Expresses disapproval of "A high State Department official" who berated the American press for lionizing Mme Nhu. This is just as reprehensible as confiscating passports of a group of 57 Americans who visited Cuba recently. Mme Nhu and Castro are two different people. "But the Administration's attitude . . . on Americans' rights to know about them is a disguised attempt at censorship."

The editorial wonders whether withholding support from the Vietnamese special forces and applying economic pressures against Diem helps or hinders the war effort. " . . . how can the Diem regime be denied the right to use any forces within reach, special or otherwise, to defend itself?" The Administration is waging two wars-- one against the Communists and one against the Diem regime. It has not done too well against the Communists and therefore there is doubt "whether it can win two wars on two fronts."

"The junta of victorious generals who staged the coup seems to be in firm control . . . " and promises are made for the effective prosecution of the war. But "welcome as these promising aspects of the coup are, they cannot quite efface the human tragedy of the Ngos" who "deserved a better fate than being killed after they had surrendered."

A description of the Taylor-McNamara mission. They would probably learn little since junior officers "would hardly furnish them with anything but a rosy view so long as the boss--General Harkins--was hovering within earshot." But Time feels that since they are both "tough-minded men, with long experience at sorting fancy from fact" they would do lots of listening and little talking.
