assessment is difficult. By magnifying the consequences of the defeat in Vietnam, they have encouraged the dire predictions now sweeping Europe. If they had expressed relief rather than dismay over the long-delayed resolution of our most draining and shaming overseas adventure, they might not be beset by the uncertainties and alarm they have generated.

Brooke points out that we have in every event very little bargaining power with the Portuguese. We alienate them only at the risk of losing a vital link in the Western alliance.

"What are we going to do?" he asks rhetorically. "Withdraw from NATO? Give up our bases in the Azores?"

It has been some time since the United States, which prefers to arm the right and straight-arm the left, has tried diplomacy. Portugal offers the best current example for us to prove that we learned something from our Vietnam experience.

Cooling Off on Marcos

In times when the Philippines take on fresh geopolitical significance for the United States, it is reassuring to find some diffidence in the State Department's posture toward the tainted regime of President Marcos.

This is a testing time in the paternalistc dealings between the United States and the Philippines, and one hint of the administration's readiness to play a strong hand is a shift of attitude toward the exile leader Raul Marglapus. He is a Stevensonian kind of politician who was a popular leader of the opposition to Marcos until he became an exile slightly before the islands fell under the mantle of martial law in 1972.

The police came to arrest Marglapus almost as soon as Marcos proclaimed the new ground rules, but he had fortuitously left the country on a speaking tour. Marglapus did not find a particularly warm reception in this country.

The State Department utilized its leverage with the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars, partly financed by congressional appropriations, to block Marglapus's selection for a fellowship in 1974. The Filipino politician is applying once more this year, and happily the State Department has progressed to a passive position.

The significance of this shift is its implication that Henry Kissinger does not mean to get caught in another of those painful campaigns to stay close at any cost to autocratic Oriental leaders whose philosophy and actions cannot be justified by the yardstick of American ideals. The temptation to court despotic governments is enlarged by the evolution of the Philippines, South Korea and Indonesia as the outer line of American influence in the Pacific.

The treatment of Marcos's wife is another hint of healthy insouciance in Washington's view of Manila. Mrs. Marcos, swept by her jet plane to frequent rendezvous with the beautiful people, has come to the United States twice in the past six months without drawing any official notice. She was reported last fall to have been badly miffed when the State Department advised President Ford to give her no attention at all.

This requires some spirit. Clark Air Base, on Philippine soil, is the second largest American air base anywhere. The Subic Bay Naval Base is a key to Seventh Fleet influence in the South China Sea.

But the Philippines are no showcase for American democracy, and the bilateral treaty of 1951 has not produced an alliance to which a majority of Americans would rally with zeal. The benefactions of the past, including nearly $1 billion in military aid, big sweeteners in the purchase of sugar and a steady umbrella of defense against all comers, have proved no inducement to progress in a society sorely lacking in grace, charity and character.

Two assumptions govern U.S. dealings with the Philippines. One, fabricated in Washington, is that the Filipinos will never translate their feisty talk into actual pressures to evacuate the American bases. The other, originating in the islands, is that the Communist insurgency will never swell to the magnitude of a real threat to the established government.

Asia's changing character makes it possible to believe that both assumptions may prove wrong in the long run. The precedents and prospects suffice at least to discourage any strong inclination to cling tightly to another rotten regime.

The Danger in South Korea

This is not the time to be considering a reduction of U.S. military strength in South Korea or actions that could weaken Seoul's ability to defend itself. But it is the time for the U.S. government to begin using its considerable influence to force President Park Chung Hee to change his regime's repressive domestic policies.

President Ford has reaffirmed and indicated that he intends to strengthen U.S. ties to South Korea. The bonds that exist are much different from those cited to justify American involvement in Indochina. They derive from a formal defense treaty, growing out of the Korean war. They derive from the costly American effort in that war, and the successful preservation of South Korea's independence. And they derive from the important geopolitical fact of Korea's proximity to Japan. That fact was the main strategic rationale for U.S. intervention in the Korean war in 1950. It has not changed since then.

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) is one of those calling for a gradual withdrawal of U.S. forces from South Korea in the wake of the Vietnam debacle. We think he is wrong. But he and other members of Congress are not wrong in their concern about what has been happening in South Korea. The Ford Administration should act on that concern for the sake of both Korean and American interests.

The danger, quite simply, is this: that the autocratic policies of the Park regime—the intolerance of political opposition, the stifling of press and public criticism, the attempt to insure conformity by police-state methods—will help create the very conditions of civil discontent and frustration in which subversion flourishes best.

The potential is there, and with it the unacceptable possibility that the United States could again become involved, directly or indirectly, in a situation inimical to its basic security responsibilities.

The chance of another cross-border invasion by Communist North Korea can't be entirely ruled out, though the possibility is slight so long as the U.S. defense commitment remains unambiguous, and so long as China and the Soviet Union are cool to such a venture, as they now appear to be.

The greater risk is one that North Korean dictator Kim Il Sung talks about openly—the launching of a new campaign of subversion in the south, of guerrilla warfare, sabotage and terrorism, this time counting on support from the local population that was not given in the past.

Last year we supported a proposal in Congress to begin a phaseout of U.S. aid to Korea in responsive protest to what Park has been doing. A military aid cutoff, we now believe, could mean only added burdens for the United States in view of the changed situation in East Asia, and might well result in miscalculations in North Korea about the durability of the U.S. commitment.

But that assessment does not diminish—indeed it enhances—the need for the United States to use its substantial leverage to promote changes in Park's antidemocratic activities.

The U.S. message should be clear. The defense commitment to South Korea will be maintained. But that commitment carries no obligation to support one-man rule based on repressive policies whose ultimate results are antithetical to American aims, interests and ideals.

Korea A-Arms Use an Option, General Says

BY SAM JAMESON
Times Staff Writer

SEOUL—The United States would consider using tactical nuclear weapons in case of an outbreak of war in the Korean peninsula, a top American military commander said here Monday.

The U.S. officer, who asked not to be named, made it clear in an interview that he did not expect North Korea's Communist dictator, Kim Il Sung, to launch an all-out attack upon South Korea at this time.

But he also indicated that if such an attack should occur, a recommendation urging use of tactical nuclear weapons would most likely be made by the U.S. command here to the White House.

The highly placed commander was asked what role "the most powerful of American weapons" played in U.S. contingency plans against an all-out attack by North Korea. Although the question was worded indirectly to allow the officer to avoid violating American policy forbidding the discussion of the location of nuclear weapons, the commander replied:

"I'm an 'attack nuke' man myself."

Then he elaborated:

"The United States armed forces has kept a whole array of tactical nuclear weapons in its inventory, recognizing that the decision as to whether they will ever be used is a decision only the commander-in-chief can make, recognizing that more emotion surrounds this in the whole military equation than anything else, and recognizing there is a school of thought that persists today that the first use of nuclear weapons starts an uncontrollable spiral.

"Having said all that, the tactical nuclear capability constitutes one option available to U.S. and allied decision makers."

The officer pointed out that "as good military professionals, we plan against the contingencies we may be called upon to exercise." But he said an all-out war on the Korea peninsula in which either China or the Soviet Union—or both Communist giants—participated directly would "really pose some tough decisions for Washington to make."

"If you are going to fight in Korea—and for objectives possibly larger than the Korean Peninsula itself—you then have to face a decision (as to whether) you are going to deploy a lot of U.S. divisions over here, or (whether) you are going to consider something else first."

He made it clear the "something else" was tactical nuclear weapons.

Unlike strategic nuclear weapons, which would wreak destruction over huge areas, tactical nuclear weapons are designed to destroy specific targets and localize damage.

The senior officer painted two scenarios for an all-out war, neither of which, he said, he expected to occur now.

In the most likely kind of all-out attack upon the south, North Korea would probably rely upon its own armed forces to launch a massive strike at Seoul, seeking to invest the city, and then solidify its gains through negotiations.

"It would be a very violent and short conflict" in which U.S. ground forces stationed here would be kept out of battle, he said. American air power and army artillery and missile units, however, would play a major role, he added. The U.S.-South Korean aim in such a war would be "to stop that guy virtually in his tracks" at the Demilitarized Zone.

A second possible kind of attack would be one in which either China or the Soviet Union, or both, committed some of their own forces—perhaps air or naval—to battle along with the North Koreans "to go for it all."

Such a war probably would turn into a long, drawn out struggle, directly involving all U.S. forces here.

Use of the American nuclear option probably would be considered most seriously in the second kind of war, the commander said.

The officer said he thought that neither China, which

How to release U.S. ship?

Show of force and cool diplomacy

By Dana Adams Schmidt
and Guy Halverson
Staff correspondents of
The Christian Science Monitor
Washington

The U.S. Government is combining a show of force with cool diplomacy as it tries to get back the cargo ship and its 39-man crew seized by the new Cambodian Government.

It is still not clear, however, what leverage Washington has to force the Cambodians to give up the ship and crew without risking the lives of the men.

A U.S. Navy reconnaissance plane was hit by gunfire as it flew over Cambodian gunboats, government sources said.

President Ford has said that he would consult with Congress before taking any military action. This raises questions to observers here: (1) A rescue mission would doubtless need the cover of secrecy — yet can such secrecy be maintained if Congress is to be told in advance? (2) If Congress is to be consulted, can the President make a speedy move? (3) Is it possible that Mr. Ford now sees progress in negotiations with Cambodia, and that he feels no such consultation will be necessary?

Meanwhile, State Department and nongovernmental experts are studying political and legal implications.

It is recalled here that while in Congress, President Ford called U.S. options "very, very limited" once the spy ship Pueblo and its crew had been seized in 1968.

It is also said that the legal situation is by no means as clear-cut as the administration has indicated by saying the seizure was a clear-cut violation of the right of innocent passage.

Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger said in Missouri, where he was visiting, that the U.S. will "wait a bit to see what diplomacy can achieve." While asserting that the U.S. would take the measures necessary to obtain the ship's release he declined comment on reports of troop movements.

The government has:

1. Reportedly ordered the amphibious assault ship Okinawa with up to 800 marines aboard to put to sea from Subic Bay in the Philippines, allegedly in the direction of the South China Sea and the location of the Mayaguez. The aircraft carrier Coral Sea was presumably operating in the South China Sea. Another 150 marines were reportedly flown from Subic Bay while 1,000 marines at Okinawa were reported on alert.

The Mayaguez has been escorted by the Cambodians to an anchorage off the island of Koh Tang, 30 miles from the Cambodian coast.

2. Sent a protest and warning to the new Communist Cambodian Government via the Government of China in Peking, and via the French Government which remains in touch with the Cambodians in Paris and is trying to keep open its embassy in Phnom Penh. State Department sources say the note threatened "serious consequences" if the ship was not set free.

Politically, White House sources admit, a vigorous "send in the marines" ploy seems attractive, especially after the distressing end of the Indo-China war. But then they cite Mr. Ford's caution in 1968.

Meanwhile, the Premier of Thailand, Kukrit Pramoj, had said earlier that his government would not allow any use of Utapao for operations connected with the seized ship.

Legally nongovernmental experts make these points:

1. From a legal point of view this was not an "act of piracy" as stated by the President. Under the Geneva Covenant of the High Seas of 1958, piracy is an act by private persons for private gain. This, however, was an act by Cambodian Government gunboats.

2. Most authorities consider that a coastal state has the right to determine whether a ship in its territorial waters is engaged in operations threatening its health or safety. In this case the ship was captured eight miles off the rocky islet of Poulo Wai within the 12-mile limit claimed by the Cambodians who probably still consider themselves at war with the U.S. Its cargo, according to American official sources, included some military supplies destined for Thailand.

3. On the other hand, there are differences of opinion as to whether territorial waters apply to tiny islets in the sea. The islet, about 50 miles from the coast of Cambodia, is furthermore claimed by South Vietnam as well as Cambodia.

4. The case of the Pueblo in 1968 is not a valid precedent because the Pueblo was a naval vessel engaged in electronic espionage. The Mayaguez, allegations by the Soviet news agency Tass notwithstanding, appears to be a genuine U.S. registered merchant ship which happened to be carrying some military supplies.

5. At the conference on the law of the sea that has been meeting in Geneva, the U.S. has sought to get international acceptance of a more clear-cut right of innocent passage for all ships through territorial waters regardless of their cargoes. But the generally accepted standards at present give the coastal state the "subjective" right to decide whether or not to seize a ship in its waters.

The Pentagon May 13 declined any comment on the freighter or the movements of U.S. ships in the China Sea, and some observers thought the blackout might be a cover for forceful action already under way.

Pentagon officials did disclose, however, that the position of the Mayaguez had been ascertained by aerial surveillance. Privately some Pentagon officials pointed out at this writing that if the U.S. is to act it had better act quickly, before the crew is landed and taken deep into the interior.

Monitor correspondent Godfrey Sperling Jr. reports from Washington:

The President's spokesman, Ron Nessen, has said flatly that the President will not take any military action on the seizure without first consulting with congress.

Asked if the President were "now consulting with Congress about an alert or precautionary acts," Mr. Nessen said "no."

Under questioning, he seemed to be ruling out the use of the loophole in the War Powers Act which says: "In every possible instance" the President shall consult with Congress before introducing U.S. Armed forces into hostilities.

He seemed to be saying that this was definitely not an instance when the President would act first and then ask for permission simply because it was "not possible" to ask first.

Asked it the President had set a deadline for release of the prisoners, Mr. Nessen said, "No, he has not." He said the controlling presidential words were his demand for "immedate release." He said: "The President has not set an hour or minute deadline."

Asked if the President has received "even the slightest glimmer of hope" in his negotiations, Mr. Nessen paused and then said, quietly, "I don't think I will take that question."

Asked if "there is any evidence the ship was carrying anything except cargo?" Mr. Nessen said: "No, a simple no."

Rep. Joe D. Waggonner (D) of Louisiana told reporters after meeting with the President May 13 that Mr. Ford said to him, "I've got a very tough decision to make on the ship."

Mr. Nessen also disclosed that there had been a previous comparable incident in roughly the same area.

"Ten days ago," he said, "a Korean ship was fired on. It was not hit. It was not detained. It was fired on by what appeared to be a Cambodian ship."

Mr. Nessen offered no help to questioners who wanted to know if the U.S had known about this incident — information that might have been used as a warning.

Air Force Study Suggests Halt to Homebuilding

From a Times Staff Writer

RIVERSIDE—An Air Force noise study recommends a halt to residential construction in Riverside's exclusive Canyon Crest development west of March Air Force Base.

Base commander Col. Stan Brown says that although the study is not binding on local officials, it should be seriously considered in light of urban encroachment around the sprawling base. The report also recommends land use restrictions for various noise zones around the base.

Canyon Crest, one of Riverside's fastest growing areas, lies in a path where the Air Force discourages residential development.

Kim Il Sung visited April 18 to 26, nor the Soviet Union, which Kim is expected to visit soon, were prepared to back any all-out attack by North Korea.

"But in the gray areas—infiltration, probes and incidents in which who did what would remain unclear—I'm not so sure," he said.

If the North Korean dictator—encouraged by the U.S. Congress' failure to vote aid to South Vietnam in its 11th hour and by Communist successes in Indochina—provoked some kind of aggression against the south, "it would be to test the water to see whether earnestness behind the fine statements of the (Ford) Administration and, to a certain extent, of Congress was really there."

Such a probe, he said, probably "would be on the lower end of the spectrum" of aggression.

SUMMARY OF NETWORK NEWS IN THIS ISSUE

John CHANCELLOR, Charles QUINN, Tom BROKAW, Catherine MACKIN and George LEWIS, all of NBC News, report on Mayaguez related events. QUINN reports on Secretary LAITIN's statement of the sinking of three Cambodian boats and also on the amended statement released later. QUINN reports a helicopter operation might be in the works. BROKAW reports on meetings at the White House of the NSC and on Presidential authority to use troops to protect American lives and shipping. MACKIN reports on the reaction of the Congress to the military action and includes statements by Senators JAVITS and TOWERS and by Rep. RHODES and other comments by Senators MANSFIELD, JACKSON and KENNEDY. CHANCELLOR reports on the sinking of the ships and that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee endorsed the military move. CHANCELLOR also reports that the Thais publicly stated they want the recently arrived U.S. troops to leave Thailand. LEWIS reports on the arrival of the new Ambassador and on Thai reaction to U.S. plans to attack from Thailand. CHANCELLOR reports that two AID centers in Thailand have been looted and that three AID officials are being held hostage by Laotians, and that the Embassy staff will be cut. Jim RUDDLE, NBC, reports on memorial funeral services for Corporal Darwin JUDGE who was killed at Tansonnhut Airport before the evacuation.

Bob SCHIEFFER, Ike PAPPAS, Phil JONES, Peter COLLINS and Marvin KALB, all of CBS, report on Mayaguez related events. PAPPAS reports on Secretary LAITIN's statement concerning the sinking of the Cambodian ships; on the planes involved in the attack; on the revised Pentagon statement; and on U.S. warship movements towards Cambodia. JONES reports on the question of Presidential consultation with Congress over the military action; and on White House meetings. COLLINS reports on the presence of the 1,000 Marines at Utapao and the Thai reaction to that presence, including a threat of drastic action to be taken. He then reports on the implications that a shutting down of U.S. bases in Thailand would have. KALB reports on the administration's view of Thailand and on the failure of U.S. diplomacy in trying to secure the release of the Mayaguez. SCHIEFFER reports on the nuclear test blast in Nevada and that no radiation leaks were reported. Bernard KALB, CBS, has a report on defense spending and on the controversy between spending money on social programs versus defense needs. He includes statements by two congressmen who take opposite sides -- Sen. TOWER takes the defense side -- gives estimates of future defense budgets; estimates of present defense programs, B-1, Trident; and includes a statement by Secretary SCHLESINGER concerning the need to increase defense spending in order to maintain the worldwide military balance between the U.S. and Russia.

Harry REASONER, Frank TOMLINSON, Howard K. SMITH and Jim BENNET, all of ABC News, report on Mayaguez related events. TOMLINSON reports on the attack on the Cambodian boats and on the U.S. planes that carried it out; on ship movements towards that area; and on options available to U.S. forces to secure the Mayaguez and its crew. REASONER reports that U.S. U.N. Ambassador SCALLY requested U.N. help in getting the ship back; and asserted the right of the U.S. to protect its people and property. BENNET reports on the Thai reaction to Marine arrivals in Thailand and includes a statement by the Thai Prime Minister demanding the removal of those Marines. SMITH has a commentary on the chances for war in Korea in light of Kim Il SUNG's desire to start a war; repression and dissension in S. Korea; U.S. retreats from Indochina; China's willingness perhaps to stop the North Koreans from warring; and measures the U.S. can take to discourage the North Koreans.

American Planes Sink Cambodian Ships

JOHN CHANCELLOR: Good evening. The crisis involving the seized American ship Mayaguez deepened today as American airmen went back into Indochina combat for the first time since 1973. American planes based in Thailand sank three vessels of the Cambodian Navy after repeated warnings when it looked as though the Cambodians were planning to take crewmen from the ship to the mainland. This took place near Koh-Tang island. Our correspondent Richard Valeriani has learned there is now definite evidence that some of the Americans are on that island. And Valeriani says there are indications that some of the Americans had been taken to the Cambodian mainland. Senator Barry GOLDWATER is quoted as saying he was told that some of the men are on the mainland now. There was a lot of activity in Washington today, a meeting of the NSC at the White House and briefings at the Defense Department. Charles Quinn has the Pentagon story.

CHARLES QUINN: Pentagon spokesman Joseph LAITIN had a statement saying that the first American warship, the destroyer escort Holt, had arrived in the area, but the heart of the matter was the American attack.

JOSEPH LAITIN: Beginning at 8:30 PM yesterday evening there were indications that the Cambodians appeared to be attempting to move captive U.S. crewmen from the ship and from the island of Koh-Tang to the mainland. After giving warning U.S. aircraft began efforts to block this movement. Three Cambodian patrol craft were destroyed, about four others were damaged and immobilized. One boat succeeded in reaching Kampong Som.

QUINN: LAITIN refused to answer any questions but later he amended the statement to say that there was not now sufficient evidence to indicate that any of the Cambodian boats had been damaged. Forces here said it was a four hour operation, that the Cambodians were warned extensively and repeatedly, that it only takes minutes to destroy a handful of patrol boats. The planes came from Thailand, sources said. None was hit, although a Navy reconnaissance plane took a bullet in its tail. Sources said the military was led to believe that the Cambodians might move the Americans to the mainland through intercepted radio messages, rather than visual sightings. They said that some American crewmen might have been on one of the patrol boats, the one that made it to port, and that it was deliberately allowed to escape.

CHANCELLOR: Chuck, so where it stands now is that American planes sank three Cambodian ships?

QUINN: Right.

CHANCELLOR: But we just don't know about the others?

QUINN: He says now after rereading intelligence reports he doesn't have sufficient evidence to indicate that any others have been damaged.

CHANCELLOR: Do you have any idea how many Americans might have been taken to the mainland?

QUINN: No, sir, there's no indication of that here, John, just that one boat perhaps if any.

CHANCELLOR: And what's next militarily?

QUINN: I've been told by a very reliable source here that a helicopter operation is in the works -- it's just in the works. It may be imminent, but decision on that will take place in the White House not here at the Pentagon.

CHANCELLOR: Charles Quinn briefing us from the Pentagon. At the White House the luncheon meeting of the NSC broke up late this afternoon and after that happened congressional leaders of both parties were asked to the White House. Tom Brokaw has more on that story.

TOM BROKAW: President FORD is meeting with congressional leaders of both parties at the White House this evening following a two hour meeting of the NSC, where military options were discussed. The President has promised to consult with Congress on military actions in the Mayaguez situation. In addition to the congressional leaders and the President in the meeting there is the Secretary of State, Henry KISSINGER, Secretary of Defense SCHLESINGER, and Vice President ROCKEFELLER. No members of the military JCS were seen at the room at the beginning of the meeting. Some congressional leaders are complaining about the nature of these consultations, but White House spokesmen say the President has a clear constitutional authority to use military force to protect American lives and property without congressional permission. Presidential advisers argue that the War Powers Act doesn't apply in this case. As one put it, this is not a case of sending a half million troops into SE Asia. So, in effect, the White House is calling it consultation, but the President is telling Congress what he'll do and he is telling them tonight here at the White House.

CHANCELLOR: Tom, what are they saying at the White House now about the safety and the whereabouts of the crew?

BROKAW: The whereabouts is still an extremely sensitive situation at the White House, John. Administration spokesmen are reluctant to talk about it, however, some high level White House officials have said they've received no reports of any casualties of the crewmen aboard the Mayaguez. But that is about as much as they'll say at the White House on that subject.

CHANCELLOR: Tom Brokaw briefing us from the White House. In the Congress there was general support for the President. The White House said strong consensus and no objections. But there were questions asked and some difficulties about whether congressional leaders were consulted or only informed. The White House says SEnate Majority leader MANSFIELD was told before the fact, but he said it was after the fact. Here's more on the Congress from Catherine Mackin.

CATHERINE MACKIN: Senator MANSFIELD was one of several prominent Democrats who at least raised questions about the action President FORD took. As for press secretary Ron Nessen's statement that there were no objections among the leaders of Congress, MANSFIELD said no objections is a highly technical phrase. MANSFIELD said you can't object after decisions already are made. He said there was no consultation, just notification only after the fact. Henry JACKSON, a Democrat running for President and a Vietnam hawk, said he hopes the United States is not going down the same road followed after the 1964 Tonkin Gulf incident which led to major involvement in Vietnam. JACKSON said this is a time for cool heads, not a time to exercise the use of force. Senator Edward KENNEDY said it appears the United States may have acted with undue haste. He questioned whether every possible diplomatic effort had been made before military force was used. But there was a lot of support for the President, many said what he did was a justified act of self defense and said he was acting fully within his power as commander in chief.

SENATOR JACOB JAVITS: I believe a President has the right to act against piracy on the high seas in respect to the U.S. vessel and there's no question about that.

SENATOR JOHN TOWER: Well I think in the past in a similar situation we've failed to act with sufficient haste.

REP. JOHN RHODES: It would be my hope that the Cambodians would realize that the situation is one that we do not intend to tolerate and that it might be well for them to release the ship and the crew.

MACKIN: All afternoon officials of the State Department and Defense Department circulated on Capitol Hill briefing the members of the House and Senate Foreign Relations Committee on what the President did. Under the 1973 War Powers Act President FORD will have to file a written report to Congress on the Cambodian action within the next 48 hours. Catherin Mackin, NBC News, Washington.

CHANCELLOR: And late today the Senate Foreign Relations Committee endorsed the President's action. Throughout the day, however, despite different kinds of messages to the Cambodian government the United States has not been given any signal in return from Phnom Penh, not even an acknowledgment that its messages were received.

(Commercials)

CHANCELLOR: The Prime Minister of Thailand, Kukrit PRAMOTCH, today was protesting the sudden arrival overnight of 1,100 American Marines who were flown to an American airbase in Thailand. He was not given notice of that, nor were American civilian officials in Bangkok. And the government of Thailand has given the American government until Wednesday night Washington time to get the Marines out of the country. The Marines, of course, could be used if necessary in a rescue mission for the crewmen of the Mayaguez. But that deadline stands. All this took place on a day when a new and somewhat bewildered American Ambassador, Charles WHITEHOUSE (?) arrived in Bangkok. George Lewis has that story by satellite.

GEORGE LEWIS: The new Ambassador was greeted by a small group of student demonstrators carrying anti-American signs, chanting and singing anti-American slogans. The demonstration was noisy but non-violent, as Ambassador WHITEHOUSE and his wife walked through the crowd. He arrived as the Thai government was protesting the reported movement of 1,100 U.S. Marines into the country. According to one account the Thai Prime Minister was threatening to break relations with the United States. But there was a polite official welcome, flower garlands from a protocol officer. In a brief statement Ambassador WHITEHOUSE had little to say about the Cambodian capture of the merchant ship Mayaguez, about any U.S. military response or about the problems between the U.S. and Thailand.

AMBASSADOR CHARLES WHITEHOUSE: I recognize that there is a problem with regards to the ship Mayaguez, with which at this moment I'm afraid I'm not familiar. My wife and I have been travelling for three days and I'm afraid at this time I'm not in any position to comment with regard to this problem. At least I should also state that until I've had the honor of presenting my credentials to his majesty the king, it would be very inappropriate of me to comment on anything that effects Thai-American relations.

LEWIS: So the new Ambassador will contend with a government which says it is angry at the U.S. There are signs here the anger is not unanimous, that some Thai leaders favor a continued military presence here. It seems to be a delicate balancing act, trying to placate the Communists while holding them at bay with U.S. military men here. And the big question is whether the Thais can pull it off. George Lewis, NBC News, Bangkok.

Anti-Americanism in Laos

CHANCELLOR: Anti-American feelings arose today in Laos as the coalition government there continued to move closer to Communist control. In the Laotian town of Savannakhet a student mob broke into the compound of the Agency for International Development, sacked it and made hostages of three American AID employees. They are believed to be unharmed. And in the royal capital of Louangphrabang the AID compound also was broken into but the four Americans there are believed safe. And in Washington the State Department said the United States would begin to cut the size of its Embassy staff in Vientiane by the end of the week.

Report on Killed U.S. Marines

CHANCELLOR: Two American Marines, Lance Corporal Darwin JUDGE of Marshaltown, Iowa and Corporal Charles McMAHON of Wilburn, Mass., were killed in a rocket attack at Tansonnhut airport two days before the Saigon government surrendered to the Vietcong and the North Vietnamese. And in the rush of the American evacuation from South Vietnam their bodies were inadvertantly left behind in a Saigon hospital. Last night in Marshaltown a memorial service was held for Lance Corporal JUDGE. Jim Ruddle reports.

JIM RUDDLE: When he was 15 he became an Eagle Scout. He like to work with his hands, to make things. He graduated from Marshaltown High School May 31st last year and enlisted in the Marines. Marshaltown H.S., now the flag at half staff, and a memorial service for Darwin JUDGE, dead at 19 in South Vietnam, one of the last two Americans killed there by enemy action. Darwin's parents learned of his death two weeks ago and their grief has been compounded. The memorial service had music, flowers and flags, but no coffin, Darwin's body was left behind in the confusion of the American evacuation of Saigon.

MINISTER: In a way tonight the whole nation is evesdropping on this place -- not out of disrespect mind you -- but perhaps as a final guest of grief. Maybe this is one of the last opportunities to collectively weep over the tragedy of the Vietnam war.

RUDDLE: So in many ways it was like all those other memorials for other American servicemen whose bodies were never returned from Vietnam. And it was a different kind of memorial to the Vietnam dead because this could be one of the last. Jim Ruddle, NBC News, Marshaltown, Iowa.

U.S. Planes Sink Cambodian Ships

BOB SCHIEFFER: Good evening. United States warplanes have sunk three Cambodian gunboats in the Gulf of Thailand about 30 miles off the coast of Cambodia. U.S. officials said the attack was ordered to prevent the Cambodians from taking the crew members off the Mayaguez, the captured American merchant ship. The air strikes occurred as more than 1,000 U.S. Marines were arriving in Thailand. The Thai government protested both the troops arrival and the sinking of the boats, which it called madness. More on the story from Ike Pappas at the Pentagon and Phil Jones at the White House.

IKE PAPPAS: It was 16 hours after the attack that the Pentagon informed the nation it had occurred.

SECRETARY LAITIN: Beginning at 8:30 PM yesterday evening there were indications that the Cambodians appeared to be attempting to move captive U.S. crewmen from the ship and from the island of Koh-Tang to the mainland. After giving warning, U.S. aircraft began efforts to block this movement. Three Cambodian patrol craft were destroyed.

PAPPAS: The original Pentagon statement said four patrol boats were also damaged. Later the Pentagon said its information may have been erroneous, that it is not clear how many, if any, of the patrol boats were damaged. At least three types of American aircraft took part, the A-7, a medium range fighter equipped with 20mm gattling guns; the F-4, an all weather fighter-bomber fitted with 20mm cannons; and the AC-130, a converted turbo-prop cargo plane carrying gattling guns. The destroyer Holt arrived on the scene this afternoon, the aircraft carrier Coral Sea is due there around midnight eastern time. Pentagon sources said pilots took some precautions to determine if any of the crew members of the ship were on the patrol boats before they attacked. However the sources said they could not rule out the possibility some of the crewmen were on the Cambodian boats. They added that some survivors were seen on rafts in the water. Some crew members may have been on the one boat that got through.

Indications here are more military force will follow unless the Khmer Rouge Communists act swiftly to release the ship and its men. Pentagon sources said that action could come within 24 hours. Ike Pappas, CBS News, the Pentagon.

PHIL JONES: The President started leaning towards military reaction late yesterday afternoon, congressional leaders were then telephoned. According to the White House this was consultation as required by the 1973 War Powers Act. However CBS News has learned that those telephone calls consisted of a Presidential aide reading a statement on President FORD's plans. The congressional leaders were not asked for a reaction or advice. White House officials say there were no objections raised. Then Mr. FORD held a meeting with his NSC. That session lasted until after midnight. Secretary of State KISSINGER was back for his regular meeting with President FORD this morning and again this afternoon for the fourth emergency security council session. KISSINGER indicated that there is still a good chance that the American crewmen are on the island near where the Mayaguez is anchored. Publicly the President has still not stated a deadline for the return of the vessel and crew. However it has now been two days since he issued that stern warning calling for the immediate return of the vessel and its crew or the Cambodians would face serious consequences. Phil Jones, CBS News, at the White House.

SCHIEFFER: In response to the Cambodian capture of that American merchant ship more than 1,000 U.S. Marines were airlifted today to Utapao, the U.S. base in Thailand. But the troop movement has created new friction between the Thai and American governments. No sooner had the Marines arrived then Thailand gave them 24 hours to get out of the country. We have reports now from Peter Collins in Thailand and Marvin Kalb in Washington.

PETER COLLINS: The Marines were brought into the big Utapao Airbase aboard Air Force jet transports from Okinawa. There was little for them to do except to wait for orders. The Marines said they were under instructions not to discuss their mission. But their presence on this base is building toward a diplomatic collision between the United States and Thailand. With the collapse of the American position in Indochina, the Thais have been increasingly nervous about having large U.S. forces in their country as they try to patch up relations with the new Communist governments of Vietnam and Cambodia. And now Thailand's Prime Minister Kukrit PRAMOTCH says he doesn't want to be dragged into a new dispute between the U.S. and Cambodia. The Prime Minister has told the U.S. he will not permit the Marines to use Thailand as a base for any move to free the captured freighter Mayaguez by force. And beyond that he has ordered the Marines out of the country by Thursday or Thailand will take "drastic action." What that action might be is open to speculation, but one option could be simply to close this and the other three American bases in Thailand. That would be a heavy blow to the United States which keeps 25,000 troops and a variety of aircraft on the bases, including B-52 bombers such as this one. If the Thais want to close the bases they could easily cut off their supplies or even move in military force, although such a step is unlikely. Peter Collins, CBS News, at Utapao Airbase, Thailand.

MARVIN KALB: The administration thinks Thailand is unreliable and it's been in the process of pulling American troops out of the country for the past few months, a process unrelated to the current crisis. The old anti-Communist alliance between Bangkok and Washington is dying as the Thais try desperately to strike up new friendships with the triumphant Communists of Cambodia and Vietnam. In this climate the U.S. did not feel that it had to inform the Thai government that the Marines were coming, and it did not, thereby further inflaming an already bad situation. Actually the Marines went to Thailand for only one purpose, as part of the rescue operation of the captured freighter. This episode only underscores the fragility of American diplomacy in SE Asia. For example, when the freighter was seized the U.S. found itself in the awkward position of being forced to turn to China for help, there was no other country the U.S. could turn to. And when, predictably, China turned a cold shoulder towards the U.S. the administration felt it had no alternative but to use military force. Marvin Kalb, CBS News, the White House.

Nevada Bomb Test

SCHIEFFER: In the ground 2,500 feet below Peyute Mesa, Nevada today the government exploded a nuclear device 50 times as powerful as the WWII atomic bomb dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. The ground shock was felt 110 ten miles away in Las Vegas where the buildings swayed and doors rattled for about 30 seconds. Monitoring planes reported no radiation leaks.

Report on Defense Spending

SCHIEFFER: Earlier this week CBS News in its special series, Defense, Diplomacy and Detente, has explored American treaty obligations throughout the world and how the United States stands militarily with its potential adversaries. Tonight in the final report Bernard Kalb takes a look at U.S. defense spending.

PRESIDENT FORD: However good their intentions, those who claim that America is overarmed and overspending on defense are dead wrong.

CONGRESSMAN: I concur with that statement, I don't think that we are overarmed. (Senator TOWER (?))

CONGRESSMAN: Absolutely not, I think that we are overspending and we're not getting our money's worth.

BERNARD KALB: That clash of views is just the opening skirmish in the annual battle over just how much the United States should spend on defense, and it's expected to get a lot more intense this year. The guns versus butter controversy, sharpened by disagreement over national priorities at a time of unemployment, inflation and uncertain economy. For the first time the Pentagon has asked for more than $100 billion in appropriations, $104.7 billion to be exact, for fiscal '76 -- reflecting the climbing cost of defense, that's a $15.7 billion increase over last year. The money for such expenses as operations and maintenance, military personnel, the acquisition of hardware. Among other objectives the record budget is aimed at accomodating inflation now and improving weaponry later. Of the grand total, about $93 billion is for actual or estimated outlays in fiscal '76. Part of the remainder represents a down payment on future growth, thereby laying the groundwork for a steadily increasing defense budget. The Pentagon estimates it could go as high as $148 billion in 1980. What has drawn the fire of congressional critics are the requests for continued funding of such highly controversial items still in the development stage, such as the B-1 bomber $84 million each; and the giant new Trident nuclear missile submarines a billion and a half dollars each, the most expensive single weapons system on the drawing boards.

CONGRESSMAN: These glamor items get into the defense budget because that's what the services want to put in there, I mean, that's what they really like to have. The Air Force loves bombers, and the submarine -- Navy wants to have a new Trident submarine, and the Army likes a new main battle tank. Those are very, very expensive pieces of equipment and not worth the cost.

KALB: An opposing view from Senator John TOWER, who sees the present defense budget as a bare bones budget and is willing to consider cuts in other programs if necessary to support it.

SENATOR JOHN TOWER: Well I think what we have to do is look at some of the social programs that we enacted during the '60's that have locked in a lot of obligatory federal spending, and perhaps go back and modify some of these programs or reduce them. But again we have to order our priorities. And I think that we have to simply take a hard look and see where we can effect cuts in the lower priority programs.

KALB: Congress has only so many dollars to work with. National defense is down for 27 percent of the federal budget. But critics argue that if the Pentagon gets that percentage other programs will suffer.

CONGRESSMAN: I think you can do that, just write down environment, health care, educational needs, job training programs. All these social and domestic problems, of course, are relatively going to suffer when we waste money over and above the needs of an adequate defense in one sector of our budget.

KALB: At the Pentagon, no defensive-

DECLASSIFIED

ness about (?) the record defense budget from Secretary James SCHLESINGER.

SECRETARY SCHLESINGER: This is a record budget only in terms of the gradually diminishing value of the dollar. Now the main point behind our defense budget is the necessity, given the U.S. foreign policy in the world, of maintaining adequate forces to retain a worldwide military balance so that the Soviet Union does not by an automatic process become the dominant power in the eastern hemisphere. With regard to the guns versus butter issue, I think I indicated that the real value of the DOD budget has been shrinking, that our percentage of the federal budget has been cut almost in half in the last -- in recent fiscal years -- so that more and more has been made available for social programs against shrinking tax revenues by real reductions in defense. The question is whether that process has not gone too far and whether it now threatens the worldwide military equilibrium which it is necessary for us to maintain.

KALB: Some congressional critics have been talking about record budget cuts the Indochina defeat has made them back away. Still not every requested dollar is regarded as untouchable. The question being asked is whether the final cuts will be only symbolic or whether the controversy over national priorities will cut deeper into the Pentagon budget. Bernard Kalb, CBS News, Washington.

SCHIEFFER: Both the Senate and the House today passed a resolution to hold federal spending this year to $367 billion. This ceiling encompasses a deficit of about $69 billion.

U.S. Planes Sink Cambodian Boats

HARRY REASONER: The United States has begun military action to gain the release of the American merchant ship Mayaguez now held by Cambodia. When diplomatic efforts to free the ship failed and it became apparent the Cambodians were about to move the crew members, U.S. planes attacked the gunboats guarding the Mayaguez, at least three of the Cambodian boats were destroyed. We have reports detailing the attack and related events first from Pentagon correspondent Frank Tomlinson.

FRANK TOMLINSON: The attack against the Cambodian boats was carried out at 8:30 last night our time by American aircraft flying out of Thailand after there were indications that the Cambodians were trying to move the captured crewmen off the freighter Mayaguez and off Koh-Tang island. Fifteen hours after the AC-130 gunships and the A-7 fighter-bombers made their attack the Pentagon made a terse announcement saying that three Cambodian patrol boats had been sunk. That original announcement also said four other Cambodian patrol boats had been damaged and immobilized. Now the Pentagon is backtracking, saying, that there's insufficient evidence to prove that those four boats were damaged. One Cambodian boat did make it to the port of Kampong Som. It was not attacked because it was feared American crewmen were onboard. Meanwhile, the Mayaguez is still at anchor off Koh-Tang island, 30 miles off the Cambodian coast and is under constant surveillance by U.S. aircraft. The first of several Naval ships headed for the Gulf of Siam has arrived in the area, it's the destroyer escort Holt. Three aircraft carriers, the Coral Sea, the Hancock and the Midway are in the western Pacific apparently headed for the Gulf of Siam. A reinforced Marine battallion landing team of 1,200 men is in Thailand, it could move at any time the order is given. Officials say there are several options open to the Marines. One of those options is to put Marines on the deck of the freighter Mayaguez. Another is to land Marines on Koh-Tang island. The best bet is to recover the Mayaguez they'll take both options simultaneously. Frank Tomlinson, ABC News, the Pentagon.

REASONER: Ambassador John SCALLY called on United Nation's Secretary Gen. WALDHEIM today to formally request U.N. help in securing the release of the Mayaguez and its crew. In a letter presented to WALDHEIM, SCALLY said the U.S. reserves the right to take such measures as may be necessary to protect the lives of American citizens and American property.

HOWARD K. SMITH: When those 1,200 Marines sent by President FORD arrived in Thailand the Thai reaction was strong. They demanded the Marines be withdrawn immediately. There was also a popular protest as the new U.S. Ambassador to Thailand arrived. ABC's Jim Bennet reports.

JIM BENNET: But even as he spoke (Ambassador) Thailand's Prime Minister was expressing other ideas on the American presence here.

DECLASSIFIED

PRIME MINISTER PRAMOTCH: We have made a protest to the U.S. Government, together with the demand that the troops be withdrawn immediately. And if that's not done, if our request (unintelligible) there will probably be a deterioration in the good relations between this country and the United States.

REPORTER: Do you mean that Thailand is going to break relations with the United States?

P.M. PRAMOTCH: We will have to wait and see the results.

BENNET: Ambassador WHITEHOUSE left the airport amidst derisive shouts that the entire U.S. military presence in Thailand should leave immediately. What the Thais want now are not U.S. Marines on their territory poised to perhaps strike again into Indochina, but assurances of neutrality with their aggressive Communist neighbors. And there are those who believe that they are even prepared to break relations with America seeking that assurance. This is Jim Bennet, ABC News in Bangkok.

REASONER: An official of the Thai Foreign Ministry criticized today's U.S. military action as piracy and madness. He said the U.S. gave no thought to the consequences for Thailand. What if Cambodia decides to retaliate, he asked? It can't retaliate against the Americans, they are too far away, but it can retaliate against Thailand which is right next door.

Commentary: Howard K. SMITH

HOWARD K. SMITH: It may not happen, but with the general downgrading of the United States by Asians we ought to give it some thought. I mean a move by North Korea against South Korea. There's a logic favoring such a move: a) Kim Il SUNG of North Korea has indicated often and openly and recently that it has never left his mind, b) his opponent General PARK of South Korea has applied repression -- though nothing like KIM's in the North -- repressions which have disunified and weakened South Korea, and c) South Korea's main support, the United States, has just lost its first war ever and has little stomach for another land war in Asia at present. But if KIM doesn't act soon we may somehow regain stomach. There's a countervailing logic also, China may oppose an adventure by KIM that might cause the U.S. to lose interest in Asia and leave China alone on the Asian continent facing a hostile Russia and also possibly facing a Japan going nuclear because of lost confidence in the U.S. Also the U.S. mood is unpredictable, it is such that one more nasty slap might just cause a quick change of heart in favor of blowing KIM to kingdom come, especially since unlike Indochina our interests should be clear in this case, the Korean Peninsula points straight at Japan. I don't know which logic will prevail but it might influence things if we made up our minds soberly, now and indicated our thoughts to KIM early. Congress would have to do that. I had the impression President FORD has already made up his mind, he would be for fighting.

THE U.S. RETOOK a seized ship and 30 crewmen after sinking Cambodian boats.

The Pentagon said a small Cambodian boat flying a white flag brought about 50 American seamen to a U.S. destroyer in the Gulf of Thailand. There wasn't any immediate word on the other nine crewmen of the U.S. merchant ship Mayaguez, seized by the Cambodians Monday. Shortly before the release of the 30 men, about 200 U.S. Marines recaptured the ship and went ashore on an island where it had been moored, encountering resistance from Cambodian troops there.

The release followed a radio broadcast from Phnom Penh that Cambodia was ready to return the merchant ship, which was accused of spying and violating Cambodian territorial waters.

The U.S. forces lost at least two helicopters in the operation, which also included air strikes against Ream airfield on the Cambodian mainland near Sihanoukville. President Ford ordered the rescue effort nearly 24 hours after sending U.S. planes to sink three Cambodian patrol boats in a bid to block Cambodia from bringing the captured U.S. seamen to the mainland.

The White House said it acted with "a strong consensus of support" from congressional leaders in the attack, which wasn't announced for 11 hours.

Thailand demanded that the U.S. immediately remove 1,100 Marines flown to an American base there early yesterday without prior notification to the Thais. The planes that sank the Cambodian boats also took off from the base in Thailand, U Tapao. The 1,100 Marines were withdrawn to a U.S. aircraft carrier early today.

Ford's Action Is Supported in Congress

By PHILIP SHABECOFF

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 14—The White House said today that President Ford had consulted with Congressional leaders before ordering an attack on Cambodian patrol boats. At least some of those leaders insisted later, however, that they had not been consulted but merely informed of a Presidential decision already made.

However, members of Congress generally expressed approval of the President's action and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee adopted a strong resolution of support this evening acknowledging the President's constitutional right to order military operations.

Yesterday the White House press secretary, Ron Nessen, told reporters that President Ford would "consult" with Congress before ordering any military action to rescue the seized American freighter Mayagüez, or its crew.

Action Called Constitutional

He quoted the Congressional War Powers Resolution of 1973, which states, in part, that "the President in every possible instance shall consult with Congress before introducing United States armed forces into hostilities or into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated."

Roderick Hills, a counsel to the President, told a questioner that Mr. Ford had acted under his Constitutional war powers to protect the lives and property of Americans. When asked to cite the specific authority within the Constitution, Mr. Hills said that he did not have the exact article in front of him.

But he insisted that the inherent right of the President to use war powers to protect lives and property had not been challenged. The only open question, he said, was the appropriate level of military response.

Ford Waited 11 Hours to Tell American Public of His Action

WASHINGTON, May 14 (UPI) —President Ford waited at least 11 hours before informing the American people today that United States warplanes had attacked Cambodian boats.

A short time later, Mr. Ford called the National Security Council into session at the White House for the third time in 24 hours to continue efforts to gain release of the United States cargo ship commandeered by Cambodian forces in the Gulf of Siam.

The President conferred periodically with Secretary of State Kissinger, and White House officials sought to portray a sense of calm.

During the President's only public appearances, at the start and end of a meeting with Premier Joop M. den Uyl of the Netherlands, Mr. Ford gave no indication that he was under great pressure. At one point, he and Mr. Kissinger exchanged jokes about soccer with the Dutch leader.

Administration sources said that the first United States air strikes against Cambodian patrol boats began by 1 A.M., Eastern Daylight Time, today and that at least five of the craft had been hit within an hour. The first public acknowledgment of the operations came about noon from the Defense Department. There was no official explanation for the delay in announcing the action taken by the American planes.

At that point the White House press secretary, Ron Nessen, said he was unable to provide further details about either the military action or the status of the 39-man crew that was aboard the merchant ship Mayagüez when it was seized Monday.

Asked whether the United States was now at war with Cambodia, Mr. Nessen replied, "Not that I am aware of."

Administration sources said that President Ford decided to order the air strikes late yesterday afternoon after the first

Support for Ford is hedged

By ADAM CLYMER

Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—The Ford administration sent in the marines and used aircraft against Cambodia just as a day of general political support for Mr. Ford here was beginning to show cracks.

And the actions also were taken just as a report of a decision to release the ship reached the city and appeared to have caught the White House totally by surprise.

While the timetable of the military operations was not made clear immediately, it appeared possible that the marines and the Navy planes engaged the Cambodians after the Phnom Penh radio report had reached Washington.

It probably will not matter as much politically as the success or failure of the efforts to get the 39 crewmen out alive—and there were reports from the Pentagon that 30 of them had been recovered by the marines—but if the appearance of disregarding the offer to free the ship and going ahead military anyway is confirmed, it could deepen any such reaction.

Senators and representatives had just finished meeting with Mr. Ford and had left the White House when the Phnom Penh radio report came over a United Press International ticker at 8:17 P.M. Ronald H. Nessen, Mr. Ford's press secretary, said the President had not learned of the report from UPI but from some other source. He would not say when Mr. Ford learned, but it was plainly not long before.

And the military moves the President intended to take—actions that the congressmen would not describe—were plainly scheduled to begin soon, perhaps in minutes. They were announced 60 minutes later.

Two of the leaders, Senator Milton R. Young (R., N.D.) and Representative Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., (D., Mass) told reporters that the results would be known by about 10 P.M. Others thought it might take longer.

But accounts of the meeting made it clear that even though the President was applauded when he came in, there was some uncertainty about his course. The congressmen did not challenge his legal authority but they indicated some reservations about the course he chose.

They were not for the most part quarreling about the wisdom of the earlier efforts to prevent gunboats from taking the captive crew to the mainland, efforts that resulted in sinking three Cambodian vessels, with one, where white faces reportedly were seen on deck, apparently allowed to get to shore.

But at least some of the Democrats were edgy both about the degree of consultation the President used before that action and last night's set of moves. And there were reservations expressed at the White House meeting about whether at least one of the steps planned in last night's operations might not needlessly threaten the crewmen's lives.

Mr Nessen had proclaimed at a White House briefing that when the leaders had been read a statement of the President's plans Tuesday afternoon (by the White House's Congressional Liaison Office), "this is considered to be consultation." Despite its likely legal sufficiency, politically the step was plainly not so considered by some of those notified on the Hill. Senator Mike Mansfield (D., Mont.), the Senate majority leader, was testy in his account of the phone call he received. He said he did not bother to object to what was read to him "becase it was already decided."

His reservations were echoed by his deputy, Senator Robert C. Byrd (D., W. Va.), after the White House meeting. "At least some of the leaders in the two houses should have been called in" to offer their opinions, he said, instead of being "advised after the fact."

And Mr. Byrd, while not identifying the precise American moves that troubled him, said that while he had supported Mr. Ford's actual decisions with some reservations about the degree of restraint employed.

Earlier, Capitol Hill had been producing general approval. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee cheered Mr Ford's use of "his constitutional powers within the framework of the War Powers Resolution."

Although Senators Edward M. Kennedy (D., Mass.) and George McGovern (D., S.D.) were critical of a lack of restraint they saw in American policy, others such as Senator John O. Pastore (D., R.I.) and Representative Lester L. Wolff (D., N.Y.) backed the President up.

Republicans were almost without exception supportive, but one senior GOP legislator, in a conversation between the report of the Cambodian offer and the announcement of the U.S. military moves, said it would "defy logic" not to hold up any armed actions to see if the offer was real. He could not be reached for comment later.

But the Democrats had plainly positioned themselves to attack the President for not consulting them—even last night, they said, they were "told" and not asked—and for a military overreaction that, if the rescue failed, they might say was more interested in saving face than in saving the crewmen's lives.

Saigon Diplomacy

France announced its recognition of the new government of South Vietnam and said that the two countries shortly will exchange ambassadors. Elsewhere, the Provisional Revolutionary Government moved to extend control of South Vietnamese embassies abroad.

The North Vietnamese charge d'affaires in London took over custody of the South Vietnamese embassy at the instruction of the PRG. In Tokyo, the Cuban government took custody of the South Vietnamese embassy until diplomatic relations are established between Japan and the new Saigon regime, and a PRG delegation arrived in New Delhi to take charge of the embassy there.

On other fronts, Belgium said it was moving to establish relations with the PRG. In Geneva, the World Health Organization's annual assembly approved the membership of North Vietnam, 116- to 0. The United States and seven other countries abstained.

FORD -- CONTINUED

White House legal department, indicated that the President believed that informing Congress of his actions satisfied the requirement of the War Powers Resolution that he consult with Congress before beginning military operations.

The resolution does not require prior approval of military action by Congress, he asserted.

At today's news briefing, Mr. Nessen said that the President, through his Congressional relations staff, "did consult" with Democratic and Republican leaders of the House of Representatives and Senate between 5:30 and 6 P.M. yesterday, "three hours before the act." A statement issued by the Defense Department today indicated that the attack began shortly after 8:30 P.M., Eastern Daylight Time.

However, Senator Mike Mansfield, Democratic leader of the Senate and one of those listed by Mr. Nessen as having been consulted, said in a telephone interview today:

"I was not consulted. I was notified after the fact about what the Administration had already decided to do."

In a statement released later, Senator Mansfield said: "I did not give my approval or disapproval because the decision had already been made. My reaction at this point is that there are a lot of questions to which I want answers."

Senator James O. Eastland, Democrat of Mississippi and President Pro Tempore of the Senate, and Senator Clifford P. Case, Republican of New Jersey, the ranking Republican on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, also said that they had not been consulted but had been informed. Mr. Eastland said he had been told after the attack.

Both, however, indicated that they strongly supported President Ford's action against the Cambodian boats.

The majority leader of the House of Representatives, Thomas P. O'Neill of Massachusetts, also said he had not been consulted but only informed.

The House minority leader, John J. Rhodes of Arizona, was quoted by The Associated Press as having said that he had not been notified until after the Cambodian vessels were sunk. But a spokesman for Mr. Rhodes told a questioner: "He was notified beforehand. We are calling it a consultation. Mr. Rhodes has no complaint."

A member of the White House Congressional liaison staff told a questioner that leaders of the Senate had been called about the President's planned action, starting with Senator Mansfield at 5:55 P.M., yesterday and concluding with Senator Eastland at 8:20 P.M., or shortly before the attack on the Cambodian vessels began. Memorandums of each call were sent to Max Friedersdorf, head of the Congressional relations staff, who had presumably passed the response along to the President, the staff member added.

This staff member said that about half the Senators had voiced approval of the President's action while the others simply "acknowledged" the information. Earlier today, Mr Nessen said that the response of the Congressional leaders to the "consultation" was "a strong consensus of support and no objections."

The members of Congress were not given any legal basis for the President's order for military intervention when they were contacted by the White House staff. At today's briefings at the White House, Mr. Nessen said that "the President has authority to protect the lives of Americans and the property of Americans under the Constitution."

Although several members of Congress charged that the President had violated the War Powers Resolution by failure to consult Congress; there was little criticism of the military action itself.

The resolution adopted by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, while it will not be voted on by the full Senate, was intended as a vote of Senatorial confidence. It was approved unanimously and said:

"Committee condemns an act of armed aggression on an unarmed U.S. merchant vessel in the course of innocent passage on an established trade route.

"The President has engaged in diplomatic means to secure its release and we support that.

"Third, we support the President in the exercise of his constitutional powers within the framework of the War Powers Resolution to secure the release of the ship and its men.

"We urge the Cambodian Government to release the ship and the men forthwith."

WAITED -- CONTINUED

of the National Security Council meetings.

Mr. Nessen said that Congressional leaders were advised of the decision at about 5:30 P.M. by White House aides, who reported that "there was a strong consensus of support and no objections."

Mr. Ford's next meeting with the Security Council started at about 10:20 P.M., soon after Mr. Kissinger returned from a speaking engagement in Kansas City. The session lasted a little over two hours. Officials said that Mr. Ford then spent a few minutes in the Oval Office and headed for the Presidential quarters, getting to bed at about 1 A.M. for about four hours of sleep. They said that he got no phone calls during the night.

Mr. Ford reached his desk at about 7:40 A.M. and after receiving his regular early-morning intelligence briefing, he met with Mr. Kissinger for about 45 minutes. He saw the Secretary of State three more times during the morning before meeting with the Security Council.

Thai Tells U.S. to Remove 1,100-Marine Unit Today

Threat to Relations

By The Associated Press

BANGKOK, Thailand, May 14 —Premier Kukrit Pramoj today gave the United States until tomorrow morning to remove 1,100 marines brought to Thailand without his permission and promised "drastic action" if his demand was not met. He did not specify the action.

The Premier told newsmen that Thailand did not intend to be drafted into American preparations to take back the American merchant ship Mayagüez. Cambodian gunboats seized the ship on Monday, and it was last reported lying to in the Gulf of Siam 30 miles off the Cambodian coast.

First reports from the Thai Foreign Ministry said 800 marines arrived before dawn at the United States Air Force's U Taphao base on the south coast, but Mr. Kukrit later said that Edward E. Masters, the American chargé d'affaires, had told him that the final total was 1,100.

Panamanian Ship Stopped

A Thai protest note warned of "serious consequences" to relations between the United States and Thailand if the marines were not removed.

Meanwhile, Thai communications sources reported that Cambodia today seized another foreign merchant ship, the Panama - registered Eastern Grand, but released it after nearly two hours. The sources said the ship was intercepted near Panjang Island, 85 miles off the coast.

Mr. Kukrit, who told Mr. Masters yesterday that Thailand did not want her territory used to stage any armed operation related to the Mayagüez, summoned him again today to deliver the ultimatum.

The text of the Thai protest note follows:

"It is recalled that on May 13, 2518 [the year according to the Buddhist calendar] the Prime Minister informed the chargé d'affaires of the American Embassy that Thailand does not wish to become involved in the dispute between the United States and Cambodia over the seizure of the vessel Mayagüez, and that Thailand will not permit her territory to be used in connection with any action that might be taken by the United States against Cambodia.

"On May 14, 2518, the Thai Government learned that the United States Government had sent some elements of its Marine forces into Thailand as part of its reaction against Cambodia.

"The Thai Government considers that this action by the United States Government is not consistent with the goodwill existing between Thailand and the United States. And unless these forces, which have entered, against the wishes of the Thai Government, are withdrawn immediately, the good relations and cooperation existing between Thailand and the United States would be exposed to serious and damaging consequences."

The Premier used stronger language to newsmen, charging that the arrival of the marines was "a violation of Thai sovereignty."

Meanwhile, 40 or 50 student protesters, shouting, "American, go home," were at the airport for the arrival of the new Ambassador to Thailand, Charles S. Whitehouse.

Mr. Whitehouse walked nodding and smiling between the ranks of the students and issued a prepared statement saying that he hoped to further "friendship and cooperation between our two peoples in the months ahead."

The National Student Center, which led the uprising that ended the military dictatorship 19 months ago, accused the United States of using the seizure of the freighter Mayaguez as an excuse to intervene again in Indochina.

Mr. Masters first learned from a news report from Washington that the marines were on the way. The Thai military command, which clears all international military flights, apparently was advised in advance. Presumably it did not pass the information on to the Government, a communication gap that has been common since the military dictatorship was overthrown in October, 1973.

Thailand under the military dictatorship was a staunch supporter of the United States war in Indochina and provided the bases from which most American air operations originated in the last years of the war. The present civilian Government is seeking a way to live with its new Communist neighbors and to return to the traditional Thai neutrality that kept the country independent while the rest of Southeast Asia came under European domination in the 19th century.

United States officials threw an unusual screen of secrecy around the crash of a United States military helicopter in northeast Thailand yesterday, raising speculation that it was on a mission in connection with the Mayagüez or the arrival of the marines.

Informed sources said all 23 persons aboard were killed when the aircraft crashed near the Laotian border and about 35 miles west of the United States Air Force base at Nakon Phanom. The sources said the passengers were Air Force men en route to U Taphao.

Approach to Sihanouk On Ship Release Fails

By John Burns
Toronto Globe and Mail

PEKING, May 14 -- Attempts by U.S. diplomats here to engage Prince Norodom Sihanouk and the Chinese government in efforts to secure the release of the American container ship Mayaguez reached a standstill Wednesday in the wake of the negative response to the initial representations on Tuesday.

Officials of the U.S. liaison office refused any official comment on the representations but it was learned that Prince Sihanouk and the Peking embassy of the Khmer Rouge government had failed to respond to requests for the ship's immediate release.

The Chinese foreign ministry, asked to intervene with the Phnom Penh authorities on Washington's behalf, was understood to have refused on the ground that the matter was not its concern.

The official Hsinhua News Agency had not reported the seizure more than 48 hours after it occurred and diplomats attached significance to the non-committal stance taken by vice premier Teng Hsiao-Ping, who was questioned about the incident in Paris.

Teng, who has been in effective day-to-day control of the government since Premier Chou En-Lai went into hospital a year ago, was asked what China would do if Washington took military action to get the vessel back.

American jets bomb base, sink 3 boats

By CHARLES W. CORDDRY
Washington Bureau of the Sun

The United States recaptured the merchant ship Mayaguez and retrieved at least 30 of its 39 crew members last night in a series of military actions against Cambodia ordered by President Ford three days after Cambodian gunboats seized the ship in the Gulf of Thailand.

Joseph Laitin, Defense Department spokesman, announced at 11.15 P.M. that a small boat bearing white flags had drawn up to the U.S. Destroyer Wilson, near Koh Tang Island, with the 30 crew members, and the destroyer took them aboard.

Mr. Laitin said the information had been conveyed to President Ford by James R. Schlesinger, Secretary of Defense.

He said the crew members had been sighted about 10.30 P.M. That was about 35 minutes before an air strike was launched from the carrier Coral Sea against Ream Airfield near the Cambodian port of Kompong Som.

Mr. Laitin also reported that in an action related to the recapture of the ship, 135-marines had landed on Koh Tang Island and more were going ashore. The marine landings on the island , it was understood, began about 7.20 P.M. Marines in that operation were brought by Air Force helicopters from Thailand. The marines who seized the ship previously had been moved to the destroyer Holt from Thailand .

Before Ronald H. Nessen, White House press secretary, issued the announcement, press dispatches from Bangkok, Thailand, reported a Phnom Penh broadcast saying the Cambodians were releasing the ship and ordering it on its way.

In response to this, Mr. Nessen said Washington messaged Cambodia: "As you know, we have seized the ship. As soon as you issue a statement that you are prepared to release the crew members you hold, unconditionally and immediately we will promptly cease military operations."

The operations ordered by Mr. Ford were:

- Marines to seize the Mayaguez.
- Additional marines to land on Koh Tang Island, where the ship was anchored, to rescue any crew members there. It was learned from other sources that the landing party was made up of 150 marines flown in by Air Force helicopters from Thailand. It was understood they encountered some opposition, but there were no details.
- Up to 1,200 marines for the operation if needed.
- U.S. aircraft from the carrier Coral Sea to carry out "associated military operations" in the Thailand Gulf to protect the military operations to retrieve the ship and crew.

The latter operations were not spelled out, but were the ones that the congressional source reported included air strikes on shore installations.

Earlier in the day, American warplanes destroyed three Cambodian patrol boats in an attempt to prevent movement of crew members of the Mayaguez to the Cambodian mainland, the Defense Department announced.

The Mayaguez was anchored about 500 yards off the island of Koh Tang, which lies 30 miles from the Cambodian coast. It was taken there after being seized about 60 miles from Cambodia in what President Ford called an act of piracy.

Before the U.S. military action was announced, President Ford called the fourth meeting of the National Security Council in three days to consider how to recover the ship and crew and what actions to take against the Cambodians.

The administration mobilized a fleet in the Thailand Gulf, ordered 1,200 marines into U Tapao Air Base in Thailand and directed Air Force helicopters and crews from several Thai bases to assemble at U Tapao. Authorities said the carrier Hancock left Subic Bay in the Philippines Tuesday and also was steaming to the gulf.

Navy and Air Force aircraft have been flying over the seized ship since it was taken by the Cambodians.

One urgent consideration at yesterday's security council meeting, an informed source said, was the Thai government's demand that the U.S. marines be withdrawn immediately.

Thailand, the government in Bangkok said, "does not wish to become involved in the dispute between the United States and Cambodia over the seizure of the vessel. . . and will not permit its territory to be used in connection with any action which might be taken by the United States against Cambodia."

A question was posed for leaders here, it was said, whether, in order to satisfy Thai demands, to move the marines to U.S. Navy ships before employing them in any action at Koh Tang island or elsewhere. An alternative was to move the marines directly into action with Thai-based U S. Air Force helicopetrs.

Mr. Laitin announced the attacks on patrol boasts yesterday at midday, giving only sketchy information and refusing to answer questions.

He said it appeared Tuesday evening that the Cambodians were trying to take the Mayaguez crew from the ship and from Koh Tang to the mainland. U.S. aircraft —identified by others as Air Force AC-130 gunships and A-7 attack bombers—undertook to block the move.

Mr Laitin said small-arms fire had been directed at American planes for several hours before this. At first he said three craft were destroyed and "about four others" were crippled. Late in the day, he said he had found there was "not sufficient verification to support" the statement about the crippled craft.

Others suggested that those boats may have raced to the protection of Koh Tang island.

Public Reaction Favors Bombings to Free Ship

The White House press office reported that initial reaction to the bombing was running strongly in favor of the President. As of 4:30 p.m. yesterday, the White House had received 668 telephone calls favoring getting the ship out, 24 against and nine calls from people merely commenting on the situation.

The White House also received 250 calls from people favoring bombing the ships, 51 calls against, and 295 telegrams favoring the bombing and 90 against.

A State Department spokesman said only four telegrams had been received there as of 4.45 p.m. yesterday. "They can be characterized as urging a vigorous American response," he said.

Suit Asks Building Halt At Base for Trident Subs

By Timothy S. Robinson

The ability of the nation to survive a nuclear missile attack, a subject normally reserved for closed congressional hearings and Pentagon war rooms, was the underlying issue in a recently completed trial here in an almost-empty federal courtroom.

The trial pitted a group of environmentalists against the military, and attorneys say the decision could have a direct influence on future litigation concerning the applicability of environmental laws to military bases.

Following more than a eek of testimony, U.S. District Court Chief Judge George L. Hart Jr. asked both sides to submit proposed legal and factual findings. His decision is expected by June.

The nuclear weapon at issue is the Trident submarine, praised by Defense Department officials as the country's most important future weapon defense against nuclear attack.

Scheduled for operation in 1978, the submarine will bear more and better nuclear weapons than the current Poseidon submarine and will be larger, quieter, and the most "survivable" of defense systems in the event of a nuclear attack, Pentagon officials testified.

Trident has a "brickbat O-1" priority, a national defense code that is now held by only two defense systems—the Poseidon and the land-based Minuteman III missile system.

With congressional approval of the system, the Navy is converting an ammunition storage dump near Bangor, Wash., to a base out of which Trident crews will train and the missile-carrying subs will operate. The base, at its peak, will employ more than 30,000 persons, according to plans.

A group of environmentalists, called "Concerned About Trident," is asking that base construction be blocked, because it says the Navy has failed to comply with environmental laws.

The environmentalists say:

The Navy never has prepared an environmental impact statement on the $15 billion Trident program.

The Navy's environmental-impact statements prepared on the Bangor site were drawn up after the decision was made to put the missile base there and are therefore a sham.

viets "another whole ocean to worry about" when defending against submarine-launched missiles, and of the need to be within easy striking distance of Moscow and Peking.

Vice Adm. R. Y. Kaufman testified that "at the risk of sounding parochial I'd say the Trident is No. 1" in terms of importance on the list of future defense systems.

When attorney David Sive attempted to cross-examine Kaufman on alternatives to Trident that may have been considered by the Navy, including the possibility of no new weapons, Hart interrupted:

"If the world becomes sweet and gentle and no one has any weapons we don't need this weapon. That is perfectly patent to anybody."

Although not claiming that the military is automatically and absolutely exempt from the requirements of the National Environmental Policy Act government attorneys have said in documents filed in the case that ". . .there are circumstances in which federal activities of a political nature are involved that are beyond the reach of NEPA and . . . some of those actions about which the plaintiffs here complain are actions of that political character.

". . .At several significant stages in the development of the Trident system, decisions were made, which had as their basis, considerations of national defense, international relations and the security of this nation as its role as a world power. These decisions are beyond the power of this court to review."

Another aspect of the Trident suit is the stand taken in behalf of the government by the Pacific Legal Foundation, a group that has sided with environment a list in the past.

In some-times sarcastic tones PLF attorneys noted that "without the Trident system, it cannot be guaranteed that foreign adversaries will not unleash vastly superior weapons, at which time all of the [plaintiffs] exhortations of naive environmental damage will have become ironically academic."

The nation's delicate Strategic Arms Limitation Talks with the Soviet Union could be undermined by a decision against Trident, the PLF attorneys continued, adding: "What bargaining power do we have in nuclear limitation talks if the Soviets know we are limiting ourselves because of domestic environmental concerns?"

The Navy has not prepared a new environmental-impact statement on the Bangor site since recent congressional aproval of a speeded-up completion date for the base.

Hart already refused to block the construction of the base pending the completion of the trial before him, and has indicated in court that he intends to weigh heavily the national-security aspect of the base in his decision.

The federal government asked that the trial be conducted because of the "public interest in having a controversy of this complexity and importance resolved on a full and complete record."

Environmentalists say building the base will have a detrimental effect on fish and wildlife in and around Hood Canal near Puget Sound, where the base is being built. They also say the Navy has not properly considered the effect on the area of the thousands of people who will arrive to build or operate the base, or the possibilities of nuclear hazards arising from handling weapons.

The Navy says, basically there is a point at which national defense takes priority over environmental concerns. The Navy points that it selected a site that is currently a base and that will take little additional construction, compared with building a base from scratch.

The Navy also says it has prepared the necessary environmental-impact statements and that no decision was made on locating the base in Bangor until after those impact statements were considered. The Navy says it selected Bangor from among 89 sites, which were narrowed to four possible locations.

Those final four sites included three on the Atlantic Coast and one on the Pacific Coast. At that point, the decision was made to put the base on the Pacific Ocean, government officials testified in court.

Three former secretaries of Navy and Secretary of Defense James Schlesinger, have filed affidavits supporting the decision to put the Trident base on the Pacific, and admirals who testified last week said the decision is even more important now than when it was made about two years ago.

With a bluntness reminiscent of the height of Cold War, the admirals discussed the necessity of giving the So-

PLEA FOR U.N. HELP MADE BY THE U.S.

By KATHLEEN TELTSCH
Special to The New York Times

UNITED NATIONS, N. Y., May 14 — The United States asked Secretary General Waldheim today to do what he could to help obtain the release of the merchant ship and crew seized early Monday off Cambodia.

The seizure was an illegal and unprovoked action that posed a threat to international peace, the United States Representative, John Scali, said in a letter handed to the Secretary General.

Mr. Waldheim responded by offering his good offices to the Governments concerned. He appealed to them to "refrain from further acts of force in order to facilitate the process of peaceful settlement."

Mr. Waldheim sent messages to Prince Norodom Sihanouk, titular head of the new Cambodean government who is in Peking, and to Phom Penh.

Mr. Scali's request was made a few hours after announcement in Washington that American aircraft had been fired on by the Cambodians and that the planes attacked and sank Cambodian gunboats in the vicinity of the seized freighter. The timing prompted some here to complain that the United States turned to the United Nations after—not before — had it resorted to force, when it could have appealed earlier.

American officials offered no explanation, but it was be-well aware that potential United Nations help was limited since there was no direct contact with the new Communist authorities in Phnom Penh. It was also believed that the request to the United Nations was something of an afterthought.

Since the Communist takeover there has been only one communication, on April 30, in which the new Foreign Minister, Sarin Chhak, claimed Cambodia's seat here; the message came via Peking. Mr. Waldheim acknowledged it but received no reply.

"The trouble with offering good offices is that one has to be sure they are welcomed by everyone, and it is difficult in this case to know where to address the offer," a United Nations official said.

The United States' letter said it had initiated "certain steps through diplomatic channels" to obtain the release of vessel and crew. Washington has asked Peking to intervene, but it is not clear how much influence the Chinese have with the new Government even though Prince Norodom Sianhouk, its titular head, is in Peking.

The letter also reserved the right to take measures to protect the lives of the Americans and the property involved, as provided in Article 51 of the United Nations Charter, which recognizes the right of self-defense against armed attack without waiting for action by the Security Council.

U.S. will 'thin out' personnel in Laos

BY DEAN MILLS
Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—The Ford administration, worried about the increasing dangers to Americans in Laos, has urged a "thinning-out" of American officials in that country.

Robert L. Funseth, a State Department spokesman, said in announcing the decision that there are no plans to evacuate all Americans or to close the American Embassy in the Lao capital of Vientiane. He said the Lao government has not requested that the embassy be closed and that the embassy remains in contact with the government.

With the resignation of rightist ministers last week, the Communist-led Pathet Lao are in effective control of the government. But unlike the Communist takeovers in Cambodia and South Vietnam, there has been no change in the structure of the government so far and therefore no technical reason for the United States to break diplomatic relations.

Mr. Funseth said that the American aid program for Laos is "under general review" as a result of anti-American demonstrations and the changes in government in Vientiane. The United States has not suspended aid despite recent developments.

The State Department said student demonstrators in the town of Savannakhet had seized three American officials of the Agency for International Development and were holding them. The American Embassy in Vientiane reported that the officials were not believed harmed.

Mr. Funseth described the "thinning-out" of American personnel in Vientiane as a process that is expected to take place over a period of several weeks beginning this week.

Americans in outlying areas already have been instructed to move the capital, he said. There is no reason, he said, to believe that American troops will be needed to protect the withdrawal process.

There are about 1,000 Americans in Laos now, 150 of them are "unofficial" Americans. The rest are the 320 officials and their dependents.

Barbarous Piracy

By Anthony Lewis

The diplomacy of violence: That is still, then, to be our trademark. Once again an American Government shows that the only way it knows how to deal with frustration is by force. And the world is presumably meant to be impressed.

The Khmer Rouge were wrong and foolish to seize the American merchant ship Mayaguez, if the facts were as stated in Washington. They violated necessary norms of international behavior. We had reason to be concerned, especially about the fate of the crew.

But using a sledgehammer to crack a nut is self-defeating for nations as for individuals. Violent escalation of the conflict could hardly be expected to achieve the immediate aim of the crew's release; to the contrary, it might heighten the danger. More broadly, the military action showed a lack of that perspective expected of a great power—the perspective, in this case, recent history.

Imagine that in 1775 and for years after an enormously powerful state equipped with futuristic weapons had intervened in our Revolutionary War. From bases in Canada it rained destruction on the thirteen colonies. A million Americans, a third of the population, fled their homes; 300,000 were casualties.

When the war was finally over, how might the victorious Americans have felt about that foreign state? If one of its ships had sailed into what were claimed to be Americans waters, might we have been tempted to board and seize the vessel?

A comparison between America in 1775 and Cambodia in 1975 is not so far-fetched. The peasant society of Cambodia today is hardly more advanced, technologically, than eighteenth-century America. Cambodia was just as defenseless against B-52's as the thirteen colonies would have been.

American planes dropped 250,000 tons of bombs on Cambodia between 1969 and Aug. 15, 1973, when Congress prohibited all U.S. military action in, over or on the waters adjoining Indochina. Between a third and a half of Cambodia's 7.5 million people became refugees. Jon Swain of The London Sunday Times, one of the correspondents recently evacuated, described the physical damage he saw as follows:

"The entire countryside has been churned up by American B-52 bomb craters, whole towns and villages razed. So far, I have not seen one intact pagoda. . . . The war damage here [Kompong Chhnang], as everywhere else we saw, is total. Not a bridge is standing, hardly a house. I am told most villagers spent the war years living semi-permanently underground in earth bunkers to escape the bombing."

With that background, Americans should be slow to point a finger of moral disapproval at the Khmer Rouge. Nor can we rightly take a lofty position on the need to respect law. Washington has not reacted with force when Ecuador seized U.S. fishing boats more distant from shore than the Mayaguez was. And the American bombing of Cambodia was itself of dubious constitutionality.

The United States also bears a heavy responsibility for the political character of Cambodia today. If we had not invaded the country in 1970, and then intervened massively in her civil war, Prince Sihanouk would doubtless have returned to power soon with a left-leaning but more traditional regime. The Khmer Rouge movement would not have developed as it has, in all its hardened zeal. Most of the human suffering of the war would have been avoided.

The Khmer Rouge inherited a ruined nation. We are rightly horrified by accounts of the harsh measures taken. But after what has been done to them, are the Cambodians really to be blamed if they are xenophobic?

Those Americans who had a part in the savagery of our policy toward Cambodia over the years should be particularly slow to utter deploring pieties now. Secretary of State Kissinger, a principal author of the policy, has described events in Cambodia as "barbarous," "inhuman," "very tragic" and "an atrocity of major proportions." A man so steeped in the blood of Cambodians should have the shame to remain silent.

And now the insensitivity is in deeds as well as words. Once again we have to show the world how tough we are: The attitude of the teen-ager proving his manhood did not end with Richard Nixon's Presidency. Demonstrative violence is in fact a central element in Henry Kissinger's diplomatic philosophy. But how long must it be our country's?

How disheartening, too, to see the Mayagüez affair evoke from Congress the old jingo talk and calls for Presidential action. Senator Clifford Case, co-author of the 1973 ban on military action in Indochina, lived down to his reputation as a pusillanimous liberal by telling President Ford that he could ignore the law. Have we learned nothing from Vietnam about law and the Presidency? Have we forgotten that America had the world's respect when she stood for patience and magnanimity in human affairs?

Pentagon to Probe Hunting Trip Reports

By Peter Gruenstein
Capitol Hill News Service

A Civil Service Commission official says the Defense Department will investigate charges that military officers and Pentagon officials used a duck hunting lodge owned by Northrop Corp., in apparent violation of an executive order.

Anthony L. Mondello, CSC's general counsel, said yesterday: "That smells. People shouldn't be doing that."

"Northrop is a recognized defense contractor," Mondello continued. "They should not be in the business of entertaining military and civilian officials. It's as simple as that."

Rep. David Henderson, D-N.C., chairman of a House civil service subcommittee, said he would ask the Defense Department and the Civil Service Commission for a timetable on the investigation. "If we're not satisfied with their investigation and if it's not prompt enough, then I'm sure the subcommittee would want to get into it."

MONDELLO SAID that, under civil service procedures, federal agencies bear primary responsibility for investigating allegations of ethical misconduct.

As previously reported by Capitol Hill News Service, trips to Northrop's hunting lodge by 123 military officers and 21 Pentagon officials between 1971 and 1973 were in apparent violation of an executive order prohibiting the acceptance by federal employes of anything of "monetary value" from a company doing business with the government.

During the time the trips were made, Northrop was competing for a multi-billion dollar contract to build a lightweight air combat fighter, the F17.

The Pentagon yesterday released a strongly worded letter written by Deputy Defense Secretary William Clements on Jan. 15, reminding military officials of the gift prohibition rule.

CLEMENTS cited a Defense Department directive defining gifts as including "any tangible items, intangible benefits, discount, tickets, passes, transportation, and accommodations or hospitality given or extended to or on behalf of the recipient.

"These prohibitions are not a matter of degree. There will be absolutely no relationship with defense contractors which violates or appears to violate the provision . . ."

Why Ford Shifted To Military Tactics

By JAMES McCARTNEY

WASHINGTON—President Ford switched from diplomatic to military tactics in the crisis over the captured merchant ship Mayaguez because of fear that some of the 39-man American crew might be taken out of reach, where they could never be rescued.

But well-placed government sources said late yesterday that some members of the crew may already have been moved to the mainland. And others may be on a nearby island, called Koh Tang, under guard by a small Cambodian naval garrison.

The President ordered what White House Press Secretary Ron Nessen described as "an inhibiting action" late Tuesday after a National Security Council (NSC) meeting.

The situation was tense.

The ship lay motionless, about a mile off Koh Tang, which is about 30 miles from the Cambodian port of Kompong Som.

The President had put his word on the line. He had labeled the seizure of the ship by the new Cambodian Communist government "an act of piracy." He had demanded its "immediate release" and declared that failure to release it "would have the most serious consequences."

U. S. warships from throughout the Pacific were steaming to the scene to back up the presidential statements. Combat-equipped U. S. marines were en route to Thailand from Okinawa, Japan.

But as the NSC met Tuesday afternoon, the military possibilities of saving the crew appeared in danger of slipping away.

U. S. reconnaissance planes were reporting that some crew members might have been moved onto the island, and that some already might have been taken to the mainland.

The President stood the risk of finding himself in a situation — so frequent in the Indochina war — where vast U. S. power might appear impotent.

At some point in the late afternoon the President gave the Pentagon authority to "isolate" the ship, and the island, so that no more Americans could be taken beyond reach.

It was what one White House source described as a "preventive tactics," chosen after initial diplomatic efforts to free the ship and crew had failed.

The President's initial decision to resort to force was not designed to rescue the sailors.

It was designed, instead, sources said, to try to keep as many men as possible in a position where they might be rescued, if a decision should be made later to try to do so.

"Obviously, the President wanted to take the diplomatic route," said one White House official.

"But if the men were moved, we'd lose control. The option of trying to extricate them would be diminished. They'd be out of reach."

Once arriving at the decision, the President instructed his Congressional liaison staff, headed by Max Friedersdorf, to contact key members of Congress to let them know.

Calls began to go out between 5 and 6 p.m. Tuesday, on a "classified" basis, to top Democratic chairmen and ranking Republicans on the Armed Services, Foreign Relations and Appropriations committees.

They were told that the President had ordered the military to use "minimum force" to isolate the freighter and keep the gunboats from removing the crew. According to the White House, none of the congressmen or senators objected.

The White House described this process as "consultation." But Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield complained that he wasn't "consulted before the fact," but was "notified after the fact."

Sadat Says He'll Ask U.S. For Aid on Debt to Soviet

BY HENRY TANNER

Special to The New York Times

BEIRUT, Lebanon, May 14—President Anwar el-Sadat said in an interview published today that he would seek financial aid from the United States to settle Egypt's large debts to the Soviet Union.

Mr. Sadat, in an interview in the Lebanese weekly Al Hawadess, was quoted as having said that aid would be one of the topics he would discuss with President Ford in Salzburg, Austria, on June 1 and 2.

Mr Sadat arrived in Bagndad tonight from Kuwait, where he spent three days in conversations with Emir Sabah al-Salem al-Sabah, the Kuwaiti ruler. Mr. Sadat will visit Jordan and Syria before returning to Cairo early next week.

In the interview, President Sadat reiterated his frequent complaint that the Soviet leaders had refused to agree to requests for a rescheduling of Egypt's debts.

Estimates of these debts stemming from military and economic assistance including construction of the Aswan High Dam, range from $4-billion to $7-billion.

"The Soviet leaders won't give me even a grace period," Mr. Sadat was quoted by the weekly. "We are contacting Arab countries for speedy action to straighten out Egypt's economy and to enable her to honor her commitments to the Soviet Union and others. These contacts are not confined to Arab countries but will be extended to the United States."

Financial talks between the United States and Egypt have been conducted in Cairo in preparation for the Salzburg meeting of the two Presidents.

The interview was the first time President Sadat indicated so clearly that without immediate help Egypt would not be able to honor her commitments to foreign governments including the Soviet Union.

Mr. Sadat's four-nation tour is regarded by informed diplomats as a reflection of a subtle but fundamental policy change decided upon by the Egyptian President after the failure of Secretary of State Kissinger's "shuttle diplomacy" in March.

For the last 18 months, since Mr. Kissinger's first visit to Cairo after the war in October, 1973, Mr. Sadat has been acting with deliberate independence as far as other Arab leaders were concerned.

Now, while still relying on the United States as the key to the Middle East conflict Mr. Sadat has resolved to operate strictly within the Arab context and to seek an Arab consensus before making a move.

According to Egyptian officials the present tour has three main objectives:

¶To seek an Arab consensus on what the Arab countries should expect from the United States in the coming stage of negotiations.

¶To mediate local disputes between Arab states, notably between Iraq and Syria over the waters of the Euphrates River and between Iraq and Kuwait over their border which has never been formally delineated.

¶To seek financial and military support from the oil-producing Arabs.

At a news conference in Kuwait President Sadat conceded that he had discussed Egypt's "enormous" economic difficulties with the Kuwaiti Emir.

In his news conference remarks and in the interview with the Lebanese weekly, Mr. Sadat reiterated a challenge to the Ford Administration to state clearly and publicly that the United States wanted Israel to withdraw from Arab territories seized during the war of tories seized during to war in 1967.

"The time has come for the United States to say whether it protects Israel within its borders or with the Arab territories that the Israelis seized by force," he said.

This apparently will be his key request to President Ford.

WASHINGTON (UPI) -- WITH OVERWHELMING FORCE, U.S. MARINES HAVE RECOVERED THE MERCHANT SHIP MAYAGUEZ AND RESCUED ALL 40 CREWMEN FROM THEIR CAMBODIAN CAPTORS.

PRESIDENT FORD SAID TODAY HE PERSONALLY ORDERED U.S. AIR FORCE FIGHTERS TO DRIVE AWAY THE CAMBODIAN GUNSHIPS THAT SEIZED THE UNARMED AMERICAN VESSEL ON MONDAY. MARINES RECAPTURED THE VESSEL WEDNESDAY, UNOCCUPIED BUT WITH FOOD STILL WARM IN THE GALLEY.

THE MARINES LANDED AT KOH TANG, A TINY ISLAND IN THE GULF OF THAILAND, IN THE FIRST STEP OF THE SWIFT RESCUE. SIXTY MILES AWAY, NAVY FIGHTERS SCREAMED OVER THE CAMBODIAN MAINLAND AND BOMBED AN AIRFIELD IN A FURTHER DISPLACE OF FORCE.

THE FIGHTING ON THE ISLAND WAS FIERCE AND CONTINUED INTO THE EARLY MORNING HOURS, WASHINGTON TIME. DEFENSE SECRETARY JAMES SCHLESINGER SAID AMERICAN TROOPS HAD BEEN KILLED, BUT REFUSED TO GIVE NUMBERS OR DETAILS.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, WASHINGTON TIME, A THAI FISHING BOAT CAME UP TO THE DESTROYER USS WILSON, WHITE FLAG FLYING. THE 40 AMERICANS WERE ABOARD.

THE MAYAGUEZ WAS TOWED OUT OF THE AREA. THE CREW REBOARDED AND FIRED ITS BOILERS, AND ITS HONG KONG-THAILAND VOYAGE RESUMED.

SCHLESINGER CALLED THE CAMBODIAN SEIZURE OF THE MAYAGUEZ "A HIJACKING," AND TOLD A PREDAWN NEWS CONFERENCE THE KHMER ROUGE HAD BUCKLED UNDER THE U.S. MILITARY MIGHT AND WERE FORCED TO RELEASE THE CAPTIVES.

FOR A FEW HOURS, AMERICAN TROOPS AGAIN FOUGHT IN INDOCHINA. FORD MUST, UNDER THE WAR POWERS ACT, EXPLAIN HIS DECISION TO CONGRESS, AND PREPARED LETTERS FOR DELIVERY TO THE HOMES OF CONGRESSIONAL LEADERS ABOUT DAWN TODAY. THE EARLY REACTION OF MANY LAWMAKERS WAS TO SUPPORT HIM.

THE WHITE HOUSE WAS PLEASED WITH THE LIGHTNING SUCCESS. SINCE THE COMMUNIST VICTORIES IN VIETNAM AND CAMBODIA, FORD AND SECRETARY OF STATE HENRY KISSINGER REPEATEDLY HAVE WARNED FOE AND BOLSTERED FRIEND THAT THE UNITED STATES WOULD STAND AND FIGHT WHEN NECESSARY.

FORD HIMSELF MADE THE ANNOUNCEMENT.

"I HAVE NOW RECEIVED INFORMATION THAT THE VESSEL HAS BEEN RECOVERED INTACT AND THAT THE ENTIRE CREW HAS BEEN RESCUED," HE SAID. "THE FORCES THAT HAVE SUCCESSFULLY ACCOMPLISHED THIS MISSION ARE STILL UNDER HOSTILE FIRE BUT ARE PREPARING TO DISENGAGE."

FOR THE FIRST TIME, CAMBODIA'S COMMUNIST GOVERNMENT MENTIONED THE SEIZURE WEDNESDAY AND CLAIMED THE SHIP WAS IN ITS TERRITORIAL WATERS. THE RADIO BROADCAST HINTED OF "ESPIONAGE OR PROVOCATIVE ACTIVITIES."

THE MAYAGUEZ WAS BOARDED MONDAY BY THE CREW OF A CAMBODIAN GUNSHIP ABOUT 60 MILES OFF THE COAST. THE OWNER, SEA-LAND CORP. OF MENLO PARK, N.J., SAID ONLY 30 OF THE 266 CONTAINERS IN THE SHIP'S CARGO HELD MILITARY SUPPLIES -- AND NONE OF THESE WERE WEAPONS, MUNITIONS, OR CLASSIFIED MATERIAL.

KISSINGER SAID DIPLOMATIC EFFORTS WOULD BE EXHAUSTED BEFORE TROOPS WERE SENT IN. REP. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, D-MASS., SAID CHINA HAD BEEN ASKED TO GIVE CAMBODIA A 24-HOUR ULTIMATUM. NO REPLY WAS RECEIVED, AND THE DEADLINE PASSED BEFORE DAWN IN THE GULF OF THAILAND, TUESDAY EVENING WASHINGTON TIME.

EIGHT CAMBODIAN GUNBOATS BEGAN LEAVING KOH TANG HEADED FOR THE CAMBODIAN PORT OF KOMPONG SOM. THEY WERE FIBERGLASS, ABOUT 30 FEET LONG -- LIKE SMALL OCEAN-GOING PLEASURE BOATS IN THE UNITED STATES -- AND ARMED WITH A SINGLE MORTAR OR MACHINE GUN.

THEY WERE STRAFED BY A7 AND F4 FIGHTER PLANES FROM U TAPAO AIR BASE IN THAILAND, EACH ONE ARMED WITH WEAPONS MORE SOPHISTICATED THAN THE BOATS. THREE VESSELS SUNK.

South Korea Bans Dissent, Curbs Travel

By Don Oberdorfer
Washington Post Foreign Service

TOKYO, May 13—South Korea's President Park Chung Hee issued a sweeping presidential edict today banning virtually all internal dissent on threat of prison terms of up to 15 years.

The new measure, one of series of off-again, on-again restrictions on domestic opposition over the past 16 months, also contains a ban on unauthorized departures of people and money from South Korea.

In a brief statement Park said he had issued today's lengthy decree "to consolidate national unity, coalesce national opinion and enable all people to prepare themselves thoroughly for an impregnable posture of national security" in the face of "a growing danger of miscalculation" by Communist North Korea.

To a large decree, public and political opinion recently had been coalescing behind government policy, following the fall of Indochina and the recent visit to Peking by North Korean President Kim Il Sung. Park's latest "emergency decree" runs the risk of refueling the opposition, even if its expression is suppressed for the time being by presidential power.

U.S. Said to Plan Cutback in Laos

From News Dispatches

VIENTIANE, May 13 — There were reports today that the U.S. embassy has decided to evacuate some Americans, as several more army units formerly aligned with the Laotian rightist faction pledged their loyalty to neutralist Premier Souvanna-Phouma and the Pathet Lao official named acting defense minister yesterday.

According to an authoritative source who told of the evacuation plan, the United States is also considering closing down American operations in some parts of Laos following the collapse of the rightist side in the tripartite coalition.

The source said it has not yet been determined how many of the approximately 820 American officials and their dependents in Laos would be sent out.

The source said those de-

U.S. weighs options on seized ship

By PETER J. KUMPA
Washington Bureau of The Sun

Washington—President Ford called the third meeting of the National Security Council in two days last night to consider options on how to recover the merchant ship Mayaguez, seized Monday by Cambodia and still held in the Gulf of Thailand 30 miles from the coast.

Henry A. Kissinger, Secretary of State, flew back from a Midwest speaking trip to attend the extraordinary top-level policy meeting, which also was attended by James R. Schlesinger, Secretary of Defense, and William E. Colby, director of the Central Intelligence Agency.

A White House spokesman denied reports that the ship had started moving during the day. "We have no information that the Mayaguez is moving," Ronald H. Nessen, presidential press secretary, said. He stated that it was still in the same place that it had been in the morning, near Koh Tang Island off the Cambodian coast.

American warplanes kept a constant watch on the ship and the fate of its crew remained a mystery. There was no hard information on whether the American crewmen had been taken off the ship or were still aboard as hostages. It was understood from informed sources that it was fear for their lives that delayed any quick naval action to recover the ship.

One U.S. Navy P-3 Orion reconnaissance plane dove through a heavy cloud cover early yesterday for a better view of the ship. It took one round of small-arms fire in the tail, but no one was injured. Other surveillance planes included jet fighters and Air

'Nothing we can do,' Teng says

Paris Bureau of The Sun

Paris—Chinese Deputy Premier Teng Hsiao-ping said yesterday that China could do nothing in the event of American military reaction to the Cambodian seizure of the U.S. merchant ship Mayaguez.

"If the United States intervenes, there is nothing we can do," said the 71-year-old leader, who is in France on a six-day official visit.

Mr. Teng, No. 3 in the Peking hierarchy and heir apparent to Premier Chou En-lai, told reporters that he was unaware of China's reported role as intermediary in diplomatic negotiations between America and Cambodia for the ship's release.

The Chinese deputy premier is here on a visit basically aimed at improving Chinese-European relations and foster-

Park noted in his announcement that some nations have expressed uneasiness or misgivings about U.S. defense commitments following the Indochina collapse. "However, our government continues to place trust and confidence in the U.S. commitment based on the Korea-U.S. mutual defense agreement, and will endeavor to further strengthen the traditional ties of close friendship and cooperation with the United States," he said.

There was no recognition in the statement of the possible adverse impact in the U.S. Congress or executive branch of the new moves to suppress internal opposition.

Park's statement called on North Korea to desist from what he called 'the daydream of communizing the whole of the Korean peninsula" and to move toward early resumption of the now-frozen North-South dialogue.

He warned that if North Korea launches another invasion, "We shall then take the occasion to eradicate their threats once and for all. I solemnly warn, therefore, that any reckless adventure by the North Korean Communists will only lead to their destruction."

The South Korean leader did not explain the basis for his unusually strong threat of retaliation against the North.

Park, who first took power in a 1961 military coup and was elected to three terms as president in popular balloting, seized nearly total control under martial law in October 1972.

As opposition to one-man rule began to grow, he issued "emergency decrees" against domestic dissent in January and April 1974. He repealed the decrees last August in the face of foreign and domestic criticism, and released most of the 200 political prisoners from their cells in February.

In effect, today's edict reinstates the previous ban on opposition to Park's rule and in some respects goes further than before.

Among other things, Emergency Measure No. 9 makes it a crime, punishable by prison terms of one to 15 years, to:

- Advocate or petition for revision or repeal of the martial-law constitution under which Park assumed unchecked power.
- Broadcast or publish any news report of any opposition to the martial-law constitution.
- Stage any student demonstration or assembly that "interferes" with politics.
- Move any Korean-owned property out of the country "with intent to perpetrate a property flight."
- Publicly oppose the new emergency edict, or report on any such opposition.

The new decree gives government ministers sweeping power to close down universities, broadcasting stations, newspapers or other enterprises, or dismiss any member of their staff or administration, in enforcing the strictures. No judicial review of such measures is permitted.

The decree also explicitly permits arrests, detention, search and seizure without warrant — all of which have been commonly practiced in recent years in South Korea.

Last year's decrees, one of which authorized the death penalty for dissent, prescribed trial by closed military court. The new decree calls for trial by civil court. No ground rules for the conduct of the trials were specified.

Force AC-130 gunships that have range and staying power.

Officially, the White House, the State Department and the Pentagon declined to say what military and diplomatic efforts were being made to recover the American merchant ship, which was seized by Cambodian gunboats while en route from Hong Kong to Sattahip in Thailand.

But, according to informed sources here, the People's Republic of China was being used to apply diplomatic pressure while a number of Navy warships led by the carrier USS Coral Sea headed for the scene and marines in Okinawa were placed on alert.

President Ford, who had labeled the seizure "an act of piracy" and demanded the immediate release of the Mayaguez, was awakened twice in the night for reports on the incident. Yesterday morning, he presided for nearly an hour over the second National Security Council meeting considering what steps to take on the captured vessel.

Whatever action the President may decide to take, he seemed to have strong backing in Congress, where demands for military action were growing. Emphasizing the word "if," Mr. Nessen said that if there were any decision for military steps, Mr. Ford would consult fully with Congress.

Senator Robert C. Byrd (D., W. Va.), assistant Senate majority leader, urged the President to set a 48-hour deadline for the release of the ship. If it were not met, he said, the United States should take "whatever action is necessary" for its return.

According to two legislators who had meetings with the President on other matters, Mr. Ford was acting coolly and deliberately in the crisis. Said Senator Jacob K. Javits (R., N.Y.): "My feeling is the President is determined the ship and crew must be returned [but] he's keeping his shirt on." Representative John B. Anderson (R., Ill.) also was convinced that Mr. Ford would consult with congressional leaders before leaving diplomatic channels to get the ship back.

Mr. Ford was awakened at 2.25 A.M. and again at 5.20 A.M. for reports on the incident. He also talked with Secretary Schlesinger at 7 A.M., with the White House declining to say what was discussed.

One report had the President ordering 150 marines to fly to Thailand in a show of strength while alerting another 1,000 marines on Okinawa. But informed sources explained that it was standard procedure to alert troops in such instances. The possibility of using marines from nearby Thailand may be moot, for in Bangkok, Prime Minister Kukrit Pramoj of Thailand said his country would not permit bases there to be used for military action against Cambodia.

Mr. Nessen refused to comment on the Thai position

Early yesterday, the White House reported that the Mayaguez was anchored close to the island of Koh Tang, about 30 miles from the port of Kompong Som, now renamed Sihanoukville, which is about 30 miles northeast of the point where it was seized by two Cambodian gunboats, about 8 miles from the rocky island of Paule Wai.

During the night, it had been escorted by the Cambodian vessels and had not gone to port as originally believed. There was no explanation for the stop, although a Pentagon spokesman said it was "apparently dead in the water."

From the last messages from the ship—given before the Cambodian boarding party reached the radio room—it is known that none of the crew of 39 had been injured during the takeover despite some gunfire.

Whether the crew had been moved off the vessel could not be determined. No spokesman here would even say whether any of the men had been sighted. There were, however, reports that more than two Cambodian vessels were in the area.

Late yesterday, there was a report that the ship had begun a slow movement. It was not headed away from the coast but it was not clear if it was headed for Sihanoukville. Later, informed sources said, the erratic movement had stopped.

American aircraft kept the ship under continuous surveillance, which was made difficult at times by the cloud cover.

There was no confirmation that the Cambodians had been reached through diplomatic channels. And there was noting but speculation on the motives in seizing the ship.

[In Washington, however, White House press secretary Ron Nessen said, "No evacuation has been ordered."]

With the action by 10 units today, some 13 military organizations in the Vientiane area have expressed support for the government following the resignation of four rightist Cabinet ministers and two key generals over the weekend.

The national radio broadcast a statement from the air force commander, Brig. Gen. Bouatha Phottivongsa, pledging support for the coalition and banning unauthorized movements of military aircraft. The grounding of planes and a prohibition against the movement of military equipment was decreed yesterday by the acting defense minister, Kham Ouane Boupha.

The staff of the Finance Ministry also expressed support for the coalition government today and demanded that Ngon Sananikone, a leading rightist politician who was one of the ministers who resigned, be replaced by the Pathet Lao deputy finance minister.

Three companies of cadets at the police academy took a stronger approach. After declaring their support for the coalition, they failed to do so by Thursday they would be considered to have abandoned their posts.

The Mayaguez Affair

THE NEW CAMBODIAN government's seizure of the American merchant ship Mayaguez poses an unwanted and difficult challenge to the Ford administration. Obviously, the United States must protect its citizens and their property from arbitrary acts by foreign states. Particularly at this moment of post-Vietnam uncertainty, the government is bound to be worrying about whether its will is still being taken seriously in the world. And yet the facts of this incident are still very few and dim. Certainly the basic prerequisites for the use of force—that the facts be known, that the Congress and the public be informed of the choices and risks, and that diplomatic alternatives be exhausted—have not yet been met.

What we do know is that an unarmed merchant ship under charter to the U.S. military, carrying supplies but apparently not weapons to U.S. military bases in Thailand, was intercepted in what Cambodia claims are its territorial waters eight miles from an island sitting 60 miles off the Cambodian coast in the Gulf of Siam. Whether this was an act of "piracy," as the administration at once claimed, is not clear to lawyers. In the absence of any explanation from the new, uncommunicative and intensely nationalistic government of Cambodia, one can only speculate on what its purposes were. To be tough and anti-American? To assert a territorial claim to an island also claimed by the Vietnamese? To take a chip for bargaining against the return of Cambodian property taken abroad by members of the former government? To protest the delivery of military supplies to American military installations on the territory of a neighboring state, Thailand, with which Cambodia has poor relations?

The United States has approached Peking for help in obtaining the release of the ship and its crew of 39. But there are no visible results as yet, and it is far from certain that China could do very much, even if it wanted to. Some approach to the United Nations Secretary General might also be appropriate. What would certainly not be appropriate, however, would be the policy recommended by Sen. James L. Buckley (Con.-R-N.Y.): "immediate punitive air and naval attacks." That he could toy so cavalierly with the lives of the 39 hostages, without having any way of knowing what actually had happened, and without considering what the targets or costs or risks of renewed bombing might be, suggests a truly astonishing inability to learn anything from Vietnam. The appeal by Sen. John Sparkman (D-Ala.) to retrieve the ship "any way we can" was only slightly less ill-considered.

The administration itself has threatened Cambodia with "the most serious consequences." It would have done much better first to build its case. As it was the administration last night found itself in the awkward if not untenable position of making plans to fly marines into American bases in Thailand, despite the Thai government's publicly stated refusal to permit use of those bases for military action against Cambodia. In fact, a more gratuitous display of American helplessness would be hard to conceive. The administration should not be raising the specter of force until it can supply the American people with convincing evidence of the rightness of its case as well as an explanation of why there is no effective alternative. American honor is being tested. But so, after Vietnam, is American common sense.

BALTIMORE SUN 14 MAY 1975

Dealing With Gunboat Diplomacy

The safe and speedy retrieval of the merchant ship Mayaguez with its crew and cargo should be the overriding concern of Washington in dealing with the incident. It was seized by boats from a Cambodia in the throes of transformation under a violent revolutionary regime that is consolidating control and spurning foreign contact. In the face of provocation by a little-known adversary, a great and self-confident power should move calmly and rationally. The first step before contemplating any action must be to find out why Cambodians did what they did, both through monitoring their broadcasts and through diplomatic lines in Peking. American bluster is unlikely to retrieve the Mayaguez, and precipitate violence might get the 39 seamen killed. Whatever a handful of marines can do, they cannot protect hostages in hostile custody.

There are some reasons to think the Mayaguez may have been seized as part of Cambodia's assertion of sovereignty over islands also claimed by South Vietnam and over waters in a 12-mile radius from them. This in turn would be part of an attempt to get economic control over a fair share of the Gulf of Thailand. Although Cambodia has a large coast, the boundaries with Vietnam and Thailand could be extended seaward in such a way as to deny it much seabed. The second session of the United Nations Third Law of the Sea Conference broke up in Geneva last week with the sea still in anarchy. There is no internationally respected way to resolve disputes over islets and over competing claims of mainlands and adjoining islands to continental shelfs.

The Mayaguez was at least the third vessel harassed by Cambodians in the same location this month. The waters are international under American doctrine but claimed by Cambodia since 1969. One puzzling aspect of the affair is why the owners of a merchant ship carrying military cargo allowed it to go so near a trouble spot involving a virulent government. The Gulf of Thailand is wide. A ship bound for Thailand need not go so near Cambodian-claimed islands.

If the assertion of territoriality was the motive, the Mayaguez is a pawn in a dispute not directed at the United States and its return should be easily managed. If another motive is involved, however, such as the acquisition of hostages for leverage in a dispute with the United States over something else, the incident could prove ugly and difficult. Dispatching marines to Thailand, where the United States already has considerable forces, only endangers Thailand's relations with the new Cambodia, and with this country. Clear communication between Washington and Phnom Penh is the first requisite and the only hope for the seamen now in Cambodian hands.

WALL STREET JOURNAL - 14 MAY 1975

Retrieving the Mayaguez

Coming as it did on top of the other reverses U.S. policy has suffered in Southeast Asia, the Khmer Rouge seizure of the U.S. ship Mayaguez is a kind of last straw. With the 40 American crewmen now being held by Cambodia, we are confronted with all the doubts and dilemmas that surround the terrorist and hijacking incidents we have already come to know too well.

No blanket laws can be laid down to deal with such situations; judgments must be made by responsible authorities in light of the particular circumstances of each incident. We do not yet know what the appropriate method will be in this incident, but in dealing with it President Ford will be the responsible authority, and he will need the broadest possible latitude. The least Congress can do is to make clear that he has the authority to use U.S. military forces if the occasion demands.

Naturally, the President's first step must be to make some intelligent appraisal of Khmer Rouge aims. Specifically, did the new Cambodian government make a misjudgment that can be resolved with diplomacy, or was this a deliberate provocation by an "outlaw" government, a declaration that the new Cambodian regime will not abide by the normal standards of international conduct?

The Mayaguez was some 60 miles from the Cambodian shore, but only eight miles from a small rock island claimed by both Cambodia and Vietnam. Possibly the Cambodians are merely interested in making a point about ownership of the island and their 12-mile limit. They recently had fired on a South Korean ship and stopped a Panamanian freighter in the same waters. If they are willing to release the Mayaguez and its crew, it would be well worth a U.S. pledge to give their rock a wider berth.

If, however, there is really a question of "piracy" on the high seas, as President Ford declared, it becomes a different issue. Given the behavior of the new Cambodian regime so far, there is every reason to suspect that the seizure is intended as an act of defiance of foreign nations in general and the U.S. in particular. If so, the next step is hard to predict. It could be the release of the Mayaguez crew, along the lines of the release of refugees from the French embassy in Phnom Penh. But something worse is also easy to imagine.

Congress has legislated against the use of American military power in Indochina and the Mayaguez incident points up the difficulties in such limitations on American power. White House counsel thinks the President can legally use force in this instance and Senator Case says the limitations do not preclude "police actions" (like the one in Korea in 1950?). Secretary Kissinger says the President has "certain inherent powers" to act. But the very ambiguities of present law are an inhibition to quick action.

Beyond that, there is the question of the next Mayaguez. One of the big questions about this incident is, since the Cambodians had already assaulted two other ships, where was the U.S. Navy? The Navy is now moving into the Gulf of Siam. If the Cambodians move against another U.S. merchantman, should the Navy stand by pending a congressional resolution?

Freedom of the seas, and more broadly freedom of Americans to travel and trade in the world, is one of the bedrocks of American foreign policy. We learned from the Barbary pirates that sometimes enforcing this right requires the use of force. We are now back to that simple bedrock, and are learning again that there is no withdrawal from the world.

CHICAGO TRIBUNE
14 MAY 1975

Cambodia turns to piracy

In a matter of a few days, the new government of Cambodia has shown its utter contempt for the principles of humanity and international law. First it uprooted millions of city people, including the aged, the wounded, and the ill—and herded them out into the countryside to toil in the fields. Now it has seized the United States merchant ship Mayaguez and its crew on the high seas. We seem to be witnessing the birth of a miniature monster.

The United States must secure the release of the ship and its 39 crewmen, most of whom are Americans. President Ford has denounced the seizure as an act of piracy, and Secretary Kissinger has called it unacceptable.

The diplomatic approaches being made to Cambodian leaders thru other governments are a correct first step. Cambodia, like an individual, is entitled to a chance to explain its behavior and correct it before any more damage is done.

But Mr. Ford quite rightly warned of serious consequences if Cambodia fails to return the ship and crew promptly—and promptly should mean hours, not weeks. Having issued this warning, he is preparing to carry it out. Naval vessels and Marines have been ordered into the area.

Liberals like Hubert Humphrey are right enough so far in warning that we should "stop, look, and listen" before using force. But if we know Mr. Humphrey, he will still be chattering on long after the crisis has turned to another humiliation like the one that lasted for a year after the Navy's Pueblo was seized by the North Koreans in 1968. That we cannot tolerate.

Another thing we must do right away is to stop playing coy about what the Mayaguez was carrying. If our cause is as just as it appears, the last thing we need is evasiveness. If the ship was carrying arms to Thailand, there is nothing improper about that. It was traveling in international waters and its seizure is plainly unacceptable. If unpunished, it will surely become the first in a series of intolerable harassments thruout Southeast Asia.

Flushed with their success in taking over Cambodia, the Khmer Rouge seem to be trying to taunt the United States, perhaps to prove that they can exact payment from us for our alleged transgressions against them. This is what was known in the days of Britain's might as "twisting the lion's tail." The British Empire never allowed the twisting to become intolerable. Neither can we allow Uncle Sam's beard to be this badly singed.

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER - 14 MAY 1975

Shooting is a last recourse

In a characteristic reaction to the seizure of a U. S. merchant vessel by a Cambodian gunboat, Sen. James Buckley demanded that the U. S. shoot first and ask questions later.

"A failure by the United States to react swiftly and clinically will only invite further outrages against the persons and property of American citizens," the New York Republican-Conservative declared. "I therefore urge the President to order immediate punitive air and naval attacks on appropriate targets in Cambodia."

That would assure the slaughter of a lot of Cambodians, but would it not also assure the slaughter of the 40-man crew of the Mayaguez?

The right course is to think first, and then perhaps we need not shoot at all. What happened, and why, in the Gulf of Siam are not at all clear, and the parallels with events in the Gulf of Tonkin 11 years ago are not so remote as to be brushed off entirely.

This is not to excuse what President Ford called "an act of piracy" by the new Cambodian regime, whose aims so far are as ambiguous as its behavior toward its own populace has been odious. Nor is it to rule out force in every and all circumstances.

Still, there is at least considerable room for doubt that the new Cambodian regime, having triumphed after years of war, is anxious to provoke a war with the U. S., and there is scarcely any room for doubt that a new round of hostilities in the Far East would not be in the American interest.

This nation's first recourse should be diplomacy, and its second and third recourse as well. That may not satisfy hawks like Sen. Buckley, but it is the best way of getting the results this nation wants.

To Halt Nuclear Spread

The threat of nuclear energy to mankind, recognized for three decades but still not adequately controlled, lies in its dual nature. Like fire, it can be used beneficially or destructively. No task confronting the United States, the Soviet Union and other advanced nations—which supply reactors, fissionable materials and other peaceful nuclear equipment to the rest of the world—is more important than heading off an accompanying spread of atomic weapons.

The energy crisis is stimulating interest in nuclear power the world around. In addition to 221 nuclear power plants operational or on order in the United States, there are now 274 power reactors operating or planned in 26 other countries. By 1980, they are expected to produce annually as a by-product more than 40,000 pounds of plutonium that, extracted from spent fuel rods, could provide enough weapons-grade fissionable material for more than 2,000 Hiroshima-size bombs.

The first line of defense against this horror is the 1970 nuclear non-proliferation treaty, which is now getting its first scheduled review at a month-long United Nations meeting in Geneva attended by most of its 91 parties, including the five Euratom countries which have just ratified—West Germany, Italy, Belgium, Holland and Luxembourg.

Efforts will be made to urge ratification by 17 other signatory countries, including Japan and Switzerland. But it is increasingly doubtful that some, such as Egypt and Turkey, any longer have that intention. And the nations which have refrained from signing include such potential weapons-states as India, Brazil, Argentina, Israel, Pakistan and South Africa.

Some treaty adherents are also suspected of nuclear weapons intentions. Iran is said to be seeking an American or French license to build a chemical reprocessing plant capable of extracting weapons-grade plutonium from spent fuel rods. So too, reportedly, is South Korea, feeling more insecure than ever in the wake of the United States withdrawal from and the subsequent collapse of South Vietnam.

This trend can be slowed and possibly halted only through concerted action by the supplier nations to withhold such critical equipment as reprocessing plants and to tighten safeguards over the sales of other nuclear materials to parties to the non-proliferation treaty and, even more so, to non-treaty countries.

No sales at all should be made to non-treaty countries that fail to accept these tighter international safeguards. The International Atomic Energy Agency might be given responsibility for conducting peaceful nuclear explosions for non-nuclear countries—but only if an I.A.E.A. study shows such explosions to be environmentally and economically feasible, something American experts increasingly doubt.

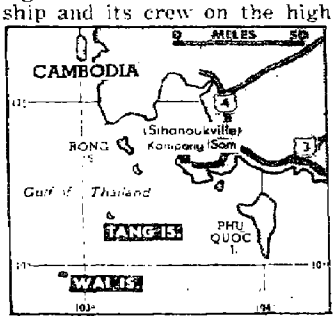
A BRAZEN ACT OF PIRACY

President Gerald Ford has reacted with commendable vigor to Cambodia's seizure of an American merchant ship and its crew on the high seas, an indefensible and open violation of international law.



The unarmed Mayaguez was boarded by the Red brigands as it sailed past the island of Poulo Wai, 55 miles from the Cambodian mainland. The vessel and its crew were later taken to another island — Koh Tang, 25 miles away.

The facts of the incident speak for themselves. They add up to naked, provocative banditry on the part of the new Communist rulers of Cambodia in defiance of rules all civilized nations have followed for the protection of peaceful ocean-going commerce for three centuries.

In the circumstances, Mr. Ford has shown forbearance in choosing diplomacy as the course of first resort in attempting to pry the Mayaguez and its crew from Communist clutches.

But we hope he has made it abundantly clear to Cambodia—directly or through intermediaries such as Red China—that neither he nor the American people will tolerate protracted palaver.

If the ship is not speedily released and sent on its way, Mr. Ford has indicated a readiness to act decisively and retake the Mayaguez by force, using whatever military measures are necessary to carry out the task.

He should not hesitate to do so. Any faltering on our part will further diminish respect for the U.S., and give every tin-pot tyrant in the world the idea that he can prey on American shipping with impunity.

The Men and the War

To the Editor:

I should like to make a partial reply to the April 7 Op-Ed article by Gloria Emerson, my experience in Vietnam being at least equal to hers and my knowledge of some of the individuals she assailed being hardly less. Loose libels, as Edmund Burke said, are to be passed by with silence and contempt. With that I agree, so long as it is an attack upon one's person. But when it is an envenomed and unsupported calumny of one's friends, that is a wholly different matter.

The late Creighton Abrams had been my personal friend since war days in Europe. Ambassadors Ellsworth Bunker and Sam Berger I came to know through personal contact in Vietnam. Others in the group hit by Miss Emerson are obviously in her view more birds of a feather.

But I speak first of Abrams. True, nothing ill was said of him, but his likeness was there conspicuously midway in the graphic gallery so arrayed as to strike the eye like a police line-up. The collective character was presented as if "from its horrid head sprang pestilence and war."

Abrams was a highly disciplined, self-contained professional. Few civilians got to know him very well, and certainly no female correspondent ever found the approach to his innerliness. I knew his character, his devotion to country, his concern for his fellow man, his passion for justice, his conviction that abuse of power was an evil beyond excuse.

Out of a few trivial episodes Miss Emerson faults Ambassador Bunker as a "man unmoved by life itself." He is somehow villainous because he liked to be with other Yale men and sing the Whiffenpoof song. Nothing said of Ambassador Bunker or implied of Sam Berger was to me in any degree recognizable. I rated them as sympathetic individuals, possessed of a large humanity, dedicated to duty amid tasks of utmost difficulty in posts where personal danger was a fact of life.

Miss Emerson wonders what these men now dream. There is no answer, so I will tell her what I dream. By extension, she would damn all of us who tried to serve our country in Vietnam. Now that the checkered flag is down and it's open season on those who tried among the losers, we need only wallow in this kind of garbage, and we'll make of the United States a land that nobody cares to serve.

Takeover in Laos

The Communists are on the verge of taking over power in Laos. The event, which has been pending for the last 20 years, is causing little stir in the world — or for that matter in Laos itself. So far, the collapse of the coalition government of Communists, neutralists and rightists and the quiet takeover of the key government posts by the Communists has proceeded with a merciful lack of violence. In the wake of Vietnam and Cambodia, it seems almost like the inevitable outcome in the last of the Indochinese states.

What has happened, apparently, is that the rightist members of the government — including the ministers of defense and finance — read the handwriting on the wall and resigned. They are expected to be replaced by their Communist deputies or else by less powerful non-Communist figures. Meanwhile, several thousand wealthy, upper-class Laotians have fled the country into Thailand, along with many Vietnamese and Chinese businessmen. And neutralist Premier Souvanna Phouma has warned that 'some important changes are about to occur" which will bring Laos into "an accord with history." Most observers in Laos expect the change to be gradual rather than violent, with Souvanna perhaps remaining for a time as a figurehead. So far, despite some hostile demonstrations, the American embassy in Vientiane is sitting tight.

The effort to set up a coalition government in Laos was perhaps unrealistic from the outset. The first was installed after an international conference on Laos held in Geneva in 1961; the latest dates from the cease-fire and peace accords of 1973. But even during the long years of bitter fighting between the royal Lao forces (including units of hill tribesmen organized and equipped by the Central Intelligence Agency) and the troops of the Communist Pathet Lao, Communist detachments remained in the capital, maintaining the fiction of a coalition. As long as the outcome of the war in South Vietnam and Cambodia remained in doubt, the arrangement had a certain logic. Now that logic must give way to the general Communist victory throughout Indochina.

Who cares? Everyone has long since forgotten that Laos was where it all began: that it was the threat of a Communist takeover in Laos in 1961 that brought the first serious American intervention in Indochina, at a time when the danger to Vietnam was still considered remote. That threat inspired John F. Kennedy to send a detachment of Marines to Thailand and call for a meeting of the SEATO powers in Bangkok, where the United States received the firm backing of Britain — and the less enthusiastic backing of France — to prevent the impending Communist grab. This, in turn, led to the Geneva conference and the Rube Goldberg coalition compromise which the Communists immediately proceeded to ignore.

But that, of course, was long ago, when a good many countries in addition to the United States were seriously alarmed about the prospect of Communist expansion in Asia and still believed they could prevent it. Today, no one is likely to worry very much about a Communist takeover in Laos, except the Laotians themselves and perhaps the Thais, who do not relish the idea of still another Communist-dominated country on their indefensible northeastern frontier. And even the Thais at this point are far more likely to accommodate than resist. Truly, much has changed in the course of the last 14 years.

Guest Editorial: ARMED FORCES JOURNAL - APRIL 1975 (14 MAY)

NOT MANY PEOPLE REALIZE IT, but the United States has been supporting a costly and inefficient civilian army for many years. This army is 40% larger than all our uniformed services combined, and it costs the taxpayers 50% more to maintain. In sharp contrast to our real Army, it is growing rapidly all the time. It does not protect our Nation's interests abroad, and it does not always respect our liberties at home. It is not answerable to the public for its actions. It has been known to be lazy and arrogant, and to show excessive concern for preserving its own power and importance.

The institution to which I refer is the Federal bureaucracy, which currently numbers more than 2.9 million employees and costs more than $35 billion a year, 11% of the total Federal budget. The interests of the Country demand that it be reformed, reduced, and brought under control.

I do not wish to impugn the integrity or ability of individual bureaucrats. Most of them, like most Americans, are patriotic, loyal and well-meaning. However, the system of which they are a part is so cumbersome and disorganized that a complete overhaul has long been desirable. The present economic crisis has made such an overhaul not just desirable but essential.

President Ford recently asked Congress to limit Federal employees to a 5% increase in pay this year, in order to help reduce the Federal deficit. I support this proposal. However, I feel the President should go further. The President should immediately institute a program to eliminate all Federal jobs, in every Department and Agnecy, that are redundant, unproductive, or unnecessary . . . .

The Federal government is not obliged to provide any individual with a job. It is obliged to provide the entire Country with economic stability. To do this, it must cut back the mammoth Federal budget, which has more than tripled in a little over a decade. Surely one of the best places to start is the $35 billion that goes annually to support the bureaucracy.

Neither will this policy mean a necessary decline in the quality of government service. Far from that, a reduction in manpower is likely to produce a corresponding increase in efficiency. This is what has happened in our Armed Services, whose personnel is now at the lowest level since the Korean War. The Defense Department has proven that, properly equipped, it can do the same job just as well with fewer people. Civilian departments can and must follow its example.

There is a further benefit to manpower reductions beyond the savings in wages and salaries. A monstrous bureaucracy like ours has a vested interest in keeping government spending high. Government spending is a bureaucrat's livelihood. The larger the appropriations for his department or agency, the greater his power and influence. As a result, Federal officials who oppose increased government expenditures are few and far between. Those who favor reducing expenditures are practically nonexistent. Clearly, government spending can never be cut unless the government itself is cut back first.

There are now almost 3-million members of our civilian army, serving in 11 executive departments, the executive office of the President, and 80 independent agencies. A nation of free men and women does not need that much supervision. What is more, the Country cannot afford that much supervision. ■☆■

Jack Anderson and Les Whitten

The swift collapse of South Vietnam badly surprised President Ford who was misled, according to White House sources, by the national intelligence estimates.

These estimates are supposed to provide the President with the best possible analysis of what is likely to happen.

He was assured, for example, that the South Vietnamese army should be able to hold off the advancing Communists for several months. Even after the Saigon defenses began to crack, the national intelligence estimate predicted that Hanoi would negotiate with Saigon and form a coalition government.

The beleaguered Central Intelligence Agency was the first, say our sources, to warn that a Communist victory was imminent. The CIA recommended that the United States use its leverage to persuade the Saigon leaders to form a "peace government," which could negotiate a truce.

This would have given the United States more time to arrange an orderly and dignified evacuation. The CIA was overruled, however, upon the advice of American Ambassador Graham Martin who called upon President Nguyen Van Thieu instead to form a war cabinet supposedly to stiffen the resistance.

Although the Joint Chiefs of Staff correctly predicted more than two years ago that President Thieu would not survive and that the Communists would win the final struggle for Vietnam, the Pentagon badly misjudged the South Vietnamese army's ability to hold the line.

The Pentagon estimate was that the South Vietnamese would battle the Communists to a standstill along the approaches to Saigon. The only exception was the Air Force intelligence chief, Maj. Gen. George Keegan, who warned that the defenses would collapse.

It was the Pentagon's assessment that the South Vietnamese infantry divisions on the line were as good as any American divisions. Then why did they buckle? From the secret cables, here is a thumbnail analysis

Why We Lost the War

Could we have won the war in Vietnam? Of course we could. Sen. Barry Goldwater and a few others are saying so but nobody is paying much attention to them and there is no good reason why anybody should. We had the power, as Gen. LeMay told us, to bomb North Vietnam back into the stone age.

Why didn't we do it? The answer usually given is that by doing it we would have risked Chinese intervention of the kind that forced us to settle for a divided Korea in our previous Asian war. But it was at least questionable whether China, preoccupied with its own cultural revolution and mindful of its historic antipathy to the Vietnamese, would have gone to the rescue of its Southern neighbor. The risk was nevertheless there.

Mr. Crawford is a former columnist for Newsweek.

A more compelling reason for our failure to win the war in the only way it could have been won was our unwillingness to accept responsibility for the degree of devastation and bloodshed this would have inflicted. Some call this squeamishness. Others call it a decent respect for the opinion of mankind. Squeamishness or respect for civilized standards—it amounts to the same thing differently stated and differently weighted.

Defeat in Vietnam has hurt us, worse probably than we are disposed to acknowledge. It has raised questions around the world about our dependability as defenders of our allies and even more of weak nations not our allies. It has cost us something in self-confidence. It has cast doubt on our competence to hold our own in a contest for advantage, if not survival, with authoritarian systems.

Even the limited war we fought sandpapered the sensibilities of many, perhaps in the end a majority of Americans. Just recently a respected columnist has referred to the "carpet bombing" of Hanoi. Had that been a carpet bombing there would now be no Hanoi to celebrate victory in its

It was not long after the Korean war ended in 1953 that the Vietnam war began heating up. The fall of Dien Bien Phu followed the Korean cease-fire by barely more than a year.

Now that Saigon has fallen and the Vietnam war is at an end, there is inevitable speculation about the outbreak of a second Korean war.

The United States is linked to South Korea by a formal treaty and by the presence of some 30,000 American troops south of the 38th Parallel. And yet, a recent national opinion survey sponsored by the Chicago Council on Foreign Relations found American voters overwhelmingly opposed to U.S. intervention, should North Korea again invade South Korean territory.

These simple facts suggest why, desirable at it may seem to many people, the United States cannot declare a moratorium on foreign policy debate. President Ford and most Democratic leaders have joined in pleas that the nation be spared an orgy of recriminations over "who lost Vietnam."

That is sentiment to which all may subscribe. But the President presumes too much when he goes on to assert that the debate is unneeded because everyone has "learned the lesson" of Vietnam.

Different people have learned very different lessons from Vietnam, and well-ordered streets. It was selective bombing of military targets that wasn't quite accurate enough to avoid some civilian structures, including a hospital, which became exhibit-A in the tours conducted for visiting Americans determined to be appalled by their country's barbarism.

Hanoi could have been razed as Dresden was in World War II. The Red River dikes could have been cracked to release flood waters. At one point the rumor that they had been attacked set off an outraged cry of protest in this country. Unquestionably American power, had it been fully employed after the Tet offensive or at some other opportune juncture, could have won the war against North Vietnam and left its indigenous Vietcong cadres in the South unsupplied.

The question is whether we would have been better off winning that way than we are losing as we did. Probably not. Why, then, did our leaders take us into a war destined to harm us whether we won or lost? Because they thought we could win using only limited military means. Thus the Green Berets in Kennedy's scheme of things to beat the invaders at their own guerrilla game. And thus Johnson's determination to escalate enough to meet the challenge posed by the Russian and Chinese arming of North Vietnam. They both miscalculated. So hindsight makes wise men of their surviving critics.

American statesmen who warned this country over the years against enmeshment in land wars on this Asian continent doubtless recognized that a Western army fighting an Oriental army would be handicapped by Western conscience. Attitudes toward the value of life are too different. Even in the war against Hitler certain standards of military conduct were maintained. Prisoners of war, for example, were reasonably well treated over all.

In North Vietnam prisoners were sadistically abused. Civilian populations in the South were systematically terrorized, not by impersonal bombing and shelling, which were bad enough on both sides, but by night marauders on the ground kidnapping and murdering thousands whose only offense was that they sympathized with the Communists' enemies. The Phoenix operation, an attempt to fight fire with fire, never burned with enough conscienceless vigor to accomplish its purpose.

We cringed at pictures of Vietcong and North Vietnamese prisoners being kicked around by their South Vietnamese captors and at exposes of tiger cages for Saigon's political prisoners. If our people on the scene tried to moderate the conduct of our Asian allies the attempt was not well enough publicized and in any case seems to have been largely unsuccessful. Rough stuff on the battlefield occurs in every war. Continued abuse after the battle is over is unforgivable. At least, our side opened its prisoner-of-war camps to Red Cross inspection; the other side never did and we never learned until their release how savage its treatment of our men had been.

We keep hearing that the Paris accords, which were to end the war with honor on both sides, were violated by North and South alike. This is to equate cannon balls with bird shot. It became apparent that the North Vietnamese and the Vietcong never had the slightest intention of abiding by the treaty's terms. The South's violations were minor by comparison, maybe because he South lacked the resources to violate them as much as it would have liked. Whatever the reason, the equal division of blame is a distortion of the evidence.

How we Americans will weather the defeat in Vietnam is not yet clear. The immediate signs are depressing. Resistance to the succor of refugees is indecent in a nation of immigrants and refugees. The number is so small that assimilation should be fairly painless even in a time of economic recession. Perhaps it is only a first spiteful reaction of a people unaccustomed to defeat. Hopefully it will change as we get used to the loss.

More troublesome for this country's future is the burgeoning of extreme pacifism. A wave of antiwar sentiment follows every war but it seems more than usually virulent this time for understandable reasons. If there is a sure way for the United States to lose its influence in this world it is to convince friend and foe that American public opinion will never again stand for use of military force in any circumstance.

Another phenomenon of this immediate post-war period is complaisant acceptance of communism as an unobjectionable alternative to democracy. We are invited to be ashamed of our anti-communism during the cold war. it was, we are told, irrational demonology. Anyway Stalin is dead, and detente is in force. What if all Asia follows the Vietnamese example? What if Western Europe is Finlandized? We will find out when and if these things happen that there was something not to regret in our cold-war attitude—and perhaps even something to regret in our failure to use our full power against North Vietnam.

until those conclusions are tested in debate, there can be no hope of agreement on a set of premises from which post-Vietnam policy can begin. Nothing makes that plainer than their differing views of the Korean situation.

Some have concluded from Vietnam that the United States should "never again" intervene on behalf of a regime which maintains power through repressive policies, which is marked by corruption and which commands only a dubious loyalty of its own subjects—even if that regime is attacked by a Communist government of no more savory character.

They argue that the U.S. treaty commitment to Korea shoud be abrogated and the American troops withdrawn as quickly as possible.

Others think the lesson of Vietnam is that the United States should never again be asked to fight a limited war on the mainland of Asia. They would support American intervention in Korea only if we were ready to go "all out for victory." Echoing the late Gen. Douglas MacArthur, they say there must be no "privileged sanctuaries" for the aggressor, or the United States should not fight again.

A third group concludes that the lesson of Vietnam is that we have been blinded by a fear of monolithic communism which has lost its relevance, if it ever had any. They argue that regimes like North Vietnam or North Korea, which maintain considerable autonomy, even as they derive support from both Peking and Moscow, are more worrisome to the Communist superstates than they should be to us.

Their view, of course, is that the United States should make it clear now that we no longer have a strong interest in who controls the Korean peninsula, and let the rival claimants settle their own quarrels.

A final group believes that a Communist Korea would put intolerable flank pressures on Japan, a linch-pin of the entire non-Communist economic and political world, and would force that country either to change its basic world orientation or to rearm—neither of which is desirable for American national interest.

From their perspective, the United States should make it clear in advance, not only to Pyongyang but to Moscow and Peking, that the United States cannot accept, and therefore will resist, a military move aimed at South Korea.

If detente is not to become a license to fish in troubled waters, they argue, the Communist giants must show their capacity for self-restraint. And if they do not, then let us disabuse ourselves of the myth of detente and reckon with the risks of the real cold war world.

All four of these views are held by people who firmly believe that they have properly assessed "the lesson of Vietnam." It is not too soon now for Congress and the President to open the debate on what that lesson really is. Tomorrow may be too late.

the central highlands last March. He concluded that his troops were spread too thin and ordered a strategic withdrawal.

But Thieu was indecisive. He would issue orders, than cancel them. He couldn't decide where to make a stand.

Finally the commander of the Second Military Region, after a meeting with Thieu, returned to his men and announced: "We're pulling out tonight."

They, not only abandoned their heavy equipment but left the First Military Region outflanked. What was supposed to be an orderly withdrawal, thereafter, turned into a pell-mell rush for the coast. Panic spread, with every man for himself, until the hasty retreat became a total rout.

What Kind of Dominoes?

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

By C. L. Sulzberger

PARIS—The only thing we know so far about the validity of a dominoes theory in Southeast Asia is that South Vietnam and Cambodia have been conquered by revolutionary armies and Laos is falling over the brink.

The incidence of guerrilla violence in Malaysia and Thailand has increased —but not drastically. North Korea seems preparing for another go at South Korea but that pertains to the domino game only in the broadest sense.

If some states—notably Malaysia, the Philippines and Thailand—are straightening out their relations with Peking, that is not astonishing. So is the United States. And, somewhat unexpectedly, an initial (perhaps temporary) result of the abrupt new look in Asia is a rise of Chinese influence, weakening Leonid Brezhnev's publicized hope to outflank southern China.

Saigon's Provisional Government has taken pains to insist it won't choose sides in the Sino-Russian quarrel. Since Saigon's sponsor, Hanoi, is believed more subject to Moscow's influence than Peking's, this assurance by Gen. Tran Van Tra seems inferentially friendlier to China.

Even Kim Il Sung, North Korea's redoubtable bullyboy, is advertising to everyone that among "evil spirits" his "ideological battle" hopes to eradicate is "feudal Confucianism." "Confucianism" is a dirty word in China, not Russia. This is significant because North Korea borders both.

The relatively tolerant appearance Saigon seeks to give the world may or may not endure. Logically it would seem improbable in view of the Indochinese dominance by Hanoi's disciplined spartan system which, after all, made the South Vietnam conquest possible.

As for Cambodia, it is very hard to judge its ideological future by its revolutionary present. The latter seems, by all accounts, to be the work of a kind of fanatical jacquerie whose early actions make Russian Bolshevism look conservative and make Chinese Maoism look like a ceremonial tea.

All one can say at this stage of the great dominoes game is that the United States has lost a great deal of influence but it is by no means certain that either Russia or China has gained much or even that Communism, as most people understand the word, will end up triumphant in the newly revolutionized areas.

Although it experienced certain unsuccessful heresies like Trotskyism, Marxism was considered a monolithic doctrine until Marshal Tito's Yugoslavia fought Stalin down on a combination of ideological and national issues. The crack Tito caused in the monolith was merely the first of many. Eventually the old Russian idea that Communism abroad could be used as an obedient servant of Kremlin dictates at home began to appear absurd.

Since Tito's rebellion, varieties of

Promises, Promises!

By James Reston

WASHINGTON, May 13—The United States isn't very good at handling defeat, probably because it hasn't had much practice. It has been excessively self-critical about the collapse of Vietnam and Cambodia, and now our officials seem obliged to go around reassuring everybody that Uncle Sam is a stout and dependable fellow after all.

Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew of Singapore came here the other day, after turning back shiploads of Vietnamese refugees who sought safe haven in his country, and lectured us on how to be a reliable ally and regain the confidence of Asia. Nevertheless, President Ford gave him a big splashy dinner at the White House, where the Prime Minister turned his toast into a stump speech, and then went on "Face the Nation" and implied that the United States had not only been unreliable but maybe even dishonorable in Southeast Asia.

Some of this sort of thing was probably unavoidable, but confusing the American record in Southeast Asia with the American record in the world over the past thirty years is a little silly, and if the world is in doubt about how the United States will react to any serious challenge to its vital interests, the postwar record is fairly clear.

Washington reacted to the Soviet threat to Berlin with the airlift; to the Soviet Sputnik challenge in outer space by going to the moon; to the disaster of the Cuban Bay of Pigs with the blockade of Khrushchev's Cuban missiles in the second Cuban crisis; to the Communist threat to Greece and Turkey with the Truman Doctrine; to the economic wreckage of Europe after the last World War with the Marshall Plan; to the Soviet pressure on Japan with a security pact and the most generous and imaginative economic and political settlement ever offered by a victorious nation to a defeated nation.

The revisionist historians are having a field day now, but in the postwar era, the United States has been at its best when confronted by serious trouble and at its worst when it was sweet-talked into dreams of a phony perpetual peace.

Moscow misjudged Dean Acheson's Pacific "defense perimeter" speech, which left Korea out of the protected area, but found an American Army in Korea soon after the North Koreans attacked the South, at the Soviet Union's urging.

The Russian threat to dispatch airborne divisions to the Middle East produced an immediate American worldwide alert and a compromise ceasefire—not a very good one—but the Moscow threat or bluff or whatever it was, got the usual stern American re-

Taiwan's Future

By George T. Chang

KEARNY, N.J.—President Ford is scheduled to visit China this fall. Undoubtedly the Taiwan issue will again be raised at the highest level, and a compromise might be worked out in the process of improving diplomatic relations between the United States and China.

The reaction of the majority of Taiwanese toward the rapprochement between the United States and China has been mixed. They welcome the emergence of new pragmatic policy on both sides. But on the other hand, they resent that the right and existence of 16 million Taiwanese have been totally ignored.

Strong desire prevails among the Taiwanese to have a decisive say about their political future. In view of the current conditions outside and inside Taiwan, one may conceive no circumstances under which the application of the principle of self-determination of people is more pertinent and urgent.

To deny 16 million literate citizens the right to decide their own political future as well as their own form of government is to violate every principle of contemporary law and politics.

Given a free and honest referendum today on Taiwan, the overwhelming majority of the people of Taiwan would choose to establish a democratic and independent state of Taiwan, both in fact and in law.

Despite uncertainty about the possible impact of the Presidential trip on future United States-China relations, one of the trip's outcomes is certain and predictable. The trip will constitute another serious blow to the present regime in Taipei.

Full diplomatic recognition of China by the United States, if reafized, would mean, among other things, complete diplomatic isolation of the Nationalist regime.

This international isolation, coupled with the deteriorating internal economic situation, would push the regime to the brink of collapse. To prevent internal turmoil or even bloodshed, the regime must immediately take the following measures as the first steps toward a more revolutionary change of its structure and character.

First, announce Taiwan as a new political entity, thereby severing de jure and de facto its linkage with past Chinese internal conflicts and

MCGOVERN SEES U.S. SEEKING UP TO 5000 CRUISE MISSILES. Sen. George McGovern (D-S. D.), in seeking a ban on U. S. cruise missiles (Defense/Space Daily, April 30), said that the Navy could seek to deploy as many as 2000 cruise missiles and the Air Force, between 2000 and 3000.

He asserted that Congress should first consider a prohibition against "any new long-range cruise missile of any kind." He said a "lesser, but still meaningful prohibition," would be to allow the more verifiable air-launched long-range cruise missiles, on the condition that all above a certain range cutoff point would be counted against the 2400 delivery vehicle ceiling set at Vladivostok, but to ban any sea-based long-range cruise missiles.

He said the cutoff point above which sea-based cruise missiles would be banned and air-launched cruise missiles counted could be 100 kilometers, or roughly the range of the Harpoon anti-ship missile.

Noting that the Administration indicated at Vladivostok that air-launched missiles with a range above 600 kilometers should be counted under the 2400 vehicle ceiling, McGovern pointed out that a cruise missile with a nominal range of 600 kms "could be altered to go over 2000 kilometers, or perhaps more."

proclaiming its intent to live in peace with all neighboring countries, including China.

The majority of the Taiwanese believe that China's vow to "liberate" Taiwan is motivated by the fact that the Nationalists remain a party to the Chinese civil war, continue to claim the title of "Government of China," and adopt "recovery of the Chinese mainland" as a national policy.

The Taiwanese also believe once the provocation is removed and a more representative government expresses its nonhostile intention, the tension in the area will be greatly diffused, paving the way to create a more favorable atmosphere in which a peaceful coexistence could be worked out between the people of Taiwan and China.

Second, end the quarter-century-long martial law. The so-called Chinese civil war has long dwindled down to a verbal war without significant military action on either side.

The indefinite state of siege maintained by the Nationalists on Taiwan has long lost its justification. It now serves only as a cynical device for the rulers to suspend indefinitely civil liberty and suppress political opposition. Return to democratic normality of political life is a prerequisite for a socio-political change essential to the island's stability.

Third, release all political prisoners, thereby providing a basis for genuine collaboration with opposition forces. Taiwan has been politically the most repressive area in the world. Many intellectuals and youths are being tortured and are languishing in military prisons.

Fourth, conduct general and free elections, thereby creating an open environment for a peaceful transfer of political power.

These measures must be taken urgently within Taiwan. Washington and Peking, too, must realize that unless and until the right of self-determination of the 16 million people of Taiwan is fully recognized by all parties concerned there will be no peace in the region.

George T. Chang is the president of World United Formosans for Independence.

sponse.

In short, whenever the United States has seemed to be wavering and the Soviet Union has probed and tested America's will and its strengths, the United States reaction has been clear and swift.

In fact, if there is a danger in the present mood of disappointment and failure in Southeast Asia, it is not that the United States will fail to react in the future but that, if pushed on the assumption of American weakness, that it will overreact, as President Kennedy did in Vietnam after his humiliating blunders at the Bay of Pigs.

The threat to the United States in the last decade was not primarily a military or strategic threat, unbalancing the power of the world, as the Pentagon insisted, but a philosophical and economic threat, dividing the American people and unbalancing their trust in one another and the dependability of their institutions at home.

To allow these divisions to go on, after the loss of 56,000 lives and over $150 billion in aid would really have raised serious and justifiable doubts about the judgment and reliability of the United States as the principal defender of Western civilization.

The allies of this hemisphere, in Europe, and in Japan and the rest of Asia will know they are in serious trouble and will know they are insecure when America is diverted from its primary interests by secondary considerations, and weakened by unemployment, inflation and mistrust.

Meanwhile, verbal assurances by President Ford and Secretary Kissinger that America is a faithful ally are not likely to do much good, and in any event, will not impress either our allies or our adversaries. If they have not learned how America reacts to adversity after Berlin, the Middle East, Cuba, and the Marshall Plan, they probably won't be impressed by Mr. Ford's apologies or Mr. Kissinger's promises.

The truth is that a united America, out of Southeast Asia, is stronger and more reliable than a divided America fighting for dubious goals around Saigon. And if the allies don't see that after the record of the last thirty years, no amount of rhetoric out of this city is likely to convince them.

Communism quite independent of Moscow appeared in China, Albania, Rumania and also infected other parties out of power such as Italy's. Indeed, a revolt within a revolt occurred in Yugoslavia itself when Milovan Djilas, once Tito's Number Two, struck out at what he considered stifling bureaucracy.

Djilas spent years in jail as a consequence of his dissent and is still refused permission to travel or to print his writings. He discusses some philosophical aspects of what we now see in Asia in an anthology called "Parts of a Lifetime," just published by Harcourt Brace Jovanovich.

In a piece called "Bureaucratic Nationalism," previously unpublished but written less than four years ago, he says: "Communism is an ideology, that is, a complete, closed doctrine. It is impossible to remove one pillar without shaking the other pillars and the entire structure. . . . We are witnessing the birth of a very specific kind of pluralism: the pluralism of nontolerant, nondemocratic nationalisms."

He wrote in 1954 (hitherto unpublished): "What the term Marxism means today has no more connection with the real Marx and his theory than does the contemporary Church with the Bible." In November, 1971, he added:

"Communism is Communism only if it is realized; that is, if it struggles for power—its real and realizable goal. And power can be conquered and maintained only on real, national grounds. Exactly because of that . . . Communism must split apart and come into conflict on national grounds. . . .

"The contemporary world, which is becoming united through diversity and where each day science and art reveal anew the indefinable complexity of nature, society and man, will complete the decomposition of ideology, at least as we know it. This is the dramatic fate that awaits Communism, which was once the most scientific ideology, the ideal ideology, the sole world ideology."

Admiral Moorer Looks Back at Vietnam

'The Ending Is Sad and Unfortunate'

THIS article is excerpted from an interview conducted by The National Public Affairs Center for Television last week. Adm. Thomas H. Moorer, a veteran of 41 years in the Navy, was chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in the crucial Vietnam years 1970-1974; before that he was chief of naval operations. The interviewer was Henry Trewhitt, Washington correspondent for the Baltimore Sun.

Admiral, you just retired recently as the nation's foremost military commander and you're now free to speak as you wish, without the discretion that's required of a sailor on active duty. I'd like to look back at Vietnam.

We've just ambiguously lost our first war, and I wonder what you would say to the parents of the 40 some thousand American boys who died in that war. Did they die in vain?

No, not in my opinion, because we did, I think, do quite a bit in Southeast Asia to stabilize the area at the time. We indicated that we were willing to make such sacrifices of blood and treasure to support what we considered to be right.

I also think as a side issue, for instance, that there are other areas in Southeast Asia, such as Indonesia for instance, that wouldn't be in the stable condition they are today if the United States had not been willing to go into Vietnam.

On the other hand, of couse, I think that the ending is sad and unfortunate, and to me in particular, who spent about 10 years of what I consider to be my most mature and productive years, struggling with this thing, to see the little Communists driving tanks supplied by the Soviets and at the same time using rifles supplied by the Chinese in an area which at one time was occupied by U.S. forces, doesn't leave me very happy, I can tell you.

Admiral, that really leads us directly almost to the "domino theory," which was first articulated I guess by the late President Eisenhower in 1954, and what he said in effect was that the countries in Southeast Asia would follow in sequence and there would be strategic consequences throughout the area, and I think probably by implication, the globe, if the United States allowed Vietnam to fall to communism. Do you see the domino theory at work now? Has it proved out?

Yes, I think that in one sense it certainly has, and, of course, we don't know yet just what will happen. But I think there's clear indication, both in the Pacific, and for that matter in Europe, that nations do not have the confidence in our country that they have had in the past.

Furthermore, looking to the future, I think that the acquisition of all of Indochina will permit the Communists to use such things as the great rice resources to bring pressure to bear on other nations in that area, and, of course, you've already seen indications from the Philippines—today there was quite a bit of talk about withdrawing from Thailand, and world-wide, I think, you will see that the so-called uncommitted nations might have second thoughts, or at least more thoughts, about supporting the U.S. position than they have had in the past.

Let's review just briefly what's happened to the so-called dominoes. Now we have South Vietnam under Communist rule, Cambodia also under Communist rule, Laos is in a formally neutralist position, but certainly dominated by Communist forces, and the Thais are in the process of asking the United States to leave.

You mentioned Indonesia; I suppose there have been no direct consequences there, as far as I know, and the Philippines are talking about our leaving. Now do you see this as a hegemony sort of movement forward of communism, or is it really a matter of individual Communist parties at work here, and do we expect to see a unified Communist front in this area?

Well, I think, of course, each individual group has its own local objectives, but on balance, it is true that the Soviets and Chinese assisted the North Vietnamese. In other words, their interest they considered to be in confluence with those of North Vietnam.

I don't look at the domino theory as if we're going to have a situation that just goes click, click, click, like that. But it's the gradual erosion of the things that have made our country prosperous and strong that concerns me.

I don't think that this is going to happen overnight, but I think it weakens us, and of course many Americans understandably say, well, what in the world interests us in Southeast Asia? What does that have to do with my daily life? Well, it has quite a bit.

For instance, if one visits the Malacca Strait, he will see what's taking place down there in terms of commerce, and things of this kind. So our standard of living, our trade, our economic and political influence, all are certainly affected by the situation that's just developed.

Admiral, everything we've said leaves a fairly bleak outlook for Southeast Asia, taken in isolation [sic], and yet you said you didn't believe that those American forces had died in vain there. What do you think the United States accomplished in that 15-year enterprise?

Well, of course, as I said, we certainly didn't accomplish what I thought at the outset that we were going to accomplish. But at the same time, I think that looking back on the conditions that prevailed at the time that the commitment was made, it would have. . . .

. . . What are those, in your judgment, that determined the commitment?

At that time, of course, we were dedicated to blocking aggression in any part of the world that [it] happened to be taking place.

I see two anachronisms in the points you have made, Admiral, and I wonder if you would agree with them. One, with regard to public support of the war. Didn't the United States undergo that experience earlier in Korea when public support definitely, or the absence of public support really, definitely became a factor in the terms under which we ended the Korean War, and it certainly was a factor in which the French ended the first Indochina war, and doesn't the experience of the French indicate that United States political leaders and strategic planners should have taken into account the French experience more than they did?

Yes, I think so, but I think perhaps the thing that deterred them from really accepting that entire line of thought was that of course we felt that, you know, and quite probably, that we could do anything, and we could have done anything if we, in my view, had have brought that war to a close.

I think that quite a bit of the restraint that was placed on our military people was caused by the concern about what the Soviets and the Chinese were going to do. But, I don't think that they ever had any intention of involving themselves in Vietnam.

Let me come specifically to that point of what the United States should have done militarily in South Vietnam, not politically, but militarily, to bring that war to a successful conclusion. . . .

Well, I think that in the first case, the troops should have been landed in North Vietnam. They should have been landed in the Vinh area perhaps, or in an area where we could have had forces north of those passes that feed down into the Ho Chi Minh Trail. That's one thing.

I certainly think that Haiphong Harbor should have been mined at the very outset. Everyone was wringing their hands as to what the Russians would do if we mined Haiphong Harbor. Seven years later we mined it, they didn't do a thing, and they never would have done anything, in my view.

And then we should have put the pressure on the area of Hanoi, Haiphong, etc., and brought the thing to a close. I think that, we had the power, we had almost unlimited power. Now, we did all these things. We went into Cambodia in 1970, we went into Laos in 1971, we mined Haiphong in May of '72, and we bombed Hanoi in December of '72. All I'm saying is we should have done all those the same day.

Admiral, what about tactics on the ground. We had an air-mobile concept—the use of ground forces transported by helicopters with high mobility, with high flexibility. Did that work, in the short-term sense?

I think it worked, but I also think that you've got to remember that again, that the North Vietnamese were a highly disciplined army that had been fighting for years, that they were not too concerned about casualties. They did not have an identification problem. They didn't care certainly about killing the South Vietnamese. And they were in the jungle warfare context.

And consequently, it always takes far more forces to defend civilized areas than it does to attack from the outside. And that again comes back to my point about invading North Vietnam—we should have reversed it so they had the problem of defending the cities instead of having to defend the cities down south.

Admiral, let's come back to that December 1972 period in the bombing—the so-called Christmas bombing of Hanoi. Do you regard the Paris peace accords that were reached as a result of that

'Never again' is not enough

Roscoe Drummond

Washington

The response of most Americans to the tragedy and cost of the Vietnam war is: "Never again."

But "never again" is not a sure guide to the future. It is not a policy, it is a hope.

The danger of "never again" is that the exact set of circumstances which drew us into Vietnam will not likely occur again. The need is to develop some settled and acceptable guidelines so that when another crisis confronts us we will be in a better position to stop, look, and listen before acting too quickly.

The premise of a very large part of America's role was well expounded by President Nixon before the fate of South Vietnam was visible. This was what the President termed the Guam doctrine.

Its essential thrust was this: While the U.S. should reduce its military presence in some parts of the world and must avoid any rash commitment of combat troops, it should provide material assistance to nations which show a resolve to defend themselves against outside aggression.

But there are caveats to such a policy. Are we going to aid nations indiscriminately whenever their frontiers are violated? Shouldn't the U.S. avoid open-ended commitments? Should we refuse to help countries whose governments are quite repressive and less democratic than our own?

All fair questions. Everyone will not give the same answers to them, but their validity seems to me to make it desirable that the President and Congress agree on basic guidelines in order to profit from the lessons of Vietnam. I would say that, at the very least, the guidelines ought to embrace four main reservations.

The U.S. should aid an aggressed nation only:

1. When there can be no appreciable doubt that the American interest is deeply involved.

2. When a recipient country shows persuasive evidence it will use such aid to good advantage.

3. When Congress is given the opportunity by the President to approve such action — and does approve it.

One of the most crucial of all the lessons to be learned from Vietnam is that we must never again allow any doubt to exist that when the government of the United States makes a promise, explicit or moral, it will fulfill that promise. The only way this can be assuredly avoided is when both the President and Congress are united in approval.

Otherwise, after Vietnam, it will not be a credible promise. America's word must be totally trustworthy. This is the way to make sure we do not repeat one of the great mistakes in Vietnam. That mistake came when in the peace agreement, the President made a moral commitment to continue aid without knowing whether Congress was willing to carry it out.

4. There is a further caveat and it deals with a matter which many of the critics of Vietnam view with the greatest concern. They ask: Why help any country where civil rights and individual freedom are under attack by the regime we are proposing to assist? These issues are not black and white. They are relative.

My answer would be that the U.S. should provide material assistance to a nation defending itself against outside aggression only when the prospect of achieving government by the governed will be enhanced by its successful defense.

The Kremlin eyes Europe

By Eric Bourne

Vienna

The Warsaw Pact — Russia's answer to NATO — completes its 20-year term this week and will be renewed automatically for a further 10 years.

Within a few months its seven members will meet with the NATO powers (the United States and Canada included) and the European neutrals in an East-West, all-European conference on security and cooperation.

A Soviet proposal for such a conference, tied originally to the "neutralization" of Germany, is older than the Warsaw treaty itself and has been the present Kremlin leadership's principal political goal in Europe since the mid-1960s. It might have come earlier but for Russia's use of force through the pact to crush the Czechoslovak reform movement in 1968. As it was, the West made the Kremlin wait another four years before agreeing to begin its preparation.

Now, in the new atmosphere of detente, it looks to be "in the bag" and this, together with the fact that the Russians are not prolonging their "NATO," prompts questions of what line Soviet policy for Europe may adopt after such a conference.

The Russians created their Warsaw Pact in May, 1955, as a response to Western European Union and NATO's enlargement by the admission of a rearmed West Germany. Like the North Atlantic treaty, it stipulated that an attack on one member would be an attack upon all and it was described as a defensive alliance of nations facing "the common danger" of a possible "rebirth of militarism" in West Germany.

This was the constant target over the years, until it was silenced first by the Soviet-West German nonaggression treaty and later by general European detente (though, in their current negotiations with NATO on force reductions in Central Europe, the Russians still harp most on West Germany's military potential).

The Warsaw Pact, however, provided also a very convenient new basis for keeping Soviet troops in Eastern Europe, over 10 years after the war had ended. And, although these were withdrawn in 1958 from Romania, the only East-bloc state without a border "open" to noncommunist Europe, they were retained elsewhere in the area as a sure means of control in an uncertain period when national self-interest had begun to make itself felt, as in Poland and Hungary.

Both the "domestic" raison d'etre for keeping the pact going and its value as an instrument of foreign policy opposed to NATO remain. But a new European situation will apply after the security conference is an accomplished fact, and the Warsaw treaty itself gives one clue to what may become the bloc's new political thrust for the future.

One of its concluding articles says that if and when a system of collective security comes about on the basis of a general European treaty, the Warsaw Pact "shall cease to be operative" the day that treaty enters into force. (The simultaneous dismantling of NATO, of course, is implicit.)

The 35-nation European conference is not concerned with such a treaty. But the declaration expected to emerge from the final "summit" will undoubtedly be interpreted and exploited by the Russians as a kind of "peace and security treaty by proxy," confirming inter alia the status quo for Germany and Europe.

It has taken the Russians 20 years to get the security conference. They doubtless reckon that now a treaty on collective security might not take so long. In any event, it will probably be much heard of in the next ten years of the Warsaw Pact.

bombing as just simply a matter of capitulation on the part of the United States?

No, I don't think so at all. I wouldn't call it capitulation. I think that it was quite clear that the bombing in Christmas of '72 had a significant effect on the North Vietnamese, and it appeared at that time as long as they were faced with that possibility in the future, that they would in fact comply with whatever agreement they happened to make.

As you recall, they were very much readied to get back to Paris and talk about these terms. Because I think they were visibly shaken. They ran out of missiles, and if we had have really wanted to at that time, or taken the action against them, they would have been in a very, very serious position. So in nine days they were ready to go back.

As you recall, we had stopped the bombing back in the early fall, and there had been a lull there for a while, and they had been very difficult with respect to agreeing to any kind of final cease-fire. And I think this made "Christiens" out of them, if such a thing can be done in Hanoi, and consequently it was thought, I believe, by people in this country as well as in South Vietnam, that so long as they had the threat of a repetition of this kind of action, which in my view should have been taken years ago, they would in fact comply.

I think your remarks imply that you do not agree with the argument with some in this country that the Christmas bombing of Hanoi was undertaken as much to convince the South Vietnamese to sign those accords as the North Vietnamese then.

That was absolutely ridiculous, in my view. I think that one of the things that's missing in all these discussions is the grave concern so many of us had about the POWs, and I'll go to my dying grave and I'll never understand why the American people were willing to tolerate this medieval torture year after year and not get aroused over it.

And President Nixon was very much concerned about the welfare of these POWs. And I think one of the greatest satisfactions he got out of his term of office was having an opportunity to welcome these boys home.

And I think that if we had not bombed as we did in December of '72, that the POWs would still be in Hanoi.

Admiral, you mentioned earlier, the North Vietnamese concern for repetition of the Christmas bombing, in other words a respect for strategic bombing. . . .

. . .That was the first time they really got the treatment they should have had several years before.

Former NATO Chief Defends U.S.-European Ties

By KINGSBURY SMITH
Hearst Headline Service

ROME, May 14 — Europe is "terrified" by America's setbacks in Vietnam and by its own inability to control events in Portugal, Cyprus and the Middle East.

With the threat of Soviet military and political power increasing, the Atlantic Alliance and NATO are more vitally important than ever.

The Atlantic Alliance remains the bulwark of Western Civilization. If America abandons it, the United States will become a second-rate power; freedom — and probably peace — will be lost.

These are the views of one of Europe's outstanding statesmen, Manlio Brosio, former Secretary General of NATO and now a member of the Italian Senate.

In a written response to questions submitted to him in connection with President Ford's forthcoming visit to Europe, Senator Brosio warned that the free world cannot win the struggle to preserve Western Civilization, "nor save peace," if "we do not believe any more in the issues at stake."

Not long ago one of America's leading commentators wrote that the European allies would not be unduly alarmed by the defeat of American policy in Vietnam. Others have asserted that America's abandonment of Vietnam would be welcomed by its European allies.

The statements of Senator Brosio, one of the most respected political personalities in Europe, would seem to indicate that some American commentators have strange sources of information.

Following are the questions submitted to senator Brosio and his answers:

Q—To what extent do you feel the credibility of America's commitments to the European allies have been affected by recent events in Vietnam, by the attitude of Congress toward that problem, and by the public opinion poll indicating a majority of the American people would be opposed to the use of American troops to fight in defense of West Berlin, or even Western Europe?

A—No doubt European people, not only conservative ones, but also moderate, enlightened democrats and democratic socialists are today astonished and terrified by the setbacks of the United States in Vietnam, and its inability to control situations in Portugal, Cyprus and the Middle East.

They are also puzzled by the attitude of Congress and by certain trends in American public opinion. The prestige of the United States in Europe has lowered, due also to an excess of previous confidence, and of blind, lazy reliance on United States decisive might (military and diplomatic).

Q—What could the United States do to help restore confidence in the credibility of its commitments to the NATO allies?

A—To restore confidence, the United States should, first of all, demonstrate its continuing interest in the Atlantic Alliance, not only by words, but mainly by deeds, doing everything possible in the Atlantic Council and at NATO headquarters, to show its presence, its authority and its resolve.

The activity and the determination of the U.S. government are the decisive elements: Congress and public opinion are

'Smart' Nuclear Warheads

FRANK VAN DER LINDEN

WASHINGTON — Sen. Thomas J. McIntrye has aimed a low blow at Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger by accusing him of promoting "nuclear warfighting doctrines which could lead to a terrifying new strategic arms race."

The New Hampshire Senator also assailed a fellow Democrat, Sen. Henry Jackson of Washington, who is also a leading aspirant for the presidency, for endorsing Schlesinger's proposals to improve this country's long-range nuclear missiles.

McIntrye said Schlesinger and Jackson "would not only dramatically increase the accuracy and yield of our current Minuteman missiles," but would also develop a new "terminally guided MARV" which would enable the warheads to change their course in flight and strike enemy targets with "virtually perfect accuracy."

"YOU'VE HEARD of "smart" bombs," McIntrye told a New Hampshire audience when he broke the news of the "MARV." "Well, this would be a 'smart' warhead."

The average American would be delighted for his country to have an improved reentry vehicle such as "MARV" if it would help to deter the Soviet Union from starting a nuclear war. McIntrye quoted a friend of his as saying, "When we go squirrel hunting back home we want to have the most accurate rifle we can get."

But the New Hampshire Senator isn't at all happy over the prospect of moving ahead of the Russians in missile technology. Quite the contrary. He charged that the Schlesinger-Jackson program would "actually dimish our national security by putting a hair trigger on nuclear war."

McINTRYE, WHO is chairman of the Senate Armed Services Subcommittee on Research and Development, arrived at his odd conclusion by following Alice-in-Wonderland logic. He reasoned that the Russians agreed to the "SALT" arms control deals of Moscow and Vladivostok only because of the central premise of "mutual vulnerability."

Translated into plain language, that means that neither of the two superpowers could be sure of knocking out the other's missiles without suffering a devastating counter-blow by the surviving weaponry. Thus, each is deterred from making an attack, and there is no war.

McIntrye and like-minded men fear that, if the United States Minuteman missiles could be equipped with a "MARV" that could kill the Soviet missiles with pin-point accuracy, the Russians would strike us first. Thus, their reasoning goes, improved U.S. weapons would "destabilize" the arms balance.

BUT SCHLESINGER recently assured the Armed Services Committee: "We are not interested in developing a disarming first-strike capability against the Soviet Union, and improvements in the Minutemen III force should in no way be construed as such.

"How far we go with our counterforce options, such as terminally guided MARV, and hard target capability in a new ICBM MX and the Trident II submarine missile, will depend upon the pace and extent of the Soviet counterforce developments.

The Secretary told McIntrye that the "MARV" is an "iffy" program, "there is no intention of deploying it at the present time" and final tests are "years in the future."

Despite these assurances, the Senator accused Schlesinger and Jackson of promoting "a terrifying new strategic arms race."

If there is to be such an arms race, the Russians will start it by developing their own larger nuclear missiles.

U.S. Should Reassess Strategy

In ancient times it was customary to execute the messenger who brought bad tidings. A century ago a Kansas weatherman was almost lynched when the tornado he predicted levelled a town.

Today we are seeing a revised version of this scenario: those of us who have emphasized the disastrous impact on America's world-standing of our walk-out in Southeast Asia are being blamed as the dominoes (yes, dominoes) fall.

Don't misunderstand me. I am not going to fight city hall: the American people have consciously or unconsciously decided against being a "Great Power." This does not for a minute mean that we are prostrate and helpless; it simply signals our unwillingness to play a major role on the world stage.

Moscow, for example, had no great intrinsic stake in Vietnam — the Indochinese contribution to the Soviet gross national product or to Russian security was nil, but the Politburo poured military assistance down the Vietnamese "rat hole."

Why? Because they correctly saw the outcome in Vietnam as a test of their will to be a "Great Power." And the message has gone out: Moscow doesn't let its allies down.

Symbolically, Vietnam has been their revenge for the 1962 Cuban missile crisis when, as Dean Rusk said, "We were eyeball to eyeball, and they blinked first."

Obviously I am profoundly unhappy about this national decision to go fishing, but on the practical level what worries me even more is that the President and the National Security Council may decide to demonstrate to the world that we have not lost our "machismo."

After the failure of the Bay of Pigs, enormous pressure was brought on President Kennedy to "do something." I visited the White House about two days after Castro had rounded up the last of the expeditionary force and everyone I talked with seemed to feel a need to demonstrate that we were not, as one put it, "a crippled giant."

Indeed, they scared me to death because the proposed ideal location for this display of muscle was Laos! I sardonically suggested they look at a map (I am a great believer in looking at maps), but this advice was spurned and I was politely told I just didn't have any guts.

Right now our main task is to caulk the boat. Because of our national and governmental focus on Indochina over the past decade, we have sadly neglected other vital matters. I have argued here for years — to take one instance — that there is no NATO strategy, and at the moment it is beginning to look as though the absence of a strategy will be matched by an absence of allies.

At this moment we are in limbo: the American people have signed off on the major premises of our policy since World War II, but no coherent substitute has been offered.

If it is to be continentalism, let us face that fact and make the necessary shifts in our commitments that will provide symmetry. And please, Mr. President, stop telling the world our credibility is undamaged: it merely makes you sound foolish.

important, but less impressive in European minds.

Unfailing loyalty to Israel, clear-cut attitude towards Portugal, firmness and balance on the Greek-Turkish controversy and on the energy problem are also essential.

Q—Why is maintenance of NATO still important?

A—The Atlantic Alliance and NATO are not only important, but more vital than ever. The threat of the expanding Soviet military and political power is increasing, slowly but steadily.

For Europe, the alliance is a question of life or death, freedom or servitude. For the United States it is a question of remaining a great world power or of declining to a second-rate power, retreated in isolation. The loss of Europe to U.S.S.R. supremacy would mean exactly that.

The Atlantic community remains the source and the bulwark of Western Civilization: If the Americans do not care for it any more, it will be lost for us all and for the world, alongside with freedom, and probably with peace.

Q—Has detente proved good or bad for the west?

A — Detente has always been a deceptive word. The Soviet Union has only understood and practiced peaceful co-existance — that is, a struggle of political and social power without actual fighting.

Peaceful co-existence in Europe has been useful. It has spared us the horrors of war. But the idea of detente, that is the relaxation of efforts and vigilance, and the illusion of an easy reconciliation of opposing and conflicting social systems, has done more harm than good. It is not a reality. It is a delusion which has greatly helped the advance of Communism in many countries — Portugal, Vietnam, Ethiopia, and maybe other countries in the near future.

"We are engaged in a struggle which we want to keep peaceful, but we cannot win it, nor end it with a draw, nor save peace, if we do not believe any more in the issues at stake."

ZUMWALT SAYS U.S. WOULD LOSE WAR WITH RUSSIA

Calls For $8 Billion Boost In DOD Budget

Former CNO Adm. Elmo Zumwalt declared this weekend that if war were to break out between the United States and Soviet Union at this time, the U.S. would face "almost certain defeat."

He said, however, that he believes that the two countries are "too rational" to engage in war.

Zumwalt blamed Congress for the decline in America's defense capability, charging that Congress "has been so penurious in its budget, we do not have the capability to stand up to the Soviet Union today." He said that the U.S. naval capability has been dwindling since the 1962 Cuban missile crisis and now has only a 50 percent chance of retaining control of the waterways.

Sees Increased DOD Budget Inducing Detente

Zumwalt said the way to halt the Soviet Union's rush to arms superiority is to increase the U.S. defense budget -- a move which he said would encourage arms limitation agreement.

He said if Congress were to increase the DOD budget by as little as $8 billion in FY '76 over the $104 billion requested, "this would send a spike on the fever chart back to Moscow and they'll begin saying, 'hey fellas, let's cool it. The natives are getting restless.'"

Mideast prospects

Joseph C. Harsch (14)

There is one reason for thinking that just possibly this summer will bring a general settlement of the most dangerous unsolved international problem in the world today. That problem is, of course, the relationship between Israel and the neighboring Arab states. The one reason it might be solved is because the Soviet Union wants something this summer which Washington need not give without getting something of value in return.

Moscow wants to get a conclusion this summer of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. The one and only thing of importance which can come out of that conference would be recognition of Moscow's control over the countries of Eastern Europe. Moscow has that control de facto today, but it has never yet had that condition recognized by the United States as de jure.

For example, if you look through a copy of the Congressional Directory you will discover that the U.S still recognizes a Latvian and a Lithuanian legation in Washington and an Estonian legation in New York City. There are charges d'affaires attached to each of these legations and they are listed in the official Washington diplomatic list published by the Department of State. In other words, the U.S. has never officially recognized the Soviet conquest and suppression of these three formerly independent Baltic states.

This fact has galled the Russians, just as the continued U.S recognition of Taiwan galls the Chinese. Moscow would like to have the whole world, including the U.S., accept the de facto situation in Eastern Europe as being legal and permanent.

There are substantial colonies of Estonian, Latvian, and Lithuanian people in the U.S. who care about their former homelands and have voting power. Hence Washington is reluctant to grant such recognition of Moscow's conquests. If it does, what would it get in return?

It may be conceivable that a Mideast settlement could be reached over Moscow's objection, but it is not likely. But with Moscow's full cooperation a settlement would come within the boundaries of realism. The settlement would not only be possible, it would even be probable.

That would require, however, a conscious decision in Moscow to give up the advantages it has enjoyed so far from continued Mideast strain and tension. It would probably require the formal and contractual recognition of permanent frontiers for Israel. It would mean full cooperation with American diplomacy at a reconvened Geneva conference this summer. It would require a joint Soviet-American settlement plan which the two would present at Geneva and, in effect, would impose on the Israelis and Arabs.

Obviously, Moscow is not going to give up the many advantages it enjoys from nonsettlement in the Middle East without getting something of value in return. But there is the possibility of the trade. There is some evidence that the Kremlin is moving in this direction. It would stand to gain something as well as losing much. It would gain security against the danger of another confrontation with the U.S. over the Middle East.

Soviet cooperation in reaching a Middle East settlement has always so far been the will-o'-the-wisp of the problem. It has always slipped away just when it seemed to be in hand. Can it be captured this summer? Just possibly. And if captured, where does it lead? It leads to Arab recognition of Israel within its pre-1967 boundaries with a guarantee of those boundaries by the Arabs and by both the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. It also means a political future for Palestinians in West Bank Jordan and some form of joint or international control over the old city of Jerusalem.

It could happen this summer if American diplomacy could work out the terms of the settlement with Moscow. But it would mean getting going — now.

Diplomats Eye Mideast Pact

By KINGSBURY SMITH
Hearst Headline Service

NEW YORK — There is a mood of cautious optimism among some well-informed UN diplomats concerning the prospects for progress within the next two months towards a new Israeli-Egyptian military disengagement agreement.

It is believed that Israel and Egypt are prepared to make new concessions to bridge the gap that caused the collapse of Secretary of State Henry Kissinger's shuttle diplomacy peace efforts in March.

Whether the concessions will be sufficient to bring about a new agreement in the step-by-step negotiating process is uncertain but some of the UN diplomats closely associated with Middle East developments are inclined to believe they will.

This mild optimism is based partly on diplomatic reports from Jerusalem, Cairo and Washington, and partly on the belief that the Israeli and Egyptian governments realize there will be grave danger of a new war this summer if a new military disengagement agreement in the Sinai has not been reached by July.

It is expected Egyptian President Anwar Sadat will tell President Ford what new concessions he is prepared to offer during their meeting in Salzburg June 1 and 2.

The American government has been applying strong pressure on Israel to make greater concessions than it was prepared to offer in March; and it is assumed Premier Yitzhak Rabin will submit new proposals when he confers with President Ford in Washington June 11 and 12.

The Israeli government is pressing Washington for a resumption of talks on Israel's pending arms requests to coincide with Premier Rabin's visit.

Israeli diplomats say it would be politically easier for Rabin to offer new concessions if the arms supply discussions were resumed. They were suspended in March when President Ford announced the U.S. intended to make a "reassessment" of its Middle East policy.

Suspension of the talks reflected the deep disappointment of the President and Secretary Kissinger over the Israeli government's refusal to make greater concessions for a deal with Egypt in March.

Continued suspension of the talks, which involved Israel's request for $2.5 billion in economic and military aid in the coming fiscal year, is viewed by Israeli diplomats as unfair pressure, especially since the State Dept. agreed early this month to supply Jordan with sophisticated surface-to-air-missiles, obviously intended to be used against Israel in the event of a new war.

While Rabin may discuss new concessions during his visit to Washington, Israeli diplomats believe it will be politically impossible for him to actually make them before the arms supply talks are resumed.

One of the reasons for moderate optimism in UN circles is yhe belief, based on diplomatic information from Jerusalem, that Rabin is prepared to drop Israel's insistence on a nonbelligerency pledge from Egypt as a condition for the withdrawal of Israeli forces from the Sinai passes and oil fields.

The Israeli leader is reported to be willing to accept "specific acts" which would demonstrate Egypt's peaceful intentions. Israeli insistence on the nonbelligerency pledge was a major factor in the breakdown of the March negotiations.

Among the "specific acts" that Israel had in mind are: Egyptian consent to extend the mandate for the presence of the UN peacekeeping force in the Sinai for three to five years; and establishment of early warning stations in the buffer zones to reduce the danger of surprise attack.

Another encouraging sign was Sadat's announcement last month at he would reopen the Suez Canal June 5. Israeli Defense Minister Dhimon Peres said that if Egypt did so and allowed ships to carry goods to and from Israel, the Israeli government would be willing to make "significant concessions."

Sadat actually gave such a commitment in a secrrt rider to the military disengagement agreement of January 1974. In this addition, which was not made public but was handed to Kissinger, Sadat said:

"As a first step, all cargoes destined for and coming from Israel would be permitted through the canal from the time of its reopening."

While the Egyptian leader is not prepared to allow ships flying the Israeli flag to pass through the canal until the state of belligerency os ended, his assurance that Israeli cargoes would be permitted was regarded by the American government as a major concession.

A Pleading For Patience On Portugal

By Mary McGrory
Washington Star Staff Writer

Sen. Edward W. Brooke, R-Mass., is proposing a course of action towards Portugal which is not costly or destructive or irrational — and therefore, perhaps, unlikely to get off the ground.

He suggests that in dealing with the new left-wing government in Lisbon we exercise diplomacy, patience and understanding.

Portugal, which has been taken over by a radical military group called the Armed Forces Movement, has so far indicated that it wishes neither military aid nor increased economic assistance. What it wants of us, Brooke thinks, is to be left alone — with particular reference to the C.I.A. — to work out a new way of doing things after 25 years of strongman, one-man Salazar rule.

Brooke, who has always been interested in Portugese affairs — he has a fair number of Portugese constituents — was in Portugal in April, shortly after the military took over.

Point of View

He found a conciliatory and open-minded attitude among the new leaders. Prime Minister Vasco Goncalves, for instance, assured him that Portugal intends to continue in NATO. He is also willing to permit the U.S. air bases in the Azores — prohibiting only their use for resupply. Portugal, of all the European nations during the October war, permitted U.S. planes bound for Israel to refuel in the Azores, and thereby suffered from the displeasure of the Arabs.

"We had a dictatorship under Salazar for 25 years," Goncalves reminded the senator, "and the U.S. never expressed the slightest concern."

The leader of the Socialists, Mario Soares, explained to Brooke that the Armed Forces Movement was sparked by junior officers who learned anticolonialism in Angola and Mozambique, two outposts of the Portuguese Empire.

"This country was under the control of 100 families and three banks," Soares told Brooke. "It was inevitable that we would move to the left."

It is possible, as Brooke wrote to President Ford in a letter on his return, that Portugal could move to the left without going Communist. The Socialists emerged from the recent election — in which 92 percent of the voters exercised the novel franchise — with 33 percent of the returns.

The Communists got only 12 percent.

The accession of the left-wing dictatorship to power caused the usual growls of disapproval in the administration, which has always preferred to deal with more congenial right-wing military dictatorships and does not trust a country that is going left to stop at socialism.

Brooke found our ambassador, Frank Carlucci, exhibiting patience and understanding towards the new rulers, for which, it was said, he was denounced behind the scenes by the secretary of state for being insufficiently "tough" and "hardline." This report was subsequently denied by the secretary of state. Our previous ambassador to Portugal also failed in this regard and was dismissed. Carlucci, however, is still in place, perhaps due to Brooke's intervention.

Brooke fears that the weak showing of the Communists in the election will not calm the fears of the administration.

"Five percent would have been enough to unnerve them," he sighs.

The members of the constituent assembly are not the new representatives of the Portuguese people. They are charged only with drafting a new constitution in the next five years. The Armed Forces Movement will be in control, meanwhile, and will have the power to ratify the document.

Brooke has had no reply to an April 8 letter to the President, in which he suggested that by over-reacting we might be "accelerating rather than inhibiting a Communist takeover."

It is difficult to say if the administration's easily-activated fears are in this case real or imagined. The President and the secretary of state have created a climate where reasonable assessment is difficult. By magnifying the consequences of the defeat in Vietnam, they have encouraged the dire predictions now sweeping Europe. If they had expressed relief rather than dismay over the long-delayed resolution of our most draining and shaming overseas adventure, they might not be beset by the uncertainties and alarm they have generated.

Brooke points out that we have in every event very little bargaining power with the Portuguese. We alienate them only at the risk of losing a vital link in the Western alliance.

"What are we going to do?" he asks rhetorically. "Withdraw from NATO? Give up our bases in the Azores?"

It has been some time since the United States, which prefers to arm the right and straight-arm the left, has tried diplomacy. Portugal offers the best current example for us to prove that we learned something from our Vietnam experience.

Cooling Off on Marcos

In times when the Philippines take on fresh geopolitical significance for the United States, it is reassuring to find some diffidence in the State Department's posture toward the tainted regime of President Marcos.

This is a testing time in the paternalistc dealings between the United States and the Philippines, and one hint of the administration's readiness to play a strong hand is a shift of attitude toward the exile leader Raul Marglapus. He is a Stevensonian kind of politician who was a popular leader of the opposition to Marcos until he became an exile slightly before the islands fell under the mantle of martial law in 1972.

The police came to arrest Marglapus almost as soon as Marcos proclaimed the new ground rules, but he had fortuitously left the country on a speaking tour. Marglapus did not find a particularly warm reception in this country.

The State Department utilized its leverage with the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars, partly financed by congressional appropriations, to block Marglapus's selection for a fellowship in 1974. The Filipino politician is applying once more this year, and happily the State Department has progressed to a passive position.

The significance of this shift is its implication that Henry Kissinger does not mean to get caught in another of those painful campaigns to stay close at any cost to autocratic Oriental leaders whose philosophy and actions cannot be justified by the yardstick of American ideals. The temptation to court despotic governments is enlarged by the evolution of the Philippines, South Korea and Indonesia as the outer line of American influence in the Pacific.

The treatment of Marcos's wife is another hint of healthy insouciance in Washington's view of Manila. Mrs. Marcos, swept by her jet plane to frequent rendezvous with the beautiful people, has come to the United States twice in the past six months without drawing any official notice. She was reported last fall to have been badly miffed when the State Department advised President Ford to give her no attention at all.

This requires some spirit. Clark Air Base, on Philippine soil, is the second largest American air base anywhere. The Subic Bay Naval Base is a key to Seventh Fleet influence in the South China Sea.

But the Philippines are no showcase for American democracy, and the bilateral treaty of 1951 has not produced an alliance to which a majority of Americans would rally with zeal. The benefactions of the past, including nearly $1 billion in military aid, big sweeteners in the purchase of sugar and a steady umbrella of defense against all comers, have proved no inducement to progress in a society sorely lacking in grace, charity and character.

Two assumptions govern U.S. dealings with the Philippines. One, fabricated in Washington, is that the Filipinos will never translate their feisty talk into actual pressures to evacuate the American bases. The other, originating in the islands, is that the Communist insurgency will never swell to the magnitude of a real threat to the established government.

Asia's changing character makes it possible to believe that both assumptions may prove wrong in the long run. The precedents and prospects suffice at least to discourage any strong inclination to cling tightly to another rotten regime.

The Danger in South Korea

This is not the time to be considering a reduction of U.S. military strength in South Korea or actions that could weaken Seoul's ability to defend itself. But it is the time for the U.S. government to begin using its considerable influence to force President Park Chung Hee to change his regime's repressive domestic policies.

President Ford has reaffirmed and indicated that he intends to strengthen U.S. ties to South Korea. The bonds that exist are much different from those cited to justify American involvement in Indochina. They derive from a formal defense treaty, growing out of the Korean war. They derive from the costly American effort in that war, and the successful preservation of South Korea's independence. And they derive from the important geopolitical fact of Korea's proximity to Japan. That fact was the main strategic rationale for U.S. intervention in the Korean war in 1950. It has not changed since then.

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) is one of those calling for a gradual withdrawal of U.S. forces from South Korea in the wake of the Vietnam debacle. We think he is wrong. But he and other members of Congress are not wrong in their concern about what has been happening in South Korea. The Ford Administration should act on that concern for the sake of both Korean and American interests.

The danger, quite simply, is this: that the autocratic policies of the Park regime—the intolerance of political opposition, the stifling of press and public criticism, the attempt to insure conformity by police-state methods—will help create the very conditions of civil discontent and frustration in which subversion flourishes best.

The potential is there, and with it the unacceptable possibility that the United States could again become involved, directly or indirectly, in a situation inimical to its basic security responsibilities.

The chance of another cross-border invasion by Communist North Korea can't be entirely ruled out, though the possibility is slight so long as the U.S. defense commitment remains unambiguous, and so long as China and the Soviet Union are cool to such a venture, as they now appear to be.

The greater risk is one that North Korean dictator Kim Il Sung talks about openly—the launching of a new campaign of subversion in the south, of guerrilla warfare, sabotage and terrorism, this time counting on support from the local population that was not given in the past.

Last year we supported a proposal in Congress to begin a phaseout of U.S. aid to Korea in responsive protest to what Park has been doing. A military aid cutoff, we now believe, could mean only added burdens for the United States in view of the changed situation in East Asia, and might well result in miscalculations in North Korea about the durability of the U.S. commitment.

But that assessment does not diminish—indeed it enhances—the need for the United States to use its substantial leverage to promote changes in Park's antidemocratic activities.

The U.S. message should be clear. The defense commitment to South Korea will be maintained. But that commitment carries no obligation to support one-man rule based on repressive policies whose ultimate results are antithetical to American aims, interests and ideals.

Korea A-Arms Use an Option, General Says

BY SAM JAMESON
Times Staff Writer

SEOUL—The United States would consider using tactical nuclear weapons in case of an outbreak of war in the Korean peninsula, a top American military commander said here Monday.

The U.S. officer, who asked not to be named, made it clear in an interview that he did not expect North Korea's Communist dictator, Kim Il Sung, to launch an all-out attack upon South Korea at this time.

But he also indicated that if such an attack should occur, a recommendation urging use of tactical nuclear weapons would most likely be made by the U.S. command here to the White House.

The highly placed commander was asked what role "the most powerful of American weapons" played in U.S. contingency plans against an all-out attack by North Korea. Although the question was worded indirectly to allow the officer to avoid violating American policy forbidding the discussion of the location of nuclear weapons, the commander replied:

"I'm an 'attack nuke' man myself."

Then he elaborated:

"The United States armed forces has kept a whole array of tactical nuclear weapons in its inventory, recognizing that the decision as to whether they will ever be used is a decision only the commander-in-chief can make, recognizing that more emotion surrounds this in the whole military equation than anything else, and recognizing there is a school of thought that persists today that the first use of nuclear weapons starts an uncontrollable spiral.

"Having said all that, the tactical nuclear capability consitutes one option available to U.S. and allied decision makers."

The officer pointed out that "as good military professionals, we plan against the contingencies we may be called upon to exercise." But he said an all-out war on the Korea peninsula in which either China or the Soviet Union—or both Communist giants—participated directly would "really pose some tough decisions for Washington to make."

"If you are going to fight in Korea—and for objectives possibly larger than the Korean Peninsula itself—you then have to face a decision (as to whether) you are going to deploy a lot of U.S. divisions over here, or (whether) you are going to consider something else first."

He made it clear the "something else" was tactical nuclear weapons.

Unlike strategic nuclear weapons, which would wreak destruction over huge areas, tactical nuclear weapons are designed to destroy specific targets and localize damage.

The senior officer painted two scenarios for an all-out war, neither of which, he said, he expected to occur now.

In the most likely kind of all-out attack upon the south, North Korea would probably rely upon its own armed forces to launch a massive strike at Seoul, seeking to invest the city, and then solidify its gains through negotiations.

"It would be a very violent and short conflict" in which U.S. ground forces stationed here would be kept out of battle, he said. American air power and army artillery and missile units, however, would play a major role, he added. The U.S.-South Korean aim in such a war would be "to stop that guy virtually in his tracks" at the Demilitarized Zone.

A second possible kind of attack would be one in which either China or the Soviet Union, or both, committed some of their own forces—perhaps air or naval—to battle along with the North Koreans "to go for it all."

Such a war probably would turn into a long, drawn out truggle, directly involving all U.S. forces here.

Use of the American nuclear option probably would be considered most seriously in the second kind of war, the commander said.

The officer said he thought that neither China, which

How to release U.S. ship?

Show of force and cool diplomacy

By Dana Adams Schmidt
and Guy Halverson
Staff correspondents of
The Christian Science Monitor
Washington

The U.S. Government is combining a show of force with cool diplomacy as it tries to get back the cargo ship and its 39-man crew seized by the new Cambodian Government.

It is still not clear, however, what leverage Washington has to force the Cambodians to give up the ship and crew without risking the lives of the men.

A U.S. Navy reconnaissance plane was hit by gunfire as it flew over Cambodian gunboats, government sources said.

President Ford has said that he would consult with Congress before taking any military action. This raises questions to observers here: (1) A rescue mission would doubtless need the cover of secrecy — yet can such secrecy be maintained if Congress is to be told in advance? (2) If Congress is to be consulted, can the President make a speedy move? (3) Is it possible that Mr. Ford now sees progress in negotiations with Cambodia, and that he feels no such consultation will be necessary?

Meanwhile, State Department and nongovernmental experts are studying political and legal implications.

It is recalled here that while in Congress, President Ford called U.S. options "very, very limited" once the spy ship Pueblo and its crew had been seized in 1968.

It is also said that the legal situation is by no means as clear-cut as the administration has indicated by saying the seizure was a clear-cut violation of the right of innocent passage.

Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger said in Missouri, where he was visiting, that the U.S. will "wait a bit to see what diplomacy can achieve." While asserting that the U.S. would take the measures necessary to obtain the ship's release he declined comment on reports of troop movements.

The government has:

1. Reportedly ordered the amphibious assault ship Okinawa with up to 800 marines aboard to put to sea from Subic Bay in the Philippines, allegedly in the direction of the South China Sea and the location of the Mayaguez. The aircraft carrier Coral Sea was presumably operating in the South China Sea. Another 150 marines were reportedly flown from Subic Bay while 1,000 marines at Okinawa were reported on alert.

The Mayaguez has been escorted by the Cambodians to an anchorage off the island of Koh Tang, 30 miles from the Cambodian coast.

2. Sent a protest and warning to the new Communist Cambodian Government via the Government of China in Peking, and via the French Government which remains in touch with the Cambodians in Paris and is trying to keep open its embassy in Phnom Penh. State Department sources say the note threatened "serious consequences" if the ship was not set free.

Politically, White House sources admit, a vigorous "send in the marines" ploy seems attractive, especially after the distressing end of the Indo-China war. But then they cite Mr. Ford's caution in 1968.

Meanwhile, the Premier of Thailand, Kukrit Pramoj, had said earlier that his government would not allow any use of Utapao for operations connected with the seized ship.

Legally nongovernmental experts make these points:

1. From a legal point of view this was not an "act of piracy" as stated by the President. Under the Geneva Covenant of the High Seas of 1958, piracy is an act by private persons for private gain. This, however, was an act by Cambodian Government gunboats.

2. Most authorities consider that a coastal state has the right to determine whether a ship in its territorial waters is engaged in operations threatening its health or safety. In this case the ship was captured eight miles off the rocky islet of Poulo Wai within the 12-mile limit claimed by the Cambodians who probably still consider themselves at war with the U.S. Its cargo, according to American official sources, included some military supplies destined for Thailand.

3. On the other hand, there are differences of opinion as to whether territorial waters apply to tiny islets in the sea. The islet, about 50 miles from the coast of Cambodia, is furthermore claimed by South Vietnam as well as Cambodia.

4. The case of the Pueblo in 1968 is not a valid precedent because the Pueblo was a naval vessel engaged in electronic espionage. The Mayaguez, allegations by the Soviet news agency Tass notwithstanding, appears to be a genuine U.S. registered merchant ship which happened to be carrying some military supplies.

5. At the conference on the law of the sea that has been meeting in Geneva, the U.S. has sought to get international acceptance of a more clear-cut right of innocent passage for all ships through territorial waters regardless of their cargoes. But the generally accepted standards at present give the coastal state the "subjective" right to decide whether or not to seize a ship in its waters.

The Pentagon May 13 declined any comment on the freighter or the movements of U.S. ships in the China Sea, and some observers thought the blackout might be a cover for forceful action already under way.

Pentagon officials did disclose, however, that the position of the Mayaguez had been ascertained by aerial surveillance. Privately some Pentagon officials pointed out at this writing that if the U.S. is to act it had better act quickly, before the crew is landed and taken deep into the interior.

Monitor correspondent Godfrey Sperling Jr. reports from Washington:

The President's spokesman, Ron Nessen, has said flatly that the President will not take any military action on the seizure without first consulting with congress.

Asked if the President were "now consulting with Congress about an alert or precautionary acts," Mr. Nessen said "no."

Under questioning, he seemed to be ruling out the use of the loophole in the War Powers Act which says: "In every possible instance" the President shall consult with Congress before introducing U.S. Armed forces into hostilities.

He seemed to be saying that this was definitely not an instance when the President would act first and then ask for permission simply because it was "not possible" to ask first.

Asked it the President had set a deadline for release of the prisoners, Mr. Nessen said, "No, he has not." He said the controlling presidential words were his demand for "immedate release." He said: "The President has not set an hour or minute deadline."

Asked if the President has received "even the slightest glimmer of hope" in his negotiations, Mr. Nessen paused and then said, quietly, "I don't think I will take that question."

Asked if "there is any evidence the ship was carrying anything except cargo?" Mr. Nessen said: "No, a simple no."

Rep. Joe D. Waggonner (D) of Louisiana told reporters after meeting with the President May 13 that Mr. Ford said to him: "I've got a very tough decision to make on the ship."

Mr. Nessen also disclosed that there had been a previous comparable incident in roughly the same area.

"Ten days ago," he said, "a Korean ship was fired on. It was not hit. It was not detained. It was fired on by what appeared to be a Cambodian ship."

Mr. Nessen offered no help to questioners who wanted to know if the U.S had known about this incident — information that might have been used as a warning.

Air Force Study Suggests Halt to Homebuilding

From a Times Staff Writer

RIVERSIDE—An Air Force noise study recommends a halt to residential construction in Riverside's exclusive Canyon Crest development west of March Air Force Base.

Base commander Col. Stan Brown says that although the study is not binding on local officials, it should be seriously considered in light of urban encroachment around the sprawling base. The report also recommends land use restrictions for various noise zones around the base.

Canyon Crest, one of Riverside's fastest growing areas, lies in a path where the Air Force discourages residential development.

Kim Il Sung visited April 18 to 26, nor the Soviet Union, which Kim is expected to visit soon, were prepared to back any all-out attack by North Korea.

"But in the gray areas—infiltration, probes and incidents in which who did what would remain unclear—I'm not so sure," he said.

If the North Korean dictator—encouraged by the U.S. Congress' failure to vote aid to South Vietnam in its 11th hour and by Communist successes in Indochina—provoked some kind of aggression against the south, "it would be to test the water to see whether earnestness behind the fine statements of the (Ford) Administration and, to a certain extent, of Congress was really there."

Such a probe, he said, probably "would be on the lower end of the spectrum" of aggression.

SUMMARY OF NETWORK NEWS IN THIS ISSUE

John CHANCELLOR, Charles QUINN, Tom BROKAW, Catherine MACKIN and George LEWIS, all of NBC News, report on Mayaguez related events. QUINN reports on Secretary LAITIN's statement of the sinking of three Cambodian boats and also on the amended statement released later. QUINN reports a helicopter operation might be in the works. BROKAW reports on meetings at the White House of the NSC and on Presidential authority to use troops to protect American lives and shipping. MACKIN reports on the reaction of the Congress to the military action and includes statements by Senators JAVITS and TOWERS and by Rep. RHODES and other comments by Senators MANSFIELD, JACKSON and KENNEDY. CHANCELLOR reports on the sinking of the ships and that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee endorsed the military move. CHANCELLOR also reports that the Thais publicly stated they want the recently arrived U.S. troops to leave Thailand. LEWIS reports on the arrival of the new Ambassador and on Thai reaction to U.S. plans to attack from Thailand. CHANCELLOR reports that two AID centers in Thailand have been looted and that three AID officials are being held hostage by Laotians, and that the Embassy staff will be cut. Jim RUDDLE, NBC, reports on memorial funeral services for Corporal Darwin JUDGE who was killed at Tansonnhut Airport before the evacuation.

Bob SCHIEFFER, Ike PAPPAS, Phil JONES, Peter COLLINS and Marvin KALB, all of CBS, report on Mayaguez related events. PAPPAS reports on Secretary LAITIN's statement concerning the sinking of the Cambodian ships; on the planes involved in the attack; on the revised Pentagon statement; and on U.S. warship movements towards Cambodia. JONES reports on the question of Presidential consultation with Congress over the military action; and on White House meetings. COLLINS reports on the presence of the 1,000 Marines at Utapao and the Thai reaction to that presence, including a threat of drastic action to be taken. He then reports on the implications that a shutting down of U.S. bases in Thailand would have. KALB reports on the administration's view of Thailand and on the failure of U.S. diplomacy in trying to secure the release of the Mayaguez. SCHIEFFER reports on the nuclear test blast in Nevada and that no radiation leaks were reported. Bernard KALB, CBS, has a report on defense spending and on the controversy between spending money on social programs versus defense needs. He includes statements by two congressmen who take opposite sides -- Sen. TOWER takes the defense side -- gives estimates of future defense budgets; estimates of present defense programs, B-1, Trident; and includes a statement by Secretary SCHLESINGER concerning the need to increase defense spending in order to maintain the worldwide military balance between the U.S. and Russia.

Harry REASONER, Frank TOMLINSON, Howard K. SMITH and Jim BENNET, all of ABC News, report on Mayaguez related events. TOMLINSON reports on the attack on the Cambodian boats and on the U.S. planes that carried it out; on ship movements towards that area; and on options available to U.S. forces to secure the Mayaguez and its crew. REASONER reports that U.S. U.N. Ambassador SCALLY requested U.N. help in getting the ship back; and asserted the right of the U.S. to protect its people and property. BENNET reports on the Thai reaction to Marine arrivals in Thailand and includes a statement by the Thai Prime Minister demanding the removal of those Marines. SMITH has a commentary on the chances for war in Korea in light of Kim Il SUNG's desire to start a war; repression and dissension in S. Korea; U.S. retreats from Indochina; China's willingness perhaps to stop the North Koreans from warring; and measures the U.S. can take to discourage the North Koreans.

American Planes Sink Cambodian Ships

JOHN CHANCELLOR: Good evening. The crisis involving the seized American ship Mayaguez deepened today as American airmen went back into Indochina combat for the first time since 1973. American planes based in Thailand sank three vessels of the Cambodian Navy after repeated warnings when it looked as though the Cambodians were planning to take crewmen from the ship to the mainland. This took place near Koh-Tang island. Our correspondent Richard Valeriani has learned there is now definite evidence that some of the Americans are on that island. And Valeriani says there are indications that some of the Americans had been taken to the Cambodian mainland. Senator Barry GOLDWATER is quoted as saying he was told that some of the men are on the mainland now. There was a lot of activity in Washington today, a meeting of the NSC at the White House and briefings at the Defense Department. Charles Quinn has the Pentagon story.

CHARLES QUINN: Pentagon spokesman Joseph LAITIN had a statement saying that the first American warship, the destroyer escort Holt, had arrived in the area, but the heart of the matter was the American attack.

JOSEPH LAITIN: Beginning at 8:30 PM yesterday evening there were indications that the Cambodians appeared to be attempting to move captive U.S. crewmen from the ship and from the island of Koh-Tang to the mainland. After giving warning U.S. aircraft began efforts to block this movement. Three Cambodian patrol craft were destroyed, about four others were damaged and immobilized. One boat succeeded in reaching Kampong Som.

QUINN: LAITIN refused to answer any questions but later he amended the statement to say that there was not now sufficient evidence to indicate that any of the Cambodian boats had been damaged. Forces here said it was a four hour operation, that the Cambodians were warned extensively and repeatedly, that it only takes minutes to destroy a handful of patrol boats. The planes came from Thailand, sources said. None was hit, although a Navy reconnaissance plane took a bullet in its tail. Sources said the military was led to believe that the Cambodians might move the Americans to the mainland through intercepted radio messages, rather than visual sightings. They said that some American crewmen might have been on one of the patrol boats, the one that made it to port, and that it was deliberately allowed to escape.

CHANCELLOR: Chuck, so where it stands now is that American planes sank three Cambodian ships?

QUINN: Right.

CHANCELLOR: But we just don't know about the others?

QUINN: He says now after rereading intelligence reports he doesn't have sufficient evidence to indicate that any others have been damaged.

CHANCELLOR: Do you have any idea how many Americans might have been taken to the mainland?

QUINN: No, sir, there's no indication of that here, John, just that one boat perhaps if any.

CHANCELLOR: And what's next militarily?

QUINN: I've been told by a very reliable source here that a helicopter operation is in the works -- it's just in the works. It may be imminent, but decision on that will take place in the White House not here at the Pentagon.

CHANCELLOR: Charles Quinn briefing us from the Pentagon. At the White House the luncheon meeting of the NSC broke up late this afternoon and after that happened congressional leaders of both parties were asked to the White House. Tom Brokaw has more on that story.

TOM BROKAW: President FORD is meeting with congressional leaders of both parties at the White House this evening following a two hour meeting of the NSC, where military options were discussed. The President has promised to consult with Congress on military actions in the Mayaguez situation. In addition to the congressional leaders and the President in the meeting there is the Secretary of State, Henry KISSINGER, Secretary of Defense SCHLESINGER, and Vice President ROCKEFELLER. No members of the military JCS were seen at the room at the beginning of the meeting. Some congressional leaders are complaining about the nature of these consultations, but White House spokesmen say the President has a clear constitutional authority to use military force to protect American lives and property without congressional permission. Presidential advisers argue that the War Powers Act doesn't apply in this case. As one put it, this is not a case of sending a half million troops into SE Asia. So, in effect, the White House is calling it consultation, but the President is telling Congress what he'll do and he is telling them tonight here at the White House.

CHANCELLOR: Tom, what are they saying at the White House now about the safety and the whereabouts of the crew?

BROKAW: The whereabouts is still an extremely sensitive situation at the White House, John. Administration spokesmen are reluctant to talk about it, however, some high level White House officials have said they've received no reports of any casualties of the crewmen aboard the Mayaguez. But that is about as much as they'll say at the White House on that subject.

CHANCELLOR: Tom Brokaw briefing us from the White House. In the Congress there was general support for the President. The White House said strong consensus and no objections. But there were questions asked and some difficulties about whether congressional leaders were consulted or only informed. The White House says SEnate Majority leader MANSFIELD was told before the fact, but he said it was after the fact. Here's more on the Congress from Catherine Mackin.

CATHERINE MACKIN: Senator MANSFIELD was one of several prominent Democrats who at least raised questions about the action President FORD took. As for press secretary Ron Nessen's statement that there were no objections among the leaders of Congress, MANSFIELD said no objections is a highly technical phrase. MANSFIELD said you can't object after decisions already are made. He said there was no consultation, just notification only after the fact. Henry JACKSON, a Democrat running for President and a Vietnam hawk, said he hopes the United States is not going down the same road followed after the 1964 Tonkin Gulf incident which led to major involvement in Vietnam. JACKSON said this is a time for cool heads, not a time to exercise the use of force. Senator Edward KENNEDY said it appears the United States may have acted with undue haste. He questioned whether every possible diplomatic effort had been made before military force was used. But there was a lot of support for the President, many said what he did was a justified act of self defense and said he was acting fully within his power as commander in chief.

SENATOR JACOB JAVITS: I believe a President has the right to act against piracy on the high seas in respect to the U.S. vessel and there's no question about that.

SENATOR JOHN TOWER: Well I think in the past in a similar situation we've failed to act with sufficient haste.

REP. JOHN RHODES: It would be my hope that the Cambodians would realize that the situation is one that we do not intend to tolerate and that it might be well for them to release the ship and the crew.

MACKIN: All afternoon officials of the State Department and Defense Department circulated on Capitol Hill briefing the members of the House and Senate Foreign Relations Committee on what the President did. Under the 1973 War Powers Act President FORD will have to file a written report to Congress on the Cambodian action within the next 48 hours. Catherin Mackin, NBC News, Washington.

CHANCELLOR: And late today the Senate Foreign Relations Committee endorsed the President's action. Throughout the day, however, despite different kinds of messages to the Cambodian government the United States has not been given any signal in return from Phnom Penh, not even an acknowledgment that its messages were received.

(Commercials)

CHANCELLOR: The Prime Minister of Thailand, Kukrit PRAMOTCH, today was protesting the sudden arrival overnight of 1,100 American Marines who were flown to an American airbase in Thailand. He was not given notice of that, nor were American civilian officials in Bangkok. And the government of Thailand has given the American government until Wednesday night Washington time to get the Marines out of the country. The Marines, of course, could be used if necessary in a rescue mission for the crewmen of the Mayaguez. But that deadline stands. All this took place on a day when a new and somewhat bewildered American Ambassador, Charles WHITEHOUSE (?) arrived in Bangkok. George Lewis has that story by satellite.

GEORGE LEWIS: The new Ambassador was greeted by a small group of student demonstrators carrying anti-American signs, chanting and singing anti-American slogans. The demonstration was noisy but non-violent, as Ambassador WHITEHOUSE and his wife walked through the crowd. He arrived as the Thai government was protesting the reported movement of 1,100 U.S. Marines into the country. According to one account the Thai Prime Minister was threatening to break relations with the United States. But there was a polite official welcome, flower garlands from a protocol officer. In a brief statement Ambassador WHITEHOUSE had little to say about the Cambodian capture of the merchant ship Mayaguez, about any U.S. military response or about the problems between the U.S. and Thailand.

AMBASSADOR CHARLES WHITEHOUSE: I recognize that there is a problem with regards to the ship Mayaguez, with which at this moment I'm afraid I'm not familiar. My wife and I have been travelling for three days and I'm afraid at this time I'm not in any position to comment with regard to this problem. At least I should also state that until I've had the honor of presenting my credentials to his majesty the king, it would be very inappropriate of me to comment on anything that effects Thai-American relations.

LEWIS: So the new Ambassador will contend with a government which says it is angry at the U.S. There are signs here the anger is not unanimous, that some Thai leaders favor a continued military presence here. It seems to be a delicate balancing act, trying to placate the Communists while holding them at bay with U.S. military men here. And the big question is whether the Thais can pull it off. George Lewis, NBC News, Bangkok.

Anti-Americanism in Laos

CHANCELLOR: Anti-American feelings arose today in Laos as the coalition government there continued to move closer to Communist control. In the Laotian town of Savannakhet a student mob broke into the compound of the Agency for International Development, sacked it and made hostages of three American AID employees. They are believed to be unharmed. And in the royal capital of Louangphrabang the AID compound also was broken into but the four Americans there are believed safe. And in Washington the State Department said the United States would begin to cut the size of its Embassy staff in Vientiane by the end of the week.

Report on Killed U.S. Marines

CHANCELLOR: Two American Marines, Lance Corporal Darwin JUDGE of Marshaltown, Iowa and Corporal Charles McMAHON of Wilburn, Mass., were killed in a rocket attack at Tansonnhut airport two days before the Saigon government surrendered to the Vietcong and the North Vietnamese. And in the rush of the American evacuation from South Vietnam their bodies were inadvertantly left behind in a Saigon hospital. Last night in Marshaltown a memorial service was held for Lance Corporal JUDGE. Jim Ruddle reports.

JIM RUDDLE: When he was 15 he became an Eagle Scout. He like to work with his hands, to make things. He graduated from Marshaltown High School May 31st last year and enlisted in the Marines. Marshaltown H.S., now the flag at half staff, and a memorial service for Darwin JUDGE, dead at 19 in South Vietnam, one of the last two Americans killed there by enemy action. Darwin's parents learned of his death two weeks ago and their grief has been compounded. The memorial service had music, flowers and flags, but no coffin, Darwin's body was left behind in the confusion of the American evacuation of Saigon.

MINISTER: In a way tonight the whole nation is evesdropping on this place -- not out of disrespect mind you -- but perhaps as a final guest of grief. Maybe this is one of the last opportunities to collectively weep over the tragedy of the Vietnam war.

RUDDLE: So in many ways it was like all those other memorials for other American servicemen whose bodies were never returned from Vietnam. And it was a different kind of memorial to the Vietnam dead because this could be one of the last. Jim Ruddle, NBC News, Marshaltown, Iowa.

U.S. Planes Sink Cambodian Ships

BOB SCHIEFFER: Good evening. United States warplanes have sunk three Cambodian gunboats in the Gulf of Thailand about 30 miles off the coast of Cambodia. U.S. officials said the attack was ordered to prevent the Cambodians from taking the crew members off the Mayaguez, the captured American merchant ship. The air strikes occurred as more than 1,000 U.S. Marines were arriving in Thailand. The Thai government protested both the troops arrival and the sinking of the boats, which it called madness. More on the story from Ike Pappas at the Pentagon and Phil Jones at the White House.

IKE PAPPAS: It was 16 hours after the attack that the Pentagon informed the nation it had occurred.

SECRETARY LAITIN: Beginning at 8:30 PM yesterday evening there were indications that the Cambodians appeared to be attempting to move captive U.S. crewmen from the ship and from the island of Koh-Tang to the mainland. After giving warning, U.S. aircraft began efforts to block this movement. Three Cambodian patrol craft were destroyed.

PAPPAS: The original Pentagon statement said four patrol boats were also damaged. Later the Pentagon said its information may have been erroneous, that it is not clear how many, if any, of the patrol boats were damaged. At least three types of American aircraft took part, the A-7, a medium range fighter equipped with 20mm gattling guns; the F-4, an all weather fighter-bomber fitted with 20mm cannons; and the AC-130, a converted turbo-prop cargo plane carrying gattling guns. The destroyer Holt arrived on the scene this afternoon, the aircraft carrier Coral Sea is due there around midnight eastern time. Pentagon sources said pilots took some precautions to determine if any of the crew members of the ship were on the patrol boats before they attacked. However the sources said they could not rule out the possibility some of the crewmen were on the Cambodian boats. They added that some survivors were seen on rafts in the water. Some crew members may have been on the one boat that got through.

Indications here are more military force will follow unless the Khmer Rouge Communists act swiftly to release the ship and its men. Pentagon sources said that action could come within 24 hours. Ike Pappas, CBS News, the Pentagon.

PHIL JONES: The President started leaning towards military reaction late yesterday afternoon, congressional leaders were then telephoned. According to the White House this was consultation as required by the 1973 War Powers Act. However CBS News has learned that those telephone calls consisted of a Presidential aide reading a statement on President FORD's plans. The congressional leaders were not asked for a reaction or advice. White House officials say there were no objections raised. Then Mr. FORD held a meeting with his NSC. That session lasted until after midnight. Secretary of State KISSINGER was back for his regular meeting with President FORD this morning and again this afternoon for the fourth emergency security council session. KISSINGER indicated that there is still a good chance that the American crewmen are on the island near where the Mayaguez is anchored. Publicly the President has still not stated a deadline for the return of the vessel and crew. However it has now been two days since he issued that stern warning calling for the immediate return of the vessel and its crew or the Cambodians would face serious consequences. Phil Jones, CBS News, at the White House.

SCHIEFFER: In response to the Cambodian capture of that American merchant ship more than 1,000 U.S. Marines were airlifted today to Utapao, the U.S. base in Thailand. But the troop movement has created new friction between the Thai and American governments. No sooner had the Marines arrived then Thailand gave them 24 hours to get out of the country. We have reports now from Peter Collins in Thailand and Marvin Kalb in Washington.

PETER COLLINS: The Marines were brought into the big Utapao Airbase aboard Air Force jet transports from Okinawa. There was little for them to do except to wait for orders. The Marines said they were under instructions not to discuss their mission. But their presence on this base is building toward a diplomatic collision between the United States and Thailand. With the collapse of the American position in Indochina, the Thais have been increasingly nervous about having large U.S. forces in their country as they try to patch up relations with the new Communist governments of Vietnam and Cambodia. And now Thailand's Prime Minister Kukrit PRAMOTCH says he doesn't want to be dragged into a new dispute between the U.S. and Cambodia. The Prime Minister has told the U.S. he will not permit the Marines to use Thailand as a base for any move to free the captured freighter Mayaguez by force. And beyond that he has ordered the Marines out of the country by Thursday or Thailand will take "drastic action." What that action might be is open to speculation, but one option could be simply to close this and the other three American bases in Thailand. That would be a heavy blow to the United States which keeps 25,000 troops and a variety of aircraft on the bases, including B-52 bombers such as this one. If the Thais want to close the bases they could easily cut off their supplies or even move in military force, although such a step is unlikely. Peter Collins, CBS News, at Utapao Airbase, Thailand.

MARVIN KALB: The administration thinks Thailand is unreliable and it's been in the process of pulling American troops out of the country for the past few months, a process unrelated to the current crisis. The old anti-Communist alliance between Bangkok and Washington is dying as the Thais try desperately to strike up new friendships with the triumphant Communists of Cambodia and Vietnam. In this climate the U.S. did not feel that it had to inform the Thai government that the Marines were coming, and it did not, thereby further inflaming an already bad situation. Actually the Marines went to Thailand for only one purpose, as part of the rescue operation of the captured freighter. This episode only underscores the fragility of American diplomacy in SE Asia. For example, when the freighter was seized the U.S. found itself in the awkward position of being forced to turn to China for help, there was no other country the U.S. could turn to. And when, predictably, China turned a cold shoulder towards the U.S. the administration felt it had no alternative but to use military force. Marvin Kalb, CBS News, the White House.

Nevada Bomb Test

SCHIEFFER: In the ground 2,500 feet below Peyute Mesa, Nevada today the government exploded a nuclear device 50 times as powerful as the WWII atomic bomb dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. The ground shock was felt 110 ten miles away in Las Vegas where the buildings swayed and doors rattled for about 30 seconds. Monitoring planes reported no radiation leaks.

Report on Defense Spending

SCHIEFFER: Earlier this week CBS News in its special series, Defense, Diplomacy and Detente, has explored American treaty obligations throughout the world and how the United States stands militarily with its potential adversaries. Tonight in the final report Bernard Kalb takes a look at U.S. defense spending.

PRESIDENT FORD: However good their intentions, those who claim that America is overarmed and overspending on defense are dead wrong.

CONGRESSMAN: I concur with that statement, I don't think that we are overarmed. (Senator TOWER (?))

CONGRESSMAN: Absolutely not, I think that we are overspending and we're not getting our money's worth.

BERNARD KALB: That clash of views is just the opening skirmish in the annual battle over just how much the United States should spend on defense, and it's expected to get a lot more intense this year. The guns versus butter controversy, sharpened by disagreement over national priorities at a time of unemployment, inflation and uncertain economy. For the first time the Pentagon has asked for more than $100 billion in appropriations, $104.7 billion to be exact, for fiscal '76 -- reflecting the climbing cost of defense, that's a $15.7 billion increase over last year. The money for such expenses as operations and maintenance, military personnel, the acquisition of hardware. Among other objectives the record budget is aimed at accomodating inflation now and improving weaponry later. Of the grand total, about $93 billion is for actual or estimated outlays in fiscal '76. Part of the remainder represents a down payment on future growth, thereby laying the groundwork for a steadily increasing defense budget. The Pentagon estimates it could go as high as $148 billion in 1980. What has drawn the fire of congressional critics are the requests for continued funding of such highly controversial items still in the development stage, such as the B-1 bomber $84 million each; and the giant new Trident nuclear missile submarines a billion and a half dollars each, the most expensive single weapons system on the drawing boards.

CONGRESSMAN: These glamor items get into the defense budget because that's what the services want to put in there, I mean, that's what they really like to have. The Air Force loves bombers, and the submarine -- Navy wants to have a new Trident submarine, and the Army likes a new main battle tank. Those are very, very expensive pieces of equipment and not worth the cost.

KALB: An opposing view from Senator John TOWER, who sees the present defense budget as a bare bones budget and is willing to consider cuts in other programs if necessary to support it.

SENATOR JOHN TOWER: Well I think what we have to do is look at some of the social programs that we enacted during the '60's that have locked in a lot of obligatory federal spending, and perhaps go back and modify some of these programs or reduce them. But again we have to order our priorities. And I think that we have to simply take a hard look and see where we can effect cuts in the lower priority programs.

KALB: Congress has only so many dollars to work with. National defense is down for 27 percent of the federal budget. But critics argue that if the Pentagon gets that percentage other programs will suffer.

CONGRESSMAN: I think you can do that, just write down environment, health care, educational needs, job training programs. All these social and domestic problems, of course, are relatively going to suffer when we waste money over and above the needs of an adequate defense in one sector of our budget.

KALB: At the Pentagon, no defensive-

DECLASSIFIED

ness about (?) the record defense budget from Secretary James SCHLESINGER.

SECRETARY SCHLESINGER: This is a record budget only in terms of the gradually diminishing value of the dollar. Now the main point behind our defense budget is the necessity, given the U.S. foreign policy in the world, of maintaining adequate forces to retain a worldwide military balance so that the Soviet Union does not by an automatic process become the dominant power in the eastern hemisphere. With regard to the guns versus butter issue, I think I indicated that the real value of the DOD budget has been shrinking, that our percentage of the federal budget has been cut almost in half in the last -- in recent fiscal years -- so that more and more has been made available for social programs against shrinking tax revenues by real reductions in defense. The question is whether that process has not gone too far and whether it now threatens the worldwide military equilibrium which it is necessary for us to maintain.

KALB: Some congressional critics have been talking about record budget cuts the Indochina defeat has made them back away. Still not every requested dollar is regarded as untouchable. The question being asked is whether the final cuts will be only symbolic or whether the controversy over national priorities will cut deeper into the Pentagon budget. Bernard Kalb, CBS News, Washington.

SCHIEFFER: Both the Senate and the House today passed a resolution to hold federal spending this year to $367 billion. This ceiling encompasses a deficit of about $69 billion.

U.S. Planes Sink Cambodian Boats

HARRY REASONER: The United States has begun military action to gain the release of the American merchant ship Mayaguez now held by Cambodia. When diplomatic efforts to free the ship failed and it became apparent the Cambodians were about to move the crew members, U.S. planes attacked the gunboats guarding the Mayaguez, at least three of the Cambodian boats were destroyed. We have reports detailing the attack and related events first from Pentagon correspondent Frank Tomlinson.

FRANK TOMLINSON: The attack against the Cambodian boats was carried out at 8:30 last night our time by American aircraft flying out of Thailand after there were indications that the Cambodians were trying to move the captured crewmen off the freighter Mayaguez and off Koh-Tang island. Fifteen hours after the AC-130 gunships and the A-7 fighter-bombers made their attack the Pentagon made a terse announcement saying that three Cambodian patrol boats had been sunk. That original announcement also said four other Cambodian patrol boats had been damaged and immobilized. Now the Pentagon is backtracking, saying, that there's insufficient evidence to prove that those four boats were damaged. One Cambodian boat did make it to the port of Kampong Som. It was not attacked because it was feared American crewmen were onboard. Meanwhile, the Mayaguez is still at anchor off Koh-Tang island, 30 miles off the Cambodian coast and is under constant surveillance by U.S. aircraft. The first of several Naval ships headed for the Gulf of Siam has arrived in the area, it's the destroyer escort Holt. Three aircraft carriers, the Coral Sea, the Hancock and the Midway are in the western Pacific apparently headed for the Gulf of Siam. A reinforced Marine battallion landing team of 1,200 men is in Thailand, it could move at any time the order is given. Officials say there are several options open to the Marines. One of those options is to put Marines on the deck of the freighter Mayaguez. Another is to land Marines on Koh-Tang island. The best bet is to recover the Mayaguez they'll take both options simultaneously. Frank Tomlinson, ABC News, the Pentagon.

REASONER: Ambassador John SCALLY called on United Nation's Secretary Gen. WALDHEIM today to formally request U.N. help in securing the release of the Mayaguez and its crew. In a letter presented to WALDHEIM, SCALLY said the U.S. reserves the right to take such measures as may be necessary to protect the lives of American citizens and American property.

HOWARD K. SMITH: When those 1,200 Marines sent by President FORD arrived in Thailand the Thai reaction was strong. They demanded the Marines be withdrawn immediately. There was also a popular protest as the new U.S. Ambassador to Thailand arrived. ABC's Jim Bennet reports.

JIM BENNET: But even as he spoke (Ambassador) Thailand's Prime Minister was expressing other ideas on the American presence here.

DECLASSIFIED

PRIME MINISTER PRAMOTCH: We have made a protest to the U.S. Government, together with the demand that the troops be withdrawn immediately. And if that's not done, if our request (unintelligible) there will probably be a deterioration in the good relations between this country and the United States.

REPORTER: Do you mean that Thailand is going to break relations with the United States?

P.M. PRAMOTCH: We will have to wait and see the results.

BENNET: Ambassador WHITEHOUSE left the airport amidst derisive shouts that the entire U.S. military presence in Thailand should leave immediately. What the Thais want now are not U.S. Marines on their territory poised to perhaps strike again into Indochina, but assurances of neutrality with their aggressive Communist neighbors. And there are those who believe that they are even prepared to break relations with America seeking that assurance. This is Jim Bennet, ABC News in Bangkok.

REASONER: An official of the Thai Foreign Ministry criticized today's U.S. military action as piracy and madness. He said the U.S. gave no thought to the consequences for Thailand. What if Cambodia decides to retaliate, he asked? It can't retaliate against the Americans, they are too far away, but it can retaliate against Thailand which is right next door.

Commentary: Howard K. SMITH
