

A REPUBLICAN CREED

A friend of mine, attempting to express the beliefs and faith of the Republican Party, wrote the following:

To tell men they can get something for nothing is wrong.

To buy votes by legislating benefits for some at the expense of others is wrong.

To incite the envy of one group of citizens for another is wrong.

To downgrade those virtues of thrift, honesty, self-reliance and reverence for the wisdom of tradition is to court disaster.

All Americans place love of God, home and country above their desire for easy living and material possessions.

It is our duty to maintain the strength of America spiritually, militarily and economically.

TO PRESERVE AND PROTECT those things of eternal value bequethed to us by the founders of the Republic we propose:

To stress and reward excellence in every field of human endeavor.

To demand and give our best in the accomplishment of every task to which we are called.

To recognize and work for true community spirit which is the opposite of the compulsion and bribery of collectivism.

To re-establish thrift and self-reliance in our national life and our personal lives.

To recognize and discharge our personal obligations to those less fortunate than ourselves.

To defend and support voluntary association and to oppose and denounce compulsory association.

To defend the institutions of local government against a state consolidation of power and the rights of states against the encroachments of the federal government.
