—Mary Harris
"Mother" Jones (1830-1930)

"Who was Mother Jones?" we're often asked. "Why did you name your magazine after her?"

She looked like a sweet old lady you'd expect to find in her rocker, telling Bible stories to her grandchildren. But Mary Harris Jones had the nation's 19th-century robber barons squirming under their top hats.

She started unions, ran strikes, fought for prison reform, helped found the IWW, supported the Mexican Revolution, and spent weeks at a time in jail. But she never lost her ability to laugh at herself, never ceased being critical of the causes to which she was committed. On one occasion, as her 100th birthday approached, she was introduced to a college audience as "a great humanitarian." "No!" Mother Jones roared. "I'm a hell-raiser!"

So who is Mother Jones? An inspiring memory of a great woman, and a magazine to help keep alive her spirit, her humor and her dedication in the years to come.

What Mother Jones Says About:

Porn. Can feminists walk the line? Deirdre English's razor-sharp analysis of the choice: censorship or the First Amendment. A surprising answer.

Food. "What this country needs is a stronger white rat." Says a food additive technician whose toxic flavors and colors are killing rats in FDA labs.

Diagnosing marriage. "Should you marry?" Dr. Drummond says if you are a woman, "No," if you're a man, "Yes." And the statistics show he's right!

Pinto madness. Chances are good your Pinto will blow up in a rear-end collision—Ford knew it when they sold it to you. We got the proof and forced history's largest auto recall.

The war against choice. Who are the women behind the anti-abortion movement? A behind-the-scenes report from the National Right to Life Convention.

Censored Doonesburys. A reader's guide to the Doonesburys America's papers wouldn't print.

Tom and Jane. Is Fonda a genuine hero or a sanctimonious dilettante? Is Hayden the left's best hope?

Infiltration. Two undercover MOTHER JONES reporters attend a top level corporate conference and discover how confident executives really are about their future.

The politics of fat. The national diet mania is a trap—and you can escape. For people of every weight.

Tobacco. How you get hooked. What smoking does to your virility. And the fight between the tobacco and furniture industries over who really causes all those house fires.

The Caesarean epidemic. How doctors peddle unnecessary surgery to make a fast buck—and the real expense is the health of the mother and child.

The dark side of diesel chic. The average diesel puts out about 1.3 pounds of sooty particulate matter per 1,000 miles — about 50 times that of gasoline-powered cars.

The crookedest union in America. No, not the Teamsters. After we published this story, we were thanked by International Laborers Union members. And warned to "stay out of Washington" by those who know their leaders.
