A new pamphlet—

John Lewis was born and raised in eastern Kentucky, and now lives in Norfolk, Virginia. He spent several weeks with the striking miners of Harlan County, Kentucky. He is a member of the Center for United Labor Action (CULA), a nationwide group of working men and women who fight to improve working conditions for workers of all races and nationalities.

He tells the story of the fight for a union in the Brookside mines of the Eastover Mining Company, a subsidiary of the multi-million dollar Duke Power Company. No mine in Harlan County had been organized since the 1940's. But the miners stuck it out for 13 months, during which they were beaten, arrested, and shot at. One miner was killed by a shotgun blast fired by a foreman. But in the end, supported by the Brookside Women's Club and by the United Mine Workers of America, they won their union.

Till Every Battle's Won reads like the labor battles of the 1930's in this country. But it is also part of the groundswell of workers to fight and win in the 1970's.

Working Women:

Our Stories and Struggles

50¢

This pamphlet contains the stories of C.U.L.A. women who in a year and a half organized three unions and negotiated contracts, stopped the telephone company from getting immediate rate increases and went into the streets with hundreds of women to protest daycare cuts. In addition, the pamphlet contains information on the Right to Work laws and states, stories of working conditions and discrimination women face nationwide, and our fight to put food on the table.

Welfare: Why Workers Need It How Billionaires Get It

Elizabeth Ross, the author, exposes the racist myths about welfare and points out that more federal funds are spent on pensions for military brass than for the poor nationwide. She remarks that the popular singer invited to the White House to sing "Welfare Cadillac" would have done better to sing "Welfare Oil Depletion Allowance."

Blast Furnace Brothers

50¢

Racism is the weapon the bosses use to get workers to fight each other instead of the company. This is the true story of the struggle inside a steel mill to defeat racism. But it wasn't the Black and white workers fighting each other--they had to fight the company. And in the end both Black and white won together.

The Battle of the Boycott

50¢

The behind-the-scenes struggle for the boycott of Farah pants. How the right of independent groups to support strikes by secondary boycotts was challenged by the N.L.R.B.'s effort to classify C.U.L.A. as a union and bring it and all similar groups under NLRB jurisdiction. CULA fought this case for the basic free speech right of all labor.
