

GOOD TIMES, BAD TIMES

The situation of the United States today may be comparable to the world of Charles Dickens as he set it out in "A Tale of Two Cities." "The worst of times," he wrote of the freedom of England and the revolutionary chaos of France. In our own country we have an abundance of good things, both materially and spiritually. We also have a threat from the radical far-left which would alter our system of law and order, profit motive and adherence to the principles of sound government that our Founding Fathers set down for us.

The radical element would restructure our system of financing and swell the giveaway plan to unprecedented proportions, all at the expense of the working man, of course. This same element has publicly expressed delight in the legal victory of a communist here at home. This same element would obliterate our defense posture which admittedly has fallen behind that of the Russians. There is no mention from this element of pushing the pendulum back to the side of law enforcement and away from the criminal hordes who now threaten our very internal existence.

It is the radical element of the Far-Left that must be rejected at the polls and nailed down in debate on the platform of public opinion. It is frightening to U. S. citizens of patriotic zeal to hear the utterances of the radicals who are inducing domestic hemorrhaging. It is repulsive to listen to and read of their adherence to the cause of Hanoi, a cause that more than 50,000 U. S. servicemen have given their lives on the field of battle to stop. We of the freedom side can still choose between the best of times and the worst of times. HLH
